PREFACE.

THE objects and scope of this work are explained in the Introductory Remarks which follow the Preface. Here it is desired to say a few words as to its history.

The book originated in a correspondence between the present writer, who was living at Palermo, and the late lamented ARTHUR BURNELL, of the Madras Civil Service, one of the most eminent of modern Indian scholars, who during the course of our communications was filling judicial offices in Southern and Western India, chiefly at Tanjore. We had then met only once—at the India Library; but he took a kindly interest in work that engaged me, and this led to an exchange of letters, which went on after his return to India. About 1872—I cannot find his earliest reference to the subject—he mentioned that he was contemplating a vocabulary of Anglo-Indian words, and had made some collections with that view. In reply it was stated that I likewise had long been taking note of such words, and that a notion similar to his own had also been at various times floating in my mind. And I proposed that we should combine our labours.

I had not, in fact, the linguistic acquirements needful for carrying through such an undertaking alone; but I had gone through an amount of reading that would largely help in instances and illustrations, and had also a strong natural taste for the kind of work.

This was the beginning of the portly double-columned edifice which now presents itself, the completion of which my friend has not lived to see. It was built up from our joint contributions till his untimely death in 1882, and since then almost daily additions have continued to be made to the material and to the structure. The subject, indeed, had taken so comprehensive a shape, that it was becoming difficult to say where its limits lay, or why it should ever end, except for the old reason which had received such poignant illustration: Ars longa, vita brevis. And so it has been wound up at last.

The work has been so long the companion of my horae subseivae, a thread running through the joys and sorrows of so many years, in the search for material first, and then in their handling and adjustment to the edifice—for their careful building up has been part of my duty from the beginning, and the whole of the matter has, I suppose, been written and re-written with my own hand at least four times—and the work has been one of so much interest to dear friends, of whom not a few are no longer here to welcome its appearance in print,* that I can hardly speak of the work except as mine.

Indeed, in bulk, nearly seven-eighths of it is so. But BURNELL contributed so much of value, so much of the essential; buying, in the search for illustration, numerous rare and costly books which were not otherwise accessible to him in India; setting me, by his example, on lines of research with which I should have else possibly remained unacquainted; writing letters with such fulness, frequency, and interest on the details of the work up to the summer of his death; that the measure of bulk in contribution is no gauge of his share in the result.

In the Life of Frank Buckland occur some words in relation to the church-bells of Ross, in Herefordshire, which may with some aptness illustrate our mutual relation to the book:

"It is said that the Man of Ross" (John Kyrle) "was present at the casting of the tenor, or great bell, and that he took with him an old silver tankard, which, after drinking claret and sherry, he threw in, and had cast with the bell."

John Kyrle's was the most precious part of the metal run into the mould, but the shaping of the mould and the larger part of the material came from the labour of another hand.

At an early period of our joint work BURNELL sent me a fragment of an essay on the words which formed our subject, intended as the basis of an introduction. As it stands, this is too incomplete to print, but I have made use of it to some extent, and given some extracts from it in the Introduction now put forward.†

* The dedication was sent for press on 6th January; on the 13th, G. U. Y. departed to his rest.
† Three of the mottoes that face the title were also sent by him.
The alternative title (Hobson-Jobson) which has been given to this book (not without the expressed assent of my collaborator), doubtless requires explanation.

A valued friend of the present writer many years ago published a book, of great acumen and considerable originality, which he called Three Essays, with no Author's name; and the resulting amount of circulation was such as might have been expected. It was remarked at the time by another friend that if the volume had been entitled A Book, by a Chap, it would have found a much larger body of readers. It seemed to me that A Glossary or A Vocabulary would be equally unattractive, and that it ought to have an alternative title at least a little more characteristic. If the reader will turn to Hobson-Jobson in the Glossary itself, he will find that phrase, though now rare and moribund, to be a typical and delightful example of that class of Anglo-Indian argot which consists of Oriental words highly assimilated, perhaps by vulgar lips, to the English vernacular; whilst it is the more fitted to our book, conveying, as it may, a veiled intimation of dual authorship. At any rate, there it is; and at this period my feeling has come to be that such is the book's name, nor could it well have been anything else.

In carrying through the work I have sought to supplement my own deficiencies from the most competent sources to which friendship afforded access. Sir Joseph Hooker has most kindly examined almost every one of the proof-sheets for articles dealing with plants, correcting their errors, and enriching them with notes of his own. Another friend, Professor Robertson Smith, has done the like for words of Semitic origin, and to him I owe a variety of interesting references to the words treated of, in regard to their occurrence, under some cognate form, in the Scriptures. In the early part of the book the Rev. George Moule (now Bishop of Ningpo), then in England, was good enough to revise those articles which bore on expressions used in China (not the first time that his generous aid had been given to work of mine). Among other friends who have been ever ready with assistance I may mention Dr. Reinhold Rost, of the India Library; General Robert Maclagan, R.E.; Sir George Birdwood, C.S.I.; Major-General R. H. Keatinge, V.C., C.S.I.; Professor Terrien de la Cooperie; and Mr. E. Colborne Baber, at present Consul-General in Corea. Dr. J. A. H. Murray, editor of the great English Dictionary, has also been most kind and courteous in the interchange of communications, a circumstance which will account for a few cases in which the passages cited in both works are the same.

My first endeavour in preparing this work has been to make it accurate; my next to make it—even though a Glossary—interesting. In a work intersecting so many fields, only a fool could imagine that he had not fallen into many mistakes; but these when pointed out, may be amended. If I have missed the other object of endeavour, I fear there is little to be hoped for from a second edition.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

The twofold hope expressed in the closing sentence of Sir Henry Yule's Preface to the original Edition of this book has been amply justified. More recent research and discoveries have, of course, brought to light a good deal of information which was not accessible to him, but the general accuracy of what he wrote has never been seriously impugned—while those who have studied the pages of Hobson-Jobson have agreed in classing it as unique among similar works of reference, a volume which combines interest and amusement with instruction, in a manner which few other Dictionaries, if any, have done.

In this edition of the Anglo-Indian Glossary the original text has been reprinted, any additions made by the Editor being marked by square brackets. No attempt has been made to extend the vocabulary, the new articles being either such as were accidentally omitted in the first edition, or a few relating to words which seemed to correspond with the general scope of the work. Some new quotations have been added, and some of those included in the original edition have been verified and new references given. An index to words occurring in the quotations has been prepared.

I have to acknowledge valuable assistance from many friends. Mr. W. W. Skeat has read the articles on Malay words, and has supplied many notes. Col. Sir R. Temple has permitted me to use several of his papers on Anglo-Indian words, and has kindly sent me advance sheets of that portion of the Analytical Index to the first edition by Mr. C. Partridge, which is being published in the Indian Antiquary. Mr. R. S. Whiteway has given me numerous extracts from Portuguese writers; Mr. W. Foster, quotations from unpublished records in the India Office; Mr. W. Irvine, notes on the later Moghul period. For valuable suggestions and information on disputed points I am indebted to Mr.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

Words of Indian origin have been insinuating themselves into English ever since the end of the reign of Elizabeth and the beginning of that of King James, when such terms as calico, chintz, and gingham had already effected a lodgment in English warehouses and shops, and were lying in wait for entrance into English literature. Such outlandish guests grew more frequent 180 years ago, when, soon after the middle of last century, the numbers of Englishmen in the Indian services, civil and military, expanded with the great acquisition of dominion then made by the Company; and we meet them in vastly greater abundance now.

Vocabularies of Indian and other foreign words, in use among Europeans in the East, have not unfrequently been printed. Several of the old travellers have attached the like to their narratives; whilst the prolonged excitement created in England, a hundred years since, by the impeachment of Hastings and kindred matters, led to the publication of several glossaries as independent works; and a good many others have been published in later days. At the end of this Introduction will be found a list of those which have come under my notice, and this might no doubt be largely added to.

Of modern Glossaries, such as have been the result of serious labour, all, or nearly all, have been of a kind purely technical, intended to facilitate the comprehension of official documents by the explanation of terms used in the Revenue department, or in other branches of Indian administration. The most notable examples are (of brief and occasional character), the Glossary appended to the famous Fifth Report of the Select Committee of 1812, which was compiled by Sir Charles Wilkins; and (of a far more vast and comprehensive sort), the late Professor Horace Hayman Wilson's Glossary of Judicial and Revenue Terms (4to, 1855) which leaves far behind every other attempt in that kind.

That kind is, however, not ours, as a momentary comparison of a page or two in each Glossary would suffice to show. Our work indeed, in the long course of its compilation, has gone through some modification and enlargement of scope; but hardly such as in any degree to affect its distinctive character, in which something has been aimed at differing in form from any work known to us. In its original conception it was intended to deal with all that class of words which, not in general pertaining to the technicalities of administration, recur constantly in the daily intercourse of the English in India, either as expressing ideas really not provided for by our mother-tongue, or supposed by the speakers (often quite erroneously) to express something not capable of just denotation by any English term. A certain percentage of such words have been carried to England by the constant reflux to their native shore of Anglo-Indians, who in some degree imbue with their notions and phraseology the circles from which they had gone forth. This effect has been still more promoted by the currency of a vast mass of literature, of all qualities and for all ages, dealing with Indian subjects; as well as by the regular appearance, for many years past, of Indian correspondence in English newspapers, insomuch that a considerable number of the expressions in question have not only become familiar in sound to English ears, but have become naturalised in the English language, and are meeting with ample recognition in the great Dictionary edited by Dr. Murray at Oxford.

* See Note A. at end of Introduction.
† Professor Wilson's work may perhaps bear re-editing, but can hardly, for its purpose, be superseded. The late eminent Telugu scholar, Mr. C. P. Brown, interleaved, with criticisms and addenda, a copy of Wilson, which is now in the India Library. I have gone through it, and borrowed a few notes, with acknowledgment by the initials C. P. B. The amount of improvement does not strike me as important.

Of words that seem to have been admitted to full franchise, we may give examples in curry, toddy, veranda, cheroot, loot, nabob, teapoy, sepoy, cowry; and of others familiar enough to the English ear, though hardly yet received into citizenship, compound, batta, pucka, chowry, baboo, mahout, aya, nautch.* first-chop, competition-wallah, griffin, &c. But beyond these two classes of words, received within the last century or so, and gradually, into half or whole recognition, there are a good many others, long since fully assimilated, which really originated in the adoption of an Indian word, or the modification of an Indian proper name. Such words are the three quoted at the beginning of these remarks, chintz, calico, gingham, also shawl, bamboo, pagoda, typhoon, monsoon, mandarin, palangquin,† &c., and I may mention among further examples which may perhaps surprise my readers, the names of three of the boats of a man-of-war, viz. the cutter, the jolly-boat, and the dingy, as all (probably) of Indian origin. Even phrases of a different character—slang indeed, but slang generally supposed to be vernacular as well as vulgar—e.g. 'that is the cheese'; sup posed to be vernacular and profane—e.g. 'I don't care a dam'—are in reality, however vulgar they may be, neither vernacular nor profane, but phrases turning upon innocent Hindustani vocables.

We proposed also, in our Glossary, to deal with a selection of those administrative terms, which are in such familiar and quotidian use as to form part of the common Anglo-Indian stock, and to trace all (so far as possible) to their true origin—a matter on which, in regard to many of the words, those who hourly use them are profoundly ignorant—and to follow them down by quotation from their earliest occurrence in literature.

A particular class of words are those indigenous terms which have been adopted in scientific nomenclature, botanical and zoological. On these Mr. Burnell remarks:—

"The first Indian botanical names were chiefly introduced by Garcia de Orta (Colloquios, printed at Goa in 1563), C. d'Acosta (Tractado, Burgos, 1578), and Rhede van Drakenstein (Hortus Malabaricus, Amsterdam, 1682). The Malay names were chiefly introduced by Rumphius (Herbarium Am-

* Nautch, it may be urged, is admitted to full franchise, being used by so eminent a writer as Mr. Browning. But the fact that his use is entirely mine, seems to justify the classification in the text (see Gloss., s.v.). A like remark applies to compound. See for the tremendous fiasco made in its intended use by a most intelligent lady novelist, the last quotation s.v. in Gloss.

† Gloss., s.v. (note p. 659, col. a), contains quotations from the Vulgate of the passage in Canticles iii. 9, regarding King Solomon's ferculum of Lebanon cedar. I have to thank an old friend for pointing out that the word palangquin has, in this passage, received solemn sanction by its introduction into the Revised Version.

bovinense, completed before 1700, but not published till 1741). The Indian zoological terms were chiefly due to Dr. F. Buchanan, at the beginning of this century. Most of the N. Indian botanical words were introduced by Roxburgh."

It has been already intimated that, as the work proceeded, its scope expanded somewhat, and its authors found it expedient to introduce and trace many words of Asiatic origin which have disappeared from colloquial use, or perhaps never entered it, but which occur in old writers on the East. We also judged that it would add to the interest of the work, were we to investigate and make out the pedigree of a variety of geographical names which are or have been in familiar use in books on the Indies; take as examples Bombay, Madras, Gourdehui, Malabar, Moluccas, Zanzibar, Pegu, Sumatra, Quilon, Seychelles, Ceylon, Java, Ava, Japan, Doab, Punjab, &c., illustrating these, like every other class of word, by quotations given in chronological series.

Other divagations still from the original project will probably present themselves to those who turn over the pages of the work, in which we have been tempted to introduce sundry subjects which may seem hardly to come within the scope of such a glossary.

The words with which we have to do, taking the most extensive view of the field, are in fact organic remains deposited under the various currents of external influence that have washed the shores of India during twenty centuries and more. Rejecting that derivation of elephant* which would connect it with the Ophir trade of Solomon, we find no existing Western term traceable to that episode of communication; but the Greek and Roman commerce of the later centuries has left its fossils on both sides, testifying to the intercourse that once subsisted. Agallochum, carbasua, camphor, sandal, musk, nard, pepper (strem, from Skt. pippali, 'long pepper'), ginger (fiyizeps, see under Ginger), lac, costus, opal, malabathrum or folium indicum, beryl, sugar (axap, from Skt. sarkara, Prak. sakṣaṇa), rice (boja, but see s.v.), were products or names, introduced from India to the Greek and Roman world, to which may be added a few terms of a different character, such as Brahma, Zapatv (drumamah, or Buddhist ascetics), tira srgalna t kal sarap (logs of teak and shaham), the ogyapa (rafts) of the Peripus (see Jangar in Gloss.); whilst dindra, drama, perhaps kastara (tin, kasttropor), kastari ('musk,' kastrover, properly a different, though analogous animal product), and a very few more, have remained in Indian literature as testimony to the same intercourse.†

The trade and conquests of the Arabs both brought foreign words to India and picked up and carried westward, in form more or less corrupted, words of Indian origin, some of which have in one way or other become part of the heritage of all succeeding foreigners in the East. Among terms which are familiar items in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, but which had, in some shape or other, found their way at an early date into use on the shores of the Mediterranean, we may instance bazaar, caza, hummaul, brinjaul, gingely, safflower, grab, maramul, dewan (dogana, douane, &c.). Of others which are found in medieval literature, either West-Asiatic or European, and which still have a place in Anglo-Indian or English vocabulary, we may mention amber-gris, chank, junk, jogy, kincob, kedgeroe, fanam, calay, bankshall, mudiher, tindal, cranny.

* See this word in Gloss.
† See A. Weber, in Indian Antiquary, ii. 143 seqq. Most of the other Greek words, which he traces in Sanskrit, are astronomical terms derived from books.
INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

The conquests and long occupation of the Portuguese, who by the year 1540 had established themselves in all the chief ports of India and the East, have, as might have been expected, bequeathed a large number of expressions to the European nations who have followed, and in great part supersede them. We find instances of missionaries and others at an early date who had acquired a knowledge of Indian languages, but these were exceptional. The natives in contact with the Portuguese learned a bastard variety of the language of the latter, which became the lingua franca of intercourse, not only between European and native, but occasionally between Europeans of different nationalities. This Indo-Portuguese dialect continued to serve such purposes down to a late period in the last century, and has in some localities survived down nearly to our own day.† The number of people in India claiming to be of Portuguese descent was, in the 17th century, very large. Bernier, about 1660, says:—

“For he (Sultan Shuja’, Aurangzeb’s brother) much courted all the Portuguese Fathers, Missionaries, that are in that Province. . . . And they were indeed capable to serve him, it being certain that in the kingdom of Bengal there are to be found not less than eight or nine thousand families of Franquis, Portugals, and these either Natives or Mesticks.” (Bernier, E.T. of 1684, p. 27.)

A. Hamilton, whose experience belonged chiefly to the end of the same century, though his book was not published till 1727, states:—

“Along the Sea-costs the Portugese have left a Vestige of their Language, tho’ much corrupted, yet it is the Language that most Europeans learn first to qualify them for a general Converse with one another, as well as with the different inhabitants of India.” (Preface, p. xii.)

Lockyer, who published 16 years before Hamilton, also says:—

“This they (the Portuguese) may justly boast, they have established kind of Lingua Franca in all the Sea Ports in India, of great use to other Europeans, who would find it difficult in many places to be well understood without it.” (An Account of the Trade in India, 1711, p. 286.)

The early Lutheran Missionaries in the South, who went out for the S.P.C.K., all seem to have begun by learning Portuguese, and in their diaries speak of preaching occasionally in Portuguese.‡ The foundation of this lingua franca was the Portuguese of the beginning of the 16th century; but it must have soon degenerated, for by the beginning of the last century it had lost nearly all trace of inflexion.§

It may from these remarks be easily understood how a large number of

* Varthema, at the very beginning of the 16th century, shows some acquaintance with Malayalam, and introduces pieces of conversation in that language. Before the end of the 16th century, printing had been introduced at other places besides Goa, and by the beginning of the 17th, several books in Indian languages had been printed at Goa, Cochin, and Ambalakadu.—(A. B.)

† “At Point de Galle, in 1660, I found it in common use, and also, somewhat later at Calcutta.”—(A. B.)

‡ See “Notices of Madras and Cuddalore, &c., by the earlier Missionaries.” Longman, 1858, passim. See also Manual, &c., in Book-List, infra p. xxxix. Dr Carey, writing from Serampore as late as 1800, says that the children of Europeans by native women, whether children of English, French, Dutch, or Danes, were all called Portuguese. Smith’s Life of Carey, 152.

§ See Note B. at end of Introductory Remarks. “Mr. Beames remarked some time ago that most of the names of places in South India are greatly disfigured in the form used by Europeans. This is because we have adopted the Portuguese orthography. Only in this way it can be explained how Colladam has become Gollerum, Solamandalam, Coromandel, and Tutukkudi, Tutukorin.” (A. B.) Mr. Burnell was so impressed with the excessive corruption of S. Indian names, that he would hardly ever willingly venture any explanation of them, considering the matter all too uncertain.
our Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, even if eventually traceable to native sources (and especially to Mahratti, or Dravidian originals) have come to us through a Portuguese medium, and often bear traces of having passed through that alembic. Not a few of these are familiar all over India, but the number current in the South is larger still. Some other Portuguese words also, though they can hardly be said to be recognized elements in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, have been introduced either into Hindustani generally, or into that shade of it which is in use among natives in habitual contact with Europeans. Of words which are essentially Portuguese, among Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, persistent or obsolete, we may quote goglet, gram, plantain, munter, caste, peon, padre, mistry or majesty, almyra, aya, cobra, mosquito, pomfret, camees, palmyra, still in general use; picolta, rolong, pial, fogass, margosa, preserved in the South; batel, brab, foras, oart, eellard in Bombay; joss, comrador, linguist in the ports of China; and among more or less obsolete terms, Moor, for a Mahommedan, still surviving under the modified form Moorman, in Madras and Ceylon; Gentoo, still partially kept up, I believe, at Madras in application to the Telugu language, mustees, castees, bandeja ('a tray'), Kittysol ('an umbrella,' and this survived ten years ago in the Calcutta customs tariff), cuespador ('a spittoon'), and covit ('a cubit or ell').

Words of native origin which bear the mark of having come to us through the Portuguese may be illustrated by such as palanquin, mandarin, mangelin (a small weight for pearls), &c.) monsoon, typhoon, mango, mangosteen, jack-fruit, batta, curry, chop, congee, coir, cutch, catamaran, cassanar, nabob, avadaav, betel, areca, benzoin, corge, copra.* A few examples of Hindustani words borrowed from the Portuguese are chabbi ('a key'), batola ('a portmanteau'), badi ('a bucket'), martol ('a hammer'), toaliga ('a towel'), Port. soldha ('soap'), basan ('plate' from Port. bacia), lidam and nildm ('an auction'), besides a number of terms used by Lascars on board ship.

The Dutch language has not contributed much to our store. The Dutch and the English arrived in the Indies contemporaneously, and though both inherited from the Portuguese, we have not been the heirs of the Dutch to any great extent, except in Ceylon, and even there Portuguese vocables had already occupied the colloquial ground. Peterally, the word in general use in English families for 'parsley,' appears to be Dutch. An example from Ceylon that occurs to memory is burgher. The Dutch admitted people of mixt descent to a kind of citizenship, and these were distinguished from the pure natives by this term, which survives. Burgher in Bengal means 'a rafter,' properly barga. A word spelt and pronounced in the same way had again a curiously different application in Madras, where it was a corruption of Vadagar, the name given to a tribe in the Nilgherry hills;—to say nothing of Scotland, where Burghers and Antiburghers were Northern tribes (veluti Gog et Magog!) which have long been condensed into elements of the United Presbyterian Church.—!

Southern India has contributed to the Anglo-Indian stock words that are in hourly use also from Calcutta to Peshawur (some of them already noted under another cleavage), e.g. betel, mango, jack, cheroor, mungoose, pariah, bandicoot, teak, patcharee, chatty, catechu, tope ('a grove'), curry, multigawamy, congee. Mamoony (a digging tool) is familiar in certain branches of the service, owing to its having long had a place in the nomenclature of the Ordnance department. It is Tamil, mannatti, 'earth-cutter.' Of some very familiar words the origin remains either dubious, or matter only for conjecture. Examples are hackery (which arose apparently in Bombay), florican, topaz.

* The nasal termination given to many Indian words, when adopted into European use, as in palangquin, mandarin, &c., must be attributed mainly to the Portuguese; but it cannot be entirely due to them. For we find the nasal termination of Achin, in Mahommedan writers (see p. 3), and that of Cockin before the Portuguese time (see p. 225), whilst the conversion of Pacsi, in Sumatra, into Pacem, as the Portuguese call it, is already indicated in the Banam of Marco Polo.

As to Hindustani words adopted into the Anglo-Indian colloquial the subject is almost too wide and loose for much remark. The habit of introducing these in English conversation and writing seems to prevail more largely in the Bengal Presidency than in any other, and especially more than in Madras, where the variety of different vernaculars in use has tended to make their acquisition by the English less universal than is in the north that of Hindustani, which is so much easier to learn, and also to make the use in former days of Portuguese, and now of English, by natives in contact with foreigners, and of French about the French settlements, very much more common than it is elsewhere. It is this bad habit of interlarding English with Hindustani phrases which has so often excited the just wrath of high English officials, not accustomed to it from their youth, and which (e.g.) drew forth in orders the humorous indignation of Sir Charles Napier.

One peculiarity in this use we may notice, which doubtless exemplifies some obscure linguistic law. Hindustani verbs which are thus used are habitually adopted into the quasi-English by converting the imperative into an infinitive. Thus to bunow, to luguw, to foestrów, to pukarow, to dumbcow, to sumjow, and so on, almost ad libitum, are formed as we have indicated.*

It is curious to note that several of our most common adoptions are due to what may be most especially called the Oordoo (Urdu) or 'Camp' language, being terms which the hosts of Chinghiz brought from the steppes of North Eastern Asia—e.g. "The old Bukshée is an awful báhadur, but he keeps a first-rate bobachee." That is a sentence which might easily have passed without remark at an Anglo-Indian mess-table thirty years ago—perhaps might be heard still. Each of the outlandish terms embraced in it came from the depths of Mongolia in the thirteenth century. Chick (in the sense of a cane-blind), daroga, oordoo itself, are other examples.

With the gradual assumption of administration after the middle of last century, we adopted into partial colloquial use an immense number of terms, very many of them Persian or Arabic, belonging to technicalities of revenue and other departments, and largely borrowed from our Mahomedan predecessors. Malay has contributed some of our most familiar expressions, owing partly to the ceaseless rovings among the Eastern coasts of the Portuguese, through whom a part of these reached us, and partly doubtless to the fact that our early dealings and the sites of our early factories lay much more on the shores of the Eastern Archipelago than on those of Continental India. Paddy, godown, compound, banksháll, rattan, durian, a-muck, proo, and cadjan, junk, crease, are some of these. It is true that several of them may be traced eventually to Indian originals, but it seems not the less certain that we got them through the Malay, just as we got words already indicated through the Portuguese.

We used to have a very few words in French form, such as boutique and mort-de-chien. But these two are really distortions of Portuguese words.

A few words from China have settled on the Indian shores and been adopted by Anglo-India, but most of them are, I think, names of fruits or other products which have been imported, such as loquat, lechee, chow-chow, cumquat, ginseng, &c. and (recently) jinrickshaw. For it must be noted that a considerable proportion of words much used in Chinese ports, and often ascribed to a Chinese origin, such as mandarin, junk, chop, pagoda, and (as I believe) typhoon (though this is a word much debated) are not Chinese at all, but words of Indian languages, or of Malay, which have been precipitated in Chinese waters during the flux and reflux of foreign trade.

Within my own earliest memory Spanish dollars were current in England at a specified value if they bore a stamp from the English mint. And similarly there are certain English words, often obsolete in Europe, which have received in India currency with a special stamp of meaning; whilst in other cases our language has formed in India new compounds applicable to new objects or shades of meaning. To one or other of these classes belong outcry, buggy, home, interloper, rogue (-elephant), tiffin, furlough, elk, roundel ('an umbrella,' obsolete), pish-pash, earth-oil, hog-deer, flying-fox, garden-house, musk-rat, nor-wester, iron-wood, long-drawers, barking-deer, custard-apple, grass-cutter, &c.

Other terms again are corruptions, more or less violent, of Oriental words and phrases which have put on an English mask. Such are mauynd, foot's rack, bearer, cot, boy, belly-band, Penang-lawyer, buckshaw, goddess (in the Malay region, representing Malay gadis, a maiden), compound, college- pheasant, chopper, summer-head, *eagle-wood, jackass-copal, bobbery, Upper Roger (used in a correspondence given by Dalrymple, for Yuva Raja, the ‘Young King,’ or Caesar, of Indo-Chinese monarchies), Isle-o'-Bats (for Allahabad or Allahabad as the natives often call it), hobson-jobson (see Preface), St. John's. The last proper name has at least three applications. There is “St. John's” in Guzerat, viz. Sanjān, the landing-place of the Parsee immigration in the 8th century; there is another “St. John's” which is a corruption of Shang-Chuang, the name of that island off the southern coast of China whence the pure and ardent spirit of Francis Xavier fled to a better world: there is the group of “St. John's Islands” near Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulau-Sikajang.

Yet again we have hybrids and corruptions of English fully accepted and adopted as Hindustani by the natives with whom we have to do, such as simkin, port-shrub, brandy-pāni, apil, rasid, tumlet (a tumbler), gīlā ('glass,' for drinking vessels of sorts), rail-gāri, lumber-dār, jail-khāna, bottle-khāna, buggy-khāna, ‘et omne quod exit in' khāna, including gymkhāna, a very modern concoction (q.v.), and many more.

Taking our subject as a whole, however considerable the philological interest attaching to it, there is no disputing the truth of a remark with which Burnell’s fragment of intended introduction concludes, and the application of which goes beyond the limit of those words which can be considered to have ‘accrued as additions to the English language’: “Considering the long intercourse with India, it is noteworthy that the additions which have thus accrued to the English language are, from the intellectual standpoint, of no intrinsic value. Nearly all the borrowed words refer to material facts, or to peculiar customs and stages of society, and, though a few of them furnish allusions to the penny-a-liner, they do not represent new ideas.”

It is singular how often, in tracing to their origin words that come within the field of our research, we light upon an absolute dilemma, or bifurcation, i.e. on two or more sources of almost equal probability, and in themselves entirely diverse. In such cases it may be that, though the use of the word originated from one of the sources, the existence of the other has invigorated that use, and contributed to its eventual diffusion.

An example of this is boy, in its application to a native servant. To this application have contributed both the old English use of boy (analogous to that of puer, garçon, Knabe) for a camp-servant, or for a slave, and the Hindi bhōi, the name of a caste which has furnished palanquin and umbrella-bearers to many generations of Europeans in India. The habitual use of the word by the Portuguese, for many years before any English influence had touched the shores of India (e.g. bōy de sombrero, bōy d'aguada), shows that the earliest source was the Indian one.

Cooly, in its application to a carrier of burdens, or performer of inferior labour, is another example. The most probable origin of this is from a nomen gentile, that of the Kolis, a hill-people of Guzerat and the Western Ghats (compare the origin of slave). But the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to connect with this. Thus, in S. India, there is a Tamil word kāli, in common use, signifying 'daily hire or wages,' which H. H. Wilson regards as the true origin of the word which we call cooly. Again, both in Oriental and Osmalian Turkish, kol is a word for a slave, and in the latter also there is kāleh, 'a male slave, a bondsman.' Khol is, in Tibetan, also, a word for a slave or servant.

Tank, for a reservoir of water, we are apt to derive without hesitation from stagnum, whence Sp. estanc, old Fr. estang, old Eng. and Lowland Scotch stank, Port. tanque, till we find that the word is regarded by the Portuguese themselves as Indian, and that there is excellent testimony to the existence of tánkā in Guzerat and Rajputana as an indigenous word, and with a plausible Sanskrit etymology.

Veranda has been confidently derived by some etymologists (among other by M. Defrémery, a distinguished scholar) from the Pers. bārdmāda, 'a projection,' a balcony; an etymology which is indeed hardly a possible one, but has been treated by Mr. Beames (who was evidently unacquainted with the facts that do make it hardly possible) with inappropriate derison, he giving as the unquestionable original a Sanskrit word baraṛāda, 'a portico.' On this Beames (who was evidently unacquainted with the facts that do make it hardly possible) with inappropriate derison, he giving as the unquestionable original a Sanskrit word baraṛāda, 'a portico.' On thisBurnell has observed that the word does not belong to the older Sanskrit but is only found in comparatively modern works. Be that as it may, it need not be doubted that the word veranda, as used in England and France, was imported from India, i.e. from the usage of Europeans in India; but it is still more certain that either in the same sense, or in one closely allied, the word existed, quite independent of either Sanskrit or Persian, in Portuguese and Spanish, and the manner in which it occurs in the very earliest narrative of the Portuguese adventure to India (Roteiro do Viagem de Vasco da Gama written by one of the expedition of 1497), confirmed by the Hispano-Arabic vocabulary of Pedro de Alcalá, printed in 1505, preclude the possibility of its having been adopted by the Portuguese from intercourse with India.

Mangrove, John Crawford tells us, has been adopted from the Malay manggiri-manggri, applied to trees of the genus Rhizophora. But we learn from Oviedo, writing early in the sixteenth century, that the name mangle was applied by the natives of the Spanish Main to trees of the same, or a kindred genus, on the coast of S. America, which same mangle is undoubtedly the parent of the French manglier, and not improbably therefore of the English form mangrove.

*Mr. Skeat's Etym. Dict. does not contain mangrove. [It will be found in his Concise Etymological Dict. ed. 1901.]*
INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

The words bearer, mate, cotswal, partake of this kind of dual or doubtful ancestry, as may be seen by reference to them in the Glossary.

Before concluding, a word should be said as to the orthography used in the Glossary.

My intention has been to give the headings of the articles under the most usual of the popular, or, if you will, vulgar quasi-English spellings, whilst the Oriental words, from which the headings are derived or corrupted, are set forth under precise transliteration, the system of which is given in a following "Nota Bene." When using the words and names in the course of discursive elucidation, I fear I have not been consistent in sticking either always to the popular or always to the scientific spelling, and I can the better understand why a German critic of a book of mine, once upon a time, remarked upon the etwas schwanckende yutsiche Orthographie. Indeed it is difficult, it never will for me be possible, in a book for popular use, to adhere to one system in this matter without the assumption of an ill-fitting and repulsive pedantry. Even in regard to Indian proper names, in which I once advocated adhesion, with a small number of exceptions, to scientific precision in transliteration, I feel much more inclined than formerly to sympathise with my friends Sir William Muir and General Maclagan, who have always favoured a large and liberal recognition of popular spelling in such names. And when I see other good and able friends following the scientific Will-o' the Wisp into such bogs as the use in English composition of sipahi and jangal, and verandah—nay, I have not only heard of bugs, but have recently seen it—instead of the good English words 'sepoy,' and 'jungle,' 'veranda,' and 'buggy,' my dread of pedantic usage becomes the greater.*

For the spelling of Mahratta, Mahratti, I suppose I must apologize (though something is to be said for it), Marat̄ih having established itself as orthodox.

NOTE A.—LIST OF GLOSSARIES.

1. Appended to the Boteiro de Vasco da Gama (see Book-list, p. xliii.) is a Vocabulary of 338 Portuguese words with their corresponding word in the Lingua de Calicut, i.e. in Malayalam.

2. Appended to the Voyages, &c., du Sieur de la Boulaye-le-Goux (Book-list, p. xxxii.), is an Explication de plusieurs mots dont l'intelligence est nécessaire au Lecteur (pp. 27).

3. Fryer's New Account (Book-list, p. xxxiv.) has an Index Explanatory, including Proper Names, Names of Things, and Names of Persons (12 pages).

4. "Indian Vocabulary, to which is prefixed the Forms of Impeachment." 12mo. Stockdale, 1788 (pp. 136).

6. "A Dictionary of Mohammedan Law, Bengal Revenue Terms, Shanscrit, Hindoo, and other words used in the East Indies, with full explanations, the leading word used in each article being printed in a new Nastuluk Type," &c. By S. Rousseau. London, 1802. 12mo. (pp. lxxiv.-287). Also 2nd ed. 1805.

* 'Buggy' of course is not an Oriental word at all, except as adopted from us by Orientals. I call sepoy, jungle, and verando, good English words; and so I regard them, just as good as alligator, or hurricane, or canoe, or Jerusalem artichoke, or cheroot. What would my friends think of spelling these in English books as alagarto, and huracan, and canoe, and girasole, and sherriffu!

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

7. Glossary prepared for the Fifth Report (see Book-list, p. xxxiv.), by Sir Charles Wilkins. This is dated in the preface "E. I. House, 1813." The copy used is a Parliamentary reprint, dated 1830.

8. The Folio compilation of the Bengal Regulations, published in 1828-29, contains in each volume a Glossarial Index, based chiefly upon the Glossary of Sir C. Wilkins.

9. In 1842 a preliminary "Glossary of Indian Terms," drawn up at the E. I. House by Prof. H. H. Wilson, 4to, unpublished, with a blank column on each page "for Suggestions and Additions," was circulated in India, intended as a basis for a comprehensive official Glossary. In this one the words are entered in the vulgar spelling, as they occur in the documents.

10. The only important result of the circulation of No. 9, was "Supplement to the Glossary of Indian Terms, A.—J." By H. M. Elliot, Esq., Bengal Civil Service, Agra, 1845. 8vo. (pp. 447).

This remarkable work has been revised, re-arranged, and re-edited, with additions from Elliot’s notes and other sources, by Mr. John Beames, of the Bengal Civil Service, under the title of "Memoirs on the Folk-Lore and Distribution of the Races of the North-Western Provinces of India, being an amplified edition of" (the above). 2 vols. 8vo. Trübner, 1869.

11. To "Morley’s Analytical Digest of all the Reported Cases Decided in the Supreme Courts of Judicature in India," Vol. I., 1850, there is appended a "Glossary of Native Terms used in the Text" (pp. 20).

12. In "Wanderings of a Pilgrim" (Book-list, p. xlvii.), there is a Glossary of some considerable extent (pp. 10 in double columns).

15. A useful folio Glossary published by Government at Calcutta between 1860 and 1870, has been used by me and is quoted in the present Gloss, as "Calcutta Glossary." But I have not been able to trace it again so as to give the proper title.

17. "Kachchri Technicalities, or A Glossary of Terms, Rural, Official, and General, in Daily Use in the Courts of Law, and in Illustration of the Tenures, Customs, Arts, and Manufactures of Hindustan." By Patrick Carnegy, Commissioner of Rai Bareli, Oudh. 8vo. 2nd ed. Allahabad, 1877 (pp. 361).

18. "A Glossary of Indian Terms, containing many of the most important and Useful Indian Words Designed for the Use of Officers of Revenue and Judicial Practitioners and Students." Madras, 1877. 8vo. (pp. 255).

21. " Anglo-Indian Dictionary. A Glossary of such Indian Terms used in English, and such English or other non-Indian terms as have obtained special meanings in India." By George Clifford Whitworth, Bombay Civil Service. London, 1855 (pp. xv—350).

Also the following minor Glossaries contained in Books of Travel or History:

22. In "Cambridge’s Account of the War in India," 1761 (Book-list, p. xxx.).
23. In "Grose’s Voyage," 1772 (Book-list, p. xxxv.).
24. In "Carracciolli’s Life of Clive" (Book-list, p. xxx.).
25. In "Bp. Hawkins’s Narrative" (Book-list, p. xxxvi.).
26. In Herkilot’s "Qanoon-e-Islam" (Book-list, p. xxxiv.).
27. In "Veletis’ View of Bengal," 1772.
29. "Manual of the Administration of the Madras Presidency," Vol. I., Career, Madras, 1893. The name of the author of this, the most valuable book of the kind recently published in India, does not appear upon the title-page. It is believed to be the work of C. D. Maclean; 30. A useful Glossary of Malayalam words will be found in Logan, "Manual of Malabar."]
NOTE B.—THE INDO-PORTUGUESE PATOIS

(By A. C. Burrell.)

The phonetic changes of Indo-Portuguese are few. $F$ is substituted for $p$; whilst the accent varies according to the race of the speaker.* The vocabulary varies, as regards the introduction of native Indian terms, from the same cause.

Grammatically, this dialect is very singular:

1. All traces of genders are lost—e.g. we find sua poca (Mat. i. 21); sua nome (id. i. 23); sua filha (id. i. 25); sua filhos (id. ii. 18); sua othos (Acts, ix. 8); o dias (Mat. ii. 1); o rey (id. ii. 2); hum voz tinhá ouvido (id. ii. 18).

2. In the plural, $s$ is rarely added; generally, the plural is the same as the singular.

3. The genitive is expressed by de, which is not combined with the article—e.g. conforme de o tempo (Mat. ii. 16); Depois de o morre (id. ii. 19).

4. The definite article is unchanged in the plural: como o discipulos (Acts, ix. 19).

5. The pronouns still preserve some inflexions: Eu, mi; nos, nosostros; minha, nossos, &c.; tu, ti, vosotros; tua, vosso; El, ella, ellos, elles, sua, suas, la, la.

6. The verb substantive is (present) tem, (past) tinhá, and (subjunctive) seja.

7. Verbs are conjugated by adding, for the present, $t$ to the only form, viz., the infinitive, which loses its final $r$. Thus, te falá; te faze; te vi. The past is formed by adding $j$—e.g. ja falá; ja olha. The future is formed by adding $ser$. To express the infinitive, $per$ is added to the Portuguese infinitive deprived of its $r$.

* Unfortunately, the translators of the Indo-Portuguese New Testament have, as much as possible, preserved the Portuguese orthography.
NOTA BENE

IN THE USE OF THE GLOSSARY

(A.) The dates attached to quotations are not always quite consistent. In beginning the compilation, the dates given were those of the publication quoted; but as the date of the composition, or of the use of the word in question, is often much earlier than the date of the book or the edition in which it appears, the system was changed, and, where possible, the date given is that of the actual use of the word. But obvious doubts may sometimes rise on this point.

The dates of publication of the works quoted will be found, if required, from the Book List, following this Nota bene.

(B.) The system of transliteration used is substantially the same as that modification of Sir William Jones's which is used in Shakespear's Hindustani Dictionary. But—

The first of the three Sanskrit sibilants is expressed by (s), and, as in Wilson's Glossary, no distinction is marked between the Indian aspirated k, g, and the Arabic gutturals kh, gh. Also, in words transliterated from Arabic, the sixteenth letter of the Arabic alphabet is expressed by (t). This is the same type that is used for the cerebral Indian (ṭ). Though it can hardly give rise to any confusion, it would have been better to mark them by distinct types. The fact is, that it was wished at first to make as few demands as possible for distinct types, and, having begun so, change could not be made.

The fourth letter of the Arabic alphabet is in several cases represented by (ṭḥ) when Arabic use is in question. In Hindustani it is pronounced as (ś).

Also, in some of Mr. Burnell's transliterations from S. Indian languages, he has used (ṅ) for the peculiar Tamil hard (r), elsewhere (r), and (γ) for the Tamil and Malayālam (k) when preceded and followed by a vowel.

The first Decad was originally printed in 1552, the 2nd in 1553, the 3rd in 1563, the 4th as completed by Lavanha in 1613 (Barbosa-Machado, Bibl. Lusit. ii., pp. 606-607, as corrected by Figaniere, Bibliogr. Hist. Port. p. 169). A. B.

In some of Burnell’s quotations he uses the 2nd ed. of Desa. i. to iii. (1628), and the 1st ed. of Dec. iv. (1613). In these there is apparently no division into chapters, and I have transferred the references to the edition of 1778, from which all my own quotations are made, whenever I could identify the passages, having myself no convenient access to the older editions.

Couto, Diogo da. The edition of the Décadas da Asia quoted habitually is that of 1778 (see Barros). The 4th Decade (Couto's first) was published first in 1602, fol.; the 5th, 1612; the 6th, 1614; the 7th, 1616; the 8th, 1673; 5 books of the 12th, Paris, 1845. The 9th was first published in an edition issued in 1736; and 120 pp. of the 10th (when, is not clear). But the whole of the 10th, in ten books, is included in the publication of 1778. The 11th was lost, and a substitute by the editor is given in the ed. of 1778. Couto died 10th Dec. 1616.

Hakluyt. The references to this name are, with a very few exceptions, to the reprint, with many additions, in 3 vols. 4to. 1807. Several of the additions are from travellers subsequent to the time of Richard Hakluyt, which gives an odd aspect to some of the quotations.

Roger, Abraham. La Porte Ouverte... ou la Vraye Representation, &c. 4to. Amsterdam, 1670.

The author was the first Chaplain at Pulicat (1631-1641), and then for some years at Batavia (see Havart, p. 129). He returned home in 1647 and died in 1649, at Gouda (Pref. p. 3). The book was brought out by his widow. Thus, at the time that the English Chaplain Lord (q.v.) was studying the religion of the Hindus at Surat, the Dutch Chaplain Roger was doing the same at Pulicat. The work of the last is in every way vastly superior to the former. It was written at Batavia (see p. 117), and, owing to its publication after his death, there are a few misprints of Indian words. The author had his information from a Brahman named Padmanabha (Padmanabha), who knew Dutch, and who gave him a Dutch translation of Bhartrihari's Satakas, which is printed at the end of the book. It is the first translation from Sanskrit into an European language (A.B.).

A third edition appeared at Milan in 1528 (4to.), and a fourth at Venice in 1533. This interesting Journal was translated into English by Eden in 1576 (8vo.), and Purchas (ii. pp. 1483-1494) gives an abridgement; it is thus one of the most important sources."

Neither Mr. Winter Jones nor my friend Dr. Badger, in editing Varthema, seem to have been aware of the dispassionate cast on his veracity in the famous Colloquios of Garcia de Orta (f. 29v. and f. 30). These affect his statements as to his voyages in the further East; and deny his ever having gone beyond Calicut and Cochin; a thesis which it would not be difficult to demonstrate out of his own narrative.

A GLOSSARY
ANGLO-INdIAN COLLOQUIAL TERMS AND PHRASES OF ANALOGOUS ORIGIN.

ABADA, a. A word used by old Spanish and Portuguese writers for a 'rhinoceros,' and adopted by some of the older English narrators. The origin is a little doubtful. If it were certain that the word did not occur earlier than c. 1530-40, it would most probably be an adoption from the Malay badak, 'a rhinoceros.' The word is not used by Barros where he would probably have used it if he knew it (see quotation under GANDA); and we have found no proof of its earlier existence in the language of the Peninsula; if this should be established we have to seek an Arabic origin in such a word as abadat, abid, fem. abida, of which one meaning is (v. Lane) 'a wild animal.' The usual form abada is certainly somewhat in favour of such an origin. [Prof. Skeat believes that the a in abada and similar Malay words represents the Arabic article, which was commonly used in Spanish and Portuguese prefixed to Arabic and other native words.] It will be observed that more than one authority makes it the female rhinoceros, and in the dictionaries the word is feminine. But so Barros makes Ganda. [Mr W.W. Skeat suggests that the female was the more dangerous animal, or the one most frequently met with, as is certainly the case with the crocodile.]

1541. — "Mynes of Silver, Copper, Tin, and Lead, from whence great quantities thereof were continually drawn, which the Merchants carried away with Troops of Elephants and Rhinoceroses (em caixas de elefantos e badas) for to transport into the Kingdoms of Sornau, by us called Siam, Pasceloco, Saraday, (Sawady in orig.), Tanu, Prome, Calaminha, and other Provinces..." — Pinto (orig. cap. xii.) in Cosmas, p. 49. The kingdoms named here are Siam (see under SARNAU); Pitchalok and Sawati (now two provinces of Siam); Taungu and Prome in B. Burma; Calaminha, in the interior of Indo-China, more or less fabulous.

1544. — "Now the King of Tartary was fallen upon the city of Poyquis with so great an army as the like had never been seen since Adam's time; in this army... were seven and twenty Kings, under whom marched 1,800,000 men... with four score thousand Rhinoceroses" (dono partirão com ostenta mil badas). — Ibid. (orig. cap. civii.) in Cosmas, p. 149.

1585. — "It is a very fertile country, with great store of provisou; there are elephants in great number and abadas, which is a kind of beast so big as two great bulls, and hath upon his snout a little horn." — Mendonça, ii. 311.

1592. — "We sent commodities to their king to barter for Amber-grease, and for the horns of Abath, wherof the Kings onely hath the traffiqe in his hands. Now this Abath is a beast that hath one horn only in her forehead, and is thought to be the female Vnicornes, and is highly esteemed of all the Moore in those parts as a most soveraigne remedy against poysen." — Barker in Bakt. ii. 591.

1598. — "The Abada, or Rhinoceros, is not in India,* but only in Bengala and Patane." — Linneothem, 88. [Hak. Soc. ii. 8.]

"Also in Bengal we found great numbers of the beasts which in Latin are called Rhinoceroses, and of the Portingallas Abadas." — Ibid. 28. [Hak. Soc. i. 96.]

c. 1608. — "... ove portano le loro mercanzie per venderle a Cinesi, particolarmente... molti corni della Bada, detto Rinoceronte..." — Carletti, p. 199.

1611. — "Bada, a very fierce animal, called by another more common name Rhinoceros. In our days they brought to the King Philip II., now in glory, a Bada which was long at Madrid, having his horn sawn off, and being blinded, for fear he should hurt anybody... The name of Bada is one imposed by the Indians themselves; but assuming that

* i.e., not on the W. coast of the Peninsula, called India especially by the Portuguese. See under INDIA.
there is no language but had its origin from the Hebrew in the confusion of tongues... it will not be out of the way to observe that Bad is an Hebrew word, from Badad, 'soilus solitarius,' for this animal is produced in desert and very solitary places."
—Odarreias, s. v.

1618. — "And the woods give great timber, and in them are produced elephants, badas..." —Godinho de Eredia, 10 v.

1618. — "A China brought me a present of a cup of abado (or black unicorns horn) with sugar caskes." —Cock's Diary, ii. 56.

1626. — On the margin of Pigafetta's Congo, as given by Purchas (ii. 1001), we find: "Rhinoceros or Abadas."—Bontius Hist. Nat. et Med.

1628. — "Abada, s. f. La hembra del Rhinoceronte."—Dic. de la Lengua Castellana.

ABCÁREE, ABKÁRY. H. from P. ab-kář, the business of distilling or selling (strong) waters, and hence elliptically the excuse upon such business. This last is the sense in which it is used by Anglo-Indians. In every district of India the privilege of selling spirits is farmed to contractors, who manage the sale through retail shopkeepers. This is what is called the 'Abkáry System.' The system has often been attacked as promoting tippling, and there are strong opinions on both sides. We subjoin an extract from a note on the subject, too long for insertion in integrity, by one of much experience in Bengal—Sir G. U. Yule.

June, 1879. — "Natives who have expressed their views are, I believe, unanimously in favour of the introduction of drinking to our Abkáres system. I don't say that this is putting the cart before the horse, but they are certainly too forgetful of the increased means in the country, which, if not the sole cause of the increased consumption, has been at least a very large factor in that result. I myself believe that more people drink now than formerly; but I knew one gentleman of very long and intimate knowledge of Bengal, who held that there was as much drinking in 1820 as in 1860."

In any case exaggeration is abundant. All Sanskrit literature shows that tippling is no absolute novelty in India. [See the article on "Spirituous Drinks in Ancient India," by Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryan, i. 359 seqq.]

1790. — "In respect to Abkáry, or Tax on Spirituos Liquors, which is reserved for Taxation... it is evident that we cannot establish a general rate, since the quantity of consumption and expense of manufacture, etc., depends upon the vicinity of principal stations. For the amount leviable upon different Stills we must rely upon officers' local knowledge. The public, indeed, cannot suffer, since, if a few Stills are suppressed by over-taxation, drunkenness is diminished."
—In a Letter from Board of Revenue (Bengal) to Government, 12th July. MS. in India Office.

1797. — "The stamps are to have the words 'Abcáre Licensing' inscribed in the Persian and Hindu languages and character."—Bengal Regulations, x. 38.

ABHIÓWA. Properly P. ab-o-hawa, 'water and air.' The usual Hindustani expression for 'climate.'

1736. — "What you write concerning the death of 500 Koogs from small-pox is understood... they must be kept where the climate [ab-o-hawa] may best agree with them."—Teppoo's Letters, 269.

ABYSSINTIA, n.p. This geographical name is a 16th-century Latinisation of the Arabic Habilat, through the Portuguese Abes, bearing much the same pronunciation, minus the aspirate. [See HUBSHEE.]

1617. — "He sent mee to buy three Abassines."—Sir T. Roe, Travels, Hak. Soc. ii. 445.]

A C. (i.e. 'after compliments'). In official versions of native letters these letters stand for the omitted formalities of native compliments.

ACHÁNOCK, n.p. H. Chandak and Achānak. The name by which the station of Barrackpore is commonly known to Sepoys and other natives. Some have connected the name with that of Job Charnock, or, as A. Hamilton calls him, Charnock, the founder of Calcutta, and the quotations render this probable. Formerly the Cantonment of Senole at Benares was also known, by a transfer no doubt, as Chhatta (or 'Little') Achañak. Two additional remarks may be relevantly made: (1) Job's name was certainly Charnock, and not Charnock. It is distinctly signed "Job Charnock," in a MS. letter from the factory at "Chutta," i.e. Chuttanuttie (or Calcutta) in the India Office records, which I have seen. (2) The map in Valentijn which shows the village of Tujannok, though published in 1726, was apparently compiled by Van der Brooke in 1662. Hence it is not probable that it took its name from Job Charnock, who seems to have entered the Company's service in 1658. When he went to Bengal we have not been able to ascertain. [See Diary of Hedges, edited by Sir H. Yule, ii. xix. In some "Documentary Memoirs of Job Charnock," which form part of vol. Ixxv. (1888) of the Hakluyt Soc., Job is said to have "arrived in India in 1655 or 1656."]

1677.—"The ship Falcone to go up the river to Hughly, or at least to Channock."—Curtis's Letter to Ft. St. Geo. of 12th December. In Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1871, No. 1., p. 21; see also p. 28.

1711.—"Channock Reach hath two shoals, the upper one in Channock, and the lower one on the opposite side . . . . you must from below Deygo as aforesaid, keep the starboard shore aboard until you come up with a Lime-Tree . . . . and then steer over with Channock Trees and house between the two shoals, until you come mid-river, but no nearer the house."—The English Pilot, 56.

1728.—"t stedekens Tjakannok."—Valentijn, v. 153. In Val.'s map of Bengal, also, we find opposite to Oogis (Hoogly), Tjakannok, and then Calcutta, and Calcuta.

1758.—"Notwithstanding these solemn assurances from the Dutch it was judged expedient to send a detachment of troops . . . . to take possession of Tannah Fort and Charnock's Battery opposite to it."—Narrative of Dutch attempt in the Hoogly, in Malcolm's Life of Clive, i. 76.

1810.—"The old village of Achannoock stood on the ground which the post of Barrackpore now occupies."—A. Graham, 142.

1848.—"From an oral tradition still prevalent among the natives at Barrackpore . . . we learn that Mr. Charnock built a bungalow there, and a flourishing bazar arose under his patronage, before the settlement of Calcutta had been determined on. Barrackpore is at this day best known to the natives by the name of Channoock."—The Bengal Oxfurary, Calcutta, p. 2.

ACHÁR, a. P. áchár, Malay áchár, adopted in nearly all the vernaculars of India for acid and salt relishes. By Europeans it is used as the equivalent of 'pickles,' and is applied to all the stores of Crosse and Blackwell in that kind. We have adopted the word through the Portuguese; but it is not impossible that Western Asiatics got it originally from the Latin acetaria. —See Plin. Hist. Nat. xix. 19.

1596.—"And they prepare a conserve of it (Anacardium) with salt, and when it is green (and this they call Achear), and this is sold in the market just as olives are with us."—Garcia, f. 17.

1598.—Lineschoten in the Dutch gives the word correctly, but in the English version (Hak. Soc. ii. 20) it is printed Aschar.

1616.—"Our jurebasso's (Juribasso) wife came and brought me a small jar of Achar for a present, desiring me to exakas her husband in that he abointed himself to take phisk."—Cocke, i. 185.

1629.—"And all these preserved in a way that is really very good, which they call acudac."—P. della Valle, ii. 708. [Hak. Soc. ii. 327.]

1687.—"Achar I presume signifies sauce. They make in the East Indies, especially at Siam and Pegu, several sorts of Achar, as of the young tops of Bambooes, &c. Bambo-Achar and Mango-Achar are most used."—Dampier, i. 391.

1727.—"And the Soldiers, Fishers, Peasants, and Handicrafts (of Goa) feed on a little Rice boiled in Water, with a little bit of Salt Fish, or Atchar, which is pickled Fruits or Roots."—A. Hamilton, i. 252. [And see under KEDGEREE.]

1783.—"We learn from Forrest that limes, salted for sea-use against scurvy, were used by the Chulias (Cholina), and were called akchar (Voyage to Morpud, 40). Thus the word passed to Java, as in next quotation:

1765-71.—"When green it (the mango) is made into attjar; for this the kernel is taken out, and the space filled in with ginger, pimento, and other spicy ingredients, after which it is pickled in vinegar."—Stavorinus, i. 237.

ACHEEN, n.p. (P. Āchin [Tam. Attai, Malay Āchēh, Āchē.] 'a wood-leech'). The name applied by us to the State and town at the N.W. angle of Sumatra, which was long, and especially during the 16th and 17th centuries, the greatest native power on that Island. The proper Malay name of the place is Āchēh. The Portuguese generally called it Achém (or frequently by the adhesion of the genitive preposition, Dachem, so that Sir F. Greville below makes two kingdoms), but our Acheen seems to have been derived from mariners of the P. Gulf or W. India, for we find the name so given (Āchīn) in the Ām-i-Akhāri, and in the Geog. Tables of Sadik Isfahāni. This form may have been suggested by a jingling analogy, such as Orientals love, with Māchin (Macheen). See also under LOOTY.

1549.—"Piratarum Aceonorum nec periculum nec suspicio fuit."—S. Fr. Xav. Epist. 387.

1562.—"But after Malacca was founded, and especially at the time of our entry into India, the Kingdom of Pocam began to increase in power, and that of Padir to diminish. And that neighbouring one of Achem, which was then insignificant, is now the greatest of all."—Barros, III. v. 8.

ADAMS APPLE. This name (Pomo d’Adamo) is given to Goa to the fruit of the Mimusops Elenqu, Linn. (Bird-wood); and in the 1835 ed. of Gerard’s Herball it is applied to the Plantain. But in earlier days it was applied to a fruit of the Citron kind.—(See Marco Polo, 2nd ed., i. 101), and the following:

1712.—"It is a kind of lime or citron tree . . . it is called Pumum Adami, because it has on its rind the appearance of two bites, which the simplicity of the ancients imagined to be the vestiges of the impression which our forefather made upon the forbidden fruit. . . ."—Bluteau, quoted by Tr. of Abo-guereque, Hak. Soc. i. 100. The fruit has nothing to do with zamboc, with which Bluteau and Mr. Birch connect it. See JAMBOO.

ADATI, s. A kind of piece-goods exported from Bengal. We do not know the proper form or etymology. It may have been of half-width (from H. add, ‘half’). [It may have been half the ordinary length, as the Salampore (Salampoorry) was half the length of the cloth known in Madras as Punjum. (Madras Man. of Ad. iii. 799). Also see Yule’s note in Hedges’ Diary, ii. ccx.]

1726.—"Casari (probably Kasiari in Midnapur Dist.) supplies many Taffathel-

ADAWLUT, s. Ar.—H.—'addalat, 'a Court of Justice,' from 'add, 'doing justice.' Under the Mohammedan government there were 3 such courts, viz., Nizamat 'Adalat, Divānī 'Adalat, and Fayvdārī 'Adalat, so-called from the respective titles of the officials who nominally presided over them. The first was the chief Criminal Court, the second a Civil Court, the third a kind of Police Court. In 1793 regular Courts were established under the British Government, and then the Sudder Adawlut (Sadr 'Adalat) became the chief Court of Appeal for each Presidency, and its work was done by several European (Civilian) Judges. That Court was, on the criminal side, termed Nizamut Adawlat, and on the civil side Dewanny Ad. At Madras and Bombay, Fouudyarry was the style adopted in lieu of Nizamut. This system ended in 1863, on the introduction of the Penal Code, and the institution of the High Courts on their present footing. (On the original history and constitution of the Courts see Fifth Report, 1812, p. 6.)

What follows applies only to the Bengal Presidency, and to the administration of justice under the Company's Courts beyond the limits of the Presidency town. Brief particulars regarding the history of the Supreme Courts and those Courts which preceded them will be found under SUPREME COURT.

The grant, by Shāh 'Ālam, in 1765, of the Dewanny of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa to the Company, transferred all power, civil and military, in those provinces, to that body. But no immediate attempt was made to undertake the direct detailed administration of either revenue or justice by the agency of the European servants of the Company. Such superintendence, indeed, of the administration was maintained in the prior acquisitions of the Company—viz., in the Zemindary of Cuttack, in the Twenty-four Pergunnas, and in the Chucklas (Chucklah) or districts of Burdwan, Midnapoor, and Chittagong, which had been transferred by the Nawab, Kāsim 'Ali Khān, in 1760; but in the rest of the territory it was confined to the agency of a Resident at the Moorshedabad Durbar, and of a 'Chief' at Patna. Justice was administered by the Mohammedan courts under the native officials of the Dewanny.

In 1770, European officers were appointed in the districts, under the name of Supervisors, with powers of control over the natives employed in the collection of the Revenue and the administration of justice, whilst local councils, with superior authority in all branches, were established at Moorshedabad and Patna. It was not till two years later that, under express orders from the Court of Directors, the effective administration of the provinces was undertaken by the agency of the Company's covenanted servants. At this time (1772) Courts of Civil Justice (Mofussil Dewanny Adawlut) were established in each of the Districts then recognised. There were also District Criminal Courts (Fowarday Adawlut) held by Oazaee or Mufty under the superintendence, like the Civil Court, of the Collectors, as the Supervisors were now styled; whilst Superior Courts (Sudder Dewanny, Sudder Nazamut Adawlut) were established at the Presidency, to be under the superintendence of three or four members of the Council of Fort William.

In 1774 the Collectors were recalled, and native 'Amils (Aumil) appointed in their stead. Provincial Councils were set up for the divisions of Calcutta, Burdwan, Dacca, Moorshedabad, Dinapore, and Patna, in whose hands the superintendence, both of revenue collection and of the administration of civil justice, was vested, but exercised by the members in rotation.

The state of things that existed under this system was discreditable. As Courts of Justice the provincial Councils were only "colourable imitations of courts, which had abdicated their functions in favour of their own subordinate (native) officers, and though their decisions were nominally subject to the Governor-General in Council, the Appellate Court was even a more shadowy body than the Courts of first instance. The Court never sat at all, though there are some traces of its having at one time decided appeals on the report of the head of the Khalsa, or native exchequer, just as the Provincial Council decided them on the report of the Cazis and Muftis."*

In 1770 the Government resolved that Civil Courts, independent of the Provincial Councils, should be established in the six divisions named above,† each under a civilian judge with the title of Superintendent of the Dewanny Adawlut; whilst to the Councils should still pertain the trial of causes relating to the public revenue, to the demands of zamindars upon their tenants, and to boundary questions. The appeal from the District Courts still lay to the Governor-General and his Council, as forming the Court of Sudder Dewanny; but that this might be real, a judge was appointed its head in the person of Sir Elijah Impey, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, an appointment which became famous. For it was represented as a transaction intended to compromise the acute dissions which had been going on between that Court and the Bengal Government, and in fact as a bribe to Impey. It led, by an address from the House of Commons, to the recall of Impey, and constituted one of the charges in the abortive impeachment of that personage. Hence his charge of the Sudder Dewanny ceased in November, 1782, and it was resumed in form by the Governor-General and Council.

In 1787, the first year of Lord Cornwallis's government, in consequence of instructions from the Court of Directors, it was resolved that, with an exception as to the Courts at Moorshedabad, Patna, and Dacca, which were to be maintained independently, the office of judge in the Mofussil Courts was to be attached to that of the collection of the revenue; in fact, the offices of Judge and Collector, which had been divorced since 1774, were to be reunited. The duties of Magistrate and Judge became mere appendages to that of Collector; the administration of justice became a subordinate function; and in fact all Regulations respecting that administration were passed in the Revenue Department of the Government.

Up to 1790 the criminal judiciary had remained in the hands of the native courts. But this was now altered; four Courts of Circuit were created, each to be superintended by two civil servants as judges; the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut at the Presidency being presided over by the Governor-General and the members of Council.

In 1793 the constant succession of revolutions in the judicial system came to something like a pause, with the entire reformation which was enacted by the Regulations of that year. The Collection of Revenue was now entirely separated from the administration of justice; Zillah Courts under European judges were established (Reg. iii.) in each of 23 Districts and 3 cities, in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa; whilst Provincial Courts of Appeal, each consisting of three judges (Reg. v.), were established at Moorshedabad, Patna, Dacca, and Calcutta. From these Courts, under certain conditions, further appeal lay to the Sudder Dewanny Adawluts at the Presidency.

As regarded criminal jurisdiction, the judges of the Provincial Courts were also (Reg. ix., 1793) constituted Circuit Courts, liable to review by the Sudder Nizamut. Strange to say, the impracticable idea of placing the duties of both of the higher Courts, civil and criminal, on the shoulders of the executive Government was still maintained, and the Governor-General and his Council were the constituted heads of the Sudder Dewanny and Sudder Nizamut. This of course continued as unworkable as it had been; and in Lord Wellesley's time, eight years later, the two Sudder Adawluts were reconstituted, with three regular judges to each, though it was still ruled (Reg. ii., 1801) that the chief judge in each Court was to be a member of the Supreme Council, not being either the Governor-General or the Commander-in-Chief. This rule was rescinded by Reg. x. of 1805.

The number of Provincial and Zillah Courts was augmented in after years with the extension of territory, and additional Sudder Courts, for the service of the Upper Provinces, were established at Allahabad in 1831 (Reg. vi.), a step which may be regarded as the inception of the separation of the N.W. Provinces into a distinct Lieutenant-Governorship, carried out five years later. But no change that can be considered at all organic occurred again in the judiciary system till 1862; for we can hardly consider as such the abolition of the Courts of Circuit in 1829 (Reg. i.), and that of the Provincial Courts of Appeal initiated by a section in Reg. v. of 1831, and completed in 1833.

1822.—"This refers to a traditional story which Mr. Elphinstone used to relate . . . . During the progress of our conquests in the North-West many of the inhabitants were encountered flying from the newly-occupied territory. 'Is Lord Lake coming?' was the enquiry. 'No,' was the reply, 'the Adawlut is coming.'"—Life of Elphinstone, ii. 131.

ADIGAR, s. Properly adhikār, from Skt. adhikārin, one possessing authority; Tam. adhikār, or akren. The title was formerly in use in South India, and perhaps still in the native States of Malabar, for a rural headman. [See quot. from Logan below.] It was

c. A.D. 250.—"And I hear that there is in India a bird Kala, which is 3 times as big as a bastard; it has a mouth of a frightful size, and long legs, and it carries a huge crop which looks like a bunch of grapes; it has a most dissonant voice, and whilst the rest of the plumage is ash-coloured, the tail-feathers are of a pale (or greenish) colour."—Aelian, de Nat. Anim. xvi. 4.
c. 1530.—"One of these (fowl) is the ding, which is a large bird. Each of its wings is the length of a man; on its head and neck there is no hair. Something like a bag hangs from its neck; its back is black, its breast white; it frequently visits Kábul. One year they caught and brought me a ding, which became very tame. The flesh which they threw it, it never failed to catch in its beak, and swallowed without ceremony. On one occasion it swallowed a shoe well shod with iron; on another occasion it swallowed a good-sized fowl right down, with its wings and feathers."—Baker, 322.
1754.—"In the evening excursions . . . . we had often observed an extraordinary species of birds, called by the native Kargil or Kargyl, a native of Bengal. They would majestically stalk along before us, and at first we took them for Indians naked. . . . The following are the exact marks and dimensions . . . . The wings extended 14 feet and 10 inches. From the tip of the bill to the extremity of the claw it measured 7 feet 6 inches. . . . In the crown was a Terrapin or land-tortoise, 10 inches long; and a large black male cat was found entire in its stomach."—Ives, 183-4.
1798.—"The next is the great Heron, the Argo or Adjudant, or Gigantic Crane of Latham . . . . It is found also in Guinea."—Pennant's View of Hindostan, ii. 156.
1810.—"Every bird saving the vulture, the Adjudant (or argelah) and kite, retires to some shady spot."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 3.
[1880.—Bell (Jungle Life, 82) describes the "snake-stone" said to be found in the head of the bird.]

ADJUTANT. n. A bird so called (so doubt) from its comical resemblance to a human figure in a stuff dress pacing slowly on a parade-ground. It is the H. kargil, or gigantic crane, and popular scavenger of Bengal, the Leptoptilus argala of Linneus. The H. name is by some dictionaries derived from a supposed Skt. word hadda-gila, 'bone-swaller.' The compound, however appropriate, is not to be found in Bühlingk and Roth's great Dictionary. The bird is very well described by Aelian, under the name of Kila, which is perhaps a relic of the still preserved vernacular one. It is described by another name, as one of the peculiarities of India, by Sultan Baber. See PELICAN.

"The feathers known as Marabou or Comercolly feathers, and sold in Calcutta, are the tail-coverts of this, and the Lept. javanicus, another and smaller species" (Jerdan). The name marabou (from the Ar. marabbé, 'quiet,' and thence 'a hermit, through the Port. marabuto) seems to have been given to the bird in Africa on like reason to that of adjutant in India. [Comer-

The name represents Skt. araka in the sense of a 'cavalier,' and this reappears scarcely modified in the Assakami or Assakeni of the historians of the expedition of Alexander.

In Long, 486; also see Rohilla.

1838. — "Professor Dorn ... discusses severally the theories that have been maintained of the descent of the Afghans: 1st, from the Copts; 2nd, the Jews; 3rd, the Georgians; 4th, the Torkas; 5th, the Moguls; 6th, the Armenians: and he mentions more cursorily the opinion that they are descended from the Indo-Scythians, Medians, Sogdians, Persians, and Indians; on considering all which, he comes to the rational conclusion, that they cannot be traced to any tribe or country beyond their present seats and the adjoining mountains." — Elphinstone's Cabool, ed. 1839, i. 209.

[Agam. adj. A term applied to certain cloths dyed in some particular way. It is the Ar. 'ajam (lit. "one who has an impediment or difficulty in speaking Arabic"), a foreigner, and in particular, a Persian. The adj. 'ajami thus means "foreign" or "Persian," and is equivalent to the Greek ἀραβικός and the Hind. मेल्खा. Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Rec., p. 145) quotes from Hieronimo di Santo Stefano (1494-98), "in company with some Armenian and Azami merchants": and (ibid.) from Varthema: "It is a country of very great traffic in merchandise, and particularly with the Persians and Azamini, who come so far as there.

Agar-agar, s. The Malay name of a kind of sea-weed (Sphorocoecus lichenoides). It is succulent when boiled to a jelly; and is used by the Chinese with birdsnest (q.v.) in soup. They also employ it as a glue, and apply it to silk and paper intended to be transparent. It grows on the shores of the Malay Islands, and is much exported to China. — (See Crawford, Dict. Ind. Agdaun, s. A hybrid H. word from H. ḏg and P. ḏan, made in imitation of ḏān, bālam-āḏan, shama-āḏn̂ ("spittoon, pencape, candlestick"). It means a small vessel for holding fire to light a cheroot.

[AKYÁB. n.p. The European name of the seat of administration of the British province of Arakan, which is also a port exporting rice largely to Europe. The name is never used by the natives of Arakan (of the Burmese race), who call the town Tsi-ti-tou, ‘Crowd (in consequence of) War.’ This indicates how the settlement came to be formed in 1826, by the fact of the British force encamping on the plain there, which was found to be healthier than the site of the ancient capital of the kingdom of Arakan, up the valley of the Arakan or Kaladyne R. The name Akylab had been applied, probably by the Portuguese, to a neighbouring village, where there stands, about 1½ miles from the present town, a pagoda covering an alleged relic of Gautama (a piece of the lower jaw, or an induration of the throat), the name of which pagoda, taken from the description of relic, is Au-kyait-dau, and of this Akylab was probably a corruption. The present town and cantonment occupy dry land of very recent formation, and the high ground on which the pagoda stands must have stood on the shore at no distant date, as appears from the finding of a small anchor there about 1835. The village adjoining the pagoda must then have stood at the mouth of the Arakan R., which was much frequented by the Portuguese and the Chittagong people.

[AKYÁB, n.p. The European name of the seat of administration of the British province of Arakan, which is also a port exporting rice largely to Europe. The name is never used by the natives of Arakan (of the Burmese race), who call the town Tsi-ti-tou, ‘Crowd (in consequence of) War.’ This indicates how the settlement came to be formed in 1826, by the fact of the British force encamping on the plain there, which was found to be healthier than the site of the ancient capital of the kingdom of Arakan, up the valley of the Arakan or Kaladyne R. The name Akylab had been applied, probably by the Portuguese, to a neighbouring village, where there stands, about 1½ miles from the present town, a pagoda covering an alleged relic of Gautama (a piece of the lower jaw, or an induration of the throat), the name of which pagoda, taken from the description of relic, is Au-kyait-dau, and of this Akylab was probably a corruption. The present town and cantonment occupy dry land of very recent formation, and the high ground on which the pagoda stands must have stood on the shore at no distant date, as appears from the finding of a small anchor there about 1835. The village adjoining the pagoda must then have stood at the mouth of the Arakan R., which was much frequented by the Portuguese and the Chittagong people.

in the 16th and 17th centuries, and thus probably became known to them by a name taken from the Pagoda.—

[Col. Temple writes—"The only derivation which strikes me as plausible, is from the Agyattaw Phaya, near which, on the island of Sittwe, a Cantonment was formed after the first Burmese war, on the abandonment of Mrohaung or Arakan town in 1826, on account of sickness among the troops stationed there. The word Agyattaw is spelt Akhyaptaw, whence probably the modern name."]

[1826.—"It (the despatch) at length arrived this day (3rd Dec. 1826), having taken two months in all to reach us, of which forty-five days were spent in the route from Akyab in Arakan.—Crawford, A. R. 289.]

ALA-BLAZE PAN. s. This name is given in the Bombay Presidency to a tinned-copper stew-pan, having a cover, and staples for straps, which is carried on the march by European soldiers, for the purpose of cooking in, and eating out of. Out on picnics a larger kind is frequently used, and kept continually going, as a kind of pot-au-feu. [It has been suggested, as the word may be a corr. of some French or Port.-term—Fr. braiser; Port. braséiro, 'a fire-pan,' braza, 'hot coals.]

ALBACORE. s. A kind of rather large sea-fish, of the Tunny genus (Thynnus albacora, Lowe, perhaps the same as Thynnus macareterus, Day); from the Port. albacor or albecora. The quotations from Ovington and Grose below refer it to albo, but the word is, from its form, almost certainly Arabic, though Dozy says he has not found the word in this sense in Arabic dictionaries, which are very defective in the names of fishes (p. 61). The word albacora in Sp. is applied to a large early kind of fig, from Ar. *alb*âkât, 'pregncox' (Dozy). Heb. bikkûrâ, in Micah vii. 1.—See Cobarruvias, s. v. Albacora. [The N. E. D. derives it from Ar. al-burk, 'a young camel, a heifer,' whence Port. bacoro, 'a young pig.' Also see Gray's note on *Pyrrh., i. 9.]

1579.—"These (flying fish) have two enemies, the one in the sea, the other in the air. In the sea the fish which is called Albiceora, as big as a gomg— Letter from Goa, by T. Stevens, in Hakl. ii. 683.

1592.—"In our passage over from S. Laurence to the maine, we had exceeding great store of Bonitos and *Alboceoras."

—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 592.

1606.—"We met likewise with shoals of Alboceoras (so call'd from a piece of white Flesh that sticks to their Heart) and with multitudes of Bonetouses, which are had from their Goodness and Excellence for eating; so that sometimes for more than twenty Days the whole Ship's Company have feasted on these curious fish."—Ovington, p. 48.

C. 1780.—"The Alboceora is another fish of much the same kind as the Bonito, from 60 to 90 pounds weight and upward. The name of this fish too is taken from the Portuguese, importing its white colour."—Grose, i. 5.

ALBATROSS. s. The great seabird (Diomedea exulans, L.), from the Port. alcator, to which the forms used by Hawkins and Dampier, and by Flacourt (according to Marcel Devic) closely approach. [Alcatrás 'in this sense altered to albi-, albe-, albatross (perhaps with etymological reference to albus, 'white,' the albatross being white, while the alcator was black.) N. E. D. a.v.] The Port. word properly means 'a pelican.' A reference to the latter word in our Glossary will show another curious misapplication. Devic states that alcator in Port. means 'the bucket of a Persian wheel,' s representing the Ar. al-kâdâs, which is again from kadra. He supposes that the pelican may have got this name in the same way that it is called in ordinary Ar. sâkkâ, 'a water-carrier.' It has been pointed out by Dr Murray, that the alcator of some of the earlier voyagers, e.g., of Davis below, is not the Diomedea, but the Man-of-War (or Frigate) Bird (Fregatus aquaticus). Hawkins, at p. 187 of the work quoted, describes, without naming, a bird which is evidently the modern albatross. In the quotation from Mocquet again, alcator is applied to some smaller sea-bird. The passage from Shelvoke is that which suggested to Coleridge "The Ancient Mariner."

1664.—"The 8th December we ankered by a small Island called Alacotrârs, wherein at our going a shore, we found nothing but sea-birds, as we call them Gannets, but by the Portugals called Alacotrârs, who for that cause gave the said Island the same name."—Hawkins (Hak. Soc.), 15.

* Also see Dozy, s. v. alceadus. Alceadus, according to Cobarruvias, is in Sp. one of the earthen pots of the noria or Persian wheel.
1562.—"The dolphins and bonitoes are the houndes, and the Alcatraces the hawkses, and the flying fishes the game."—Ibid. 152.

1604.—"The other foule called Alcatrasi is a kind of Hawk that lieth by fishing. For when the Bonitos or Dolphins doe chase the flying fish under the water . . . this Alcatrasi flyeth after them like a Hawke after a Partridge."—Davis (Hak. Soc.), 158.

c. 1608-10.—"Alcatras sont petitsoiseaux ainsi comme estourneaux."—Mosquet, Voyages, 226.

1672.—"We met with those feathered Harbingers of the Cape . . . Albatrosses . . . they have great Bodes, yet not proportionate to their Wings, which met out twice their length."—Fryer, 12.

1690.—"They have several other Signs, whereby to know when they are near it, as the Sea Fowl they meet at Sea, especially the Albatrosses, a very large long-winged Bird."—Dampier, i. 531.

1719.—"We had not had the sight of one fish of any kind, since we were come Southward of the Straights of Le Maire, nor one sea-bird, except a disconsolate black Albatross, who accompanied us for several days, hovering about us as if he had lost himself, till Halley (my second Captain) observing, in one of his melancholy fits, that this bird was always hovering near us, imagin'd from his colour, that it might be some ill omen . . . But be that as it would, he after some fruitless attempts, at length shot the Albatross, not doubting (perhaps) that we should have a fair wind after it . . ."—Shakespeare's Voyage, 72, 73.

1740.—". . . a vast variety of sea-fowl, amongst which the most remarkable are the Pinguins; they are in size and shape like a goose, but instead of wings they have short stumps like fins . . . their bills are narrow like those of an Albatross, and they stand and walk in an erect posture. From this and their white bellies, Sir John Narborough has whimsically likened them to little children standing up in white aprons."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. (1755), p. 68.

1754.—"An Albatrosse, a sea-fowl, was shot off the Cape of Good Hope, which measured 17½ feet from wing to wing."—Ives, 5.

1805.—"At length did cross an Albatross; Thorough the fog it came; As if it had been a Christian soul We hailed it in God's name."—The Ancient Mariner.

c. 1861.—"Souvent pour s'amuser, les hommes d'équipage Prennent des albatros, vastes oiseaux des mers, Qui suivent, indolentes compagnons de voyage, Le navire glissant sur les gouffres amers."—Bandelaires, L'Albatros.

ALCATIF, s. This word for 'a carpet' was much used in India in the 16th century, and is treated by some travellers as an Indian word. It is not however of Indian origin, but is an Arabic word (كتايف, 'a carpet with long pile') introduced into Portugal through the Moors.

c. 1540.—"There came aboard of Antonio de Faría more than 60 balotes, and ballons, and manwheus (q. v. v.) with awnings and flags of silk, and rich alicatifs."—Pinto, ch. xviii. (orig.).

1560.—"The whole tent was cut in a variety of arabesques, inlaid with coloured silk, and was carpeted with rich alicatifs."—Teneiro, Itin., c. xvi.

1585.—"The windows of the streets by which the Viscomy passes shall be hung with carpets (alcatifados), and the doors decorated with branches, and the whole adorned as richly as possible."—Archiv. Port. Orient., fascic. ii. 225.

1608-10.—"Quand elles vont à l'Eglise on les porte en palanquin . . . le dedans est d'un grand tapiss de Parso, qu'il appelle A Lacatif . . ."—Fyvart, ii. 92; [Hak. Soc. ii. 102].

1648.—". . . many silk stuffs, such as satin, contenijs (Cutianee) attelap (read attelas), alegie . . . ornis [H. orna, 'A woman's sheet'] of gold and silk for women's wear, gold alicatijven . . ."—Van Twist, 50.

1726.—"They know nought of chairs or tables. The small folks eat on a mat, and the rich on an Alcatief, or carpet, sitting with their feet under them, like our Tailors."—Van Twist, v. Chorom, 55.

ALCORANAS, s. What word does Herbert aim at in the following? [The Stanf. Diet. regards this as quite distinct from Alcoran, the Koran, or sacred book of Mohammedans (for which see N.E.D. s.v.), and suggests Al-gorân, 'the horns,' or al-qîrân, 'the vertices.'] 1685.—"Some (mosques) have their Alcorana's high, slender, round steeples or towers, most of which are terraced near the top, like the Standard in Cheapside, but twice the height."—Herbert, Travels, 3rd ed. 1694.

ALCOVE, s. This English word comes to us through the Span. alcova and Fr. alcove (old Fr. aucove), from Ar. al-kubbah, applied first to a kind of tent (so in Hebr. Numbers xxv. 8) and then to a vaulted building or recess. An edifice of Saracenic construction at Palermo is still known as La Cuba; and another, a domed tomb, as La Cubola. Whatever be the true formation of the last word, it seems to have given us, through the Italian, Cupola. [Not so in N.E.D.] 1738.—“Cuba, commonly used for the vaulted tomb of marab-buts” [Adjutant.]—Shaw’s Travels, ed. 1757, p. 40.

ALDEA. a. A village; also a villa. Port. from the Ar. al-da’a, ‘a farm or villa.’ Bluteau explains it as ‘Povoção menor que lugar.’ Lane gives among other and varied meanings of the Ar. word: ‘An estate consisting of land or of land and a house, . . . . land yielding a revenue.’ The word forms part of the name of many towns and villages in Spain and Portugal.

1547.—“The Governor (of Baqaem) Dom João de Castro, has given and gives many aldeas and other grants of land to Portugaluese who served and were wounded at the fortress of Dicò, and to others of long service. . . .”—Simão Botelho, Cartas 3.

1673.—“Here . . . in a sweet Air, stood a Magnificent Rural Church; in the way to which, and indeed all up and down this Island, are pleasant Aldeas, or villages and hamlets that . . . . swarm with people.”—Valentijn, v. (Malabar), 11.

1780.—“The Coast between these is filled with Aldées, or villages of the Indians.”—Duvan, N. Directory, 5th ed., 110.

1782.—“Il y a aussi quelques Aldées considérables, telles que Navar et Portenorge, qui appartienent aux Princes du pays.”—Sonnerat, Voyage, i. 37.

ALFANDICA. a. A custom-house and resort for foreign merchants in an oriental port. The word comes through the Port. al-fandego, Span. fundego, Ital. fondaco, Fr. fondique or fondique, from Ar. al-funduk, ‘the inn,’ and this from Gk. παρακατά, παρακάτω, ‘a pilgrim’s hospice.’

[c. 1610.—“The conveyance of them thence to the alfanidique.”—Pyrrard della Valte, Hak. Soc. i. 861.]

ALLAHABAD, n.p. This name, which was given in the time of Akbar to the old Hindu Prayag or Prág (PRAAG) has been subjected to a variety of corrupt pronunciations, both European and native. Ilahabas is a not uncommon native form, converted by Europeans into Halabas, and further by English soldiers formerly into Isle of bats. And the Illabads, which we find in the Hastings charges, survives in the Elleeabad still heard occasionally.

* Query, from captured vessels containing foreign (non-Indian) women? The words are as follows: “As escravas que me dias que ha mande, tomarão de prêns, que as Gentis d’esta terra não prendem, e manobras do mundo como chegão a des annos.”
ALLEJA. s. This appears to be a stuff from Turkestian called (Turki) alchah, alajah, or aláchah. It is thus described: "a silk cloth 5 yards long, which has a sort of wavy line pattern running in the length on either side." (Baden-Powell's Punjub Handbook, 86). [Platts in his Hind. Dict. gives idaka, "a kind of cloth woven of silk and thread so as to present the appearance of cardamoms (idaka)."

But this is evidently a folk etymology. Yusuf Ali (Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 85) accepts the derivation fromAleha or Alachah, and says it was probably introduced by the Moguls, and has historical associations with Agra, where alone in the N.W.P. it is manufactured. "This fabric differs from the Doriya in having a substantial texture, whereas the Doriya is generally flimsy. The colours are generally red, or bluish-red, with white stripes." In some of the western districts of the Panjab various kinds of fancy cotton goods are described as Lacha. (Francis, Mon. on Cotton, p. 8). It appears in one of the trade lists (see PIECE-GOODS) as Elachashes.

ALLIGATOR. s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian term for the great lacertine amphibia of the rivers. It was apparently in origin a corruption, imported from S. America, of the Spanish el or al lagarto (Lat. lacerta), "a lizard." The "Summary of the Western Indies" by Pietro Martire d'Anghiera, as given in Ramusio, recounting the last voyage of Columbus, says that, in a certain river, "they sometimes encountered those crocodiles which they call Lagarti; these make away when they see the Christians, and in making away they leave behind them an odour more fragrant than musk." (Rom. iii.
f. 17v.). Oviedo, on another page of the same volume, calls them "Lagartio dragoni" (f. 62).

Bluteau gives "Lagarto, Crocodilo" and adds: "In the Oriente Conquistado (Part I. f. 823) you will find a description of the Crocodile under the name of Lagarto."

One often, in Anglo-Indian conversation, used to meet with the endeavour to distinguish the two well-known species of the Ganges as Crocodile and Alligator, but this, like other applications of popular and general terms to mark scientific distinctions, involves fallacy, as in the cases of 'panther, leopard,' 'camel, dromedary,' 'attorney, solicitor,' and so forth. The two kinds of Gangetic crocodile were known to Aelian (c. 250 A.D.), who writes: "It (the Ganges) breeds two kinds of crocodiles; one of these is not at all hurtful, while the other is the most voracious and cruel eater of flesh; and these have a horny prominence on the top of the nostril. These latter are used as ministers of vengeance upon evil-doers; for those convicted of the greatest crimes are cast to them; and they require no executioner."

1493.-"In a small adjacent island ... our men saw an enormous kind of lizard (lagarto muy grande), which they said was as large round as a calf, and with a tail as long as a lance ... but bulky as it was, it got into the sea, so that they could not catch it."—Letter of Dr. Chacon, in Select Letters of Columbus by Major, Hakl. Soc. 2nd ed., 48.

1599.—"All along this River, that was not very broad, there were a number of Lizards (lagartos), which might more properly be called Serpents ... with scales upon their backs, and mouth two foot wide ... there be of them that will sometimes get upon an almadis ... and overturn it with their tails, swallowing up the men whole, without dismembering of them."—Pinto, in Cogan's tr. 17 (orig. cap. xiv.).

1552.—"... aquatic animals such as ... very great lizards (lagartos), which in form and nature are just the crocodiles of the Nile."—Barros, I. iii. 8.

1568.—"In this River we killed a monstrous Lagarto, or Crocodile ... he was 23 feet by the rule, headed like a hoggo. ..."—Job Hortop, in Hakl. iii. 590.

1579.—"We found here many good commodities ... besides lagartos, munckeyes, and the like."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hakl. Soc. 112.

1691.—"In this place I have seen very great water alligator (which we call in English crocodiles), seven yards long."—Master Antonio Knivet, in Purchas, iv. 1228.

1593.—"In this River (of Guayaquill) and all the Rivers of this Coast, are great abundance of Alligator ... persons of credit have certified to me that as small fishes in other Rivers abound in shoals, so the Alligators are in this ..."—Sir Richard Hawkins, in Purchas, iv. 1400.

c. 1593.—
"... and in his needy shop a tortoise hung, An alligator stuff'd, and other skins Of ill-shaped fishes."

Romeo & Juliet, v. 1.

1596.—"Vpon this river there were great store of fowles ... but for lagartos it exceeded, for there were thousands of those ugly serpents; and the people called it for the abundance of them, the river of Lagartos in their language."—Raleigh, The Discoverie of Guiana, in Hakl. iv. 137.

1596.—"Once he would needs defend a rat to be animal rationale ... because she esteems it more than her husband. And the more to convince it, because everie one laught at him ... the next rat he saw'd on hee made an anatomie of, and read a lecture of 3 days long upon everie artire or muscule, and after hanged her over his head in his studio in stead of an apothecarie's crocodile or dride Alligator."—T. Nash's The Hous of Porter, to meet with the endeavour to discern the difference of venpance upon him."

1592.—"In this River we killed a monstrous Lagarto, seven yarda long."—Fernandez, on another River. Hakl. iv. 137.

1552.—"In this River we killed a monstrous Lagarto, seven yarda long."—Rob Hortop, in Hakl. iv. 137.

1673.—"The River was full of Alligators, and if I saw any I must fight with him, else he would kill me."—D. Midleton, in Purchas, i. 244.

1610.—"These Blackes ... told me the River was full of Alligatas, and if I saw any I must fight with him, else he would kill me."—Midleton, in Purchas, i. 244.

1613.—"... mais avante ... por distancia de 2 legoa, esta o fermoso rio de Casam de lagartos o crocodillo."—Goeden de Breanda, 10.

1675.—"The River was full of Alligators or Crocodiles, which lay basking in the Sun in the Mud on the River's side."—Pray, 55.

1675.—"I was cleaning a vessel ... and had Stages fitted for my People to stand on ... and we were plagued with five or six Alligators, which wanted to be on the Stage."—A. Hamilton, ii. 138.

1761.—"... else that sea-like Stream (Whence Traffic pours her bounties on mankind) Dread Alligators would alone possess."—Grainger, Bk. ii.

1781.—"The Hooghly alone has never been so full of sharks and alligators as now. We have it on undoubted authority that within the past two months over a hundred people have fallen victims to these brutes."—Pioneer Mail, July 10th.

ALLIGATOR-PEAR. 8. The fruit of the Laurus persea, Lin., Persea gratissima, Gaertn. The name as here given is an extravagant, and that of avocado or avocato a more moderate, corruption of aguacat or ahuacat (see below), which appears to have been the native name in Central America, still surviving there. The Quichua name is palta, which is used as well as aguacat by Cieza de Leon, and also by Joseph de Acosta. Grainger (Sugarcane, Bk. I.) calls it "rich *sabaco," which he says is "the Indian name of the avocado, avocado, avigato, or, as the English corruptly call it, alligator pear. The Spaniards in S. America call it Aguacate, and under that name it is described by Ulloa." In French it is called avocat. The praise which Grainger, as quoted below, "liberally bestows on this fruit, is, if we might judge from the specimens occasionally met with in India, absurd. With liberal pepper and salt there may be a remote suggestion of marrow; but that is all. Indeed it is hardly a fruit in the ordinary sense. Its common sea name of 'midshipman's butter' [or 'subaltern's butter'] is suggestive of its merits, or demerits.

Though common and naturalised throughout the W. Indies and E. coasts of tropical S. America, its actual native country is unknown. Its introduction into the Eastern world is comparatively recent; not older than the middle of 18th century. Had it been worth eating it would have come long before.

1532-50.—"There are other fruits belonging to the country, such as fragrant pines and plantains, many excellent guavas, coyamotes, aguacates, and other fruits."—Cieza de Leon, 16.

1608.—"The Paltas is a great tree, and carries a faire leaf, which hath a fruite like to great pears; within it hath a great stone, and all the rest is soft meate, so as when they are full ripe, they are, as it were, butter, and have a delicate taste."—Joseph de Acosta, 250.

c. 1660.—

"The Aguacat no lesser is Venus Friend (To th' Indices Venus Conquest doth extend)

A fragrant Leaf the Aguacate bears;
Her Fruit in fashion of an Egg appears,
With such a white and spermy Juice it swells
As represents moist Life's first Principles."

Conway, Of Plantes, v.

1680.—"This Tavoga is an exceeding pleasant Island, abounding in all manner of fruits, such as Pine-apples... and *Albe-

1685.—"The Aguacate Pear-tree is as big as most Pear-trees... and the Fruit as big as a large Lemon... The Substance in the inside is green, or a little yellowish, and soft as butter..."—Dampier, i. 203.

1736.—"Aguacata, Baum. This fruit itself has no taste, but when mixt with sugar and lemon juice gives a wholesome and tasty flavour."—Zeidler's Lexicon, s. v.

"And thou green avocato, charm of sense, Thy ripen'd marrow liberally bestow't.*"

Grainger, Bk. I.

1830.—"The avocado, with its Brobdignag pear, as large as a purser's lantern."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1843, 40.

[1861.—"There is a well-known West Indian fruit which we call an avocado or alligator pear."—Tylor, Anahuac, 227.]

1873.—"Thus the fruit of the Pera grataeirnna was called Ahocat by the ancient Mexicans; the Spaniards corrupted it to avocado, and our sailors still further to 'Alligator pear.'"—Bell's Nicaragua, 107.

[ALLYGOLE, ALICHOL, ALLYGOLL, ALLEEGOLE, s. H.—P. 'aliqol, from 'dls 'lofty, excellent,' Skt. gola, a troop; a nondescriptive word used for 'irregular foot in the Maratha service, without discipline or regular arms. According to some they are so named from charging in a dense mass and invoking 'Ali, the son-in-law of Mohammed, being chiefly Mohammedana.'—(Wilson)."

1796.—"The Nesibe (Nujeeb) are matchlockmen, and according to their different casts are called Alagoles or Rohillas; they are indifferently formed of high-cast Hindoos and Musselmans, armed with the country Bandook (bandook), to which the ingenuity of De Boigne had added a Bayonet."—*W. 1804.—"Allygool, A sort of chosen light infantry of the Rohilla Patans: sometimes the term appears to be applied to troops supposed to be used generally for desperate service."—Fraser, Military Memoirs of Skinner, ii. 71 note, 75, 76.

1817.—"The Allygoole answer nearly the same description."—Blackser, Mem. of Operations in India, p. 22.]

ALMADIA, s. This is a word introduced into Portuguese from Moorish Ar. al-madjya. Properly it means 'a raft' (see Dozy, s. v.). But it is generally used by the writers on India for a canoe, or the like small native boat.

Socotrana, Lam. In this meaning (a) the name is considered (Hannbury and Flückiger, Pharmacographia, 616) to be derived from the Syriac sōkhrā (P. ałh). b. ALOES-wood, the same as EAGLE-wood. This is perhaps from one of the Indian forms, through the Hebrew (pl. forms) aḥādim, ʾakhalim and aḥālōth, ʾakhalōth. Neither Hippocrates nor Theophrastus mentions aloeo, but Dioscorides describes two kinds of it (Mat. Med. iii. 3). "It was probably the Socotrine aloes with which the ancients were most familiar. Eustathius says the aloe was called ʾlepā, from its excellence in preserving life (ad. II. 630). This accounts for the powder of aloes being called Hiera πικρα in the older writers on Pharmacy." (Francis Adams, Names of all Minerals, Plants, and Animals dec. by the Greek authors, etc.)

(a) c. A.D. 70.—"The best Aloe (Latin the same) is brought out of India. Much use is of it in many cases, but principally to loosen the belly; being the only purgative medicine that is comfortable to the stomach." —Pliny, Bk. xxvii (Pl. Holland ii. 212).

(b) "Hle bo kal Νικόδημος . . . φέρον μίμα ερώτις καὶ ἄλος ὦσει λίπας ἐκατόν."—John xix. 39.

c. A.D. 545.—"From the remoter regions, I speak of Tainista and other places, the imports to Taprobane are silk ALOES-wood (ālōn), cloves, sandal-wood, and so forth."—Cosmas, in Cathay, p. clxxvii.

[c. 1605.—"In wch Iland of Allahakatrina are good haborus faire depth and good Anchor ground." —Description of Birds-wood, First Letter Book, 22. (Here there is a confusion of the name of the island Socotra with that of its best-known product —ALOE Socotrana.)

1617.—". . . a kind of lignum ALOEWISE."—Cocks’s Diary. i. 309 [and see i. 3].

ALOO, a. Skt. — H. dī. This word is now used in Hindustani and other dialects for the 'potato.' The original Skt. is said to mean the esculent root ARUM campanulatum.

ALOO BOKHARA, s. P. alə-bəkʰəra, 'Bokh. plum'; a kind of prune commonly brought to India by the Afghan traders.

[c. 1666.—"Ubec being the country which principally supplies Delhi with . . . many loads of dry fruit, as Bokhara prunes. . ."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 118.]

ALMANACK, a. On this difficult word see Dozy’s Oosterlingen and N.E.D. In a passage quoted by Eusebius from Porphyry (Praep. Evang. t. iii. ed. Gaisford) there is mention of Egyptian calendars called ἀμαναξαρδ. Also in the Vocabular Arusigno of Pedro de Alcala (1605) the Ar. ʾManāk is given as the equivalent of the Span. almanaque, which seems to show that the Sp. Arabs did use ʾmanāk in the sense required, probably having adopted it from the Egyptian, and having assumed the initial aļ to be their own article.

ALMYRA, s. H. almdri. A wardrobe, chest of drawers, or like piece of (closed) furniture. The word is in general use, by masters and servants in Anglo-Indian households, in both N. and S. India. It has come to us from the Port. almaro, but it is the same word as Fr. armoire, Old E. ambr [for which see N.E.D.] &c., and Sc. ʿamra, originating in the Lat. armarium, or -ria, which occurs also in L. Gr. as ἀμαρ, ἀμάρος.

A. D. 1450.—"Item, I will my chamber prestes haue . . . the thone of thame the to almèr, & the thothir of yame the other almèr, whilst I ordnyd for kepyng of vesturentes." —Will of Sir T. Cumberlege, in Academy, Sept. 27, 1879, p. 231.

1589.—"item ane langett, item ane almarie, ane Kist, ane sait burde . . . ."—Ext. Records Burgh of Glasgow, 1876, 130.

1787.—"Sahib, have you looked in Mr. Morrison’s almirah?" —Life in Mofussil, i. 84.

ALPEEN, s. H. alpin, used in Bombay. A common pin, from Port. alfineto (Panjab N. & Q., ii. 117).

AMAH, s. A wet nurse; used in Madras, Bombay, China and Japan. It is Port. ama (comp. German and Swedish amme).

1839.—"... A sort of good-natured housekeeper-like bodies, who talk only of ayahs and amahs, and bad nights, and babies, and the advantages of Hodgson's ale while they are nursing; seeming in short devoted to "suckling fools and chronicling small beer."—Letters from Madras, 294. See also p. 106.

AMBAEE, s. This is a P. word ( cambri) for a Howdah, and the word occurs in Colebrooke's letters, but is quite unusual now. Gladwin defines Aマー as "an umbrella over the Howdah" (Index to Ayeen, i.). The proper application is to a canopied howdah, such as is still used by native princes.

[c. 1661.—"An engraver felt that he might venture to shut his brother up in a covered umbra, a kind of closed litter in which women are carried on elephants."—Bernter (ed. Constable), 69.]

c. 1665.—"On the day that the King went up the Mountain of Pire-ponjale... being followed by a long row of elephants, upon which sat the Women in Mensembers and Embarrys..."—Bernter, E.T. 180 [ed. Constable, 407].

1798.—"The Raja's Sosarees was very grand and superb. He had twenty elephants, richly embroidered with richemahs, the whole of them mounted by his sirdars, himself riding upon the largest, put in the centre."—Skinner, Mem. 1. 167.

1799.—"Many of the largest Ceylon and other DecaneyElephants bore ambarris on which all the chiefs and nobles rode, dressed with magnificence, and adorned with the richest jewels."—Life of Colebrooke, p. 164.

1805.—"Amarzy, a canopied seat for an elephant. An open one is called Howza or Howda."—Dict. of Words used in E. Indies, 2nd ed. 21.

1907.—"A royal tiger which was started in beating a large cover for game, sprang up so far into the umbarry or state howdah, in which Sujah Dowla was seated, as to leave little doubt of a fatal issue."—Williamson, Orient. Field Sports, 15.

AMBARREH, s. Dekh. Hind. and Mahr. ambär, ambäri [Skit. amla-vatkā], the plant Hibiscus cannabinus, affording a useful fibre.

AMBOYNA, n.p. A famous island in the Molucca Sea, belonging to the Dutch. The native form of the name is Ambun [which according to Marsden means 'dew'].

[1605.—"He hath sent hither his forces which hath expelled all the Portuguese out of the ports they here should att Ambwun and Tydore."—Birdwood, First Letter, 68.]

AMEEN, s. The word is Ar. amin, meaning 'a trustworthy person,' and then an inspector, intendant, &c. In India it has several uses as applied to native officials employed under the Civil Courts, but nearly all reducible to the definition of fide commissarius.

Thus an ameen may be employed by a Court to investigate accounts connected with a suit, to prosecute local enquiries of any kind bearing on a suit, to sell or to deliver over possession of immovable property, to carry out legal process as a bailiff, &c. The name is also applied to native assistants in the duties of land-survey. But see Sudder Ameer (SUDDER).

1817.—"Native officers called ammeens were sent to collect accounts, and to obtain information in the districts. The first incidents that occurred were complaints against these ammeens for injurious treatment of the inhabitants..."—Mull. Hist., ed. 1840, iv. 12.

1881.—"Bengalies bowmen, once pure, are converted into demons; Ameeens, once harmless, become tigers; magistrates, supposed to be just, are converted into oppressors."—Peterson, Speech for Prosecution in Nil Durpan case.

1878.—"The Ameer employed in making the partition of an estate."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 230.

1882.—"A missionary... might, on the other hand, be brought to a standstill when asked to explain all the terms used by an amin or valuator who had been sent to fix the judicial rents."—Jamy. Rev., Dec. 30, p. 898.

AMEER, s. Ar. Amir (root amr, 'commanding,' and so) 'a commander, chief, or lord,' and, in Ar. application, any kind of chief from the Amiru' Is-māmim, 'the Amir of the Faithful'
t. e. the Caliph, downwards. The word in this form perhaps first became familiar as applied to the Princes of Sind, at the time of the conquest of that Province by Sir C. J. Napier. It is the title affected by many Mussulman sovereigns of various calibres, as the Amir of Kabul, the Amir of Bokhara, &c. But in sundry other forms the word has, more or less, taken root in European languages since the early Middle Ages. Thus it is the origin of the title ‘Admiral’, now confined to generals of the sea service, but applied in varying forms by medieval Christian writers to the Amirs, or lords, of the court and army of Egypt and other Mohammedan States. The word also came to us again, by a later importation from the Levant, in the French form, Emir or Emer.—See also Omrah, which is in fact Umard, the pl. of Amir. Byzantine writers use Ἀμέρ, Ἀμώρας, Ἀμώρας, Ἀμώρας, &c. (See Dusange, Gloss, Greciot.) It is the opinion of the best scholars that the forms Admiral, Ammiraglio, Admiral &c., originated in the application of a Low Latin termination -al-or -alis, though some doubt may still attach to this question. (See Marcel Devic, s. v. Amirald, and Dozy, Oosterlingh, s. v. Adimiral [and N.E.D. s. v. Admiral]. The d in admirably probably came from a false imagination of connection with admirat).

1280.—‘Li grand amirans des galies m'envoia querre, et me demanda si j'estoie cousins le roy; et je le di que nainin . . . ’—Joannis, p. 175. This passage illustrates the sort of way in which our modern use of the word Admiral originated.

c. 1345.—‘The Master of the Ship is like a great amir; when he goes ashore the archers and the blackamoors march before him with javelins and swords, with drums and horns and trumpets.’—Ibn Batuta, iv. 93.

Compare with this description of the Commander of a Chinese Junk in the 14th century A. Hamilton's of an English Captain in Malabar in the end of the 17th:

"Captain Beawes, who commanded the Alenarle, accompanied us also, carrying a Drum and two Trumpets with us, so as to make our Compliment the more solemn."—i. 294.

And this again of an "interloper" skipper at Hooghly, in 1683:

1683.—"Alley went in a splendid Equipment, habited in scarlet richly laced. Ten Englishmen in Blue Caps and Coats edged with Red, all armed with Blunderbusses, went before his pallankeen, 80 (18) Poms before them, and 4 Musicians playing on the Weights with 2 Flags, before him, like an Agent . . ."—Hodges, Oct. 8 ( Hak. Soc. i. 123).

1884.—"Il Soldano fui cristiano di Grecia, e fu venduto per schiavo quando era fanciullo a uno ammiraglio, come tu diessi capitano di guerra."—Prevost, p. 58.

1615.—"The inhabitants (of Sidon) are of sundry nations and religions; governed by a succession of Princes whom they call Emers; descended, as they say, from the Druses."—Sandys, Journey, 210.

AMOY, n. p. A great seaport of Fokien in China, the name of which in Mandarindialect is Hia-men, meaning 'Hall Gate,' which is in the Changchau dialect A-musv. In some books of the last century it is called Emoy and the like. It is now a Treaty-Port.

1887.—"Amoy or Anhay, which is a city standing on a Navigable River in the Province of Fokien in China, and is a place of vast trade."—Dampier, l. 417. (This looks as if Dampier confounded the name of Amoy, the origin of which (as generally given) we have stated, with that of An-hai, one of the connected ports, which lies to the N.E., about 30 m., as the crow flies, from Amoy.)

1727.—"There are some curiosities in Amoy. One is a large Stone that weighs above forty Tuns . . . in such an Equilibrium, that a Youth of twelve Years old can easily make it move."—A. Hamilton, II. 243.

AMSHOM, s. Malayal. ašham, from Skt. aśam, 'a part,' defined by Gundert as "part of a Talook, formerly called hobiya, greater than a tara." (Logan (Man. Malabar, i. 87) speaks of the asem as a 'parish.') It is further explained in the following quotation:

1788.—"The amshom is really the smallest revenue division there is in Malabar, and is generally a tract of country some square miles in extent, in which there is no such thing as a village, but a series of scattered homesteads and farms, where the owner of the land and his servants reside . . . separate and apart, in single separate huts, or in scattered collections of huts."—Report of Census Com. in India.

A MUCK, to run, v. There is we believe no room for doubt that, to us at least, this expression came from the Malay countries, where both the phrase and the practice are still familiar. Some valuable remarks on the phenomenon, as prevalent among the Malays, were contributed by Dr Oxley of Singapore to the Journal of the Indian Archipelago, vol. iii. p. 532; see a quotation below. [Mr W. W. Skeat writes—"The best explanation of the fact is perhaps that it was the Malay national method of committing suicide, especially as one never hears of Malys committing suicide in any other way. This form of suicide may arise from a wish to die fighting and thus avoid a 'straw death, a cow's death'; but it is curious that women and children are often among the victims, and especially members of the suicide's own family. The act of running a-muck is probably due to causes over which the culprit has some amount of control, as the custom has now died out in the British Possessions in the Peninsula, the offenders probably objecting to being caught and tried in cold blood. I remember hearing of only about two cases (one by a Sikh soldier) in about six years. It has been suggested further that the extreme monotonous heat of the Peninsula may have conduced to such outbreaks as those of Running amuck and Letah.]

The word is by Crawfurd ascribed to the Javanese, and this is his explanation:

"A muck (J.). An a-muck; to run a-muck; to tilt; to run furiously and desperately at any one; to make a furious onset or charge in combat."—(Malay Dict.) [The standard Malay, according to Mr Skeat, is rather amok (mengmok).]

Marsden says that the word rarely occurs in any other than the verbal form mengamuk, 'to make a furious attack' (Mem. of a Malayan Family, 96).

There is reason, however, to ascribe an Indian origin to the term; whilst the practice, apart from the term, is of no rare occurrence in Indian history. Thus Tod records some notable instances in the history of the Rajputs. In one of these (1634) the eldest son of the Raja of Mârwâr ran a-muck at the court of Shâh Jahân, failing in his blow at the Emperor, but killing five courtiers of eminence before he fell himself. Again, in the 18th century, Bijai Singh, also of Mârwâr, bore strong resentment against the Tâlpura prince of Hyderâbâd, Bijar Khân, who had sent to demand from the Râjput tribute and a bride. A Bhatti and a Chondâwat offered their services for vengeance, and set out for Sind as envoys. Whilst Bijar Khân read their credentials, muttering, 'No mention of the bride!' the Chondâwat buried a dagger in his heart, exclaiming 'This for the bride!' 'And this for the tribute!' cried the Bhatti, repeating the blow. The pair then plied their daggers right and left, and 26 persons were slain before the envoys were hacked to pieces (Tod, ii. 45 & 315).

But it is in Malabar that we trace the apparent origin of the Malay term in the existence of certain desperados who are called by a variety of old travellers amouchi or amuco. The nearest approach to this that we have been able to discover is the Malayâlam amar-kkân, 'a warrior' (from amar, 'fight, war'). [The proper Malayâlam term for such men was Chavere, literally those who took up or devoted themselves to death.] One of the special applications of this word is remarkable in connection with a singular custom in Malabar. After the Zamorin had reigned 12 years, a great assembly was held at Tirunâvâyî, when that Prince took his seat surrounded by his dependants, fully armed. Any one might then attack him, and the assailant, if successful in killing the Zamorin, got the throne. This had often happened. [For a full discussion of this custom see Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed., ii. 14 sq.] In 1600 thirty such assailants were killed in the enterprise. Now these men were called amar-kkâr (pl. of amar-kkân, see Gundert s.v.). These men evidently ran a-muck in the true Malay sense; and quotations below will show other illustrations from Malabar which confirm the idea that both name and practice originated in Continental India. There is indeed a difficulty as to the derivation here indicated, in the fact that the amuco or amouchi of European writers on Malabar seems by no means close enough to amarkkan, whilst it is so close to the Malay dmuk; and on this further light may be hoped for. The identity between the amoucos of Malabar and the amuck runners of the Malay peninsula is clearly shown by the passage from Correa given below. [Mr Whiteway adds—to certain Hindus whom he saw in S. Malabar near Quilon, whose duty it was to defend the Syrian Christians with their lives. There are reasons for thinking that the worthy priest got hold of the story of a cock and a bull; but in any case the Hindus referred to were really Jangadas.”] (See JANCADA).

De Gubernatis has indeed suggested that the word amouchi was derived from the Skt. amoksha, ‘that cannot be loosed’; and this would be very consistent with several of the passages which we shall quote, in which the idea of being ‘bound by a vow’ underlies the conduct of the persons to whom the term was applicable both in Malabar and in the Archipelago. But amoksha is a word unknown to Malayalam, in such a sense at least.

‘We have seen a-muck derived from the Ar. almak, ‘fatuous’ ([e.g. Ball, Jungle Life, 358.] But this is etymology of the kind which scorns history.

The phrase has been thoroughly naturalised in England since the days of Dryden and Pope. [The earliest quotation for “running amuck” in the N.E.D. is from Marvell (1672).]

c. 1480.—Niccolo Conti, speaking of the greater islands of the Archipelago under the name of the Two Javas, does not use the word, but describes a form of the practice—

“Homicide is here a jest, and goes without punishment. Debtors are made over to their creditors as slaves; and some of these, preferring death to slavery, will with drawn swords rush on, stabbing all whom they fall in with of less strength than themselves, until they reach death at the hands of some one more than a match for them. This man, the creditors then sue in Court for the dead man’s debt.”—In _India in the XVIth Century_, p. 45.

1511.—“There are some of them (Javanese) who if they fall ill of any severe illness vow to God that if they remain in health they will of their own accord seek another more honourable death for his service, and as soon as they get well they take a dagger in their hands, and go out into the streets and kill as many persons as they meet, both men, women, and children, in such wise that they go like mad dogs, killing until they are killed. These are called Amoco. And as soon as they see them begin this work, they cry out, saying Amoco, Amoco, in order that people may take care of themselves, and they kill them with dagger and spear thrusts.”—Barbosa, Hak. Soc. 194. This passage seems to show that the word amuck must have been commonly used in Malay countries before the arrival of the Portuguese there, c. 1511.

1589.—“The Tyrant (o Rey Ache) sallied forth in person, accompanied with 5000 resolute men (cinco mil Amoucos) and charged the Bataes very furiously.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xviii.) in Cogan, p. 20.

1552.—De Barros, speaking of the capture of the Island of Beth (Beth, off the N.W. point of Kawan) by Nuño Tristán in 1531, says: “But the natives of Guzarat stood in such fear of Sultan Badur that they would not consent to the terms. And so, like people determined on death, all that night they shaved their heads (this is a superstitious practice of those who despise life, people whom they call in India Amoucos) and betook themselves to their mosques, and there devoted their persons to death . . . and as an earnest of this vow, and as an example of this resolution, the Captain ordered a great fire to be made, and cast into it his wife, and a little son that he had, and all his household and his goods, in fear lest anything of his should fall into our possession.” Others did the like, and then they fell upon the Portuguese.—Dec. IV. iv. 13.

c. 1561.—In war between the Kings of Calicut and Cochin (1503) two princes of Cochin were killed. A number of these desperadoes who have been spoken of in the quotations were killed . . . “But some remained who were not killed, and these went in shame, not to have died avenging their lords . . . these were more than 200, who all, according to their custom, shaved off all their hair, even to the eyebrows, and embraced each other and their friends and relations, as men about to suffer death. In this case they are as madmen—known as amoucos—and count themselves as already among the dead. These men dispersed, seeking wherever they might find men of Calicut, and among those they rushed fearless, killing and slaying till they were slain. And some of them, about twenty, reckoning more highly of their honour, desired to turn their death to better account; and these separated, and found their way secretly to Calicut, determined to slay the king. But as it became known that they were amoucos, the city gave the alarm, and the King sent his servants to slay them as they slew others. But they like desperate men played the devil (santio diabrunos) before they were slain, and killed many people, with women and children. And fire of them went together to a road near the city which they haunted for a good while after, making robberies and doing much mischief, until the whole of them were killed.”—Correa, i. 364-5.

1566.—“The King of Cochis . . .” hath a great number of gentlemen which he calleth Amoochi, and some are called Nairs; these two sorts of men esteem not their lives anything, so that it may be for the honour of their King.”—M. Caesar Frederiks in Purchas, ii. 1708. [See Logues, Man. Malabar, i. 138.]

1584.—“Their forces (in Cochin) consist in a kind of soldiers whom they call amoichi, who are under obligation to die at the King's pleasure, and all soldiers who, in war lose their King or their general lie under this obligation. And of such the King makes use in urgent cases, sending them to die fighting."—Letter of F. Sassetti to Francesco I., Gd. D. of Tuscany, in De Gubernatis, 154.

c. 1584.—"There are some also who are called Amocchi . . . . who being weary of living, set themselves in the way with a weapon in their hands, which they call a 'criega,' to kill as many as they meet with, till somebody kill them; and this they do for the least anger they conceive, as desperate men."—G. Balbi in Purchas, ii. 1724.

1602.—De Couto, speaking of the Javanese: "They are chivalrous men, and of such determination that for whatever offence may be offered them they make themselves amoncoor, and revenge themselves with the greatest satisfaction thereof. And were a spear run into the stomach of such an one he would still press forward without fear till he got at his foe."—Dec. iv. iii. 1.

In another passage (ib. vii. 14) De Couto speaks of the amoncos of Malabar just as Della Valle does below. In Dec. vi. viii. 8 he describes how, on the death of the King of Pimonta, in action with the Portuguese, "near 4000 Nares made themselves amoncos with the usual ceremonies, shaving their heads on one side, and swearing by their pagoda to avenge the King's death."

1604.—"Auia hecho vna junta de Amocos, con sus ceremonias para venir a morir adonde el Panical auia sedo muerto."—Guerrero, Relacion, 91.

1611.—"Viceroy. What is the meaning of amoncos? Soldier. It means men who have made up their mind to die in killing as many as they can, as is done in the parts about Malaca by those whom they call amoncus in the language of the country."—Couto, Dialogo do Soldado Pratico, 2nd part, p. 9. (Printed at Lisbon in 1790).

1615.—"Hos inter Nairo genus est et ordro quos Amocos vocant quisbus ob studium rei ballicens praecipua laus tribuitur, et omnium habentur validissimi."—Jarric, Theaurus, i. 66.

1624.—"Though two kings may be at war, either enemy takes great heed not to kill the King of the opposite faction, nor yet to strike his umbrella, wherever it may go . . . for the whole kingdom of the slain or wounded king would be bound to avenge him with the complete destruction of the enemy, or all, if needful, to perish in the attempt. The greater the king's dignity among the people, the longer period lasts this obligation to furious revenge . . . . this period or method of revenge is termed Amoco, and so they say that the Amoco of the Samori lasts even days; the Amoco of the king of Cochin lasts a lifetime; and so of others."—P. della Valle, ii. 745 [Hak. Soc., ii. 380 seq.].

1648.—"Derribere os palisseades s'estoit caché un coquin de Bantamois qui estoit revenu de la Mecque et jouoit à Moqua . . . . il court par les rues et tue tous ceux qu'il rencontre."—Tavernier, V. des Indes, liv. iii. ch. 24 [Ed. Baille, ii. 361 seq.].

1659.—"I saw in this month of February at Batavia the breasts torn with red-hot lances off a black Indian by the executioner; and after this he was broken on the wheel from below upwards. This was because through the evil habit of eating opium (according to the godless custom of the Indians) he had become mad and raised the cry of Amoco (misq. for Amock) . . . in which mad state he had slain five persons . . . . The third amoncor whom I saw during that visit to Batavia (a few months) broken on the wheel for murder."

"Such a murderer and Amock-runner has sometimes the fame of being an invincible hero because he has so manfully repulsed all who tried to seize him . . . . So the Netherlands Government is compelled when such an Amock-runner is taken alive to punish him in a terrible manner."—Walter Schultze's Ost-Indische Reise-Beschreibung (German ed.), Amsterdam, 1678, pp. 19-20 and 227.

1672.—"Every community (of the Malabar Christians), every church has its own Amouchi, which . . . are people who take an oath to protect with their own lives the persons and places put under their safeguard, from all and every harm."—P. Vicenzo Maria, 145.

"If the Prince is slain the amonchi, who are numerous, would avenge him desperately. If he be injured they put on festive raiment, take leave of their parents, and with fire and sword in hand invade the hostile territory, burning every dwelling, and slaying man, woman, and child, sparing none, until they themselves fall."—Ibid. 237-8.

1673.—"And they (the Mohammedans) are hardly restrained from running a muck (which is to kill whoever they meet, till they be slain themselves), especially if they have been at Hodge [Hodges] a Pilgrimage to Mocca."—Fryer, 91.

1687.—Dryden assailing Burnet:—

"Prompt to assault, and careless of defence, Invulnerable in his impudence, He dares the World; and eager of a name,
He thrusts about and justles into fame.
Frontless and satire-proof, he scours the streets
And runs an Indian Muck at all he meets."

The Hind and the Panther, line 2477.

1689.—"Those that run these are called Amonki, and the doing of it Running a Muck."—Ovington, 287.
1712. "Amouco (Termo da India) val o mesmo que homem determinado e apostado que despreza a vida e não teme a morte."—Blueste, s.v.

1727. "I answered him that I could no longer bear their Injustice, and if I had not Permission in three Days, I would run a Muck (which is a mad Custom among the Malayas when they become desperate)."—A. Hamilton, ii. 231.

1787. "Satire's my weapon, but I'm too disreputable To run a muck, and tilt at all I meet."—Pope, Is. of Horace, B. ii, Sat. i. 69.

1783-71. "These acts of indiscriminate murder are called by us munks, because the perpetrators of them, during their frenzy, continually cry out amok, amok, which signifies kill, kill..."—Staunton, i. 291.

1783. At Benoelen in this year (1760)—"the Count (d'Estaing) afraid of an inscription among the Buggasses... invited several to the Fort, and when these had entered the Wicket was shut upon them; in attempting to disarm them, they mangled, that is ran a muck; they drew their creassa, killed one or two Frenchmen, wounded others, and at last suffered themselves, for supporting this right of honour."—Forrest's Voyage to Persia, 77.

1784. "It is too be controverted that these desperate acts of indiscriminate murder, called by us munks, and by the natives mongamo, do actually take place, and frequently too, in some parts of the east (in Java in particular)."—Marden, R. of Sumatra, 239.

1788. "We are determined to run a muck rather than suffer ourselves to be forced away by these Hollander."—Mem. of a Malayan Family, 66.

1788. "At Batavia, if an officer take one of these amoks, or mohawks, as they have been called by an easy corruption, his reward is very considerable; but if he kill them, nothing is added to his usual pay..."—Translator of Staunton, i. 224.

1803. "We cannot help thinking, that one day or another, when they are more full of opium than usual, they (the Malays) will run a muck from Cape Comorin to the Caspian."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3rd ed., iii. 6.

1846. "On the 8th July, 1846, Sunan, a respectable Malay house-builder in Penang, ran amok... killed an old Hindu woman, a Kling, a Chinese boy, and a Kling girl about three years old... and wounded two Hindus, three Kling, and two Chinese, of whom only two survived... On the trial Sunan declared he did not know what he was about, and persisted in this at the place of execution... The amok took place on the 8th, the trial on the 18th, and the execution on the 15th July,—all within 8 days."—J. Ind. Arch., vol. iii. 460-61.

1849. "A man sitting quietly among his friends and relatives, will without provocation suddenly start up, weapon in hand, and slay all within his reach... Next day when interrogated... the answer has invariably been, 'The Devil entered into my eyes were darkened, I did not know what I was about.' I have received the same reply on at least 20 different occasions; on examination of these monomaniacs, I have generally found them labouring under some gastric disease, or troublesome ulcer..."—The Bugis, whether from revenge or disease, are by far the most addicted to run amok. I should think three-fourths of all the cases I have seen have been by persons of this nation."—Dr T. Osley, in J. Ind. Arch., iii. 532.

1875. "On being struck the Malay at once stabbed Arshad with a kris; the blood of the people who had witnessed the deed was aroused, they ran amok, attacked Mr. Birch, who was bathing in a floating bath close to the shore, stabbed and killed him."—Sir W. J. Servis to the E. of Carnarvon, Nov. 16, 1875.

1876. "Twice over, while we were winding our way up the steep hill in Gaia, it was our luck to see a Turk 'run a muck'... nine times out of ten that frenzy is feigned, but not always, as for instance in the case where a priest took to running a muck on an Austrian Lloyd's boat on the Black Sea, and after killing one or two passengers, and wounding others, was only stopped by repeated shots from the Captain's pistol."—Barkley, Five Years in Bulgaria, 240-41.

1877. "The Times of February 11th mentions a fatal muck run by a Spanish sailor, Manuel Alves, at the Sailors' Home, Liverpool; and the Overland Times of India (31st August) another run by a seyoy at Meerut.

1879. "Running a muck does not seem to be confined to the Malays. At Ravenna, on Monday, when the streets were full of people celebrating the festa of St John the Baptist, a maniac rushed out, snatched up a knife from a butcher's stall and fell upon everyone he came across... before he was captured he wounded or less seriously 11 persons, among whom was one little child."—* Pall Mall Gazette*, July 1.

"Captain Shaw mentioned... that he had known as many as 40 people being injured by a single amok runner. When the cry amok! amok! is raised, people fly to the right and left for shelter, for after the blinded madman's kris has once drunk blood, his fury becomes ungovernable, his sole desire is to kill; he strikes there and there; he stays fugitives in the back, his kris drips blood, he rushes on yet more wildly, blood and murder in his course; there are shrieks and groans, his bloodshot eyes start from their sockets, his frenzy gives him unnatural strength; then all of a sudden he drops, shot through the heart, or from sudden exhaustion, clutching his bloody kris."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese,

ANACONDA. a. This word for a great python, or boa, is of very obscure origin. It is now applied in scientific zooology as the specific name of a great
S. American water-snake. Cuvier has "L'Anacundo (Boa scytale et murina, L.—Boa aquatica, Prince Max.)," (Bévye Animal, 1829, ii. 76). Again, in the Official Report prepared by the Brazilian Government for the Philadelphia Exhibition of 1876, we find: "Of the genus Boa . . . we may mention the . . .
scururus or scurubus (B. anaconda), whose skins are used for boots and shoes and other purposes." And as the subject was engaging our attention we read the following in the St James' Gazette of April 3, 1882:—"A very unpleasant account is given by a Brazilian paper, the Voz do Povo of Diamantino, of the proceedings of a huge water-snake called the sucurus, which is to be found in some of the rivers of Brazil . . . A slave, with some companions, was fishing with a net in the river, when he was suddenly seized by a sucurus, who made an effort with his hinder coils to carry off at the same time another of the fishing party." We had naturally supposed the name to be S. American, and its S. American character was rather corroborated by our finding in Ramusio's version of Pietro Martire d'Angheria such S.
American names as Anaacuchoa and Anaacuona. Serious doubt was however thrown on the American origin of the word when we found that Mr H. W. Bates entirely disbelieved it, and when we failed to trace the name in any older books about S.
America.

In fact the oldest authority that we have met with, the famous John Ray, distinctly assigns the name, and the serpent to which the name properly belonged, to Ceylon. This occurs in his Synopsis Methodica Animalium Quadruedesum et Serpentinae Generis, Lond. 1683. In this he gives a Catalogue of Indian Serpents, which he had received from his friend Dr Tancred Robinson, and which the latter had noted in Museo Leydeni.
No. 8 in this list runs as follows:—
"8. Serpens Indicus Bubalinus.
Anacunda Zeylomensibis, id est Bubalorum ailioorumque jumentorum membra conterens," p. 383.

The following passage from St Jerome, giving an etymology, right or wrong, of the word boa, which our naturalists now limit to certain great serpents of America, but which is often popularly applied to the pythons of E. Asia, shows a remarkable analogy to Ray's explanation of the name Anacinda:—

C. A. D. 395-400.—"Si quidem draco mirae magnitudinis, quos gentilis sermone Boas vacant, ab eo quod tam grandes simi ut boves gastire soleant, omnem late vastabat provinciam, et non solum armenta et pecudes sed agricolas quoque et pastores tractos ad se vi spiritus absorbebat."—In Vita Stc.
Hilarionis Eremitarum, Opera Scn. Eus.
Hieron. Venetiis, 1767, ii. col. 55.

Ray adds that on this No. 8 should be read what D. Cleyerus has said in the Ephem. German. An 12. obscr. 7, titled: De Serpente magno Indico Orientalis Uroobubulam deglutente. The serpent in question was 25 feet long.
Ray quotes in abridgment the description of its treatment of the buffalo; how, if the resistance is great, the victim is dragged to a tree, and compressed against it; how the noise of the crushing bones is heard as far as a cannon: how the crushed carcass is covered with saliva, etc. It is added that the country people (apparently this is in Amboyna) regard this great serpent as most desirable food.

The following are extracts from Cleyerus's paper, which is, more fully cited, Miscellanea Oricosa, sive Ephimeridum Medico-Physicorum Germanicarum Academiae Naturae Curiosorum, Dec. ii.—Animus Secundus, Anni
MDCLXXXIII. Norimbergae. Anno MDCLXXXIV. pp. 18-20. It is illustrated by a formidable but inaccurate picture showing the serpent seizing an ox (not a buffalo) by the muzzle, with huge teeth. He tells how he dissected a great snake that he bought from a huntsman in which he found a whole stag of middle age, entire in skin and every part;
and another which contained a wild goat with great horns, likewise quite entire; and a third which had swallowed a porcupine armed with all his "sagittiferis aculeis." In Amboyna a woman great with child had been swallowed by such a serpent.

"Quod si animal quoddam robustius renitatur, ut spiris anguis enecri non possit, serpens crebris cum animali convolucionibus caudae suæ proximam arborem in auxilium et robur corporis arripit sampe circumdat, quo eo fortius et valentius gyris suis animal comprimere, suffocare, et demum enbus aut exaudiri potuit.

"Factum est hoc modo, ut (quod ex fide dignissimis habeo) in Regno Aracon . . . talis vasti corporis anguis prope flumen quodam, cum Uro-bubalo, sive sylvestris bubalo et ura . . . immani spectaculo congregi visus fuerit, sumpque dicto modo occiderit; quo conflictu et plusquam hostili ampli-x fragor ossium in bubalo comminutorum ad distantiam tormenti bellici majoris . . . . a spectaculosis sat eunmisstantibus exandiri potuit . . . ."

The natives said these great snakes had poisonous fangs. These Cleyer could not find, but he believes the teeth to be in some degree venomous, for a servant of his scratched his hand on one of them. It swelled, greatly delirium quam Patrae Jeauitse hic oomponunt, vulneri adapta tus omne venenum extraheref et ubique symptomata convenientibus antidotis essent profligate."

Again, in 1768, we find in the Scots Magazine, App. p. 673, but quoted from "London pap. Aug. 1768," and signed by R. Edwin, a professed eyewitness, a story with the following heading: "Description of the Anaconda, a monstrous species of serpent. In a letter from an English gentleman, many years resident in the Island of Ceylon in the East Indies . . . . The Ceylonese seem to know the creature well; they call it Anaconda, and talked of eating its flesh when they caught it." He describes its seizing and disposing of an enormous "tyger." The serpent darts on the "tyger" from a tree, attacking first with a bite, then partially crushing and dragging it to the tree . . . . "winding his body round both the tyger and the tree with all his violence, till the ribs and other bones began to give way . . . . each giving a loud crack when it burst . . . . the poor creature all this time was living, and at every loud crash of its bones gave a houl, not loud, yet piteous enough to pierce the cruellest heart."

Then the serpent drags away its victim, covers it with slaver, swallows it, etc. The whole thing is very cleverly told, but is evidently a romance founded on the description by "D. Cleyerus," which is quoted by Ray. There are no tigers in Ceylon. In fact, "R. Edwin" has developed the Romance of the Anaconda out of the description of D. Cleyerus, exactly as "Mynheer Försch" some years later developed the Romance of the Upas out of the older stories of the poison tree of Macassar. Indeed, when we find "Dr Andrew Cleyer" mentioned among the early relators of these latter stories, the suspicion becomes strong that both romances had the same author, and that "R. Edwin" was also the true author of the wonderful story told under the name of Foersch. (See further under UPAS.)

In Percival's Ceylon (1803) we read: "Before I arrived in the island I had heard many stories of a monstrous snake, so vast in size as to devour tigers and buffaloes, and so daring as even to attack the elephant." (p. 303). Also, in Pridham's Ceylon and its Dependencies (1849, ii. 750-51): "Pimbera or Anaconda is of the genus Python, Cuvier, and is known in English as the rock-snake." Emerson Tennent (Ceylon, 4th ed., 1860, i. 196) says: "The great python (the 'boa' as it is commonly designated by Europeans, the 'anaconda' of Eastern story) which is supposed to crush the bones of an elephant, and to swallow a tiger" . . . . It may be suspected that the letter of "R. Edwin" was the foundation of all or most of the stories alluded to in these passages. Still we have the authority of Ray's friend that Anaconda, or rather Anacondaia, was at Leyden applied as a Ceylonese name to a specimen of this python. The only interpretation of this that we can offer is Tamil anai-kondra [anaik-konda], "which killed an elephant"; an appellative, but not a name. We have no authority for the application of this appellative to a snake, though the passages quoted from Percival, Pridham, and Tennent are all suggestive of such stories, and the interpretation of the name anacandoia given to Bay: "Bubalorum... membra conterens," is at least quite analogous as an appellative. It may be added that in Malay anakanda signifies "one that is well-born," which does not help us... [Mr Skeat is unable to trace the word in Malay, and rejects the derivation from anakanda given above. A more plausible explanation is that given by Mr D. Ferguson (8 Ser. N. & Q. xii. 123), who derives anacandoia from Singhalese Henakandayi (hena, 'lightning'; kanda, 'stem, trunk,') which is a name for the whip-snake (Passerina mycterizans), the name of the smaller reptile being by a blunder transferred to the greater. It is at least a curious coincidence that Ogilvy (1670) in his "Description of the African Isles" (p. 690), gives: "Anakandef, a sort of small snakes," which is the Malagasy Anakandify, 'a snake."

ANANAS. 5. The Pine-apple (Ananas sativa, Lindl.; Bromelia Ananas, L.), a native of the hot regions of Mexico and Panama. It abounded, as a cultivated plant, in Hispaniola and all the islands according to Oviedo. The Brazilian Nana, or perhaps Nanas, gave the Portuguese Ananas or Ananas. This name has, we believe, accompanied the fruit whithersoever, except to England, it has travelled from its home in America. A pine was brought home to Charles V., as related by J. D'Acosta below. The plant is stated to have been first, in Europe, cultivated at Leyden about 1650 (?) In England it first fruited at Richmond, in Sir M. Decker's garden, in 1712.* But its diffusion in the East was early and rapid. To one who has seen the hundreds of acres covered with pine-apples on the islands adjoining Singapore, or their profusion in a seemingly wild state in the valleys of the Kasia country on the eastern borders of Bengal, it is hard to conceive of this fruit as introduced in modern times from another hemisphere. But, as in the case of tobacco, the name bewrayeth its true origin, whilst the large natural family of plants to which it belongs is exclusively American. The names given by Oviedo, probably those of Hispaniola, are Iatiana as a general name, and Boniana and Atariqua for two species. Pine-apples used to cost a pardao (a coin difficult to determine the value of in those days) when first introduced in Malabar, says Linschoten, but "now there are so many grown in the country, that they are good cheape" (91); [Hak. Soc. ii. 19]. Athanasius Kircher, in the middle of the 17th century, speaks of the ananas as produced in great abundance in the Chinese provinces of Canton, Kiangsu and Fuhkien. In Ibn Muhammad Wali's H. of the Conquest of Assam, written in 1682, the pine-apples of that region are commended for size and flavour. In the last years of the preceding century Carletti (1699) already commends the excellent ananas of Malacca. But even some 20 or 30 years earlier the fruit was grown profusely in W. India, as we learn from Chr. d'Acosta (1578). And we know from the Ain that (about 1690) the ananas was habitually served at the table of Akbar, the price of one being reckoned at only 4 dama, or 1/2 of a rupee; whilst Akbar's son Jahangir states that the fruit came from the sea-ports in the possession of the Portuguese.—(See Ain, i. 66-68.)

In Africa too, this royal fruit has spread, carrying the American name along with it. "The Mānānāzi† or pine-apple," says Burton, "grows luxuriantly as far as 3 marches from the coast (of Zanzibar). It is never cultivated, nor have its qualities as a fibrous plant been discovered." (J.R.G.S. xix. 36). On the Ile Ste Marie, of Madagascar, it grew in the first half of the 17th century as manasse (Flacourt, 29).

Abul Fażl, in the Ain, mentions that the fruit was also called kathal-isafar, or 'travel jack-fruit,' "because young plants put into a vessel may be taken on travels and will yield fruits." This seems a nonsensical pretext for the name, especially as another American fruit, the Guava, is sometimes known in Bengal as the Safari-nan, or 'travel mango.' It has been suggested by one of the present writers that these cases may present an uncommon use of the word safari in the sense of 'foreign' or 'outlandish,' just as Clusius says of the pine-apple in India, "peregrinus est hic fructus," and as we begin this article by speaking of the ananas as having 'travelled' from its home in S. America. In the Teoro of Cobarruvias (1611) we find "Cafori, cosa de Africa o Argel, como grenada" ('a thing from Africa or Algiers, such as a pomegranate'). And on turning to Dasy and Eng. we find that in Saracenic Spain a renowned kind of pomegranate was called romundn safari: though this was said to have its name from a certain Safari sin-Obaid al Kild, who grew it first. One doubts here, and suspects some connection with the Indian terms, though the link is obscure. The lamented Prof. Blochmann, however, in a note on this suggestion, would not admit the possibility of the use of safari for 'foreign.' He called attention to the possible analogy of the Ar. safarjal for 'quince.' Another suggestion may be hazarded. There is an Ar. word, dafffir, which the dicta. define as 'a kind of olive.' Burton (Ar. Nights, iii. 79) translates this as 'sparrow-olives,' and says that they are so called because they attract sparrows (daffir). It is perhaps possible that this name for a variety of olive may have been transferred to the pine-apple, and on reaching India, have been connected by a folk etymology with safari applied to a 'travelled' fruit. In Macassar, according to Crawford, the ananas is called Pandang, from its strong external resemblance, as regards fruit and leaves, to the Pandanus. Conversely, we have called the latter screw-pine, from its resemblance to the ananas, or perhaps to the pine-cone, the original owner of the name. Acosta again (1578) describes the Pandanus odoratissima as the 'wild ananas,' and in Malayalam the pine-apple is called by a name meaning 'pandanus-jackfruit.' The term ananas has been Arabized, among the Indian pharmacists at least, as 'an-un-nsa 'the eye of man'; in Burmese non-na-ri, and in Singhalese and Tamil as anam (see Moddeen Sheriff).

* The English Cyclop. states on the authority of the Sloane MSS. that the pine was brought into England by the Earl of Portland, in 1660. [See Encyl. Brit., 9th ed., xix. 106.]

We should recall attention to the fact that pine-apple was good English long before the discovery of America, its proper meaning being what we have now been driven (for the avoiding of confusion) to call a pine-cone. This is the only meaning of the term 'pine-apple' in Minneh's Guide into Tongues (2nd ed. 1627). And the ananas got this name from its strong resemblance to a pine-cone. This is most striking as regards the large cones of the Stone-Pine of S. Europe. In the following three first quotations 'pine-apple' is used in the old sense:

1563.—"To all such as die so, the people erecteth a chappell, and to each of them a pillar and pole made of Pine-apple for a perpetuall monument."—Reports of Japan, in Hakt. ii. 537.

1577.—"In these islanedes they found no trees known unto them, but Pine-apple trees, and Date trees, and of manryous heught, and exceddyng hardye."—Peter Martyr, in Eden's H. of Travaile, fol. 11.

Oviedo, in H. of the (Western) Indies, fills 2½ folio pages with an enthusiastic description of the pine-apple as first found in Hispaniola, and of the reason why it got this name (pina in Spanish, pigna in Ramusio's Italian, from which we quote). We extract a few fragments.

1536.—"There are in this land of Spagnuolo certain thistles, each of which bears a Pigna, and this is one of the most beautifull fruits that I have seen. It has all these qualities in combination, viz. beauty of aspect, fragrance of colour, and exquisite flavour. The Christians gave it the name it bears (Pigna) because it is, in a manner, like that. But the pine-apples of the Indies of which we are speaking are much more beautiful than the pigna [i.e. pine-cones] of Europe, and have nothing of that hardnesse which is seen in those of Castile, which are in fact nothing but wood," &c.—Ramusio, iii. f. 135 v.

1564.—"Their pines be of the bigness of two fists, the outside whereof is of the making of a pine-apple [i.e. pine-cone], but it is so soft like the rinde of a cucumber, and the inside esteth like an apple, but it is more delicious than any sweet apple sugared."—Master John Hawkins, in Hakt. iii. 602.
ANANAS.

June 19.—"Standing by his Majesty at dinner in the Presence, there was of that rare fruit call'd the King-pine, grown in the Barbadoes and the West indies, the first of them I have ever seen. His Majesty having cut it up was pleas'd to give me a piece off his own plate to taste of, but in my opinion it falls short of those ravishing varieties of deliciousness describ'd in Capt. Ligon's history and others."—Evelyn, July 19.

1716.—"I had more reason to wonder that night at the King's table" (at Hanover) "to see a present from a gentleman of this country. . . . what I thought, worth all the rest, two ripe Ananasus, which to my taste are a fruit perfectly delicious. You know they are naturally the growth of the Brazil, and I could not imagine how they came here but by enchantment."—Lady M. W. Montagu, Letter XIX.

Thomson, Summer.

The poet here gives the word an unusual form and accent.

C. 1730.—"They (the Portuguese) cultivate the skirts of the hills, and grow the best products, such as sugar-cane, pine-apples, and rice."—Khaft Khan, in Elliot, vii. 345.

A curious question has been raised regarding the ananas, similar to that discussed under Custard-Apple, as in the existence of the pine-apple to the Old World, before the days of Columbus.

In Prof. Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies (i. 578), it is stated in reference to ancient Assyria: "Fruits. . . . were highly prized; amongst those of most repute were pomegranates, grapes, citrons, and apparently pine-apples." A foot-note adds: "The representation is so exact that I can hardly doubt the pine-apple being intended. Mr Layard expresses himself on this point with some hesitation (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 338)."

The cut given is something like the conventional figure of a pine-apple, though it seems to us by no means very exact as such. Again, in Winter Jones's tr. of Conti (c. 1430) in India in the 16th Century, the traveller, speaking of a place called Pannonis (read Paumia apparently Pegu) is made to say: "they have pine-apples, oranges, chestnutes, melons, but small and green, white sandal-wood and camphor."
ANANA S.

We cannot believe that in either place the object intended was the Ananas, which has carried that American name with it round the world. Whatever the Assyrian representation was intended for, Conti seems to have stated, in the words pinus habent (as it runs in Poggio's Latin) merely that they had pine-trees. We do not understand on what ground the translator introduced pine-apples. If indeed any fruit was meant, it might have been that of the screw-pine, which though not eaten might perhaps have been seen in the bazars of Pegu, as it is used for some economical purposes. But pinus does not mean a fruit at all. 'Pine-cones' even would have been expressed by pinsas or the like. [A reference to Mr L. W. King was thus answered: "The identity of the tree with the date-palm is, I believe, acknowledged by all naturalists who have studied the trees on the Assyrian monuments, and the 'cones' held by the winged figures have obviously some connection with the trees. I think it was Prof. Tylor of Oxford (see Academy, June 8, 1886, p. 283) who first identified the ceremony with the fertilization of the palm, and there is much to be said for his suggestion. The date-palm was of very great use to the Babylonians and Assyrians, for it furnished them with food, drink, and building materials, and this fact would explain the frequent repetition on the Assyrian monuments of the ceremony of fertilisation. On the other hand, there is no evidence, so far as I know, that the pine-apple was extensively grown in Assyria." Also see Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 556 seq.; on the use of the pine-cone in Greece, Fraser, Pausanias, iii. 65.]

ANCHEDIVA, ANJEDIVA, n.p.
A small island off the W. coast of India, a little S. of Carwar, which is the subject of frequent and interesting mention in the early narratives. The name is interpreted by Malayalam as aśi-ju-diva, 'Five Islands,' and if this is correct belongs to the whole group. This may, however, be only an en-deavour to interpret an old name, which is perhaps traceable in 'Ardhiwa Νηρος of Ptolemy. It is a remarkable example of the slovenliness of English professional map-making that Keith Johnston's Royal Atlas map of India contains no indication of this famous island. [The Times Atlas and Constable's Hand Atlas also ignore it.] It has, between land surveys and sea-charts, been omitted altogether by the compilers. But it is plain enough in the Admiralty charts; and the way Mr Birch speaks of it in his translation of Albuquerque as an "Indian seaport, no longer marked on the maps," is odd (ii. 168).

c. 1345.—Ibn Batuta gives no name, but Anjediva is certainly the island of which he thus speaks: "We left behind us the island (of Sindabur or Goa), passing close to it, and cast anchor by a small island near the mainland, where there was a temple, with a grove and a reservoir of water. When we had landed on this little island we found there a Jogri leaning against the wall of a Budhānāk or house of idols."—Ibn Batut, iv. 63.

The like may be said of the Roteiro of V. da Gama's voyage, which likewise gives no name, but describes in wonderful correspondence with Ibn Batuta; as does Correa, even to the Jogri, still there after 150 years!

1498.—"So the Captain-Major ordered Nicolas Coello to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was; and he found in the same island a building, a church of great ashtar-work, which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones in the midst of the body of the church. Moreover they found, just beyond the church, a tanque of wrought ashtar, in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tanque of the depth of 4 fathoms, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship."—Roteiro, 95.

1510.—"I quitted this place, and went to another island which is called Ansediva ... There is an excellent port between the island and the mainland, and very good water is found in the said island."—Farthing, 120.

c. 1552.—"Dom Francesco de Almeida arriving at the Island of Anchediva, the first thing he did was to send João Homem with letters to the factors of Canaror, Cochin, and Coulo. ..."—Barros, I. viii. 9.

c. 1561.—"They went and put in at Angediva, where they enjoyed themselves much; there were good water springs, and there was in the upper part of the island a tank
ANDAMAN. n.p. The name of a group of islands in the Bay of Bengal, inhabited by tribes of a negrito race, and now partially occupied as a convict settlement under the Government of India. The name (though perhaps obscurely indicated by Ptolemy—see H. Y. in P.R.G.S. 1881, p. 666) first appears distinctly in the Ar. narratives of the 9th century. [The Ar. dual form is said to be from Agamita; the Malay name of the aborigines.] The persistent charge of cannibalism seems to have been unfounded. [See E. H. Man, On the Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands, Intro. xiii. 45.]

A.D. 851.—"Beyond are two islands divided by a sea called Andaman. The natives of these islands devour men alive; their hue is black, their hair woolly; their countenance and eyes have something frightful in them . . . . they go naked, and have no boats . . . ."—Relation des Voyages, &c. par Reinard, i. 8.

c. 1050.—"These islands are mentioned in the great Tanjore temple-inscription (11th cent.) as Tisarat, 'islands of Impurity,' inhabited by cannibals.

c. 1292.—"Angamanain is a very large island. The people are without a King and are idolators, and are no better than wild beasts . . . . they are a most cruel generation, and eat everybody that they can catch if not of their own race."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. c. 18.

c. 1430.—". . . leaving on his right hand an island called Andemanis, which means the island of Gold, the circumference of which is 800 miles. The inhabitants are cannibals. No travellers trust to do so by bad weather, for when taken they are torn to pieces and devoured by these cruel savages."—Conti, in India in XV. Cent., 8.

c. 1566.—"Da Nicub sar a Pega 6 vna catena d'Isole infinite, delle quali molte sono habitat de gente selvaggia, e chiamansi Isole d'Andeman . . . . e se per disgrazia si perde in queste Isole qualche naua, come gia se n'ha perso, non ne scampa alcuno, che tutti gli amazzano, e mangiano."—Cesare de' Federici, in Ramuno, iii. 391.

1727.—"The Islands opposite the Coast of Tanacairn are the Andemans. They lie about 80 leagues off, and are surrounded by many dangerous Banks and Rocks; they are all inhabited with Cannibals, who are so fearless that they will swim off to a Boat if she approach near the shore, and attack her with their wooden Weapons . . . ."—A. Hamilton, ii. 65.

ANDOR. s. Port. 'a litter,' and used in the old Port. writers for a palankin. It was evidently a kind of Muncheel or Dandy, i.e. a slung hammock rather than a palankin. But still, as so often is the case, comes in another word to create perplexity. For andas is, in Port., a bier or a litter, appearing in Bluteau as a genuine Port. word, and the use of which by the writer of the Roteiro quoted below shows that it is so indeed. And in defining Andor the same lexicographer says: 'A portable vehicle in India, in those regions where they do not use beasts, as in Malabar and elsewhere. It is a kind of contrivance like an uncovered Andas, which men bear on their shoulders, &c. . . . Among us Andor is a machine with four arms in which images or reliques of the saints are borne in processions.' This last term is not, as we had imagined an old Port. word. It is Indian, in fact Sanskrit, hindola, 'a swing, a swinging cradle or hammock.' whence also Mahr. hindola, and H. hindola or handola. It occurs, as will be seen, in the old Ar. work about Indian wonders, published by M. Van der Lith and Marcel Deric. [To this Mr Skeat adds that in Malay andor means 'a buffalo-sledge for carting rice,' &c. It would appear to be the same as the Port. word, though it is hard to say which is the original.]

1013.—"Le même m'a conté qu'à Sérendib, les rois et ceux qui se comportent à la façon des rois, se font porter dans le handoul (handoli) qui est semblable à une litière, soutenu sur les épaules de quelques pistons."—Kittâb 'Ajâ'ib al Hind, p. 118.

1498.—"After two days had passed he (the Cashal Cotwal) came to the factory in an andor which men carried on their shoulders, and these (andors) consist of great canes which are bent overhead and arched, and from these are hung certain cloths of a half fathom wide, and a fathom and a half long, and at the ends are pieces of wood to bear the cloth which hangs from the cane; and laid over the cloth there is a great ANDRUM. s. Malavâl. andram. The form of hydrocele common in S. India. It was first described by Kaempfer, in his Decas, Leyden, 1694. —(See also his Amoenitates Exoticae, Fascic. iii. pp. 557 seq.)

ANGELY-WOOD. s. Tam. anjili, or anjali-maram; arctocarpus hirsuta Lam. [in Malabar also known as Iyne (dýnt) (Logan, i. 39)]. A wood of great value on the W. Coast, for shipbuilding, house-building, &c.

ANGEGO, n.p. A place on the Travancore coast, the site of an old English Factory; properly said to be Ayju-tengu, Amâchârnu, Malâyal; the trivial meaning of which would be “five cocoa-nuts.” This name gives rise to the marvellous rhapsody of the once famous Abbe Raynal, regarding “Sterne’s Eliza,” of which we quote below a few sentences from the 34 pages of close print which it fills.

ANGICUT. s. Used in the irrigation of the Madras Presidency for the dam constructed across a river to fill and regulate the supply of the channels drawn off from it; the cardinal work in fact of the great irrigation systems. The word, which has of late years become familiar all over India, is the Tam. comp. anai-katju, ‘Dam-building.’

Mattress of the same size, and this all made of silk-stuff wrought with gold-thread, and with many decorations and fringes and tassels; whilst the ends of the cane are mounted with silver, all very gorgeous, and rich, like the lords who travel so.” — Correa, i. 102.

1582.—“The Moors all were on foot, and their Captain was a valiant Turk, who as being their Captain, for the honour of the thing was carried in an Andor on the shoulders of 4 men, from which he gave his orders as if he were on horseback.” —Barros, ii. vi. viii.

1623.—Della Vallee describes three kinds of shoulder-borne vehicles in use at Goa: (1) reti or nets, which were evidently the simple hammock, muncheel or dandy; (2) the andor; and (3) the palakin. “And these two, the palikins and the andors, also differ from one another, for in the andor the cane which sustains it is, as it is in the reti, straight; whereas in the palakin, for the greater convenience of the inmate, and to give more room for raising his head, the cane is arched upward like this, Ω. For this purpose the canes are bent when they are small and tender. And those vehicles are the most commodious and handsome; whilst the ends of the curved canes, for such canes, of good quality and strength to bear the weight, are not numerous; so they sell for 100 or 120 pardaus each, or about 60 of our scudi.” —P. della Vallee, ii. 610.

1750.—“In the most eminent parts of it (Siam) are thick Forests of Angelina wood, whereof thousands of ships might be made.” —Pinto, in Cogan, p. 289; see also p. 84.

1598.—“There are in India other wonderfull and thick trees, whereof Ships are made; there are trees by Cochin, that are called Angelina, whereof certaine scutes or skiffes called Tones (Doney) are made . . . . it is so strong and hard a woode that Iron in tract of time would bee consumed thereby by reason of the hardness of the woode.” —Linschotes, ch. 58 [Hak. Soc. ii. 50].

1644.—“Another thing which this province of Malavâr produces, in abundance and of excellent quality, is timber, particularly that called Angelina, which is most durable, lasting many years, insomuch that even if you desire to build a great number of ships, or vessels of any kind . . . . you may make them all in a year.” —Bocarro, MS. f. 315.

ANNA.

convenient that you should leave the garrison at present."—Letter from Council at Madras to Lt.-Col. Harper, Comm. at Tanjore, in E. J. Papers, 1777, 4to, i. 386.

1784.—"As the cultivation of the Tanjore country, by all the surveys and reports of our engineers employed in that service, to depend altogether on a supply of water by the Cauvery, which can only be secured by keeping the Anicut and banks in repair, we think it necessary to repeat to you our orders of the 4th July, 1777, on the subject of these repairs."—Dep. of Court of Directors, Oct. 27th, as amended by Bd. of Control, in Bartle, iv. 194.

1785.—"The Anicut is no doubt a judicious building, whether the work of Saheb Raja or anybody else."—Correspondence between A. Ross, Esq., and G. A. Ram, Esq., at Tanjore, on the subject of furnishing water to the N. Circars. In Dalrymple, O. R., ii. 459.

ANILE, NEEL, a. An old name for indigo, borrowed from the Port. amb. They got it from the Ar. al-nil, pron. an-nil; nil again being the common name of indigo in India, from the Skt. nila, 'blue.' The vernacular (in this instance Bengali) word appears in the title of a native satirical drama Nil-Darpan, 'The Mirror of Indigo (planting),' famous in Calcutta in 1861, in connection with a cause célèbre, and with a sentence which discredited the now extinct Supreme Court of Calcutta in a manner unknown since the days of Impey.

"Neel-walla" is a phrase for an Indigo-planter [and his Factory is "Neel-kotha"].

1501.—Amerigo Vespucci, in his letter from the ld. of Cape Verde to Lorenzo di Piero Francesco de' Medici, reporting his meeting with the Portuguese Fleet from India, mentions among other things brought "anil and tuzin," the former a manifest transcription's error for anil.—In Baldelli Ros., 'Il Mondo,' p. livii.

1516.—In Barbosa's price list of Malabar we have:

"Anil adador (i.e. floating; see Garcia below) very grand, per ferazola . . . . . . 20 masams.
Anil loaded, with much sand, per ferazola . . . . . . 18 to 20."

1525.—"A load of anyil in cakes which weighs 34 mountes, 368 tangas."—Lembrança, 52.

1653.—"Anil is not a medicinal substance but an article of trade, so we have no need to speak thereof. . . . The best is pure and clear of earth, and the surest test is to burn it in a candle . . . . others put it in water, and if it floats then they reckon it good."—Garcia, t. 25 v.

1658.—"Neel, the churle 70 duckats, and a churle is 27 rotlettes and a half of Aleppo."—Mr John Newton, in Hakl. ii. 378.

1688.—"They use to prick the skinne, and to put on it a kind of anil, or blacking which doth continue always."—Fisch, in Hakl. ii. 395.

c. 1610.—". . . l'Anil ou Indigue, qui est vne teinture bleue violette, dont il ne s'en trouve qu'à Cambayes et Surattte."—Pyrrard de Levai, ii. 158; [Hak. Soc. ii. 246].

1622.—"E conforme a dita pauta se despechará o dito ano de canella."—In Arch. Port. Orient., faso, 2, 240.

1638.—"Les autres marchandises, que l'on y débite le plus, . . . . du sel ammoniac, et de l'Indique, que ceux de pays appellent Anil."—Mandello, Paris, 1659, 188.

1648.—". . . . and a good quantity of Anil, which, after the place where most of it is got, is called Chirchez Indigo."—Van Twist, 14. Sharkej or Sirkej, 5 m. from Ahmedabad. "Cirquez Indigo." (1824) occurs in Sainthury, iii. 442. It is the "Sercase" of Forbes [Or. Mm. 2nd ed. ii. 204]. The Dutch, about 1620, established a factory there on account of the indigo. Many of the Sultans of Guzerat were buried there (Stavrinus, i. 109). Some account of the "Sarkhej Rosas, or Mauzaolea, is given in H. Briggs's Cities of the Mogulls (Bombay, 1849, pp. 274, sqq.). "Indigo of Bia (Biana) Sicchez" [1609]. Danvers, Letters, i. 28: "Indico, of Laher, here worth viij. the pounde Berchis."—Birdwood, Letter Book, 287.

ANNA, a. Properly H. anà, anah, the 16th part of a rupee. The term belongs to the Mohammedan monetary system (Rube). There is no coin of one anna only, so that it is a money of account only. The term anna is used in denoting a corresponding fraction of any kind of property, and especially in regard to coparcenary shares in land, or shares in a speculation. Thus a one-anna share is \frac{1}{2} of such right, or a share of \xi in the speculation; a four-anna is \frac{1}{4}, and so on. In some parts of India the term is used as subdivision \(\xi\) of the current land measure. Thus, in Sauger, the anna = 16 rúsis, and is itself \xi of a kancha (Elliot, Gloss. s.v.). The term is also sometimes applied colloquially to persons of mixed parentage. 'Such a one has at least 2 annas of dark blood,' or 'coffee-colour.' This may be compared with the Scotch expression that a person of deficient intellect 'wants twopenny in the shilling.'

1708.—"Provided . . . that a debt due from Sir Edward Littleton . . . of 80,407 Rupees and Eight Annas Money of Bengal, with Interest and Damages to the said English Company shall still remain to them . . .—Earl of Godolphin's Award between the Old and the New E. I. Co., in Charters, &c., p. 358.

1727.—"The current money in Surat: Bitter Almonds go 32 to a Pice:

1 Annas . . . . . . 4 Pice.
1 Rupee . . . . . . 16 Annas.

In Bengal their Accounts are kept in Pice:
12 to an Annas.
16 Annas to a Rupee."

ANT, WHITE, s. The insect (Termeis bellicosus of naturalists) not properly an ant, of whose destructive powers there are in India so many disagreeable experiences, and so many marvellous stories. The phrase was perhaps taken up by the English from the Port. formiga branchas, which is in Bluteau's Dict. (1713, iv. 175). But indeed exactly the same expression is used in the 14th century by our medieval authority. It is, we believe, a fact that these insects have been established at Rochelle in France, for a long period, and more recently at St. Helena. They exist also at the Convent of Mt. Sinai, and a species in Queensland.

A.D. c. 250.—It seems probable that Aelian speaks of White Ants.—"But the Indian ants construct a kind of heaped-up dwellings, and these not in depressed or flat positions easily liable to be flooded, but in lofty and elevated positions . . ."—De Nat. Animal. xvi. cap. 15.

1835.—"Est quod etiam ligna rodunt et venas lapidum; et quoutquot breviter invenient siculam super terram, et panones lanaces, et bombysancte lanient; et faciant ad modum muri crustam unan de arenæ minutiissima, ita quod sol non possit eas tangere; et sic remanent coopertæ; verum est quod si contingat illam crustam frangiat, et solem eas tangere, quam citius moriturunt.—Fr. Jordauus, p. 53.

1879.—"But there is yet a far greater inconvenience in this Country, which proceeds from the infinite number of white Emmets, which though they are but little, have teeth so sharp, that they will eat down a wooden Post in a short time. And if great care be not taken in the places where you lock up your Bales of Silk, in four and twenty hours they will eat through a Bale, as if it had been saw'd in two in the middle."

1713.—"On voit encore des fourmis de plusieurs espèces; la plus pernicieuse est celle que les Européens ont nommée fourmi blanche."—Lettres Edifiantes, xii. 98.

1727.—"He then began to form Projects how to clear Accounts with his Master's Creditors, without putting anything in their Pockets. The first was on 500 chests of Japan Copper . . . and they were brought into Account of Profit and Loss, for so much eaten up by the White Ants."—A. Hamilton, ii. 169.

1751.—". . . concerning the Organ, we sent for the Revd. Mr. Bellamy, who declared that when Mr. Frankland applied to him for it that he told him that it was not in his power to give it, but wished it was removed from thence, as Mr. Pearson informed him it was eaten up by the White Ants."—Pt. Will. Cons., Aug. 12. In Long. 25.

1789.—"The White Ant is an insect greatly dreaded in every house; and this is not to be wondered at, as the devastation it occasions is almost incredible."—Munro, Narrative, 81.

1876.—"The metal cases of his baggage are disagreeably suggestive of White Ants, and such omnivorous vermin."—Sat. Review, No. 1057, p. 6.

APIL, s. Transfer of Eng. 'Appeal'; in general native use, in connection with our Courts.

1872.—"There is no Sindi, however wild, that cannot now understand ' Rasid' (receipt) [Rased] and 'Apli' (appeal)."—Burton, Sind Rewinded, i. 283.

APOLLO BUNDER, n.p. A well-known wharf at Bombay. A street near it is called Apollo Street, and a gate of the Fort leading to it 'the Apollo Gate.' The name is said to be a corruption, and probably is so, but of what it is a corruption is not clear. The quotations given afford different suggestions, and Dr Wilson's dictum is entitled to respect, though we do not know what palava here means. Sir G. Birdwood writes that it used to be said in Bombay, that Apollo-bandar was a corr. of palava-bandar, because the pier was the place where the boats used to land palava fish. But we know of no fish so called; it is however possible that the pallo or Sable-fish (Hilsa) is meant, which is so called in Bombay, as well as in Sind. [The Asn. (ii. 338) speaks of "a kind of fish called paloah which comes up into the Indus from the sea, unrivalled for its fine and exquisite flavour," which is the Hilsa.] On the other hand we may observe that there was at Calcutta in 1748 a frequented tavern called the Apollo (see Long, p. 11). And it is not impossible that a house of the same name may have given its title to the Bombay street and wharf. But Sir Michael Westropp's quotation below shows that Pallo was at least the native representation of the name more than 150 years ago. We may add that a native told Mr W. G. Pedder, of the Bombay C.S., from whom we have it, that the name was due to the site having been the place where the "poli" cake, eaten at the Holi festival, was baked. And so we leave the matter. [1823.—"Lieut. Mudge had a tent on Apollo-green for astronomical observations."—Owen, Narrative, i. 327.] 1847.—"A little after sunset, on 2nd Jan. 1843, I left my domicile in Ambrolie, and drove to the Palawí bandar, which receives from our accommodative countrymen the more classical name of Apollo pier."—Wilson, Lands of the Bible, p. 4. 1860.—"And at this place ye Kayghote came to London, theyre ye fofle . . . worchypen II Idolys in cheete. Ye yeffrste is Apollo, wherefoe ye cheefe lonynde place of theyr Metropole is hyght Apollo-Bander . . . ."—Ext. from a MS. of Sir John Mandeville, lately discovered. (A friend here queries: 'By Mr. Shapira!') 1877.—"This bundar is of comparatively recent date. Its name 'Apollo' is an English corruption of the native word Palava (fish), and it was probably not extended and brought into use for passenger traffic till about the year 1819 . . . ."—Maclean, Guide to Bombay, 167. The last work adds a note: "Sir Michael Westropp gives a different derivation . . . : Polo, a corruption of Palava, derived from Pál, which inter alia means a fighting vessel, by which kind of craft the locality was probably frequented. From Palava or Pálavar, the bundar now called Apollo is supposed to take its name. In the memorial of a grant of land, dated 5th Dec. 1743, the palkahd in question is called Pallo."—High Court Reports, iv. pt. 3. [1880.—"His mind is not prehensile like the tail of the Apollo Bundar."—Aberigh-Mackay, Twenty-One Days in India, p. 141.] APRICOT. a. Prunus Armeniaca, L. This English word is of curious origin, as Dozy expounds it. The Romans called it Malum Armeniacum, and also (Persicum?) praecox, or 'early.' Of this the Greeks made παρακτια, &c., and the Arab conquerors of Byzantine provinces took this up as birkoł and berkoł, with the article al-berkoł, whence Sp. albarquco, Port. albroque, alboquorque, Ital. albococco, albicocca, Prov. aubricot, ambroicot, Fr. abricot, Dutch arieben, aribroes, Eng. apricock, apricot. Dozy mentions that Dodonaeus, an old Dutch writer on plants, gives the vernacular name as Vrooje Persen, 'Early Peaches,' which illustrates the origin. In the Cyprus bazaars, apricots are sold as ขวัญผง; but the less poetical name of 'kill-johns' is given by sailors to the small hard kinds common to St. Helena, the Cape, China, &c. Zard diš [aloo] (Pers.) 'yellow-plum' is the common name in India. 1615.—"I received a letter from Jorge Duria ... with a basket of apricockes for my selfe."—Cocks's Diary, I. 7. 1711.—"Apricocks—the Persians call Kill Franz, because Europeans not knowing the Danger are often hurt by them."—Lockyer, p. 231. 1738.—"The common apricot . . . is . . . known in the Frank language (in Barbary) by the name of Malza Franco, or the Killer of Christians."—Shaw's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 144. ARAB. a. This, it may be said, in Anglo-Indian always means 'an Arab horse.' 1296.—"Car il va du port d'Aden en Inde moult grant quantité de bons destriers arrabins et chevaus et grans ronceins de ij salles."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 38. [See Sir H. Yule's note, 1st ed., vol. ii. 375.] 1838.—"Alexander deesseut du destrier Arrabia."—Rommont d'Alexandre (Bodl. MS.).
c. 1590.—"There are fine horses bred in every part of the country; but those of Cachch are so small, being equal to Arabas."—Ats., i. 138.

1825.—"Arabs are excessively scarce and dear; and one which was sent for me to look at, at a price of 800 rupees, was a skittish, cat-legged thing."—Heber, i. 189 (ed. 1844).

c. 1844.—A local magistrate at Simla had returned from an unsuccessful investigation. An acquaintance hailed him next day: 'So I hear you came back re infected!' 'No such thing,' was the reply; 'I came back on my grey Arab!' 1856.—

"... the true blood-royal of his race, The silver Arab with his purple veins Translucent, and his nostrils cowered wide, And flaming eye. ..."

The Banayn Tree.

ARAKAN, ARRACAN, n.p. This is an European form, perhaps through Malay [which Mr Skeat has failed to trace], of Bakhaing, the name which the natives give themselves. This is believed by Sir Arthur Phayre [see Journ. As. Soc. Ben. xii. 24 seqq.] to be a corruption of the Skt. rakhabas, Pali rakhaba, i.e. 'ogre' or the like, a word applied by the early Buddhists to unconverted tribes with whom they came in contact. It is not impossible that the 'Arwyg' of Ptolemy, which unquestionably represents Arakan, may disguise the name by which the country is still known to foreigners; at least no trace of the name as 'Silver-land' in old Indian Geography has yet been found. We may notice, without laying any stress upon it, that in Mr. Beal's account of early Chinese pilgrims to India, there twice occurs mention of an Indo-Chinese kingdom called Q-li-ki-lo, which transliterates fairly into some name like Arwyg, and not into any other yet recognisable (see J.R.A.S. (N.S.) xiii. 560, 562).

1659.—Arracan. See TALAPONIN.

1660.—"Despatches about this time arrived from Muzamm Khan, reporting his successive victories and the flight of Shuja to the country of Bakhang, leaving Bengal undefended."—Khaft Khan, in Eliot, vii. 254.

[c. 1660.—"The Prince ... sent his eldest son, Sultan Banque, to the King of Racon, or Mog."—Bernier (ed. Consable), 109.]

c. 1665.—"Knowing that it is impossible to pass any Cavalry by Land, no, not so much as any Infantry, from Bengal into Bakhang, because of the many channels and rivers upon the Frontiers ... he (the Governor of Bengal) thought upon this experiment, viz. to engage the Hollander in his design. He therefore sent a kind of Ambassador to Batavia."—Bernier, E. T., 65 ([ed. Consable, 180]).

1673.—"... A mixture of that Race, the most accurately base of all Mankind who are known for their Bastard-breed lurking in the Islands at the Mouths of the Ganges, by the name of Racanners."—Fryer, 219. (The word is misspirted Buccanere; but see Fryer's Index.)

1726.—"It is called by some Portuguese Ortakan, by others among them Arrakcan, and by some again Rakan (after its capital) and also Mog (Mugg)."—Valentinyn, v. 140.

1727.—"Arakan has a Conveniency of a noble spacious River."—A. Hamilton, ii. 30.

ARBOL TRISTE, s. The tree or shrub, so called by Port. writers, appears to be the Nyctanthes arbor triste, or Arabian jasmine (N. O. Jasminae), a native of the drier parts of India.
ARCOT, n.p. Arkat, a famous fortress and town in the Madras territory, 66 miles from Madras. The name is derived by Bp. Caldwell from Tam. ᴣメリ, the ‘Six Forests,’ confirmed by the Tam-Fr. Dict. which gives a form ᴣメリ = Six forests [‘the abode of six Rishis in former days. There are several places of this name in the southern districts besides the town of Arcot near Vellore. One of these in Tanjore would correspond better than that with Harkatu of Ibn Batuta, who reached it on the first evening of his march inland after landing from Ceylon, apparently on the shallow coast of Madura or Tanjore.’—Madras Ad. Man. ii. 211]. Notwithstanding the objection made by Maj.-Gen. Cunningham in his Geog. of Ancient India, it is probable that Arcot is the ᴥेरिवै सॅपॊन "Zapat of Ptolemy, ‘Arkatu, residence of K. Sora.’

1566.—‘We landed with them on the beach, in the country of Ma’bar . . . we arrived at the fortress of Harkhat, where we passed the night.’—Ibn Batuta, iv. 187, 188.

1785.—‘It may be said that this letter was written by the Nabob of Arcot in a moody humour . . . certainly it was; but it is in such humour is the truth comes out.’—Burke’s Speech, Feb. 28th.

ARECA, a. The seed (in common parlance the nut) of the palm Areca catechu, L., commonly, though somewhat improperly, called ‘betal-nut’; the term Betel belonging in reality to the leaf which is chewed along with the areca. Though so widely cultivated, the palm is unknown in a truly indigenous state. The word is Malayal. ᴣメディ [according to Bp. Caldwell, from ᴣメディ ‘close arrangement of the cluster,’ ᴣメディ, ‘nut,’ N.E.D.], and comes to us through the Port.

1510.—‘When they eat the said leaves (betal), they eat with them a certain fruit which is called areca, and the tree of the said areca is called Areca.’—Varthema, Hak. Soc., i. 144.

1516.—‘There arrived there many zambucus [Sambook] . . . . with areca.’—Barbosa, Hak. Soc., 64.

1521.—‘They are always chewing Areca, a certain Fruit like a Peare, cut in quarters and rolled up in leaves of a Tree called Betel (or Vetele), like Bay leaves; which having chewed they spit forth. It makes the mouth red. They say they do it to comfort the heart, nor could live without it.’—Fégeré, in Purchas, i. 38.

1548.—‘In the Renda do Betel, or Betel duties at Goa, are included Betel, arequina, jacks, green ginger, oranges, lemons, figs, coir, mangos, citronos.’—Botehão, Tombo, 48. The Port also formed a word arequêtra for the tree bearing the nuts.

1563.—‘. . . and in Malabar they call it par (Tam. pêk); and the Nairs (who are the gentlemen) call it areco.’—Garcia D’O., f. 91 b.

1566.—‘Great quantities of Areca, which is a fruit of the bignesse of nutmegs, which fruites they eate in all these parts of the Indies, with the leafe of an Herbe, which they call Betel.’—C. Frederiks, transl. in Hakl. ii. 360.

1586.—‘Their friends come and bring gifts, cocoos, figges, areccæs, and other fruits.’—Fich, in Hakl., ii. 380.

1624.—‘And therewith they mix a little ashes of sea-shells and some small pieces of an Indian nut sufficiently common, with which they here call Poufel, and in other places Areca; a very dry fruit, seeming within like perfect wood; and being of an astringent nature they hold it good to strengthen the Toeth.’—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 38. Mr Grey says: ‘As to the Port name, Poufel or Poufel, the origin is uncertain. In Sir J. Maundeville’s Travels it is said that black pepper “is called Falful,” which is probably the same word as “Poufel.” But the Ar. Poufel or Poufel is “betal-nut.”]

1689.—‘. . . the Nerí which is drawn from the Arequês Tree in a fresh earthen vessel, is as sweet and pleasant as Milk’—Ovington, 287. [Nerí = H. and Mahr. ᴣメディ, ‘sap,’ but nerí is, we are told, Gueseati for toddy in some form.]

ARGEMONE MEXICANA. This American weed (N.O. Papaveraceae) is notable as having overrun India, in every part of which it seems to be familiar. It is known by a variety of names, Firinghi ḍhatūra, gamboge thistle, &c. [See Watt, Dict. Econ. Prod., i. 306 seqq.]
ARGUS PHEASANT, a. This name, which seems more properly to belong to the splendid bird of the Malay Peninsula (Argusanua gigantes, Tem., Pavo argus, Lin.), is confusingly applied in Upper India to the Himàlayan horned pheasant Ceriornis (Spp. satyra, and melianaopephala) from the round white eyes or spots which mark a great part of the bird’s plumage.— See remark under MOONAH.

ARRACK, RACK, a. This word is the Ar. ʿarak, properly ‘perspiration,’ and then, first the exudation or sap drawn from the date palm (ʿarak al-tamar); secondly any strong drink, ‘distilled spirit,’ ‘essence,’ etc. But it has spread to very remote corners of Asia. Thus it is used in the forms ʿarıkì and ʿarıkí in Mongolia and Manchuria, for spirit distilled from grain. In India it is applied to a variety of common spirits; in S. India to those distilled from the fermented sap of sundry palms; in E. and N. India to the spirit distilled from cane-molasses, and also to that from rice. The Turkish form of the word, rakı, is applied to a spirit made from grape-skins; and in Syria and Egypt to a spirit flavoured with anisseed, made in the Lebanon. There is a popular or slang Fr. word, riquiqui, for brandy, which appears also to be derived from ʿarakī (Marcel Devic). Humboldt (Examen, &c., ii. 300) says that the word first appears in Pigafetta’s Voyage of Magellan; but this is not correct.

c. 1420.—“At every yearm (post-house) they give the travellers a sheep, a goose, a fowl . . . ʿarak . . .”—Shah Rukh’s Embassy to China, in N. & E., xiv. 396.

1516.—“And they bring coccu-nuts, hurrace (which is something to drink) . . .”—Barboas, Hak. Soc. 59.

1518.—“—que todos os mantimentos sao de pão, como vinhos, orracas, arrozées, carnes, e pescações.—In Archiv. Port. orient., fasc. 2, 57.

1521.—“When these people saw the politeness of the captain, they presented some fish, and a vessel of palm-wine, which they call in their language uraca . . .”—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 72.

1544.—“Manuell a cruze . . . commendo ut plurimum invigilat duobus illis Christianorum Carerum pagis, diligentere attendere . . . nemo potu Oracae se inebriet . . . si ex hoc dico ne nemo Punicali oracae potetur, ipso ad mihi suo gravi damno luituros.—Sci. Fr. Xar. Epist., p. 111.

1554.—“And the excuse on the orragas made from palm-trees, of which there are three kinds, viz., cara, which is as it is drawn; orragas, which is cara once boiled (cosida, qu. distilled!); sharab (ziraza) which is boiled two or three times and is stronger than orragas.”—S. Botelho, Tombo, 50.

1563.—“One kind (of coccu-palm) they keep to bear fruit, the other for the sake of the cara, which is vino mosto; and this when it has been distilled they call . . .”—Garcia D’O., f. 67. (The word uraca, used here, is a very ancient importation from India, for Cosmas (6th century) in his account of the coccu-nut, confounding (it would seem) the milk with the toddy of that palm, says: “The Argelion is at first full of a very sweet water, which the Indians drink from the nut, using it instead of wine. This drink is called rhoncousra, and is extremely pleasant.” It is indeed possible that the rhonco here may already be the word arrack).

1605.—“A Chinese borne, but now turned Javan, who was our next neighbour . . . and brewed Arracke which is a kind of hot drink, that is used in most of these parts of the world, instead of Wine . . .”—E. Scot, in Purchas, i. 175.

1631.—“. . . jecur . . . a poto istius maledicti Arrac, non tantum in temperamento immutatum, sed etiam in substantia sua corruptur.”—Jac. Bonitus, lib. ii. caps. vii. p. 22.

1687.—“Two jars of Arrack (made of rice as I judged) called by the Chinese Samahe (Sampacho).”—Dampier, i. 419.

1719.—“We exchanged some of our wares for opium and some arrack . . .”—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. II.

1727.—“Mr Boucher had been 14 Months soliciting to procure his Phirmand; but his repeated Petitions . . . had no Effect. But he had an Englishman, one Swain, for his Interpreter, who often took a large Dose of Arrack . . . Swan got pretty near the King (Aurungshe) . . . and cried with a loud Voice in the Persian Language that his Master wanted Justice done him” (see DOAI).—A. Hamilton, i. 97.

Rack is a further corruption; and rack-punch is perhaps not quite obsolete.

1603.—“We taking the But-ends of Pikes and Halberts and Faggot-sticks, drive them into a Raack-house.”—E. Scot, in Purchas, i. 184.

Purchas also has Vraci and other forms; and at i. 648 there is mention of a strong kind of spirit called Back-pees (Malay dp = fire). See FOOL’S RACK.

1616.—“Some small quantitie of Wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Raack, distilled from Sugar and a spicie Rinde of a Tree called Jagra (Jaggery).”—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1470.

1622.—“We’ll send him a jar of rack by next conveyance.”—Letter in Sainsbury, iii. 40.
ARSÉNAL. 37

ARYAN.

1627. — "Java hath been fatal to many of the English, but much through their own distemper with Back." — Purchas, Pilgrimage, 465.

A.D. 1591. — "Joe...finally insisted upon having a bowl of punch. That bowl of punch was the cause of all this history." — Vanity Fair, ch. vi.

ARSÉNAL, a. An old and ingenious etymology of this word is arz navalis. But it is really Arabic. Hyde derives it from tars-hadhah, 'domus terroris,' contracted into tarsinah, the form (as he says) used at Constantinople (Syntagma Dissert., i. 100). But it is really the Ar. dār al-ṣinaḍa, 'domus artificii,' as the quotations from Ma'lūd clearly show. The old It. forms darsena, darsinale corroborate this, and the Sp. tarascan, which is rendered in Ar. by Pedro de Alcala, quoted by Dozy, as dar a cinaa. — (See details in Dozy, Oosterlingen, 16-18.)

1573. — "In this city (Fes) there is a very great building which they call Darsaena, where the Christian captives used to labour at blacksmith’s work and other crafts under the superintendence and orders of renegade headmen...here they made cannon and powder, and wrought swords, cross-bows, and arquebuses." — Marmol, Desc. General de Africa, lib. iii. f. 92.

ART, EUROPEAN. We have heard much, and justly, of late years regarding the corruption of Indian art and artistic instinct by the employment of the artists in working for European patrons, and after European patterns. The copying of such patterns is no new thing, as we may see from this passage of the brightest of writers upon India whilst still under Asiatic government.

c. 1655. — "...not that the Indians have not wit enough to make them successful in Arts, they doing very well (as to some of them) in many parts of India, and it being found that they have inclination enough for them, and that some of them make (even without a Master) very pretty workmanship and imitate so well our work of Europe, that the difference thereof will hardly be discerned." — Bernier, E. T., 81-82 [ed. Constable, 254].

ARTIFICE, a. The genealogy of this word appears to be somewhat as follows: The Ar. is al-hashir (perhaps connected with ḥarash, 'rough-skinned') or al-kharash; hence Sp. alcarchose and It. carciofo and arcoico, Fr. archivant, Eng. artichoke.

1488. — "The Incense (bensoin) tree is small...its branches are like those of a thistle or an artichoke (al-kharash)." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 240. Al-kharash in the published text. The spelling with a instead of ā is believed to be correct (see Dozy, a.v. Alcarchosa); [also see N.E.D. a.v. Artichoke].

ARYAN, adj. Skt. Ārya, 'noble.' A term frequently used to include all the races (Indo-Persic, Greek, Roman, Celtic, Scavonic, &c.) which speak languages belonging to the same family as Sanskrit. Much vogue was given to the term by Pictet’s publication of Les Origines Indo-Européennes, ou les Aryes Primitifs (Paris, 1869), and this writer seems almost to claim the name in this sense as his own (see quotation below). But it was in use long before the date of his book. Our first quotation is from Ritter, and there it has hardly reached the full extent of application. Ritter seems to have derived the use in this passage from Lessen’s Pentapotamia. The word has in great measure superseded the older term Indo-Germanic, proposed by F. Schlegel at the beginning of the last century. The latter is, however, still sometimes used, and M. Hovelacque, especially, prefers it. We may observe here that the connection which evidently exists between the several languages classed together as Aryan cannot be regarded, as it was formerly, as warranting an assumption of identity of race in all the peoples who speak them.

It may be noted as curious that among the Javanese (a people so remote in blood from what we understand by Aryan), the word Arya is commonly used as an honorary prefix to the names of men of rank; a survival of the ancient Hindu influence on the civilisation of the island.

The earliest use of Aryan in an ethnic sense is in the Inscription on the tomb of Darius, in which the king calls himself an Aryan, and of Aryan descent, whilst Ormuzd is in the Median version styled, ‘God of the Aryans’ 1881.-"Latin, aegine, with Greek, and the Celtic, the Teutonic, and Slavonic languages, together likewise with the ancient dialects of India and Persia, must have sprung from an earlier language, the mother of the whole Indo-European or Aryan family of speech."—Prof. Max Müller, Lectures, 1st Ser. 52.

We also find the verb Aryanize:

1885.—"Thus all India was brought under the sway, physical or intellectual and moral, of the alien race; it was thoroughly Aryanized."—Whitney, u. s. 7.

ASHRAFEE, a. Arab. ashraf, 'noble,' applied to various gold coins (in analogy with the old English 'noble'), especially to the dinar of Egypt, and to the Gold Mohur of India.—See AXERAFINE.

c. 1550.—"There was also the sum of 500,000 Fanory ahrerarffis equal in the currency of Persia to 50,000 royal Irak tomans."—Mem. of Harunayn, 126. A note suggests that Fanory, or Flor, indicates forts.

ASSAM, n.p. The name applied for the last three centuries or more to the great valley of the Brahmaputra River, from the emergence of its chief sources from the mountains till it enters the great plain of Bengal. The name Assam and sometimes Asham is a form of Ahum or Ahom, a dynasty of Shan race, who entered the country in the middle ages, and long ruled it. Assam politically is now a province embracing much more than the name properly included.

c. 1690.—"The dominions of the Rajah of Asham join to Kamroop; he is a very powerful prince, lives in great state, and when he dies, his principal attendants, both male and female, are voluntarily buried alive with his corpse."—Gladwin's Ayen (ed. 1800) ii. 3; [Jarrett, trans. ii. 118].

1782.—"Ye Nabob was very busy dispatching and vesting divers principal officers sent with all possible diligence with recruits for their army, lately overthrown in Asham and Sillet, two large plentiful countries 8 days' journey distant from this city (Dacca)."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 29th.; [Hak. Soc. I. 43].

1770.—"In the beginning of the present century, some Brahmins of Bengal carried their superstitions to Asham, where the people were so happy as to be guided solely by the dictates of natural religion."—Raynal (tr. 1777) i. 420.1

1788.—"M. Chevalier, the late Governor of Chandernagore, by permission of the King, went up as high as the capital of Assam, about the year 1762."—Kennell's Mem., 3rd ed. p. 229.

ASSEGAY, a. An African throwing-spear. Dozy has shown that this is Berber zaghdya, with the Ar. article prefixed (p. 223). Those who use it often seem to take it for a S. African or Eastern word. So Godinho de Eredia seems to use it as if Malay (f. 21v). [Mr Skeat remarks that the nearest word in Malay is seligi, explained by Klinkert as ‘a short wooden throwing-spear,’ which is possibly that referred to by G. de Eredia.]

2. 1270.—“There was the King standing with three ‘exortins’ (or men of the guard) by his side armed with javelins [ab iar atagayes].”—Chronicle of K. James of Aragon, tr. by Mr. Foster, 1888, i. 173.

c. 1444.—“... They have a quantity of amugaias, which are a kind of light darts.”—Codestesto, Navagato primeira, 82.

1533.—“But in general they all came armed in their fashion, some with amugaias and shields and others with bows and quivers of arrows.”—Barros, i. iii. 1.

1572.—“Hum de escendo embracado, e de amugaias, Outro de arco encerrado, e secta arrada.”—Camões, i. 86.

By Burton:

“this, targe on arm and amugai in hand, that, with his bended bow, and venom’d reed.”

1586.—“I loro archibugi sono belli, e buoni, come i nostri, e lo lance sono fatte con alcune canne piene, e farti, in capo delle quali mettono vn ferro, come uno di quelli dalle nostri sagagit.”—Balbi, 111.

1600.—“These they use to make Instruments of wherewith to fish ... as also to make weapons, as Bows, Arrows, Aponeres, and Asmagayes.”—Disc. of Guinea, from the Dutch, in Purchas, ii. 927.

1608.—“Donques voyant que nous ne pouvions passer, les deux hommes sont venus en nageant auprès de nous, et ayans en leurs mains trois Lanceets ou Asmagayes.”—Houtman, 66.

[1648.—“The ordinary food of these Caferes is the flesh of this animal (the elephant), and four of them with their Assegais (in orig. assegayes) which are a kind of short pikes are able to bring an elephant to the ground and kill it.”—Tavernier (ed. Ball), ii. 161, cf. ii. 285.]

1666.—“Les autres armes offensives (in India) sont l’arc et la flèche, le javelot ou sagayes ...”—Thévenot, v. 192 (ed. 1727).

1681.—“... ils ont ... dite des y nuve hommes bases armados con dardas, y assayas, asi llamam los Arabes unas lancas pequenas arrojadas, y plegaron con elles.”—Martines de la Puente, Compendio, 87.

1879.—“Alert to fight, athirst to slay,
They make the dreaded assagi,
And rush with blind and frantic will
On all, when few, whose force is skill.”—Ismadaya, by Ld. Stratford de Redcliffe, Times, March 29.

ATAP, ADAP. s. Applied in the Malayo-Javanese regions to any palm-fronds used in thatching, chiefly to those of the Nipa (Nipa fruticans, Thunb.). [Atap, according to Mr Skeat, is also applied to any roofing; thus tiles are called atap batu, ‘stone ataps.’]

The Nipa, “although a wild plant, for it is so abundant that its culture is not necessary, it is remarkable that its name should be the same in all the languages from Sumatra to the Philippines.”—(Crawford, Dict. Ind. Arch. 301). Atap is Javanese for ‘thatch.’

1672.—“Atap or leaves of Palm-trees ...”—Baldaeus, Ceylon, 184.

1690.—“Adapoli (quae solut sioces et vetusta) ...”—Rumphius, Herb. Amb. i. 14.

1817.—“In the maritime districts, atap or thatch is made ... from the leaves of the nipa.”—Raffles, Java, i. 166; (2nd ed. i. 186).

1878.—“The universal roofing of a Perak house is Atap stretched over bamboo rafters and ridge-poles. This atap is the dried leaf of the nipah palm, doubled over a small stick of bamboo, or ribong.”—McNair, Perak, &c., 164.

ATLAS. s. An obsolete word for ‘satin,’ from the Ar. atlās, used in that sense, literally ‘bare’ or ‘bald’ (comp. the Ital. raso for ‘satin’). The word is still used in German. [The Draper’s Dict. (a.v.) says that “a silk stuff wrought with threads of gold and silver, and known by this name, was at one time imported from India.”]

Yusuf Ali (Mon. on Silk Fabrics, p. 93) writes: “Atlas is the Indian satin, but the term satan (corrupted from the English) is also applied, and sometimes specialised to a thicker form of the fabric. This fabric is always substantial, i.e. never so thin or netted as to be semi-transparent; more of the weft showing on the upper surface than of the warp.”]

1673.—“They go Rich in Apparel, their Turbats of Gold, Damask’d Gold Atlas Coats to their Heels, Silk, Aluja or Cuttaneese breeches.”—Fryer, 196.

1683.—“I saw ye Taffiates and Atlassees in ye Warehouse, and gave directions concerning their several colours and stripes.”—Hedges, Diary, May 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 85].

1689.—(Surat) “... is renown’d for ... rich Silks, such as Atlassees ... and for Zarbafe [or Zarbaf]. ...”—Ovington, 218.
1712.—In the Spectator of this year are advertised "a purple and gold Atlas gown" and "a scarlet and gold Atlas petticoat edged with silver."—Cited in Malcolm's Anecdotes (1806), 429.

1777.—"They are exquisite in the Weaver's Trade and Embroidery, which may be seen in the rich Atlas . . . made by them."—A. Hamilton, i. 160.

c. 1750-60.—"The most considerable (manufacture) is that of their atlases or satin flowered with gold and silver."—Grose, i. 117.

Note.—I saw not long ago in India a Polish Jew who was called Jacob Atlas, and he explained to me that when the Jews (about 1800) were forced to assume surnames, this was assigned to his grandfather, because he wore a black satin gaberine!—(A. B. 1879.)

ATOLL, s. A group of coral islands forming a ring or chaplet, sometimes of many miles in diameter, inclosing a space of comparatively shallow water, each of the islands being on the same type as the atoll. We derive the expression from the Maldivian islands, which are the typical examples of this structure, and where the form of the word is adolu. [P. de Laval (Hak. Soc. i. 93) states that the provinces in the Maldives were known as Atollon.] It is probably connected with the Sinhalese etukh, 'inside'; [or etula, as Mr Gray (P. de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 94) writes the word.] The Mad. Admin. Man. in the Glossary gives Malayal. attalam, 'a sinking reef'. The term was made a scientific one by Darwin in his publication on Coral Reefs (see below), but our second quotation shows that it had been generalised at an earlier date.

c. 1810.—"Étant au milieu d'un Atlollon, vous voyez autour de vous ce grand banc de pierre que jay dit, qui environne et qui defend les iles contre l'imputuosité de la mer."—Pyrrard de Laval, i. 71 (ed. 1879); [Hak. Soc. i. 94].

1752.—"Atollon, a name applied to such a place in the sea as exhibits a heap of little islands lying close together, and almost hanging on to each other."—Zeidler's (German) Universal Lexicon, s.v.

1842.—"I have invariably used in this volume the term atoll, which is the same given to these circular groups of coral islets by their inhabitants in the Indian Ocean, and is synonymous with 'lagoon-island'."—Darwin, The Structure, &c., of Coral Reefs, 2.

AUMIL, s. Ar. and thence H. âmîl (noun of agency from 'amal, 'he performed a task or office,' therefore 'an agent'). Under the native governments a collector of Revenue; also a farmer of the Revenue invested with chief authority in his District. Also AUMILDAH. Properly 'amaldir, 'one holding office'; (Ar. 'amal, 'work,' with P. term of agency). A factor or manager. Among the Mahrattas the 'Amaldir was a collector of revenue under varying conditions—(See details in Wilson). The term is now limited to Mysore and a few other parts of India, and does not belong to the standard system of any Presidency. The word in the following passage looks as if intended for 'amaldir, though there is a term Maldir, 'the holder of property.'

1850.—"The Mandal or Didar (Dewan) that came with the Ruccas (Boodah) from Golconda sent forward to Lingappa at Conjiveram."—Ft. St. Geo. Cons., 9th No. III., 38.

c. 1780.—". . . having detected various frauds in the management of the Amaldir or renter . . . (M. Lally) paid him 40,000 rupees."—Orme, iii. 496 (ed. 1800).

1788.—"The amaldira, or managers of the districts."—Diram, p. 56.

1799.—"I wish that you would desire one of your people to communicate with the Amaldir of Soondah respecting this road."—A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Munro's Life, i. 335.

1804.—"I know the character of the Poshwah, and his ministers, and of every Mahrata amaldir sufficiently well . . ."—Wellington, iii. 38.

1809.—"Of the amul I saw nothing."—Ld. Valentia, i. 412.

AURUNG, s. H. from P. aurang, 'a place where goods are manufactured, a dépôt for such goods.' During the Company's trading days this term was applied to their factories for the purchase, on advances, of native piece-goods, &c.

1778.—". . . Gentoo-factors in their own pay to provide the investments at the different Aurungs or cloth markets in the province."—Orme, ii. 51.

1789.—"I doubt, however, very much whether he has had sufficient experience in the commercial line to enable him to manage so difficult and so important an aurung as Luckipore, which is almost the only one of any magnitude which supplies the species of coarse cloths which do not interfere with the British manufacture."—Carmichael, i. 436.

AVA, n.p. The name of the city which was for several centuries the AVADAVAT, s. Improperly for Amadavat. The name given to a certain pretty little cage-bird (Estrela amandava, L. or 'Red Wax-Bill') found throughout India, but originally brought to Europe by Ahmadabad, in Guzerat, of which the name is a corruption. We also find Ahmadabad represented by Madava; as in old maps Astabad on the Caspian is represented by Strava (see quotation from Correa below). [One of the native names for the bird is lal, 'ruby,' which appears in the quotation from Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali below.]

1546.—"The greater the resistance they made, the more of their blood was spilt in their defeat, and when they took to flight, we gave them chase for the space of half a league. And it is my belief that as far as the will of the officers and lascars went, we should not have halted on this side of Madavá; but as I saw that my people were much fatigued, and that the Moors were in great numbers, I withdrew them and brought them back to the city."—D. João de Castro's despatch to the City of Goa respecting the victory at Diu.—Correa, iv. 574.

1648.—"The capital (of Guzerat) lies in the interior of the country and is named Hamel-Boud, i.e. the City of King Hamel who built it; nowadays they call it Amadavar or Amadabat."—Van Twist, 4.

1673.—"From Amadavad, small Birds, who besides that they are spotted with white and Red no bigger than Maseels, the principal Chorister beginning, the rest in Consort, Fifty in a Cage, make an admirable Chorus."—Fryer, 116.

[1777.—"... a few presents now and then—china, shaws, congon tea, avadavats, and Indian crackers."—The School for Scandal, v. i.]

1813.—"... amadavats, and other songsters are brought thither (Bombey) from Surat and different countries."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47. [The 2nd ed. (i. 32) reads amavadsa.] [1832.—"The lollah, known to many by the name of haver-dawatt, is a beautiful little creature, about one-third the size of a hedge-sparrow."—Mrs Meer Hassan Ali, Observat. ii. 54.]

AVATAR, a. Skt. Avatra, an incarnation on earth of a divine Being. This word first appears in Baldaeus (1672) in the form Antiar (Agoder, p. 52), which in the German version generally quoted in this book takes the corrupter shape of Altar.

[c. 1690.—"In the city of Sambal is a temple called Hari Mandal (the temple of Vishnu) belonging to a Brahman, from among whose descendants the term avatar will appear at this spot."—Alt, tr. Jarrett, ii. 281.]

1672.—"Bey den Benjansen haben auch diese zehen Verwandlungen den Namen das sie Altarea heissen, und auch hat Mats Altar als dieser erste, gewihret 2500 Jahr."—Baldaeus, 472.

1784.—"The ten Avatáras or descents of the deity, in his capacity of Preserver."—Sir W. Jones, in Avat. Res. (reprint) i. 284.
1812.—"The Avatars of Vishnu, by which are meant his descents upon earth, are usually counted ten..."—Maria Graham, 49.

1821.—"The Irish Avatar."—Byron.

1872.—"... all which cannot blind us to the fact that the Master is merely another avatar of Dr Holmes himself."—Sal. Review, Dec. 14, p. 768.

1873.—"He... builds up a curious History of Spiritualism, according to which all matter is mediated or immediately the avatar of some Intelligence, not necessarily the highest."—Academy, May 15th, 1726.

1875.—"Bo... Balbo's avatars were a hundredfold as numerous as those of Vishnu."—1842, April 24th, p. 421.

AVERAGE. s. Skeet derives this in all its senses from L. Latin averia, used for cattle; for his deduction of meanings we must refer to his Dictionary. But it is worthy of consideration whether average, in its special marine use for a proportionate contribution towards losses of those whose goods are cast into the sea to save a ship, &c., is not directly connected with the Fr. averie, which has quite that signification. And this last Dozy shows most plausibly to be from the Ar. 'aowdr, spoilt merchandise.' [This is rejected by the N.E.D., which concludes that the Ar. 'aowdr is "merely a mod. Arabic translation and adaptation of the Western term in its latest sense."] Note that many European words of trade are from the Arabic; and that averie is in Dutch averij, avery, or haverti.—(See Dozy, Oosterling.)

AYAH. s. A native lady's-maid or nurse-maid. The word has been adopted into most of the Indian vernaculars in the forms dya or dyd, but it is really Portuguese (f. aia, 'a nurse, or governess'; m. aix, 'the governor of a young noble'). [These again have been connected with L. Latin aida, Fr. aide, 'a helper."

1779.—"I was sitting in my own house in the compound, when the lya came down and told me that her mistress wanted a candle."—Kemuyar's evidence, in the case of Grand v. Francis. Ext. in Echoes of Old Caledonia, 235.

1782.—(A Table of Wages)—

"Connumah... ...10 (rupees a month). 8 * * * *

Eyah... ...5."—India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1810.—"The female who attends a lady while she is dressing, etc., is called an Ayah."—Williamson, V. M. 1. 337.

1826.—"The lieutenant's visits were now less frequent than usual; one day, however, he came... and on leaving the house I observed him slip something, which I doubted not was money, into the hand of the Ayah, or serving woman, of Jane."—Pandurang Hari, 71; [ed. 1873, i. 99].

1842.—"Here (at Simla) there is a great preponderence of Mahometans. I am told that the guns produced absolute consternation, visible in their countenances. One Ayah threw herself upon the ground in an agony of despair... I fired 42 guns for Ghuzni and Cabul: the 22d (42nd) gun—which announced that all was finished—was what overcame the Mahometans."—Lord Ellenborough, in Indian Administration 226. This stuff was written to the great Duke of Wellington!

1875.—"... The white-robed ayah sits in and out of the tents, finding a home for our various possessions, and thither we soon retire."—Fraser's Mag., June, i. 99.

1879.—"He was exceedingly fond of his two children, and got for them servants; a man to cook their dinner, and an ayah to take care of them."—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 7.

BABA. s. This is the word usually applied in Anglo-Indian families, by both Europeans and natives, to the children—often in the plural form, baba log (log= 'folk'). The word is not used by the natives among themselves in the same way, at least not habitually: and it would seem as if our word baby had influenced the use. The word baba is properly Turki= 'father'; sometimes used to a child as a term of endearment (or forming part of such a term, as in the P. Bbdjjan, 'Life of your Father'). Compare the Russian use of batushka. [Bbdjfan is a common form of address to a Fakir, usually a member of one of the Musulman sects. And hence it is used generally as a title of respect.]

1826.—"I reached the hut of a Goisain... and reluctantly tapped at the wicket, calling, 'O Baba, O Maharaj.'"—Pandurang Hari [ed. 1873, i. 76].

1890.—"While Sunny Baba is at large, and might at any time make a raid on Mamma, who is dosing over a novel on the spider chair near the mouth of the ther-manticote, the Ayah and Bearer dare not leave their charge."—Abercromby-Mackay, Twenty-one Days, p. 94.]

BABAGOOREE. a. H. Babbaghiri, the white agate (or chalcedony) of Cambay. [For these stones see Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 323: Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 68.] It is apparently so called from the patron saint or martyr of the district containing the mines, under whose special protection the miners place themselves before descending into the shafts. Tradition alleges that he was a prince of the great Ghori dynasty, who was killed in a great battle in that region. But this prince will hardly be found in history.

1516.—"They also find in this town (Limadura in Gusserat) much chalcedony, which they call babbaghiri. They make beads with it, and other things which they wear about them."—Barbosa, 67.

1554.—"In this country (Gusserat) is a profusion of Babbaghiri and carnelians; but the best of these last are those coming from Yaman."—Sida 'Ali Kapudda, in J.A.S.B. v. 463.

1559.—"By the command of his Majesty grain weights of babbaghiri were made, which were used in weighing."—Ats, i. 85, and note, p. 615 (Blockmansa).

1818.—"On the summit stands the tomb . . . . of the titular saint of the country, Baba Ghor, to whom a devotion is paid more as a deity than as a saint."—Copland, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., i. 294.

1849.—Among ten kinds of carnelians specified in H. Briggs's Cities of Gujarat we find "Bawa Gori Akik, a veined kind."—p. 183.

BABEN, n.p. This name is given to the I. of Perim, in the St. of Babelmandel, in the quotation from Ovington. It was probably English sea-slanger only. [Mr Whiteway points out that this is clearly from albabo, the Port. form of the Ar. word. João de Castro in Botelho (1641), p. 34, says: "This strait is called by the neighbouring people, as well as those who dwell on the shores of the Indian Ocean, Albabo, which in Arabic signifies 'gates.'"]

1659.—"The Babbe is a small island opening to the Red Sea. . . . Between this and the Main Land is a safe Passage . . . ."—Ovington, 468.

[1769.—"Yet they made no estimation of the currents without the Babbe": (note), "This is the common sailors' phrase for the Straits of Babelmandel."—Bruce, Travels to discover the Source of the Nile, ed. 1790, Bk. i. cap. ii.]

BABER, BAHUR, a. H. babar, babar. A name given to those districts of the N.W. Provinces which lie immediately under the Himalayas to the dry forest belt on the talus of the hills, at the lower edge of which the moisture comes to the surface and forms the wet forest belt called Tarail. (See TENGAL) The following extract from the report of a lecture on Indian Forests is rather a happy example of the danger of "a little learning" to a reporter:

1877.—"Beyond that (the Tarail) lay another district of about the same breadth, called in the native dialect Bahadar. That in fact was a great filter-bed of sand and vegetation."—London Morning Paper of 26th May.

BABI-BOUSSA, a. Malay bab (‘hog’) rasa (‘stag’). The 'Stag-hog,' a remarkable animal of the swine genus (Sus babirussa, L.; Babirussa alfarus, F. Cuvier), found in the island of Bourou, and some others of the I. Archipelago, but nowhere on continental Asia. Yet it seems difficult to apply the description of Pliny below, or the name and drawing given by Cosmas, to any other animal. The 4-horned swine of Aelian is more probably the African Wart-hog, called accordingly by F. Cuvier Phacochoerus Aeliani.

c. a.D. 70.—"The wild bores of India have two bowing fangs or tusks of a cubit length, growing out of their mouth, and as many out of their foreheads like calves horns."—Pliny, viii. 52 (Holland's Tr. i. 291).

c. 250.—"Αμυρος δαλών εν Άιστρωτι γενέσθαι . . . . ου τερπάρων."—Aelian, De Nat. Anim. xvii. 10.

c. 545.—"The Chirolophus (‘Hog-stag’) I have both seen and eaten."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, in Cathay, &c., p. cxxv.

1555.—"There are hogs also with horns, and parats which prattle much which they call noris (Lory)."—Galvano, Discoveries of the World, Hak. Soc. 120.

* This word takes a ludicrous form in Dawner: "All the Indians who speak Malayan look on those Mosegiars as a kind of Barbarians; and upon any occasion of dislike, would call them Bobby, that is Hogs."—l. 313.
1658.—"Quadrupes hoc insuitatate figurae monstrosa bestis ascibunt Indi quod adversae speciei animalibus, Porco sollicitat et Cervo, pronatum potent . . . .

1869.—"The wild pig seems to be of a species peculiar to the island (Celebes); but a much more curious animal of this family is the Babirusa or Pig-deer, so named by the Malays from its long and slender legs, and curved tusks resembling horns. This extraordinary creature resembles a pig in general appearance, but it does not dig with its snout, as it feeds on fallen fruits. . . .

Here again we have a resemblance to the Wart-hogs of Africa, whose upper canines grow outwards and curve up as to form a transition from the usual mode of growth to that of the Babirusa. In other respects there seems no affinity between these animals, and the Babirusa stands completely isolated, having no resemblance to the pigs of any other part of the world."—Wallace, Malay Archip. (ed. 1890), p. 211, seqq.

BABOO, s. Beng. and H. Babū [Skt. vapra, 'a father']. Properly a term of respect attached to a name, like Master or Mr., and formerly in some parts of Hindustan applied to certain persons of distinction. Its application as a term of respect is now almost or altogether confined to Lower Bengal (though C. P. Brown states that it is also used in S. India for 'Sir, My lord, your Honour'). In Bengal and elsewhere, among Anglo-Indians, it is often used with a slight savour of disparagement, as characterizing a superficially cultivated, but too often effeminate, Bengali. And from the extensive employment of the class, to which the term was applied as a title, in the capacity of clerks in English offices, the word has come often to signify 'a native clerk' who writes English.

1781.—"I said . . . From my youth to this day I am a servant to the English. I have never gone to any Rajah or Baboo nor will I go to them."—Depn. of Doood Sing, Commandant. In Narr. of Jafarut. at Basrur in 1751. Calo. 1782. Reprinted at Roorkee, 1853. App., p. 165.

"Here Edmund was making a monstrous ado, About some bloody Letter and Conta Bab-Booh."

1803.—". . . Calling on Mr. Neave I found there Baboo Dheep Narain, brother to Oodit Narain, Rajah at Benares."—Lord Valetta's Travels, i. 112.

1824.—". . . the immense convent-like mansion of some of the more wealthy Babooos. . ."—Heber, i. 31, ed. 1844.

1834.—"The Baboo and other Tales, descriptive of Society in India."—Smith & Elder, London. (By Augustus Prinsep.)

1850.—"If instruction were sought for from them (the Mohammedan historians) we should no longer hear bombastic Baboos, enjoying under our Government the highest degree of personal liberty . . . rave about patriotism, and the degradation of their present position."—Sir H. M. Elliot, Orig. Preface to Mahom. Historians of India, in Dowson's ed., I. xxii.

1853.—"The pliable, plastic, receptive Baboo of Bengal eagerly avails himself of this system (of English education) partly from a servile wish to please the Baboo lopes, and partly from a desire to obtain a Government appointment."—Fraser's Mag., Aug., 206.

1880.—"English officers who have become de-Europeised from long residence among undomesticated natives . . . Such officials are what Lord Lytton calls White Baboos. . ."—Aberleigh-Mackay, Twenty-one Days, p. 104.

N.B.—In Java and the further East babū means a nurse or female servant (Javanese word).

BABOOL, s. H. babal, babir (though often mispronounced babul, as in two quotations below); also called kikar. A thorny mimosa common in most parts of India except the Malabar Coast; the Acacia arabica, Willd. The Bhils use the gum as food.

1666.—"L'eau de Vie de ce Pays . . . qu'on y boit ordinairement, est faite de jaspe ou sucre noir, qu'on met dans l'eau avec de l'écorce de l'arbre Baboul, pour y donner quelque force, et ensuite on les distill ensemble."

—Thevenot, v. 50.

1780.—"Price Current. Country Produce: Babul Trees, large, 6 pc. each tree."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, April 29. [This is babul, the Bengali form of the word.]

1824.—"Rampoor is . . . chiefly remarkable for the sort of fortification which surrounds it. This is a high thick hedge . . . of bamboos . . . faced on the outside by a formidable underwood of acasia and babool."

1849.—"Look at that great tract from Deesa to the Ha'la mountains. It is all BABOON, s. This, no doubt, comes to us through the Ital. babuino, but it is probable that the latter word is a corruption of Pers. mawmān ['the auspicious one'] and then applied by way of euphemism or irony to the baboon or monkey. It also occurs in Ital. under the more direct form of mawmāne in gatto-mawmāne, 'cat-monkey,' or rather 'monkey-cat.' [The N.E.D. leaves the origin of the word doubtful, and does not discuss this among other suggested derivations.]

BACANORE and BARCELOR, nn. p. Two ports of Canara often coupled together in old narratives, but which have entirely disappeared from modern maps and books of navigation, insomuch that it is not quite easy to indicate their precise position. But it would seem that Bacanore, Malayal. Vakkannūr, is the place called in Canarese Bārātir, the Barcoor-pettah of some maps, in lat. 13° 25' 1/2. This was the site of a very old and important city, 'the capital of the Jain kings of Tulava ... and subsequently a stronghold of the Vijayanagar Rajas.'—Imp. Gess. [Also see Stuart, Man. S. Canara, ii. 294.]

Also that Barcelor is a Port. corruption of Bārātir [the Canarese Basaarir, 'the town of the waved-leaf fig tree. (Mod. Adm. Man. Gloss. s.v.)*] It must have stood immediately below the 'Barisul Peak' of the Admiralty charts, and was apparently identical with, or near to, the place called Seroor in Scott's Map of the Madras Presidency, in about lat. 13° 55'. [See Stuart, ibid. ii. 242. Seroor is perhaps the Shirir of Mr. Stuart (ibid. p. 243).]

c. 1830.—'Thence (from Hannaur) the traveller came to Bāsārār, a small city ...'—Abufedaa, in Gildemeister, 184.

c. 1843.—'The first town of Malrajār that we visited was Abu-Bārār, which is small, situated on a great estuary, and abounding in coco-nut trees. ... Two days after our departure from that town we arrived at Pākāntir, which is large and situated on an estuary. One sees there an abundance of sugar-cane, where has no equal in that country.'—Ibn Batuta, iv. 77-78.

c. 1420.—'Dias præsteeum ad maritimas urbes, alteram Fashamuriam ... nomine, xx diebus transit.'—Conti, in Poggio de Var. Fort. iv.

1501.—'Bacanor,' for Bacanor, is named in Amerigo Vespucci's letter, giving an account of Da Gama's discoveries, first published by Baldelli Boni, Il Mitto, pp. iii. seqq.

1516.—'Passing further forward ... along the coast, there are two little rivers on which stand two places, the one called Bacenor, and the other Brasolor, belonging to the kingdom of Naryagua and the province of Tolinat (Tulua-nata, Tulusa or S. Canara). And in them is much good rice grown round about these places, and this is loaded in many foreign ships and in many of Malabar ...'—Barossa, in Lisbon Coll. 294.

1548.—'The Port of the River of Barcelor pays 500 loads (of rice as tribute).'—Boteio, Tombo, 246.

1562.—'Having dispatched this vessel, he (V. da Gama) turned to follow his voyage, desiring to erect the padrão (votive pillar) of which we have spoken; and not finding a place that pleased him better, he erected one on certain islets joined (as it were) to the land, giving it the name of Santa Maria, whence these islands are now called Saint Mary's isles, standing between Bacanor and Batical, two notable places on that coast.'—De Barros, I. iv. 11.

1726.—'In Barcelor or Basselore have we still a factory ... a little south of Basselore lies Baquannor and the little River Vier.'—Valetijn, v. (Malabar) 6.

1727.—'The next town to the Southward of Batasoula [Batsul] is Barcelor, standing on the Banks of a broad River about 4 Miles from the Sea ... The Dutch have a Factory here, only to bring up Rice for their Garrison ... Bacanora, between Barcelor and Mangalore, both having the benefit of Rivers to export the large quantities of Rice that the Fields produce.'—A. Hamilton, i. 284-5. [Molkey is Mulki, see Stuart, op. cit. ii. 250.]

1780.—'St Mary's Islands lie along the coast N. and S. as far as off the river of Bacanor, or Callianpor, being about 6 leagues ... In lat. 18° 50' N., 5 leagues from Bacanor, runs the river Barcelor.'—Daw's N. Directory, 6th ed. 105.

1814.—'Barcelor, now frequently called Cundapore.'—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109, also see 118; [2nd ed. ii. 464.]

BACKDORF, s. H. bdg-dor ('bridle-cord'); a halter or leading rein.

BACKSEE. Sea H. bakse, nautical 'aback,' from which it has been formed (Roebuck).
BADEGA. n.p. The Tamil Vadagar, i.e. ‘Northerners.’ The name has at least two specific applications:

a. To the Telegu people who invaded the Tamil country from the kingdom of Vijayanagara (the Bismaga or Narsinga of the Portuguese and old travellers) during the later Middle Ages, but especially in the 16th century. This word first occurs in the letters of St. Francis Xavier (1644), whose Parava converts on the Tinnevelly Coast were much oppressed by these people. The Badaga language of Lucena, and other writers regarding that time, is the Telegu. The Badagas of St. Fr. Xavier’s time were in fact the emissaries of the Nāyaka rulers of Madura, using violence to exact tribute for those rulers, whilst the Portuguese had conferred on the Paravas “the somewhat dangerous privilege of being Portuguese subjects.”—See Caldwell, H. of Tinnevelly, 69 sqq.

1544.—“Ego ad Comorimium Promontorium contendens equique navicular duendo xx. cibarum onustas, ut meiser illis subveniam Neophyti, qui Bagadurum (read Bad-garum) accurrimentum Christiani nominis hostium torvoe pernici, relictis vicis, in desertas insulas se abiderunt.”—S. F. Xav.
Epist. I. vii., ed. 1677.

1572.—“Gens est in regno Bismagae quae Badagas vocant.”—E. Acosta, 4 b.

1787.—“In sā parte missionis Carnutensis in quā Telugu, ut siunt, lingua viget, seu inter Badagas, quinque annos versatum sum; neque quamdiu viguerunt vires ab illā dilecttissimā sanctissimā Missione Pudlichium veni.”—In Norbert, ill. 280.

1875.—“Mr C. P. Brown informs me that the early French missionaries in the Guntur country wrote a vocabulary ‘de la langue Tālenca, dite vulgairement la Badaga.’”—Bp. Caldwell, Dravidian Grammar, Intr. p. 33.

b. To one of the races occupying the Nilgiri Hills, speaking an old Canarese dialect, and being apparently a Canarese colony, long separated from the parent stock.—(See Bp. Caldwell’s Grammar, 2nd ed., pp. 34, 126, &c.) [The best recent account of this people is that by Mr Thurston in Bulletin of the Madras Museum, vol. ii. No. 1.] The name of these people is usually in English corrupted to Burghers.

BADGEER, s. P. bdd-gir, ‘wind-catch.’ An arrangement acting as a wind sail to bring the wind down into a house; it is common in Persia and in Sind. [It is the Badhānj of Arabia, and the Malik of Egypt (Burton, Ar.
Nights, i. 237; Lane, Mod. Egypt, i. 23.)

1298.—“The heat is tremendous (at Hormus), and on that account the houses are built with ventilators (seniers) to catch the wind. These ventilators are placed on the side from which the wind comes, and they bring the wind down into the house to cool it.”—Marco Polo, ii. 450.

[1598.—A similar arrangement at the same place is described by Linschoten, i. 51, Hak. Soc.]

1683.—At Gamron (Gombroon) “most of the houses have a square tower which stands up far above the roof, and which in the upper part towards the four winds has ports and openings to admit air and catch the wind, which plays through these, and ventilates the whole house. In the heat of summer people lie at night at the bottom of these towers, so as to get cool rest.”— Nieuhoff, Voy. on Land-Reise, ii. 70.

1792.—“The air in it was continually refreshe and renewed by a current made like a funnel, in the manner of M. da Hamel.”—Staunton, Voyage, ii. 104.]

Can soarsly win a breath from heaven.”

Moore, Fire-worshippers.

1872.—“ ... Badgirs or windcatchers.
You see on every roof these diminutive screens of wattle and dab, forming acute angles with the hatches over which they project. Some are moveable, so as to be turned to the E. W. between March and the end of July, when the monasoon sets in from that quarter.”—Burton’s Sind Revised, 254.

1881.—“A number of square turrets stick up all over the town; these are badgirs or ventilators, open sometimes to all the winds, sometimes only to one or two, and divided inside like the flues of a great chimney, either to catch the draught, or to carry it to the several rooms below.”—Pioneer Mail, March 8th.

BADJOE, BAJOO, s. The Malay jacket (Mal. baju) [of which many varieties are described by Dennys (Disc. Dict. p. 107)].

[c. 1610.—“The women (Portuguese) take their ease in their smocks or Bajus, which are more transparent and fine than the most delicate draperies of those parts.”—Peyard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 112.]

1784.—“Over this they wear the badjo, which resembles a morning gown, open at the neck, but fastened close at the waist, and half-way up the arm.”—Mardens, H. of Swattra, 2nd ed. 44.

1878.—“The general Malay costume . . . consists of an inner vest, having a collar to button tight round the neck, and the baju, or jacket, often of light coloured dimity, for undress.”—McNair, 147.
BAEL, a. H. bel, Mahr. bel, from Skt. vila, the Tree and Fruit of Aegle marmelos (Correa), or 'Bengal Quince,' as it is sometimes called, after the name (Marmelos of Benguala) given it by Garcia de Orta, who first described the virtues of this fruit in the treatise of dyers, and others. There are noticed also by P. Vincenzo Maria and others, and have always been familiar in India. Yet they do not appear to have attracted serious attention in Europe till about the year 1580. It is a small tree, a native of various parts of India. The dried fruit is now imported into England.—(See Hanbury and Fickinger, 116); [Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 117 seq.). The shelly rind of the bel is in the Punjab made into carved snuff-boxes for sale to the Afghans.

1583.—"And as I knew that it was called bel in Bacaun, I enquired of those native physicians which was its proper name, ciri6ode or bet, and they told me that ciri6ode is the physician's name for it."—Garcia De O., ff. 221 v., 222.

1631.—Jac. Bottius describes the bel as maturum cymonum (i.e. a quince), and speaks of its pulp as good for dyers and the cholerae innamam orygammas.—Lib. vi. cap. viii.

1672.—"The Bill plant grows to no greater height than that of a man [this is incorrect], all thorny . . . . the fruit in size and hardness, and nature of rind, resembles a pomegranate, dotted over the surface with little dark spots equally distributed . . . . With the fruit they make a decoction, which is most efficacious remedy for dyers' dyestuffs or fluxes, proceeding from excessive heat. . . ."—P. Vincenzo, 353.

1879.—". . . On this plain you will see a large bel-tree, and on it one big bel-fruit."—Miss Stokes, Indias Fairy Tales, 140.

BAFTA, a. A kind of calico, made especially at Baroch; from the Pers. bide, 'woven.' The old Baroch bafas seem to have been fine goods. Nothing is harder than to find intelligible explanations of the distinction between the numerous varieties of cotton stuffs formerly exported from India to Europe under a still greater variety of names; names and trade being generally alike obsolete. Baftas however survived in the Tariffs till recently. [Bafta is at present the name applied to a silk fabric. (See quotation from Yunuf Ali below.) In Bengal, Charpata and Noakhali in the Chittagong Division were also noted for their cotton baftas (Birdwood, Industr. Arts, 249.)

1598.—"There is made great store of Cotton Linnen of divers sort . . . Baftas."—Linschoten, p. 18. [Hak. Soc. i. 60.]

[1605-6.—"Patia Kusa of the finest Toyia, Bafta."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 73. We have also "Black Baftata."—Ibid. 74.]

1612.—"Baftas or white Callicoes, from twenty to forty Royals the orerge."—Capt. Saris, in Purchas, i. 347.

1665.—"The Baftas, or Callicoes painted red, blue, and black, are carried white to Agra and Amadabad, in regard those cities are nearest the places where the Indigo is made that is used in colouring."—Tavernier, (E. T.) p. 127; [ed. Ball, ii. 8.]

1672.—"Broad Baftas, a broad and narrow."—Fryer, 86.

1727.—"The Baroch Baftas are famous throughout all India, the country producing the best Cotton in the World."—A. Hamilton, i. 144.

1875.—In the Calcutta Tariff valuation of this year we find Piece Goods, Cotton:

[1900.—"Akin to the pot thama is a fabric known as Bafta (literally woven), produced in Benares; body pure silk, with butis in kalabatam or cloth; . . . used for argarkhas, kote, and women's paykamas (Musalmans).—Yunuf Ali, Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 97.]

It is curious to find this word now current on Lake Nyanza. The burial of King Mtesa's mother is spoken of:

1888.—"The chiefs half filled the nicely-padded coffin with baftas (washed calico) . . . after that the corpse and then the coffin was filled up with more baftas . . . ."—In Oh. Misry. Intelligencer, n.s., viii. p. 543.

BAHAR, a. Ar. bahd, Malayal. badram, from Skt. bhadra, 'a load.' A weight used in large trading transactions; it varied much in different localities; and though the name is of Indian origin it was naturalised by the Arabs, and carried by them to the far East, being found in use, when the Portuguese arrived in those seas, at least as far as the Moluccas. In the Indian islands the bahár is generally reckoned as equal to 3 pecula (q.v.), or 400 avoirdupois. But there was a different bahár in use for different articles of merchandise; or, rather, each article had a special balance. In weighing, which practically made a different bahár (see PICOTA).

[Mr. Skeat says that it is now uniformly exact to 400 lbs. av. in the British dominions in the Malay Peninsula; but Klinkert gives it as the equivalent of 12 picula of Agar-agar; 6 of cinnamon; 3 of Tripang.]

1498.—"... and begged him to send to the King his lord a bagar of cinnamon, and another of clove for sample" (a mostra).—Roteiro de V. de Gama, 78.

1506.—"In Canarol el seu rei se sentí, é qui nasce rz. (i.e. sensori or 'ginger'); ma li rz. pochi e non casi soni come quelli de Colet, e suo poco si chiamà baar, che sono K. (Cantari) à de Lisbona."—Relazione di Leonardo Ca' Masser, 26.

1510.—"If the merchandise about which they treat be spices, they deal by the bahár, which bahár weighs three of our cantari."—Varthema, p. 170.

1516.—"It (Malacon) has got such a quantity of gold, that the great merchants do not estimate their property, nor reckon otherwise than by bahars of gold, which are 4 quintals to each bahár."—Barboza, 193.

1552.—"300 bahares of pepper."—Casteñeda, ii. 301. Correa writes bares, as does also Couto.

1554.—"The bar of nut (nos) contains 20 faraças, and 5 maundes more of picota; thus the baar, with its picota, contains 20½ faraças. . . ."—A. Nunes, 6.

c. 1569.—"After this I saw one that would have given a Barre of Pepper, which is two Quintals and a half, for a little Measure of water, and he could not have it."—C. Fredericke, in Hakl. ii. 358.

1588.—"Each Bar of Sunda weigheth 330 cattes of China."—Linekotter, 34: [Hak. Soc. i. 113.

BAHAUDUR, s. H. Bahádur, 'a hero, or champion.' It is a title affixed commonly to the names of European officers in Indian documents, or when spoken of ceremoniously by natives (e.g. "Jones Bahib Bahádur"), in which use it may be compared with "the gallant officer" of Parliamentary courtesy, or the Illustrissimo Signore of the Italians. It was conferred as a title of honour by the Great Mogul and by other native princes [while in Persia it was often applied to slaves (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 114)]. Thus it was particularly affected to the end of his life by Hyder Ali, to whom it had been given by the Raja of Mysore (see quotation from John Lindsay below [and Wilks, Mysore, Madras reprint, i. 280]). Bahádur and Sirdar Bahádur are also the official titles of members of the 2nd and 1st classes respectively of the Order of British India, established for native officers of the army in 1837. [The title of Rád Bahádur is also conferred upon Hindu civil officers.]

As conferred by the Court of Delhi the usual gradation of titles was (ascending):—1. Bahádur; 2. Bahádur Jang; 3. Bahádur ud-Daulah; 4. Bahádur ul-mulk. At Hyderabad they had also Bahádur ul-Umrá (Kirkpatrick, in Tippoo's Letters, 354). [Many such titles of Europeans will be found in North Indian N. & Q., i. 35, 143, 179; iv. 17.]

In Anglo-Indian colloquial parlance the word denotes a haughty or pompous personage, exercising his brief authority with a strong sense of his own importance; a don rather than a swaggerer. Thackeray, who derived from his Indian birth and connections a humorous felicity in the use of Anglo-Indian expressions, has not omitted this serviceable word. In that brilliant burlesque, the Memoirs of Major Gahagan, we have the Maharatta traitor Babacock Bahauder. It is said also that Mr Canning's malicious wit bestowed on Sir John Malcolm, who was not less great as a talker than as a soldier and statesman, the title, not included in the

Bahai'dur is one of the terms which the hosts of Chingiz Khan brought with them from the Mongol Steppes. In the Mongol genealogies we find Yesugai Bahai'dur, the father of Chingiz, and many more. Subutai Bahai'dur, one of the great soldiers of the Mongol host, twice led it to the conquest of Southern Russia, twice to that of Northern China. In Sanang Setzen's poetical annals of the Mongols, as rendered by I. J. Schmidt, the word is written Baghatur, whence in Russian Bogatir still survives as a memento probably of the Tartar domination, meaning 'a hero or champion.' It occurs often in the old Russian epic ballads in this sense; and is also applied to Samson of the Bible. It occurs in a Russian chronicler as early as 1240, but in application to Mongol leaders. In Polish it is found as Boktur, and in Hungarian as Batir,—this last being in fact the popular Mongol pronunciation of Baghatur. In Turki also this elision of the guttural extends to the spelling, and the word becomes Batir, as we find it in the Dicts. of Vambery and Pavet de Courteille. In Manchu also the word takes the form of Batiru, expressed in Chinese characters as Pa-tu-lu;† the Kirghiz has it as Batyr; the Altai-Tataric as Paatyr, and the other dialects even as Magathyr. But the singular history of the word is not yet entirely told. Benfey has suggested that the word originated in Skt. bhaga-dhara ('happiness-possessing');‡ But the late lamented Prof. A. Schiefer, who favoured us with a note on the subject, was strongly of opinion that the word was rather a corruption "through dissimulation of the consonant," of the Zend bagha-puthra 'Son of God,' and thus but another form of the famous term Fagdur, by which the old Persians rendered the Chinese Tien-tse ('Son of Heaven'), applying it to the Emperor of China.

* As Lord William's table, Major Malcolm mentioned as a notable fact that he and three of his brothers had once met together in India. "Impossible, Malcolm, quite impossible." said the Governor-General. Malcolm persisted. "No, no," said Lord William, "if four Malcolms had met, we should have heard the noise all over India!"

1280-90.—In an eccentric Persian poem purposely stuffed with Mongol expressions, written by Purbahâi Jâmil in praise of Arghûn Khân of Persia, of which Hammer has given a German translation, we have the following:—

"The Great Khan names thee his Ulugh-Bâekkhi [Great Secretary].

Seeing thou art bâekkhi and Behâdir to boot:

O Well-beloved, the yârîgâh [rescript] that thou dost issue is obeyed

By Turk and Mongol, by Persian, Greek, and Barbarian!"

Geach. der Gold. Horde, 461.

1800.—"I ordained that every Ameer who should reduce a Kingdom, or defeat an army, should be exalted by three things:—by a title of honour, by the Tagh [Yak's tail standard]; and by the Naâzdr [great kettle drum]; and should be dignified by the title of Bahai'dur."—Timour's Institutes, 283; see also 291-293.

1404.—"E elles le dixeron û aquel era uno de los valientes e Bahai'dures q'en el linage del Señor auia."—Clavijo, § ixxix.

"E el home û este haze e mas vino beue disen que es Bahai'dur, que disen elles por homen reizo."—Do. § cxi.

1407.—"The Prince mounted, escorted by a troop of Bahai'duras, who were always about his person."—Abdurrâzaâ's Hist. in Not. et Ecl. xiv. 128.

1536.—"(As a proper name.) "Isa i de potentissimus Rex Badur, Indiæ universæ terror, a quo nonulli regni Pori maximis quodam regis teneri affirmant...."—Letter from John III. of Portugal to Pope Paul III.

Hardly any native name occurs more frequently in the Portuguese Hist. of India than this of Badur—viz. Bahai'dur Shâh, the warlike and powerful king of Guzerat (1526-37), killed in a fray which closed an interview with the Viceroy, Nuno da Cunha, at Diu.

1754.—"The Kirgeese Tartars... are divided into three Hordas, under the Government of a Khan. That part which borders on the Russian dominions was under the authority of Jean Beck, whose name on all occasions was honoured with the title of Bater."—Hanway, i. 239. The name Jean Beck is probably Jaanbek, a name which one finds among the hordes as far back as the early part of the 14th century (see Ibn Batuta, ii. 597).

1759.—"From Shah Alum Bahai'dre, son of Alum Guire, the Great Mogul, and successor of the Empire, to Colonel Sabut Jung Bahai'dre" (i.e. Clive).—Letter in Long, p. 163.

We have said that the title Behaoudur (Bahai'dur) was one by which Hyder Ali of Mysore was commonly known in his day. Thus in the two next quotations:
1781.—“Sheikh Hussein upon the guard tells me that our army has beat the Behander [i.e. Hyder Ali], and that peace was making. Another sepoy in the afternoon tells us that the Behahnder had destroyed our army, and was besieging Madras.”—Capt. John Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindays, iii. 296.

1800.—“One lac of Behandry peakedas.”—Wellington, i. 148.

1801.—“Thomas, who was much in liquor, now turned round to his sowars, and said—‘Could any one have stopped Sahib Bahandur at this gate but one month ago? ’ ‘No, no,’ replied they; on which—”—St. Leger, Mu. Mem. i. 285.

1872.—“... the word ‘Bahadur’... (at the Mogul’s Court)... was only used as an epithet. Ahmed Shah used it as a title and ordered his name to be read in the Fanda as ‘Mujahid and son of Muhammad Abd naqir Ahmad Shah Bahadur. Hence also ‘Kampani Bahadur,’ the name by which the E. I. Company is still known in India. The modern ‘Khan Bahadur’ is, in Bengal, by permission assumed by Muhammadan Deputy Magistrates, whilst Hindu Deputy Magistrates assume ‘Kah Bahadur;’ it stands, of course, for ‘Khan-i-Bahadur,’ the courageous Khan.’ The compound, however, is a modern abnormal one; for ‘Khan’ was conferred by the Dihli Emperors, and so also ‘Bahadur’ and ‘Bahadur Khan,’ but not ‘Khan Bahadur.’”—Prof. Blochmann, in Ind. Antiquary, i. 281.

1878.—“Reverencing at the same time bravery, dash, and boldness, and loving their freedom, they (the Kirghis) were always ready to follow the standard of any bashyr, or hero, ... who might appear on the stage.”—Sayley’s Turkistan, i. 33.

1878.—“Peacock feathers for some of the subordinate officers, a yellow jacket for the successful general, and the bestowal of the Manchoo title of Baturun, or ‘Brave,’ on some of the most distinguished brigadiers, are probably all the honours which await the retreating army. The reward, which fell to the share of ‘Chinese Gordon’ for the part he took in the suppression of the Taiping rebellion was a yellow jacket, and the title of Baturun has lately been bestowed on Mr Meany for years of faithful service against the rebels in the province of Kweichow.”—Saturday Rev., Aug. 10, p. 182.

1879.—“This strictly prohibitive Proclamation is issued by the Provincial Adingtative Board of Likim... and Chang, Brevet-Provincial Judge, chief of the Foochow Likim Central Office, Taotai for special service, and Baturun with the title of ‘Awe-inspiring Brave.’”—Trans. of Proclamation against the cultivation of the Poppy in Foochow, July 1879.

BAHIRWUTTEEA. s. Guj. bahirwatta. A species of outlawry in Guzerat; bahirwatta, the individual practising the offence. It consists in the Rajpoota or Grassias making their ryots and dependants quit their native village, which is suffered to remain waste; the Grassia with his brethren then retires to some asylum, whence he may carry on his depredations with impunity. Being well acquainted with the country, and the redress of injuries being common cause with the members of every family, the Bahirwuttea has little to fear from those who are not in the immediate interest of his enemy, and he is in consequence enabled to commit very extensive mischief.”—Col. Walker, quoted in Forbes, Rás Mda, 2nd ed., p. 254-5. Col. Walker derives the name from bahir, ‘out,’ and wutt, ‘a road.’ [Tod, in a note to the passage quoted below, says “this term is a compound of bhir (bahir) and wuttan (wuton), literally ex patriis.”]

[1829.—“This petty chieftain, who enjoyed the distinctive epithet of outlaw (barwattia), was of the Sonigurra clan.”... Pers. Narr., in Annals of Raj. (Calcutta reprint), i. 724.]

The origin of most of the brigandage in Sicily is almost what is here described in Kattiiwar.

BAIKREE. s. The Bombay name for the Barking-deer. It is Guzaratī behri; and acc. to Jordon and Blandford, Mammoita, 533) Mahir. behra or bekar, but this is not in Molesworth’s Dict. [Forsyth (Highlands of C. I., p. 470) gives the Gond and Korku names as Bherki, which may be the original].

1879.—“Any one who has shot bahri on the spurs of the Ghats can tell how it is possible unerringly to mark down these little beasts, taking up their position for the day in the early dawn.”—Ovrl. Times of India, Suppt. May 12, 7b.

BAJRA. s. H. bajrā and bajri (Penicillaria spicata, Willden.). One of the tall millets forming a dry crop in many parts of India. Forbes calls it bahjoores (Or. Mem. ii. 406; [2nd ed. i. 167], and bajeres (i. 23)).

1844.—“The ground (at Maharajpore) was generally covered with bajrees, full 5 or 6 feet high.”—Lord Ellenborough, in Ind. Admin. 414.

BAKIR-KHĀNI. s. P.—H. bakir-khānī; a kind of cake almost exactly resembling pie-crust, said to owe its name to its inventor, Bākir Khān. to give a nonsensical explanation, cited below. The expression may be illustrated by the old Scotch phrases regarding “below and above the Pass” of so and so, implying Lowlands and Highlands.

c. 1562.—“All these things were brought by the Moors, who traded in pepper which they brought from the hills where it grew, by land in Bissega, and Balagate, and Cambay.”—Correa, ed. Ed. Stanley, Hak. Soc. p. 344.

1583.—“R. Let us get on horseback and go for a ride; and as we go you shall tell me what is the meaning of Nizambawa (Nisamaluo), for you often speak to me of such a person.

"O. I will tell you now that he is King in the Bagalate (misprint for Balagate), whose father I have often attended medically, and the son himself sometimes. From him I have received from time to time more than 12,000 pardas; and he offered me a salary of 40,000 pardas if I would visit him for so many months every year, but I would not accept.”—Garcia de Orta, f. 33v.

1588.—“This high land on the toppe is very flatte and good to build upon, called Balagatte.”—Linschooten, 20; [Hak. Soc. i. 65; cf. i. 285].

1614.—“The coast of Coromandel, Balagat or Telingana.”—Sainsbury, i. 301.

1673.—“. . . opening the ways to Bailagat, that Merchants might with safety bring down their Goods to Port.”—Fryer, 78.

c. 1760.—“The Balla-gat Mountains, which are extremely high, and so called from Balla, mountain, and gate, flat [1], because one part of them affords large and delicious plains on their summit, little known to Europeans.”—Grose, i. 231.

This is nonsense, but the following are also absurd misdescriptions:

1805.—“Bala Ghaut, the higher or upper Gout or Ghaut, a range of mountains so called to distinguish them from the Payen Ghauts, the lower Ghauts or Passes.”—Dict. of Words used in E. Indies, 28.

1813.—“In some parts this tract is called the Balla-Gaut, or high mountains; to distinguish them from the lower Gout, nearer the sea.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 206; [2nd ed. i. 119].

BALASORE, n.p. A town and district of Orissa; the site of one of the earliest English factories in the “Bay,” established in 1642, and then an important seaport; supposed to be properly Baḏshehara, Skt. bala, 'strong, firm,' isvara, 'lord,' perhaps with reference to Krishna. Another place of the same name in Madras, an isolated peak, 6'762' high, lat. 11° 41' 43'', is said to take its name from the Asura Bana.

1676.—
"When in the vale of Balasar I fought,
And from Bengal the captive Monarch brought."— Dryden, Abrangabe, ii. 1.

1727.—"The Sea-shore of Balasore being very low, and the Depths of Water very gradual from the Strand, make Shipes in Balasore Road keep a good Distance from the Shore; for in 4 or 5 Fathoms, they ride 3 Leagues off."—A. Hamilton, i. 397.

Balass. s. A kind of ruby, or rather a rose-red spinelle. This is not an Anglo-Indian word, but it is a word of Asiatic origin, occurring frequently in old travellers. It is a corruption of Balakhai, a popular form of Badakshàn, because these rubies came from the famous mines on the Upper Oxus, in one of the districts subject to Badakshân. [See Vanbecy, Sketches, 265 ; Ball, Tavernier, i. 362 n.]

1494.—"Tenis (Tamerlan) vestido vna ropa et vn paño de seda raso sin lavares e á la cabeza tenía vn sombrero bíscu alto con un Balax en cima e con ajocar e piedras."—Clavijo, § cx.

1516.—"These balassés are found in Balaxayo, which is a kingdom of the mainland near Pegu and Bengal."—Barbosa, 213. This is very bad geography for Barbosa, who is usually accurate and judicious, but it is surpassed in much later days.

1591.—"I could never understand from whence those that be called Balass come."—Cesur Frederike, in Hakt. ii. 372.

1589.—"The Ballayeses are likewise sold by weight."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 156.

1611.—"Of the Ballasse Rubies little and great, good and bad, there are single two thousand pieces" (in Akbar's treasury).—Haskins, in Purchas, i. 217.

1653.—"Les Royaumes de Pegou, d'ou viennent les rubis balasets."—De la Boulaye-le-Goux, 126.

1673.—"The last sort is called a Balasse Ruby, which is not in so much esteem as the Spinell, because it is not so well colour'd."—Fryer, 215.

1689.—"... The Balasse Ruby is supposed by some to have taken its name from Palatium, or Palace;... the most probable Conjecture is that of Marcus Paulus Venetus, that it is borrowed from the Country, where they are found in greatest Plentie."—Ovington, 588.

Balcony. s. Not an Anglo-Indian word, but sometimes regarded as of Oriental origin; a thing more than doubtful. The etymology alluded to by Mr. Schuyler and by the lamented William Gill in the quotations below, is not new, though we do not know who first suggested it. Neither do we know whether the word balagani, which Erman (Tr. in Siberia, E. T. I. 116) tells us is the name given to the wooden booths at the Nijnei Fair, be the same P. word or no. Wedgwood, Littre, [and the N.E.D.] connect balcony with the word which appears in English as balk, and with the Italian balco, 'a scaffolding' and the like, also used for 'a box' at the play. Balco, as well as palco, is a form occurring in early Italian. Thus Franc. da Buti, commenting on Dante (1385-87), says: "Balco è luogo alto dove si monta e scende." Hence naturally would be formed balcone, which we have in Giov. Villani, in Boccacio and in Petrarch.

Manuzzi (Vocabolario It.) defines balcone as finestrà (?).

It may be noted as to the modern pronunciation that whilst ordinary mortals (including among verse-writers Scott and Lockhart, Tennyson and Hood) accent the word as a dactyl (balcóny), the crème de la crème, if we are not mistaken, makes it, or did in the last generation make it, as Cowper does below, an amphibrach (balcóny): "Xanthus his name with those of heavenly birth, But called Scamander by the sons of earth!" [According to the N.E.D. the present pronunciation, "which," said Sam. Rogers, "makes me sick," was established about 1825.]

c. 1348.—"E al continuo v'era pieno di belle donne a' balconi."—Giov. Villani, x. 132-4.

c. 1340-50.—
"Il figliuol di Latona avea già nòve Volte guardato dal balcon sovrano, Per quella, ch'alcun tempo mosse
I suoi soepir, od o gli alturai commove in vano.

Petrarca, Rime, Pte. i. Sonn. 35, ed. Pisa, 1805.
or generally aect. For from the lofty balcony, Rung trumpet, shalm and psaltery.

At Edmonton his loving wife From the balcony spied Had tender husband, wond’ring much To see how he did ride.

For from the lofty balcony, Rung trumpet, shalm and psaltery.

Under tower and balcony, By garden-wall and gallery, A gleaming shape she floated by, Dead pale between the houses high.

The houses (in Turkistan) are generally of but one story, though sometimes there is a small upper room called bala-khana (P. bala, upper, and khana, room) whence we get our balcony.—Schuyler’s Turkistan, i. 120.

1880.—“Bala khana means ‘upper house, or ‘upper place,’ and is applied to the room built over the archway by which the chipped khana is entered, and room to the way, we got our word ‘Baloon.’”—MS. Journal in Persia of Captain W. J. Gill, R.E.

1918.—“The President commanded his own Baloon (a Barge of State, of Two and Twenty Oars) to attend me.”—Fryer, 70.

1855.—“The Burman has now Eighty Baloons, none of which as [sic] great Guns.”—Letter from Capt. R. Jackson, in Dalrymple Or. Report. i. 195.

1811.—“This is the simplest of all boats, and consists merely of the trunk of a tree hollowed out, to the extremities of which pieces of wood are applied, to represent a stern and prow; the two sides are boards joined by rottins or small bambous without nails; no iron whatsoever enters into their construction. The Balamns are used in the district of Chittagong.”—Solyns, iii.

BALSONA, BUSSORA, &c., n.p.

These old forms used to be familiar from their use in the popular version of the Arabian Nights after Galland. The place is the sea-port city of Basra at the mouth of the Shat-al’-Arab, or United Euphrates and Tigris. [Burton (Ar. Nights, x. 1) writes Bassorah.]

1929.—“There is also on the river as you go from Bandas to Kisii, a great city called Basra surrounded by woods in which grow the best dates in the world.”—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 6.

c. 1580.—“Balsara, altrimenti detta Bassora, è una città posta nell’ Arabia, la quale al presente e signoraggiata dal Turco . . . è città di gran negozio di spezierie, di droghe, e altre merci che uengono di Ormuz; è abondante di datioli, rizi, e grani.”—Balbi, f. 32f.

1996.—“The town of Balsona: also Bassora.”—Linzchoten, Hak. Soc. i. 45.

1771.—“From Atropatia and the neighbouring plains Of Adiabene, Media, and the south Of Susiana to Basra’s Haven . . .” Paradise Regained, iii.

1747.—“He (the Pres. of Bombay) further advises us that they have wrote our Homble. Masters of the Loss of Madras by way of Bussaro, the 7th of November.”—Pt. St. David Comm., 8th January 1746-7. MS. in India Office.

BALTY, a. H. balli, ‘a bucket,’ [which Platts very improbably connects with Skt. adri, ‘water’], is the Port. balde.

BÁLWAR, a. This is the native servant’s form of ‘barber,’ shaped by the striving after meaning as bál-uár, for baldad, i.e. ‘capillarius,’ ‘hair-man.’ It often takes the further form bál-búr, another factitious hybrid, shaped by P. búridan, ‘to cut,’ quasi ‘hair-cutter.’ But though now obsolete, there was a Persian word bābār, for a barber or surgeon, from which came this Turkish term "Le Berber-bachi, qui fait la barbe au Pacha," which we find (c. 1674) in the Appendix to the journal of Antoine Galland, pubd. at Paris, 1881 (ii. 190). It looks as if this must have been an early loan from Europe.

BAMBOO, s. Applied to many gigantic grasses, of which Bambusa arundinacea and B. vulgaris are the most commonly cultivated; but there are many other species of the same and allied genera in use; natives of tropical Asia, Africa, and America. This word, one of the commonest in Anglo-Indian daily use, and thoroughly naturalised in English, is of exceedingly obscure origin. According to Wilson it is Canarese bāndā (or as the Madras Admin. Man. Gloss. s.v.) writes it, bambu, which is said to be "onomatopoeic from the crackling and explosions when they burn". Marsden inserts it in his dictionary as good Malay. Crawford says it is certainly used on the west coast of Sumatra as a native word, but that it is elsewhere unknown to the Malay languages. The usual Malay word is bulūh. He thinks it more likely to have found its way into English from Sumatra than from Canara. But there is evidence enough of its familiarity among the Portuguese before the end of the 16th century to indicate the probability that we adopted the word, like so many others, through them. We believe that the correct Canarese word is banu. In the 16th century the form in the Cancon appears to have been samambo, or at least it was so represented by the Portuguese. Rumphius seems to suggest a quiant onomatopoeia: " vehementissimos edunt ictus et sonitus, quum incidendo comburuntur, quando notum ejus nomen Bambu, Bambu, facile exauditur."—(Herb. Amb. iv. 17.) Mr. Skeat writes: "Although bulūh is the standard Malay, and bambu apparently introduced, I think bambu is the form used in the low Javanese vernacular, which is quite a different language from high Javanese. Even in low Javanese, however, it may be a borrowed word. It looks curiously like a trade corruption of the common Malay word samambo, which means the well-known 'Malacca cane,' both the bamboo and the Malacca cane being articles of export. Klinkert says that the samambo is a kind of rattan, which was used as a walking-stick, and which was called the Malacca cane by the English. This Malacca cane and the rattan 'bamboo cane' referred to by Sir H. Yule must surely be identical. The fuller Malay name is actually rotan samambo, which is given as the equivalent of Calamus Scipionum, Lour. by Mr. Ridley in his Plant List (J.R.A.S., July 1897).

The term applied to tabashir (Takahsheer), a siliceous concretion in the bamboo, in our first quotation seems to show that bambu or mambu was one of the words which the Portuguese inherited from an earlier use by Persian or Arab traders. But we have not been successful in finding other proof of this. With reference to sakkar-mambu Ritter says: "That this drug (Tabashir), as a product of the bamboo-cane, is to this day known in India by the name of Sacar Mambu is a thing which no one needs to be told" (ix. 334). But in fact the name seems now entirely unknown.

It is possible that the Canarese word is a vernacular corruption, or development, of the Skt. vanica [or vambha], from the former of which comes the H. bāns. Bamboo does not occur, so far as we can find, in any of the earlier 16th-century books, which employ canna or the like.

In England the term bamboo-cane is habitually applied to a kind of walking-stick, which is formed not from any bamboo but from a species of rattan. It may be noted that some 30 to 35 years ago there existed along the high road between Putney Station and West Hill a garden fence of bamboos of considerable extent; it often attracted the attention of one of the present writers.

1568.—"The people from whom it (tabashir) is got call it sacar-mambum ... because the canes of that plant are called by the Indians mambu."—Garcia, f. 194.

1578.—"Some of these (canes), especially in Malabar, are found so large that the people make use of them as boats (embarcaciones) not opening them out, but cutting one of the canes right across and using the natural knots to stop the ends, and so a couple of naked blacks go upon it ... each of them at his own end of the mambu [in orig. mābu] (so they call it), being provided with two paddles, one in each hand . . .
and so upon a cane of this kind the folk pass across, and sitting with their legs clinging naked."—C. Acosta, Tractado, 296.

Again:
"... and many people on that river (of Cranganor) make use of these canes in place of boats, to be safe from the numerous Crocodiles or Caymiones (as they call them) which are in the river (which are in fact great and ferocious lizards)" [tagartae].—

Ibid. 297.

These passages are curious as explaining, if they hardly justify, Ctesias, in what we have regarded as one of his greatest bounces, viz. his story of Indian canes big enough to be used as boats.

1586.—"All the houses are made of canes, which they call Bamboos, and bee covered with Strawes."—Fück, in Hakl. ii. 391.

1588.—"... a thicke reede as big as a man's legge, which is called Bamboo."—

Linschoten, 56; [Hak. Soc. i. 165].

C. 1610.—"Les Portugais et les Indiens ne se servent point d'autres bastons pour porter leurs palanquins ou litières. Ils l'appellent partout Bamou."—Pyard, i. 237; [Hak. Soc. i. 329].

1615.—"These two kings (of Camboja and Siam) have neyther Horses, nor any fiery Instruments; but make use only of bowes, and a certaine kind of pike, made of a knottie wood like Canes, called Bamboe, which is exceeding strong, though pliant and supplie for use."—De Montfort, 33.

1621.—"These Forts will better appeare by the Draught thereof, herewith sent to your Worships, inclosed in a Bamboo."—Letter in Purkhas, i. 689.

1623.—"Among the other trees there was an immense quantity of bambū, or very large Indian canes, and all clothed and covered with pretty green foliage that went creeping up them."—P. della Valle, ii. 640; [Hak. Soc. ii. 220].

C. 1666.—"Cette machine est suspendue à une longue barre que l'on appelle Pambou."—Thévenot, v. 182. (This spelling recurs throughout a chapter describing palankins, though elsewhere the traveller writes bambou.)

1673.—"A Bambo, which is a long hollow cane."—Fryer, 34.

1727.—"The City (Ava) tho' great and populous, is only built of Bamboo canes."—A. Hamilton, ii. 47.

1855.—"When I speak of bamboo huts, I mean to say that post and walls, wallplates and rafters, floor and thatch and the withes that bind them, are all of bamboo. In fact it might almost be said that among the Indian tribes of the nations the staff of life is a Bamboo. Scaffolding and ladders, landing-jetties, fishing apparatus, irrigation-wheels and scoops, cars, masts and yards, spikes and arrows, hats and helmets, bow, bow-string and quiver, oil-cans, water-stoups and cooking-pots, pipe-sticks, conduits, clothes-boxes, pan-boxes, dinner-trays, pickles, preserves, and melodious musical instruments, torches, footballs, cordage, bellows, mats, paper, these are but a few of the articles that are made from the bamboo."—Vale, Mission to Ava, p. 153.

To these may be added, from a cursory inspection of a collection in one of the museums at Kew, combs, mugs, sun-blinds, cages, grotesque carvings, brushes, fans, shirts, sails, teapots, pipes and harps.

Bamboos are sometimes popularly distinguished (after a native idiom) as male and female; the latter embracing all the common species with hollow stems, the former title being applied to a certain kind (in fact, a sp. of a distinct genus, Dendrocalamus strictus), which has a solid or nearly solid core, and is much used for bludgeons (see latitude) and spear-shafts. It is remarkable that this popular distinction by sex was known to Ctesias (c. B.C. 400) who says that the Indian reeds were divided into male and female, the male having no

One of the present writers has seen (and partaken of) rice cooked in a joint of bamboo, among the Khyens, a hillpeople of Arakan. And Mr Markham mentions the same practice as prevalent among the Chunchos and savage aborigines on the eastern slopes of the Andes (J. R. Geog. Soc. xxv. 155). An endeavour was made in Pegu in 1855 to procure the largest obtainable bamboo. It was a little over 10 inches in diameter. But Clusius states that he had seen two great specimens in the University at Leyden, 30 feet long and from 14 to 16 inches in diameter. And E. Haeckel, in his Visit to Ceylon (1882), speaks of bamboo-stems at Peradenia, "each from a foot to two feet thick." We can obtain no corroborated of anything approaching 2 feet.—[See Gray's note on Pyard, Hak. Soc. i. 330.]

BAMÓ, n.p. Burm. Bha-mo, Shan Me-maw; in Chinese Sin-Kai, 'Newmarket.' A town on the upper Irrawadi, where one of the chief routes from China abuts on that river; regarded as the early home of the Karens. [(McMahon, Karens of the Golden Cher., 103.)] The old Shan town of Bamó was on the Tapeng R., about 20 m. east of the Irawadi, and it is supposed that the English factory alluded to in the quotations was there.

1684.—"A Settlement at Bamoom upon the confines of China."—Fringle, Madras Cons., iii. 102.

1759.—"This branch seems formerly to have been driven from the Establishment at Pannoo."—Dalrymple, Or. Rep., i. 111.

BANANA, n. The fruit of Musa paradisiaca, and M. sapientum of Linnaeus, but now reduced to one species under the latter name by R. Brown. This word is not used in India, though one hears it in the Straits Settlements. The word itself is said by De Orta to have come from Guinea; so also Pigafetta (see below). The matter will be more conveniently treated under PLANATIN. Prof. Robertson Smith points out that the coincidence of this name with the Ar. bandan, 'fingers or toes,' and bandana, 'a single finger or toe,' can hardly be accidental. The fruit, as we learn from Mukaddas, grew in Palestine before the Crusades; and that it is known in literature only as musa would not prove that the fruit was not somewhere popularly known as 'fingers.' It is possible that the Arabs, through whom probably the fruit found its way to W. Africa, may have transmitted with it a name like this; though historical evidence is still to seek. [Mr. Skeat writes: "It is curious that in Norwegian and Danish (and I believe in Swedish), the exact Malay word pisang, which is unknown in England, is used. Prof. Skeat thinks this may be because we had adopted the word banana before the word pisang was brought to Europe at all."] 1668.—"The Arab calls these musa or amusa; there are chapters on the subject in Avicenna and Serapion, and they call them by this name, as does Rasis also. Moreover, in Guinea they have these figs, and call them bananas."—Garcia, 98r.

1598.—"Other fruits there are termed Bananas, which we think to be the Musa of Egypt and Soria . . . but here they cut them yearly, to the end they may bear the better."—Tr. of Pigafetta's Congo, in Harleian Coll. ii. 553 (also in Purchas, ii. 1008.)

c. 1610.—"Des bannes (marginal rubric Bananensi) que les Portugais appellent figues d'Inde, et aux Maldives Quella."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 85; [Hak. Soc. i. 113]. The Maldivian word is here the same as H. kelá (Skt. kadalá).

1673.—"Bananoes, which are a sort of Plantain, though less, yet much more grateful."—Fryer, 40.

1686.—"The Banana tree is exactly like the Plantain for shape and bigness, not easily distinguishable from it but by the Fruit, which is a great deal smaller."—Dampier, i. 316.

BANCOON, BETEECOOT, ss. Terms of abuse, which we should hesitate to print if their odious meaning were not obscure "to the general." If it were known to the Englishmen who sometimes use the words, we believe there are few who would not shrink from such brutality. Something similar in character seem the words which Saul in his rage flings at his noble son (1 Sam. xx. 30).

There is a handsome tomb and mosque to the N. of Ahmedabad, erected by Hajji Malik Bahā-ud-din, a wazir of Sultan Mohammed Bigara, in memory of his wife Bibi Achat or Achkut; and probably the vile story to which the 17th-century travellers refer is founded only on a vulgar misrepresentation of this name.

1648.—"Bēty-cknoit; dat is (onder eer-"breginge gesprooken) in onze tale te beggen, u Dochters Schasemelhoyt."—Van Tuyt, 16.

1792.—"The officer (of Tippoo's troops) who led, on being challenged in Moors answered (Agari que loute). 'We belong to the advance—the title of Lally's brigade, supposing the people he saw to be their own Europeans, whose uniform also is red; but soon discovering his mistake the commandant called out (Pryingly Banchshoot)—chetona 'they are the rascally English! Make off'; in which he set the corps a ready example."—Dixon's Narrative, 147.

BANCOOK, n.p. The modern capital of Siam, properly Bang-kok; see explanation by Bp. Pallegoix in quotation. It had been the site of forts erected on the ascent of the Menam to the old capital Ayuthia, by Constantine Phaulcon in 1675; here the modern city was established as the seat of government in 1787, after the capture of Ayuthia (see JUDEA) by the Burmese in that year. It is uncertain if the first quotation refer to Bunchot.

1592.—"... and Banplasoot, which stands at the mouth of the Menam."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1611.—"They had arrived in the Road of Siam the twentieth of August, and cast Anchor at three fathome high water. ... The Towne lyeth some thirtie leagues up along the River, whither they sent neere of their arrival. The Sabander (see SHAH-BUNDER) and the Governor of Manock (a place situate by the River), came backe with the Messengers to receive his Majesties Letters, but chiefly for the presents expected."—P. Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 321.

1727.—The Ship arrived at Benookoec, a Castle about half-way up, where it is customary for all Ships to put their Guns ashore."—A. Hamilton, i. 368.

1850.—"Civitas regia tris habet nomina: ... ban makkk, per contractionem Bangkòk, pagus oleastrorum, set nomen primitivum quod hodie etiam vulgo usurpatur."—Pulleigos, Gram. Linguaes Thai., Bangkok, 1850, p. 167.

BANDANNA, s. This term is properly applied to the rich yellow or red silk handkerchief, with diamond spots left white by pressure applied to prevent their receiving the dye. The etymology may be gathered from Shakespeare's Dict., which gives "Bàn-dhna: 1. A mode of dyeing in which the cloth is tied in different places, to prevent the parts tied from receiving the dye; ... 3. A kind of silk cloth" A class or caste in Guzerat who do this kind of preparation for dyeing are called Bandhár (Drummond). [Such handkerchiefs are known in S. India as Pulicat handkerchiefs. Cloth dyed in this way is in Upper India known as Chàmîri. A full account of the process will be found in Journ. Ind. Art, ii. 63, and S. M. Hadi's Mon. on Dyes and Dyeing, p. 35.]

c. 1590.—"His Majesty improved this department in four ways. ... Thirdly, in stuffs as ... Bândhmun, Chàtst, Aûchah."—Ais, i. 91.

1818.—"Bandanmos ... 800."—Millburn (List of Bengal Piece-goods, and no. to the ton), ii. 221.

1848.—"Mr Soape, lately admitted partner into the great Calcutta House of Fogle, Fake, and Cracksam ... taking Fako's place, who retired to a princely Park in Sussex (the Fogles have long been out of the firm, and Sir Horace Fogle is about to be raised to the peerage as Baron Bandanana), ... two years before it failed for a million, and plunged half the Indian public into misery and ruin."—Vanithy Fair, ii. ch. 25.

1866.—"'Of course,' said Tooogood, wiping his eyes with a large red bandana handkerchief. 'By all means, come along, Major. The major had turned his face away, and he also was weeping.'—Last Chronicle of Barset, ii. 362.

1875.—"In Calcutta, Tariff Valuations: 'Piece goods silk: Bandah Choppahs, per piece of 7 handkerchiefs ... score ... 115 Rs.'

BANDAREE, s. Mahr. Bandarî, the name of the caste or occupation. It is applied at Bombay to the class of people (of a low caste) who tend the coco-palm gardens in the island, and draw toddy, and who at one time formed a local militia. [It has no connection with the more common Bhändràr, 'a treasurer or storekeeper.'

1548.—"... certain duties collected from the bandarys who draw the toddy (evra) from the alaes ..."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 203.

1644.—"The people ... are all Christians, or at least the greater part of them consisting of artisans, carpenters, chaudaris (this word is manifestly a mistranscription of bandaris), whose business is to gather nuts from the coco-palms, and corumbus (see KOONBEE) who till the ground."—Bocarro, M.3.

1673.—"The President ... if he go abroad, the Bandarines and Moors under two Standards march before him."—Fryer, 68.

"... besides 60 Field-pieces ready in their Carries upon occasion to attend the Militia and Bandarines."—Ibid. 66.

c. 1760.—"There is also on the island kept up a sort of militia, composed of the land-tillers, and bandarees, whose living depends chiefly on the cultivation of the coco-nut trees."—Grose, i. 48.

1808.—"... whilst on the Brab trees the cast of Bhundarees paid a due for extracting the liquor."—Bombay Regulation, i. of 1806, sect. vi. para. 2.

1810.—"Her husband came home, laden with toddy for distilling. He is a bandari or toddy-gatherer."—Maria Graham, 38.

c. 1836.—"Of the Bhundarees the most remarkable usage is their fondness for a peculiar species of long trumpet, called Bhongalee, which, ever since the dominion of the Portuguese, they have had the privilege of carrying and blowing on certain State occasions."—R. Murphy, in Tr. Bo. Geog. Soc. i. 131.

1883.—"We have received a letter from one of the large Bhundaries in the city, pointing out that the tax on toddy trees is now Rs. 18 (1 Rs. 1, 8 a.) per tapped toddy tree per annum, whereas in 1872 it was only BANDEJAH, s. Port. bandeja, 'a salver,' 'a tray to put presents on.' We have seen the word used only in the following passages:

1621.—"We and the Hollanders went to visit Semi Dono, and we carried a bottle of strong water, and an other of Spanish wine, with a great box (or bandeja) of sweet bread."—Cocke's Diary, ii. 143.

1747.—"Making a small cott (see COT) and a rattan bandeja for the Nabob. . . ." (Pagodas) 4: 32: 21.—Act. Expenses at Fort St. David, Jany., M.S. Records in India Office.

c. 1760.—"(Betel) in large companies is brought in ready made up on Japan chargers, which they call from the Portuguese name, Bandeja, something like our tea-boards."—Grose, i. 237.

1766.—"To Monurbad Dowla Nabob—

R. A. P.
1 Pair Pistols . 216 0 0
2 China Bandases 172 12 9"

—Lord Clive's Durbar Charges, in Long, 483.

Bandeja appears in the Manilla Vocabulary of Blumenritth as used there for the present of cakes and sweetmeats, tastefully packed in an elegant basket, and sent to the priest, from the wedding feast. It corresponds therefore to the Indian dāti (see DOLLY).

BANDEL, n.p. The name of the old Portuguese settlement in Bengal about a mile above Hoogly, where there still exists a monastery, said to be the oldest church in Bengal (see Imp. Gazetteer). The name is a Port. corruption of bandar, 'the wharf'; and in this shape the word was applied among the Portuguese to a variety of places. Thus in Corea, under 1541-42, we find mention of a port in the Red Sea, near the mouth, called Bandar dos Malemos ('of the Pilots'). Chittagong is called Bandel de Chatighão (e.g. in Bocarro, p. 444), corresponding to Bandar Chatgām in the Autobiog. of Jahāngir (Elliott, vi. 326). [In the Diary of Sir T. Roe (see below) it is applied to Gomboon], and in the following passage the original no doubt runs Bandar-i-Hūgli or Hūgli-Bandar.

1681.—". . . these Europeans increased in number, and erected large substantial buildings, which they fortified with cannons, muskets, and other implements of war. In due course a considerable place grew up, which was known by the name of Port of Hūgli."—Abdul Hamid, in Elliot, vii. 32.

1758.—". . . les établissemens formés pour assurer leur commerce sont situés sur les bords de cette rivière. Celui des Portugais, qu'ils ont appelé Bandel, en adoptant le terme Fango de Bandar, qui signifie port, est aujourd'hui réduit à peu de chose . . . et il est presque contigu à Ugli en remontant."—D'Anville, Eclaircissements, p. 64.

1782.—"There are five European factories within the space of 20 miles, on the opposite banks of the river Ganges in Bengal; Houghley, or Bandell, the Portuguese Presidency; Chinsura, the Dutch; Chandernagore, the French; Srimpor, the Danish; and Calcutta, the English."—J. Atkinson, Observations, &c., p. 51. In Price's Tracts, i.

BANDICOOT, s. Corr. from the Telugu pandi-kokku, lit. 'pig-rat.' The name has spread all over India, as applied to the great rat called by naturalists Mus malabaricus (Shaw), Mus giganteus (Hardwicke), Mus banducota (Bechstein), [Nesokia bandicota (Blanford, p. 426)]. The word is now used also in Queensland, [and is the origin of the name of the famous Bendiigo gold-field (3 ser. N. d. Q. ix. 97)].

c. 1780.—"In Lesser India there be some rats as big as foxes, and venomous exceeding."—Friar Jordanus, Hak. Soc. 29.

1834.—"They imprison in the dungeons (of Dwaigir, i.e. Danatābād) those who have been guilty of great crimes. There are in those dungeons enormous rats, bigger than cats. In fact, these latter animals run away from them, and can't stand against them, for they would get the worst of it. So they are only caught by stratagem. I have seen these rats at Dwaigir, and much amazed I was!"—Ibn Batuta, iv. 47.

Fryer seems to exaggerate worse than the Moor:

1673.—"For Vermin, the strongest huge Rat as big as our Pigs, which burrow under the Houses, and are bold enough to venture on Poultry."—Fryer, 116.

The following surprisingly confounds two entirely different animals:

1789.—"The Bandicoot, or musk rat, is another troublesome animal, more indeed from its offensive smell than anything else."—Munro, Narrative, 32. See MUSK-RAT.

[1828.—"They be called Brandy-cutes."—Or. Sporting Mag. i. 128.]
1879.—"I shall never forget my first night here (on the Cocos Islands). As soon as the Sun had gone down, and the moon risen, thousands upon thousands of rats, in size equal to a bandicoot, appeared."—Pollok, Sport in B. Borneo, &c., ii. 14.

1880.—"They (wild dogs in Queensland) hunted Kangaroo when in numbers . . . but usually preferred smaller and more easily obtained prey, as rats, bandicoots, and 'possums."—Blackwood's Mag., Jan., p. 85.

BANDICOY, s. The colloquial name in S. India of the fruit of H. esculentus; Tamil vendai-khāli, i.e. unripe fruit of the vendai, called in H. bendi. See BENDY.

RANDO! H. imperative bāndho, 'tie or make fast.' "This and probably other Indian words have been naturalised in the docks on the Thames frequented by Lascar crews. I have heard a London lighter-man, in the Victoria Docks, throw a rope ashore to another Londoner, calling out, Bando!"—(M.-Gen. Keatinge.)

BANDY, s. A carriage, bullock-carrige, buggy, or cart. This word is usual in both the S. and W. Presidencies, but is unknown in Bengal, and in the N.W.P. It is the Tamil wendi, Telug. bāny, 'a cart or vehicle.' The word, as bendi, is also used in Java. [Mr Skeat writes—"Klinkert has Mal. bendi, 'a chaise or calectione,' but I have not heard the word in standard Malay, though Clifford and Swett. have bēndu, 'a kind of sedan-chair carried by men,' and the commoner word āndu 'a sedan-chair or litter,' which I have heard in Selangor. Wilkinson says that kāretā (i.e. kētra bāndi) is used to signify any two-wheeled vehicle in Johor."]

1800.—"No wheel-carriges can be used in Canara, not even a buffalo-bandy."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 243.

1810.—"None but open carriges are used in Ceylon; we therefore went in bandies, or, in plain English, gags."—Maria Graham, 88.

1826.—"Those persons who have not European coachmen have the horses of their . . . 'bandies' or gigs, led by these men. . . . Gigs and hackeries all go here (in Ceylon) by the name of bandy."—Heber (ed. 1844), ii. 152.

1860.—"Bullock bandies, covered with cabajans met us."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 146.

BANG, BHANG, s. H. bhāng, the dried leaves and small stalks of hemp (i.e. Cannabis indica), used to cause intoxication, either by smoking, or when eaten mixed up into a sweetmeat (see MAJOON). Hashish of the Arabs is substantially the same; Birdwood says it "consists of the tender tops of the plants after flowering." [Bhang is usually derived from Skt. bha, 'breaking,' but Burton derives both it and the Ar. bāny from the old Coptic Nēban, 'meaning a preparation of hemp; and here it is easy to recognise the Homeric Nēpente."

"On the other hand, not a few apply the word to the henbane (Hyoscyamus niger) so much used in mediev. Europe. The Kamis evidently means henbane, distinguishing it from Hashish at hardfish, 'rascal's grace,' i.e. the herb Pteragranum. . . The use of Bhang doubtless dates from the dawn of civilisation, whose earliest social pleasures would be inebriants. Herodotus (iv. c. 75) shows the Scythians burning the seeds (leaves and capsules) in worship and becoming drunk upon the fumes, as do the S. African Bushmen of the present day."—(Arab. Nights, i. 65.)

1563.—"The great Sultan Badur told Martim Affonso de Souza, for whom he had a great liking, and to whom he told all his secrets, that when in the night he had a desire to visit Portugal, and the Brazil, and Turkey, and Arabia, and Persia, all he had to do was to eat a little bangue . . ."—Garcia, f. 26.

1578.—"Bangue is a plant resembling hemp, or the Cannabis of the Latins . . . the Arabs call this Bangue 'Asis'" (i.e. Hashish).—O. Acosta, 390.61.

1698.—"They have . . . also many kinds of Drogues, as Amfon, or Opium, Camfora, Bangue and Sandall Wood."—Linchothen, 19; [Hak. Soc. i. 61; also see ii. 115.]

1806.—"O mais de tāpo estava oheo de bangue."—Gouvea, 93.

1838.—"Il se fit apporter vn petit cabinet d'or . . . dont il tira deux layettes, et prit dans l'yme de l'affon, ou opium, et dans l'autre du bengi, qui est vne certaine drogue ou poudre, dont ils se servoient pour s'exciter à la luxure."—Mandelaio, Paris, 1659, 150.
1855.—"I have two sorts of the Bangue, which were sent from two several places of the East Indies; they both differ much from our Hemp, although they seem to differ most as to their magnitude."—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Ray, in Ray's Correspondence, 1848, p. 160.

1873.—"Bang (a pleasant intoxicating Seed mixed with Milk). . ."—Fryer, 91.

1711.—"Bang has likewise its Vertue attributed to it; for being used as Tea, it inebriates, or exhilarates them according to the Quantity they take."—Lockyer, 61.

1727.—"Before they engage in a Fight, they drink Bang, which is made of a Seed like Hemp-seed, that has an intoxicating Quality."—A. Hamilton, i. 194.

1784.—". . . it does not appear that the use of Bank, an intoxicating weed which resembles the hemp of Europe, . . . is considered even by the most rigid (Hindoo) breach of the law."—G. Forster, Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 291.

1789.—"A shop of Bang may be kept with a capital of no more than two shillings, or one rupee. It is only some better who he gave a heavy tax, and his cash to boot. . ."—Mr. Ray, 961.

1808.—"To the cutwahl he gave a heavy pair of gold Bangies, of which he considerably enhanced the value by putting them on his wrists with his own hands."—Journal of Sir J. Nicholls, in note to Wellington Despatches, ed. 1837, ii. 373.

1809.—"Bangies, or bracelets."—Maria Graham, 18.

1810.—"Some wear . . . a stout silver ornament of the ring kind, called a bangle, or karruk (kard) on either wrist."—Williamson, V. M. i. 305.

1826.—"I am paid with the silver bangles of my enemy, and his cash to boot."—Fardwarg Hauk, 27; [ed. 1873, i. 36].

1873.—"Year after year he found some excuse for coming up to Sirmoori—now a proposal for a tax on bangles, now a scheme for a new mode of Hindustani pronunciation."—The True Reformer, i. 24.

BAN'GUN, s.—See BRINJAL.

BANG, s. Hind. bāngar. In Upper India this name is given to the higher parts of the plain country on which the towns stand—the older alluvium—in contradistinction to the khadar [Khāḍir] or lower alluvium immediately bordering the great rivers, and forming the limit of their inundation and modern divagations; the khāḍir having been cut out from the bāngar by the river. Medlicott spells bhangar (Man. of Geol. of India, i. 404).

BANGY, BANGHY, &c. s. H. bānghī, Mahr. bāngī; Skt. vihangamā, and vihangikā.

a. A shoulder-yoke for carrying loads, the yoke or bāngy resting on the shoulder, while they are carried by animals. But sweeter far our social hours, our prison pets, yon felon In Elysian bowers O'er a bask of rom wine."—Lord Neave.

BANGED—is also used as a participle, for 'stimulated by bang,' e.g., "banged up to the eyes."—Banged.

BANGLE, s. H. bangrī or bāngrī. The original word properly means a ring of coloured glass worn on the wrist by women; [the chari of N. India] but bangle is applied to any native ring-bracelet, and also to an anklet or ring of any kind worn on the ankle or leg. Indian silver bangles on the wrist have recently come into common use among English girls.

1803.—"To the cutwahl he gave a heavy pair of gold bangleis, of which he considerably enhanced the value by putting them on his wrists with his own hands."—Journal of Sir J. Nicholls, in note to Wellington Despatches, ed. 1837, ii. 373.

1809.—"Bangies, or bracelets."—Maria Graham, 18.
BANJO. 61

[1843.—“I engaged eight bearers to carry my palanquin. Besides these I had four banghy-burdars, men who are each obliged to carry forty pound weight, in small wooden or tin boxes, called petarrus.”— Traveler’s account, Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 91.]

b.—
c. 1844.—“I will forward this by banghy dâr a copy of Capt. Moreby’s Survey of the Red Sea.”—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Admin. of Lord Ellenborough, p. 221.

1873.—“The officers of his regiment... subscribed to buy the young people a set of crockery, and a plated tea and coffee service (got up by dawk bangsee... at not much more than 200 per cent. in advance of the English price.”—The True Reformer,
i. 57.

BANJO. s. Though this is a West-and not East-Indian term, it may be worth while to introduce the following older form of the word:

1784.—
“Permit thy slaves to lead the choral dance
To the wild bannasaw’s melancholy sound.”—Graineser, iv.

See also Davies, for example of banjore, (and N.E.D for banjer).

BANKSHALL. a. A warehouse. b. The office of a Harbour Master or other Port Authority. In former sense the word is still used in S. India; in Bengal the latter is the only sense recognised, at least among Anglo-Indians; in Northern India the word is not in use. As the Calcutta office stands on the banks of the Hooghly, the name is, we believe, often accepted as having some indefinite reference to this position.
And in a late work we find a positive and plausible, but entirely unfounded, explanation of this kind, which we quote below. In Java the word has a specific application to the open hall of audience, supported by wooden pillars without walls, which forms part of every princely residence. The word is used in Sea Hindustani, in the forms bangdir, and bangdal for a ‘store-room’ (Roebeck).

Banksbell is in fact one of the oldest of the words taken up by foreign traders in India. And its use not only by Correa (c. 1561) but by King
John (1524), with the regularly-formed Portuguese plural of words in -af, shows how early it was adopted by the Portuguese. Indeed, Correa does not even explain it, as is his usual practice with Indian terms.

More than one serious etymology has been suggested:—(1). Crawfurd takes it to be the Malay word bangal, defined by him in his Malay Dict.
thus: “(J.) A shed; a storehouse; a workshop; a porch; a covered passage.” (see J. Ind. Archip. iv. 182).
[Mr Skeat adds that it also means in Malay ‘half-husked paddy,’ and ‘fallen timber, of which the outer layer has rotted and only the core remains.’
But it is probable that the Malay word, though marked by Crawfurd (“J.”) as Javanese in origin, is a corruption of one of the two following:
(2) Beng. bangasha, from Skt. banik or vanik, ‘trade,’ and idla, ‘a hall.’
This is Wilson’s etymology.
(3). Skt. bhandaśa, Canar. bha-dasha, Malayal. pandisha, Tam. panda-šalai or pandakandalai, ‘a storehouse or magazine.’

It is difficult to decide which of the two last is the original word; the prevalence of the second in S. India is an argument in its favour; and the substitution of g for d would be in accordance with a phonetic practice of not uncommon occurrence.

c. 1545.—“For the bandar there is in every island (of the Maldives) a wooden building, which they call bajansār [evidently for banjasār, i.e. Arabic spelling for bangasār] where the Governor... collects all the goods, and there sells or barters them.”—Ibn Baal, iv. 120.

[1520.—“Collected in his bangasāl” (in the Maldives).—Doc. da Torre do Tombo,
p. 452.]

1524.—A grant fmm K. John to the City of Goa, says: “that henceforward even if no market rent in the city is collected from the bacças, viz. those at which are sold honey, oil, butter, bete (i.e. betel), spices, and cloths, for permission to sell such things in the said bacças, it is our pleasure that they shall sell them freely.”
A note says: “Apparently the word should be bacças, or bacçases, or bacçasas, which then signified any place to sell things, but now particularly a wooden house.”— 1561.—“... in the bengaças, in which stand the goods ready for shipment.”— Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 260.

1610.—The form and use of the word have led P. Teixeira into a curious confusion (as it would seem) when, speaking of foreigners at Ormus, he says: “hay muchos gentiles, Banaeases [see BANYAN], Bangasalys, y
Cambayatis”—where the word in italics

Digitized by Google probably represents Bangaly, i.e. Bengaliis (Rel. de Harmac, 18).

c. 1610.—"Le facteur du Roy chrestien des Maldives tenoit ass bancasalle ou plustost cellier, sur le bord de la mer en l'isle de Malé."—Pynard de Lasau, ed. 1679,
i. 85; [Hak. Soc. i. 85; also see i. 267].

1613.—"The other settlement of Yer-with houses of wood patched extends ... to the fields of Tanajonpaser, where there is a bancasal or sentry's house without other defense."—Godinho de Eredal, 6.

1625.—"Bancasal, a shed (or barn), or often a roof without walls to sit under, sheltered from the rain or sun."—Gasper Wilens, Vocabularium, &c., ins' Graven-haage; repr. Batavia, 1706.

1734-5.—"Paid the Bankshall Merchants for the house poles, country reapers, &c., necessary for housebuilding."—In Wheeler,
iii. 148.

1748.—"A little below the town of Wampo
... These people (compradores) build a house for each ship. ... They are called by us bancasals. In these we deposit the rigging and yards of the vessel, chests, water-casks, and every thing that incommodes us aboard."—A Voyage to the E. Indians in 1747 and 1748 (1762), p. 294. It appears from this book (p. 118) that the place in Canton River was known as Bankshall Island.

1750-52.—"One of the first things on arriving here (Canton River) is to procure a bancasal, that is, a great house, constructed of bamboo and mats ... in which the stores of the ship are laid up."—A Voyage, &c., by Olof Toroe ... in a series of letters to Dr Linneaus, Transal, by J. R.
Forster (with Osbeck's Voyage), 1771.

1783.—"These people (Chulias, &c., from India, at Achin) ... on their arrival immediately build, by contract with the natives, houses of bamboo, like what in China at Wampo is called bankshall, very regular, on a convenient spot close to the river."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 41.

1788.—"Bancasals—Storehouses for depositing ships' stores in, while the ships are unloading and refitting."—Indian Voal.
(Stockdale).

1813.—"The East India Company for seventy years had a large bankshall, or warehouse, at Mires, for the reception of the pepper and sandalwood purchased in the dominions of the Mysore Rajah."— 1817.—"The bangal or mendpoo is a large open hall, supported by a double row of pillars, and covered with shingles, the interior being richly decorated with paint and giltiging."—Raffles, Java (2nd ed.), i. 93.

The Javanese use, as in this passage, corresponds to the meaning given in Janges, Javanese Dict.: "Bangal, Vorstelijke Zitplaats" (Prince's sitting-place).

[1614.—"The custom house or bankshall at Masulipatam."—Foster, Letters, ii. 88.]

1623.—"And on the Place by the see there was the Custom-house, which the Persians in their language call Bankasal, a building of no great size, with some open outer porticoes."—P. della Valle, ii. 465.

1673.—"... Their Bank Solls, or Custom House Keys, where they land, are Two; but mean, and shut only with ordinary Gates at Night."—Pryer, 27.

1683.—"I came ashore in Capt. Goyer's Pinnaque to the Bankshall, about 7 miles from Ballasore."—Hedges, Diary, Feb. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 65].

1687.—"The Mayor and Aldermen, etc., do humbly request the Honourable President and Council would please to grant and assign over to the Corporation the petty dues of Bankshall Tolls."—In Wheeler, i. 207.

1727.—"Above it is the Dutch Bankshall, A Place where their Ships ride when they cannot get further up for the too swift Currents."—A. Hamilton, ii. 6.

1789.—"And that no one may plead ignorance of this order, it is hereby directed that it be placed constantly in view at the Bankshall in the English and country languages."—Procl. against Smuggling in Seton-Karr, ii. 5.

1787.—"The term 'Bankshall' has always been a puzzle to the English in India. It is borrowed from the Dutch. The 'Soll' is the Dutch or Danish 'Zoll,' the English 'Toll.' The Bankshall was then the place on the 'bank' where all tolls or duties were levied on landing goods."—Talboys Wheeler, Early Records of B. India, 196. (Quite erroneous, as already said; and Zoll is not Dutch.)

BANTAM, n.p. The province which forms the western extremity of Java, properly Bantam. [Mr Skeat gives Bantam, Crawfurd, Bantin.] It formed an independent kingdom at the beginning of the 17th century, and then produced much pepper (no longer grown), which caused it to be greatly frequented by European traders.
An English factory was established here in 1608, and continued till 1682, when the Dutch succeeded in expelling us as interlopers.

[1615.—"They were all valued in my invoice at Bantam."—Foster, Letters, iv. 93.]

1727.—"The only Product of Bantam is Pepper, wherein it abounds so much, than they can export 10,000 Tuns per annum."—A. Hamilton, ii. 127.

BANTAM FOWLS, s. According to Crawfurd, the dwarf poultry which we call by this name were imported from Japan, and received the name "not from the place that produced them, but from that where our volyers first found them."—(Desc. Dict. s.v. Bantam). The following evidently in Pegu describes Bantams:

1566.—"They also eat certain cocks and hens called toria, which are the size of a turtle-dove, and have feathered feet; but so pretty, that I never saw so pretty a bird. I brought a cock and hen with me as far as Chaul, and then, suspecting they might be taken from me, I gave them to the Capuchin fathers belonging to the Madre de Doco."—Bali, i. 125v, 126.

1673.—"From Siam are brought hither little Champoro Cocks with ruffled feet, well armed with Spurs, which have a strutting Gate with them, the truest mistled in the World."—Fryer, 116.

1703.—"Wilde cocks and hens . . . much like the small sort called Champores, several of which we have had brought us from Camboja."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxxiii.

This looks as if they came from Champā (q. v.).

(1) BANYAN, s. a. A Hindu trader, and especially of the Province of Guzerat, many of which class have for ages been settled in Arab ports and known by this name; but the term is often applied by early travellers in Western India to persons of the Hindu religion generally. b. In Calcutta also it is (or perhaps rather was) specifically applied to the native brokers attached to houses of business, or to persons in the employment of a private gentleman doing analogous duties (now usually called sircar).

The word was adopted from Viṇīya, a man of the trading caste (in Gujarāti viṇīyo), and that comes from Skt. vīṇa, 'a merchant.' The terminal nasal may be a Portuguese addition (as in palangquin, mandarin, Bassein), or it may be taken from the plural form viṇīyak. It is probable, however, that the Portuguese found the word already in use by the Arab traders. Śiddi 'Ali, the Turkish Admiral, uses it in precisely the same form, applying it to the Hindus generally; and in the poem of Sassi and Panhu, the Sindian Romeo and Juliet, as given by Burton in his Sindb (p. 101), we have the form Viṇīyāṇa. P. F. Vincenzo Maria, who is quoted below absurdly alleges that the Portuguese called these Hindus of Guzerat Bag- nani, because they were always washing themselves "... chiamati da Portughesi Bagnani, per la frequenza e superstizione, con quale si lavano più volte il giorno" (251). See also Luillier below. The men of this class profess an extravagant respect for animal life; but after Stanley brought home Dr. Livingstone's letters they became notorious as chief promoters of slave-trade in Eastern Africa. A. K. Forbes speaks of the mediæval Wānias at the Court of Anhilwārā as "equally gallant in the field (with Rajputs), and wiser in council . . . already in profession puritans of peace, but not yet drained enough of their hery Kshātri blood."—(Rds Māla, i. 240; [ed. 1878, 184].)

Bunya is the form in which Viṇīya appears in the Anglo-Indian use of Bengal, with a different shade of meaning, and generally indicating a grain-dealer.

1516.—"There are three qualities of these Gentiles, that is to say, some are called Drabutus . . . others are called Bantums, and are merchants and traders."—Barbone, 51.

1552.—"... Among whom came certain men who are called Banesanes of the same heathen of the Kingdom of Cambaia . . . coming on board the ship of Vasco da Gama, and seeing in his cabin a pictorial image of Our Lady, to which our people did reverence, they also made adoration with much more fervency."—Barròs, Dec., i. liv. iv. cap. 6.

1555.—"We may mention that the inhabitants of Guzerat call the unbelievers Banyins, whilst the inhabitants of Hindustan call them Hindus."—Śiddi 'Ali Kapudsā, in J. As., 1st S. ix. 197-8.

1563.—"R. If the fruits were all as good as this (mango) it would be no such great matter in the Banesanes, as you tell me, not to eat flesh. And since I touch on this matter, tell me, pritech, who are these Banesanes . . . who do not eat flesh . . ."—García, f. 136.

1608.—"The Govenour of the Towne of Gaudene is a Banyan, and one of those kind of people that observe the Law of Pythagoras."—Jones, in Purchas, i. 231.

1623.—"One of these races of Indians is that of those which call themselves Vanid, but who are called, somewhat corruptly by the Portuguese, and by all our other Franks, Bansians; they are all, for the most part, traders and brokers."—P. della Valle, i. 496-7; [and see i. 75 Hak. Soc.].

1630.—"A people presented themselves to mine eyes, clothed in linen garments, somewhat low descending, of a gesture and garbe, as I may say, maidenly and well nigh effeminate; of a countenance shy, and somewhat estranged; yet smiling out a giesed and bashful familiarity. . . . I asked what manner of people these were, so strangely notable, and not at all strange. Reply was made that they were Banians. — Lord, Preface.

1665. — "In trade these Banians are a very strange people, and worse than the Jews; more expert in all sorts of cunning tricks, and more maliciously mischievous in their revenge." — Tavernier, E. T. ii. 58; [ed. Ball, i. 136, and see i. 91].

1666. — "Aussi chacun a son Banian dans les Indes, et il y a des personnes de qualité qui leur consent tout ce qu'ils ont . . ." — Thévenot, v. 165. This passage shows in anticipation the transition to the Calcutta use (b., below).

1672. — "The inhabitants are called Guizerasses and Banyans." — Bolduc, 2.

1673. — "The Banyan follows the Soldier, though as contrary in Humour as the Antipodes in the same Meridian are opposite to one another. . . . In Cases of Trade they are not so hide-bound, giving their Consciences more Scope, and boggle at no Villainy for an Emolument." — P. P. Vincenzo di Maria, 114.

1727. — "It is the custom to say that to make one Bengan (so they call the Gentle Merchants) you need three Chinese, and to make one Chinese three Hebrews." — P. F. Cusani di Maria, 114.

1870. — "We have reason to suspect that the intention was to make him (Nundocomar Banyan to General Claverie, to surround the General and us with the Governor's creatures, and to keep us totally unacquainted with the real state of the Government." — Minute by Claverie, Monson, and Frances, P. W., 11th April. In Price's Tracts, ii. 188.

1730. — "We are informed that the Juty Wallahs or Makers and Vendors of Bengal Shoes in and about Calcutta . . . intend sending a Joint Petition to the Supreme Council. . . . on account of the great decay of their Trade, entirely owing to the Luxury of the Bengalis, chiefly the Banyans (sic) and Sarsas, as there are scarce any of them to be found who does not keep a Chariot, Phaeton, Buggy or Pallauquin, and some all four . . ." — In Hicky's Bengal Gazette, June 24th.

1753. — "Mr. Hastings' Bannian was, after this auction, found possessed of territories yielding a rent of £140,000 a year." — Burke, Speech on E. J. Bill, in Writings, &c., iii. 490.

1878. — "The said Warren Hastings did permit and suffer his own banyan or principal black steward, named Canto Beboo, to hold farms . . . to the amount of 12 lacs of rupees per annum." — Art. agst. Hastings, Burke, vii. 111.

"A practice has gradually crept in among the Banians and other rich men of Calcutta, of dressing some of their servants . . . nearly in the uniform of the Honourable Company's Sepoys and Lascars. . . ." — Notification, in Seton Kerr, i. 122.

1879. — "Banyan—A Gentoo servant employed in the management of commercial affairs. Every English gentleman at Bengal has a Banyan who either acts of himself, or as the substitute of some great man or black merchant." — Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

1810. — "The same person frequently was banyan to several European gentlemen; all of whose concerns were of course accurately known to him, and thus became the subject of conversation at those meetings the Banyans of Calcutta invariably held. . . ." — Williams, V. M. i. 189.

1817. — "The European functionary . . . has first his banyan or native秘书." — Mill, Hist. (ed. 1840), iii. 14. Mr. Mill does not here accurately interpret the word.

(2) BANYAN, n. An undershirt, originally of muslin, and so called as resembling the body garment of the Hindus; but now commonly applied to under-body-clothing of elastic cotton, woollen, or silk web. The following quotations illustrate the stages by which the word reached its present application. And they show that our predecessors in India used to adopt the native or Banyan costume in their hours of ease. C. P. Brown defines Banyan as "a loose dressing-gown, such as Hindu tradesmen wear." Probably this may have been the original use; but it is never so employed in Northern India.

1872. — "It is likewise ordered that both Officers and Souldiers in the Fort shall, both on every Sabbath Day, and on every day when they exercise, wear English apparel; in respect the garbe is most becoming as Souldiers, and correspondent to their profession."—Sir W. Langhorne's Standing Order, in Wheeler, iii. 426.

1731.—"The Ensign (as it proved, for his first appearance, being undressed and in his banyan coat, I did not know him) came off from his cot, and in a very haughty manner cried out, 'None of your disturbance, Gentlemen.'"—In Wheeler, iii. 109.

1781.—"I am an Old Stager in this Country, having arrived in Calcutta in the Year 1736. . . . Those were the days, when Gentlemen studied Ease instead of Fashion; when even the Hon. Members of the Council met in Banyan Shirts, Long Drawers (q.v.), and Coconee (Congee) caps; with a Case Bottle of good old Arrach, and a Gouget of Water placed on the Table, which the Secretary (a Skilful Hand) frequently converted into Punch . . ."—Letter from An Old Country Captain, in India Gazette, Feb. 24th.

1773.—In a letter from Horace Walpole to the Countess of Upper Osory, dated April 30th, 1773 (Gunningham's ed., v. 459) he describes a ball at Lord Stanley's, at which two of the dancers, Mr. Storer and Miss Wrottesley, were dressed "in banians with furs, for winter, cock and hen." It would be interesting to have further details of these garments, which were, it may be hoped, different from the modern Banyan.

1810.—". . . an undershirt, commonly called a banian."—Williamson, V.M. i. 19.

(3) BANYAN, s. See BANYAN-TREE.

BANYAN-DAY, s. This is sea-slang for a jour masque, or a day on which no ration of meat was allowed; when (as one of our quotations above expresses it) the crew had "to observe the Law of Pythagoras." 1690.—"Of this (Kickeyry or Kedgeree, q.v.) the European Sailors feed in these parts once or twice a Week, and are forc'd at those times to a Pagan Abstinence from Flesh, which creates in them a perfect Dislike and utter Detestation to those Bannian Days, as they commonly call them."—Ovington, 310, 81.

BANYAN-FIGHT, s. Thus:

1690.—"This Tongue Tempest is termed there a Bannian-Fight, for it never rises to blows or bloodshed."—Ovington, 275. Sir G. Birdwood tells us that this is a phrase still current in Bombay.

BANYAN-TREE, also elliptically Banyan, s. The Indian Fig-Tree (Ficus Indica, or Ficus Bengaleena, L.), called in H. bar [or baryat, the latter

stable, p. 309).] The name appears to have been first bestowed popularly on a famous tree of this species growing near Gombroon (q.v.), under which the Banyans or Hindu traders settled at that port, had built a little pagoda. So says Tavernier below. This original Banyan-tree is described by P. della Valle (ii. 453), and by Valentijn (v. 209). P. della Valle's account (1622) is extremely interesting, but too long for quotation. He calls it by the Persian name, til. The tree still stood, within half a mile of the English factory, in 1758, when it was visited by Ives, who quotes Tickell's verses given below. [Also see CUBEER BURR.]

c. A.D. 70.—"First and foremost, there is a Fig-tree there (in India) which beareth very small and slender figges. The property of this Tree, is to plant and set it selfe without mans helpe. For it spreadeth out with mightie armes, and the lowest water-boughes underneath, do bend so downward to the very earth, that they touch it againe, and lie upon it; whereby, within one years space they will take fast root in the ground, and put forth a new Spring round about the Mother-tree: so as these braunches, thus growing, seeme like a traille or border of arbours most curiously and artificially made," &c.—Pliny's Nat. Historie, by Philémon Holland, i. 860.

". . . The goodly bole being got To certain cubits' height, from every side
The boughs decline, which, taking root afresh, Spring up new boles, and these spring
new, and newer,
Till the whole tree become a porticus,
Or arched arbour, able to receive A numerous troop."

Ben Jonson, Neptune's Triumph.

C. 1650.—"Cet Arbre estoit de même especce que celuy qui est a une lieu du Bander, et qui passe pour une merveille; mais dans les Indes il y en a quantité. Les Persans l'appellent Lul, les Portugais Arber de Reye, et les Francais l'Arbre des Ban-ianes; parce que les Baniano ont fait bâti dessus une Pagode avec un carvanasse, sacompagné de plusieurs petits étangs pour se laver."—Tavernier, V. de Perse, liv. v.
ch. 23. [Also see ed. Ball, ii. 198.]

C. 1650.—"Near to the City of Ormus was a Banianns tree, being the only tree that grew in the Island."—Tavernier, Eng. Tr. i.
255.

C. 1666.—"Nous vimes à cent ou cent cinquante pas de ce jardin, l'arbre War dans toute son étendue. On l'appelle aussi Ber, et arbre des Banians, et arbre des racines
. . . ."—Thevenot, v. 76.
1867.—
"The fig-tree, not that kind for fruit renown'd;
But such as at this day, to Indians known,
In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother-tree, a pillar'd shade
High over-arch'd, and echoing walks between." —Paradise Lost, ix. 1101.

[Warton points out that Milton must have had in view a description of the Banyan-tree in Gerard's Herbal under the heading "of the arched Indian fig-tree."]

1872.—"Eastward of Surat two Courses, i.e. a League, we pitched our Tent under a Tree that besides its Leaves, the Branches bear its own Roots, therefore called by the Portuguese Arbor de Raiz; For the Adoration the Banyans pay it, the Banyan-Tree." —Fryer, 105.

1891.—"About a (Dutch) mile from Chamran, stands a tree, heretofore described by Mandelelo and others. . . . Beside this tree is an island temple where the Banyans do their worship." —Valentijn, v. 287-8.

"The fair descendents of thy sacred bed Wide-branching o'er the Western World shall spread,
Like the fam'd BANIAN Tree, whose plant shoot
To earthward bending of itself takes root,
Till like their mother plant ten thousand stand.
In verdant arches on the fertile land;
Beneath her shade the tawny Indians rove,
Or hunt at large through the wide-echoing grove." —Tickell, Epistle from a Lady in England to a Lady in Avignon.

1728.—"On the north side of the city (Surat) is there an uncommonly great Pichar or Waringin* tree. . . . The Portuguese call this tree Albero de lais, i.e. Root-tree. . . . Under it is a small chapel built by a Banyan. . . . Day and night lamps are alight there, and Banyans constantly come in pilgrimage, to offer their prayers to this saint." —Valentijn, iv. 145.

1871.—". . . being employed to construct a military work at the fort of Trip lanzore (afterwards called Marden's Bastion) it was necessary to cut down a banyan-tree which so incensed the brahmans of that place, that they found means to poison him" (i.e. Thomas Marden of the Madras Engineers). —Mem. of W. Marden, 7-8.

1809.—"Their greatest enemy (i.e. of the buildings) is the BANYAN-Tree." —Ed. Valentijn, i. 996.

"In the midst an aged BANIAN grew.
It was a goodly sight to see
That venerable tree,
For o'er the lawn, irregularly spread,
Fifty straight columns propt its lofty head;
And many a long depending shoot,
Seeking to strike its root,
Straight like a plummet grew towards the ground.
Some on the lower boughs which crossed their way,
Fixing their bearded fibres, round and round,
With many a ring and wild contortion wound;
Some to the passing wind at times, with sway
Of gentle motion swung;
Others of younger growth, unnerved, were hung Like stone-drops from the cavern's fretted height." —Southey, Curse of Kehama, xiii. 51. [Southey takes his account from Williamson, Orient. Field Sports, ii. 118.]

1821.—
"Des banians touffus, par les brames adorés, Depuis longtemps la langueur nous implore,
Courbées par le midi, dont l'ardueur les devore, Ils étendent vers nous leurs rameaux alterés." —Casmir Delavigne, Le Parti, iii. 6.

A note of the publishers on the preceding passage, in the edition of 1855, is diverting:
"Un journaliste allemand a accusé M. Casmir Delavigne d'avoir pris pour un arbre une secte religieuse de l'Inde. . . . The German journalist was wrong here, but he might have found plenty of matter for ridicule in the play. Thus the Brahmins (men) are Akbar (!), Idmore (!), and Eisenpelt (!!!); their women Nula (!), Zeide (!), and Mirza (!)."

1825.—"Near this village was the finest banyan-tree which I had ever seen, literally a grove rising from a single primary stem, whose massive secondary trunks, with their straightness, orderly arrangement, and evident connexion with the parent stock, gave the general effect of a vast vegetable organ. The first impression which I felt on coming under its shade was, 'What a noble place of worship!'
—Heber, ii. 93 (ed. 1844).

1834.—"Cast forth thy word into the everliving, everworking universe; it is a seed-grain that cannot die; unnoticed to-day, it will be found flourishing as a banyan-grove—(perhaps alas! as a hemlock forest) after a thousand years." —Swtor Reéartus.

1856.—
". . . its pendant branches, rooting in the air, Yearn to the parent earth and grappling fast, Grow up huge stems again, which shooting forth
In massy branches, these again despatch
Their drooping heralds, till a labyrinth Of root and stem and branch commingling, forest.
A great cathedral, aisled and choired in wood.”

_The Banyan Tree, a Poem._

1865.—“A family tends to multiply families around it, till it becomes the centre of a tribe, just as the banyan tends to surround itself with a forest of its own offspring.”— Maclellan, _Primitive Marriage_, 209.

1873.—“... the banyans soutenu par des racines aériennes et dont les branches tombantes engendrent en touchant terre des sujets nouveaux.”—_Rev. des Deux Mondes_, Oct. 15, p. 832.

BARASINHĀ, s. The H. name of the widely-spread _Cercus Waliuchi_, Cuvier. This H. name (‘12-horn’) is no doubt taken from the number of times being approximately twelve.
The name is also applied by sportamen in Bengal to the _Ricercus Duvavellii_, or Swamp-Deer. _[See Blanford, Mamn. 538 seqq. ]_

[1875.—“I know of no flesh equal to that of the ibex; and the same, a species of a giant antelope of Chinese Tibet, with the barra-singh, a red deer of Kashmir, are nearly equally good.”—Wilson, _Abode of Snow_, 91.]

[BARBER’S BRIDGE, n.p. This is a curious native corruption of an English name. The bridge in Madras, known as _Barber’s Bridge_, was built by an engineer named Hamilton. This was turned by the natives into _Ambudon_, and in course of time the name _Ambudon_ was identified with the Tamil _ambattan_, ‘barber,’ and so it came to be called Barber’s Bridge.—_See Le Faux, Man. of the Salem Dist_; ii. 169, note.]

BARBICAN, s. This term of medieval fortification is derived by Littre, and by Marcel Devic, from Ar.
bāb-khānā, which means a sewer-pipe or water-pipe. And _one_ of the meanings given by Littre is, “une ouverture longue et étroite pour l’écoulement de eaux.” Apart from the possible, but untraced, history which this alleged meaning may involve, it seems probable, considering the usual meaning of the word as ‘an outwork before a gate,’ that it is from Ar. P. _bāb-khānā_, ‘gate-house.’ This etymology was suggested in print about 50 years ago by one of the present writers* and confirmed his mind some years later, when in the native town of Cawnporte, not long before the Mutiny, he saw a brand-new double-towered gateway, or gate-house, on the face of which was the inscription in Persian characters: “Bāb-Khānā-i-Mahommed Bakhsh,” or whatever was his name, s. “The _Barbican_ of Mahommed Bakhsh.” [The N.E.D. suggests P. barbar-khānā, ‘house on the wall,’ it being difficult to derive the Romanic forms in _bar-_ from _bāb-khānā._]

The editor of the Chron. of K. James of Aragon (1833, p. 493) says that _barbaca_ in Spain means a second, outermost and lower wall; _i.e._ a faussebrace. And this agrees with facts in that work, and with the definition in Cobarruvias; but not at all with Joinville’s use, nor with V.-le-Duc’s explanation.

_c._ 1250.—“Tuit le baron... s’accomer-ent que en un terre... fust en une fortresse qui fut bien garnie de gent, si qui se l Turfoisent saillies... cell tore fust ainsi come _barbaca_ (orig. ‘quai antemural’) de l’este.”—_The Mod. Fr. tr. of William of Tyre, ed. Paul Paris_, i. 158.

_c._ 1270.—“... on condition of his at once putting me in possession of the albarans tower... and should besides make his Saracens construct a _barbaca_ round the tower.”—_James of Aragon_, as above.

1309.—“Pour requerrer es gent plus muevemant, fis le roys faire une _barbagaune_ demandant le pont qui estoit entre nomous ou, et tel maniere que l’on posse entrer de dons pars en la _barbagaune_ a cheval.”—_Joinville_,
p. 162.

1552.—“_Lourenço de Brito ordered an_ intrenchment of great strength to be dug, in the fashion of a _barbican_ (barbacal) outside the wall of the fort... on account of a well, a stone-cast distant...”—_Barros_, ii. 1. 5.

_c._ 1870.—“_Barbacan_. Défense extérieure protégeant une entrée, et permettant de réunir un assez grand nombre d’hommes pour disposer des sortes ou protéger une retraite.”—_Viollet-le-Duc_, _H. d’une Forteresse_, 361.

BARBIERS, s. This is a term which was formerly very current in the East, as the name of a kind of paralysis, often occasioned by exposure to chills. It began with numbness and imperfect command of the power of movement, sometimes also affecting the muscles of the neck and power of Military History, Edinburgh, Blackwood, 1861.

articulation, and often followed by loss of appetite, emaciation, and death. It has often been identified with Beriberi, and medical opinion seems to have come back to the view that the two are forms of one disorder, though this was not admitted by some older authors of the last century. The allegation of Lind and others, that the most frequent subjects of beriberi were Europeans of the lower class who, when in drink, went to sleep in the open air, must be contrasted with the general experience that beriberi rarely attacks Europeans. The name now seems obsolete.

1675.—"When once follows Fluxes, Dropvy, Scorry, Barbiers (which is an enervating sic the whole Body, being neither able to use hands or Feet), Gout, Stone, Malignant and Putrid Fevers."—Fryer, 68.

1690.—"Another Distemper with which the Europeans are sometimes afflicted, is the Barbers, or a deprivation of the Vej and Activity of their Limbs, whereby they are rendered unable to move either Hand or Foot."—Owington, 350.

1755.—"(If the land wind blow on a person sleeping) the consequence of this is always dangerous, as it seldom fails to bring on a fit of the Barbiers (as it is called in this country), that is, a total deprivation of the use of the limbs."—Ikes, 77.

[c. 1757.—"There was a disease common to the lower class of Europeans, called the Barbiers, a species of palsy, owing to exposure to the land winds after a fit of intoxication."—In Cary, Good Old Days, ii. 286.]

1785.—"The barbiers, a species of palsy, is a disease most frequent in India. It distresses chiefly the lower class of Europeans, who when intoxicated with liquors frequently sleep in the open air, exposed to the land winds."—Land on Diseases of Hot Climates, 260. (See BERIBERI.)

BARGANY, BRAGANY, H. bdrak-ki. The name of a small silver coin current in W. India at the time of the Portuguese occupation of Goa, and afterwards valued at 40 reis (then about 5½d.). The name of the coin was apparently a survival of a very old system of coinage-nomenclature. Kani is an old Indian word, perhaps Dravidian in origin, indicating ¼ of ¼ or 1-64th part. It was applied to the jital (see JETUL) or 64th part of the medieval Delhi silver tanka—this latter coin being the prototype in weight and position of the Rupee, as the kani therefore was of the modern Anglo-Indian pice (= 1-64th of a Rupee). There were in the currency of Mohammed Tughlak (1324-1361) of Delhi, aliquot parts of the tanka, Dokani, Shaah-kanis, Hashi-kanis, Dvadasha-kanis, and Shikanda-kanis, representing, as the Persian numerals indicate, pieces of 2, 6, 8, 12, and 16 kanis or jital. (See E. Thomas, Patham Kings of Delhi, pp. 218-219.) Other fractional pieces were added by Firoz Shah, Mohammed's son and successor (see Id. 276 seqq. and quotation under c. 1360, below). Some of these terms long survived, e.g. do-kanis in localities of Western and Southern India, and in Western India in the present case the bdrok-dani or 12 kanis, a vernacular form of the dvadasha-kanis of Mohammed Tughlak.

1330.—"Thousands of men from various quarters, who possessed thousands of these copper coins ... now brought them to the treasury, and received in exchange gold tankas and silver tankas (Tanga), shash-kanis and daka-kanis, which they carried to their homes."—Turik-i-Firoz-Shahi, in Bilid, iii. 240-241.

c. 1380.—"Sultan Firoz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tanka and the silver tanka. There were also distinct coin of the respective values of 48, 25, 24, 12, 10, 8 and 6, and one jital, known as chikal-o-haski-kanis, bit-o-panigani, bit-o-chakr-kanis, dvadasha-kanis, daka-kanis, hash-kanis, phash-kanis, and yak jital."—Ibid. 387-393.

1510.—Barganyum, in quotation from Correa under Pardao.

1564.—"Es tangas brancas que se recebe dos foros, são de 4 bargany a tanga, e de 24 leaes o bargany, . . . i.e. "And the white tangas that are received in payment of land revenues are at the rate of 4 bargany to the tanga, and of 24 leaes to the bargany."—A. Nunes, in Subsidios, p. 31.

"Statement of the Revenues which the King our Lord holds in the Island and City of Guoa.

"Item—The Islands of Tipyary, and Divar, and that of Chordao, and Johão, all of them, pay in land revenue (de foro) according to ancient custom 36,474 white tangas, 3 barganias, and 21 leaes, at the rate of 3 barganias to the tanga and 24 leaes to the barganias, the same thing as 24 barssuros amounting to 14,006 pardao's, 1 tanga and 47 leaes, making 4,201,916½ reis. The isle of Tipyary (Balseete) is the largest, and on it stands the city of Guoa; the others are much smaller and are annexed to it, they being all contiguous, only separated by rivers."—Botelho, Tomo, ibid. pp. 46-7.

1584.—"They use also in Goa amongst the common sort to bargain for coals, wood, lime and such like, at so many braganias, accounting 24 bassudos for one bragania, albeit there is no such money stamped."—Barret, in Holk. ii. 411; (but it is copied from G. Balbi’s Italian, f. 71v).

BARGEER. s. H. from P. bâqry. A trooper of irregular cavalry who is not the owner of his troop horse and arms (as is the normal practice [see SILLADAR], but is either put in by another person, perhaps a native officer in the regiment, who supplies horses and arms and receives the man’s full pay, allowing him a reduced rate, or has his horse from the State in whose service he is. The P. word properly means ‘a load-taker,’ ‘a baggage horse.’ The transfer of use is not quite clear. [“According to a man’s reputation or connections, or the number of his followers, would be the rank (mamšad) assigned to him. As a rule, his followers brought their own horses and other equipment; but sometimes a man with a little money would buy extra horses, and mount relations or dependants upon them. When this was the case, the man riding his own horse was called, in later parlance, a nilaḥdar (literally, ‘equipment-holder’), and one riding somebody else’s horse was a bâqry (‘burden-taker.’)”—W. Irvine, The Army of the Indian Moghuls, J.R.A.S. July 1896, p. 530.]

1844.—“If the man again has not the cash to purchase a horse, he rides one belonging to a native officer, or to some privileged person, and becomes what is called a bârgeer . . .”—Cuttuta Rev., vol ii. p. 57.

BARKING-DEER, s. The popular name of a small species of deer (Cervulus aureus, Jerdon) called in H. kētkar, and in Nepal rāwād; also called Rūfaced-Deer, and in Bombay Bālkree. Its common name is from its call, which is a kind of short bark, like that of a fox but louder, and may be heard in the jungles which it frequents, both by day and by night. (Jerdon).

BARODA, n.p. Usually called by the Dutch and older English writers Brodera; proper name according to the Imp. Gazetteer, Wadodra; a large city of Guzerat, which has been since 1732 the capital of the Mahratta dynasty of Guzerat, the Gaikwarâ. (See GUICOWAR).

1555.—“In a few days we arrived at Barri; some days after at Balodura, and then took the road towards Champatt (read Champanty).”—Sidi ‘Alt, p. 91.

1669.—“That city (Champavel) may be a day’s journey from Debaradora or Barodar, which we commonly call Verdora.”—Coute, IV. ix. 5.

[1614.—“We are to go to Amadavari, Cambia and Brothers.”—Foster, Letters, ii. 218; also see iv. 197.]

1813.—Brodara, in Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 268; [2nd ed. ii. 282, 389].

1857.—“The town of Baroda, originally Barpatra (or a bear leaf, i.e. leaf of the Picea indica, in shape), was the first large city I had seen.”—Auto. of Lutfullah, 39.

BAROS, n.p. A fort on the West Coast of Sumatra, from which the chief export of Sumatra camphor, so highly valued in China, long took place. [The name in standard Malay is, according to Mr Skeat, Barus.] It is perhaps identical with the Fanisār or Fansār of the Middle Ages, which gave its name to the Fansārī camphor, famous among Oriental writers, and which by the perpetuation of a mis-reading is often styled Kasārī camphor, &c. (See CAMPHOR, and Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 282, 285 seqq.) The place is called Barrowse in the E. I. Colonial Papers, ii. 52, 153.

1727.—“Baros is the next place that abounds in Gold, Camphire, and Benzoin, but admits of no foreign Commerce.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 118.

BARRACKPORE, n.p. The auxiliary Cantonment of Calcutta, from which it is 15 m. distant, established in 1772. Here also is the country residence of the Governor-General, built by Lord Minto, and much frequented in former days before the annual migration to Simla was established. The name is a hybrid. (See ACHANOOK).

BARRAMUHUL, n.p. H. Bra-maḥall, ‘Twelve estates’; an old designation of a large part of what is now the district of Salem in the Madras Presidency. The identification of the Twelve Estates is not free from difficulty; [see a full note in Le Fanu's Man. of Salem, i. 83, seqq.].

1881.—"The Baramahal and Dindigal was placed under the Government of Madras; but owing to the deficiency in that Presidency of civil servants possessing a competent knowledge of the native languages, and to the unsatisfactory manner in which the revenue administration of the older possessions of the Company under the Madras Presidency had been conducted, Lord Cornwallis resolved to employ military officers for a time in the management of the Baramahal."—Athurbok, Mem. of Sir T. M.'soro, xxxviii.

BASHAW. a. The old form of what we now call pasha, the former being taken from báshá, the Ar. form of the word, which is itself generally believed to be a corruption of the P. padisháh. Of this the first part is Skt. páti, Zend. páti, Old P. páti, 'a lord or master' (comp. Gr. seirwmyr). Pechah, indeed, for 'Governor' (with the ch guttural) occurs in I. Kings x. 16, II. Chron. ix. 14, and in Daniel iii. 2, 3, 27. Prof. Max Müller notices this, but it would seem merely as a curious coincidence.—(See Pusey on Daniel, 567.)

"Great kings of Barbary and my portly bassas.

Marinos, Tamburlaine the Great, 1st Part, iii. 1.

c. 1590.—"Filius alter Osmanis, Vrchanis frater, alium non habet in Annalibus titulum, quam Alis bassas : quod bassas vocabulum Turcis caput significat."—Lemnclavvus, Annales Sultanorum Othmanidarum, ed. 1650, p. 402. This etymology connecting bassad with the Turkish báshá, 'head,' must be rejected.

c. 1610.—"Un Bassá estoit venu en sa Cour pour luy rendre compte du tribut qu'il luy apportoit; mais il fut neuf mois entiers à attendre que celui qui a la charge . . . . eut le temps et le loisir de le compter . . . . El Pyramid de Laval (of the Great Mogul), ii. 101.

1702.—"The most notorious injustices we have suffered from the Arabs of Muscat, and the Bashaw of Judda."—In Wheeler, ii. 7.

1727.—"It (Bagdad) is now a prodigious large City, and the Seat of a Beglerbeg . . . . The Bashaws of Basora, Comera, and Muwil (the ancient Nineveh) are subordinate to him."—A. Hamilton, i. 78.

BASIN, s. H. bason. Pease-meal, generally made of Gram (q. v.) and used, sometimes mixed with ground orange-peel or other aromatic substances, to cleanse the hair, or for other toilette purposes.

[1832.—"The attendants present first the powdered pea, called basun, which answers the purpose of soap."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 228.]

BASSADORE, n.p. A town upon the island of Khaim in the Persian Gulf, which belonged in the 16th century to the Portuguese. The place was ceded to the British Crown in 1817, though the claim now seems dormant. The permission for the English to occupy the place as a naval station was granted by Saiyyid Sultan bin Ahmad of 'Omán, about the end of the 18th century; but it was not actually occupied by us till 1821, from which time it was the depot of our Naval Squadron in the Gulf till 1882. The real form of the name is, according to Dr. Badger's transliterated map (in H. of Imáns, dc. of Omán), Básdá.

1673.—"At noon we came to Bassatu, an old ruined town of the Portuguese, fronting Congo."—Fryer, 320.

BASSEIN, n.p. This is a corruption of three entirely different names, and is applied to various places remote from each other.

(1) Wadá, an old port on the coast, 26 m. north of Bombay, called by the Portuguese, to whom it long pertained, * Başalim* (e.g. Barros, i. ix. 1).

1756.—"Bandar Bassii".—Miral-i-Ahmad, Bird's tr., 129.

1781.—"General Goddard after having taken the fortress of Basaid, which is one of the strongest and most important fortresses under the Mahrratta power . . . ."—Seir Mutaquerin, iii. 327.

(2) A town and port on the river which forms the westernmost delta-arm of the Irawadi in the Province of Pegu. The Burmese name Báthein, was, according to Prof. Forchhammer, a change, made by the Burmese conqueror Alompra, from the former name Kutohein (i.e. Kusin), which was a native corruption of the old name Kusima (see COSMIN). We cannot explain the old European corruption Persam. [It has been supposed that the name represents the Besima of Ptolemy (Geog. ii. 4; see M'Crie in Ind. Ant. xiii. 372); but (ibid. xxii. 20) Col. Temple denies this on the ground that the name Bassein does not date earlier than about 1780. According to the same authority (ibid. xxii. 19), the modern Burmese name is Patheng, by ordinary phonetics used for Putheng, and spelt Pusin or Pusim. He disputes the statement that the change of name was made by Alaungp'aya or Alampra. The Talang pronunciation of the name is Pasem or Pusim, according to dialect.]

[1801.—“An ineffectual attempt was made to repose and defend Bassein by the late Chekey or Lieutenant.”—Synes, Mission, 16.] The form Persam occurs in Dalmynpe, (1759) (Or. Repert., i. 127 et passim).

(3) Basil, or properly Wadim; an old town in Berar, the chief place of the district so-called. [See Berar Gazett. 176.]

BATAVAR, s. This is a term applied to divinities in old Javanese inscriptions, &c., the use of which was spread over the Archipelago. It was regarded by W. von Humboldt as taken from the Skt. avatara (see AVATAR); but this derivation is now rejected. The word is used among R. C. Christians in the Philippines now as synonymous with ‘God’; and is applied to the infant Jesus (Bhutanitriti, Vocabular). [Mr. Skeat (Malay Magic, 96 seqq.) discusses the origin of the word, and prefers the derivation given by Favre and Wilkin, Skt. bhatatra, ‘lord.’ A full account of the “Pedara, or Sea Dyak gods,” by Arch-deacon J. Perham, will be found in Roth, Native of Sarawak, I. 168 seqq.]

BATAVIA, n.p. The famous capital of the Dutch possessions in the Indies; occupying the site of the old city of Jakarta, the seat of a Javanese kingdom which combined the present Dutch Provinces of Batang, Buitenzorg, Krang, and the Preanger Regencies.

1619.—“On the day of the capture of Jakarta, 30th May 1619, it was certainly time and place to speak of the Governor-General’s dissatisfaction that the name of Batavia had been given to the Castle.”—Valentijn, iv. 489.

The Governor-General, Jan Pietersen Coen, who had taken Jakarta, desired to have called the new fortress New Hoorn, from his own birth-place, Hoorn, on the Zuider Zee.

c. 1649.—“While I stay’d at Batavia, my Brother dy’d; and it was pretty to consider what the Dutch made me pay for his Funeral.”—Tavernier (E.T.), i. 203.

BATOUUL, BATOOLE, BATE- CALA, &c., n.p. Bhaktal. A place often named in the older narratives. It is on the coast of Canara, just S. of Pigeon Island and Hog Island, in lat. 13° 59’, and is not to be confounded (as it has been) with BEITCUL.

1828.—“... there is also the King of Batigala, but he is of the Sasaena.”—Friar Jordanus, p. 41.

1510.—The “Batigala, a very noble city of India,” of Varthema (119), though misplaced, must we think be this place and not Beitcoul.

1548.—“Tredado (i.e. ‘Copy’) do Contrato que o Governador Gracia de Saa fez com a Raynha de Batecalas por não aver Reexy e ela reger o Reexynos.”—In S. Bolcho, Tombo, 242.

1599.—“... part is subject to the Queen of Baticula, who sellett great store of pepper to the Portugals, at a towns called Onor...”—Sir Fulke Greville to Sir Fr. Walsingham, in Bruce’s Annals, i. 125.

1618.—“The fift of March we anchored at Batachela, shooting three Pescos to give notice of our arrival...”—Wm. Hore, in Purchas, i. 657. See also Sainsbury, ii. p. 374.

BATEL, BATELO, BOTELLA, s. A sort of boat used in Western India, Sind, and Bengal. Port. batel, a word which occurs in the Roteiro de V. da Gama, 91 [cf. PATTELLO].
the existence of the European military term bdt or bdt-money. The latter is from bdt, 'a pack-saddle,' [Late Lat. bauda], and implies an allowance for carrying baggage in the field. It will be seen that one writer below seems to confound the two words.

b. H. batta and batta: ago, or difference in exchange, discount on coins not current, or of short weight. We may notice that Sir H. Elliot does not recognize an absolute separation between the two senses of Battà. His definition runs thus: "Difference of exchange; anything extra; an extra allowance; discount on uncurren t, or short-weight coins; usually called Battà." The word has been supposed to be a corruption of Bharta, increase, but it is a pure Hindi vocable, and is more usually applied to discount than to premium."—[Supp. Gloss. i. 41.]

a. H. bhata or bhaida: an extra allowance made to officers, soldiers, or other public servants, when in the field, or on other special grounds; also subsistence money to witnesses, prisoners, and the like. Military Battà, originally an occasional allowance, as defined, grew to be a constant addition to the pay of officers in India, and constituted the chief part of the excess of Indian over English military emoluments. The question of the right to batta on several occasions created great agitation among the officers of the Indian army, and the measure of economy carried out by Lord William Bentinck when Governor-General (G. O. of the Gov.-Gen. in Council, 28th November 1828) in the reduction of full batta to half batta, in the allowances received by all regimental officers serving at stations within a certain distance of the Presidency in Bengal (viz. Barrackpore, Dumdum, Berhampore, and Dina-apore) caused an enduring bitterness against that upright ruler.

It is difficult to arrive at the origin of this word. There are, however, several Hindi words in rural use, such as bhatt, bhatta, 'advances made to ploughmen without interest,' and bhattach, bhantia, 'ploughmen's wages in kind,' with which it is possibly connected. It has also been suggested, without much probability, that it may be allied to bahut, 'much, excess,' an idea entering into the meaning of both a and b. It is just possible that the familiar military use of the term in India may have been influenced by the existence of the European military term bdt or bdt-money.
of full-batta to half-batta is spoken of by Correa (iv. 356). The mantimento had been paid all the year round, but the Governor, Martin Afonso de Sousa, in 1542, "desiring," says the historian, "a way to curry favour for himself, whilst going against the people and sending his soul to hell," ordered that in future the mantimento should be paid only during the 6 months of Winter (i.e. of the rainy season), when the force was on shore, and not for the other 6 months when they were on board the cruisers, and received rations. This created great bitterness, perfectly analogous in depth and in expression to that entertained with regard to Lord W. Bentinck and Sir John Malcolm, in 1839. Correa's utterance, just quoted, illustrates this, and a little lower down he adds: "And thus he took away from the troops the half of their mantimento (half their batta, in fact), and whether he did well or ill in that, he'll find in the next world."—See also ibid. p. 430.

1502.—"The Captain-major . . . between officers and men-at-arms, left 60 men (at Cochín), to whom the factor was to give their pay, and every month a cruzado of mantimento, and to the officers when on service 2 cruzados . . ."—Correa, i. 328.

1507.—(In establishing the settlement at Mozambique) "And the Captains took counsel among themselves, and from the money in the chest, paid the force each a cruzado a month for mantimento, with which the men greatly refreshed themselves . . ."—Ibid. 786.

1511.—"All the people who served in Malaca, whether by sea or by land, were paid their pay for six months in advance, and also received monthly two cruzados of mantimento, cash in hand" (i.e. they had double batta).—Ibid. ii. 287.

1548.—"And for 2 faraoes (see FARASH) 2 parados a month for the two and 4 tanyas for batta."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 223. The editor thinks this is for bata, i.e. padda. But even if so it is used exactly like batta or maintenance money. A following entry has: "To the constable 38,920 reis a year, in which is comprised maintenance (mantimento)."

1554.—An example of batees for rice will be found s. v. MOORAH.

The following quotation shows batee (or batty) used at Madras in a way that also indicates the original identity of batty, 'rice,' and batta, 'extra allowance':—

1680.—"The Peons and Tarryars (see TALLIAR) sent in quest of two soldiers who had deserted from the garrison returned with answer that they could not light of them, whereupon the Peons were turned out of service, but upon Verona's intercession were taken in again, and fined each one month's pay, and to repay the money paid them for batee . . ."—Pt. St. Geo. Con., Feb. 10. In Notes and Extas. No. iii. p. 3.

1707.—". . . that they would allow Batta or subsistence money to all that should desert us."—In Wheeler, ii. 63.

1785.—". . . orders were accordingly issued . . . that on the 1st January, 1786, the double batta should cease."—Caraccioli's Clive, iv. 160.

1790.—". . . batta, or as it is termed in England, Mts and forage money, which is here, in the field, almost double the peace allowance."—Munro's Narrative, p. 97.

1799.—"He would rather live on half-pay, in a garrison that could boast of a fixed court, than vegetate on full batta, where there was none."—Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 227.

The following shows Batty used for rice in Bombay:

—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 23.

1829.—"To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.—Sir, Is it understood that the Wives and daughters of officers on half batta are included in the order to mourn for the Queen of Wirmemberg; or will half-mourning be considered sufficient for them?"—Letter in above, dated 15th April 1829.

1857.—"They have made me a K.C.B. I may confess to you that I would much rather have a year's batta, such as the latter would enable me to leave this country a year sooner."—Sir Hope Grant, in Incidents of the Sepoy War.

1554.—"And gold, if of 10 mutes or 24 carats, is worth 10 cruzados the tael . . . if of 9 mutes, 9 cruzados; and according to whatever the mutes may be it is valued; but moreover it has its bata, i.e. its shroffage (carrafraygra) or agio (caibo) varying with the season."—A. Nunes, 40.

1680.—"The payment or receipt of Batta or Vatum upon the exchange of Pollicat for Madras pagodas prohibited, both coins being of the same Matt and weight, upon pain of forfeiture of 24 pagodas for every offence together with the loss of the Batta."—Pt. St. Geo. Con., Feb. 10. In Notes and Extas., p. 17.

1760.—"The Nabob receives his revenues in the sicles of the current year only . . . and all sicles of a lower date being essumed, like the coin of foreign provinces, only a merchandise, are bought and sold at a certain discount called bataa, which rises and falls like the price of other goods in the market. . . .—Pt. Wm. Cons., June 30, in Long, 216.

1510.—"...he immediately tells master that the batta, i.e. the exchange, is altered."—Williamson, V. M. 1. 203.

BATTAS, BATAKS, &c. n.p. [the latter, according to Mr. Skeat, being the standard Malay name]; a nation of Sumatra, noted especially for their singular cannibal institutions, combined with the possession of a written character of their own and some approach to literature.

c. 1430.—"In ejus insulae, quam dicunt Bathechee, parte, anthropophagi habitant . . . capita humana in theauris habitant, quae ex hostibus captis abecissae, eis carnibus recondunt, fiscue utunrum pro nummis."—Costi, in Poggius, De Var. Fort. lib. iv.

c. 1539.—"This Ambassador, that was Brother-in-law to the King of Battas ... brought him a rich Present of Wood of Aoles, Cambalas, and five quintals of Benjammon in flowers."—Cogan’s Prata, 15.

c. 1555.—"This Island of Sumatra is the first land wherein we know man’s flesh to be eaten by certain people which live in the mountains, called Baceas [read Batas], who vae to glide their teeth."—Galvano, Discoveries of the World, Hak. Soc. 108.

1596.—"Nel regno del Dacin sono alcuni huoghi, ne’ quali si ritrovano certe genti, che mangiano le creature humane, e tali genti, si chiamano Bataocchi, e quando fra loro i padri, e i madri sono vecchi, si accorano i vicinati di mangiarli, e li mangiano."—C. Babi, f. 190.

1618.—"In the woods of the interior dwelt Anthropophagi, eaters of human flesh, and to the present day continues that abuse and evil custom among the Battas of Sumatra."—Godinho de Bredia, f. 22s.

Bawustye, s. Corr. of bobatay in Lascar dialect (Roebuck).

BAY, The, n.p. In the language of the old Company and its servants in the 17th century, The Bay meant the Bay of Bengal, and their factories in that quarter.

1689.—"And the Councell of the Bay is as expressly distinguished from the Council of Hugly, over which they have noe such power."—In Hages, under Sept. 24. [Hak. Soc. i. 114.]

1747.—"We have therefore laden on her 1784 Balas . . . which we sincerely wish may arrive safe with You, as We do that the Gentlemen at the Bay had according to our repeated Requests, furnished us with an earlier conveyance . . ."—Letter from Ft. St. David, 2nd May, to the Court [MS. in India Office].

BAYA, s. H. baud [baya], the Weaver-bird, as it is called in books of Nat. Hist., Plocus Bava, Blyth (Fam. Pongilidae). This clever little bird is not only in its natural state the builder of these remarkable pendant nests which are such striking objects, hanging from eaves or palm-branches; but it is also docile to a singular degree in domestication, and is often exhibited by itinerant natives as the performer of the most delightful tricks, as we have seen, and as is detailed in a paper of Mr Blyth’s quoted by Jerdon. "The usual procedure is, when ladies are present, for the bird on a sign from its master to take a cardamom or sweatmeat in its bill, and deposit it between a lady’s lips. . . . A miniature cannon is then brought, which the bird loads with coarse grains of powder one by one . . . it next seizes and skilfully uses a small ramrod: and then takes a lighted match from its master, which it applies to the touch-hole." Another common performance is to scatter small beads on a sheet; the bird is provided with a needle and thread, and proceeds in the prettiest way to thread the beads successively. [The quotation from Abul Fazl shows that these performances are as old as the time of Akbar and probably older still.]

[c. 1590.—"The byaya is like a wild sparow but yellow. It is extremely intelligent, obedience and docile. It will take small coins from the hand and bring them to its master, and will come to a call from a long distance. Its nests are so ingeniously constructed as to defy the rivalry of clever artificers."—Ates (trans. Jarratt), iii. 122.]

1790.—"The young Hindu women of Banaras . . . wear very thin plates of gold, called tau’s, slightly fixed by way of ornament between the eyebrows, and when they pass through the streets, it is not uncommon for the youthful libertines, who amuse themselves with training Bayah’s, to give them a sign, which they understand, and to send them to pluck the pieces of gold from the foreheads of their mistresses."—Asiat. Researches, ii. 110.

[1813.—Forbes gives a similar account of the nests and tricks of the Baya.—Or. Mem., 2nd ed. i. 33.]
BAYADÈRE. a. A Hindu dancing-girl. The word is especially used by French writers, from whom it has been sometimes borrowed as if it were a genuine Indian word, particularly characteristic of the persons in question. The word is in fact only a Gallicized form of the Portuguese bailadeira, from bailar, to dance. Some 50 to 60 years ago there was a famous ballet called Le dieu et la bayadère, and under this title Punch made one of the most famous hits of his early days by presenting a cartoon of Lord Ellenborough as the Bayadère dancing before the idol of Somnath; [also see DANCING-GIRL].

1518.—"There also came to the ground many dancing women (sœothures bailadeiras) with their instruments of music, who make their living by that business, and these danced and sang all the time of the banquet . . . . "—Orzas, ii. 394.

1528.—"XLVII. The dancers and danceresses (bayadores & bayadeiras) who come to perform at a village shall first go and perform at the house of the principal man of the village" (Gencur, see GAUM).—Fournal de usos costume dos Gancuros e Lavadores de -raa Ilha de Goa, in Arch. Port. Or., fascic. 5, 132.

1596.—"The heathenish whore called Bailadiera, who is a dancer."—Litachiades, i. 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 284].

1599.—"In hac icone primum proponentur Inda Bailadiera, id est saltatrix, quas in publicis ludis aliqua solemnitasibus saltando spectaculum exhibet."—De Bry, Text to pl. xiv. in vol. ii. (also see p. 90, and vol. vii. 28), etc.

[c. 1676.—"All the Baladines of Gombroon were present to dance in their own manner according to custom."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 385.]

1782.—"Surate est renommé par ses Bayadères, dont le véritable nom est Dirdsâns: celui de Bayadères que nous leur donnons, vient du mot Bailadeiras, qui signifie en Portugais Danseuses."—Sonnerat, i. 7.

1794.—"The name of Bailadiers, we never heard applied to the dancing girls; or saw but in Baynal, and 'War in Asia,' by an Officer of Colonel Bailie's Detachment,' it being a corrupt Portuguese word."—Moor's Narrative of Little's Detachment, 356.

1825.—"This was the first specimen I had seen of the southern Bayadère, who differ considerably from the nath girls of northern India, being all in the service of different temples, for which they are purchased young."—Heber, ii. 190.

c. 1836.—"On one occasion a rumour reached London that a great success had been achieved in Paris by the performance of a set of Hindoo dancers, called Les Bayadères, who were supposed to be priestesses of a certain sect, and the London theatrical managers were at once on the qui vive to secure the new attraction . . . . My father had concluded the arrangement with the Bayadères before his brother managers arrived in Paris. Shortly afterwards, the Hindoo priestesses appeared at the Adelphi. They were utterly uninteresting, wholly unattractive. My father lost £2000 by the speculation; and in the family they were known as the 'Buy-em-dears' ever after."—Edmund Yates, Recollections, i. 29, 30 (1884).

BAYPAIRE, BEOPAREY, s. H. bepâri, and byopâri (from Skt. vyapârin); a trader, and especially a petty trader or dealer.

A friend long engaged in business in Calcutta (Mr. J. F. Ogilvy, of Gillanders & Co.) communicates a letter from an intelligent Bengalee gentleman, illustrating the course of trade in country produce before it reaches the hands of the European shipper:

1873.—". . . the enhanced rates . . . do not practically benefit the producer in a marked, or even in a corresponding degree; for the lion's share goes into the pockets of certain intermediate classes, who are the growth of the above system of business.

"Following the course of trade as it flows into Calcutta, we find that between the cultivators and the exporter these are: 1st. The Bepparee, or petty trader; 2nd. The Aurut-dar; * and 3rd. The Mahajun, interested in the Calcutta trade. As soon as the crops are cut, Bepparee appears upon the scene; he visits village after village, and goes from homestead to homestead, buying there, or at the village marts, from the ryots; he then takes his purchases to the Aurut-dar, who is stationed at a centre of trade, and to whom he is perhaps under advances, and from the Aurut-dar the Calcutta Mahajun obtains his supplies . . . for eventual despatch to the capital. There is also a fourth class of dealers called Phorees, who buy from the Mahajun and sell to the European exporter. Thus, between the cultivator and the shipper there are so many middlemen, whose participation in the trade involves a multiplication of profits, which goes a great way towards enhancing the price of commodities before they reach the shipper's hands."—Letter from Baboo Nobokaran Ghose. [Similar details for Northern India will be found in Hoey, Mon. Trade and Manufacturers of Lucknow, 59 seqq.]

BAZAAR, s. H. &c. From P. bāzār, a permanent market or street of shops. The word has spread westward into

* Aurut-dar is arhat-dār, from H. ārhat, 'agency'; phorees=H. phariya, 'a retailer.'
Arabic, Turkish, and, in special senses, into European languages, and eastward into India, where it has generally been adopted into the vernaculars. The popular pronunciation is bestr. In S. India and Ceylon the word is used for a single shop or stall kept by a native. The word seems to have come to S. Europe very early. F. Balducci Pegolotti, in his Mercantile Handbook (c. 1540) gives basara as a Genoese word for 'market-place' (Catthay, &c. ii. 286). The word is adopted into Malay as pasar, [or in the poems pasar].

1474.—Ambrose Contarini writes of Kazan, that it is "walled like Como, and with basars (bazarri) like it."—Ramusio, ii. f. 117.

1857.—"Lord, there is a honey bazar, repair thither."—Turnour's transl. of Mahanarso, 24.

1873.—"This, remarked my handsome Greek friend from Vienna, is the finest wife-basara in this part of Europe... Go a little way east of this, say to Ramonius, and you will find wife-basara completely undisguised, the ladies seated in their carriages, the youths filing by, and pausing before this or that beauty, to bargain with papa about the dower, under her very nose."—Frazer's Mag. N. S. vii. p. 617 (Vienna, by M. D. Cowans).

BDELLIUM, s. This aromatic gum-resin has been identified with that of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker, inhabiting the dry regions of Arabia and Western India; gugal of Western India, and mokl in Arabic, called in P. bo-i-jahdun (Jews' scent). What the Hebrew bdolah of the R. Phison was, which was rendered bdellium since the time of Josephus, remains very doubtful. Lassen has suggested musk as possible. But the argument is only this: that Dioscorides says some called bdellium μαδδάκον; that μαδδάκον perhaps represents Madalaka, and though there is no such Skt. word as madalaka, there might be madadaka, because there is madara, which means some perfume, no one knows what! (Ind. Alterth. i. 292.) Dr. Royle says the Persian authors describe the Bdeilium as being the product of the Doom palm (see Hindu Medicine, p. 90). But this we imagine is due to some ambiguity in the sense of mokl. [See the authorities quoted in Encycl. Bibl. a.v. Bdeilium which still leave the question in some doubt.]

BEADALA, n.p. Formerly a port of some note for native craft on the Râmnâd coast (Madura district) of the Gulf of Manar, Vadavuly in the Atlas of India. The proper name seems to be Vâdala, by which it is mentioned in Bishop Caldwell's Hist. of Tinnevelly (p. 235), [and which is derived from Tami. vaid, 'hunting,' and al, 'a banyan-tree' (Mad. Adm. Man. Gloss.)]

p. 953). The place was famous in the Portuguese History of India for a victory gained there by Martin Affonso de Sousa (Capitão Mór do Mar) over a strong land and sea force of the Zamorin, commanded by a famous Mahomedan Captain, whom the Portuguese called Paté Marcar, and the Tuhfat-al-Mujahidin calls 'Ali Ibrahim Markar, 15th February, 1538. Barros styles it “one of the best fought battles that ever came off in India.” This occurred under the viceroyalty of Nuno da Cunha, not of Stephen da Gama, as the allusions in Camões seem to indicate. Captain Burton has too hastily identified Beadala with a place on the coast of Malabar, a fact which has perhaps been the cause of this article (see Lusitânia, Commentary, p. 477).

c. 1570.—“And about this time Alee Ibrahim Murkar, and his brother-in-law Kunjee-Alee-Murkar, sailed out with 22 grubs in the direction of Kael, and arriving off Beadâla, they landed, leaving their grubs at anchor. . . . But destruction overtook them at the arrival of the Franks, who came upon them in their galliots, attacking and capturing all their grubs. Now this capture by the Franks took place in the latter part of the month of Shaban, in the year 944 [end of Jan. 1588].”—Tuhfat-al-Mujahidin, tr. by Rowlandson, 141.

Camões, x. 65.

By Burton (but whose misconception of the locality has here affected his translation):

“then well nigh reached the Cape 'olept Comorin, another wreath of Fame by him is won ;
the strongest squadron of the Samorim who doubted not to see the world undone,

Beadâla's self his martial yoke shall feel.”

1814.—“Validdâla, a pretty populous village on the coast, situated 13 miles east of Mutupetta, inhabited chiefly by Musulmans and Shânâres, the former carrying on a wood trade.”—Account of the Prov. of Ramnad, from Mackenzie Collections in J. R. As. Soc. iii. 170.

BEAR-TREE, BAIR, &c. s. H. ber, Mahr. bora, in Central Provinces bor, [Malay bedara or bidara China] (Skp. badara and vadara) Euphrasius juja-ba, Lam. This is one of the most widely diffused trees in India, and is found wild from the Punjab to Burma, in all which region it is probably native. It is cultivated from Queensland and China to Morocco and Guinea. “Sir H. Elliot identifies it with the lotus of the ancients, but although the large juicy product of the garden Euphrasius is by no means bed, yet, as Madden quaintly remarks, one might eat any quantity of it without risk of forgetting home and friends.”—(Punjab Plants, 43.)

1563.—“O. The name in Canarese is bor, and in the Decan ber, and the Malays call them bedara, and they are better than ours; yet not so good as those of Balagore . . . . which are very tasty.”—Garcia De O., 33

[1609.—“Here is also great quantity of gum-lack to be had, but is of the tree called ber, and is in grain like unto red mastic.”—Dunciens, Letters, i. 80.]

BEARER, s. The word has two meanings in Anglo-Indian colloquial: a. A palankin-carrier; b. (In the Bengal Presidency) a domestic servant who has charge of his master's clothes, household furniture, and (often) of his ready money. The word in the latter meaning has been regarded as distinct in origin, and is stated by Wilson to be a corruption of the Bengali vehâra from Skt. vyayvahâri, a domestic servant. There seems, however, to be no historical evidence for such an origin, e.g. in any habitual use of the term vehâra, whilst as a matter of fact the domestic bearer (or sirdar-bearer, as he is usually styled by his fellow-servants, often even when he has no one under him) was in Calcutta, in the penultimate generation when English gentlemen still kept palankins, usually just what this literally implies, viz. the head-man of a set of palankin-bearers. And throughout the Presidency the bearer, or valet, still, as a rule, belongs to the caste of Kahâri (see NUHâR), or palki-bearers. [See BOY.]
BEEBEE.

1782.—"... imposition that a gentleman should pay a rascal of a Sirdar Bearer monthly wages for 8 or 10 men... out of whom he gives 4, or may perhaps indulge his master with 6, to carry his palanquin."—India Gazette, Sept. 2.

c. 1815.—"Henry and his Bearer."—(Title of a well-known book of Mrs. Sherwood's.)

1878.—"My bearer who was to go with us (Eva's ayah had struck at the last moment and stopped behind) had literally girt up his loins, and was loading a diminutive mule with a miscellaneous assortment of brass pots and blankets."—A True Reformer, ch. iv.

BEEBEE, s. H. from P. bībī, a lady. [In its contracted form βι, it is added as a title of distinction to the names of Muslim ladies.] On the principle of degradation of titles which is so general, this word in application to European ladies has been superseded by the hybrids Mem-Sāhib, or Madam-Sāhib, though it is often applied to European maid-servants or other Englishwomen of that rank of life. [It retains its dignity as the title of the Bībī of Cananore, known as Bībī Valīya, Malayāl, 'great lady,' who rules in that neighbourhood and exercises authority over three of the islands of the Laccadives, and is by race a Moplah Mohammedan.] The word also is sometimes applied to a prostitute. It is originally, it would seem, Oriental Turki. In Pavet de Courtille's Dict. we have "Bībī, dame, épouse légitime" (p. 181). In W. India the word is said to be pronounced bōbo (see Burton's Sind). It is curious that among the Sākalāva of Madagascar the wives of chiefs are termed bībī; but there seems hardly a possibility of this having come from Persia or India. [But for Indian influence on the island, see Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. xv. 174.] The word in Hova means 'animal.'—(Sibree's Madagascar, p. 253.)

1879.—"I, Beebee Bales, the Princess of Cannanore and of the Laccadives Islands, &c., do acknowledge and give in writing that I will pay to the Government of the English East India Company the moiety of whatever is the produce of my country...—Engagement in Logen, Malabar, iii. 181.)

BEECH-DE-MER, s. The old trade way of writing and pronouncing the name, bicho-de-mar (borrowed from the Portuguese) of the sea-slug or holothuria, so highly valued in China. [See menu of a dinner to which the Duke of Connaught was invited, in Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. p. 247.] It is split, cleaned, dried, and then carried to the Straits for export to China, from the Maldives, the Gulf of... of Manar, and other parts of the Indian seas further east. The most complete account of the way in which this somewhat important article of commerce is prepared, will be found in the Tijdschrift voor Nederlandsch Indie, Jaarg, xvii. pt. i. See also SWALLOW and TRIPANG.

BEECHMÁN, also MECHILMÁN, s. Sea-H. for 'midshipman.' (Roebuck.)

BEENGH, s. H. bigā. The most common Hindu measure of land-area, and varying much in different parts of India, whilst in every part that has a bigā there is also certain to be a pucks beengh and a kutcha beengh (vide CUTCHA and PUCKA), the latter being some fraction of the former. The beengh formerly adopted in the Revenue Survey of the N.W. Provinces, and in the Canal Department there, was one of 3025 sq. yards or \( \frac{1}{4} \) of an acre. This was apparently founded on Akbar's beengh, which contained 3600 sq. Ilāh gā, of about 33 inches each. [For which see Ain, trans. Jarrett, ii. 62.] But it is now in official returns superseded by the English acre.

1763.—"I never seized a beenga or beeng (a bigā) belonging to Calcutta, nor have I ever impressed your gomastahs."—Nassoth Kāmin 'Ali, in Gleig's Mem. of Hastings, i. 129.

1828.—"A Begghah has been computed at one-third of an acre, but its size differs in almost every province. The smallest Begghah may perhaps be computed at one-third, and the largest at two-thirds of an acre."—Malcolm's Central India, ii. 15.

1877.—"The Resident was gratified at the low rate of assessment, which was on the general average eleven annas or 1s. 4d. per beengh, that for the Nizam's country being upwards of four rupees."—Meadows Taylor, Story of my Life, ii. 5.

BEENGUM, BEGUM, &c. s. A Princess, a Mistress, a Lady of Rank; applied to Mahomedan ladies, and in the well-known case of the Beegum Sumroo to the professedly Christian (native) wife of a European. The word appears to be Or. Turki. bigam, [which some connect with Skt. bhaga, 'lord,'] a feminine formation from Beg, 'chief, or lord,' like Kāmin from Kāmah; hence P. begam. [Beg appears in the early travellers as Beaga.]

[1617.—"Their Company that offered to rob the Beegum's junk."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 464.]

1619.—"Behind the girl came another Beegum, also an old woman, but lean and feeble, holding on to life with her teeth, as one might say."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 6.

1655.—"Begun, Reine, ou espouse du Schah."—De la Boullaye le Gous, 127.

[1708.—"They are called for this reason 'Beegum,' which means Free from Care or Solicitude" (as if P. be-ghām, 'without care!')—Catron, H. of the Mogul Dynasty in India, E. T., 287.]

1787.—"Among the charges (against Hastings) there is but one engaged, two at most—the Beegums's to Sheridan; the Rannee of Goheed (Gohud) to Sir James Erakine. So please your palate."—Ed. Burks to Sir G. Elliot, L. of Ld. Minto, i. 119.

BEEJOO, s. Or 'Indian badger,' as it is sometimes called, H. biyā [biyā]. Mellivora indicus, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 176.] It is also often called in Upper India the Grave-digger, [gorkhodo] from a belief in its bad practices, probably unjust.

BEER, s. This liquor, imported from England, and now largely made in the country, has been a favourite in India from an early date. Porter seems to have been common in the 18th century, judging from the advertisements in the Calcutta Gazette; and the Pale Ale made, it is presumed, expressly for the India market, appears in the earliest years of that publication. That expression has long been disused in India, and beer, simply, has represented the thing. Hodgson's at the beginning of this century, was the beer in almost universal use, replaced by Bass, and Allsopp, and of later years by a variety of other brands. [Hodgson's ale is immortalised in Bon Courage.] BEER, COUNTRY. At present, at least in Upper India, this expression simply indicates ale made in India (see COUNTRY) as at Masūri, Kasauli, and Ootacamund Breweries. But it formerly was (and in Madras perhaps still is) applied to ginger-beer, or to a beverage described in some of the quotations below, which must have become obsolete early in the last century. A drink of this nature called Sugar-beer was the ordinary drink at Batavia in the 17th century, and to its use some travellers ascribed the prevalent unhealthiness. This is probably what is described by Jacob Bontius in the first quotation:

1631.—There is a recipe given for a beer of this kind, "not at all less good than Dutch beer." Take a hoop'd cask of 30 amphoras (!), fill with pure river water; add 2lb. black Java sugar, 4oz. tamarinds, 3 lemons cut up, cork well and put in a cool place. After 14 hours it will boil as if on a fire." &c.—Hist. Nat. et Med. Indic. Orient., p. 8. We doubt the result anticipated.

1789.—"They use a pleasant kind of drink, called Country-beer, with their victuals; which is composed of toddy ... porter, and brown-sugar; is of a brisk nature, but when cooled with saltpetre and water, becomes a very refreshing draught."—M'Kar, Narrative, 42.

1810.—"A temporary beverage, suited to the very hot weather, and called Country-beer, is in rather general use, though water artificially cooled is commonly drunk during the repasts."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 122.

BEER-DRINKING. Up to about 1850, and a little later, an ordinary exchange of courtesies at an Anglo-Indian dinner-table in the provinces, especially a mess-table, was to ask a guest, perhaps many yards distant, to "drink beer" with you; in imitation of the English custom of drinking wine together, which became obsolete somewhat earlier. In Western India, when such an invitation was given at a mess-table, two tumblers, holding half a bottle each, were brought to the inviter, who carefully divided the bottle between the two, and then sent one to the guest whom he invited to drink with him.

1848.—"He ain't got distany manners, damny," Bragg observed to his first mate; "he wouldn't do at Goyverne, Roper, where his Lordship and Lady William was as kind to me . . . and asking me at dinner to take beer with him before the Commander-in-Chief himself . . ."—Vanity Fair, II. ch. xxii.

1858.—"First one officer, and then another, asked him to drink beer at mess, as a kind of tacit suspension of hostilities."—Oakfield, ii. 52.

BEETLEFAKEE, n.p. "In some old Voyages coins used at Mocha are so called. The word is Bait-ul-fakih, the 'Fruit-market,' the name of a bazar there." So C. P. Brown. The place is in fact the Coffee-mart of which Hodeida is the port, from which it is about 30 m. distant inland, and 4 marches north of Mocha. And the name is really Bait-ul-Fakih, 'The House of the Divine,' from the tomb of the Saint Ahmad Ibn Müsi, which was the nucleus of the place.—(See Ritter, xii. 872; see also BEETLE-FACKIE, Milburn, i. 96.)

1710.—"They daily bring down coffee from the mountains to Betel-faquy, which is not above 3 leagues off, where there is a market for it every day of the week."—(French) Voyage to Arabia the Happy, E. T., London, 1728, p. 99.

1770.—"The tree that produces the Coffee grows in the territory of Betal-faqu, a town belonging to Yemen."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 352.

BEGAR, BIGARRY, s. H. begār, from P. begār, 'forced labour' [be 'without', gār (for kār), 'one who works' ]; a person pressed to carry a load, or do other work really or professionally for public service. In some provinces begār is the forced labour, and bigārī the pressed man; whilst in Karnātā, begārī is the performance of the lowest village offices without money payment, but with remuneration in grain or land (Wilson). C. P. Brown says the word is Canarese; but the P. origin is hardly doubtful.

1519.—"It happened that one day sixty begārīs went from the Comorin side towards the fort loaded with oyster-shells."—Cust. Ind., Bk. V. ch. 38.

1525.—"The inhabitants of the villages are bound to supply begārīs who are workers."—Archiv. Port. Orient. Fasc. V. p. 126.

1555.—"Telling him that they fought like heroes and worked (at building the fort) like bygārīs."—Correa, iii. 625.

1554.—"And to 4 bygārīnās, who serve as water carriers to the Portuguese and others in the said intrenchment, 15 days a day to each. ..."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 78.

1673.—"Gowra, whither I took a Pilgrimage, with one other of the Factors, Four Peons, and Two Biggareens, or Porters only."—Fryer, 158.

1800.—"The bygārī system is not bearable: it must be abolished entirely."—Wellington, i. 244.

1815.—Aitchison's Indian Treaties, &c., contains under this year numerous annexus issued, in Nepal War, to Hill Chiefs, stipulating for attendance when required with begāreens and serpais."—ii. 389 seqq.

1882.—"The Malaula people were some time back ordered to make a practicable road, but they flatly refused to do anything of the kind, saying they had never done any begār labour, and did not intend to do any."—(Ref. wanting.)

BEHAR, n.p. H. Bhār. That province of the Mogul Empire which lay on the Ganges immediately above Bengal, was so called, and still retains the name and character of a province, under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and embracing the ten modern districts of Patna, Sāran, Gāya, Shāhābād, Tīrhūt, Champārān, the Santal Parganas, Bhāgalpūr, Monghyr, and Purniāh. The name was taken from the old city of Bhār, and that derived its title from being the site of a famous Vihāra in Buddhist times. In the later days of Mahommedan rule the three provinces of Bengal, Behar and Oṛisa were under one Subadar, viz. the Nawāb, who resided latterly at Mubreḩidābād.

BEITCUL, n.p. We do not know how this name should be properly written. The place occupies the isthmus connecting Carwar Head in Canara with the land, and lies close to the Harbour of Carwar, the inner part of which is Beston Cove.

1711.—"Ships may ride secure from the South West Monsoon at Batte Cove (qu. BATTECOLE !), and the River is navigable for the largest, after they have got in."—Lockyer, 272.

1727.—"The Portuguese have an Island called Anjediva [see ANCHEDIVA]... about two miles from Batocali."—A. Hamilton, ii. 125.

BELGAUM, n.p. A town and district of the Bombay Presidency, in the S. Mahatta country. The proper name is said to be Canarese Vennugratura, 'Bamboo-Town.' [The name of a place of the same designation in the Vizagapatam district in Madras is said to be derived from Skt. bila-grutra, 'cave-village.']—Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. s.v.)
The name occurs in De Barros under the form "Cidade de Bilgan" (Dec. IV., liv. vii. cap 5).

BENAMEE, adj. P.—H. be-nami, 'anonymous'; a term specially applied to documents of transfer or other contract in which the name entered as that of one of the chief parties (e.g. of a purchaser) is not that of the person really interested. Such transactions are for various reasons very common in India, especially in Bengal, and are not by any means necessarily fraudulent, though they have often been so. "There probably is no country in the world except India, where it would be necessary to write a chapter 'On the practice of putting property into a false name.'"—(Mayne, Hindu Law, 373.) In the Indian Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), sections 421-423, "on fraudulent deeds and dispositions of Property," appear to be especially directed against the dishonest use of this benami system.

It is alleged by C. P. Brown on the authority of a statement in the Friend of India (without specific reference) that the proper term is bandam, adopted from such a phrase as bandam chittki, 'a transferable note of hand,' such notes commencing, 'bo-nam-t-fudana,' 'to the name or address of' (Abraham Newlands). This is conceivably, and probably true, but we have not the evidence, and it is opposed to all the authorities: and in any case the present form and interpretation of the term benami has become established.

1854.—"It is very much the habit in India to make purchases in the name of others, and from whatever causes the practice may have arisen, it has existed for a series of years: and these transactions are known as 'Benames transactions'; they are noticed at least as early as the year 1778, in Mr. Justice Hyde's Notes."—Ld. Justice Knight Bruce, in Moore's Reports of Cases on Appeal before the P. C., vol. vi. p. 72.

"The presumption of the Hindu law, in a joint undivided family, is that the whole property of the family is joint estate... where a purchase of real estate is made by a Hindu in the name of one of his sons, the presumption of the Hindu law is in favour of its being a benamee purchase, and the burden of proof lies on the party in whose name it was purchased, to prove that he was solely entitled."—Note by the Editor of above Vol., p. 53.

1861.—"The decree Sale law is also one chief cause of that nuisance, the benamee system... It is a peculiar contrivance for getting the benefits and credit of property, and avoiding its charges and liabilities. It consists in one man holding land, nominally for himself, but really in secret trust for another, and by ringing the changes between the two... relieving the land from being..."
BENARES. n.p. The famous and holy city on the Ganges. H. Bundras from Skt. Varanasi. The popular Punjab etymology is from the names of the streams Varuna (mod. Barna) and Asi, the former a river of some size on the north and east of the city, the latter now a rivulet no longer in use. This origin is very questionable. The name, as that of a city, has been familiar to Sanskrit literature since b.c. 120. The Buddhist legends would carry it much further back, the name being in them very familiar.

c. 637.—"The Kingdom of Po-lo-mes (Varkandi Benaor) is 4000 li in compass. On the west the capital adjoins the Ganges..."—Hioen Thang, in Pol. Boudh. ii. 254.

c. 1020.—"If you go from Bari on the banks of the Ganges, in an easterly direction, you come to Ajodh, at the distance of 25 parasangs; thence to the great Benares (Bundras) about 20."—Al-Birist, in Elliot, i. 58.

1665.—"Banaras is a large City, and handsomely built; the most part of the Houses being either of Brick or Stone... but the inconvenience is that the Streets are very narrow."—Taylor, E. T., ii. 52; [ed. Ball, i. 118. He also uses the forms Benares and Banaros, Ibid. ii. 182, 225].

BENCOOLEN, n.p. A settlement on the West Coast of Sumatra, which long pertained to England, viz. from 1655 to 1824, when it was given over to Holland in exchange for Malacca, by the Treaty of London. The name is a corruption of Malay Bangkoulou, and it appears as Mangkoulu or Winkouled in Pauthier’s Chinese geographical quotations, of which the date is not given (Marc. Pol., p. 556, note). The English factory at Bencooleen was from 1714 called Fort Marlborough.

1501.—"Benoulou" is mentioned among the ports of the East Indies by Amerigo Vespucci in his letter quoted under BAGNORE.

1690.—"We... were forced to bear away to Benouef, another English Factory on the same Coast... It was two days before I went ashore, and then I was improntued by the Governor to stay there, to be Gunner of the Fort."—Dampier, i. 512.

1727.—"Benoolone is an English colony, but the European inhabitants not very numerous."—A. Hamilton, ii. 114.

1788.—"It is nearly an equal absurdity, though upon a smaller scale, to have an establishment that costs nearly 40,000l. at Benooolen, to facilitate the purchase of one cargo of pepper."—Cornwallis, i. 390.

BENDAMOEER, n.p. Pers. Bandamir. A popular name, at least among foreigners, of the River Kur (Arazes) near Shiraz. Properly speaking, the word is the name of a dam constructed across the river by the Amir Fanah Khusruh, otherwise called Aded-ud-daulah, a prince of the Buweil family (a.d. 965), which was thence known in later days as the Band-i-Amir, "The Prince’s Dam." The work is mentioned in the Geog. Dict. of Yakut (c. 1220) under the name of Sikru Fannau-Khusra Khwurah and Kirdu Fanah Khusra (see Barb. Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, 313, 480). Fryer repeats a rimarole that he heard about the miraculous formation of the dam or bridge by Band Hamero (!) a prophet, "wherefore both the Bridge and the Plain, as well as the River, by Boterus is corruptly called Bindamir" (Fryer, 258).

c. 1475.—"And from thence, a daies journey, ye come to a great bridge upon the Byndamir, which is a notable great ryver. This bridge the said Salomon caused to be made."—Barbaro (Old E. T.), Hak. Soc. 80.

1621.—"... having to pass the Kur by a longer way across another bridge called Bend’ Emir, which is as much as to say the Tie (ligatura), or in other words the Bridge, of the Emir, which is two leagues distant from Chehil minar... and which is so called after a certain Emir Hamza the Dilemite who built it... Fra Filippo Ferrari, in his Geographical Etymos, attributes the name of Bendemir to the river, but he is wrong, for Bendemir is the name of the bridge and not of the river."—P. della Valle, ii. 284.
1868.—"It is best to observe, vue le commun People appelle le Bend-Emir en cet endroit ab pulsen, c'est à dire le Fieux du Pont Neuf; qu'on ne l'appele par son nom de Bend-Emir que proche de la Digue, qui lui a fait donner ce nom."—Chardin (ed.
1711), ix. 45.

1869.—"We proceeded three miles farther, and crossing the River Bend-Emir, entered the real plain of Mandash."—Morier (First Journey), 124. See also (1811) 2nd Journey, pp. 78-74, where there is a view of the Band-Amir.

1813.—"The river Bund Emeer, by some anient Geographers called the Cyropolis," takes its present name from a dyke (in Persian a bund) erected by the celebrated Ameer Azad-a-Doolah Delami."—Macdonald Kinnie, Geog. Mem. of the Persian Empire, 59.

1817.—*
"There's a bower of roses by Bendameer's stream,
And the nightingale sings round it all the day long."—Lalla Rookh.

1850.—"The water (of Lake Neyris) . . . is almost entirely derived from the Kur (known to us as the Bund Amir River) . . ."
—Abbott, in J.R.G.S., xxv. 73.

1876.—We do not know whether the Band-i-Amir is identical with the quasisynonymous Pul-i-Kham by which Col.
Magregor crossed the Kur on his way from Shiras to Yezd. See his Khorasan, i. 45.

BENDÁRA, s. A term used in the Malay countries as a title of one of the higher ministers of state—Malay bandahara, Jav. bendari, 'Lord.' The word enters into the numerous series of purely honorary Javanese titles, and the etiquette in regard to it is very complicated. (See Tijdscr. v.
Nederl. Indie, year viii. No. 12, 253 seqq.). It would seem that the title is properly bandarâ, 'a treasurer,' and taken from the Skt. bhândâra, 'a steward or treasurer.' Haex in his Malay-Latin Dict. gives Bandâra, 'Oeconomus, quaeator, expenditor.'
[Mr. Skeat writes that Clifford derives it from Benda-hara-an, 'a treasury,' which he again derives from Malay benha, 'a thing,' without explaining bara, while Wilkinson with more probability classes it as Skt.]

1509.—"Whilst Sequeira was consulting with his people over this matter, the King sent his Bendâra or Treasure-Master on board."—Valentijn, v. 322.

1589.—"There the Bandara (Bendara) of mandment of Pedro de Faria for to entertain

1613.—"This administration (of Malaca) is provided for a three years' space with a governor ... and with royal officers of revenue and justice, and with the native Bendara in charge of the government of the lower class of subjects and foreigners."
—Godinho de Eredia, 68.

1631.—"There were in Malaco five principal officers of dignity ... the second is it is the custom that the eldest bintara should have green shades before his eyes, that he may not be dazzled by the greatness of the Raja, and forget his duty) brought the books and packets, and delivered them to the bintara with the black bòrî, from whose hands the Raja received them, one by one, in order to present them to the youths."—A Malay's account of a visit to Govt. House, Calcutta, tranal. by Dr. Leyden

1883.—"In most of the States the reigning prince has regular officers under him, chief among whom ... the Bandahara or treasurer, who is the first minister. ...—Miss

BENDY-TREE.

This, according to Sir G. Birdwood, is the Theopaea populnea, Lam. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 45 sqq.], and gives a name to the 'Bendy Basar' in Bombay. (See PORTIA.)

BENGAL, n.p. The region of the Ganges Delta and the districts immediately above it; but often in English use with a wide application to the whole territory garrisoned by the Bengal army. This name does not appear, so far as we have been able to learn, in any Mahommaded or Western writing before the latter part of the 13th century. In the earlier part of that century the Mahommaded writers generally call the province Lakhanatoi, after the chief city, but we have also the old form Bang, from the indigenous Vanga. Already, however, in the 11th century we have it as Vangalam on the Inscription of the great Tanjore Pagoda. This is the oldest occurrence that we can cite.

The alleged City of Bengal of the Portuguese which has greatly perplexed geographers, probably originated with the Arab custom of giving an important foreign city or seaport the name of the country in which it lay (compare the city of Solimandala, under OBOMANDEL). It long kept a place in maps. The last occurrence that we know of is in a chart of 1743, in Dalrymple's Collection, which identifies it with Chittagong, and it may be considered certain that Chittagong was the place intended by the older writers (see Varthema and Ovington). The former, as regards his visiting Banghella, deals in fiction—a thing clear from internal evidence, and expressly alleged, by the judicious Garcia de Orta: "As to what you say of Ludovico Vartomano, I have spoken, both here and in Portugal, with men who knew him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and then reverted to us, doing penance for his sins; and that the man never went further than Calecut and Cochín."—Colloquios, f. 30.

1345.—"... we were at sea 43 days and then arrived in the country of Bangala, which is a vast region abounding in rice. I have seen no country in the world where provisions are cheaper than in this; but it is muggy, and those who come from Khorasan call it 'a hell full of good things.'"—Ibn Batuta, iv. 211. (But the Emperor Aurungzebe is alleged to have 'emphatically styled it the Paradise of Nations.'—Note in Savoniorus, i. 291.)

1510.—"We took the route towards the city of Banghella... one of the best that I had hitherto seen."—Varthema, 210.
1516.—"... the Kingdom of Bengal, in which there are many towns. ... Those of the interior are inhabited by Gentiles subject to the King of Bengal, who is a Moor; and the seaports are inhabited by Moors and Gentiles, amongst whom there is much trade and much shipping to many parts, because this sea is a gulf ... and at its inner extremity there is a very great city inhabited by Moors, which is called Bengal, with a very good harbour."—Barboza, 178-9.

c. 1690.—"Bengaleh originally was called Bung; it derived the additional at from that being the name given to the mounds of earth which the ancient Raja's caused to be raised in the low lands, at the foot of the hills."—Ayen Abbey, tr. Gladstone, ii. 4 (ed. 1800); [tr. Jarrett, ii. 120].

1690.—"Arreacon ... is bounded on the North-West by the Kingdom of Bengal, some Authors making Chitagam to be its first Frontier City; but Teixeira, and generally the Portuguese Writers, reckon that as a City of Bengal; and not only so, but place the City of Bengal it self ... more South than Chitagam. Tho' I confess a late French Geographer has put Bengal into his Catalogue of imaginary Cities."—Cowper, 554.

BENGAL, a. This was also the designation of a kind of piece-goods exported from that country to England, in the 17th century. But long before, among the Moors of Spain, a fine muslin seems to have been known as albengalas, surviving in Spanish albengala. (See Deysey and Eng. s. v.) [What were called "Bengal Stripes" were striped gingham brought first from Bengal and first made in Great Britain at Paisley. (Draper's Dict. s. v.) So a particular kind of silk was known as a Bengal wound, because it was "rolled in the rude and artless manner immemorially practised by the natives of that country." (Milburn, in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. 3, 186.) See N.E.D. for examples of the use of the word as late as Lord Macaulay.]

1696.—"... it is granted that Bengal and stain'd Callicoes, and other East India Goods, do hinder the Consumption of Norwich stuffs ..."—Davenant, An Essay on the East India Trade, 31.

BENGAL, s. This is or was also applied in Portuguese to a sort of cane carried in the army by sergeants, &c. (Bluteau).

BENGALIEE, n.p. A native of Bengal [Baboo]. In the following early occurrence in Portuguese, Bengal is used:

1552.—"... in the defence of the bridge died three of the King's captains and Tsam Bandam, to whose charge it was committed, a Bengali (Bengala) by nation, and a man sagacious and crafty in stratagems rather than a soldier (cavaliere)."—Barroso, II., vi. iii.

[1610.—"Bengasalys." See quotation from Teixeira under BANKSHALL.]

A note to the Seir Mutaghorin quotes a Hindustani proverb: Bengali indgá, Kashmiri hagíri, i.e., 'The Bengalees is ever an entangler, the Cashmerees without religion.'

[1699.—"Two Bengalies here of Council."—Hedge, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ocvvii.]

BENIGHTED, THE, adj. An epithet applied by the denizens of the other Presidencies, in facetious disparagement to Madras. At Madras itself "all Carnatic fashion" is an habitual expression among older English-speaking natives, which appears to convey a similar idea. (See MADRAS, NULL.)

1660.—"... to ye Londe of St Thomas. It ye ane darke Londe, & ther dwelten ye Cimmerians whereof speaketh Membruus. Pesto in hys Odyssey & to thy Daye they cipen Cimmeris, or de Berytes folk."—Fra Grangier, Colle, vol. ii. Fragment of Sir J. Maudendorf, from a MS. lately discovered.

BENJAMIN, BENZOIN, &c., s. A kind of incense, derived from the resin of the Styrax benzoin, Dryander, in Sumatra, and from an undetermined species in Siam. It got from the Arab traders the name luban-şaw, i.e., "Java Frankincense," corrupted in the Middle Ages into such forms as we give. The first syllable of the Arabic term was doubtless taken as an article—lo benzoi, whence benzio, benzoin, and so forth. This etymology is given correctly by De Orta, and by Valentijn, and suggested by Barboza in the quotation below. Spanish forms are benjui, menjui; Modern Port. bejooim, bejowim; Ital. belsino, &c. The terms Jawa, Javo, Javo were applied by the Arabs to the Malay countries generally (especially BERBERYN, BARBERYN, n.p.
Otherwise called Beruwala, a small port with an anchorage for ships and a considerable coasting trade, in Ceylon, about 35 m. south of Columbo.

BERBERI, a. An acute disease, obscure in its nature and pathology, generally but not always presenting dyspical symptoms, as well as paralytic weakness and numbness of the lower extremities, with oppressed breathing. In cases where debility, oppression, anxiety and dyspepsia are extremely severe, the patient sometimes dies in 6 to 30 hours. Though recent reports seem to refer to this disease as almost confined to natives, it is on record that, in 1796, in Trincomalee, 300 Europeans died of it.

The word has been alleged to be Singhalase barvi [the Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. s. v. gives barviri], ‘debility.’ This kind of reduplication is really a common Singhalase practice. It is also sometimes alleged to be a W. Indian Negro term; and other worthless guesses have been made at its origin. The Singhalese origin is on the whole most probable [and is accepted by the N.E.D.]. In the quotations from Bonitus and Bluteau, the disease described seems to be that formerly known as Barbiers. Some authorities have considered these diseases as quite distinct, but Sir Joseph Fayrer, who has had attention to berberi and written upon it (see The Practitioner, January 1877), regards Barbiers as “the dry form of Beri-beri,” and Dr. Lodewijks, quoted below, says briefly that “the Barbiers of some French writers is incontestably the same disease.”

On benjuy or benerva (“of Sowa”), see De Orza, f. 29, 30, 31. And on benjuy or mandulle or mandalato (mandole) (“of almond”) l.d. 80v.

* Ermanus or Kurnian in Malay and Javanese.
it is necessary to remark that the use of the term Barbiers is by no means confined to French writers, as a glance at the quotations under that word will show). The disease prevails endemically in Ceylon, and in Peninsular India in the coast-tracts, and up to 40 or 60 m. inland; also in Burma and the Malay region, including all the islands, at least so far as New Guinea, and also Japan, where it is known as kakki: [see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 238 seqq.]. It is very prevalent in certain Madras Jails. The name has become somewhat old-fashioned, but it has recurred of late years, especially in hospital reports from Madras and Burma. It is frequently epidemic, and some of the Dutch physicians regard it as infectious. See a pamphlet, Beriberi door J. A. Lodewijks, ond. officier van Gezondheid bij het Ned. Indische Leger, Harderwijk, 1882. In this pamphlet it is stated that in 1879 the total number of beri-beri patients in the military hospitals of Netherlands-India, amounted to 9873, and the deaths among these to 1882. In the great military hospitals at Achipa there died of beri-beri between 1st November 1879, and 1st April 1880, 574 persons, of whom the great majority were divanagarbeiders, i.e. 'forced labourers.' These statistics show the extraordinary prevalence and fatality of the disease in the Archipelago. Dutch literature on the subject is considerable.

Sir George Birdwood tells us that during the Persian Expedition of 1857 he witnessed beri-beri of extraordinary virulence, especially among the East African stokers on board the steamers. The sufferers became dropically distended to a vast extent, and died in a few hours.

In the second quotation scurvy is evidently meant. This seems much allied by cause to beriberi though different in character.

[1568.—"Our people sickened of a disease called berbere, the belly and legs swell, and in a few days die, as there died many, ten or twelve a day."—Conto, vili. ch. 25.]

c. 1610.—"Ce ne fut pas tout, car l'ceu encoor ceste fasesheuse maladie de louende que les Portugais appellent autrement berber et les Hollandais scurbut."—Moojenet, 221.

1831.—"... Constat frequenti illorum usu, praeertim liquoris aquae dicto, non solum diabetas... sed et paralysis. Beriberi dictam hinc natam esse."—Vac. Bostii, Dial. iv. See also Lib. ii. cap. iii., and Lib. iii. p. 40.

1859.—"There is also another sickness which prevails in Banda and Ceylon, and is called Barbier; it does not vex the natives so much as foreigners."—Sarr, 37.

1892.—"The Indian and Portuguese women draw from the green flowers and cloves, by means of firing with a still, a water or spirit of marvellous sweet smell... especially it is good against a certain kind of paralysis called Berberis."—Nieuwhef, Zee en Lant-Rese, ii. 33.

1898.—"The Portuguese in the Island suffer from another sickness which the natives call beri-beri."—Ribeiro, f. 55.

1720.—"Berberes (termo da India). Huma Paralysea bestarde, ou entorpecimento, com que fica o corpo como tolhido."—Bluteau, Dict. s. v.

1809.—"A complaint, as far as I have learnt, peculiar to the island (Ceylon), the berri-berri; it is in fact a dropsey that frequently destroys in a few days."—Ed. Valenlina, i. 318.

1885.—(On the Maldives) "... the crew of the vessels during the survey... suffered mostly from two diseases; the Beriberi which attacked the Indians only, and generally proved fatal."—Young and Christopher, in Tr. Ro. Geog. Soc., vol. i.

1887.—"Empyemaerticum oil called oleum nigrum, from the seeds of Celastrus nutans (Malkunger) described in Mr. Malcolmson's able prize Essay on the Hist. and Treatment of Berberi.. the most efficacious remedy in that intractable complaint."—Royse on India's Medicine, 46.

1886.—"A malady much dreaded by the Japanese, called Kakki. It excites a most singular dread. It is considered to be the same disease as that which, under the name of Beriberi, makes such havoc at times on crowded jails and barracks."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 298.

1882.—"Barba, a disease which consists in great swelling of the abdomen."—Blumentritt, Vocabular, s. v.

1885.—"Dr. Wallace Taylor, at Osaka, Japan, reports important discoveries respecting the origin of the disease known as beri-beri. He has traced it to a microscopic spore recently developed in rice. He has finally detected the same organism in the earth of certain alluvial and damp localities."—St. James's Gazette, Aug. 9th.

BERYL.

s. This word is perhaps a very ancient importation from India to the West, it being supposed that its origin was the Skt. vaidūrya, Prak. veśīrya, whence [Malay baiduri and biduri], P. billaur, and Greek βηρυλλός. Borchard points out the probable identity of the two last words by the transposition of l and r. Another transposition appears to have given Ptolemy his ὘ποίησις ἔρη (for the Western Ghats), representing probably the native Vaidūrya mountains. In Ezekiel xxvii. 13, the Sept. has βηρυλλός, where the Hebrew now has zarshā, [another word with probably the same meaning being shohum (see Professor Ridgeway in Encycl. Bibl. s.v. Beryl)]. Professor Max Müller has treated of the possible relation between vaidūrya and vidīla, 'a cat,' and in connection with this observes that "we should, at all events, have learnt the useful lesson that the chapter of accidents is sometimes larger than we suppose."—(India, What can it Teach us?) p. 287. This is a lesson which many articles in our book suggest; and in dealing with the same words, it may be indicated that the resemblance between the Greek αλουπος, billaur, a common H. word for a cat, and the P. billaur, 'beryll,' are at least additional illustrations of the remark quoted.

c. A.D. 70.—"Beryls ... from India they come as from their native place, for seldom are they to be found elsewhere. ... Those are best accounted of which contain a sea-water green."—Prin. Bk. XXXVII. cap. 20 (in P. Holland, ii. 618).

c. 150.—"Ποτάμια ἐν ἕ βηρυλλος."—Ptolemy, l. vii.

a. The leaf of the Piper betel, L., chewed with the dried areca-nut (which is thence improperly called betel-nut, a mistake as old as Frayer—1673,—see p. 40), chunam, etc., by the natives of India and the Indo-Chinese countries. The word is Malayal. vettīla, i.e. veru + sla = 'simple or mere leaf,' and comes to us through the Port. betre and betle. Pawn (q.v.) is the term more generally used by modern Anglo-Indians. In former times the betel-leaf was in S. India the subject of a monopoly of the E. I. Co.

1298.—"All the people of this city (Cael) as well as the rest of India, have a custom of perpetually keeping in the mouth a certain leaf called fembel ... the lords and gentlefolks and the King have these leaves prepared with camphor and other aromatic spices, and also mixt with quicklime."—Marco Polo, ii. 363. See also Abdurrazziq, in India in XV. Cent., p. 32. 1498.—In Vasco da Gama's Roeiro, p. 69, the word used is atamber, i.e. al-tambal (Arab.) from the Skt. ambāla. See also Acosta, p. 185. [See TEMBOOL.]

1516.—"We call this betel Indian leaf."—Barboza, 73.

1521.—"Betre (or vettelle)."—See under ARECA.

1552.—"... at one side of the bed stood a man ... who held in his hand a gold plate with leaves of betelle. ..."—De Barros, Dec. I. iv. cap. viii.

1583.—"We call it betre, because the first land known by the Portuguese was Malabar, and it comes to my remembrance that in Portugal they used to speak of their coming not to India, but to Calcutta ... insomuch that in all the names that occur, which are not Portuguese, are Malabar, like betre."—Garcia, f. 37g.

1582.—The transl. of CastaReda by N. L. has betelle (f. 35), and also vitelle (f. 44).

1585.—A King's letter grants the revenue from betel (betre) to the bishop and clergy of Goa.—In Arch. Port. Or., fasc. 3, p. 38.

1615.—"He sent for Coco-Nuts to give the Company, himselfe chewing Bittle and lime of Oyster-shells, with a Kernel of Nut called Arracco, like an Akorne, it bites in the mouth, accordeth rhume, cooles the head, strengthens the teeth, & is all their Phisick."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 537; [with some trifling variations in Foster's ed. (Hak. Soc.) i. 19].

1672.—"They pass the greater part of the day in indolence, occupied only with talk, and chewing Betel and Areca, by which means their lips and teeth are always stained."—P. di Vincenzo Maria, 252.

1677.—The Court of the E. I. Co. in a letter to Pt. St. George, Dec. 12, disapprove of allowing "Valentine Nurse 20 Rupees a month for diet, 7 Rupees for 1 porter, 2 for a cook, 1 for Beetle, and 2 for a Porter, which is a most extravagant rate, which we shall not allow him or any other."—Notes and Ext., No. i. p. 21.

1727.—"I presented the Officer that

waited on me to the Sea-side (at Calicut) with 6 sequens for a feast of betelle to him and his companions."—A. Hamilton, i. 306.

BETTELA, BEATELLE, &c., s. The name of a kind of muslin constantly mentioned in old trading-lists and narratives. This seems to be a Sp. and Port. word beatilla or beatilha, for ‘a veil,’ derived, according to Cobarruvias, from ‘certain beatas, who invented or used the like.’ Beata is a religiosa. ["The Beatilla is a certain kind of white E. I. chintz made at Masulipatam, and known under the name of Organdi."—Mad. Admin. Mun. Gloss. p. 233.]

"Vestida huma camisa preciosa.
Trazida de delgada beatilha,
Que o corpo crystallino deixa ver-se;
Que tanto bem não he para esconder-se.

Cabece, vi. 21.

1598.—"... this linen is of divers sorts, and is called Serampuras, Casam, Comas, Beattillas, Sapatasses, and a thousand such names."—Linschoten, 28; [Hact. Soc. i. 96; and cf. i. 56].

1655.—"To servants, 3 pieces beteellas"
—in Wheeler, i. 149.

1727.—"Before Aurungzeb conquered Vissiapore, this country (Sundah) produced the finest Betelias or Muslins in India."—A. Hamilton, i. 204.

[1788.—"There are various kinds of muslins brought from the East Indies, chiefly from Bengal: Betillas, &c."—Chambers’s Cyc., quoted in 3 ser. Notes & Q. iv. 88.]

BEWAERIS, adj. P.—H. be-vatris, 'without heir.' Unclaimed, without owner or heir.

BEYOPOOR, n.p. Properly Veppūr, or Bēppūr, [derived from Malayāl. veppu, 'deposit,' ur, 'village,' a place formed by the receding of the sea, which has been turned into the Skt. form Vayupura, 'the town of the Wind-god']. The terminal town of the Madras Railway on the Malabar coast. It stands north of the river; whilst the railway station is on the S. of the river—(see CHALLA). Tipppo Sahib tried to make a great port of Beypoor, and to call it Sultanatnam. [It is one of the many places which have been suggested as the site of Ophir (Logan, Malabar, i. 346), and is probably the Bellipporto of Tavernier, "where there was a fort which the Dutch had made with palms" (ed. Bell, i. 236).]

"Chamarâ o Samorim mais gente nova; Virão Reis de Bippur, e de Tanor. . . ."

Camões, x. 14.

1727.—"About two Leagues to the Southward of Calcutt, is a fine River called Baypore, capable to receive ships of 3 or 400 Tuns."—A. Hamilton, i. 322.

BEZOAR, a. This word belongs, not to the A.-Indian colloquial, but to the language of old oriental trade and materia medica. The word is a corruption of the P. name of the thing, pādzahr, 'pellens venenum,' or pādshahr. The first form is given by Meninaki as the etymology of the word, and this is accepted by Littré [and the N.E.D.]. The quotations of Littré from Ambrose Paré show that the word was used generically for 'an antidote,' and in this sense it is used habitually by Avicenna. No doubt the term came to us, with so many others, from Arab medical writers, so much studied in the Middle Ages, and this accounts for the b, as Arabic has no p, and writes bezwheel. But its usual application was and is, limited to certain hard concretions found in the bodies of animals, to which antidotal virtues were ascribed, and especially to one obtained from the stomach of a wild goat in the Persian province of Lur. Of this animal and the bezaur an account is given in Kaempfer’s Aemolletes Exoticus, pp. 398 seqq. The Besoor was sometimes called Snake-Stone, and erroneously supposed to be found in the head of a snake. It may have been called so really because, as Ibn Baitar states, such a stone was laid upon the bite of a venomous creature (and was believed) to extract the poison. Moodeen Shereef, in his Supp. to the Indian Pharmacopoeia, says there are various besoors in use (in native mat. med.), distinguished according to the animal producing them, as a goat-, camel-, fish-, and snake-besoar; the last quite distinct from Snake-Stone (q.v.).

[A false Besoar stone gave occasion for the establishment of one of the great distinctions in our Common Law, viz. between actions founded upon contract, and those founded upon wrongs: Chandelor v. Lopus was decided in 1604 (reported in 2. Croke, and in Smith’s Leading Cases). The head-note runs—] to a twinkle of a royal eye-lash !"—Hajji Baba, ed. 1885, p. 148.

BHAT, s. H. &c. bhatta (Skt. bhūtta, a title of respect, probably connected with bhatti, 'a supporter or master'), a man of a tribe of mixed descent, whose members are possessed genealogists and poets; a bard. These men in Bājpūtāna and Guzerat had also extraordinary privileges as the guarantors of travellers, whom they accompanied, against attack and robbery. See an account of them in Forbes's Bāta Mālā, i. ix. &c., reprint 558 seqq.; [for Bengal, Bisle, Tribes & Castes, i. 101 seqq.; for the N.W.F., Crooke, Tribes & Castes, ii. 20 seqq.]

c. 1555.—"Among the infidel Bānyāns in this country (Guzerat) there is a class of litterati known as Bāta. These undertake to be guides to traders and other travellers . . . when the caravans are waylaid on the road by Rāshbūts, i.e. Indian horsemen, coming to pillage them, the Bāta takes out his dagger, points it at his own breast, and says: 'I have become surety! If aught befals the caravan I must kill myself!' On these words the Rāshbūts let the caravan pass unharmed."—Sidi 'Ali, 86.

1775.—"The Hindoo rajahs and Maharatta chieftains have generally a Bāht in the family, who attends them on public occasions . . . sounds their praise, and proclaims their titles in hyperbolical and figurative language . . . many of them have another mode of living; they offer themselves as security to the different governments for payment of their revenue, and the good behaviour of the Zemindars, patails, and public farmers; they also become guarantees for treaties between native princes, and the performance of bonds by individuals."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 89; [2nd ed. i. 577; also see ii. 258]. See TRAGA.

1810.—"India, like the nations of Europe, had its minstrels and poets, concerning whom there is the following tradition: At the marriage of Sīva and Parvatty, the immortals having exhausted all the amusements they knew, wished for something new; when Sīva, wiping the drops of sweat from his brow, shook them to earth, upon which the Bawīs, or Bards, immediately sprang up."—Maria Graham, 169.

of the N. Western Deccan, and believed to have been the aborigines of Rajputana; some have supposed them to be the \( \Phi \lambda \lambda \alpha \gamma \) of Ptolemy. They are closely allied to the Coolies (q. v.) of Guzerat, and are believed to belong to the Kolarian division of Indian aborigines. But no distinct Bhil language survives.

1785.—"A most infernal yell suddenly issued from the deep ravines. Our guides informed us that this was the noise always made by the Bheels previous to an attack.—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 480.

1825.—"All the Bheels whom we saw today were small, slender men, less broad-shouldered... and with faces less Celtic than the Pahurees of the Rajmahal. Two of them had rude swords and shields, the remainder had all bows and arrows."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 75.

s. A word used in Bengal—bhi; a marsh or lagoon; same as Jeel (q. v.)

[1860.—"The natives distinguish a lake so formed by a change in a river's course from one of usual origin or shape by calling the former a bow—whilst the latter is termed a Bheel."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 35.]

1789.—"Below Shouy-doung there used to be a big bheel, wherein I have shot a few duck, teal, and snipe."—Pollok, Sport in B. Burma, i. 26.

s. The universal word in the Anglo-Indian households of N. India for the domestic (corresponding to the sakki of Egypt) who supplies the family with water, carrying it in a muscuck (q. v.), or goatskin, slung on his back. The word is P. bhishat, a person of bhisi or paradise, though the application appears to be peculiar to Hindustan. We have not been able to trace the history of this term, which does not apparently occur in the \( \text{Ain} \), even in the curious account of the way in which water was cooled and supplied in the Court of Akbar (Bloehmann, tr. i. 55 seqq.), or in the old travellers, and is not given in Meninski's lexicon. Vulkers gives it only as from Shakespear's Hindustani Dict. [The trade must be of ancient origin in India, as the leather bag is mentioned in the Veda and Manu (Wilson, Rig Veda, ii. 28; Institutes, ii. 79.) Hence Col. Temple (Ind. Ant., xi. 117) suggests that the word is Indian, and connects it with the Skt. \( \text{vish} \), 'to sprinkle.'] It is one of the fine titles which Indian servants rejoice to bestow on one another, like Mehtar, Khalifa, &c. The title in this case has some justification. No class of men (as all Anglo-Indians will agree) is so diligent, so faithful, so unobtrusive, and uncomplaining as that of the bhishats. And often in battle they have shown their courage and fidelity in supplying water to the wounded in face of much personal danger.

[1826.—"The sepoys started up, and cried 'Bhooch, b.hook, arry arry.' This cry of 'a ghost' reached the ears of the officer, who bid his men fire into the tree, and that would bring him down, if there."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 107.]

BHOUNSLA, n.p. Properly Bhoslah or Bhonslah, the surname of Sivaji, the founder of the Marhatta empire. It was also the surname of Parsoji and Raghuji, the founders of the Marhatta dynasty of Berar, though not of the same family as Sivaji.

1673.—"Seva Gh, derived from an Ancient Line of Rajahs, of the Cast of the Bouncedes, a Warlike and Active Offspring."—Fryer, 171.

c. 1730.—"At this time two parganas, named Póna and Sopá, became the jagir of Sháh Bhooshlah. Sivaji became the manager. ... He was distinguished in his tribe for courage and intelligence; and for craft and trickery he was reckoned a sharp son of the devil."—Káthýa Kádas, in Elliot, vii. 257.

1780.—"It was at first a particular tribe governed by the family of Bhoshshlah, which has since lost the sovereignty."—Sir Muttaheria, iii. 214.

1732.—"... le Bonsole, les Marates, et les Mogola."—Somarat, i. 60.

BHYACHARRA, s. H. bhayachárdá. This is a term applied to settlements made with the village as a community, the several claims and liabilities being regulated by established customs, or special traditional rights. Wilson interprets it as "fraternal establishments." [This hardly explains the tenure, at least as found in the N.W.P., and it would be difficult to do so without much detail. In its perhaps most common form each man's holding is the measure of his interest in the estate, irrespective of the share to which he may be entitled by ancestral right.]

1869.—"The Heat of the Day is spent in Rest and Sleeping ... sometimes upon Cotts, and sometimes upon Bichana, which are thick Quilts."—Ovington, 318.

BIDREE, BIDY, s. H. Bidri; the name applied to a kind of ornamental metal-work, made in the Deccan, and deriving its name from the city of Bidar (or Bedar), which was the chief place of manufacture. The work was, amongst natives, chiefly applied to hooka-bells, rose-water bottles and the like. The term has acquired vogue in England of late amongst amateurs of "art manufacture." The ground of the work is pewter alloyed with one-fourth copper: this is inlaid (or damascened) with patterns in silver; and then the pewter ground is blackened. A short description of the manufacture is given by Dr. G. Smith in the Madras Lit. Soc. Journ., N.S. i. 81-84; [by Sir G. Birdwood, Indust. Arts, 163 seqq.; Journ. Ind. Art, i. 41 seqq.] The ware was first described by B. Heyne in 1813.

BILABUNDY, s. H. bilabandi. An account of the revenue settlement of a district, specifying the name of each mahali (estate), the farmer of it, and the amount of the rent (Wilson). In the N.W.P. it usually means an arrangement for securing the payment of revenue (Elliot). C. P. Brown says, quoting Raikes (p. 106), that the word is bilá-bandi, 'hole-stopping,' viz. stopping those vents through which the coin of the proprietor might ooze out. This, however, looks very like a 'striving after meaning,' and Wilson's suggestion that it is a corruption of behri-bandi, from behri, 'a share,' 'a quota,' is probably right.

[1858.—"This transfer of responsibility, from the landlord to his tenants, is called 'Jumuo Lagána,' or transfer of summa. The assembly of the tenants, for the purpose of such adjustment, is called sunjéer bundee, or linking together. The adjustment thus made is called the bilabunde."—Sleeman, Journey through Oudh, i. 208.]

BILAYUT, BILLAIT, &c. n.p.-Europe. The word is properly Ar. Wildyat, 'a kingdom, a province,' variously used with specific denotation, as the Afghans term their own country.
often by this name; and in India again it has come to be employed for distant Europe. In Sicily Il Regno is used for the interior of the island, as we use Mofussil in India. Wildyati is the usual form in Bombay.

BILAYUTEE PAWNEE, BILAYTEE PANEE. The adjective bildyati or wildyati is applied specifically to a variety of exotic articles, e.g. bildyati baingan (see Brinjaul), to the tomato, and most especially bildyati pani, 'European water,' the usual name for soda-water in Anglo-India.

1885.—"But look at us English,' I urged, 'we are ordered thousands of miles away from home, and we go without a murmur.' 'It is true, Khudaranwaul,' said Gunga Purasad, 'but you alone drink English-water (soda-water), and the strength of it enables you to bear up under all fatigue and sorrows.' His idea (adds Mr. Knighton) was that the effervescent force of the soda-water, and the strength of it which drove out the cork so violently, gave strength to the drinker of it." —Times of India Mail, Aug. 11, 1885.

BILDÁR, s. H. from P. beldar, 'a spade-wielder,' an excavator or digging labourer. Term usual in the Public Works Department of Upper India for men employed in that way.

1847.—"Ye Lymne is alle oute! Ye Masouns lounge aboute!
Ye Beldars have alle strucke, and are smokynge atte their Eese Ye Brickes are alle done! Ye Kyne are Skyne and Bone.
And ye Thressourr has bolted with xii thousand Rupees!"

BILLOCH, BELOOCH, n.p. The name (Baluch or Biluch) applied to the race inhabiting the regions west of the Lower Indus, and S.E. of Persia, called from them Biluchistan; they were dominant in Sind till the English conquest in 1843. [Prof. Max Müller (Lectures, i. 97, note) identified the name with Skt. mlechcha, used in the sense of the Greek bدينοs for a despoiled foreigner.]

A.D. 643.—"In the year 32 H. 'Abdulla bin 'Amar bin Rabi' invaded Kirmán and took the capital Kuwshar, so that the aid of the men of Kaj and Baldu was solicited in vain by the Kirmáns." —Elliot, i. 417.

c. 1200.—"He gave with him from Kandahar and Lár, mighty Belochis, servants... with nobles of many castes, horses, elephants, men, carriages, charioteers, and chariots." —The Poem of Chaud Bard seaside in Ind. Ant. i. 272.

1556.—"We proceeded to Gwádir, a trading town. The people here are called Bálú: their prince was Malik Jalaluddin, son of Malik Dinár." —Sidi 'Ali, p. 73.

1590.—"This tract is inhabited by an important Beloch tribe called Kalman." —Ains, trans. Jarret, ii. 337.

1618.—The Boleshos are of Mahomet's Religion. They deal much in Camels, most of them robbers..." —N. Whittington, in Purchas, i. 485.

1648.—"Among the Machumatists next to the Pattans are the Bhotias of great strength" [1 Wildyati]. —Van Twist, 95.

1727.—"They were lodged in a Caravan-sera, when the Ballowches came with about 800 to attack them; but they had a brave warm Reception, and left four Score of their Number dead on the Spot, without the loss of one Dutch Man." —A. Hamilton, i. 107.

1818.—Millburn calls them Blooches (Or. Com. i. 145).

1844.—"Officers must not shoot Peacocks: if they do the Belooches will shoot officers—at least so they have threatened, and M.-G. Napier has not the slightest doubt but that they will keep their word. There are no wild peacocks in Scinde,—they are all private property and sacred birds, and no man has any right whatever to shoot them." —Gen. Orders by Sir C. Napier.

BINKY-NABOB, s. This title occurs in documents regarding Hyder and Tipoo, e.g. in Gen. Stewart's desp. of 8th March 1799: "Mohammed Rezza, the Binky Nabob." [Also see Wilks, Mysoor, Madras reprint, ii. 346.]

It is properly benki-nawab, from Canarese benki, 'fire,' and means the Commandant of the Artillery.

BIRD OF PARADISE. The name given to various beautiful birds of the family Paradisidae, of which many species are now known, inhabiting N. Guinea and the smaller islands adjoining it. The largest species was called by Linneaus Paradisaea apoda, in allusion to the fable that these birds had no feet (the dried skins brought for sale to the Moluccas having usually none attached to them). The name Manucode which Buffon adopted for these birds occurs in the form Manucodiata in some of the following quotations. It is a corruption of the Javanese... name Manuk-devata, the Bird of the Gods, which our popular term renders with sufficient accuracy. [The Siamese word for 'bird,' according to Mr. Skeat, is sukk, perhaps from manok.]

c. 1430.—"In majori Java avis precipuus reperitur sine pedibus, instar palumbi, pluma leviter, canedae oblonga, semper in arboribus quiescens: casu non editur, pullis et cana habentur pretiosiores, quibus prorum ornamentum capitis utuntur."—N. Costi, in Poggius de Varietate Fortunae, lib. iv.

1553.—"The Kings of the said (Moluccas) began only a few years ago to believe in the immortality of souls, taught by no other argument than this, that they had seen a most beautiful little bird, which never alighted on the ground or any other terrestrial object, but which they had sometimes seen to come from the sky, that is to say, when it was dead and fell to the ground. And the Machometa traders who traffic in those islands assured them that this little bird was a native of Paradise, and that Paradise was the place where the souls of the dead are; and said that the accounts of the princes attached themselves to the sect of the Machometans, because it promised them many marvellous things regarding this place of souls. This little bird they called by the name of Manucodiata. . . ."—Letter of Maximilian of Transylvania, Sec. to the Emp. Charles V., in Rasmou, f. 361v; see also f. 362.

c. 1524.—"He also (the K. of Bachian) gave us for the King of Spain two most beautiful dead birds. These birds are as large as thrushes; they have small heads, long beaks, legs slender like a writing pen, and a span in length; they have no wings, but instead of them long feathers of different colours, like plumes; their tail is like that of the thrush. All the feathers, except those of the wings (I), are of a dark colour; they may be felt by the touch when the wind blows. They told us that these birds come from the terrestrial Paradise, and they call them bolon dinata, [burung-dewata, same as Javanese Manuk-devata, supra] that is, divine birds."—Pighetta, Hac. Soc. 143.

1596.—"... in these Islands (Moluccas) onlie is found the bird, which the Portingales call Passeros de Soe, that is Foulie of the Sunne, the Italians call it Mosso codicata, and the Latins Paradisio, by us called Paradise birds, for ye beauty of their feathers which passe all other birds: these birds are never seen alive, but being dead they are found upon the Island; they fly, as it is said, alwasies into the Sunne, and keeps them selves continually in the ayre ... for they haue neither feet nor wings, but only head and most part of their body ..."—Linschoten, 35; [Hac. Soc. i. 118].

"Olha os pelos mares do Oriente
As infinitas ilhas espalhadas

Aqui as auras aves, que não descem Nunca à terra, e só mortas aparecem."

Coste, x. 132.

Eng. shed by Burton:

"Here see o'er oriental seas bespread Infinite island-groups and alwhere Strewed . . .

Here dwell the golden fowls, whose home
Is air,
And never earthward save in death may fare."

1645.—"... the male and female Manucodiata, the male having a hollow in the back, in which 'tis reported the female both lays and hatches her eggs."—Evelyn's Diary, 4th Feb. 1674.—"The strangest long-wing'd hawk that flies,

That like a Bird of Paradise,
Or herald's marathet, has me fogs . . . ."

Hudibras, Pt. ii. cant. 3.

1591.—"As for the story of the Manucodiata or Bird of Paradise, which in the former Age was generally receiv'd and accepted for true, even by the Learned, it is now discovered to be a fable, and rejected and exploy'd by all men" (i.e. that it has no feet).—Ray, Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of the Creation, ed. 1692, Pt. ii. 147.

1705.—"The Birds of Paradise are about the bigness of a Pidgeon. They are of varying Colours, and are never found or seen alive; neither is it known from whence they come . . . ."—Funnel, in Dampier's Voyages, ii. 286-7.

1868.—"When seen in this attitude, the Bird of Paradise really deserves its name, and must be ranked as one of the most beautiful and wonderful of living things."—Wallace, Malay Archip., 7th ed., 464.

BIRDS' NESTS. The famous edible nests, formed with mucus, by certain swiftlets, Collocalia nudifica, and C. linchi. Both have long been known on the eastern coasts of the B. of Bengal, in the Malay Islands [and, according to Mr. Skeat in the islands of the Inland Sea (Talas Sap) at Singora]. The former is also now known to visit Darjeeling, the Assam Hills, the Western Ghats, &c., and to breed on the islets off Malabar and the Concan.

BISCOPRA. s. H. biobhopyrd or biobhopyrd. The name popularly applied to a large lizard alleged, and commonly believed, to be mortally venomous. It is very doubtful whether there is any real lizard to which this name applies, and it may be taken as certain that there is none in India with the qualities attributed. It is probable that the name does carry to many the terrific character which the ingenious author of Tribes on My Frontier alleges. But the name has nothing to do with either 1883.—"But of all the things on earth that bite or sting, the palm belongs to the biscobra, a creature whose very name seems to indicate that it is twice as bad as the cobra. Though known by the terror of its name to natives and Europeans alike, it has never been described in the Proceedings of any learned Society, nor has it yet received a scientific name. . . . The awful deadliness of its bite admits of no question, being supported by countless authentic instances. . . . The points on which evidence is required are—first, whether there is any such animal; second, whether, if it does exist, it is a snake with legs, or a lizard without them."—Tribes on my Frontier, p. 206.

BISH, BIKH, &c., n. H. from Skt. viśha, 'poison.' The word has several specific applications, as (a) to the poison of various species of aconite, particularly Aconitum ferox, otherwise more specifically called in Skt. vatsanābha, 'calf's navel,' corrupted into bachnābh or bachnāg, &c. But it is also applied (b) in the Himalaya to the effect of the rarefied atmosphere at great heights on the body, an effect which there and over Central Asia is attributed to poisonous emanations from the soil, or from plants; a doctrine somewhat naively accepted by Huc in his famous narrative. The Central Asiatic (Turki) expression for this is Ešk, 'smell.'

1564.—"Entre les singularités que le consul de Florentins me montra, me feist goûter vne racine que les Arabes nomment Bick: laquelle me cause si grande chaleur en la bouche, qui me dura deux jours, qu'il me semblloit y avoir du feu. . . . Elle est bien petite comme vn petit nauceau: les autres (auteurs) l'ont nommee Naphetla . . ."—Pierre Belon, Observations, &c., f. 97.

1661-2.—"Est autem Langur mons omnium altissimns, ita ut in summittate ejus viatores vix respirare ob aëris subutilitatem quaeant: neque est ob virulentas nonnullarum herbarum exhalationes aestivo tempore; in manifesto visus ventis curriculo transire possit."—PP. Dorville and Gruber, in Kircher, China Illustrata, 65. It is curious to see these intelligent Jesuits recognize the true cause, but accept the fancy of their guides as an additional one!

1612.—"Here begins the Esh—this is a Turkish word signifying Smell . . . it implies something the odour of which induces indisposition; far from hence the breathing of horse and man, and especially of the former, becomes affected."—Mir Isæt Ullah, in J. R. As. Soc. i. 283.

1815.—"Many of the coolies, and several of the Mewattees and Ghoorkha sepoys and chuprasies now lagged, and every one complained of the bis or poisoned wind. I now suspected that the supposed poison was nothing more than the effect of the rarefaction of the atmosphere from our great elevation."—Praser, Journal of a Tour, &c., 1820, p. 442.

1819.—"The difficulty of breathing which at an earlier date Andrades, and more recently Moorcroft had experienced in this region, was confirmed by Webb; the Botianos themselves felt it, and call it bis k huswa, i.e. poisonous air; even horses and yaks . . . suffer from it."—Webb's Narrative, quoted in Ritter, Asien, ii. 592, 649.

1845.—"Nous arrivames à neuf heures au pied du Bourjan-Bota. La caravane s'arrêta un instant . . . on se montrait avec anxiété un gaz subtil et léger, qu'on nommait vaupre pestilential, et tout le monde paraitait abattu et découragé . . . Bentont les chevaux se refusent à porter leurs cavaliers, et chacun avance à pied et à petits pas . . . tous les visages blêmissent, on sent le cœur s'affadir, et les jambes ne peuvent plus fonctionner . . . Une partie de la troupe, par mesure de prudence s'arrêta . . . le reste par prudence aussi épousa tous les efforts pour arriver jusqu'au bout, et ne pas mourir asphyxié au milieu de cet air chargé d'acide carbonique," &c., Huc et Gobert, ii. 211: [E. T., ii. 114].

BISMILLAH, intj., lit. "In the name of God"; a pious ejaculation used by Mahommedans at the commencement of any undertaking. The ordinary form runs—Bi-'imm 'Allah 'r-raḥmān 'r-raḥīm, i.e. "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful," is of Jewish origin, and is used at the commencement of meals, putting on new clothes, beginning any new work, &c. In the second form, used at the time of going into battle or slaughtering animals, the allusion to the attribute of mercy is omitted.

[1335—"As they were killed after the Portuguese manner without the bysmelia, which they did not say over them."—Correa, iii. 746.]

BISNAGAR, BISNAG, BEEJANUGGER, n.p. These and other forms stand for the name of the ancient city which was the capital of the most important Hindu kingdom that existed in the peninsula of India, during the later Middle Ages, ruled by the Raya dynasty. The place is now known as Humpy (Hampi), and is entirely in ruins. [The modern name is corrupted from Pampa, that of the river near which it stood. (Rice, Myore, ii. 487.)] It stands on the S. of the Tungabhadra R., 38 m. to the N.W. of Bellary. The name is a corruption of Vijayanagara (City of Victory), or Vidyanagara (City of learning), [the latter and earlier name being changed into the former (Rice, Ibid. i. 343, note.)] Others believe that the latter name was applied only since the place, in the 13th century, became the seat of a great revival of Hinduism, under the famous Sayana Madhava, who wrote commentaries on the Vedas, and much besides. Both the city and the kingdom were commonly called by the early Portuguese Naringham (q.v.), from Narasimha (c. 1490-1508), who was king at the time of their first arrival. [Rice gives his dates as 1488-1508.]

c. 1420.—""Profectus hinc est procul a mari miliaribus trecentis, ad civitatem ingentem, nomine Bisnagalam, ambitu milliarum sexaginta, circa praeruptos montes sitam."—Conti, in Poggiius de Var. For- nacae, iv.

1442.—""... the chances of a maritime voyage had led Abd-er-rassak, the author of this work, to the city of Bisanagar. He saw a place extremely large and thickly peopled, and a King possessing greatness and sovereignty to the highest degree, whose dominion extends from the frontier of Serendib to the extremity of the country of Kalbergh—at the frontiers of Bengal to the environs of Malabar."—Abdurrahman, in Indis in XV. Cent., 22.

c. 1470.—""The Hindu sultan Kadam is a very powerful prince. He possesses a numerous army, and resides on a mountain at Bisanagather."—Athan. Nikitin, in Indis in XV. Cent., 22.

1516.—""45 leagues from these mountains inland, there is a very great city, which is called Bissanagher...""—Barbosa, 85.

1611.—""Le Roy de Bissanagar, qu'on appelle aussi quelquefois le Roy de Nar- singa, est puissant."—Wyfflicht, H. des Indes, ii. 64.

BISON, n. The popular name, among Southern Anglo-Indian sportsmen, of the great wild-ox called in Bengal gaur and gavial (Gaurerus gaurus, Jerdon); [Bos gaurus, Blanford]. It inhabits sparsely all the large forests of India, from near Cape Comorin to the foot of the Himalayas (at least in their Eastern portion), and from Malabar to Tenasserim.

1881.—""Once an unfortunate native superintendent or mistari [Malistry] was pounded to death by a savage and solitary bison."—Saty. Revieu, Sept. 10, p. 333.

BLACAN-MATEE, n.p. This is the name of an island adjoining Singapore, which forms the beautiful 'New Harbour' of that port; Malay belakang, or blakang-mati, lit. 'Dead-Back island,' (of which, writes Mr. Skeat, no satisfactory explanation has been given. According to Dennys (Disc. Dict., 51), "one explanation is that the Southern, or as respects Singapore, hinder, face was so unhealthy that the Malays gave it a designation signifying by onomatopoea, death was to be found behind its ridge"). The island (Blacan-mati) appears in one of the charts of Godinho de Eredia (1613) published in his Malaca, &c. (Brussels, 1882), and though, from the excessive looseness of such old charts, the island seems too far from Singapore, we are satisfied after careful comparison with the modern charts that the island now so-called is intended.

BLACK, n. Adj. and substantive denoting natives of India. Old-fashioned, and heard, if still heard, only from the lower class of Europeans; even in the last generation its habitual use was chiefly confined to these, and to old officers of the Queen's Army.

1676.—""We do not approve of your sending any persons to St. Helena against their wills. One of them you sent there makes a great complaint, and we have ordered his liberty to return again if he desires it; for we know not what effect it may have if complaints should be made to the King that we send away the natives; besides that it is against our inclination to buy any blacks, and to transport them from their wives and children without their own consent."—Court's Letter to Pt. St. Creas., in Notes and Eats. No. i. p. 12.

1747.—"Vencatamal, the Commanding Officer of the Black Military, having behaved very commendably on several occasions against the French; in consideration thereof agreed that a Present be made him of Six hundred Rupees to buy a Horse, that it may encourage him to act in like manner."—Pt. St. David Cons., Feb. 6. (MS. Record, in India Office).

1750.—"Having received information that some blacks residing in this town were dealing with the French for goods proper for the Europe market, we told them if we found any proof against any residing under your Honors' protection, that such should suffer our utmost displeasure."—Pt. Wm. Cons., Feb. 4, in Long, 24.

1753.—"John Wood, a free merchant, applies for a pass which, if refused him, he says 'it will reduce a free merchant to the condition of a foreigner, or indeed of the meanest black fellow.'"—Pt. Wm. Cons., in Long, p. 41.

1761.—"You will also receive several private letters from Hastings and Sykes, which must convince me as Circumstances did me at the time, that the Dutch forces were not sent with a View only of defending their own Settlements, but absolutely with a Design of disputing our Influence and Possessions; certain Ruin must have been the Consequence to the East India Company. They were raising black Forces at Patna, Cossimbazar, Chinsura, &c., and were working Night and Day to compleat a Field Artillery . . . all these preparations previous to the commencement of Hostilities plainly prove the Dutch meant to act offensively only not defensively."—Holograph Letter from Clive (unpublished) in the India Office Records. Dated Berkeley Square, and indorsed "27th Decr. 1761."

1762.—"The Black inhabitants send in a petition setting forth the great hardship they labour under in being required to sit as arbitrators in the Court of Cutcherry."—Pt. Wm. Cons., in Long, 277.

1762.—"See quotation under Sepoy, from Price."

"... the 35th Regiment, commanded by Major Popham, which had lately behaved in a mutinous manner . . . was broke with insubordination. The black officers with halters about their necks, and the sepoys strip of their coats and turbans were drummed out of the Cantonments."—India Gazette, March 30.

1787.—"As to yesterday's particular charge, the thing that has made me most invertebrate and unrelenting in it is only that it related to cruelty or oppression inflicted on two black ladies . . ."—Lord Minto, in Life, &c., i. 128.

1789.—"I have just learned from a Friend at the India House, y' the object of Treves' ambition at present is to be appointed to the Adaulet of Benares, w'h is now held by a Black named Alii Caun. Understanding that most of the Adaulets are now held by Europeans, and as I am informed y' it is the intention y' the Europeans are to be so placed in future, I shall be vastly happy if without committing any injustice you ca place young Treves in y' situation."—George P. of Wales, to Lord Cornwallis, in C.'s Corresp. ii. 29.

1782-3.—"And be it further enacted that . . . in all captures which shall be made by H. M.'s Army, Royal Artillery, provincial, black, or other troops . . ."—Act 2 & 3 Will. IV., ch. 63, sec. 2.

The phrase is in use among natives, we know not whether originating with them, or adopted from the usage of the foreigner. But Kālā ādmi 'black man', is often used by them in speaking to Europeans of other natives. A case in point is perhaps worth recording. A statue of Lord William Bentinck, on foot, and in bronze, stands in front of the Calcutta Town Hall. Many years ago a native officer, returning from duty at Calcutta to Barrackpore, where his regiment was, reported himself to his adjutant (from whom we had the story in later days). 'Anything new, Sūbdār, Sahib?' said the Adjutant. 'Yes,' said the Sūbdār, 'there is a figure of the former Lord Sahib arrived.' 'And what do you think of it?' 'Sāhib,' said the Sūbdār, 'ābhi hai kālā ādmi kā sa, jab pāta ho jaegā jō aachhā hogā l.' ('It is now just like a native—a black man') when the whitewash is applied it will be excellent.'

In some few phrases the term has become crystallized and semi-official. Thus the native dressers in a hospital were, and possibly still are, called Black Doctors.

1787.—"The Surgeon's assistant and Black Doctor take their station 100 paces in the rear, or in any place of security to which the Doolies may readily carry the wounded."—Regulations for the H. C.'s Troops on the Coast of Coromandel.

In the following the meaning is special:

1788.—"For Sale. That small upper-roomed Garden House, with about 5 big-gahs (see BEEGAH) of ground, on the road leading from Cheringhee to the Burying Ground, which formerly belonged to the Moravians; it is very private, from the number of trees on the ground, and having lately received considerable additions and repairs, is well adapted for a Black Family. Apply to Mr. Camac.”—In Seton-Karr, i. 282.

BLACK ACT. This was the name given in odium by the non-official Europeans in India to Act XI., 1836, of the Indian Legislature, which laid down that no person should by reason of his place of birth or of his descent be, in any civil proceeding, excepted from the jurisdiction of the Courts named, viz.: Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Zillah and City Judge’s Court, Principal Sudder Ameens, Sudder Ameens, and Moonisoff’s Court, or, in other words, it placed European subjects on a level with natives as to their subjection in civil causes to all the Company’s Courts, including those under Native Judges. This Act was drafted by T. B. Macaulay, then Legislative Member of the Governor-General’s Council, and brought great abuse on his head. Recent agitation caused by the “Ilbert Bill,” proposing to make Europeans subject to native magistrates in regard to police and criminal charges, has been, by advocates of the latter measure, put on all fours with the agitation of 1836. But there is much that discriminates the two cases.

1876.—“The motive of the scrupuliity with which Macaulay was assailed by a handful of sorry scribblers was his advocacy of the Act, familiarly known as the Black Act, which withdrew from British subjects resident in the provinces their so-called privilege of bringing civil appeals before the Supreme Court at Calcutta.”—Trelwyan’s Life of Macaulay, 2nd ed., i. 588.

[BLACK BEER, s. A beverage mentioned by early travellers in Japan. It was probably not a malt liquor. Dr. Aston suggests that it was kuro-hi, a dark-coloured sake used in the service of the Shinto gods.

BLACK-BUCK, s. The ordinary name of the male antelope (Antilope bezoartica, Jerdon) [A. cervicapra, Blanford], from the dark hue of its back, by no means however literally black.

1690.—“The Indians remark, ‘tis September’s Sun which caused the black lines on the Antelopes’ Backs.”—Ovington, 139.

BLACK COTTON SOIL. — (See REGUR.)

[BLACK JEWS, a term applied to the Jews of S. India; see 2 ser. N. & Q., iv. 4. 429; viii. 232, 418, 521; Logan, Malabar, i. 246 seqq.]

BLACK LANGUAGE. An old-fashioned expression, for Hindustani and other vernaculars, which used to be common among officers and men of the Royal Army, but was almost confined to them.

BLACK PARTRIDGE, s. The popular Indian name of the common francolin of S.E. Europe and Western Asia (Francolinus vulgaris, Stephens), notable for its harsh quasi-articulate call, interpreted in various parts of the world into very different syllables. The rhythm of the call is fairly represented by two of the imitations which come nearest one another, viz. that given by Sultan Baber (Persian): ‘Shir dāram, shakrak’ (‘I’ve got milk and sugar!’) and (Hind.) one given by Jordon: ‘Lahsan pīyāz udrak’ (‘Garlic, onion, and ginger’!). A more pious one is: Khuddā teri kudrat, ‘God is thy strength!’ Another mentioned by Capt. Baldwin is very like the truth: ‘Be quick, pay your debts!’ But perhaps the Greek interpretation recorded by Athenaeus (ix. 39) is best of all: τρίς τοίς κακοφθυγας κακός ‘Three-fold ills to the ill-doers!’ see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. xviii. and note 1; [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 234, iv. 17.]

BLACK TOWN, n.p. Still the popular name of the native city of Madras, as distinguished from the Fort and southern suburbs occupied by the English residents, and the bazaars which supply their wants. The term is also used at Bombay.

1678.—Fryer calls the native town of Madras “the Heathen Town,” and “the Indian Town.”

1727.—“The Black Town (of Madras) is inhabited by Gentoo, Mahomedans, and Indian Christians... It was walled in towards the Land, when Governor Pî ruled it.”—A. Hamilton, i. 357.

1780.—“Adjoining the glacie of Fort St. George, to the northward, is a large town commonly called the Black Town, and which is fortified sufficiently to prevent any surprise by a body of horse.”—Hodges, p. 6.
BLACK WOOD. 100 BOBACHEE.

1780.—"... Cadets upon their arrival in the country, many of whom... are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses in the Black Town..."—Muaro's Narrative, 22.

1782.—"When Mr. Hastings came to the government he added some new regulations... divided the black and white town (Calcutta) into 35 wards, and purchased the consent of the natives to go a little further off."—Price, Some Observations, etc., p. 60. In Tracts, vol. i.

1813.—"The large bazar, or the street in the Black Town, (Bombay)... contained many good Asiatic houses."—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 96. Also see quotation (1809) under BOMBAY.

1827.—"Hartley hastened from the Black Town, more satisfied than before that some deceit was about to be practised towards Menie Gray."—Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xi.

BLACK WOOD. The popular name for what is in England termed 'rose-wood'; produced chiefly by several species of Dalbergia, and from which the celebrated carved furniture of Bombay is made. [The same name is applied to the Chinese ebony used in carving (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed., 107).] (See BIS000.)

1813.—"Black wood furniture becomes like heated metal."—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 106.

1879.—(In Babylonia). "In a mound to the south of the mass of city ruins called Jum-juma, Mr. Rasam discovered the remains of a rich hall or palace... the cornices were of painted brick, and the roof of rich Indian blackwood."—Athenaeum, July 5, 22.

BLANKS, s. The word is used for 'whites' or 'Europeans' (Port. branco) in the following, but we know not if anywhere else in English:

1718.—"The Heathens... too shy to venture into the Churches of the Blanks (so they call the Christians), since these were generally adorned with fine cloths and all manner of proud apparel."—(Ziegendaly and Plutacho), Propagation of the Gospel, &c. Pt. 1., 3rd ed., p. 78.

[BLATTY, adj. A corr. of wīla-yātī, 'foreign' (see BILAYUT). A name applied to two plants in S. India, the Sonneratia acida, and Hydrocleys zeylanica (see Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. s. v.). In the old records it is applied to a kind of cloth. Owen (Narrative, i. 349) uses Blat as a name for the landwind in Arabia, of which the origin is perhaps the same.

1610.—"Blatty, the corge Rs. 060."—Dinners, Letters, i. 72.

BLIMBEE, s. Malayāl. vilimbi; H. belambā [or bilambā]; Malay. bālimbing or belimbing. The fruit of Averrhoa bilimbi, L. The genus was so called by Linnaeus in honour of Averroes, the Arab commentator on Aristotle and Avicenna. It embraces two species cultivated in India for their fruits; neither known in a wild state. See for the other CARAMBOLA.

BLOOD-SUCKER, s. A harmless lizard (Lacerta cristata) is so called, because when excited it changes in colour (especially about the neck) from a dirty yellow or grey, to a dark red.

1810.—"On the morn, however, I discovered it to be a large lizard, termed a blood-sucker."—Morton's Life of Leyden, 110.

1813.—"The large seraur, or lacerta, commonly called the bloodsucker."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 110 (2nd ed.).]

BOBACHEE, s. A cook (male). This is an Anglo-Indian vulgarisation of bāwarī, a term originally brought, according to Hammer, by the hordes of Chingiz Khan into Western Asia. At the Mongol Court the Bāwarī was a high dignitary, 'Lord Sewer' or the like (see Hammer's Golden Horde, 235, 461). The late Prof. A. Schiefner, however, stated to us that he could not trace a Mongol origin for the word, which appears to be 'Or. Turki. [Platts derives it from P. bāwar, 'confidence.']

c. 1338.—"Chaque soir a un bâward, et lorsque la table a été dressée, cet officier s'asseye devant son maitre... le bâwardy coupe la viande en petits morceaux. Ces gens-là possèdent une grande habileté pour dépecer la viande."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 407.

c. 1590.—Bâwarî is the word used for cook in the original of the Aīn (Blochmann's Eng. Tr. i. 58).

1610.—"... the dripping... is returned to the meat by a bunch of feathers... tied to the end of a short stick. This little neat, cleanly, and cheap dripping-ladle, answers admirably; it being in the power of the babachy to baste any part with great precision."—Williamson, V. M. i. 228.

1866.—"And every night and morning The bobache shall kill The sempiternal moorghe, And we'll all have a grill."—The Dark Bungalow, 228.
BOBACHEE CONNAH, s. H. Bāwarchi-khāna, ‘Cook-house,’ t.e. Kitchen; generally in a cottage detached from the residence of a European household.

[1829.—“In defiance of all Bawurchi-khāna rules and regulations.”—Or. Sport Mag., i. 118.]

[1710.—“And beat with their hand on the mouth, making a certain noise, which we Portuguese call babare. Babare is a word composed of babo, ‘a child’ and are, an adverb implying ‘to call.’”—Oriente Conquis-tado, vol ii.; Conquista, i. div. i. sec. 8.]

1830.—“When the band struck up (my Arab) was much frightened, made bobbery, set his foot in a hole and nearly pitched me.”—Mem. of Col. Mountains, 2nd ed., 106.

1866.—“But what is the meaning of all this bobbery?”—The Dewk Bungalow, p. 387.

Bobbery is used in ‘pigeon English,’ and of course a Chinese origin is found for it, viz. pa-pi, Cantonese, ‘a noise.’ [The idea that there is a similar English word (see 7 ser. N. & Q., v. 206, 271, 338, 416, 513) is rejected by the N.E.D.]

BOBBERY-BOB! interj. The Anglo-Indian colloquial representation of a common exclamation of Hindus when in surprise or grief—Bāp-ro! or Bap-rē Bāp! ‘O Father!’ (we have known a friend from north of Tweed whose ordinary interjection was ‘My great-grandmother!’). Blumenroth’s Philippine Vocabulary gives Nact/= Madre mía, as a vulgar exclamation of admiration.

1782.—“Captain Cowe being again examined . . . if he had any opportunity to make any observations concerning the execution of Nundocomar! said, he had; that he saw the whole except the immediate act of execution . . . there were 8 or 10,000 people assembled; who at the moment the Rajah was turned off, dispersed suddenly, crying ‘Ah-bauparee!’ leaving nobody about the gallows but the Sheriff and his attendants, and a few Europeans spectators. He explains the term Ah-bauparee, to be an exclamation of the black people, upon the appearance of anything very alarming, and when they are in great pain.”—Price’s 2nd Letter to E. Burke, p. 5. In Tracts, vol ii.

“If an Hindoo was to see a house on fire, to receive a smart slap on the face, break a china basin, cut his finger, see two Europeans boxing, or a sparrow shot, he would call out Ah-bauparee!”—From Report of Select Committee of H. of C., ibid. pp. 9-10.

1884.—“They both hastened to the spot, where the man lay senseless, and the syce by his side muttering Bāpṇe bāpṇe.”—The Baboo, p. 48.

1863-64.—“My men soon became aware of the unwelcome visitor, and raised the cry, ‘A bear, a bear!’

BOBBERY-PACK, s. A pack of hounds of different breeds, or (oftener) of no breed at all, wherewith young officers hunt jackals or the like; presumably so called from the noise and disturbance that such a pack are apt to raise. And hence a ‘scratch pack’ of any kind, as a ‘scratch match’ at cricket, &c. (See a quotation under BUNOW.)

1878.—“. . . on the mornings when the ‘bobbera’ pack went out, of which Macpherson was ‘master,’ and I ‘whip,’ we used to be up by 4 A.M.”—Life in the Mofussil, i. 142.

The following occurs in a letter received from an old Indian by one of the authors, some years ago:

BOCCA TIGRIS, n.p. The name applied to the estuary of the Canton River. It appears to be an inaccurate reproduction of the Portuguese Boca do Tigre, and that to be a rendering of the Chinese name Hu-mén, ‘Tiger Gate.’ Hence in the second quotation Tigris is supposed to be the name of the river.

1747.—“At 8 o’clock we passed the Bog of Tygrea, and at noon the Lyon’s Tower.”—A Voy. to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1749.

1770.—“The City of Canton is situated on the banks of the Tigres, a large river. . . .”—Raynal (tr. 1771), ii. 285.

1872.—“. . . à sept lieues de la bonne du Tigre, on apperceoit la Tour du Lion.”—Soucreau, Voyage, ii. 294.

[1900.—“The launch was taken up the Canton River and abandoned near the Bocca Tigris (the Bogue).”—The Times, 29 Oct.]

BOCHA, s. H. bocha. A kind of chair-palankin formerly in use in Bengal, but now quite forgotten.

1810.—“Ladies are usually conveyed about Calcutta . . . in a kind of palanquin called Bogue, n.p. This name is applied by seamen to the narrows at the mouth of the Canton River, and is a corruption of Bocca. (See BOCCA TIGRIS.)

Boliah, Bauleah, s. Beng. bâtika. A kind of light accommodation boat with a cabin, in use on the Bengal rivers. We do not find the word in any of the dictionaries. Ives, in the middle of the 18th century, describes it as a boat very long, but so narrow that only one man could sit in the breadth, though it carried a multitude of rowers. This is not the character of the boat so called now. [Buchanan Hamilton, writing about 1820, says: "The bhaniliya is intended for the same purpose, [conveyance of passengers], and is about the same size as the Pani (see PAUNCHWAY). It is sharp at both ends, rises at the ends less than the Panni, and its till is placed in the middle, the rowers standing both before and behind the place of accommodation of passengers. On the Kosi, the Bhaniliya is a large fishing-boat, carrying six or seven men." (Eastern India, iii. 345.) Grant (Rural Life, p. 5) gives a drawing and description of the modern boat.]

1757.—"To get two bolias, a Goordore, and 87 dandies from the Nazir."—Ices, 157.

1810.—"On one side the picturesque boats of the natives, with their floating huts; on the other the bolias and pleasure-boats of the English."—Maria Graham, 142.

1811.—"The extreme lightness of its construction gave it incredible speed. An example is cited of a Governor General who in his Bawalesaa performed in 8 days the voyage from Lucknow to Calcutta, a distance of 400 marine leagues."—Sorlyna, iii. The drawing represents a very light skiff, with only a small kiosque at the stern.

1824.—"We found two Boliah, or large row-boats, with convenient cabins."—Heber, i. 26.

1834.—"Rivers's attention had been attracted by seeing a large beauliath in the act of swinging to the tide."—The Baboo, i. 14.

Bolta, s. A turn of a rope; sea. H. from Port. volta (Boebuck).

Bombasa, n.p. The Island of Bombasa, off the E. African Coast, is so called in some old works. Bombâs is used in Persia for a negro slave; see quotation.

1516.—"... another island, in which there is a city of the Moors called Bombàs, very large and beautiful."—Barbosa, 11. See also Colonial Papers under 1609, i. 188.

1883.—"... the Bombàs, or coal-black negro of the interior, being of much less price, and usually only used as a cook."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

Bombay, n.p. It has been alleged, often and positively (as in the quotations below from Fryer and Grose), that this name is an English corruption from the Portuguese Bom-bahia, 'good bay.' The grammar of the alleged etymon is bad, and the history is no better; for the name can be traced long before the Portuguese occupation, long before the arrival of the Portuguese in India. C. 1430, we find the islands of Mahim and Mumba-Devi, which united form the existing island of Bombay, held, along with Salsette, by a Hindu Râi, who was tributary to the Mohammedan King of Guzerat. (See Ras MâIâ, ii. 350; [ed. 1878, p. 270]. The same form reappears (1516) in Barbosa's Tana-Mayamba (p. 68), in the Estado da India under 1525, and (1663) in Garcia de Orta, who writes both Mombâim and Bombaim. The latter author, mentioning the excellence of the area produced there, speaks of himself having had a grant of the island from the King of Portugal (see below). It is customarily called Bombaim on the earliest English Rupee coinage. (See under Bupee.) The shrine of the goddess Mumba-Devi from whom the name is supposed to have been taken, stood on the Esplanade till the middle of the 17th century, when it was removed to its present site in the middle of what is now the most frequented part of the native town.

1507.—"Sultan Mahommed Bigarrah of Guzerat having carried an army against Chaiwal, in the year of the Hijra 913, in order to destroy the Europeans, he effected his designs against the towns of Bassai (see Bassein) and Mambai, and returned to his own capital."—MiraM-I-Ahmedi (Bird's transl.), 224-15.

1508.—"The Viceroy quitted Dabul, passing by Chaul, where he did not care to go in, to avoid delay, and anchored at Bombaim, whence the people fled when they saw the fleet, and our men carried off.
many cows, and caught some blacks whom they found hiding in the woods, and of these they took away those that were good, and killed the rest."—Correa, i. 929.

1516.— "... a fortress of the before-named King (of Guzerat), called Tanamayumba, and near it is a Moorish town, very pleasant, with many gardens ... a town of very great Moorish mosques, and temples of worship of the Gentiles ... it is likewise a sea port, but of little trade."—Barros, 69. The name here appears to combine, in a common oriental fashion, the name of the adjoining town of Thana (see TANA) and Bombay.

1525.— "E a Ilha de Bombay, que no foral velho esta uma em catorze mil e quatro cento fedas ... J xii l. iii. 8. fedas.

"E os anos outros estaua arrendada por mill trescentos setenta e cinco pardaos ... j iii. 8 xxxv. pardaos.

"Fui oforada a mestre Diogo pelo dito governador, por mill quaatroscentos trinta e dois pardaos ... J liii. 8 xxxv. pardaos mdo."—Tombo do Estada da India, 160-161.

1531.— "The Governor at the island of Bombay awaited the junction of the whole expedition, of which he made a muster, taking a roll from each captain, of the Portuguese soldiers and sailors and of the captive slaves who could fight and help, and of the number of musketeers, and of other people, such as servants. And all taken together he found in the whole fleet some 3580 soldiers (homens d'armas), counting captains and gentlemen; and some 1450 Portuguese seamen, with the pilots and masters; and some 2000 soldiers who were Malabars and Goa Canarines; and 8000 slaves fit to fight; and among these he found more than 3000 musketeers (espingardeiros), and 4000 country seamen who could row (mariseiros de terra remeiro), beside the marines of the junks who were more than 800; and with married and single women, and people taking goods and provisions to sell, and menial servants, the whole together was more than 30,000 souls. ..."—Correa, iii. 392.

1552.— "The Governor advanced against Bombay on the 6th February, which was moreover the very day on which Ash Wednesday fell."—Conto, IV, 4.

1554.— "Item of Mazaguer 3500 fedeas.

"Item of Mombaim, 17,000 fedeas.

"Rents of the land surrendered by the King of Canbaya in 1543, from 1555 to 1548."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 139.

1563.— "... and better still is (that the areca) of Bombay, an estate and island which the King our Lord has graciously granted me on perpetual lease."—Garcia De Orta, f. 91r.

"SIR VANT. Sir, here is Simon Toscano, your tenant at Bombay, who has brought this basket of mangoes for you to make a present to the Governor; and he says that when he has moored his vessel he will come here to put up."—Ibid. f. 134v.

1644.— "Description of the Port of Bombay.

"The Viceroy Conde de Linhares sent the 8 councillors to fortify this Bay, so that no European enemy should be able to enter. These Ministers visited the place, and were of opinion that the width (of the entrance) being so great, becoming even wider and more unobstructed further in, there was no place that you could fortify so as to defend the entrance. ..."—Borcaro, MS. f. 227.

1666.— "Ces Toherons ... demeurent pour la plupart a Baroche, a Bombaye et a Amedabad."—Themon, v. 40.

"De Bacaim a Bombaim il y a six lieues."—Ibid. 248.

1673.— "December the Eighth we paid our Homage to the Union-flag flying on the Fort of Bombay."—Fryer, 59.

"Bombaim ... ventures furthest out into the Sea, making the Mouth of a spacious Bay, whence it has its Etymology; Bombay, quasi Boon bay."—Ibid. 62.

1676.— "Since the present King of England married the Princess of Portugal, who had in Portion the famous Port of Bombay... they coin both Silver, Copper, and Tin."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 6.

1677.— "Quod dicta Insula de Bombaim, una cum dependentiis suis, nobis ab origine bona fide ex pacto (sicut opportunit truditas non fuerit)."—King Charles II. to the Viceroy L. de Mendoza Furtado, in Desc., ex. of the Port and Island of Bombay, 1724, p. 77.

1690.— "This Island has its Denomination from the Harbour, which... was originally called Boon Bay, i.e. in the Portuguese Language, a Good Bay or Harbour."—Onington, 128.

"... Terra e ilha de que El-Rei nosso senhor me fui mercê, oforada em fatia. Em fatiaem is a corruption apparently of emphyteusa, i.e. properly the person to whom land was granted on lease, such as the Civil Law called emphyteusa. "The emphyteuta was a perpetual lessee who paid a perpetual rent to the owner."—English Op. s.v. Emphyteusta.
1711.—Lockyer declares it to be impossible, with all the Company's Strength and Art, to make Bombay "a Mart of great Business."—P. 83.

c. 1760.—"... one of the most commodious bays perhaps in the world, from which distinction it received the denomination of Bombay, by corruption from the Portuguese Buona-Badia, though now usually written by them Bombaim."—Grose, i. 29.

1770.—"No man chose to settle in a country so unhealthy as to give rise to the proverb That at Bombay a man's life did not exceed two moons."—Raynal (E. T.), 1777, i. 389.

1809.—"The largest pagoda in Bombay is in the Black Town. ... It is dedicated to Mombu Deoes ... who by her images and attributes seems to be Parvati, the wife of Siva."—Maria Graham, 14.

BOMBAY BOX-WORK. This well-known manufacture, consisting in the decoration of boxes, desks, &c., with veneers of geometrical mosaic, somewhat after the fashion of Tunbridge ware, is said to have been introduced from Shiraz to Surat more than a century ago, and some 30 years later from Surat to Bombay. The veneers are formed by cementing together fine triangular prisms of ebony, ivory, green-stained ivory, stag's horn, and tin, so that the sections when sawn across form the required pattern, and such thin sections are then attached to the panels of the box with strong glue.

BOMBAY DUCK.—See BUMMEOLO.

BOMBAY MARINE. This was the title borne for many years by the meritorious but somewhat depressed service which in 1830 acquired the style of the "Indian Navy," and on 30th April, 1863, ceased to exist. The detachments of this force which took part in the China War (1841-42) were known to their brethren of the Royal Navy, under the temptation of alliteration, as the "Bombay Buccaneers." In their earliest employment against the pirates of Western India and the Persian Gulf, they had been known as "the Grab Service." But, no matter for these names, the history of this Navy is full of brilliant actions and services. We will quote two noble examples of public virtue:

(1) In July 1811, a squadron under Commodore John Hayes took two large junks issuing from Batavia, then under blockade. These were lawful prize, laden with Dutch property, valued at £600,000. But Hayes knew that such a capture would create great difficulties and embarrassments in the English trade at Canton, and he directed the release of this splendid prize.

(2) 30th June 1815, Lieut. Boyce in the brig 'Nautilus' (180 tons, carrying ten 18-pr. carronades, and four 9-prs.) encountered the U.S. sloop-of-war 'Peacock' (639 tons, carrying twenty 32-pr. carronades, and two long 18-prs.). After he had informed the American of the ratification of peace, Boyce was peremptorily ordered to haul down his colours, which he answered by a flat refusal. The 'Peacock' opened fire, and a short but brisk action followed, in which Boyce and his first lieutenant were shot down. The gallant Boyce had a special pension from the Company (£435 in all) and lived to his 93rd year to enjoy it.

We take the facts from the History of this Navy by one of its officers, Lieut. C. R. Low (i. 294), but he erroneously states the pension to have been granted by the U.S. Govt.

1780.—"The Hon. Company's schooner, Carinjar, with Lieut. Murry Commander, of the Bombay Marines, is going to Archin (sic, see ACHIEN) to meet the Ceres and the other Europe ships from Madras, to put on board of them the St. Helena stores."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 8th.

BONITO, s. A fish (Thynnus pelamys, Day) of the same family (Sombridae) as mackerel and tunny, very common in the Indian seas. The name is Port., and apparently is the adj. bonito, 'fine.'

c. 1610.—"On y pesche vue quantité admirable de gros poissons, de septe ou huit sortes, qui sont néantmoins quasi de meme race et espèce ... commes bonites, abecores, daurades, et autres."—Pyrard, i. 137.

c. 1615.—"Bonites et abecores sont en couleur, shape, et taste much like to Mackerels, but grow to be very large."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1464.

c. 1620.—"How many sail of well-mann'd ships As the Bonito does the Flying-fish Have we pursued. ..."—Beaum. & Flit., The Double Marriage, ii. 1.

c. 1760.—"The fish undoubtedly takes its name from relishing so well to the taste of the Portuguese ... that they call it BONZE, s. A term long applied by Europeans in China to the Buddhist clergy, but originating with early visitors to Japan. Its origin is however not quite clear. The Chinese 檀僧, 'a religious person' is in Japanese bonze or bonzo; but Köppen prefers 檀僧, 'Teacher of the Law,' pron. in Japanese bo-zī (Die Rel. des Buddha, i. 321, and also Schott's Zur Litt. des Chin. Buddhismus, 1873, p. 46). It will be seen that some of the old quotations favour one, and some the other, of these sources. On the other hand, Bandhya (for Skt. vandya, 'to whom worship or reverence is due, very reverend') seems to be applied in Nepal to the Buddhist clergy, and Hodgson considers the Japanese bonze (bonze?) traceable to this. (Essays, 1874, p. 63.) The same word, as bandke or bonde, is in Tibetan similarly applied. (See Jachetti's Dict., p. 365.) The word first occurs in Jorge Álvarez's account of Japan, and next, a little later, in the letters of St. Francis Xavier. Cocks in his Diary uses formus approaching boze.

1549. — "I find the common secular people here less impure and more obedient to reason than their priests, whom they call bonzos." — Letter of St. F. P. Xavier, in COREY'S Life, ii. 238.

1572. — "... sacerdotes... qui ipsisum lingūā bonzī appellantur." — E. Acosta, 58.

1585. — "They have amongst them (in Japan) many priests of their idols whom they call bonzos, of the which there be great conventa." — Parier's Tr. of Mendosa (1599), ii. 300.

1590. — "This doctrine doe all they embrace, which are in China called Cen, but with us at Japon are named Bonzi." — As Exct. Treatise of the Kingd. of China, &c., Hakt. ii. 580.

1618. — "And their is 300 boze (or pagon priests) have alowance and mean-tenancy for caver to pray for his sole, in the same sorte as munkes and fryres use to doe amongst the Roman papistes." — Cocks's Diary, ii. 75; [in i. 117, boze; bonzes (i. 143).]

1678. — "It is estimated that there are in this country (Siam) more than 200,000 priests called Bonzes." — Tavernier, ed. Balf, ii. 293.

1727. — "... or perhaps make him fadge in a China bonze in his Calendar, under the name of a Christian Saint." — A. Hamilton, i. 253.

1794-7.— "Alike to me encas'd in Grecian bronze Koran or Vulgate, Veda, Priest, or Bonze." — Pursuits of Literature, 6th ed., p. 335.

1814.— "While Fun deals in Mandarin, Bonzes, Bohers, Peers, Bishops, and Punch, Hum—are sacred to thee." — T. Moore, Hum and Fam.

(1) BORA, BOORA, s. Beng. bhuda, a kind of cargo-boat used in the rivers of Bengal.

1675. — "About noone overtook the eight borasse." — Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccccvii.

1847. — "The boa... being a very floaty light boat, rowinge with 20 to 30 Owas, those carry Salt Fester and other goods from Hugly downewards, and some trade to Dacca with salt; they also serve for tow boats for ye ships bound up or downe ye river." — Ibid. ii. 15.

(2) BORA, s. H. and Guz. bohrā and bohord, which H. H. Wilson refers to the Skt. vavahārī, 'a trader, or man of affairs,' from which are formed the ordinary H. words byohord, byohariya (and a Guzerati form which comes very near bohord). This is confirmed by the quotation from Nurullah below, but it is not quite certain. Dr. John Wilson (see below) gives an Arabic derivation which we have been unable to verify. [There can be no reasonable doubt that this is incorrect.] There are two classes of Bohrās belonging to different Mohammedan sects, and different in habit of life.

1. The Shi'a Bohrās, who are essentially townspeople, and especially congregate in Surat, Burhanpur, Ujjain, &c. They are those best known far and wide by the name, and are usually devoted to trading and money-lending.
Their original seat was in Guzerat, and they are most numerous there, and in the Bombay territory generally, but are also to be found in various parts of Central India and the N.-W. Provinces, [where they are all Hindus]. The word in Bombay is often used as synonymous with pedlar or boxwallah. They are generally well-to-do people, keeping very cleanly and comfortable houses. [See an account of them in Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 470 seqq. 2nd ed.]

These Bohras appear to form one of the numerous Shi'a sects, akin in character to, and apparently of the same origin as, the Ismailiyyah (or Assassins of the Middle Ages), and claim as their original head and doctor in India one Ya'qub, who emigrated from Egypt, and landed in Cambay A.D. 1137. But the chief seat of the doctrine is alleged to have been in Yemen, till that country was conquered by the Turks in 1538. A large exodus of the sect to India then took place. Like the Ismailis they attach a divine character to their Mullah or chief Pontiff, who now resides at Surat. They are guided by him in all things, and they pay him a percentage on their profits. But there are several sectarian subdivisions: Detidi Bohras, Sulaimani Bohras, &c. [See Forbes, Rts Mdt, ed. 1878, p. 264 seqq.]

2. The Sunni Bohras. These are very numerous in the Northern Concan and Guzerat. They are essentially peasants, sturdy, thrifty, and excellent cultivators, retaining much of Hindu habit; and are, though they have dropped caste distinctions, very exclusive and "denominational" (as the Bombay Gazetteer expresses it). Exceptionally, at Pattan, in Baroda State, there is a rich and thriving community of trading Bohras of the Sunni section; they have no intercourse with their Shi'a namesakes.

The history of the Bohras is still very obscure; nor does it seem ascertained whether the two sections were originally one. Some things indicate that the Shi'a Bohras may be, in accordance with their tradition, in some considerable part of foreign descent, and that the Sunni Bohras, who are unquestionably of Hindu descent, may have been native converts of the foreign immigrants, afterwards forcibly brought over to Sunnism by the Guzerat Sultans. But all this must be said with much reserve. The history is worthy of investigation.

The quotation from Ibn Batuta, which refers to Gandari on the Baroda river, south of Cambay, alludes most probably to the Bohras, and may perhaps, though not necessarily, indicate an origin for the name different from either of those suggested.

c. 1348.—"When we arrived at Kandahar . . . we received a visit from the principal Musulmans dwelling at his (the pagan King's) Capital, such as the Children of Khosak Bohrah, among whom was the Nakhoda Ibrahim, who had 6 vessels belonging to him."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 58.

c. 1620.—Nurullah of Shuster, quoted by Colebrooke, speaks of this class as having been converted to Islam 800 years before. He says also: "Most of them subsist by commerce and mechanical trades; as is indicated by the name Bohrah, which signifies 'merchant' in the dialect of Guzerat."—Ibn As. Res., vii. 388.

1673.—"The rest (of the Mohammedians) are adopted under the name of the Province or Kingdom they are born in, as Mogul . . . or Schisms they have made, as Bilhim, Jenootte, and the lowest of all is Borrah."—Fryer, 93.

c. 1780.—"Among the rest was the whole of the property of a certain Muhammad Mokrim, a man of the Bohra tribe, the Chief of all the merchants, and the owner of three or four merchant ships."—H. of Hydrur Naik, 383.

1810.—"The Borahs are an inferior set of travelling merchants. The inside of a Borah's box is like that of an English country shop, spelling-books, prayer-books, lavender water, eau de luce, soap, tapes, scissors, knives, needles, and thread make but a small part of the variety."—Maria Graham, 53.

1825.—"The Boras (at Broach) in general are unpopular, and held in the same estimation for parsimony that the Jews are in England."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 119; also see 72.

1853.—"I had the pleasure of baptizing Ismail Ibrahim, the first Bohrah who, as far as we know, has yet embraced Christianity in India. . . . He appears thoroughly divorced from Muhammad, and from 'Ali the son-in-law of Muhammad, whom the Bohoras or Ismaelites, according to the meaning of the Arabic word, from which the name proceeds, esteem as an improvement on his father-in-law, having a higher degree of inspiration, which has in good measure, as they imagine, manifested itself among his successors, recognised by the Bohoras and by the Ansar, Ismaelites, Drus, and Metawilieh of Syria. . . ."—Letter of Dr. John Wilson, in Life, p. 456.

1883.—". . . India, between which and the north-east coast of Africa, a consider-Borneo, n.p. This name, as applied to the great island in its entirety, is taken from that of the capital town of the chief Malay State existing on it when it became known to Europeans, Bunté, Burné, Brunat, or Burnat, still existing and known as Bruné.

1516.—"In this island much camphor for eating is gathered, and the Indians value it highly. . . . This island is called Borney."—Barbosa, 203-4.

1521.—"The two ships departed thence, and running among many islands came on one which contained much cinnamon of the finest kind. And then again running among many islands they came to the island of Borneo, where in the harbour they found many junks belonging to merchants from all the parts about Malacca, who make a great mart in that Borneo."—Correa, ii. 631.

1610.—"Bornealaya are with white and black quails, like checkers, such as Poling-kuney are."—Dunster, Letters, i. 72.

The cloth called Bornealaya perhaps took its name from this island.

[", "There is brimstone, pepper, Bournesh camphor."—Dunster, Letters, i. 79.]

1614.—In Stainesbury, i. 313 [and in Foster, Letters, ii. 94], it is written Burnea.

1727.—"The great island of Borneow or Borneo, the largest except California in the known world."—A. Hamilton, ii. 44.

Boro-Bodo, or Budur, n.p. The name of a great Buddhist monument of Indian character in the district of Kadi in Java; one of the most remarkable in the world. It is a quadrangular structure occupying the summit of a hill, which apparently forms the core of the building. It is quadrangular in plan, the sides, however, broken by successive projections; each side of the basement, 406 feet. Including the basement, it rises in six successive terraces, four of them forming corridors, the sides of which are panneld with bas-reliefs, which Mr. Fergusson calculated would, if extended in a single line, cover three miles of ground. These represent scenes in the life of Sakya Muni, scenes from the Jítakas, or pre-existences of Sakya, and other series of Buddhist groups. Above the corridors the structure becomes circular, rising in three shallower stages, bordered with small dagobas (72 in number), and a large dagoba crowns the whole. The 72 dagobas are hollow, built in a kind of stone lattice, and each contains, or has contained, within, a stone Buddha in the usual attitude. In niches of the corridors also are numerous Buddhas larger than life, and about 400 in number. Mr. Fergusson concludes from various data that this wonderful structure must date from a.D. 650 to 800.

This monument is not mentioned in Valentijn's great History of the Dutch Indies (1726), nor does its name ever seem to have reached Europe till Sir Stamford Raffles, the British Lieut.-Governor of Java, visited the district in January 1814. The structure was then covered with soil and vegetation, even with trees of considerable size. Raffles caused it to be cleared, and drawings and measurements to be made. His History of Java, and Crawford's Hist. of the Indian Archipelago, made it known to the world. The Dutch Government, in 1874, published a great collection of illustrative plates, with a descriptive text.

The meaning of the name by which this monument is known in the neighbourhood has been much debated. Raffles writes it Boro Bodo [Hist. of Java, 2nd ed., ii. 30 seqq.]. [Crawford, Descr. Dict. (a.v.), says: "Boro is, in Javanese, the name of a kind of fish-trap, and budor may possibly be a corruption of the Sanscrit budus, 'old.'"]

The most probable interpretation, and accepted by Friedrich and other scholars of weight, is that of 'Myriads Buddhas.' This would be in some analogy to another famous Buddhist monument in a neighbouring district, at Brambáman, which is called Chándi Senu, or the "Thousand Temples," though the number has been really 238.

Bosh, s. and interj. This is alleged to be taken from the Turkish bosh, signifying "empty, vain, useless, void of sense, meaning or utility" (Redhouse's Dict.). But we have not been able to trace its history or first appearance in English. [According to the N.E.D. the word seems to have come into use about 1834 under the influence of Morier's novels, Ayeesha, Hajiji Baba, &c. For various speculations on its origin see 5 ser. N. & Q. iii. 114, 173, 257.

BOTICKERÁ, s. Port. botiqueiro. A shop or stall-keeper. (See BOUTIQUE.)

1727.—". . . he past all over, and was forced to relieve the poor Botickieros or Shopkeepers, who before could pay him Taxes."—A. Hamilton, i. 268.

BO TREE, s. The name given in Ceylon to the Pipal tree (see PEEPUL) as revered by the Buddhists; Singh. bo-gás. See in Emerson Tenmint (Ceylon, ii. 632 seqq.), a chronological series of notices of the Bo-tree from B.C. 288 to A.D. 1739.

1675.—"Of their (the Veddas') worship there is little to tell, except that like the Cingales, they set round the high trees Bogas, which our people call Pagod-trees, with a stone base and put lamps upon it."—Ryklof Van Goens, in Valentijn (Ceylon), 209.

1681.—"I shall mention but one Tree more as famous and highly set by as any of the rest, if not more so, tho' it bear no fruit, the benefit consisting chiefly in the Holiness of it. This tree they call Bogahah; we the Oat-tree."—Knaur, 18.

BOTTLE-TREE, s. Qu. Adansonia digitata, or 'baobab'? Its aspect is somewhat suggestive of the name, but we have not been able to ascertain. [It has also been suggested that it refers to the Babool, on which the Baya, often builds its nest. "These are formed in a very ingenious manner, by long grass woven together in the shape of a bottle." (Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 33.)]

[BOUNDARY-HEDGE, s. A corruption of boundary-hedge, and applied in old military writers to the thick plantation of bamboo or prickly-pear which used to surround native forts.

1792.—"A Bound Hedge, formed of a wide belt of thorny plants (at Seringapatam)."—Witte, Historical Sketches, iii. 217.]

BOUTIQUE, s. A common word in Ceylon and the Madras Presidency (to which it is now peculiar) for a small native shop or booth: Port. butica or boteca. From Blueau (Suppt.) it would seem that the use of butica was peculiar to Portuguese India.

and generally with landings and loggie where travellers may rest in the shade. This kind of structure, almost peculiar to Western and Central India, though occasionally met with in Northern India also, is a favourite object of private native munificence, and though chiefly beneath the level of the ground, is often made the subject of most effective architecture. Some of the finest specimens are in Guzerat, where other forms of the word appear to be wad and wadin. One of the most splendid of these structures is that at Aśīrwā in the suburbs of Ahmedabad, known as the Well of Dhai (or the Nurse) Harir, built in 1486 by a lady of the household of Sultan Mohammed Bigara (that famous Prince of Cambay) celebrated by Butler—see under CAMBAY), at a cost of 3 lakhs of rupees. There is an elaborate model of a great Guzerati baoli in the Indian Museum at S. Kensington.

We have seen in the suburbs of Palermo a regular baoli, excavated in the tufaceous rock that covers the plain. It was said to have been made at the expense of an ancestor of the present proprietor (Count Ranchibile) to employ people in a time of scarcity.

c. 1343.—"There was also a baīn, a name by which the Indians designate a very spacious kind of well, revetted with stone, and provided with steps for descent to the water's brink. Some of these wells have in the middle and on each side pavilions of stone, with seats and benches. The Kings and chief men of the country rival each other in the construction of such reservoirs on roads that are not supplied with water."
—Ibn Batuta, iv. 13.

1626.—"There was an empty space within the fort (of Agra) between Ibrahim's palace and the ramparts. I directed a large wān to be constructed on it, ten gos by ten. In the language of Hindostān they denominate a large well having a staircase down it wān."
—Baber, Mem., 342.

1775.—"Near a village called Sevasse Contra I left the line of march to sketch a remarkable building. on a near approach I discerned it to be a well of very superior workmanship, of that kind which the natives call Bhourass or Bhoulia."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 102; [2nd ed. i. 397].

1806.—"Who so digs a well deserves the love of creatures and the grace of God," but a wānī is said to value 10 koosa (or wells) because the water is available to bipeds without the aid of a rope."—R. Drummond, Illustrations of Guzerattees, etc.

1825.—"These bawddles are singular contrivances, and some of them extremely handsome and striking. . . ."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 37.

1856.—"The wāv (Sansk. vāppad) is a large edifice of a picturesque and stately as well as peculiar character. Above the level of the ground a row of four or five open pavilions at regular distances from each other . . . is alone visible. . . . The entrance to the wāv is by one of the end pavilions."—Forbes, Rās Mālā, i. 257; [reprint 1878, p. 197].

1876.—"To persons not familiar with the East such an architectural object as a bawlee may seem a strange perversion of ingenuity, but the grateful coolness of all subterranean apartments, especially when accompanied by water, and the quiet gloom of these recesses, fully compensate in the eyes of the Hindu for the more attractive magnificence of the ghats. Consequently the descending flights of which we are now speaking, have often been more elaborate and expensive pieces of architecture than any of the buildings above-ground found in their vicinity."—Fergusson, Indian and Eastern Architecture, 486.

BOY Wallah

s. Hybrid H. Bakas- (i.e. box) wadd. A native itinerant pedlar, or packman, as he would be called in Scotland by an analogous term. The boxwallah sells cutlery, cheap nick-nacks, and small wares of all kinds, chiefly European. In former days he was a welcome visitor to small stations and solitary bungalows. The Bora of Bombay is often a boxwadda, and the boxwadda in that region is commonly called Bora. (See BORA.)

a. A servant. In Southern India and in China a native personal servant is so termed, and is habitually summoned with the vocative 'Boy!' The same was formerly common in Jamaica and other W. I. Islands. Similar uses are familiar of puér (e.g. in the Vulgate Dixit Giesi puer Vi Dei. II Kings v. 20), Ar. wadd, waddāw, garçon, knave (Germ. Knabe); and this same word is used for a camp-servant in Shakespeare, where Fluenen says: "Kill the Pys and the luggage! 'tis expressly against the laws of arms."—See also Grose's Ml. Antiquities, i. 183, and Latin quotation from Xavier under Oniconopoly. The word, however, came to be especially used for ‘Slave-boy,’ and applied to slaves of any age. The Portuguese used moço in the same way. In ‘Pigeon English’ also ‘servant’ is Boy, whilst ‘boy’ in our ordinary sense is discriminated as ‘smallo-boy’.

b. A Palankin-bearer. From the name of the caste, Telug. and Malayal. boys, Tam. bōri, &c. Wilson gives bhoi as H. and Mahr. also. The word is in use northward at least to the Nerudda R. In the Konkan, people of this class are called Kāhār bhīś (see Ind. Ant. ii. 164, iii. 77).

P. Paulino is therefore in error, as he often is, when he says that the word boy as applied by the English and other Europeans to the coolies or jacchini who carry the dooly, “has nothing to do with any Indian language.” In the first and third quotations (under b), the use is more like a, but any connection with English at the dates seems impossible.

BRAHMIN, BRAHMAN, BRAH-

MIN, s. In some parts of India called Bahman; Skt. Brahamana. This word now means a member of the priestly caste, but the original meaning and use were different. Haug. Brahma und die Brahmanen, pp. 8-11 traces the word to the root bhr, 'to increase,' and shows how it has come to have its present signification. The older English form is Brachman, which comes to us through the Greek and Latin authors.

1714.—"The Dervis at first made some scruple of violating his promise to the dying brachman. —The Spectator, No. 578.

BRAHMINY BULL, s. A bull devoted to Siva and let loose; generally found frequenting Hindu bazars, and fattened by the run of the Buniyas shops. The term is sometimes used more generally (Brahminy bull, -ox, or -cow) to denote the humped Indian ox as a species.

1872.—"He could stop a huge Bramini bull, when running in fury, by catching hold of its horns."—Govinda Sommaya, i. 89.

BRAHMINY BUTTER, s. This seems to have been an old name for Ghee (q.v.). In MS. "Acct. Charges, Dieting, &c., at Fort St. David for Nov.—Jany., 1746-47," in India Office, we find:

"Butter . . . . Pagodas 2 2 0 Brahminy do. . . 1 34 0."

BRAHMINY DUCK, s. The common Anglo-Indian name of the handsome bird Casarea rutila (Pallas), or 'Ruddy Sheldrake'; constantly seen on the sandy shores of the Gangetic rivers in single pairs, the pair almost always at some distance apart. The Hindi name is chakwad, and the chakwad-chakwai (male and female of the species) afford a commonplace comparison in Hindi literature for faithful lovers and spouses. "The Hindus have a legend that two lovers for their indiscretion were transformed into Brahminy Ducks, that they are condemned to pass the night apart from each other, on opposite banks of the river, and that all night long each, in its turn, asks its mate if it shall come across, but the question is always met by a negative—"Chakwa, shall I come?" "No, Chakwi," "Chakwi, shall I come?" "No, Chakwa."—(Jordon.) The same author says the bird is occasionally killed in England.

BRAHMINY KITE, s. The Morus Pondicerianus of Jordon, Halastur Indus, Boddaert. The name is given because the bird is regarded with some reverence by the Hindus as sacred to Vishnu. It is found throughout India.

c. 1328.—"There is also in this India a certain bird, big like a Kite, having a white head and belly, but all red above, which boldly snatches fish out of the hands of fishermen and other people, and indeed [these birds] go on just like dogs."—Friar Jordanus, 38.

1673.—"...tis Sacrilege with them to kill a Cow or Calf; but highly pious to shoot a Kite, dedicated to the Brachmans, for which Money will hardly pacify."—Fryer, 33.

[1813.—"We had still a bold and more ravenous enemy in the hawks and brahimine kites."—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., ii. 162.]

BRAHMO-SOMAJ, s. The Bengali pronunciation of Skt. Brahma Samaja, assembly of Brahmists; Brahma being the Supreme Being according to the Indian philosophic systems. The reform of Hinduism so called was begun by Ram Mohun Roy (Rama Mohana Roy) in 1830. Professor A. Weber has shown that it does not constitute an independent Indian movement, but is derived from European Theism. [Also see Montier-Williams, Brahmanism, 496.]

1876.—"The Brahmo Somaj, or Theistic Church of India, is an experiment hitherto unique in religious history."—Collet, Brahmo Year-book, 5.

BRANDUL, s. 'Backstay,' in Sea H. Port. brandal (Roebuck).

BRANDY COORTEE, -COATEE. s. Od sometimes simply Brandy. A corruption of bardan, 'a cloak,' literally pluviale, from P. bardan, 'rain.' Barnd-kurti seems to be a kind of hybrid shaped by the English word coat, though kurti and kurti are true P. words for various forms of jacket or tunic.

[1754.—"Their women also being not less than 6000, were dressed with great coats (these are called baramul) of crimson cloth, after the manner of the men, and not to be
BRANDYPAWNEE. 113

BRANDYPAWNEE, s. Brandy and water; a specimen of genuine Urdu, i.e. Camp jargon, which hardly needs interpretation. H. pani, 'water.' Williamson (1810) has brandy-shrub-passy (V. M. ii. 123).

[1854.—"I'm sorry to see you gentlemen drinking brandy-pawnee," says he; "it plays the deuce with our young men in India."—Thackeray, Newcomes, ch. i.]

BRASS-KNOCKER, s. A term applied to a réchauffé or serving up again of yesterday's dinner or supper. It is said to be found in a novel by Winwood Reade called Liberty Hall, as a piece of Anglo-Indian slang; and it is supposed to be a corruption of base khdina, H. 'stale food'; see 5 ser. N. & Q., 34, 77.]

BRATY, s. A word, used only in the South, for cakes of dry cow dung, used as fuel more or less all over India. It is Tam. varatti, [or vrdita], 'dried dung.' Various terms are current elsewhere, but in Upper India the most common is upld.—(Vide OOPLA).

BRAVA, n.p. A sea-port on the east coast of Africa, lat. 1° 7' N., long. 44° 3', properly Barawa.

1516.—"... a town of the Moors, well walled, and built of good stone and whited, which is called Brava... It is a place of trade, which has already been destroyed by the Portuguese, with great slaughter of the inhabitants..."—Barboes, 15.

BRASIL-WOOD, s. This name is now applied in trade to a dye-wood imported from Pernambuco, which is derived from certain species of Caesalpinia indigenous there. But it originally applied to a dye-wood of the same genus which was imported from India, and which is now known in trade as Sappan (q.v.). [It is the andam or bakram of the Arabs (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 49.)] The history of the word is very curious. For when the name was applied to the newly discovered region in S. America, probably, as Barros alleges, because it produced a dye-wood similar in character to the brasil of the East, the trade-name gradually became appropriated to the S. American product, and was taken away from that of the E. Indies. See some further remarks in Marco Polo, 2nd ed., ii. 368-370 [and Encycl. Bibl. i. 190]. This is alluded to also by Camões (x. 140): "But here where Earth spreads wider, ye shall claim realms by the ruddy Dye-wood made renowned; these of the 'Sacred Cross' shall win the name: by your first Navy shall that world be found." Burton.

The medieval forms of brazil were many; in Italian it is generally verzi, versino, or the like.

1330.—"And here they burn the brasill-wood (verzina) for fuel..."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., p. 77.

1552.—"... when it came to the 3d of May, and Pedralvares was about to set sail, in order to give a name to the land thus newly discovered, he ordered a very great Cross to be hoisted at the top of a tree, after mass had been said at the foot of the tree, and it had been set up with the solemn benediction of the priests, and then he gave the country the name of Santa Cruz... But as it was through the symbol of the Cross that the Devil lost his dominion over us... as soon as the red wood called Brasil began to arrive from that country, he wrought that that name should abide in the mouth of the people, and that the name of Holy Cross should be lost, as if the name of a wood for colouring cloth were of more moment than that wood which imbues all the sacraments with the tincture of salvation, which is the Blood of Jesus Christ."—Barros, i. v. 2.

1554.—"The bear (Bahar) of Brasil contains 20 faracóras (see FRASALA), weighing it in a colir rope, and there is no matucia (see PICOTA)"—A. Nunes, 18.

1641.—"We went to see the Rasel-house where the lusty knaves are compelled to labour, and the rasping of Brasil and Logwood is very hard labour."—Evelyn's Diary, August (19).
BREECH-CANDY, n.p. A locality on the shore of Bombay Island to the north of Malabar Hill. The true name, as Dr. Murray Mitchell tells me, is believed to be Burj-khad, 'the Tower of the Creek.'

BRIDGEMÁN, s. Anglo-Sepoy H. brýjman, denoting a military prisoner, of which word it is a quaint corruption.

BRINJARRY, s. Also BINJAR-BEE, BUNJAR-BEE, and so on. But the first form has become classical from its constant occurrence in the Indian Despatches of Sir A. Wellesley. The word is properly H. banjdr, and Wilson derives it from Skt. bani, 'trade,' katra, 'doer.' It is possible that the form brýjdr may have been suggested by a supposed connection with the Pers. birýj, 'rice.' (It is alleged in the Dict. of Words used in the E. Indies, 2nd ed., 1805, to be derived from birýj, 'rice,' and ara, 'bring'). The Brinjarres of the Deccan are dealers in grain and salt, who move about, in numerous parties with cattle, carrying their goods to different markets, and who in the days of the Deccan wars were the great resource of the commissariat, as they followed the armies with supplies for sale. They talk a kind of agratta in the west appear to have a tradition of having first come to the Deccan with Moghul camps as commissariat carriers. In a pamphlet called Some Account of the Bunjarra Class, by N. R. Cumberlege, District Sup. of Police, Bassein, Berar (Bombay, 1882; [North Indian N. & Q. iv. 163 seqq.]), the author attempts to distinguish between brýjarres as 'grain-carriers,' and bunjarrahs, from banjdr, 'waste land' (meaning banjar or bunjur). But this seems fanciful. In the N.-W. Provinces the name is also in use, and is applied to a numerous tribe spread along the skirt of the Himālaya from Hardwar to Gorakhpur, some of whom are settled, whilst the rest move about with their cattle, sometimes transporting goods for hire, and sometimes carrying grain, salt, lime, forest produce, or other merchandise for sale. [See Crooke, Tribes and Castes, i 149 seqq.] Vanjaras, as they are called about Bombay, used to come down from Rajputāna and Central India, with large droves of cattle, laden with grain &c., taking back with them salt in the most part. These were not mere carriers, but the actual dealers, paying ready money, and they were ordered in conduct.

c. 1505.—"As scarcity was felt in h camp (Sultan Sikandar Lodi's) in consequence of the non-arrival of the Banjaras he despatched 'Asam Humayyun for the purpose of bringing in supplies."—Nanam Ullah, in Elliot, v. 100 (written c. 1612).

1516.—"The Moors and Gentiles of the cities and towns throughout the country come to set up their shops and cloths at Chaul ... they bring these in great caravans of domestic oxen, with packs, like donkeys, and on the top of these long white sacks placed crosswise, in which they bring their goods; and one man drives 30 or 40 beasts for them."—Baretoe, 71.

1563.—"... This King of Dejly took the Balagat from certain very powerful gentooes. These are tribes that are now called Venesaras, and from others dwelling in the country, who are called Collas; and all these, Collas, and Venesaras, and Reisbutos, live by theft and robbery to this day."—Garcia De O., f. 34.

c. 1582.—"The very first step which Mohabut Khan [Khan Khánán] took in the Deccan, was to present the Bunjaras of Hindostan, with elephants, horses, and cloths; and he collected (by these conciliatory measures) so many of them that he had one chief Bunjara at Agrah, another in Goojrat, and another above the Ghats, and established the advanced price of 10 sar per rupee (in his camp) to enable him to buy it cheaper."—Ms. Life of Mohabut Khan (Khan Khanán), in Briggs's paper quoted below, 183.

1638.—"... Il y a dans le Royaume de Curnouen vn certain peuple qu'ils appellent Vene-sara, qui achettent le bled et le rie ... pour le rendre dans l'Indosth ... ou ils vont auees des Calista ou Caravaces de cinq ou six, et quelque fois de neuf ou dix mille bestes de somme ...."—Mandello, 245.

1793.—"Whilst the army halted on the 23rd, accounts were received from Captain Read ... that his convoy of Brinjarres had been attacked by a body of horse."—Dirom, 2.

1800.—"The Brinjarres I look upon in the light of servants of the public, of whose grain I have a right to regulate the sale ... always taking care that they have a proportionate advantage."—A. Wellesley, in Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 284.

"The Brinjarres drop in by degrees."—Wellington, i. 175.

1810.—"Immediately facing us a troop of Brinjarres had taken up their residence for the night. These people travel from one end of India to the other, carrying salt, grain, assafetida, almost as necessary to an army as salt."—Maria Graham, 61.
BRINJAL. 115  BRINJAL.

1813.—"We met there a number of Vanjaraas, or merchants, with large droves of oxen, laden with valuable articles, from the interior country, to commute for salt on the sea-coast."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 206; [2nd ed. i. 118; also see ii. 276 seqq.]

"As the Dacan is devoid of a single navigable river, and has no roads that admit of wheel-carriages, the whole of this extensive intercourse is carried on by laden bullocks, the property of that class of people known as Bunjaras."—Ann. Orig., Hist. and Manners of the Vanjawas, by Capt. John Briggs, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 61.

1825.—"We passed a number of Brinjarres who were carrying salt. . . . They had all bow's . . . arrows, sword and shield. . . . Even the children had, many of them, bows and arrows suited to their strength, and I saw one young woman equipped in the same manner."—Heber, ii. 94.

1877.—"They were brinjarres, or carriers of grain, and were quietly encamped at a village about 24 miles off; trading most unexpectingly in grain and salt."—Meadows Taylor, Life, ii. 17.

BRINJAL. a. The name of a vegetable called in the W. Indies the Egg-plant, and more commonly known to the English in Bengal under that of bengus (prop. bayingan). It is the Solanum Melongena, L., very commonly cultivated on the shores of the Mediterranean as well as in India and the East generally. Though not known in a wild state under this form, there is no reasonable doubt that S. Melongena is a derivative of the common Indian S. insanus, L. The word in the form brinjaul is from the Portuguese, as we shall see. But probably there is no word of the kind which has undergone such extraordinary variety of modifications, whilst retaining the same meaning, as this. The Skt. is budasi, H. budati, bayingan, P. badingan, badingan, Ar. badingan, Span. albergenan, beringana, Port. bingela, bingela, bingella, Low Latin melanguola, meranguola, Ital. melangola, melanzana, mel a insana, &c. (see P. della Valle, below), French aubergine (from albergena), melongène, merangè, and particularly belingone, aubergine, auberge, albergine, albergame. (See Marcel Devie, p. 46.) Littre, we may remark, explains (dormantse Homero) aubergine as 'espice de morelle,' giving the etym. as "diminutif de abergy" (in the sense of a kind of peach). Melongena is no real Latin word, but a factitious rendering of melanzana, or, as Marcel Devie says, "Latin du botaniste." It looks as if the Skt. word were the original of all. The H. bayingan again seems to have been modified from the P. badingan, [or, as Platta asserts, direct from the Skt. vanga, vangana, 'the plant of Bengal," and bayingan also through the Ar. to have been the parent of the Span. berengena, and so of all the other European names except the English 'egg-plant.' The Ital. mel a insana is the most curious of these corruptions, framed by the usual effort after meaning, and connecting itself with the somewhat indigestible reputation of the vegetable as it is eaten in Italy, which is a fact. When cholera is abroad it is considered (e.g. in Sicily) to be an act of folly to eat the melanzana. There is, however, behind this, some notion (exemplified in the quotation from Lane's Mod. Egypt. below) connecting the badingan with madness. [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 417.] And it would seem that the old Arab medical writers give it a bad character as an article of diet. Thus Avicenna says the badingan generates melancholy and obstructions. To the N. O. Solanaceae many poisonous plants belong.

The word has been carried, with the vegetable, to the Archipelago, probably by the Portuguese, for the Malays call it berinjul. [On this Mr. Skeat writes: "The Malay form brinjul, from the Port., not berinjul, is given by Clifford and Swettenham, but it cannot be established as a Malay word, being almost certainly the Eng. brinjaul done into Malay. It finds no place in Klinkert, and the native Malay word, which is the only word used in pure Peninsular Malay, is terong or trong. The form berinjul, I believe, must have come from the Islands if it really exists."] 1554.—(At Goa). "And the excise from garden stuff under which are comprised these things, viz.: Radishes, beetroot, garlic, onions green and dry, green tamarinds, lettuce, comabalinga, ginger, oranges, dill, coriander, mint, cabbage, salted mangoes, brinjalas, lemons, gourd, citrons, cucumbers, which articles none may sell in retail except the Rendeiro of this excise, or some one who has got permission from him."—S. Bostelo, Tombo, 49.

1580.—"Trifolium quoque viron comendunt Arabes, mentham Judaei crudam, . . . mela insana . . ."—Proper Alpinus, i. 65.

1611.—"We had a market there kept upon the Strand of divers sorts of provisions, towit... Pallingenes, cucumbers...

1616.—"It seems to me to be one of those fruits which are called in good Tuscan potroncian, but which by the Lombards are called melanzane, and by the vulgar at Rome marignana; and if my memory does not deceive me, by the Neapolitans in their patois malagnane." —P. della Valle, i. 197.

1673.—"The Garden... planted with Potatoes, beans, Barenjaws, both hot plants..." —Pryer, 104.

1738.—"Then follow during the rest of the summer, calabashas... bedin-janas, and tomatas." —Shaw’s Travels, 2nd ed. 1757, p. 141.

c. 1740.—"This man (Balaji Rao), who had become absolute in Hindostan as well as in Dccan, was fond of bread made of Badjrah... he lived on raw Bringoelas, on unripe mangoes, and on raw red pepper." —Seir Mutaghiri, iii. 229.

1785.—Bonafer writes Beringodes. — i. 183.

1783.—Forrest spells brinjalles (V. to Merut, 40); and (1810) Williamson biringal (V. M. i. 186). Forbes (1815), biringal and barenjal (Or. Mem. i. 32) [in 2nd ed. i. 22, bungala] ii. 50; [in 2nd ed. i. 348].

1810.—"I saw last night at least two acres covered with brinjal, a species of Solanum." —Maria Graham, 24.

1826.—"A plate of poached eggs, fried in sugar and butter; a dish of badenfains, slit in the middle and boiled in grease." —Haji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 150.

1835.—"The neighbours unanimously declared that the husband was mad... One exclaimed: ‘There is no strength nor power but in God! God restore thee!’ Another said: ‘How sad! He was really a worthy man.’ A third remarked: ‘Badingans are very abundant just now.’

—Lane, Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, 299.

1860.—"Amongst other triumphs of the native cuisine were some singular, but by no means inelegant chefs d’œuvre, brinjals boiled and stuffed with savoury meats, but exhibiting ripe and undressed fruit growing on the same branch." —Tennent’s Ceylon, ii. 161. This dish is mentioned in the Sanskrit Cookery Book, which passes as by King Nala. It is managed by wrapping part of the fruit in wet cloths whilst the rest is being cooked.

BROACH, n.p. Bharoch, an ancient and still surviving city of Guzerat, on the River Nerudda. The original forms of the name are Bhirgu-Kachcha, and Bhudu-Kachcha, which last form appears in the Sunnar Cave Inscription No. ix., and this was written with fair correctness by the Greeks as Barrovias and Barybros. "Illiterate Guzerattees would in attempting to articulate Bhreeghoo-Khetra (sic), lose the half in coalescence, and call it Barigache." —Drummond, Illus. of Guzerattes, &c.

c. B.C. 20.—"And then laughing, and strippt naked, anointed and with his loin-cloth on, he leaped upon the pyre. And this inscription was set upon his tomb: Zarmanochgas the Indian from Barago'h having rendered himself immortal after the hereditary custom of the Indians..." —Nicolaus Damascenus, in Strabo, v. 72. [Lassen takes the name Zarmanochgas to represent the Skt. Srémanadharya, teacher of the Srémanas, from which it would appear that he was a Buddhist priest.]

c. A.D. 80.—"On the right, at the very mouth of the gulf, there is a long and narrow strip of shoal... And if one succeeds in getting into the gulf, still it is hard to hit the mouth of the river leading to Barygaza, owing to the land being so low... and when found it is difficult to enter, owing to the shoals of the river near the mouth. On this account there are at the entrances fishermen employed by the King... to meet ships as far off as Syrastrene, and by these they are piloted up to Barygaza." —Periplus, sect. 43. It is very interesting to compare Hornburgh with this ancient account.

From the sands of Swallow to Broach a continued bank extends along the shore, which at Broach river projects out about 5 miles... The tide flows here... velocity 6 knots... rising nearly 30 feet... On the north side of the river, a great way up, the town of Broach is situated; vessels of considerable burden may proceed to this place, as the channels are deep in many places, but too intricate to be navigated without a pilot." —India Directory (in loco).

1785.—Barse is mentioned as one of the places against which Arab attacks were directed.—See Elliot, i. 441.

c. 1300.—... a river which lies between the Saraut and Gangas... has a south-westerly course till it falls into the sea near Bharuch." —Al-Biruni, in Elliot, i. 49.

A.D. 1521.—"After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday, in Thana of India, I baptized about 90 persons in a certain city, called Parocco, 10 days journey distant therefrom..." —Prier Jordanus, in Cathay, &c., 226.

1552.—"A great and rich ship said to belong to Meleque Gupij, Lord of Baroche." —Barros, II. vi. 2.

[1615.—"It would be necessary to give credit unto two or three Gussaratte for some cloth to make a voyage to Burrouse." —Foster, Letters, iv. 94.]

1617.—"We gave our host... a peecce of backar baroche to his children to make them 2 coatses."—Cocke's Diary, i. 330.  [Bockar here seems to represent a port connected with Broach, called in the Ais (ii. 243) Bhaskor or Bhakor; Bayley gives Bhakorh as a village on the frontier of Gujerat.]

1639. —"Before the hour of complines ... we arrived at the city of Barochi, or Behrug as they call it in Persian, under the walls on the south side, flows a river called Nerochi."—P. della Valle, ii. 529; [Hak. Soc. i. 60].

1756.—"Bandar of Behuch."—(Bird's tr. of Mira'i-Hamadi, 115.]

1803.—"I have the honour to enclose ... papers which contain a detailed account of the ... capture of Baroch."—Waddington, i. 269.

BUCK, v. To prate, to chatter, to talk much and egotistically. H. baknd.  [A buck-stick is a chatterer.]

1890.—"And then ... he bucks with a quiet stubborn determination that would fill an American editor, or an Under Secretary of State with despair. He belongs to the 12-foot-tiger school, so perhaps he can't help it."—Alt Baba, 184.

BUCKAU, s. Ar. H. bakkl, 'a shopkeeper;' a bunya (q. v. under BANYAN).  In Ar. it means rather a 'second-hand' dealer.

[c. 1500.—"There is one cast of the Vaisyas called Banik, more commonly termed Banja (grain-merchant). ... The Persians name them bakkl .'—Ais, tr. Jurveti, iii. 118.]

1800.—"... a bucks of this place told me he would let me have 500 bags to-morrow."—Waddington, i. 199.

1826.—"Should I find our neighbour the Baqual ... at whose shop I used to spend in sweetmeats all the copper money that I could purloin from my father."—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, 285.

BUCKSHAW, s. We have not been able to identify the fish so called, or the true form of the name. Perhaps it is only H. bachchah, Mehr. bachcha (P. bachi, Skt. vata), 'the young of any creature.' But the Konkanti Dict. gives 'bousen, peixe pequeno de qualquer sorte,' 'little fish of any kind.' This is perhaps the real word; but it also may represent bachcha. The practice of manuring the coco-palms with putrid fish is still rife, as residents of the Government House at Parell never forget. The fish in use is refuse bummelo (q. v.). [The word is really the H. bachchah, a well-known edible fish which abounds in the Ganges and other N. Indian rivers. It is either the Pseudotropius garus, or P. murius of Day, Fish. Ind., nos. 474 or 471; Fau. Br. Ind. i. 141, 137.]

1739.—"... Coco Nut, for Oyl, which latter they dunging with (Bubhas) Fish, the Land-Breeses brought a poisonous Smell on board Ship."—Fryer, 55.  [Also see Wheeler, Early Res., 40.]

1727.—"The Air is somewhat unhealthful, which is chiefly imputed to their dunging their Cocoa-nut trees with Buck-shaw, a sort of small Fishes which their Sea abounds in."—A. Hamilton, i. 181.

1894.—"... manure for the coconut-tree ... consisting of the small fry of fish, and called by the country name of Buckshaw."—Grose, i. 31.

BUCKSHAW, s. This is also used in Cocke's Diary (i. 63, 99) for some kind of Indian piece-goods, we know not what. [The word is not found in modern lists of piece-goods. It is perhaps a corruption of Pers. bukchah, 'a bundle,' used specially of clothes. Tavernier (see below) uses the word in its ordinary sense.

1615.—"80 pieces Borkha gingama"; "For Borkhaw, double piece, at 9 mas."—Ibid. iii. 156; iv. 50.

1665.—"I went to lie down, my bouchha being all the time in the same place, half under the head of my bed and half outside."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 166.]

BUCKSHEESH, BUZhEXES, s. P. through P. — H. bakshish, Buonamano, Trinkgeld, pourboire; we don't seem to have in England any exact equivalent for the word, though the thing is so general; 'something for (the driver)' is a poor expression; tip is accurate, but is slang; gratuity is official or dictionary English.

1759.—"To Presents:—R. A. F.

c. 1780.—"... Buxie money."—Isea, 51.

1810.—... each mile will cost full one rupee (i.e. 2a. 6d.), besides various little disbursements by way of buxees, or presents, to every set of bearers."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 235.

1823.—"These Christmas-boxes are said to be an ancient custom here, and I could almost fancy that our name of box for this particular kind of present... is a corruption of buckahish, a gift or gratuity, in Turkish, Persian, and Hindoostanee."—Heber, i. 45.

1833.—"The relieved bearers opened the shutters, thrust in their torch, and their black heads, and most unceremoniously demanded buxees."—W. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 239.

BUCKYNE, s. H. backydan, the tree Melia azedarach, Roxb. (N. O. Malvaceae). It has a considerable resemblance to the mim tree (see NEM); and in Bengali is called maha-nim, which is also the Skt. name, mahanimba. It is sometimes erroneously called Persian Lilac.

BUDDHA, BUDDHISM, BUDDHIST. These words are often written with a quite erroneous assumption of precision Bhudda, &c. All that we shall do here is to collect some of the earlier mentions of Buddha and the religion called by his name.

c. 240.—"Wisdom and deeds have always from time to time been brought to mankind by the messengers of God. So in one age they have been brought to mankind by the messenger called Buddha to India, in another by Zarathushtra to Persia, in another by Jesus to the West. Thereupon this revelation has come down, this prophecy in this last age, through me, Maitri, the messenger of the God of truth to Babylonia."—The Book of Maitri, called Shaburkhan, quoted by Albirashed, in his Chronology, tr. by Sachau, p. 190.

Ut Christioloam de virginis partu non-solennis natura, vel auctoritas sacrae lecturae sed superficiis Gentilis, et commenta perdendoque fabulosi."—Ratramani Corbeleinii L. de Nativitate Xti., cap. iii. in L. D'Acker, Speculium, tom. i. p. 54, Paris, 1723.

c. 870.—"The Indians give in general the name of budd to anything, connected with their worship, or which forms the object of their veneration. So, an idol is called bodd."—Biddulph, in Ellicot, i. 123.

c. 904.—"Buddhasat was the founder of the Sabean Religion, who was induced to mankind renunciation (of this world) and the intimate contemplation of the superior worlds... There was to be read on the gate of the Naobhar* at Balkh an inscription in the Persian tongue of which this is the interpretation: 'The words of Buddhasat: In the courts of kings three things are needed, Sincerity, Patience, Wealth.' Below had been written in Arabic: 'Buddhasat lies. If a free man possesses any of the three, he will flee from the courts of Kings.'"—

Maus, iv. 45 and 49.

1000.—... pseudo-prophets came forward, the number and history of whom it would be impossible to detail... The first mentioned is Buddhasat, who came forward in India...—Albirashed, Chronology, by Sachau, p. 196. This name given to Buddha is specially interesting as showing a step nearer the true Budhakatta, the origin of the name 'Judea,' under which Buddha became a Saint of the Church, and as elucidating Prof. Max Müller's ingenious suggestion of that origin (see Chipa, &c., iv. 184; see also Academy, Sept. 1, 1888, p. 146).

c. 1090.—"A stone was found there in the temple of the great Budda on which an inscription... purporting that the temple had been founded 50,000 years ago...—A'Utbi, in Elliot, ii. 39.

c. 1060.—"This madman then, Manes (also called Scythianus) was by race a Brahman, and he had for his teacher Budas, formerly called Terebithus, who having been brought up by Scythianus in the learning of the Greeks became a follower of the sect of Empedocles (who said there were two first principles opposed to one another), and when he entered Persia declared that he had been born of a virgin, and had been brought up among the hills... and this Budas (alias Terebithus) did perish, crushed by an unclean spirit."—Georg. Cedrenus, Hist. Comp.,

* Naobhar = Naya-Vihara ('New Buddhist Monastery') is still the name of a district adjoining Balkh.
It is remarkable how many poems on the subject of Buddha have appeared of late years. We have noted:

2. The Story of Gautama Buddha and his Creed: An Epic by Richard Phillips, Longmans, 1871. This is also printed in octaves, but each octave consists of 4 heroic couplets.

3. Vasavadatta, a Buddhist Idyll; by Dean Plumtre. Republished in Things New and Old, 1884. The subject is the story of the Courtisan of Mathura ("Vasavadatta and Upagupta"), which is given in Burnouf's Introd. a l'Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien, 146-148; a touching story, even in its original crude form.

It opens:

"Where proud Mathura rears her hundred towers. . . ."

The Skt. Dict. gives indeed as an alternative Mathura, but Mathura is the usual name, whence Anglo-Ind. Muttra.

4. The brilliant Poem of Sir Edwin Arnold, called The Light of Asia, or the Great Renunciation, being the Life and Teaching of Gautama, Prince of India, and Founder of Buddhism, as told in verse by an Indian Buddhist, 1879.

BUDGE-BUDGE, n. p. A village on the Hooghly R., 15 m. below Calcutta, where stood a fort which was captured by Clive when advancing on Calcutta to recapture it, in December, 1756. The Imperial Gazetteer gives the true name as Baj-baj, [but Hamilton writes Bhuya-bhuj].

1756.—"On the 29th December, at six o'clock in the morning, the admiral having landed the Company's troops the evening before at Majapos, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Clive, cannonaded Bougee Bougee Fort, which was strong and built of mud, and had a wet ditch round it."—Iems, 99.

1757.—The Author of Memoir of the Revolution in Bengal calls it Budubugia; (1763), Luke Scottoff Budge Goodes.

BUDGEROW, s. A lumbering keelless barge, formerly much used by Europeans travelling on the Gangetic rivers. Two-thirds of the length ait was occupied by cabins with Venetian windows. Wilson gives the word as H. and B. bajra; Shakespear gives H. bajra and bajra, with an improbable suggestion of derivation from bajar, 'hard or heavy.' Among Blochmann's extracts from Mahomedan accounts of the conquest of Assam we find, in a detail of Mir Jumla's fleet in his expedition of 1662, mention of 4 bajras (J. As. Soc. Ben. xli. pt. i. 73). The same extracts contain mention of war-aloops called bachiari (pp. 57, 75, 81), but these last must be different. Bajra may possibly have been applied in the sense of 'thunder-bolt.' This may seem unsuited to the modern budgerow, but is not more so than the title of 'lightning-darter' is to the modern Burkundanze (q.v.)! We remember how Joinville says of the approach of the great galley of the Count of Jaffa:—"Semblait que fouree chest des cieux." It is however perhaps more probable that bajra may have been a variation of bagla. And this is especially suggested by the existence of the Portuguese form pajaros, and of the Ar. form bagara (see under BUGGALOW).

Mr. Edye, Master Shipwright of the Naval Yard in Trincomalee, in a paper on the Native Craft of India and Ceylon, speaks of the Baggala or Budgerow, as if he had been accustomed to hear the words used indiscriminately. (See J. R. A. S., vol. i. p. 12): [There is a drawing of a modern Budgerow in Grant, Rural Life, p. 5.]

c. 1570.—"Their barkes be light and armed with oares, like to Foibes. . . . and they call these barkes Bawaraz and Pataus" (in Bengal).—Cesar Frederick, E. T. in Halk. ii. 388.

1662.—(Blochmann's Ext. as above).

1705.—"... des Bawara qui sont de grands bateau."—Lutillier, 52.

1723.—"Le lendemain nous passâmes sur les Bawaras de la compagnie de France."—Lett. Edif. xiii. 268.

1727.—"... in the evening to recreate themselves in Chaises or Palankins; or by water in their Budgeroes, which is a convenient Boat."—A. Hamilton, li. 12.

1737.—"Charges, Budgrows... Rs. 261. 6. 3."—MS. Account from W. Williams, in India Office.

1780.—"A gentleman's Bugerow was drove ashore near Chau-paul Gault."—Hick's Bengal Gazette, May 13th.

1781.—"The boats used by the natives for travelling, and also by the Europeans, are the budgerows, which both sail and row."—Hodges, 39.

1783.—"... his boat, which, though in Kashmir (it) was thought magnificent, would not have been disgraced in the station of a Kitchen-tender to a Bengal budgero."—G. Forster, Journey, ii. 10.

1784.—"I shall not be at liberty to enter my budgerow till the end of July, and must be again at Calcutta on the 22d of October."—Sir W. Jones, in Mem. ii. 38.

1785.—"... Mr. Hastings went aboard his Budgerow, and proceeded down the river, as soon as the tide served, to embark for Europe on the Berrington."—In Selon-Karr, i. 86.

1794.—"By order of the Governor-General in Council... will be sold the Hon'ble Company's Budgerow, named the Sons-mookhee... the Budgerow lays in the nallah opposite to Chitpore."—Ibid. ii. 114.

1830.—"Upon the bosom of the tide Vessels of every fabric ride; The fisher's skiff, the light canoe, The Bujra broad, the Bhodia trim, Or Pinnaces that gallant swim, With favouring breeze—or dull and slow Against the heady current go..."—H. H. Wilson, in Bengal Annual, 29.

* This (Sonamukhi, 'Chrysostoma') has continued to be the name of the Viceroy's river yacht (probably) to this day. It was so in Lord Canning's time, then represented by a large adapted to be towed by a steamer.
BUDGROOK, a Port. basarucco.
A coin of low denomination, and of varying value and metal (copper, tin, lead, and tutenague), formerly current at Goa and elsewhere on the Western Coast, as well as at some other places on the Indian seas. It was also adopted from the Portuguese in the earliest English coinage at Bombay. In the earliest Goa coinage, that of Albuquerque (1510), the real or basarucco was equal to 2 reis, of which reis there went 420 to the gold cruzado (Gerson da Cunha). The name appears to have been a native one in use in Goa at the time of the conquest, but its etymology is uncertain. In Van Noort's Voyage (1648) the word is derived from basdr, and said to mean 'market-money' (perhaps basdr-raka, the last word being used for a copper coin in Canarese). [This view is accepted by Gray in his notes on Pyrard (Hak. Soc. ii. 68), and by Burnell (Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 143). The Madras, Admin. Mon. Gloss. (s.v.) gives the Can. form as bajdr-rohka, 'market-money.'] C. P. Brown (MS. notes) makes the word -badaga-raka, which he says would in Canarese be 'basepenny,' and he ingeniously quotes Shakespeare's 'beggarly denier,' and Horace's "vilem assem." This is adopted in substance by Mr. E. Thomas, who points out that ruka or rukka is in Mahratti (see Molenworth, s.v.) one-twelfth of an anna. But the words of Khafi Khan below suggest that the word may be a corruption of the P. busury, 'big,' and according to Wilson, budrakh (s.v.) is used in Mahratti as a dialectic corruption of busury. This derivation may be partially corroborated by the fact that at Mocha there is, or was formerly, a coin (which had become a money of account only, 80 to the dollar) called kabir, i.e. 'big' (see Ovington, 463, and Milburn, i. 98). If we could attach any value to Pyrard's spelling—boursurques—this would be in favour of the same etymology; as is also the form basory given by Mandelslo. [For a full examination of the value of the budgrook based on the most recent authorities, see Whiteway, Rise of the Port. Power, p. 68.]

1654.—Basarucos at Mulucco (Mohucaes) 50,—1 tanga, at 80 reis to the tanga, 5 tagas =1 pardao. "Os quases basarucos se faz comorta de 200 caixas" (i.e. to the tanga).—A. Nunes, 41.

[1584.—Basaruchies, Barret, in Hakl. See SHEOFF.]

1588.—"They pay two Basarukes, which is as much as a Hollanders Doit. . . . It is molten money of badde Tinne."—Linschoten, 52, 69; [Hak. Soc. i. 180, 242].

1609.—"Le plus bas argent, sont Basa rucoos . . . et sont fait de mauvais Estain."—Houtmann, in Navigation des Hollandois, i. 53e.

c. 1610.—"Il y en a de plusieurs sortes. Le premier est appollée Bonsurques, dont il en faut 75 pour un Tanc. Il y a d'autre Bonsurques vieilles, dont il en faut 105 pour le Tanche. . . . Il y a de cette monnoye qui est de fer; et d'autre de caltin, metal de Chine" (see CALAY).—Pyrard, ii. 39; see also 21; [Hak. Soc. ii. 33, 68].

1611.—"Or a Viceroy coins false money; for so I may call it, as the people lose by it. For copper is worth 40 xerafins (see XERA-FINE) the hundred weight, but they coin the basarucos at the rate of 80 and 70. The Moors on the other hand, keeping a keen eye on our affairs, and seeing what a huge profit there is, coin there on the mainland a great quantity of basarucos, and gradually smuggle them into Goa, making a pitiful of gold."—Couto, Dialogo do Soldado Furtivo, 158.

1638.—"They have (at Gombroon) a certain Copper Coin which they call Besury, whereof 6 make a Peys, and 10 Peys make a Chay (2sh4) which is worth about 5d. English."—V. and Tr. of J. A. Mandelslo into the E. Indies, E. T. 1659, p. 8.

1672.—"Their coins (at Tanor in Malabar) of Copper, a Baserook, 20 of which make a Panam."—Fryer, 53. [He also spells the word Basrook. See quotation under BEANS.]

1711.—"The Budgrooks (at Muskat) are mixt Mettle, rather like Iron than anything else, have a Cross on one side, and were coin'd by the Portuguese. Thirty of them make a silver Mamooda, of about Eight Penez Value."—Lockyer, 211.

c. 1720-30.—"They (the Portuguese) also use bits of copper which they call busury, and four of these busurs pass for a Julas."—Khafi Khan, in Elliot, v. 345.

1760.—"At Goa the scorahim is worth 240 Portugal reis, or about 16d. sterling; 2 reis make a basaraco, 15 basaracos a rixim, 42 riximos a tanga, 4 tangas a puro, 24 pures a pagoda of gold."—Grose, i. 892.

1838.—"Only eight or ten loads (of coffeee) were imported this year, including two loads of 'Kopes' (see COFECCK), the copper currency of Russia, known in this country by the name of Bughrukohca. They are converted to the same uses as copper."—Report from Kabul, by A. Burns; in Punjub Trade Report, App. p. iii.
This may possibly contain some indication of the true form of this obscure word, but I have derived no light from it myself. The Budlee was apparently current at Muscat down to the beginning of last century (see Milburn, i. 116).

BUDLEE.

A substitute in public or domestic service. H. badal, 'exchange; a person taken in exchange; a locum tenens'; from Ar. badal, 'he changed.' (See Muddle.)

BUDMÄSH, a. One following evil courses; Fr. mauvais sujet; It. malandrino. Properly bad-mash, from P. bad, 'evil,' and Ar. ma'dah, 'means of livelihood.'

1844.—"... the reputation which John Lawrence acquired ... by the masterly manoeuvring of a body of police with whom he descended on a nest of gamblers and cut-throats, 'budimashes' of every description, and took them all prisoners."—Bowsworth Smith's Life of Lt. Lawrence, i. 178.

1866.—"'The truth of the matter is that I was foolish enough to pay these budimashes beforehand, and they have thrown me over.'—The Dank Bungalow, by G. O. Trevelyan, in Fraser, p. 385.

1866.—"Cholmondeley. Why the shaitan didn't you come before, you lazy old budzat?"—The Dank Bungalow, p. 215.

BUFFALO.

This is of course originally from the Latin bubalus, which we have in older English forms, buffle and buff and bugle, through the French. The present form probably came from India, as it seems to be the Port. buffalo. The proper meaning of bubalus, according to Pliny, was not an animal of the ox-kind (bov[bilas] was a kind of African antelope); but in Martial, as quoted, it would seem to bear the vulgar sense, rejected by Pliny.

At an early period of our connection with India the name of buffalo appears to have been given erroneously to the common Indian ox, whence came the still surviving misnomer of London shops, 'buffalo humps.' (See also the quotation from Ovington.) The buffalo has no hump. Buffalo tongues are another matter, and an old luxury, as the third quotation shows. The ox having appropriated the name of the buffalo, the true Indian domestic buffalo was differentiated as the 'water buffalo,' a phrase still maintained by the British soldier in India. This has probably misled Mr. Blochmann, who uses the term 'water buffalo,' in his excellent English version of the Asa (e.g. i. 219). We find the same phrase in Barkley's Five Years in Bulgaria, 1876: "Besides their bullocks every well-to-do Turk had a drove of water-buffaloes" (32). Also in Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist (1863), p. 46, and in Miss Bird's Golden Chersonese (1883), 60, 274. [The unscientific use of the word as applied to the American Bison is as old as the end of the 18th century (see N. E. D.).]

The domestic buffalo is apparently derived from the wild buffalo (Bubalus arni, Jerd.; B. bubalus, Blainv.), whose favourite habitat is in the swampy sites of the Sunderbunds and Eastern Bengal, but whose haunts extend north-eastward to the head of the Assam valley, in the Terai west to Oudh, and south nearly to the Godavery; not beyond this in the Peninsula, though the animal is found in the north and north-east of Ceylon.

The domestic buffalo exists not only in India but in Java, Sumatra, and Manilla, in Mazzanderan, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Adherbijan, Egypt, Turkey, and Italy. It does not seem to be known how or when it was introduced into Italy.—(See Hahn) [According to the Encycl. Brit. (9th ed. iv. 442), it was introduced into Greece and Italy towards the close of the 6th century.]

C. A. D. 70. — "Howbeit that country bringeth forth certain kinds of goodly great wild bovves: to wit the Bisontes, mained with a collar, like Lions; and the Vri [Ursus], a mightie strong beast, and a swift, which the ignorant people call Buffles (bufales), whereas indeed the Buffe is bred in Africa, and cariseth some resemblance of a calfe rather, or a Stag."—Pliny, by Ph. Hollande, i. 199-200.

Drummond, Illus. of Gourmet, &c.

""The tank which fed his fields was there. ...
There from the intolerable heat
The buffaloes retreat;
Only their nostrils raised to meet the air,
Amid the shel'tring element they rest."— Curse of Kehama ix. 7.

1878.—"I had in my possession a head of a cow buffalo that measures 13 feet 8 inches in circumference, and 6 feet 6 inches between the tips—the largest buffalo head in the world."—Pollok, Sport in Br. Burmah, dc., i. 107.

Buggalow, s. Mahr. bagla, ba-gala. A name commonly given on the W. coast of India to Arab vessels of the old native form. It is also in common use in the Red Sea (bafala) for the larger native vessels, all built of teak from India. It seems to be a corruption of the Span. and Port. baoel, bazal, baxel, bazella, from the Lat. va-scellum (see Dies, Etym. Wörterb. i. 439, a. v.). Cobarruvias (1811) gives in his Sp. Dict. "Bazel, quasi vassell," as a generic name for a vessel of any kind going on the sea, and quotes St. Isidore, who identifies it with phaeceus, and from whom we transcribe the passage below. It remains doubtful whether this word was introduced into the East by the Portuguese, or had at an earlier date passed into Arabic marine use.
The latter is most probable. In Corres (c. 1561) this word occurs in the form pajer, pl. pajeies (j and x being interchangeable in Sp. and Port.
See Lendas, i. 2, pp. 592, 619, &c.).
In Pinto we have another form. Among the models in the Fisheries Exhibition (1833), there was "Zaragoat or Bagarah from Aden." [On the other hand Burton (Ar. Nights, i. 119) deervies the word from the Ar. baglah,
'a she-mule.' Also see BUGGY.

Buggy, a. In India this is a (two-wheeled) gig with a hood, like the gentleman's cab that was in vogue in London about 1830-40, before broughams came in. Latham puts a (?) after the word, and the earliest tables that he gives are from the second quarter of this century (from Praed and I. D'Israeli). Though we trace the word much further back, we have not discovered its birthplace or cyymology. The word, though used in England, has never been very common there; it is better known both in Ireland and in America. Littré gives bughe as French also. The American buggy is defined by Noah Webster as "a light, one-horse, four-wheel vehicle, usually with one seat, and with or without a calash-top." Cuthbert Bede shows (N. d. Q. 5 ser. v. p. 445) that the adjective ‘buggy’ is used in the Eastern Midlands for ‘conceited.’ This suggests a possible origin. “When the Hunterian spelling-controversy raged in India, a learned Member of Council is said to have stated that he approved the change until ________ began to spell buggy as bugi. Then he gave it up.” —M. G. Keatinge. I have recently seen this spelling in print. [The N.E.D. leaves the etymology unsettled, merely saying that it has been connected with bogie and bug. The earliest quotation given is that of 1773 below.]

1773.—“Thursday 3d (June). At the sessions at Hick’s Hall two boys were indicted for driving a post-coach and four against a single horse-chaise, throwing out the driver of it, and breaking the chaise to pieces. Justice Welch, the Chairman, took notice of the frequency of the brutish custom among the post drivers, and their insensibility in making it a matter of sport, ludicrously denoting mischief of this kind ‘Running down the Buggies.’ The prisoners were sentenced to be confined in Newgate for 12 months.” —Gentleman’s Magazine, xiii. 297.

1780.—“Shall D(onald)ld come with Butts and tons And knock down Epegrams and Puns? With Chairs, old Cota, and Buggies trick ye! Forbid it, Phoebus, and forbid it, Hicky!”

In Hicky’s Bengal Gazette, May 13th.

1782.—“... go twice round the Race-Course as hard as we can set legs to ground, but we are beat hollow by Bob Crochet’s Horses driven by Miss Fanny Hardheart, who in her career oversets Tim Capias the Attorney in his Buggy. ...”—In India Gazette, Dec. 23rd.

1783.—“Wanted, an excellent Buggy Horse about 15 Hands high, that will trot 15 miles an hour.”—India Gazette, Sept. 14.

1784.—“For sale at Mr. Mann’s, Rada Bazar. A Phaeton, a four-spring’d Buggy, and a two-spring’d ditto. ...”—Calcutta Gazette, in Sein-Karr, i. 41.

1791.—“For sale. A good Buggy and Horse. ...”—Bombay Courier, Jan. 20th.

1824.—“... the Archdeacon’s buggy and horse had every appearance of issuing from the back-gate of a college in Cambridge on Sunday morning.”—Hedber, i. 192 (ed. 1844).

[1837.—“The vehicles of the place (Mong-} hir), amounting to four Buggies (that is a foolish term for a cabriole, but as it is the only vehicle in use in India, and as buggy is the only name for said vehicle, I give it up), ... were assembled for our use.”—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 14.]

BUGIS, n.p. Name given by the Malays to the dominant race of the island of Celebes, originating in the S.-Western limb of the island; the people calling themselves Wugii. But the name used to be applied in the Archipelago to native soldiers in European service, raised in any of the islands. Compare the analogous use of Telinga (q.v.) formerly in India.

1658.—“... Thereupon the Hollands resolved to unite their forces with the Bouques, that were in rebellion against their Sovereign.”—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 192.

1688.—“These Buggasses are a sort of warlike trading Malays and mercenary soldiers of India. I know not well whence they come, unless from Macassar in the Isle of Celebes.”—Dampier, ii. 108.

1758.—“... The Dutch were commanded by Colonel Rousela, a French soldier of fortune. They consisted of nearly 700 Europeans, and as many buggasses, besides country troops.”—Narr. of Dutch attempt in Buggass, in Malcolm’s Clive, ii. 87.

1783.—"The word Buggese has become among Europeans consonant to soldier, in the east of India, as Sepoy is in the West."—Ibid. p. 78.

1811.—"We had fallen in with a fleet of nine Buggese prows, when we went out towards Pulo Mancape."—Lord Minto in India, 279.

1878.—"The Bugis are evidently a distinct race from the Malays, and some originally from the southern part of the island of Celebes."—McNair, Perak, 130.

BULBUL, s. The word bulbul is originally Persian (no doubt intended to imitate the bird's note), and applied to a bird which does duty with Persian poets for the nightingale. Whatever the Persian bulbul may be correctly, the application of the name to certain species in India "has led to many misconceptions about their powers of voice and song," says Jerdon. These species belong to the family Brachipodidae, or short-legged thrushes, and the true bulbuls to the sub-family Pyconotinae, e.g. genera Hypnisetes, Hemixos, Acurus, Oriniger, Ixos, Kelatiria, Rubigala, Brachipodius, Otoomopha, Pyconotus (P. pygaeus, common Bengal Bulbul; P. haemorrhous, common Madras Bulbul). Another sub-family, Phyllonithinae, contains various species which Jerdon calls green Bulbuls.

[A lady having asked the late Lord Robertson, a Judge of the Court of Session, "What is the animal is the bulbull?" he replied, "I suppose, Ma'am, it must be the mate of the coo-coo."—3rd ser., N. & Q. v. 81.]

1784.—"We are literally lulled to sleep by Persian nightingales, and cease to wonder that the Bulbul, with a thousand tales, makes such a figure in Persian poetry."—Sir W. Jones, in Memoirs, &c., ii. 37.

1813.—"The bulbul or Persian nightingale ... I never heard one that possessed the charming variety of the E. I. C. nightingale ... whether the Indian bulbul and that of Iran entirely correspond I have some doubts."—Forsyth, Oriental Memoirs, i. 50; [2nd ed. i. 34].

1848.—"It is one's nature to sing and the other's to hoot," he said, laughing, "and with such a sweet voice as you have yourself, you must belong to the Bulbul faction."—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxvii.

BULGAR, BOLGAR, s. P. bulghdr. The general Asiatic name for what we call 'Russia leather,' from the fact that the region of manufacture and export was originally Bolghar on the Volga, a kingdom which stood for many centuries, and gave place to Kazan in the beginning of the 15th century. The word was usual also among Anglo-Indians till the beginning of last century, and is still in native Hindustani use. A native (mythical) account of the manufacture is given in Baden-Powell's Punjab Handbook, 1872, and this fanciful etymology: "as the scent is derived from soaking in the pith (ghdr), the leather is called Balghdr." (p. 124).

1298.—"He bestows on each of those 12,000 Barons ... likewise a pair of boots of Burgal, curiously wrought with silver thread."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. i. 381. See also the note on this passage.

c. 1383.—"I wore on my feet boots (or stockings) of wool; over these a pair of linen lined, and over all a thin pair of Burgall, i.e. of horse-leather lined with wolf skin."—Ibn Batutea, ii. 445.

1624.—"Putrefy and Hayward, Factors at Ispahan to the E. I. Co., have bartered horse-tooth and 'bulgar' for carpets."—Ibid. p. 268.

1673.—"They carry also Bulgar-Hides, which they form into Tanks to bathe themselves."—Fryer, 398.

c. 1680.—"Putting on a certain dress made of Bulgar-leather, stuffed with cotton."—Seir Mutaphiri, iii. 387.

1759.—Among expenses on account of the Nabob of Bengal's visit to Calcutta we find:

"To 50 pair of Bulgar Hides at 13 per pair, Rs. 702 : 0 : 0."—Long, 183.

1786.—Among "a very capital and choice assortment of Europe goods" we find "Bulgar Hides."—Gazette, June 8, in Sainbury, i. 177.

1811.—"Most of us furnished at least one of our servants with a kind of bottle, holding nearly three quarts, made of bulghar ... or Russia-leather."—W. Ouseley's Travels, i. 247.

In Tibetan the word is bulhari.

BULKUT, s. A large decked ferry-boat; from Telug. balla, a board. (C. P. Brown).

BULLUMTEER, s. Anglo-Sepoy dialect for 'Volunteer.' This distinctive title was applied to certain regiments of the old Bengal Army, whose terms of enlistment embraced service.
BUMBA. 126 BUNCUS, BUNCO.

Bumbelo, s. A small fish, abounding on all the coasts of India and the Archipelago; Harpodon nereus of Buch. Hamilton; the specific name being taken from the Bengal name nereus. The fish is a great delicacy when fresh caught and fried. When dried it becomes the famous Bombay Duck (see Ducks, Bombay), which is now imported into England.

The origin of either name is obscure. Molesworth gives the word as Mahratti with the spelling bombi, or bombila (p. 595 a). Bumbelo occurs in the Supp. (1727) to Bluteau's Dict. in the Portuguese form bombulim, as "the name of a very savoury fish in India." The same word bombulim is also explained to mean 'humus preges na soya a moda,' 'certain plaits in the fashionable ruff,' but we know not if there is any connection between the two. The form Bombay Duck has an analogy to Digby Chicks which are sold in the London shops, also a kind of dried fish, pilchards we believe, and the name may have originated in imitation of this or some similar

English name. [The Digby Chicks said to be a small herring are a peculiar manner at Digby, in Lincolnshire: but the Americans derive from Digby in Nova Scotia; see N. & Q. vii. 247.]

In an old chart of Chittagong (by B. Plaisted, 1764, published A. Dalrymple, 1785) we find a called Bumbello Point.

1783.—"Up the Bay a Mile lies a going, a great Fishing-Town, prominent for a Fish called Bumbello Sustenance of the Poorer sort."—Fry 1785.—"My friend General Calverley, Governor of Madras, tells me that the Dampig did make Speldings in the East Indies, particularly at Bombay, where they call Bumbaroles."—Note by Boswell in his Journal to the Hebrides, under August 18th, 1772.

1810.—"The bumbelo is like a large eel; it is dried in the sun, and is eaten at breakfast with kedgeree."—Graham, 25.

1813.—Forbes has bumbaloo; Or. i. 53; [2nd ed., i. 36].

1877.—"Bummalow or Bobbi, the fish still called 'Bombay Duck.'"—Strad Revisited, i. 68.

BUNCUS, BUNCO, s. An old English name for cheroot. Apparently from Jhangi bungkus, 'a wrapper, bundle, wrapped.'

1711.—"Tobacco . . . for want of they smoke in Buncus, as on the Coromandel Coast. A Buncus is a little Tobacco up in the Leaf of a Tree, about the size of one's little Finger, they light on and draw the Smoke thro' the other end of which they are curiously made up, and sold 30 in a bundle."—Lockyer, 61.

1726.—"After a meal, and on other occasions it is one of their greatest delights men and women, old and young, Pinang (areca), and to smoke the women do with a Bongkoss, or rolled up, and the men with a Goorr, a little can or flower pot) whereby they manage to pass most of their time. —Valentinij, v. Chorom. 55. [Goorr, Malay guri-guri, 'a small earthenware pot used also for holding provisions' (Keseef).]

"One with a coconut shell in gold or silver to hold their Tobacco (i.e. tobacco in rolled stones) . . . —Valentinij, iv. 61.

1730.—"The tobacco leaf, rolled up, in about a finger's length, they call a buncus, and is, I fancy, what they make as what the West Indians call a segar; and of this the Gentoo make use."—Grose, i. 148.
BUND. a. Any artificial embankment, a dam, dyke, or causeway. H.

band. The root is both Skt. (bandh) and P., but the common word, used as it is without aspirate, seems to have come from the latter. The word is common in Persia (e.g. see BENDAMEER). It is also naturalized in the Anglo-Chinese ports. It is there applied especially to the embanked quay along the shore of the settlements. In Hong Kong alone this is called (not bund, but) prasa (Port. ‘shore’ [see FRAYA]), probably adopted from Macao.

1810.—“The great bund or dyke.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 279.

1810.—“The natives have a tradition that the destruction of the bund was effected by a foreign enemy.”—Temcent’s Ceylon, ii. 504.

1815.—“... it is pleasant to see the Chinese... being propelled along the bund in their hand carts.”—Thomson’s Malacca, &c., 408.

1816.—“... so I took a stroll on Tien-Tsin bund.”—Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 28.

BUNDER, a. P. bandar, a landing-place or quay; a seaport; a harbour; (and sometimes also a custom-house). The old It. scala, mod. scala, is the nearest equivalent in most of the sensesthat occurs to us. We have (c. 1565) the Mir-bandar, or Port Master, in Sind (Eliot, i. 277) [cf. Shabbandar]. The Portuguese often wrote the word bandel. Bundar is in S. India the popular native name of Masulipatam, or Macht-bundar.

c. 1843.—“The profit of the treasury, which they call bandar, consists in the right of buying a certain portion of all sorts of cargo at a fixed price, whether the goods be only worth that or more; and this is called the Law of the Bandar.”—Im Batavia, iv. 120.

c. 1846.—“So we landed at the bandar, which is a large collection of houses on the sea-shore.”—Ibid. 228.

1852.—“Coega-star sent word to Affonso d’Alboquerque that on the coast of the main land opposite, at a port which is called Bandar Angon... were arrived two ambassadors of the King of Shiraz.”—Barros, II. ii. 4.

[1816.—“Besides the danger in intercepting our boats to and from the shore, &c., their firing from the Banda would be with much difficulty.”—Poyer, Letters, iv. 328.]

1873.—“We fortify our Houses, have Bunders or Docks for our Vessels, to which belong Yards for Seamen, Soldiers, and Stores.”—Poyer, 115.

1809.—“On the new bundar or pier.”—Maria Graham, 11.

1847, 1880.—See quotations under APOLLO BUNDER.

BUNDER-BOAT, a. A boat in use on the Bombay and Madras coast for communicating with ships at anchor, and also much employed by officers of the civil departments (Salt, &c.) in going up and down the coast. It is rigged as Bp. Heber describes, with a cabin amidships.

1825.—“We crossed over... in a stout boat called here a bundar boat. I suppose from ‘bandsen’ a harbour, with two masts, and two lateen sails...”—Heber, ii. 121, ed. 1844.

BUNDOBUST, a. P.-H.—band-o-bast, lit. ‘tying and binding.’ Any system or mode of regulation; discipline; a revenue settlement.

1768.—“Mr. Rumbold advises us... he proposes making a tour through that province... and to settle the Bundobust for the ensuing year.”—Letter to the Court of Directors, in Vereist, Vinea of Bengal, App. 77.

o. 1843.—“There must be bahut aachkā bandobast (i.e. very good order or discipline) in your country,” said an aged Khānsamā (in Hindustani) to one of the present writers. “When I have gone to the Bandheads to meet a young gentleman from Bihārat, if I gave him a cup of tea, ‘dāeti tāhti,’ said he. Three months afterwards this was all changed; bad language, violence, no more tāhti.”

1880.—“There is not a more fearful wild-fowl than your travelling M.P. This unhappy creature, whose mind is a perfect blank regarding Fanjārdi and Bandobast...”—Ali Baba, 181.

BUNDOOK, a. H. bandük, from Ar. bunduk. The common H. term for a musket or matchlock. The history of the word is very curious. Bundük, pl. bandātik, was a name applied by the Arabs to filberts (as some allege) because they came from Venice (Bandātik, comp. German Veredlig). The name was transferred to the nut-like pellets shot from cross-bows, and thence the cross-bows or arblasts were called bundük, elliptically for kaus al-b., ‘pellet-bow.’ From cross-bows the name was transferred again to firearms, as in the parallel case of arquebus. [Al-Bandūkānī, ‘the man of the pellet-bow,’ was one of the names by which the Caliph Hārūn-al-Rashīd was known, and Al Zahir Baybars al-Bandukdārī, the fourth Baharite Soldan (A.D. 1260-77) was so entitled because he had been slave to a Bandukdār, or Master of Artillery (Burton, Ar. Nights, xii. 38).

[1875.—“Bandīqās, or orderlies of the Maharaja, carrying long guns in a loose red cloth cover.”—Drew, Jummao and Kashmir, 74.]

BUNGALOW, s. H. and Mahr. bangla. The most usual class of house occupied by Europeans in the interior of India; being on one story, and covered by a pyramidal roof, which in the normal bungalow is of thatch, but may be of tiles without impairing its title to be called a bungalow. Most of the houses of officers in Indian cantonments are of this character. In reference to the style of the house, bungalow is sometimes employed in contradistinction to the (usually more pretentious) pucka house; by which latter term is implied a masonry house with a terraced roof. A bungalow may also be a small building of the type which we have described, but of temporary material, in a garden, on a terraced roof for sleeping in, &c. &c. The word has also been adopted by the French in the East, and by Europeans generally in Ceylon, China, Japan, and the coast of Africa.

Wilson writes the word bangla, giving it as a Bengali word, and as probably derived from Banga, Bengal. This is fundamentally the etymology mentioned by Bp. Heber in his Journal (see below), and that etymology is corroborated by our first quotation, from a native historian, as well as by that from F. Buchanan. It is to be remembered that in Hindustan proper the adjective of or belonging to Bengal is constantly pronounced as bangla or banglā. Thus one of the eras used in E. India is distinguished as the Banglāera. The probability is that, when Europeans began to build houses of this character in Behar and Upper India, these were called Banglā or 'Bengal-fashion' houses; that the name was adopted by the Europeans themselves and their followers, and so was brought back to Bengal itself, as well as carried to other parts of India. (In Bengal, and notably in the districts near Calcutta, native houses to this day are divided into atk-chala, chau-chala, and Bangala, or eight-roofed, four-roofed, and Bengali, or common huts. The first term does not imply that the house has eight coverings, but that the roof has four distinct sides with four more projections, so as to cover a verandah all round the house, which is square. The Bangala, or Bengali house, or bungalow has a sloping roof on two sides and two gable ends. Doubtless the term was taken up by the first settlers in Bengal from the native style of edifice, was materially improved, and was thence carried to other parts of India. It is not necessary to assume that the first bungalows were erected in Behar.” (Saturday Rev., 17th April 1886, in a review of the first ed. of this book.)

A.H. 1041 = A.D. 1633.—“Under the rule of the Bengalis (dardāh-i-Bangalīyān) a party of Frank merchants, who are inhabitants of Sundip, came trading to Sāgānaw. One kos above that place they occupied some ground on the banks of the estuary. Under the pretence that a building was necessary in their transactions in buying and selling, they erected several houses in the Bangalī style.”—Bādāshāhāna, in Elliot, vii. 31.

c. 1680.—In the tracing of an old Dutch chart in the India Office, which may be assigned to about this date, as it has no indication of Calcutta, we find at Hoogly: Dung... Hollants Logge... Bangaliser of Speelhuyse, i.e. “Hoogly... Dutch Factory... Bungalow, or Pleasure-house.”

1711.—“Mr. Herring, the Pilot’s Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hugli.”

“From Gull Gut all along the Hooghly Shore until below the New Chaney almost as far as the Dutch Bunglow has a Band.”—Thoroton, The English Pilot, Pt. III. p. 54.

1711.—“Natty Bungo or Neda Bangalla. River lies in this Reach (Tanna) on the Leeward side.”—Ibid. 56. The place in the chart is Neda Bangalla, and seems to have been near the present Akra on the Hoogly.

1758.—“I was talking with my friends in Dr. Fullerton’s bangla when news came of Ram Narain’s being defeated.”—Seir Mutagherin, ii. 103.

1780.—“To be Sold or Let, A Commodious Bungalow and out Houses... situated on the Road leading from the Hospital to the Burying Ground, and directly opposite to the Avenue in front of Sir Elijah Impey’s House...”—The India Gazette, Dec. 25.
BUNGALOW.

1783.-"Bunglow is a corruption of Bengalee, the general name in this country for any structure in the cottage style, and only of one floor. Some of these are spacious and comfortable dwellings."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 93.

1875.-"The little groups of officers dispersed to their respective bungalows to dress and breakfast."—The Dilemma, ch. i.

In Oudh the name was specially applied to Fyzabad.

1858.-"Fyzabad... was founded by the first rulers of the reigning family, and called for some time Bungalow, from a bungalow which they built on the verge of the stream."—Steeman, Journey through the Kingdom of Oudh, i. 157.

BUNGALOW, DAWK.-s. A rest-house for the accommodation of travellers, formerly maintained (and still to a reduced extent) by the paternal care of the Government of India. The material of the accommodation was humble enough, but comprised the things essential for the weary traveller—shelter, a bed and table, a bathroom, and a servant furnishing food at a very moderate cost. On principal lines of thoroughfare these bungalows were at a distance of 10 to 15 miles apart, so that it was possible for a traveller to make his journey by marches without carrying a tent. On some less frequent roads they were 40 or 50 miles apart, adapted to a night’s run in a palankin.

1853.-"Dak-bungalows have been described by some Oriental travellers as the ‘Inns of India.’ Playful satirists!”—Oakfeld, ii. 17.

1886.-"The Dak Bungalow; or, Is his Appointment Fucka?"—By W. O. Trencher, in Fraser’s Magazine, vol. 73, p. 215.

1878.-"I am inclined to think the value of life to a dak bungalow fowl must be very trifling."—In my Indian Garden, 11.

BUNGY, a. H. bhangi. The name of a low caste, habitually employed as sweepers, and in the lowest menial offices, the man being a house sweeper and dog-boy, [his wife an Ayah]. Its members are found throughout Northern and Western India, and every European household has a servant of this class. The colloquial application of the term bungy to such this is anything more than a banana."— Oakfield, ii. 38.

[1870.—"We shall be satisfied with choosing for illustration, out of many, one kind of bemowed or prepared evidence."—Chewers, Med. Jurisprud., 86.]

BURDWAWE, n.p. A town 67 m. N.W. of Calcutta, Burdwan, but in its original Skt. form Vardhamana, 'thriving, prosperous,' a name which we find in Ptolemy (Bardamana), though in another part of India. Some closer approximation to the ancient form must have been current till the middle of 18th century, for Holwell, writing in 1765, speaks of "Burdwan, the principal town of Burdumaan" (Hist. Events, &c., i. 113; see also 123, 125).

BURGHER. This word has three distinct applications.

a. The word burgier, in Dutch, used in the sense of 'citizen.' It is the Dutch word burger, 'citizen.' The word is applied to European people of partly European descent, and is used in the same sense as 'half-caste' and 'Eurasian' in India Proper. [In its higher sense it is still used by the Boers of the Transvaal.]

1807.—"The greater part of them were admitted by the Dutch to all the privileges of citizens under the denomination of Burgurers."—Cordiner, Dec. of Ceylon.

1877.—"About 60 years ago the Burghers of Ceylon occupied a position similar to that of the Eurasians of India at the present moment."—Calcutta Review, cviii. 180-1.

b. n.p: People of the Nilgherry Hills, properly Badagas, or 'North-erners.'—See under BADEGA.

c. The word rafter, in Dutch, used in the sense of burgier, or in the sense of 'armed policeman.'

BURKUNDUAWE, s. An armed retainer; an armed policeman, or other armed unmounted employé of a civil department; from Ar.-P. burkundus, 'lightning-darter,' a word of the same class as jadn-baz, &c. [Also see BUZERRY.]

1726.—"3000 men on foot, called Bir-candees, and 2000 pioneers to make the road, called Bieldars (see BILDA)."—Valentijn, iv. Sarutte, 276.

1798.—"Capt. Welsh has succeeded in driving the Bengal Burkundaws out of Assam."—Cornwallis, ii. 207.
BURMA, BURMAH. 131

from myan, 'swift,' and ma, 'strong,' and was taken as a sobriquet by the people at some early date, perhaps in the time of Anawrahta, A.D. 1150.]

1516.—"Having passed the Kingdom of Bengale, along the coast which turns to the South, there is another Kingdom of Gentiles, called Burma... They frequently are at war with the King of Pegu. We have no further information respecting this country, because it has no shipping."—Barbosa, 181.

1538.—"But the war lasted on and the Brahmas took all the kingdom."—Correa, iii. 851.]

1548.—"And folk coming to know of the secrecy with which the force was being despatched, a great desire took possession of all to know whither the Governor intended to send so large an armament, there being no Rumis to go after, and nothing being known of any other cause why ships should be despatched in secret at such a time. So some gentlemen spoke of it to the Governor, and much importuned him to tell them whither they were going, and the Governor, all the more bent on concealment of his intentions, told them that the expedition was going to Pegu to fight with the Brahmas who had taken that Kingdom."—Ibid. iv. 268.

1545.—"How the King of Brahmas undertook the conquest of this kingdom of Siam (Siam), and of what happened till his arrival at the City of Odda."—P. M. Pinto (orig.) cap. 185.

1558.—"Brama." See quotation under JANGOMAY.

1606.—"Although one's whole life were wasted in describing the superstitions of these Gentiles—the Pegus and the Brahmas—one could not have done it all, therefore I only treat of some, in passing, as I am now about to do."—Conto, viii. cap. xii.

1639.—"His (King of Pegu's) Guard consists of a great number of Souldiers, with them called Brahmanas, is kept at the second Port."—Mandelo, Travels, E. T. ii. 110.

1630.—"ARTICLES of COMMERCIO to be proposed to the King of Barma and Pegu, in behalf of the English Nation for the settling of a Trade in those coasts,"—Pl. St. Geo. Com., in Notes and Essays., iii. 7.

1727.—"The Dominions of Barma are at present very large, reaching from Moreva near Tanacretis, to the Province of Yansin in China."—A. Hamilton, ii. 41.

1759.—"The Burmabnas are much more numerous than the Peguese and more addicted to commerce; even in Pegu their numbers are 100 to 1."—Letter in Dalrymple, O. R., i. 59. The writer appears desirous to convey by his unusual spelling some accurate reproduction of the name as he had heard it. His testimony as to the

BURRA-BEEBEE, s. H. bari bibi, 'Grande dame.' This is a kind of slang word applied in Anglo-Indian society to the lady who claims precedence at a party. [Nowadays Bari Mem is the term applied to the chief lady in a Station.]

[1843.—"The ladies carry their burrah-bishship into the steamers when they go to England. ... My friend endeavoured in vain to persuade them that whatever their social importance in the 'City of Palaces,' they would be but small folk in London."—Chor Chor, by Viscountess Falkland, i. 92.]

[BURRA-DIN, s. H. bard-din. A 'great day,' the term applied by natives to a great festival of Europeans, particularly to Christmas Day.

[1880.—"This being the Burra Din, or great day, the fact of an animal being shot was interpreted by the men as a favourable augury."—Ball, Jungle Life, 279.]

BURRA-KHANA, s. H. bard khana, 'big dinner'; a term of the same character as the two last, applied to a vast and solemn entertainment.

[1880.—"To go out to a burra khana, or big dinner, which is succeeded in the same or some other house by a larger evening party."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 51.]

BURRA SAHIB. H. bard, 'great'; 'the great Sahib (or Master), a term constantly occurring, whether in a family to distinguish the father or the elder brother, in a station to indicate the Collector, Commissioner, or whatever officer may be the recognised head of the society, or in a department to designate the head of that department, local or remote.

[1889.—"At any rate a few of the great lords and ladies (Burra Sahib and Burra Mem Sahib) did speak to me without being driven to it."—Lady Dufferin, 34.]

BURRAMPOOTER, n.p. Properly (Skt.) Brahmaputra ('the son of Brahma'), the great river Brahmpur of which Assam is the valley. Rising within 100 miles of the source of the Ganges, these rivers, after being separated by 17 degrees of longitude, join before entering the sea. There is no distinct recognition of this great river by the ancients, but the Diardanes or Oudanes, of Curtius and Strabo, described as a large river in the remoter parts of India, abounding in dolphins and crocodiles, probably represents this river under one of its Skt. names, Hiddini.

[c. 1590.—"There is another very large river called Berhumputter, which runs from Khatai to Coach (see COOCH BERA) and thence through Basoohah to the sea."—Ayen. Akkbery (Gladwin) ed. 1800, ii. 6; ed. Jarrett, ii. 121.]

[1726.—"Out of the same mountains we see ... a great river flowing which ... divides into two branches, whereof the easterly one on account of its size is called the Great Barrempooter."—Valentijn, v. 154.

[1758.—"Un peu au-dessous de Daka, le Gange est joint par une grosse rivière, qui sort de la frontière du Tibet. Le nom de Bramanputre qu'on lui trouve dans quelques cartes est une corruption de celui de Brahmaputren, qui dans le langage du pays signifie tirant son origine de Brahma."—D'Anville, Éclairissemens, 62.

[1767.—"Just before the Ganges falls into ye Bay of Bengal, it receives the Baramputrey or Assam River. The Assam River is larger than the Ganges ... it is a perfect Sea of fresh Water after the Junction of the two Rivers."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, d. 10th March.

[1793.—"... till the year 1785, the Burrampooter, as a capital river, was unknown in Europe. On tracing this river in 1765, I was no less surprised at finding it rather larger than the Ganges, than at its course previous to its entering Bengal. ... I could no longer doubt that the Burrampooter and Sampaoo were one and the same river."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. 356.

BURSAUTER, s. H. barsatt, from barsat, 'the Rains.'

a. The word properly is applied to a disease to which horses are liable in the rains, putstular eruptions breaking out on the head and fore parts of the body.

[1828.—"That very extraordinary disease, the burrsat'ti."—Or. Sport. Mag., reprint, 1873, i. 125.

[1882.—"Horses are subject to an infections disease, which generally makes its appearance in the rainy season, and therefore called burrsat'ti."—Mrs Meer Hassan Ali, ii. 27.]

b. But the word is also applied to a waterproof cloak, or the like. (See BRANDY COOTTIT.)

1880.—"The scenery has now been arranged for the second part of the Simla season . . . and the appropriate costume for both sexes is the decorous barsatti."—Pioneer Mail, July 8.

BUS, adv. P-H. bas, 'enough.' Used commonly as a kind of interjection: 'Enough! Stop! One jam sati! Basta, basta! ' Few Hindustani words stick closer by the returned Anglo-Indian. The Italian expression, though of obscure etymology, can hardly have any connection with bas. But in use it always feels like a mere expansion of it!

1853.—"And if you pass, say my dear good-natured friends, 'you may get an appointment. Bus! (you see my Hindustani knowledge already carries me the length of that emphatic monosyllable). . . ."—Oakfield, 2nd ed. i. 42.

BUSHEIRE, n.p. The principal modern Persian seaport on the Persian Gulf; properly Abushahr.

1727.—"Bowchler is also a Maritim Town . . . It stands on an Island, and has a pretty good Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 90.

BUSTER, s. An inhabited quarter, a village. H. basi, from Skt. vas = 'dwell.' Many years ago a native in Upper India said to a European assistant in the Canal Department: "You Feringis talk much of your country and its power, but we know that the whole of you come from five villages" (panch basti). The word is applied in Calcutta to the separate groups of huts in the humbler native quarters, the sanitary state of which has often been held up to reproval.

[1889.—"There is a dreary bustee in the neighbourhood which is said to make the most of any cholera that may be going."—R. Kipling, City of Dreadful Night, 54.]

BUTLER, s. In the Madras and Bombay Presidencies this is the title usually applied to the head-servant of any English or quasi-English household. He generally makes the daily market, has charge of domestic stores, and superintends the table. As his profession is one which affords a large scope for feathering a nest at the expense of a foreign master, it is often followed at Madras by men of comparatively good caste. (See CON-SUMAH.)

1618.—"Yokey the butler, being sick, asked license to goe to his howse to take phisick."—Cocks, i. 138.

1689.—". . . the Butlers are enjind to take an account of the Place each Night, before they depart home, that they (the Peons) might be examind before they stir, if ought be wanting."—Orsington, 398.

1782.—"Wanted a Person to act as Steward or Butler in a Gentleman's House, he must understand Hairdressing."—India Gazette, March 2.

1789.—"No person considers himself as comfortably accommodated without entertaining a Dubash at four pagodas per month, a Butler at 3, a Poon at 2, a Cook at 3, a Compradore at 2, and kitchen boy at 1 pagoda."—Murro's Narrative of Operations, p. 27.

1778.—"Glancing round, my eye fell on the pantry department . . . and the butler trimming the reading lampes."—Camp Life in India, Fraser's Mag., June, 696.

1789.—". . . the moment when it occurred to him (i.e. the Nyoung-young Prince of Burma) that he ought really to assume the guise of a Madras butler, and be off to the Residency, was the happiest inspiration of his life."—Standard, July 11.

BUTLER-ENGLISH. The broken English spoken by native servants in the Madras Presidency; which is not very much better than the Pigeon-English of China. It is a singular dialect; the present participle (e.g.) being used for the future indicative, and the preterite indicative being formed by 'done'; thus I telling = 'I will tell'; I done tell = 'I have told'; done come = 'actually arrived.' Peculiar meanings are also attached to words; thus family = ‘wife.’ The oddest characteristic about this jargon is (or was) that masters used it in speaking to their servants as well as servants to their masters.

BUXEY, s. A military paymaster; H. bakhsh. This is a word of complex and curious history.

In origin it is believed to be the Mongol or Turkic corruption of the Skt. bhiksha, ‘a beggar,’ and thence a Buddhist or religious mendicant or member of the ascetic order, bound by his discipline to obtain his daily food by begging.* Bakshi was the word commonly applied by the Tartars of the host of Chinigiz and his successors, and after them by the Persian writers of the Mongol era, to the regular Buddhist clergy; and thus the word appears under various forms in the works of medieval European writers from whom examples are quoted below. Many of the class came to Persia and the west with Hulakit and with Bātū Khan, and as the writers in the Tartar camps were probably found chiefly among the bakshis, the word underwent exactly the same transfer of meaning as our clerk, and came to signify a litteratus, scribe or secretary. Thus in the Latino-Perso-Turkish vocabulary, which belonged to Petrarch and is preserved at Venice, the word scriba is rendered in Comanian, i.e. the then Turkish of the Crimea, as Bacen. The change of meaning did not stop here.

Abūl-Fażl in his account of Kashmir (in the Aīn, [ed. Jarrett, iii. 219]) recalls the fact that baksh was the title given by the learned among Persians and Arabic writers to the Buddhist priests whom the Tibetans styled lāmda. But in the time of Baber, say circa 1500, among the Mongols the word had come to mean surgeon; a change analogous again, in some measure, to our colloquial use of doctor. The modern Mongols, according to Pallas, use the word in the sense of ‘Teacher,’ and apply it to the most venerable or learned priest of a community. Among the Kirghiz Kazzak, who professed Mahomedanism, it has come to the character which Marco Polo, or less associates with it, and more conjurer or medicine-man; in Western Turkestan it signifies ‘Bard’ or ‘Minstrel.’ (Vambery, his Sketches of Central Asia (p. 52), speaks of a Bakhshi as a troubadour.)

By a further transfer of meaning of which all the steps are not clear in another direction, under the Moslem Empires of India the bakhsh was applied to an officer in military administration, his office is sometimes rendered ‘Minister of the Horse’ (of horse, it is to be remembered, the whole substance of the army consisted), but whose duties in some measure, in fact habitually, embraced those of Paymaster-General, as well as, in a manner, of Commander-in-Chief, or Chief of the army. [Mr. Irvine, who gives a detailed account of the Bakhshi under the last Moguls, (J. R. A. Soc., 1896, p. 539 seq.), prefers to call him an Adjutant-General.] More properly perhaps this was the position of the Baksh, who had other bakhshis under him. Bakshis in military command continued in the armies of the baktars, of Hyder Ali, and of the native powers. But both the Persian spelling and the modern connection of the title with pay indicate a probability that some confusion of associations has arisen between the old Tartar title of the P. bakhsh, ‘portion,’ bakhshidan giveth, bakhsh, ‘payment.’ In early days of the Council of William we find the title Buxee applied to a European Civil officer through whom payments were made; (see Long and Seton-Karr, passim.) This is obsolete, but the word is in the Anglo-Indian Army the recognised designation of a Paymaster.

This is the best known existing form of the word. But under some Native Governments it is still the designation of a high officer of state. And according to the Calcutta Glossary it has been used in the N.W.P. for ‘a collector of a house tax’ (!) and the like. In Bengal for ‘a superintendent of property in Mysore for a treasurer’ &c., and the N.W.P. the Baksh, popularly known to natives as ‘Baksh Tik’ or ‘Tax Baksh,’ is the person in charge.
of one of the minor towns which are not under a Municipal Board, but are managed by a Panch, or body of assessors, who raise the income needed for watch and ward and conservancy by means of a graduated house assessment.] See an interesting note on this word in Quadrâm. 1861.—"To the best of my memory he was accused of having done his best to urge the people of Dhar to rise against our Government, and several of the witnesses deposed to this effect; amongst them the Bukshae."—Memo. on Dhar, by Major McMullen.
1874.—"Before the depositions were taken down, the gomasta of the planter drew aside the Buxari, who is a police-officer next to the darogd."—Gourind Samanta, ii. 225.

BUXERRY. s. A matchlock man; apparently used in much the same sense as Burkundaze (q.v.) now obsolete. We have not found this term excepting in documents pertaining to the middle decades of 18th century in Bengal; [but see references supplied by Mr. Irvine below] nor have we found any satisfactory etymology. Buzo is in Port. a gun-barrel (Germ. Buche); which suggests some possible word buzeiro. There is however none such in Bluteau, who has, on the other hand, "Butexes, an Indian term; artillery-men, &c." and quotes from Hist. Orient. iii. 7: "Buxarii sunt hi qui quinque tormentis praeficiuntur." This does not throw light. Bajjar, 'thunderbolt,' may have given vogue to a word in analogy to P. barkandas, 'lightning-darter,' but we find no such word. As an additional conjecture, however, we may suggest Bakedris, from the possible circumstance that such men were recruited in the country about Baksar (Buzar), i.e. the Sada bag district, which up to 1857 was a great recruiting ground for sepoyas. [There can be no doubt that this last suggestion gives the correct origin of the word. Buchanan Hamilton, Eastern India, i. 471, describes the large number of men who joined the native army from this part of the country.]

[1680.—The Mogul army was divided into three classes—Nusdran, or mounted men; Topkhanah, artillery; Aaham, infantry and artificers. 1772.—"Buckserries. Foot sic. whose common arms are only sword and target."—Glossary in Gross's "Voyage ed. [This is copied, as Mr. Irvine tells us from the Glossary of 1757 prefixed to Address to the Proprietors of E. I. Co.'s Holwell's Indian Tracts, 3rd ed., 1779."

1850.—"Another point to which turned his attention . . . was the organisation of an efficient native regular force. Hitherto the native troops employed in Calcutta . . . designated Buxerries nothing more than Burkundas, armed equipped in the usual native manner. Brook, Hist. of the Rise and Progress Bengal Army, i. 92.

BYDE, or BEDE HORSE. note by Kirkpatrick to the passage below from Tipoo's Letters says Horse are "the same as Pind Looties, and Kuzzaks" (see FINDA LOOTY, COSSACK). In the Life of Hyder Ali by Hussian Ali Kirmani, tr. by Miles, we read Hyder's Kuzzaks were under command of "Ghazi Khan B. But whether this leader was called from leading the "Bede" or gave his name to them, do appear. Miles has the highly in- gent note: 'Bede is another name (Kuzzak): Kirkpatrick supposed word Bede meant infantry, which believe, it does not' (p. 36). Quotation from the Life of I seems to indicate that it was the of a caste. And we find in Sh. Indian Tribes and Castes, among of Mysore, mention of the Bedai tribe, probably of huntamen, dark, tall, and warlike. Formerly many were employed as soldiers, and served in Hyder's wars (iii. 153; see also the same tribe in the S. Mahratta country, ii. 321). Assuming -ar to be a plural sign, we have here probably the "Bedes" who gave their name to these plundering horse. The Bedar are mentioned as one of the predatory classes of the peninsula, along with Marawars, Kallars, Ramūsis (see RAMOOSY), &c., in Sir Walter Elliot's paper (J. Ethnol. Soc., 1869, N.S. pp. 112-13). But more will be found regarding them in a paper by the late Gen. Briggs, the translator of Firishta's Hist. (J. R. A. Soc. xiii.). Besides Bedar, Bednor (or Nagar) in Mysore seems to take its name from this tribe. [See Rice, Mysore, i. 255.]

1802. "The Kakur and Chapao horse... (Although these are included in the Bede tribe, they carry off the palm even from them in the arts of robbery)..."—H. of Tipoo, by Hussein 'Ali Khan Kirmāni, tr. by Miles, p. 76.

[BYLEE, s. A small two-wheeled vehicle drawn by two oxen. H. bahal, bahī, baillī, which has no connection, as is generally supposed, with basil, 'an ox', but is derived from the Skt. ealī, 'to carry.' The bylee is used only for passengers, and a larger and more imposing vehicle of the same class is the Eut. There is a good drawing of a Panjab bylee in Kipling's Beast and Man (p. 117); also see the note on the quotation from Forbes under HACKERY.

1841. "A native bylee will usually produce, in gold and silver of great purity, ten times the weight of precious metals to be obtained from a general officer's equipage."—Society in India, i. 162.

1854. "Most of the party... were in a barouch, but the rich man himself [one of the Muttra Seths] still adheres to the primitive conveyance of a bylee, a thing like a footboard, but with two wheels, generally drawn by two oxen, but in which he drives a splendid pair of white horses, sitting cross-legged the while!"—Mrs Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, &c., ii. 205.]

O

CABAYA, s. This word, though of Asiatic origin, was perhaps introduced into India by the Portuguese, whose writers of the 16th century apply it to the surcoat or long tunic of muslin, which is one of the most common native garments of the better classes in India. The word seems to be one of those which the Portuguese had received in older times from the Arabic (kabā, 'a vesture'). From Dozy's remarks this would seem in Barbary to take the form kabāya. Whether from Arabic or from Portuguese, the word has been introduced into the Malay countries, and is in common use in Java for the light cotton surcoat worn by Europeans, both ladies and gentlemen, in dishabille. The word is not now used in India Proper, unless by the Portuguese. But it has become familiar in Dutch, from its use in Java. [Mr. Gray, in his notes to Pyrard (p. 372), thinks that the word was introduced before the time of the Portuguese, and remarks that kabāya in Ceylon means a coat or jacket worn by a European or native.]

c. 1540. "There was in her an Embassador who had brought Hidalgo (Idaljan) a very rich Cabaya... which he would not accept of, for that thereby he would not acknowledge himself subject to the Turk."—Cogan's Pint, pp. 10-11.

1552. "... he ordered him then to bestow a cabaya."—Castaneda, iv. 438. See also Stanley's Correr, 132.

1554. "And moreover there are given to these Kings (Malabar Rajas) when they come to receive these allowances, to each of them a cabaya of silk, or of scarlet, of 4 cubits, and a cap or two, and two sheath-knives."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 26.

"Ohem da fina purpura as cabayas, Lustram os pennos da tocida soda."—Camões, ii. 93.

"Cabaya do damasco rico e dino Da Tyria cor, entre elles esteimado."—Ibid. 95.

1585. "The King is apparelled with a Cable made like a shirt tied with strings on one side."—R. Fitz, in Hakl., ii. 386.

1588. "They wear sometimes when they go abroad a thinne cotton linnen gowme called Cabala. ..."—Linschoten, 70; [Hak. Soc. i. 247].
CABOB. 138  CABUL, CAUBOOL.

CABOB, s. Ar.-H. kabāb. This word is used in Anglo-Indian households generically for roast meat. [It usually follows the name of the dish, e.g. murghi kabab, 'roast fowl'.] But specifically it is applied to the dish described in the quotations from Fryer and Ovington.

c. 1510.—"C'est une jachette ou soutine, Qu'il appellent Lhaasæ (P. libas, 'clothing') ou Cabays, est de teolle de Cotton fort fine et blanche, qui leur va jusqu'aux talons."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 265; [Hak. Soc. i. 872].

1860.—"I afterwards understood that the dress they wore was a sort of native garment, which in the country they call sarong or kabahal, but I found it very unbecoming."—Max. Havelaar, 43. [There is some mistake here, sarong and Kabaya are quite different.]

1878.—"Over all this is worn (by Malay women) a long loose dressing-gown-style of garment called the kabaya. This robe falls to the middle of the leg, and is fastened down the front with circular brooches."—McNair, Perak, &c., 151.

CABUL, CAUBOOL, &c., n.p. This name (Kābul) of the chief city of N. Afghanistan, now so familiar, is perhaps traceable in Ptolemy, who gives in that same region a people called Ḳāḇūrā, and a city called Ḳāfūra. Perhaps, however, one or both may be corrodorated by the nārōs Kašālity of the Periplus. The accent of Kábul is most distinctly on the first and long syllable, but English mouths are very perverse in error here. Moore accents the last syllable:

"... pomegranates full
Of melting sweetness, and the ears
And sunniest apples that Caubul
In all its thousand gardens bear."

Light of the Harem.

Mr. Arnold does likewise in Sobrah and Bustam:

"But as a troop of pedlars from Cabool, Cross underneath the Indian Caucasus..."

It was told characteristically of the late Lord Ellenborough that, after his arrival in India, though for months he heard the name correctly spoken by his councillors and his staff, he persisted in calling it Cabbol till he met Dost Mahommed Khan. After the interview the Governor-General announced as a new discovery, from the Amir's pronunciation, that Cábúl was the correct form.

1552.—Barros calls it "a Cidade Cabol, Metropoli dos Mogoles."—IV. vi. 1.

1586.—

"Ah Cabul! word of woe and bitter shame;
Where proud old England's flag, dishonoured, sank Beneath the Crescent; and the butcher knives Beat down like reeds the bayonets that had
From Plassey on to snow-capt Caucasus,
In triumph through a hundred years of war."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

CACOULLI. a. This occurs in the App. to the Journal d'Antoine Galland, at Constantinople in 1673: "Dragmes de Cacouli, drogue qu'on use dans le Cahue," i.e. in coffee (ii. 206). This is Pers. Arab. .setStroke(13,15,16,14)kàkùlù for Cardamom, as in the quotation from Garcia. We may remark that Kàkùlù was a place somewhere on the Gulf of Siam, famous for its fine aloes-wood (see Ibn Batuta, iv. 240-44). And a bastard kind of Cardamom appears to be exported from Siam, Amomum xanthoides, Wal.

1583.—"O. Arefena gives a chapter on the cacúlla, dividing it into the bigger and the less... calling one of them cacúlla quehir, and the other cacúlla cegner [Ar. labir, panghir], which is as much as to say greater cardamom and smaller cardamom."—Garcia De O., i. 47v.

1759.—"These Vakeels... stated that the Rani (of Bednore) would pay a yearly sum of 100,000 Hooms or Pagodas, besides a tribute of other valuable articles, such as Fquli (betal), Dates, Sandal-wood, Kàkùlù... black pepper, &c."—Hist. of Hyder Naiz, 183.

CADDY, a. i.e. tea-caddy. This is possibly, as Crawfurde suggests, from Catty (q.v.), and may have been originally applied to a small box containing a catty or two of tea. The suggestion is confirmed by this advertisement:

1792.—"By R. Henderson... A Quantity of Tea in Quarter Chests and Caddies, imported last season..."—Madras Courier, Dec. 2.

CADET, a. (From Prov. capdett, and Low Lat. capitellum, [dim. of caput, 'head'] Skeat). This word is of course by no means exclusively Anglo-Indian, but it was in exceptionally common and familiar use in India, as all young officers appointed to the Indian army went out to that country as cadets, and were only promoted to ensigns and posted to regiments after their arrival—in olden days sometimes a considerable time after their arrival. In those days there was a building in Fort William known as the 'Cadet Barrack'; and for some time early in last century the cadets after their arrival were sent to a sort of college at Baraset; a system which led to no good, and was speedily abolished.

1768.—"We should very gladly comply with your request for sending you young persons to be brought up as assistants in the Engineering branch, but as we find it extremely difficult to procure such, you will do well to employ any who have a talent that way among the cadets or others."—Court's Letter, in Long, 290.

1769.—"Upon our leaving England, the cadets and writers used the great cabin promiscuously; but finding they were troublesome and quarrelsome, we brought a Bill into the house for their ejection."—Life of Lord Teignmouth, i. 15.

1781.—"The Cadets of the end of the years 1771 and beginning of 1772 served in the country four years as Cadets and carried the musket all the time."—Letter in Hicky's Bengali Gazette, Sept. 29.

CADJAN, a. Jav. and Malay kajang, [or according to Mr. Skeat, kajang], meaning 'palm-leaves,' especially those of the Nipa (q.v.) palm, dressed for thatching or matting. Favre's Dict. renders the word feuilles entrelacées. It has been introduced by foreigners into S. and W. India, where it is used in two senses:

a. Coco-palm leaves matted, the common substitute for thatch in S. India.

1673.—"... flags especially in their Villages (by them called Cajans, being Coco-tree branches) upheld with some few sticks, supplying both Sides and Coverings to their Cottages."—Fryer, 17. In his Explanatory Index Fryer gives 'Cajan, a bough of a Toddy-tree.'

c. 1680.—"Ex iiis (folis) quoque radiores mattae, Cadjjang vocatae, conficiuntur, quibus aedificia sunt in eis deponere velimum, osteguntur."—Rumphius, i. 71.

1727.—"We travelled 8 or 10 miles before we came to his (the Cananore Rajah's) Palace, which was built with Twigs, and covered with Cadjans or Cocoa-nut Tree Leaves woven together."—A. Hamilton, i. 296.

1809.—"The lower classes (at Bombay) content themselves with small huts, mostly of clay, and roofed with cadjan."—Maria Graham, 4.

1880.—"Houses are timbered with its wood, and roofed with its plaited fronds, which under the name of cadjans are likewise employed for constructing partitions and fences."—Tenente's Ceylon, ii. 128.

b. A strip of fan-palm leaf, i.e. either of the Talipot (q.v.) or of the Palmyra, prepared for writing on; and so a document written on such a strip. (See OILAH.)

1707.—"The officer at the Bridge Gate bringing in this morning to the Governor a Cajan letter that he found hung upon a post near the Gate, which when translated seemed to be from a body of the Right Hand Caste."—In Wheeler, ii. 78.

1716.—"The President acquaints the Board that he has intercepted a villainous letter or Cajan."—Ibid. ii. 231.

1839.—"At Rajahmundry... the people used to sit in our reading room for hours, copying our books on their own little cadjan leaves."—Letters from Madras, 275.

CADJOWA, s. [P. kajdowah]. A kind of frame or pannier, of which a pair are slung across a camel, sometimes made like litters to carry women or sick persons, sometimes to contain sundries of camp equipage.

1645.—"He entered the town with 8 or 10 camels, the two Cajavas or Litters on each side of the Camel being close shut... But instead of Women, he had put into every Cafaya two Souldiers."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 61; [ed. Bull, i. 144].

1790.—"The camel appropriated to the accommodation of passengers, carries two persons, who are lodged in a kind of pannier, laid loosely on the back of the animal. This pannier, termed in the Persian Kidjahwah, is a wooden frame, with the sides and bottom of netted cords, of about 3 feet long and 2 broad, and 2 in depth... the journey being usually made in the night-time, it becomes the only place of his rest... Had I been even much accustomed to this manner of travelling, it must have been irksome; but a total want of practice made it excessively grievous."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 104-5.

CAEH, n.p. Properly Kayal [Tam. kāy, 'to be hot'], 'a lagoon' or 'backwater.' Once a famous port near the extreme south of India at the mouth of the Tamraparni R., in the Gulf of Mannar, and on the coast of Tinnevelly, now long abandoned. Two or three miles higher up the river lies the site of Korkai or Kolkai, the Κόρκαιος εὔρος of the Greeks, each port in succession having been destroyed by the retirement of the sea. Tutikorin, six miles N., may be considered the modern and humbler representative of those ancient marts; [see Stuart, Man. of Tinnevelly, 38 seqq.].

1298.—"Cai is a great and noble city... It is at this city that all the ships touch that come from the west."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 21.

1442.—"The Coast, which includes Calicutt with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as Kabel (and Kayal) a place situated opposite the Island of Serendib."..."—Abdurrazzih, in India in the XVth Cent., 19.

1444.—"Ulta esas urbes est Cahila, qui locous margaritas... producit."—Conti, in Poggio, De Var. Fortunae.

1498.—"Another Kingdom, Caal, which has a Moorish King, whilst the people are Christian. It is ten days from Calcut by sea... here there be many pearls."—Routiero de V. de Gama, 106.

1514.—"Passando oltre al Cavo Comedi (C. Comorin), sono gentili; e intra esso a Caal da dove si pesca le perle."—Giov. da Empoli, 79.

1516.—"Further along the coast is a city called Caal, which also belongs to the King of Coulam, peopled by Moors and Gentooes, great traders. It has a good harbour, whither come many ships of Malabar; others of Caramandiel and Benguela."—Barbosa, in Lisbon Coll., 387-8.

CAFFER, CAFFRE, COFFREE, &c., n.p. The word is properly the Ar. Kāfir, pl. Kofra, 'an infidel, an unbeliever in Islam.' As the Arabs applied this to Pagan negroes, among others, the Portuguese at an early date took it up in this sense, and our countrymen from them. A further appropriation in one direction has since made the name specifically that of the black tribes of South Africa, whom we now call, or till recently did call, Caffres. It was also applied in the Philippine Islands to the Papuans of N. Guinea, and the Alfrums of the Moluccas, brought into the slave-market.

In another direction the word has become a quasi-proper name of the (more or less) fair, and non-Mahomedan, tribes of Hindu-Kush, sometimes called more specifically the Sidd-pust or 'black-robbed' Caffres.

The term is often applied malevolently by Mahomedans to Christians, and this is probably the origin of the mistake pervading some of the early Portuguese narratives, especially the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, which described many of the Indo-Chinese States as being Christian.*

[c. 1300.—"Kafir." See under LACK.]

c. 1404.—Of a people near China: "They were Christians after the manner of those of Cathay."—Clavijo by Markham, 141.

... And of India: "The people of India are Christians, the Lord and most part of the people, after the manner of the Greeks; and among them are also other Christians who mark themselves with fire in the face, and their creed is different from that of the others; for those who thus mark themselves with fire esteem themselves above the others. And among them are Moors and Jews, and they are subject to the Christians."—Clavijo, (orig.) § cxxi.; comp. Markham, 153-4. Here we have (1) the confusion of Caffer and Christian; and (2) the confusion of Abyssinia (India Tertia or Middle India of some medieval writers) with India Proper.

[c. 1470.—"The sea is infested with pirates, all of whom are Kofras, neither Christians nor Mussulmans; they pray to stone idols, and know not Christ."—Athos. Nikif, in Index in the Xth Cent., p. 11.]

1563.—"In the year 1484 there came to Portugal the King of Benin, a Caffre by nation, and he became a Christian."—Stanley's Caffre p. 8.

1572.—"Verigo os Caffres aspiras e avaros. Tirar a linha dams seus vestidos."—Camões, v. 47.

By Burton:

"shall see the Caffres, greedy race and false, strip the fair ladye of her raiment torn."—

[c. 1610.—"... a Christian whom they call Caparoon."—Ibid., Hak. Soc. i. 261.]

1614.—"That knave Simon the Caffre, not what the writer took him for—he is a knave, and better lost than found."—Sainsbury, i. 355.

1653.—": toy mesme qui passe pour vn Kaffre, ou homme sans Dieu, parmi les Mussulmans."—De la Boullaye-le-Geux, 310 (ed. 1657).

c. 1665.—"It will appear in the sequel of this History, that the pretense used by Auren-zebo, his third Brother, to cut off his (Dara's) head, was that he was turned Kaffar, that is to say, an Infidel, of no Religion, an Idolater."—Bernier, E. T. p. 3; [ed. Constable, p. 7].

1673.—"They show their Greatness by their number of Sumbreesores and Cofferies, whereby it is dangerous to walk late."—Fryer, 74.

..."Beggars of the Mussolmen Cast, that if they see a Christian in good Clothes ... are presently upon their Functilibis with God Almighty, and interrogate him, Why he suffers him to go afoot and in Rags, and this Coffery (Unbeliever) to vaunt it thus!"

—Ibid. 91.

1678.—"The Justices of the Choultry to turn Pady Pasquall, a Popish Priest, out of town, not to return again, and if it proves to be true that he attempted to seduce Mr. Mohun's Coffree Frans from the Protestant religion."—Pt. St. Geo. Cons. in Notes and Extracts, Pt. i. p. 72.

1759.—"Blacks, whites, Coffries, and even the natives of the country (Pegu) have not been exempted, but all universally have been subject to intermittent Fevers and Fluxes" (at Negrais).—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 124.

Among expenses of the Council at Calcutta in entertaining the Nabob we find "Purchasing a Coffree boy, Rs. 500."—In Long, 194.

1781.—"To be sold by Private Sale—Two Coffree Boys, who can play remarkably well on the French Horn, about 18 Years of Age: belonging to a Portuguese Paddrie lately deceased. For particulars apply to the Vicar of the Portuguese Church, Calcutta, March 17th, 1781."—The India Gazette or Public Advertiser, No. 19.

1781.—"Run away from his Master, a good-looking Coffee Boy, about 20 years old, and about 6 feet 7 inches in height... When he went off he had a high topi."—Ibid. Dec. 29.

1782.—"On Tuesday next will be sold three Coffee Boys, two of whom play the French Horn... a three-wheel’d Buggy, and a variety of other articles."—India Gazette, June 15.

1799.—"He (Tipoo) had given himself out as a Champion of the Faith, who was to drive the English Caffers out of India."—Letter in Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 221.

1800.—"The Caffre slaves, who had been introduced for the purpose of cultivating the lands, rose upon their masters, and seizing on the boats belonging to the island, effected their escape."—Symes, Embassy to Asea, p. 10.

c. 1866.—
"And if I were forty years younger, and my life before me to choose, I wouldn’t be lectured by Kaffirs, or swindled by fat Hindoos."
Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindarce.

CAPII.A. s. Arab. kafla: a body or convoy of travellers, a Caravan (q.v.). Also used in some of the following quotations for a sea convoy.

1562.—"Those roads of which we speak are the general routes of the Caffis, which are sometimes of 3,000 or 4,000 men... for the country is very perilous because of both hill-people and plain-people, who haunt the roads to rob travellers."—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

1596.—"The ships of Chetins (see CHETTY) of these parts are not to sail along the coast of Malavur or to the north except in a cassila, that they may come and go more securely, and not be cut off by the Malavurs and other corsairs."—Proclamation of Geo. Viceroy, in Archiv. Port. Or., fasc. iii. 661.

1598.—"Two Cassylens, that is companies of people and Camelles."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 159.

1616.—"A cassilow consisting of 200 broadcloths,"—Foster, Letters, iv. 278.]

1623.—"Non navigamus di notte, perché la cassila era molto grande, al mio parere di più di duecento vascelli."—P. della Valle, ii. 587; [and comp. Hak. Soc. i. 18].

1650.—"... some of the Raisahs... making Outrados prey on the Cassiloes passing by the Way..."—Lord, Benian’s Religion, 81.

1672.—"Several times yearly numerous cassilas of merchant barques, collected in the Portuguese towns, traverse this channel (the Gulf of Cambay), and these always await the greater security in the full moon. It is also observed that the vessels which go through with this voyage should not be joined and fastened with iron, for so great is the abundance of lodestone in the bottom, that indubitably such vessels go to pieces and break up."—P. Vincenzo, 109. A curious survival of the old legend of the Lodestone Rocks.

1673.—"... Time enough before the Caphalas out of the Country come with their Wares."—Fryer, 86.

1727.—"In Anno 1699, a pretty rich Caffila was robbed by a Band of 4 or 5000 villains... which struck Terror on all that had commerce at Tutia."—A. Hamilton, i. 116.

1867.—"It was a curious sight to see, as was seen in those days, a carriage enter one of the northern gates of Palermo preceded and followed by a large convoy of armed and mounted travellers, a kind of Kafis, that would have been more in place in the opening chapters of one of James’s romances than in the latter half of the 19th century."—Quarterly Review, Jan., 101-2.

CAFIRISTAN, n.p. P. Kafiristan, the country of Kafirs, i.e. of the pagan tribes of the Hindu Kush noticed in the article Caffer.

c. 1514.—"In Cheghánsértâ there are neither grapes nor vineyards; but they bring the wines down the river from Kafiristan... So prevalent is the use of wine among them that every Kafir has a hig, or leather bottle of wine about his neck; they drink wine instead of water."—Autobiog. of Baber, p. 144.

[c. 1590.—The Kafirs in the Túmanis of Ališang and Najrat are mentioned in the Ars, tr. Jarrett, ii. 406.]

1603.—"... they fell in with a certain pilgrim and devotee, from whom they learned that at a distance of 80 days’ journey there was a city called Gappershánt, into which no Mahomedan was allowed to enter..."—Journey of Bened. Góes, in Cathay, &c. ii. 554.

CAIMAL, s. A Nair chief; a word often occurring in the old Portuguese historians. It is Malayāl. kaimal.

1504.—"So they consulted with the Zamorin, and the Moors offered their agency to send and poison the walls at Cochin, so as to kill all the Portuguese, and also to send Nairs in disguise to kill any of our people that they found in the palm-woods, and away from the town... And meanwhile the Mangate Caimal, and the Caimal of Pimblem, and the Caimal of Diamper, seeing that the Zamorin’s affairs were going from bad to worse, and that the castles which the Italians were making were all wind and nonsense, that it was already August when ships might be arriving from Portugal... departed to their own estates with a multitude of their followers, and sent to the King of Cochín their ollas of allegiance."—Correa, i. 482.

1566.—"... certain lords bearing title, whom they call Caimais" (rainhas).—Damião de Goes, Chron. del Rei Dom Emmanuel, p. 49.

1606.—"The Malabars give the name of Caimais (Caímes) to certain great lords of vessels, who are with their governments haughty as kings; but most of them have confederation and alliance with some of the great kings, whom they stand bound to aid and defend..."—Gouvea, f. 27v.

"Ficáus seus Caímais pressus e mortos." Malaca Conquistada, v. 10.

CAIQUE, s. The small skiff used at Constantinople, Turkish kâi̇l. Is it by accident, or by a radical connection through Turkish tribes on the Arctic shores of Siberia, that the Greenlander's kajak is so closely identical? [The Stanf. Dict. says that the latter word is Esquimaux, and recognises no connection with the former.]

CAJAN, s. This is a name given by Sprengel (Cajanus indicus), and by Linnaeus (Cytisus cajan), to the leguminous shrub which gives dhall (q.v.). A kindred plant has been called Delicos cajiang, Willdenow. We do not know the origin of this name. The Cajan was introduced to America by the slave-traders from Africa. De Candolle finds it impossible to say whether its native region is India or Africa. (See DHALL, CALAVANCE.) [According to Mr. Skeat the word is Malay. pokok'chbang, 'the plant which gives beans,' quite a different word from kajang which gives us Cadjan.]

CAJEPUT, s. The name of a fragrant essential oil produced especially in Celebes and the neighbouring island of Bouro. A large quantity is exported from Singapore and Batavia. It is used most frequently as an external application, but also internally, especially (of late) in cases of cholera. The name is taken from the Malay kays-putch, i.e. 'Leignum album.' Filet (see p. 140) gives six different trees as producing the oil, which is derived from the distillation of the leaves.

The chief of these trees is Melaleuca leucadendron, L., a tree diffused from the Malay Peninsula to N.S. Wales. The drug and tree were first described by Rumphius, who died 1693. (See Hanbury and Flückiger, 247 [and Wallace, Malay Arch., ed. 1890, p. 294].)

CASKEN, s. This is Sea H. for Cozneca (Boeckuck).

CALALUZ, s. A kind of swift rowing vessel often mentioned by the Portuguese writers as used in the Indian Archipelago. We do not know the etymology, nor the exact character of the craft. [According to Mr. Skeat, the word is Jav. kalulis, kalulus, spelt keloeles by Klinkert, and explained by him as a kind of vessel. The word seems to be derived from loelo, 'to go right through anything,' and thus the literal translation would be 'the threader,' the reference being, as in the case of most Malay boat names, to the special figure-head from which the boat was supposed to derive its whole character.]

1525.—"4 great lancharas, and 6 calaluzes and manchus which row very fast."—Lembranças, 8.

1539.—"The King (of Achin) set forward with the greatest possible despatch, a great armament of 200 rowing vessels, of which the greater part were lancharas, jeoças, and calaluzes, besides 15 high-sided junks."—F. M. Fino, cap. xxxii.

1552.—"The King of Siam... ordered to be built a fleet of some 200 sail, almost all lancharas and calaluzes, which are rowing-vessels."—Barros, II. vi. 1.

1613.—"And having embarked with some companions in a caelius or rowing vessel. . . ."—Goñido de Eredia, f. 51.

CALAMANDER WOOD, s. A beautiful kind of rose-wood got from a Ceylon tree (Diospyros quaeceita). Tennent regards the name as a Dutch corruption of Coromandel wood (i. 118), and Drury, we see, calls one of the ebony-trees (D. melanoxylon) "Coromandel-ebony." Forbes Watson gives as Singhalese names of the wood Calumadiriya, Kalumadereya, &c., and the term Kalumadiriya is given with this meaning in Clough's Singh. Dict.; still in absence of further information, it may remain doubtful if this be not a borrowed word. It may be worth while to observe that, according to Tavernier, [ed. Ball, ii. 1.4] the "painted calicoes" or "chites" of Masulipatam were called "Calmendar, that is to say,done with a pencil" (Kalam-dar?), and possibly this appellation may have been given by traders to a delicately veined wood. [The N.E.D. suggests that the Singh. terms quoted above may be adaptations from the Dutch.]

1777.—"In the Cingalese language Calaminder is said to signify a black flaming tree. The heart, or woody part of it, is extremely handsome, with whitish or pale yellow and black or brown veins, streaks and waves."—Thunberg, iv. 206-6.

1818.—"Calminder wood" appears among Ceylon products in "Mihurn, I. 345.

1825.—"A great deal of the furniture in Ceylon is made of ebony, as well as of the Calamander tree... which is become scarce from the improvident use formerly made of it."—Heber (1844), ii. 161.

1834.—"The forests in the neighbourhood afford timber of every kind (Calamander excepted)."—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 198.

CALAMBAK, s. The finest kind of aloes-wood. Crawfurad gives the word as Javanese, kalambak, but it perhaps came with the article from Ohampa (q.v.).

1510.—"There are three sorts of aloeswood. The first and most perfect sort is called Calamapat."—Vartkema, 225.

1661.—"It must be said that the very fine calambuco and the other eagle-wood is worth at Calicut 1000 maravedis the pound."—Barbosa, 204.

1539.—"This Ambassador, that was Brother-in-law to the King of the Betas ... brought him a rich Present of Wood of Aloes, Calamabas, and 5 quintals of Benjamion in flowers."—F. M. Pinto, in Cogan's tr. p. 15 (orig. cap. xiii.).

1651.—(Campar, in Sumatra) "has nothing but forests which yield aloeswood, called in India Calamabco."—Castanheda, bk. iii.
cap. 69, p. 218, quoted by Crawford, Descrip. 7.

1562.—"Past this kingdom of Camboja begins the other Kingdom called Campa (Champa), in the mountains of which grows the genuine aloes-wood, which the Moors of those parts call Calamaboc."—Barros, I.
xr. 1.

[c. 1590.—"Kalanbak (calembo) is the wood of a tree brought from Zirbah; it is heavy and full of veins. Some believe it to be the raw wood of aloes."—Ae, ed. Blochmann, i. 31.]

[c. 1610.—"From this river (the Ganges) comes that excellent wood Calamba, which is believed to come from the Earthly Paradise."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 353.]

1613.—"And the Calamba is the most fragrant medulla of the said tree."—Godinho de Barbosa, i. 15e.

1615.—"Lunra (a black gum), gummellac, collomback."—Foster, Letters, iv. 87.

1618.—"We opened the ij chists which came from Syam with calambak and silk, and said it out."—Cocke's Diary, ii. 61.

1774.—"Les Mahometans font de ce Kalambe assez spacieux qu'ils portent à la main par amusement. Ce bois quand il est échauffé ou un peu frotté, rend un odeur agréable."—Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, 127.

See EAGLE-WOOD and ALOES.

CALASH, s. French calèche, said by Litré to be a Slav word, and so N.E.D.]. In Bayly's Dict. it is calash and caliche. [The N.E.D. does not recognise the latter form; the former is as early as 1678]. This seems to have been the earliest precursor of the buggy in Eastern settlements. Bayly defines it as 'a small open chariot.'
The quotation below refers to Batavia, and the President in question was the Prest. of the English Factory at Chusan, who, with his council, had been expelled from China, and was halting at Batavia on his way to India.

1702.—"The Shabander riding home in his Calash this Morning, and seeing the President sitting without the door at his lodgings, alighted and came and Sat with the President near an hour... what moved the Shabander to speak so plainly to the President thereof he knew not, But observed that the Shabander was in his Glasses at his first alighting from his Calash."—Progs. "Monday, 30th March," MS. Report in India Office.

CALAVANCE, s. A kind of bean;
acc. to the quotation from Osbeck, Dolichos spinosis. The word was once common in English use, but seems forgotten, unless still used at sea. Sir Joseph Hooker writes: "When I was in the Navy, haricot beans were in constant use as a substitute for tomatoes and in Brazil and elsewhere, were called Calavances. I do not remember whether they were the seed of Phaseolus lunatus or vulgaris, or of Dolichos spinosis, alias Caljang" (see CAJAN). The word comes from the Span. garbanzos, which De Candolle mentions as Castilian for 'pois chichi,' or Oicer arietinum, and as used also in Basque under the form garbantzu, CALAY. 145

[or garbatzu, from garau, 'seed,' antzu, 'dry,' N.E.D.]

1620.—"... from hence they make their provision in abundance, viz. beef, cheese, pork, garvanes, and small peas or beans...."—Cook's Diary, ii. 311.

c. 1830.—"... in their Canoes brought us... green pepper, garvanes, Buffalos, Hens, Eggs, and other things."—Str. T. Herbert, ed. 1866, p. 350.

1719.—"I was forc'd to give them an extraordinary meal every day, either of Farina or calavanes, which at once made a considerable consumption of our water and firing."—Skeltock's Voyage, 62.

1788.—"But garvanes are prepared in a different manner, neither do they grow soft like other pulse, by boiling. . . ."—Skeat's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 140.

1752.—"... Calavanes (Dolichos sinensis)."—Osebek, i. 304.

1774.—"When I asked any of the men of Dory why they had no gardens of plantains and Kalavanes... I learnt that the Hottentots supply them."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 109.

1814.—"His Majesty is authorised to permit for a limited time by Order in Council, the Importation from any Port or Place whatsoever of... any Beans called Kidney, French Beans, Tares, Lentilles, Calavanes, and all other sorts of Pulse."—Act 54 Geo. III. cap. xxxvi.

CALAY, a. Tin; also v., to tin copper vessels—H. kala'i karnu. The word is Ar. kala'i, 'tin,' which according to certain Arabic writers was so called from a mine in India called kala'. In spite of the different initial and terminal letters, it seems at least possible that the place meant was the same by that the old Arab geographers called Kalah, near which they place mines of tin (al-kala'), and which was certainly somewhere about the coast of Malacca, possibly, as has been suggested, at Kadah* or as we write it, Quedda. [See Ain, tr. Jarrett, iii 43.]

The tin produce of that region is well known. Kalang is indeed also a name of tin in Malay, which may have been the true origin of the word before us. It may be added that the small State of Salangor between Malacca and Perak was formerly known as Nagri-Kalang, or the 'Tin Country,' and that the place on the coast where the British Resident lives is called Klang (see Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 210, 215). The Portuguese have the forms calain and calin, with the nasal termination so frequent in their Eastern borrowings. Bluteau explains calain as 'Tin of India, finer than ours.' The old writers seem to have hesitated about the identity with tin, and the word is confounded in one quotation below with Tootnague (q.v.). The French use calin. In the P. version of the Book of Numbers (ch. xxxi. v. 29) kala't is used for 'tin.' See on this word Quatremerre in the Journal des Savans, Dec. 1846.

c. 920.—"Kalah is the focus of the trade in aloeswood, in camphor, in sandalwood, in ivory, in the lead which is called al-Kala't."—Relation des Voyages, etc., i. 94.

c. 1154.—"Thence to the Isles of Lankalitis is reckoned two days, and from the latter to the Island of Kalah. . . . There is in this last island an abundant mine of tin (al-Kala't). The metal is very pure and brilliant."—Edirisi, by Jawurt, i. 80.

1552.—"... Tin, which the people of the country call Cahem."—Castanheda, iii. 213. It is mentioned as a staple of Malacca in ii. 186.

1606.—"That all the chalios which were neither of gold, nor silver, nor of tin, nor of calain, should be broken up and destroyed."—Gouyez, Synodo, f. 288.

1610.—"... They carry (to Hormuz) clove, cinnamon, pepper, cardamom, ginger, mace, nutmeg, sugar, calaym, or tin."—Relaciones de P. Teixeira, 382.

c. 1610.—"... money... not only of gold and silver, but also of another metal, which is called calin, which is white like tin, but harder, purer, and finer, and which is much used in the Indies."—Pyrrard de Laval (1679) i. 164; [Hak. Soc. i. 234, with Gray's note].

1613.—"And he also reconnoitred all the sites of mines of gold, silver, mercury, tin, or calain, and iron and other metals..."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 58.

1846.—"... Il y a (i.e. in Siam) plusieurs minieres de calain, qui est un metal metoyen, entre le plomb et l'ester."—Cardin, Rel. de la Prov. de Japon, 163.

1726.—"The goods exported hither (from Pegu) are... Kain (a metal coming very near silver)..."—Valentijn, v. 128.

1770.—"They send only one vessel (viz. the Dutch to Siam) which transports Javanese horses, and is freighted with sugar, spices, and linen; for which they receive in return calain, at 70 livres 100 weight."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 208.

CALCUTTA, n.p. B. Kabikatā, or Kalikattā, a name of uncertain etymology. The first mention that we are aware of occurs in the Ain-i-Akbari. It is well to note that in some early charts, such as that in Valentijn, and the oldest in the English Pilot, though Calcutta is not entered, there is a place on the Hoogly Calcular, or Calcuta, which leads to mistake. It is far below, near the modern Fulta. [With reference to the quotations below from Luillier and Sonnerat, Sir H. Yule writes (Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xcvi.): "In Orme’s Historical Fragments, Job Charnock is described as ‘Governor of the Factory at Golgot near Hugli.’ This name Golgot and the corresponding Golghat in an extract from Mushabat Khān indicate the name of the particular locality where the English Factory at Hugli was situated. And some confusion of this name with that of Calcutta may have led to the curious error of the Frenchman Luiller and Sonnerat, the former of whom calls Calcutta Golgouthe, while the latter says: ‘Les Anglais prononcent et scrivent Golgota.’"]

c. 1590.—"Kalikata va Bakaga va Barbakpur, 3 Mahal."—Ata. (orig.) i. 408; (tr. Jarrett, ii. 141).

[1688.—"So我自己 accompanied with Capt. Haddock and the 130 soldiers we carried from hence embarked, and about the 20th September arrived at Calcutta."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxxix.]

1698.—"This avairious disposition the English plied with presents, which in 1698 obtained his permission to purchase from the Zeminder... the towns of Sootanatty, Calcutta, and Goompore, with their districts extending about 3 miles along the eastern bank of the river."—Orme, repr. ii. 71.

1702.—"The next morning we pass’d by the English Factory belonging to the old Company, which they call Golgotha, and is a handsome Building, to which were adding stately Warehouses."—Voyage to the E. Indies, by Le Sieur Lullier, E. T. 1715, p. 259.

1726.—"The ships which sail thither (to Hugli) first pass by the English Lodge in Coliacatte, 9 miles (Dutch miles) lower down than ours, and after that the French one called Chandarnagor..."—Valentijn, v. 162.

1727.—"The Company has a pretty good Hospital at Calcutta, where many go in to undergo the Penance of Physic, but few come out to give an Account of its Operation... One Year I was there, and there were reckoned in August about 1200 English, some Military, some Servants to the Company, some private Merchants residing in the Town, and some Seamen belong to Shipping lying at the Town, and before the beginning of January there were 400 Burials registered in the Clerk’s Books of Mortality."—A. Hamilton, ii. 9 and 6.

1742.—"I had occasion to stop at the city of Firduhdanga (Chandernagore) which is inhabited by a tribe of Frenchmen. The city of Calcutta, which is on the other side of the water, and inhabited by a tribe of English who have settled there, is much more extensive and thickly populated..."—Abdul Karim Khan, in Eliot’s, viii. 127.

CALEEFA. 8. Ar. Khaltifa, the Caliph or Vice-gerent, a word which we do not introduce here in its high Mahommedan use, but because of its quaint application in Anglo-Indian households, at least in Upper India, to two classes of domestic servants, the tailor and the cook, and sometimes to the barber and farrier. The first is always so addressed by his fellow-servants (Khaltifa-ji). In South India the cook is called Maistry, i.e. artiste. In Sicily, we may note, he is always called Monsir (1) an indication of what ought to be his nationality. The root of the word Khaltifa, according to Prof. Sayce, means ‘to change,’ and another

* "Capitale des établissements Anglais dans le Bengale. Les Anglais prononcent et écrivent Golgota" (?) CALICO, s. Cotton cloth, ordinarily of tolerably fine texture. The word appears in the 17th century sometimes in the form of Calicut, but possibly this may have been a purism, for calicos or callico occurs in English earlier, or at least more commonly in early voyages.

The word may have come to us through the French calicot, which though retaining the t to the eye, does not do so to the ear. The quotations sufficiently illustrate the use of the word and its origin from Calicut. The fine cotton stuffs of Malabar are already mentioned by Marco Polo (i. 379). Possibly they may have been all brought from beyond the Ghauts, as the Malabar cotton, ripening during the rains, is not usable, and the cotton stuffs now used in Malabar all come from Madura (see Fryer below; and Terry under CALICUT). The Germans, we may note, call the turkey Calecutische Hahn, though it comes no more from Calicut than it does from Turkey. [See TURKEY.]

1579.—"I great and large Canowes, in each whereof were certaine of the greatest personages that were about him, attired all of them in white Lawne, or cloth of Calicet."

—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 1579.

1591.—"The commodities of the shippes that come from Bengala bee . . . fine Calicet cloth, Pintados and Rice."

—Barker's Lancaster, in Hakl. i. 592.

1592.—"The callicos were book-callicos, calico launes, broad white calicos, fine starched callicos, coarse white callicos, browne coarse callicos."

—Desc. of the Great Carrack Madre de Dios.

1602.—"And at his departure gave a robe, and a Tucke of Calico wrought with gold."

—Lancaster's Voyage, in Purchas, i. 153.

1604.—"It doth appear by the abbreviate of the Accounts sent home out of the Indies, that there remained in the hands of the Agent, Master Starkey, 482 fardels of Calico."

"I can fit you, gentlemen, with fine callicoes too, for doublets; the only sweet fashion now, most delicate and courtly: a meek gentle callico, cut upon two double affectable taffetas; all most neat, neat, and unmatchable."

1605.—" . . . about their loynes they (the Javanese) weare a kind of Callicoo-cloth."—Edm. Scot, ibid. 165.

1608. —"They esteem not so much of money as of Calicut clothes, Pintados, and such like stuffs."—John Davis, ibid. 136.

1612. —"Callicoo copboard clithaes, the piece ... xla."—Rates and Valuations, &c. (Scotland), p. 294.

1616. —"Angareza . . . inhabited by Moorees trading with the Maine, and other three Easterns Islands with their Castel and fruits, for Callicooes or other binnens to cover them."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas; [with some verbal differences in Hak. Soc. i. 17].

1627. —"Callicoo, tela delicata Indica. H. Calicunt, dicit à Calicunt, Indiae regione ubi confectionur."—Minshew, 2nd ed., s.v.

1673. —"Staple Commodities are Calicunts, white and painted."—Fryer, 34.

"Callicout for Spice . . . and no Cloath, though it give the name of Calicout to all in India, it being the first Port from whence they are known to be brought into Europe."—Ibid. 86.

1707. —"The Governor lays before the Council the silent action of Captain Leaton, who on Sunday last marched part of his company . . . over the Company's Calicoes that lay a dyeing."—Minute in Wheeler, ii. 48.

1720. —Act 7 Geo. I. cap. vii. "An Act to preserve and encourage the woollen and silk manufacture of this kingdom, and for more effectual employing of the Poor, by prohibiting the Use and Wear of all printed, painted, stained or dyed Calicoes in Apparel, Houshold Stuff, Furniture or otherwise."—Stat. at large, v. 229.

1812. —"Like Iris' bow down darts the painted cine, Starred, striped, and spotted, yellow, red, and blue, Old calico, torn silk, and muslin new."—Rejected Addresses (Oribee).

CALICUT, n.p. In the Middle Ages the chief city, and one of the chief ports of Malabar, and the residence of the Zamorin (q.v.). The name Kolködu is said to mean the 'Cock-Fortress.' [Logan (Man. Malabar, i. 241 note) gives koli, 'fowl,' and kotto, 'corner or empty space,' or kotta, 'a fort.'] There was a legend, of the Dido type, that all the space within cock-crow was once granted to the Zamorin.

c. 1343. —"We proceeded from Fandaraina to Kali-Kit, one of the chief ports of Mullabar. The people of Chm, of Java, of Sallân, of Mahal (Maldive), of Yemen, and Fars frequent it, and the traders of different regions meet there. Its port is among the greatest in the world."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 89.

CALICUTHEM deinceps petit, urbem maritimam, octo millibus passuum ambitum, nobile totius Indiae emporium, pipere, laccos, gingiberis, cinnamonum cras- soreis, kebulis, zedoariae fertilia."—Conti, in Poggius, De Var. Fortunae.

1442. —"Calicut is a perfectly secure harbour, which like that of Ormuss brings together merchants from every city and from every country."—Abdurrassch, in India in Xvth Cent., p. 15.

c. 1475. —"Calicut is a port for the whole Indian sea . . . The country produces pepper, ginger, colour plants, muscat [nut-meg], cloves, cinnamon, aromatic roots, adract [green ginger] . . . and everything is cheap, and servants and maids are very good."—Ath. Nikéias, ibid. p. 20.

1488. —"We departed thence, with the pilot whom the king gave us, for a city which is called Qualcut."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 48.

1572. —"Já fora de tormentas, e dos primeiros Marés, o temor vão do peito vos; Dize alegre o Pilo Melindano, 'Terra he de Calicut, se n'he engano.'"—Canoes, vi. 92.

By Burton:

"now, 'scaped the tempest and the first sea-dread, fled from each bosom terrors vain, and cried the Melindanian Pilot in delight, 'Calicut-land, if ough't I see aright!'"

1616. —"Of that wool they make divers sorts of Calico, which had that name (as I suppose) from Callicutta, not far from Goa, where that kind of cloth was first bought by the Portuguese."—Terrey, in Purchas. [In ed. 1777, p. 105, Callicuta.]

CALINGULA, s. A sluice or escape. Tam. kalángal; much used in reports of irrigation works in S. India.

[1883. —"Much has been done in the way of providing sluices for minor channels of supply, and calingulaia, or water weirs for surplus vents."—Venkatasami Row, Man. of Tanjore, p. 332.]

CALPUTTEE, s. A caulker; also the process of caulking; H. and Beng. kalidpatti and kalidpatti, and these no doubt from the Port. kalafate. But this again is oriental in origin, from the Arabic kalifat, the 'process of caulking.' It is true that Dozy (see p. 376) and also Jal (see his Index, ii. 559) doubt the last derivation, and are disposed to connect the Portuguese and Spanish words, and the Italian calefattare, &c., with the Latin calefacere, a view which M. Marcel Devie rejects. The latter word would apply well enough to the process of pitching a vessel as practised in the Mediterranean, where we have seen the vessel careened over, and a great fire of thorns kindled under it to keep the pitch fluid. But caulking is not pitching; and when both form and meaning correspond so exactly, and when we know so many other marine terms in the Mediterranean have been taken from the Arabic, there does not seem to be room for reasonable doubt in this case. The Emperor Michael V. (A.D. 1041) was called kalafatoury, because he was the son of a caulker (see Ducange, Gloss. Graec., who quotes Zonaras).

1554.—(At Mozambique) . . . “To two calafattes . . . of the said brigantines, at the rate annually of 20,000 reis each, with 9000 reis each for maintenance and 6 measures of millet to each, of which no count is taken.”—Simão Botelho, Tombo, 11.

c. 1620.—“S’il estoit bescin de calafader le Vaiseau . . . on y aurroit beaucoup de peine dans ce Port, principalement si on est contraint de se servir des Charpentiers et des Calafadeurs du Pays; parce qu’ils dépendent tous du Gouverneur de Bombain.”—Roger . . . des Indes Orient., par Alexio da Motta, in Thévenot’s Collection.

CALUAT, s. This in some old travels is used for Ar. khilwat, ‘privacy, a private interview’ (C. P. Brown, M.S.).

1404.—“And this Garden they call Talicia, and in their tongue they call it Calbet.”—Clapp, & c. comp. Markham, 130.

1670.—“Still deeper in the square is the third tent, called Calnet-Kaza, the retired spot, or the place of the privy Council.”—Bernier, ed. Constable, 361.

1822.—“I must tell you what a good fellow the little Raja of Tallacca is. When I visited him we sat on two musmads without exchanging one single word, in a very respectable durbar; but the moment we retired to a Khilwat the Raja produced his Civil and Criminal Register, and his Minute of demands, collections and balances for the 1st quarter, and began explaining the state of his country as eagerly as a young Collector.”—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 144.

1824.—“The khilwat or private room in which the doctor was seated.”—Haji Biba, p. 87.

CALUETE, CALUETE, s. The punishment of impalement; Malayal. kaluckki (pron. etti). [See IMPALE.]

1510.—“The said wood is fixed in the middle of the back of the malefactor, and passes through his body . . . this torture is called uncalvet.”—Varthema, 147.

1582.—“The Capitaine General for to encourage them the more, commanded before them all to pitch a long staffe in the ground, the which was made sharp at ye one end. The same among the Malabars is called Calvete, upon ye which they do execute justice of death, unto the poorest or vilest people of the country.”—Casaseca, tr. by N. L., II. 145, 146.

1636.—“The Queen marvolling much at the thing, and to content them she ordered the sorcerer to be delivered over for punishment, and to be set on the calote, which is a very sharp stake fixed firmly in the ground . . .” &c.—Gouvart, f. 47v; see also f. 163.

CALYAN, n.p. The name of more than one city of fame in W. and S. India; Stk. Kalyana, ‘beautiful, noble, propitious.’ One of these is the place still known as Kalyan, on the Ulhas river, more usually called by the name of the city, 33 m. N.E. of Bombay. This is a very ancient port, and is probably the one mentioned by Cosmas below. It appears as the residence of a donor in an inscription on the Kanheri caves in Salseet (see Fergusson and Burgess, p. 349). Another Kalyana was the capital of the Chalukyas of the Deccan in the 9th-12th centuries. This is in the Nizam’s district of Naldrig, about 40 miles E.N.E. of the fortress called by that name. A third Kalyana was a port of Canara, between Mangalore and Kundapur, in lat. 13° 28’ or thereabouts, on the same river as Bacanore (q.v.). [This is apparently the place which Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 206) calls Callian Bondi or Kalyan Bandar.] The quotations refer to the first Calyan.

c. A.D. 80-90.—“The local marts which occur in order after Barygaza are Akabar, Sappa, Kalliana, a city which was raised to the rank of a regular mart in the time of Saraganae, but, since Sandanze became its master, its trade has been put under restrictions; for if Greek vessels, even by accident, enter its ports, a guard is put on board, and they are taken to Barygaza.”—Periplus, § 52.

c. A.D. 545.—“And the most notable places of trade are these: Sindu, Orritha, Kalliana, Sibr. . . .”—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., p. clxxxviii.

1673.—“On both sides are placed stately Aides, and dwellings of the Portuguese Fidalgo; till on the Right, within a Mile or more of Gaubat, they yield possession to the neighbouring Senni Gil, at which City (the key this way into that Rebel’s Country), Wind and Tide favouring us, we landed."—Fryer, p. 128.

1825.—"Near Candaullah is a waterfall... its stream winds to join the sea, nearly opposite to Tannah, under the name of the Callianass river."—Heber, ii. 137.

Prof. Forchhammer has lately described the great remains of a Pagoda and other buildings with inscriptions, near the city of Pegu, called Kalyani.

CAMBAY, n.p. Written by Mahommedan writers Kambayat, sometimes Kinbyyat. According to Col. Tod, the original Hindu name was Kambhavati, 'City of the Pillar'; [the Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. gives stambha-tirtha, 'sacred pillar pool'].

Long a very famous port of Guzerat, at the head of the Gulf to which it gives its name. Under the Mahommedan Kings of Guzerat it was one of their chief residences, and they are often called Kings of Cambay. Cambay is still a feudatory State under a Nawab. The place is in decay, owing partly to the shoals, and the extraordinary rise and fall of the tides in the Gulf, impeding navigation. [See Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 313 seqq.]

o. 951.—"From Kambay to the sea, about 2 parasangs. From Kambay to Srabaya (!) about 4 days."—Istahkhi, in Elliot, i. 80.

1320.—"Hoc vero Oceanum mare in illis partibus principaliiter habit duces portus: quorum unus nominatur Mahakot, et alius Cambeth."—Marino Sanudo, near beginning.

o. 1420.—"Cambay is situated near to the sea, and is 12 miles in circuit; it abounds in spikenard, lac, indigo, myrabolans, and silk."—Conti, in India in XVth Cent., 20.

1498.—"In which Gulf, as we were informed, there are many cities of Christians and Moors, and a city which is called Quadambay."—Roteiro, 49.

1506.—"In Combes è terra de Mori, e il suo Re è Moro; e là è una gran terra, e li nasce turbiti, e spigonardo, e mulo (read mulo—see ANIL), lache, corniole, salcedes, gotoni..."—Re del. Leonardo Ca' Masser, in Archivio Stor. Italiano, App.

1674.—"The Prince of Cambay's daily food is asp and basilisk and toad, Which makes him have so strong a breath, Each night he stinks a queen to death."—Hudibras, Pt. ii. Canto i.

Butler had evidently read the story of Mahmud Bigara, Sultan of Guzerat, Varthema or Purchas.

CAMBOJA, n.p. An ancient kingdom in the eastern part of India, once great and powerful, it fell, and under the 'protectorate' of France, whose Saigon colony adjoins. The name, like so many others of Indo-China since the time of Ptolemy, is of Skt. origin, being apparently a transfer of the name of a nation and country on the N. frontier of India, Camboja, suppose have been about the locality of Champa or Kafristan. Ignoring this fact, and Chinese and other etymologies, the name had been invented for the name. In older Chinese annals (c. 1200) this region had the name of Ro from the period after our era, and the kingdom of Camboja had been powerful, it was known to the Chinese as Chin-la. Its power seems to have extended at one time westward, haps to the shores of the B. of Bon and Ruins of extraordinary vastness are architectural elaboration are numerous and have attracted great attention. Mouhot's visit in 1859, they had been mentioned by century missionaries, and some buildings when standing in splendour were described by a Chinese visitor at the end of the 13th century. The gum Gamboge bidentum in the early records [Bir. Rep. on Old Eve., 27] so familiar to us, derives its name from this country, the chief source of supply.

o. 1161.—"... although... the belief of the people of Rámâyana was the same as that of the Buddhist men of Ceylon... CAMEEZE, s. This word (kamis) is used in colloquial H. and Tamil for 'a shirt.' It comes from the Port. camisa. But that word is directly from the Arab kamis, 'a tunic.' Was St. Jerome's Latin word an earlier loan from the Arabic, or the source of the Arabic word? probably the latter; [so N.E.D. a.v. Camise]. The Mod. Greek Dick. of Sophocles has καμίσαο. Camisa is, according to the Slang Dictionary, used in the cant of English thieves; and in more ancient slang it was made into 'commission.'

c. 400.—'Solent militantes habere lineas quas Camistas vocant, sic aptas membris et adstrictas corporibus, ut expedit sint vel ad cursum, vel ad praemia ... quomquae necessitas traxerit.'—Sat. Hieronymi Epist. (lav.) ad Fabriolum, § 11.

1404.—'And to the said Ruy Gonzales he gave a big horse, an ambler, for they prise a horse that ambles, furnished with saddle and bridle, very well according to their fashion; and besides he gave him a camisa and an umbrella' (see SOMBEIRO).—Clavijo, § lxxxix.; Martham, 100.

1464.—'to William and Richard my sons, all my fair camises. ...—Will of Richard Strode, of Newnham, Devon.

1498.—'That a very fine camilya, which in Portugal would be worth 300 reis, was given here for 2 fuses, which in that country is the equivalent of 30 reis, though the value of 30 reis is in that country no small matter.'—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 77.

1573.—'The richest of all (the shops in Fex) are where they sell camisas. ...—Marmol, Desc. General de Africa, Pt. I. Bk. iii. f. 87v.

CAMP, a. In the Madras Presidency [as well as in N. India] an official not at his headquarters is always addressed as 'in Camp.'

CAMPHOR, s. There are three camphors:

a. The Bornean and Sumatran camphor from Dryobalanops aromatica.

b. The camphor of China and Japan, from Ossinomum Camphora. (These are the two chief camphors of commerce; the first immensely exceeding the second in market value; see Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi. Note 3.)

c. The camphor of Blumea balsamifera, D.C., produced and used in China under the name of ngai camphor.

The relative ratios of value in the Canton market may be roughly given as b, 1; c, 10; a, 80.

The first Western mention of this drug, as was pointed out by Messrs. Hanbury and Flückiger, occurs in the Greek medical writer Aëtius (see below), but it probably came through the Arabs, as is indicated by the ph, or f of the Arab kafur, representing the Skt. karpura. It has been suggested that the word was originally Javanese, in which language kafur appears to mean both 'line' and 'camphor.'

Moodeen Sheriff says that kafur is used (in Ind. Materia Medica) for 'amber.' Tābahīr (see TABASHEER), is, according to the same writer, called bīnas-kafur 'bamboo-camphor'; and ras-kafur (mercury-camphor) is an impure subchloride of mercury. According to the same authority, the varieties of camphor now met with in the bazaars of S. India are—1. kafur-i-kaisuri, which is in Tamil called pachch'ēi (i.e. crude karupparum; 2. Sūratī kafur; 3. chinī; 4. batai (from the Batto country?). The first of these names is a curious instance of the perpetuation of a blunder, originating in the misreading of loose Arabic writing. The name is unquestionably finsi, which carelessness as to points has converted into kaisuri (as above, and in Blochmann's Ain, i. 79). The camphor alfarsi is mentioned as early as by Avicenna, and by Marco Polo, and came from a place called Pansir in Sumatra, perhaps the same as Barus, which has now lost its name to the costly Sumatran drug. A curious notion of Ibn Batuta's
CAMPHOR. 152 CANARA.

(iv. 241) that the camphor of Sumatra (and Borneo) was produced in the inside of a cane, filling the joints between knot and knot, may be explained by the statement of Barbosa (p. 204), that the Borneo camphor as exported was packed in tubes of bamboo. This camphor is by Barbosa and some other old writers called ‘estable camphor’ (da mangiare), because used in medicine and with betel.

Our form of the word seems to have come from the Sp. alcanfor and canfora, through the French camphre. Dozy points out that one Italian form retains the truer name cufura, and an old German one (Mid. High Germ.) is gafcer (Oosterl. 47).

c. 540.—“These (islands called Al-Ramûn) abound in gold mines, and are near the country of Ransir, famous for its camphor...”—Mas'uid, i. 388. The same work at iii. 49, refers back to this passage as “the country of Mangurak.” Probably Mas'uid wrote correctly Fanurak.

1406.—“... et dei [Tenasserim] vivere, canella... camfera de menara o de quilla nova...” (i.e. both camphor to eat and not to eat, or Sumatra and China camphor).—Leonardo Co' Masser.

c. 1500.—“The Camphor tree is a large tree growing in the ghatas of Hindostan and in China. A hundred horsemen and upwards may rest in the shade of a single tree.... Of the various kinds of camphor the best is called Ribaki or Quiripir. In some books camphor in its natural state is called... Bhimani.”—Ai, Blockmann, ed. i. 78-9. [Bhimani is more properly bhimani, and takes its name from the demigod Bhismen, second son of Pandu.]

1623.—“In this shipp we have laden a small parcel of camphire of Barowe, being in all 60 cattis.”—Batarian Letter, pubd. in Cock's Diary, ii. 343.

1726.—“The Persians name the Camphor of Baros, and also of Borneo to this day Kafur Canfur, as it also appears in the printed text of Avicebron, and Bellesennus notes that in some MSS. of the author is found Kafur Fansuri...”—Valentijn, iv. 67.

1786.—“The Camphor Tree has been recently discovered in this part of the Sircar's country. We have sent two bottles of the essential oil made from it for your use.”—Letter of Tipoo, Kirkpatrick, p. 281.

1875.—“Camphor, Bholmai (barus), valuation 11b. 80 rs. Refined cake 1 errf. 65 rs.”

Table of Customs Duties on Imports into Br. India up to 1875.

The first of these is the fine Sumatran camphor; the second at 1½ of the price is China camphor.

CAMPOO, a. H. Kampa, corr. of the English 'camp,' or more properly of the Port. 'campo.' It is used for 'a camp,' but formerly was specifically applied to the partially disciplined brigades under European commanders in the Mahratta service.

[1525.—Mr. Whiteway notes that Castanheda (bk. vi. ch. ci. p. 217) and Barros (iii. 10, 3) speak of a ward of Malacca as Campon China; and de Erueta (1613) calls it Campon China, which may supply a link between Camoon and Kampoeng. (See COMPAUND).

1803.—“Begum Sumroo’s Campon has come up the ghatas, and I am afraid... joined Scindiah yesterday. Two deserters... declared that Pohiman’s Campon was following it.”—Wellington, ii. 284.

1883.—“... its unhappy plains were swept over, this way and that, by the cavalry of rival Mahratta powers, Mogul and Rohilla horsemen, or campos and paluns (battalions) under European adventurers.”—Quarterly Review, April, p. 294.

CANARA, n.p. Properly Kannada. This name has long been given to that part of the West coast which lies below the Ghattas, from Mt. Dely northward to the Goa territory; and now to the two British districts constituted out of that tract, viz. N. and S. Canara. This appropriation of the name, however, appears to be of European origin. The name, probably meaning 'black country' [Dravid. kar, 'black'; ndatu, 'country'], from the black cotton soil prevailing there, was properly synonymous with Karnditaka (see CARNATIC), and apparently a corruption of that word. Our quotations show that throughout the sixteenth century the term was applied to the country above the Ghattas, sometimes to the whole kingdom of Narsinga or Vijayanagar (see BISNAGAR). Gradually, and probably owing to local application at Goa, where the natives seem to have been from the first known to the Portuguese as Canariis, a term which in the old Portuguese works means the Konkani people and language of Goa, the name became appropriated to the low country on the coast between Goa and Malabar, which was subject to the kingdom in question, much in the same way that the name Carnatic came at a later date to be misapplied on the other side of the Peninsula.

The Kanara or Canarese language is spoken over a large tract above the Ghauts, and as far north as Bidar (see Caldwell, Introd. p. 33). It is only one of several languages spoken in the British districts of Canara, and that only in a small portion, viz. near Kundapur. Tulu is the chief language in the Southern District. Kanadam occurs in the great Tanjore inscription of the 11th century.

1516. "Beyond this river commences the Kingdom of Narisinga, which contains five very large provinces, each with a language of its own. The first, which stretches along the coast to Malabar, is Tulinate (i.e. Tulu-nada), or the modern district of S. Canara; another lies in the interior... another has the name of Telinga, which confines with the Kingdom of Orissa; another is Canari, in which is the great city of Bisnuga; and then the Kingdom of Charnamedal, the language of which is Tamul." —Barboza.

Englished by Burton:

"Here seen yonside where wavy waters play a range of mountains skirts the murmuring main serving the Malabar for mighty mure, who thus from him of Canara dwells secure."

1598. "The land itself is called Decan, and also Canara." —Linschoten, 49; [Hak. Soc. i. 169].

1614. "Its proper name is Charnatara, which from corruption to corruption has come to be called Canara." —Couto, Dec. VI. liv. v. cap. 5.

In the following quotations the term is applied, either inclusively or exclusively, to the territory which we now call Canara:—

1615. "Canara. Thence to the Kingdom of the Canarins, which is but a little one, and 5 days journey from Damara. They are tall of stature, idle, for the most part, and therefore the greater thieves." —De Monfart, p. 23.

1628. "Having found a good opportunity, such as I desired, of getting out of Goa, and penetrating further into India, that is more to the south, to Canara... " —P. della Valle, ii. 601; [Hak. Soc. ii. 168].

1672. "The strip of land Canara, the inhabitants of which are called Canarins, is fruitful in rice and other food-stuffs." —Baggeau, 96. There is a good map in this work, which shows 'Canara' in the modern acceptance.

1672. "Description of Canara and Journey to Goa.—This kingdom is one of the finest in India, all plain country near the sea, and even among the mountains all populated." —P. Vincenzo Maria, 420. Here the title seems used in the modern sense, but the same writer applies Canara to the whole Kingdom of Binasagar.

1728. "The Kingdom Canara (under which Onor, Batisola, and Garoopa are dependent) comprises all the western lands lying between Wallkin (Konkan) and Malabar, two great coast countries."—Valentijn, v. 2.

1727.—"The country of Canara is generally governed by a Lady who keeps her Court at a Town called Bajodur; two Days journey from the Sea."—A. Hamilton, i. 260.

CANARIN, n.p. This name is applied in some of the quotations under Canara to the people of the district now so called by us. But the Portuguese applied it to the (Konkan) people of Goa and their language. Thus a Konkani grammar, originally prepared about 1600 by the Jesuit, Thomas Esteveao (Stephens, an Englishman), printed at Goa, 1640, bears the title Arte da Lingoa Canarin. (See A. B(urmein) in Ind. Antiq. ii. 98.)

CANAUT, CONAULT, CONNAUGHT, s. H. from Ar. kandî, the side wall of a tent, or canvas enclosure. [See Surapurda.]

[1616.—"High cannattes of a coarse stuff made like arres."—Sir T. Roe, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 325.]

"The King's Tents are red, reared on poles very high, and placed in the midst of the Camp, covering a large Compass, encircled with Canata (made of red calico striped with Canas at every breadth) standing upright on nine foot high guarded round every night with Souldiers."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1481.

c. 1680.—"And (what is hard enough to believe in Indostan, where the Grandees especially are so jealous . . .) I was so near to the wife of this Prince (Dara), that the cords of the Kanatess . . . which enclosed them (for they had not so much as a poor tent), were fastened to the wheels of my chariot."—Bernier, E. T. 22; [ed. Constable, 89].

1792.—"They passed close to Tippoo's tent; the canaut (misprinted canam) was standing, but the green tent had been removed."—T. Munro, in Life, iii. 73.

1793.—"The canaut of canvas . . . was painted of a beautiful sea-green colour."—Dirom, 280.

1817.—"A species of silk of which they make tents and canauts."—Mil'î, ii. 201.

1825.—Heber writes connaut.—Orig. ed. ii. 257.

CANDAHAR, n.p. Kandahar. The application of this name is now exclusively to (a) the well-known city of Western Afghanistan, which is the object of so much political interest. But by the Ar. geographers of the 9th to 11th centuries the name is applied to (b) the country about Peshawar, as the equivalent of the ancient Indian Gandhara, and the Gandarâis of Strabo. Some think the name was transferred to (a) in consequence of a migration of the people of Gandhâra carrying with them the begging-pot of Buddha, believed by Sir H. Rawlinson to be identical with a large sacred vessel of stone preserved in a mosque of Candahar. Others think that Candahar may represent Alexandria in Arachosia. We find a third application of the name (c) in Ibn Batuta, as well as in earlier and later writers, to a former port on the east shore of the Gulf of Cambay, Ghandhar in the Broach District.

a. 1552.—"Those who go from Persia, from the kingdom of Horasan (Khurasan), from Bohrâ, and all the Western Regions, travel to the city which the natives corruptly call Candar, instead of Scandar, the name by which the Persians call Alexander. . . ."—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

1664.—"All these great preparations give us cause to apprehend that, instead of going to Kachemire, we be not led to besiege that important city of Kandahar, which is the Frontier to Persia, Indostan, and Usbeck, and the Capital of an excellent Country."—Bernier, E. T., p. 118; [ed. Constable, 382].

1871.—"From Arachosia, from Candar east, And Margians to the Hyrcanian cliffs Of Caucasus."—Paradise Regained, iii. 316 seqq.

b. c. 1030.—". . . thence to the river Chandhrâ (Chinâb) 12 (parases); thence to Jalilam on the West of the Bâyat (or Hydaspes) 18; thence to Wathind, capital of Kandahâr 20; thence to Parshâwar 14. . . ."—Al-Birûnî, in Elliot, i. 63 (corrected).

c. c. 1343.—"From Kinhâa (Cambay) we went to the town of Kâwî (Kâwî, opp. Cambay), on an estuary where the tide rises and falls. . . . thence to Kandahâr, a considerable city belonging to the Infidels, and situated on an estuary from the sea."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 57-8.
1516.—"Further on... there is another place, in the mouth of a small river, which is called Guandari... And it is a very good town, a seaport."—Barbosa, 64.

1814.—"Candhar, eighteen miles from the wells, is pleasantly situated on the banks of a river; and a place of considerable trade; being a great thoroughfare from the sea coast to the Gunt mountains."—Forbes, Or. Mens. i. 205.; [2nd ed. i. 116].

CANDAREEN, s. In Malay, to which language the word apparently belongs, kandari. A term formerly applied to the hundredth of the Chinese ounce or weight, commonly called by the Malay name tahil (see TaHIL). Fryer (1673) gives the Chinese weights thus:—

1 Catty is nearest 16 Tailes
1 Teen (Taile) is 10 Mass
1 Mass in Silver is 10 Quadrans
1 Quadrans is 10 Cash
750 Cash make 1 Royal
1 grain English weight is 2 cash.

1564.—"In Malacca the weight used for gold, misk, &c., the cato, contains 20 tailes, each taile 18 mass, each mass 20 cumbdaryns; also 1 panal 4 masses, each mass 4 cupongs; each cupong 5 cumbdaryns."—A. Nunes, 39.

1615.—"We bought 5 great square postes of the Kings master carpenter; cost 2 mas 6 condins per peceo."—Cook, i. 1.

(1) CANDY, n.p. A town in the hill country of Ceylon, which became the deposit of the sacred tooth of Buddha at the beginning of the 14th century, and was adopted as the native capital about 1692. Chitty says the name is unknown to the natives, who call the place Mahab Nuvar, 'great city.' The name seems to have arisen out of some misapprehension by the Portuguese, which may be illustrated by the quotation from Valentijn.

O. 1580.—"And passing into the heart of the Island, there came to the Kingdom of Candia, a certain Friar Pascoal with two companions, who were well received by the King of the country Javira Bandar... in so much that he gave them a great piece of ground, and everything needful to build a church, and houses for them to dwell in."—Costa, Dec. VI. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1552.—"... and at three or four places, like the passes of the Alps of Italy, one finds entrance within this circuit (of mountains) which forms a Kingdom called Candia."—Barros, Dec. III. Liv. ii. cap. 1.

1645.—"Now then as soon as the Emperor was come to this Castle in Candia he gave order that the 600 captive Hollanders, should be distributed throughout his country among the peasants, and in the City."—J. J. Stuur's 15-Jährige Kriegs-Dienst, 97.

1681.—"The First is the City of Candy, so generally called by the Christians, probably from Conde, which in the Chingulay Language signifies Hills, for among them it is situated, but by the Inhabitants called Hingodaug-lalur, as much as to say 'The City of the Chingulay people,' and Mauneur, signifying the 'Chief or Royal City.'"—R. Knox, p. 5.

1728.—"Candi, otherwise Candid, or named in Cingalees Conde Oude, i.e. the high mountain country."—Valentijn (Ceylon), 19.

(2) CANDY, s. A weight used in S. India, which may be stated roughly at about 500 lbs., but varying much in different parts. It corresponds broadly with the Arabian Bahar (q.v.), and was generally equivalent to 20 Manzas, varying therefore with the maund. The word is Mahr. and Tel. khandi, written in Tam. and Mal. kandi, or Mal. kanti, [and comes from the Skt. khand, 'to divide.' A Candy of land is supposed to be as much as will produce a candy of grain, approximately 75 acres]. The Portuguese write the word candil.

1683.—"A candil which amounts to 522 pounds" (ararleis).—Garcez, f. 55.

1698.—"One candiel (v.l. candil) is little more or less than 14 bushels, wherewith they measure Rice, Corne, and all graine."—Linechoiten, 69; [Hak. Soc. i. 245].

1618.—"The Candis at this place (Batala) containeth neere 500 poundes."—W. Hore, in Purchas, i. 657.

1710.—"They advised that they have supplied Habib Khan with ten candy of country gunpowder."—In Wheeler, ii. 198.

c. 1760.—Grose gives the Bombay candy as 20 maunds of 28 lbs. each=560 lbs.; the Surat ditto as 20 maunds of 37½ lbs.=746½ lbs.; the Anjengo ditto 560 lbs.; the Carwar ditto 575 lbs.; the Coromandel ditto at 500 lbs. &c.

(3) CANDY (SUGAR). This name of crystallized sugar, though it came no doubt to Europe from the P.-Ar. kand (P. also shakar kanda; Sp. azucar candé; It. candì and succher candito; Fr. sucre candis) is of Indian origin. There is a Skt. root khand, 'to break,' whence khandi, 'broken,' also applied in various compounds to granulated and candied sugar. But there is also Tam. kar-kanda, kala-kanda, Mal. kandi, kalkandi, and kalkantu, which may have been the direct source of the P. and Ar. adoption of the word, and perhaps its original, from a Dravidian word—lump. [The Dravidian terms mean stone-piece.]"

A German writer, long within last century (as we learn from Mahn, quoted in Diez's Lexicon), appears to derive candy from Candia, *"because most of the sugar which the Venetians imported was brought from that island" —a fact probably invented for the nonce. But the writer was the same wiseacre who (in the year 1829) characterised the book of Marco Polo as a "clumsily compiled ecclesiastical fiction disguised as a Book of Travels" (see Introduction to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. pp. 112-113).

c. 1348.—"A centinajo si vende gien-giovo, cannella, lacca, insenso, indaco...
versino scorzuto, zuccero . . . zucccheri candi . . . porcellane . . . osto . . ."— Pegolotti, p. 134.

1461.—" . . . Un ampolotto di balsamo.
Toriaca bessoleti 15. Zuccheri Moccari (?)
panni 42. Zuccheri canditi, scatole 5. . . ."—List of Presents from Sultans of Egypt to the Doge. (See under BENJAMIN.)

c. 1596.—"White sugar candy (Kandi zelfed) . . . 54 dama per ser."—Ato, i. 63.

1527.—"Sugar Candie, or Stone Sugar."—
Minshew, 2nd ed. s.v.

1727.—"The Trade they have to China is divided between them and Surat . . . the Goods of their own Cargo, which consists in Sugar, Sugar-candy, Almoh, and some Drugs . . . are all for the Surat Market."—
A. Hamilton, i. 371.

CANGUE, a, A square board, or portable pillar of wood, used in China as a punishment, or rather, as Dr. Wells Williams says, as a kind of censure, carrying no disgrace; strange as that seems to us, with whom the essence of the pillory is disgrace. The frame weighs up to 30 lbs., a weight limited by law. It is made to rest on the shoulders without chafing the neck, but so broad as to prevent the wearer from feeling himself. It is generally taken off at night (Giles, and see Gray, China, i. 56 seqq.).

The Cangue was introduced into China by the Tartar dynasty of Wei in the 5th century, and is first mentioned under A.D. 481. In the Kuang-yun (a Chin. Dict. published A.D. 1009) it is called kanggian (modern mandarin hiong-hia), i.e.
'Neck-fetter.' From this old form probably the Ammonites have derived their word for it, gong, and the Cantonese Kang-ka, ‘to wear the Cangue,’ a survival (as frequently happens in Chinese vernaculars) of an ancient term with a new orthography.
It is probable that the Portuguese took the word from one of these latter forms, and associated it with their own canga, ‘an ox-yoke,’ or ‘porter’s yoke for bearing burdens.’ [This view is rejected by the N.E.D. on the authority of Prof. Legge, and the word is regarded as derived from the Port. form given above. In reply to an enquiry, Prof. Giles writes: "I am entirely of opinion that the word is from the Port., and not from any Chinese term."] The thing is alluded to by F. M. Pinto and other early writers on China, who do not give it a name.

Something of this kind was in use in countries of Western Asia, called in P. doshka (biligum). And this word is applied to the Chinese cangue in one of our quotations. Doshka, however, is explained in the lexicon Buhram-i-Kati as ‘a piece of timber with two branches placed on the neck of a criminal’ (Quatremère, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 172, 173).

1420.—" . . . made the ambassadors come forward side by side with certain prisoners.
. . . Some of these had a doshka on their necks."—Shah Rukh’s Mission to China, in Cuthay, p. ccxiv.

[1525.—Custancheda (Bk. VI. ch. 71, p. 154) speaks of women who had come from Portugal in the ships without leave, being tied up in a cage and whipped.]

c. 1540.—" . . . Ordered us to be put in a horrid prison with fettors on our feet, manacles on our hands, and collars on our necks. . . ."—P. M. Pinto, (orig.) ch. lxxxiv.

1585.—"Also they doo lay on them a certaine covering of timber, wherein remaineth no more space of hollownesse then their bodies doth make: thus they are vased that are condemned to death."—Mendona (tr. by Parke, 1599), Hak. Soc. i. 117-118.

1696.—"He was imprisoned, cangoeis, tormented, but making friends with his Money . . . was cleared, and made Under-Customer. . . ."—Bourney’s Journal at Cochin
China, in Dalmynple, Or. Rep. i. 81.

[1705.—"All the people were under confinement in separate houses and also in con-gas"—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. eccel.]

Lockyer, p. 92.  Lockyer adds: "I understood the Cangas to be Thumbols" (p. 96).
1727.—"With his neck in the congoes which are a pair of stocks made of bamboo."—A. Hamilton, ii. 175.
1779.—"Ansestôô on les mit tous trois en prison, des chaines aux pieds, une cangue au cou."—Lettres Edify. xxv. 427.
1797.—"The punishment of the cka, usually called by Europeans the cangas, is generally inflicted for petty crimes."—Swire, Emb.
bd., &c., ii. 492.
1878.—"... frapper sur les jolies a l'aide d'une petite lame de cuir; c'est, je crois, la seule correction infligée aux femmes, car je n'en ai jamais vu amener porter la cangue."—Lion Rossel, A Travess la Ciea, 124.

CANHAVEIRA, COMINERE, COONMODE, n.p. Kanymedu or Kusamedu, Tam. kans, 'humped,' medu, 'mound'); a place on the Coromandel coast, which was formerly the site of European factories (1682-1698) between Pondicherry and Madras, about 13 m. N. of the former.

1501.—In Amerigo Vespucci's letter from C. Verde to Lorenzo de' Medici, giving an account of the Portuguese discoveries in India, he mentions on the coast, before Malacca, "Conimal."—In Baidelli-Boni, Intro. to Il Milione, p. liii.
1561.—"On this coast there is a place called Canhaveira, where there are so many deer and wild cattle that if a man wants to buy 500 deer-skins, within eight days the blacks of the place will give him delivery, catching them in snares, and giving two or three skins for a fanam."—Correa, ii. 772.
1690.—"It is resolved to apply to the Soobidar of Sevag's Country of Chengg for a Cowle to settle factories at Coonabor (I) and Coonemarre, and also at Porto Novo, if desired."—Fr. St. (to Coemoa, 7th Jan.), in Notes and Cza., No. iii. p. 44.
1699.—"We therefore conclude it more safe and expedient that the Chief of Conimere... do go and visit Rama Raja."—In Wheeler, Early Rec., p. 97.
1727.—"Congomery or Conjemeer is the next place, where the English had a Factory many years, but, on purchasing Fort St. Davit, it was broken up. At present its name is hardly seen in the Map of Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 357.
1758.—"De Pondicherry, à Madras, la côte court en général nord-nord-est quelques degrés est. Le premier endroit de remarque est Congi-medu, vulgairement dit Congimer, à quatre lieues marines plus que moins de Pondicherry."—D'Anville, p. 123.

CANNANORE, n.p. A port on the coast of northern Malabar, famous in the early Portuguese history, and which still is the chief British military station on that coast, with a European regiment. The name is Kanar or Kanaar, 'Krishna's Town.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Mal. kannu, 'eye,' wr. 'village,' &c., 'beautiful village.]

1506.—"In Cananor il suo Re si è sentito, e qui nasce ecc. (i.e. kanarri, 'ginger'); ma li è pochi e non c'è beni come quelli di Cochet."—Leonardo Ca' Masser, in Archivio Storico Ital., Append.
1510.—"Cananor is a fine and large city, in which the King of Portugal has a very strong castle. This Cananor is a port at which horses, which come from Persia disembark."—Varthema, 123.
1572.—"Chamarâo o Samarim mais gente nova..." Fará que todo o Nayre em fim se nova Que entre Calcut jaz, e Cananor."—Câmões, x. 14.

By Burton:
"The Samorin shall summon fresh allies;
Lo! at his bidding every Nayr-man hies,
That dwells 'twixt Calcut and Cananor."—[1611.—"The old Nahuda Mahomet of Cananor goeth aboard in this boat."—Dawson, Letters, i. 95.]

CONANGO, a. P. kudun-gö, i.e. 'Law-utterer' (the first part being Arab. from Gr. κωδος). In upper India, and formerly in Bengal, the registrar of a taqṣil, or other revenue subdivision, who receives the reports of the phátwirâ, or village registrars.

1758.—"Add to this that the King's Connagoes were maintained at our expense, as well as the Gomastahs and other servants belonging to the Zemindars, whose accounts we sent for."—Letter to Court, Dec. 31, in Long, 157.
1765.—"I have to struggle with every difficulty that can be thrown in my way by ministers, mutedesdes, congoes (I), &c., and their dependents."—Letter from F. Sykes, in Carracciolo's Life of Olive, i. 542.

CANTEROY, a. A gold coin formerly used in the S.E. part of Madras territory. It was worth 3 rs. Properly Kanthiravi hun (or paqoda) from Kanthirava Boyd, 'the lion-voiced,' [Skt. kanta, 'throat,' rana, 'noise'], who ruled in Mysore from 1638 to 1689 (C. P. Brown, MS.; Rice, Mysore, i. 803). See Dirorn's Narrative, p. 279, where the revenues of the CANTON, n.p. The great seaport of Southern China, the chief city of the Province of Kwang-tung, whence we take the name, through the Portuguese, whose older writers call it Cantão. The proper name of the city is Kwang-chau-fu. The Chin. name Kwang-tung (= 'Broad East') is an ellipse for 'capital of the E. Division of the Province Liang-kwang (or 'Two Broad Realms').'

CAPASS, s. The cotton plant and cotton-wool. H. kapta, from Skt. karpasa, which seems as if it must be the origin of caprama, though the latter is applied to flax.

1792.—'The full collections amounted to five Crores and ninety-two lacks of Canterray pagodas of 3 Rupees each.'—Diar. Pr. Or. Rep. i. 237.

1790.—'Accounts are commonly kept in Canter-ray Palama, and in an imaginary money containing 10 of these, by the Musulmans called churama [see CHUCKRAM] and by the English Canterray Pagodas...'.—Buchanan's Mysore, i. 129.

CANTONMENT, s. (Pron. Cantonment, with accent on penult.). This English word has become almost appropriated as Anglo-Indian, being so constantly used in India, and so little used elsewhere. It is applied to military stations in India, built usually on a plan which is originally that of a standing camp or 'cantonment.'

1778.—'I know not the full meaning of the word cantonment, and a camp this singular place cannot well be termed; it more resembles a large town, very many miles in circumference. The officers' bungalows on the banks of the Tappar are large and convenient,' &c.—Forbes, Letter in Or. Mens. describing the 'Bengal Cantonnements near Surat.' iv. 299.

1825.—'The fact, however, is certain... the cantonments at Lucknow, may Calcutta itself, are abominably situated. I have heard the same of Madras; and now the lately-settled cantonment of Nusserabad appears to be as objectionable as any of them.'—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 7.

1848.—'Her ladyship, our old acquaintance, is as much at home at Madras as at Brussels—in the cantonment as under the tents.'—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. 8.

CAPEL, a. Malayal. kappal, 'a ship.' This word has been imported into Malay, kapal, and Javanese. [It appears to be still in use on the W. Coast; see Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. (2) 470.]

1488.—In the vocabulary of the language of Calicut given in the Roteiro de V. de Gama we have—

1510.—'Some others which are made like ours, that is in the bottom, they call capel.'—Varthema, 154.
CAPELAN, n.p. This is a name which was given by several 16th-century travellers to the mountains in Burma from which the rubies purchased at Pegu were said to come; the idea of their distance, &c., being very vague. It is not in our power to say what name was intended. [It was perhaps Kyat-pyen.] The real position of the 'ruby-mines' is 60 or 70 m. N.E. of Mandalay. [See Ball's Tavernier, ii. 99, 465 seqq.]

1506.—"... e qui è uno porto appresso uno loco che si chiama Acaiplen, dove li se trova molti rubini, e spinade, e zole d'ogni sorte."—Leonardo di Ca' Masser, p. 28.

1510.—"The sole merchandise of these people is jewels, that is, rubies, which come from another city called Capellan, which is distant from this (Pegu) 30 days' journey."—Varthema, 218.

1516.—"Further inland than the said Kingdom of Ava, at five days journey to the south-east, is another city of Gentiles... called Capelan, and all round are likewise found many and excellent rubies, which they bring to sell at the city and fair of Ava, and which are better than those of Ava."—Barboa, 187.

c. 1535.—"This region of Arquam borders on the interior with the great mountain called Capelan,am, where are many places inhabited by a not very civilised people. These carry musk and rubies to the great city of Ava, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Arquam..."—Sommario de Regni, in Ramusio, i. 334v.

1660.—"... A mountain 12 days journey or thereabouts, from Siren towards the North-east; the name whereof is Capelan. In this mine are found great quantities of Rubies."—Tavernier (E. T.) ii. 143; [ed. Ball, ii. 99].

Phillip's Mineralogy (according to Col. Burney) mentions the locality of the ruby as "the Capelan mountains, sixty miles from Pague, a city in Ceylon!"—(J. As. Soc. Am. Reg., li. 76). This mine is certainly very loose in his geography, and Dana (ed. 1850) is not much better: "The best ruby sapphires occur in the Capelan mountains, near Syrian, a city of Pegu."—Mineralogy, p. 222.

CAPUCAT, n.p. The name of a place on the sea near Calicut, mentioned by several old authors, but which has now disappeared from the maps, and probably no longer exists. The proper name is uncertain. ([It is the little port of Kapatt or Kappaťangadi (Mal. kəvo, 'guard', pattu, 'place', in the Cooroombranaud Taluka of the Malabar District. (Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 73). The Madras Gloss. calls it Caupeaud. Also see Gray, Pyramid, i. 360.]"

1498.—"In the Roteiro it is called Capua.

1500.—"This being done the Captain-Major (Pedralvares Cabrál) made sail with the foresail and mizen, and went to the port of Capocate which was attached to the same city of Calicut, and was a haven where there was a great loading of vessels, and where many ships were moored that were all engaged in the trade of Calicut..."—Coraes, i. 207.

1510.—"... another place called Capogatto, which is also subject to the King of Calicut. This place has a very beautiful palace, built in the ancient style."—Varthema, 133-134.

1518.—"Further on... is another town, at which there is a small river, which is called Capucado, where there are many country-born Moors, and much shipping."—Barboa, 162.

CARACOA, CARACOLLE, KAR-KOLLEN, &c., s. Malay kora-kora or kira-kira, which is either a transferred use of the Malay kura-kura, or ku-kira, 'a tortoise,' alluding, one would suppose, either to the shape or pace of the boat, but perhaps the tortoise was named from the boat, or the two words are independent; or from the Ar. kurkūr, pl. kardīn, 'a large merchant vessel.' Scott (s.v. Coracora), says: "In the absence of proof to the contrary, we may assume kora-kora to be native Malayan."] Dozy (s.v. Carraca) says that the Ar. kura-kura was, among the Arabs, a merchant vessel, sometimes of very great size. Crawford describes the Malay kura-kura, as a large kind of sailing vessel'; but the quotation from Jarric shows it to have been the Malay galley. Marre (Kata-Kata Malayon, 87) says: "The Malay kora-kora is a great row-boat; still in use in the Moluccas. Many measure 100 feet long and 10 wide. Some have as many as 90 rowers."

1390.—"We embarked on the sea at Ladhikiya in a big kürkür belonging to Genoese people, the master of which was called Martalamin."—Itn Batuta, ii. 254.

1349.—"I took the sea on a small kürkür belonging to a Tunisian."—Ibid., iv. 327.
CARAFFE. 1606.—"The foremost of these galleys or Caracollas recovered our Shippe, wherein was the bag of Tarnata."—Middletone's Voyage, E. 2.

1627.—"They have Gallies after their manner, formed like Dragons, which they row very swiftly, they call them *karkollen."—Purcell, Pilgrimage, 606.

1569.—"They (natives of Caram, &c.) hawked these dry heads backwards and forwards in the Korrekores as a specialty."—Walter Schulten's Ost-Indische Reise, &c., p. 14.

1711.—"Les Philippines nomment ces batimens *caroomas. C'est une espée de petite galere à rames et à voiles."—Lettres Édifi. iv. 27.

1774.—"A coroço is a vessel generally fitted with outriggers, having a high arched stem and stern, like the points of a half moon. . . . The Dutch have fleets of them at Ambon, which they employ as guardacostos."—Forrest, Voyage to N. Guinea, 29. Forrest has a plate of a coroço, p. 64.

1699.—"The boat was one of the kind called *kara-kara, quite open, very low, and about four tons burden. It had out-riggers of bamboo, about five off each side, which supported a bamboo platform extending the whole length of the vessel. On the extreme outside of this sat the twenty rowers, while within was a convenient passage fore and aft. The middle of the boat was covered with a thatch-house, in which baggage and passengers are stowed; the gunwale was not more than a foot above water, and from the great side and top weight, and general clumsiness, these boats are dangerous in heavy weather, and are not infrequently lost."—Wallace, Malay Arch., ed. 1890, p. 266.

CARAFFE, s. Dozy shows that this word, which in English we use for a water-bottle, is of Arabic origin, and comes from the root *gharaf, 'to draw' (water), through the Sp. *garrafa. But the precise Arabic word is not in the dictionaries. (See under CARBOY.)

CARAMBOLA, s. The name given by various old writers on Western India to the beautiful acid fruit of the tree (N.O. Oxalideae) called by Linn. from this word, Averrhoa carambola. This name was that used by the Portuguese. De Orta tells us that it was the Malabar name. The word *karabal is also given by Molesworth as the Mahratti name; [another form is karambela, which comes from the Skt. *karambala, which gives the sense of 'food-appetizer']. In Upper India the fruit is called kamranga, kamrak, or khamrak (Skt. *karmara, karmara, karmaraka, karmaranaga)." (See also BILIMBE.) Why a cannon at billiards should be called by the French carambolage we do not know. [If Mr. Ball be right, the fruit has a name, Cape-Gooseberry, in China which in India is used for the Tiparry.—*Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 253.]

C. 1580.—"Another fruit is the *Kermerik. It is solid with five sides," &c.—Erskine's Baber, 326.

1663.—"O. Antonia, pluck me from that tree a Carambola, or two (for so they call them in Malavar, and we have adopted the Malavar name, because that was the first region where we got acquainted with them)."

1529. —"Here they are, they are beautiful; a sort of sour-sweet, not very acid.

1586. —"O. They are called in Canarim and Decam camboc and in Malay balimba. . . . they make with sugar a very pleasant conserve of these. . . . Antonia! bring hither a preserved carambola."—Garcia, ff. 46, 47.

1598.—"There is another fruit called Carambolas, which hath 8 (or 5 really) corners, as bigge as a smal aple, sower in eating, like vnripe plumes, and most used to make Conserve. (Note by Palaudanus). The fruites which the Malabars and Portugales call Carambolas, is in Decan called Camarix, in Canar, Camarix and Camabili; in Malao, Botumba, and by the Persians Chamarooh."—Linschoten, 96; [Hak. Soc. ii. 83].

1672.—"The Carambola . . . as large as a pear, all sculptured (as it were) and divided into ribs, the ridges of which are not round but sharp, resembling the heads of those iron maces that were anciently in use."

1878.—"The oxalic Kamrak."—*In my Indian Garden, 50.

1900.—"... that most curious of fruits, the carambola, called by the Chinese the yong-foo, or foreign peach, though why this name should have been selected is a mystery, for when cut through, it looks like a star with five rays. By Europeans it is also known as the Cape gooseberry."—*Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. p. 253.]

CARAT, s. Arab *kirdat, which is taken from the Gr. *keperion, a bean of the *kepereia or carob tree (Ceratonia silique, L.). This bean, like the Indian rati (see BUTTEE) was used as a weight, and thence also it gave name to a coin.

* Sir J. Hooker observes that the fact that there is an acid and a sweet-fruited variety (bilimbe) of this plant indicates a very old cultivation. of account, if not actual. To discuss the carat fully would be a task of extreme complexity, and would occupy several pages.

Under the name of siliqua it was the 24th part of the golden solidus of Constantine, which was again $\frac{1}{12}$ of an ounce. Hence this carat was $\frac{1}{144}$ of an ounce. In the passage from St. Isidore quoted below, the cerates is distinct from the siliqua, and = $\frac{1}{12}$ siliqua. This we cannot explain, but the siliqua Graeca was the keptron; and the siliqua as $\frac{1}{12}$ of a solidus is the parent of the carat in all its uses. [See Prof. Gardner, in Smith, Dict. Ant. 3rd ed. ii. 675.] Thus we find the carat at Constantinople in the 14th century = $\frac{1}{12}$ of the Hyperpera or Greek bezant, which was a debased representative of the solidus; and at Alexandria $\frac{1}{24}$ of the Arabic dinar, which was a purer representative of the solidus. And so, the Roman uncia signified $\frac{1}{12}$ of any unit (compare ounce, inch), so to a certain extent carat came to signify $\frac{1}{12}$. Dictionaries give Arab. lirdat as " $\frac{1}{12}$ of an ounce." Of this we do not know the evidence. The English Cyclopaedia (s.v.) again states that "the carat was originally the 24th part of the marc, or half-pound, among the French, from whom the word came." This sentence perhaps contains more than one error; but still both of these allegations exhibit the carat as $\frac{1}{12}$th part. Among our goldsmiths the term is still used to measure the proportionate quality of gold; pure gold being put at 24 carats, gold with $\frac{1}{24}$ alloy at 22 carats, with $\frac{1}{12}$ alloy at 18 carats, &c. And the word seems also (like Anna, q.v.) sometimes to have been used to express a proportionate scale in other matters, as is illustrated by a curious passage in Marco Polo, quoted below.

The carat is also used as a weight for diamonds. As $\frac{1}{14}$ of an ounce troy this ought to make it 34 grams. But these carats really run 151 1/2 to the ounce troy, so that the diamond carat is 34.5 grams nearly. This we presume was adopted direct from some foreign system in which the carat was $\frac{1}{12}$ of the local ounce. [See Ball, Tavernier, ii. 447.]

1296.—"The Great Khan sends his commissioners to the Province to select four or five hundred... of the most beautiful young women, according to the scale of beauty enjoined upon them. The commissioners assemble all the girls of the province, in presence of appraisers appointed for the purpose. They carefully survey the points of each girl... They then set down some as estimated at 18 carats, some at 17, 18, 20, or more or less, according to the sum of the beauties or defects of each. And whatever standard the Great Khan may have fixed for those that are to be brought to him, whether it be 20 carats or 21, the commissioners select the required number from those who have attained to that standard." —Marco Polo, 2nd ed. i. 350-351.

1673.—"A stone of one Carraok is worth 10l." —Fryer, 214.

CARAVAN, a. P. karodd; a convoy of travellers. The Ar. kaṣila is more generally used in India. The word is found in French as early as the 13th century (Lettre). A quotation below shows that the English transfer of the word to a wheeled conveyance for travellers (now for goods also) dates from the 17th century. The abbreviation van in this sense seems to have acquired rights as an English word, though the altogether analogous bus is still looked on as slang.

c. 1270.—"Meanwhile the convoy (la caravana) from Tortose... armed seven vessels in such wise that any one of them could take a galley if it ran alongside." —Chronicle of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, i. 379.

1830.—"De hac civitate resedens cum caravanas et cum quadam societate, ivi versus Indian Superiorem." —Frisar Odorici, in Cadhay, &c., ii. App. iii.

CARAVANSEBAY, a. P. kar-vadvar; a Serai (q.v.) for the reception of Caravans (q.v.).

1004.—"And the next day being Tuesday, they departed thence and going about 2 leagues arrived at a great house like an Inn, which they call Carabansarao (road-serai), and here were Chactalay looking after the Emperor's horses."—Chajno, § xlvii. Comp. Marhams, p. 114.

1564.—"Fay a parler souvent de ce nom de Carbaschi : . . . on ne peut le nommer autrement en Francesco, sinon van Carbaschi: et pour le seauoir donner a entendre, il faut supposer qu'il n'y a point d'hoteellerie es pays ou domaine le Turc, ne de lieux pour se loger, sinon dedens celles maison publique appelées appellées Carbaschi. . . ."—Observations per P. Belos, i. 59.

1566.—"Hic diversi in diversorum publicum, Caravanarasa Turcae vocant . . . vacuum est aedificium . . . in quo medio patet area ponendis narcis et camelis."—Busbogiu, Epist. i. (p. 35).

1619.—". . . a great bazar, enclosed and roofed in, where they sell stuffs, clothes, &c., with the House of the Mint, and the great caravanserai, which bears the name of Lala Beig (because Lala Beig the Treasurer gives audiences, and does his business there) and another little caravanserai, called that of the Ghilac or people of Ghilan."—P. della Valle (from Isphahan), ii. 8; [comp. Hak. Soc. i. 95].

1627.—"At Band Atly we found a neat Caravanraw or Inn . . . built by men's charity, to give all civill passengers a resting-place gratis; to keepe them from the injury of thieves, beasts, weather, &c."—Herbert, p. 124.

CARAVEL, a. This often occurs in the old Portuguese narratives. The word is alleged to be not Oriental, but Celtic, and connected in its origin with the old British coracle, see the quotation from Isidore of Seville, the indication of which we owe to Bluteau, s.v. The Portuguese caravel is described by the latter as a 'round vessel' (i.e. not long and sharp like a galley), with lateen sails, ordinarily of 200 tons burthen. The character of swiftness attributed to the caravel (see both Damian and Bacon below) has suggested to us whether the word has not come rather from the Persian Gulf—Turki karawul, 'a scout, an outpost, a vanguard.' Doubtless there are difficulties. [The N.E.D. says that it is probably the dim. of Sp. caraba.] The word is found in the following passage, quoted from the Life of St. Nilus, who died c. 1000, a date hardly consistent with Turkish origin. But the Latin translation is by Cardinal Sirelt, c. 1650, and the word may have been changed or modified:

"Cognitavit enim in unaquaque Calabrie regione pericerae navigatis . . . Id autem non ferentes Russani dedit . . . simul irrudentes et simul tumultuantes navigabatur commouerunt et ess quas Caravelas appetantur occurrunt."—In the Collection of Martens and Durand, vi. col. 980.

1492.—"So being one day importuned by the said Christopher, the Catholic King was persuaded by him that nothing should keep him from making this experiment; and so effectual was this persuasion that they fitted out for him a ship and two caravels, with which at the beginning of August 1492, with 120 men, sail was made from Gades."—Summary of the B. of the Western Indies, by Pietro Martire in Rumanio, iii. f. 1.

1506.—"Item trae della Mina d'oro de Gines ogn anno ducenti 120 mila che veni ogni anno da caravelle con ducenti 10 mila."—Leonardo di Ca'Masser, p. 50.

1624.—"Sunt stiasm naues quaedam nunciae quas ad officium celeritatis opposite extructae sunt (quas carnellias vocant)."—Bacon, Hist. Venitorum.

1838.—"The deep-sea fishing boats called Mochods . . . are carvel built, and now generally iron fastened. . . ."—Short Account of Bombay Fisheries, by D. G. Macdonald, M.D.

CARBOY, a. A large glass bottle holding several gallons, and generally covered with wicker-work, well known in England, where it is chiefly used to convey acids and corrosive liquids in bulk. Though it is not an Anglo-Indian word, it comes (in the form kardba) from Persia, as Wedgwood has pointed out. Kaempfer, whom we quote from his description of the wine trade at Shiraz, gives an exact etching of a carboy. Littré mentions that the late M. Mohl referred caraffe to the same original; but see that word. Karaba is no doubt connected with Ar. kirba, 'a large leathern milk-bottle.'

1712.—"Vasa vitrea, alia sunt majora, ampullaceae et circumduto scorpi tunicae, quae vocant Karaba . . . Venit Karaba una spud vitriarii duobus mammidi, raro car- rius."—Kazvinfer, Aemo. Exot. 379.

1754.—"I delivered a present to the Governor, consisting of oranges and lemons, with several sorts of dried fruits, and six carboys of Isfahan wine."—Hannay, i. 102.

1800.—"Six carobals of rose-water."—Symes, Emb. to Aes, p. 488.

1813.—"Carboy of Rosewater . . ."—Millburn, ii. 390.

1875.—"People who make it (Shiraz Wine) generally bottle it themselves, or else sell it in huge bottles called Kurbab holding about a dozen quarts."—Macgregor, Journey through Khorasan, &c., 1879, i. 97.

CARCANA, CARCONNA. s. H. from P. kärkba, 'a place where business is done'; a workshop; a departmental establishment such as that of the commissariat, or the artillery park, in the field.

1663.—"There are also found many raised Walks and Tents in sundry Places, that are the offices of several Officers. Besides these there are many great Halls that are called Kar-Kanya, or places where Handy-craftsmen do work."—Beranger, E. T. 83; [ed. Constable, 250].

e. 1756.—"In reply, Hydur pleaded his poverty . . . but he promised that as soon as he should have established his power, and had time to regulate his departments (Kährkanajat), the amount should be paid."—Hussain Ali Khan, History of Hydur Naik, p. 87.

1800.—"The elephant belongs to the Kar- kana, but you may as well keep him till we meet."—Wellington, i. 144.

1804.—"If the (bulllock) establishment should be formed, it should be in regular Karkana."—Ibid. iii. 512.

CAROON, s. Mahr. kär-kähn, 'a clerk,' H.—P. kär-kun, (faciendorum factor) or 'manager.'

[c. 1590.—"In the same way as the kar kun sets down the transactions of the assessments, the mugfaddam and the patrenon shall keep their respective accounts."—Asa, tr. Jarrett, ii. 46.

[1615.—"Made means to the Coroone or Scivano to help us to the copias of the King's licence."—Foster, Letters, iii. 122.

1616.—"Addick Raia Pongolo, Coroone of this place."—Ibid. iv. 167.]

1826.—"My benefactor's chief caroon or clerk allowed me to sort out and direct despatches to officers at a distance who belonged to the command of the great Sayant Rao."—Pandurang Haいた; [ed. 1878, i. 28.]

CARENS, n.p. Burm. Ka-rung, [a word of which the meaning is very uncertain. It is said to mean 'dirty-feeders,' or 'low-caste people,' and it has been connected with the Kirata tribe (see the question discussed by McMahon, The Karens of the Golden Chersonese, 43 seqq.)]. A name applied to a group of non-Burmese tribes, settled in the forest and hill tracts of Pegu and the adjoining parts of Burma, from Mergui in the south, to beyond Toungoo in the north, and from Arakan to the Salwen, and beyond that river far into Siamese territory. They do not know the name Kareng, nor have they one name for their own race; distinguishing, among these whom we call Karens, three tribes, Sgaw, Pwo, and Byhot, which differ somewhat in customs and traditions, and especially in language. The results of the labours among them of the American Baptist Mission have the appearance of being almost miraculous, and it is not going too far to state that the cessation of blood feuds, and the peaceable way in which the various tribes are living . . . and have lived together since they came under British rule, is far more due to the influence exercised over them by the missionaries than to the measures adopted by the English Government, beneficial as these doubtless have been" (Br. Burma Gazetteer, [ii. 226]). The author of this excellent work should not, however, have admitted the quotation of Dr. Mason's fanciful notion about the identity of Marco Polo's Carajan with Karen, which is totally groundless.

1759.—"There is another people in this country called Carianners, whiter than either (Burmans or Peguans), distinguished into Buraghmah and Pegu Carianners; they live in the woods, in small Societies, of ten or twelve houses; are not wanting in industry, though it goes no further than to procure them an annual subsistence."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 100.

1799.—"From this reverend father (V. Sangermano) I received much useful information. He told me of a singular description of people called Carayners or Carianers, that inhabit different parts of the country, particularly the western provinces of Dala and Bassein, several societies of whom also dwell in the district adjacent to Rangoon. He represented them as a simple, innocent race, speaking a language distinct from that of the Burmans, and entertaining rude notions of religion. They are timorous, honest, mild in their manners, and exceedingly hospitable to strangers." — Symes, p. 207.

C. 1819. — "We must not omit here the Carian, a good and peaceable people, who live dispersed through the forests of Pegu, in small villages consisting of 4 or 5 houses . . . they are totally dependent upon the despotic government of the Burmese." — Sangeman, p. 34.

CARICAL, n.p. Etymology doubtful; Tam. Karatikkal, [which is either kāra, 'masonry' or 'the plant, thorny webera': kā, 'channel'] (Madras Adm. Man. ii. 212, Gloss. s.v.). A French settlement within the limits of Tanjore district.

CARNATIO, n.p. Karnataka and Karnataka, Skt. adjective forms from Karnata or Kārṇata, [Tam. kar, 'black,' ndva, 'country']. This word in native use, according to Bp. Caldwell, denoted the Telegu and Canarese people and their language, but in process of time became specially the appellation of the people speaking Canarese and their language (Drue. Gram. 2nd ed. Introd. p. 34). The Mahommedans on their arrival in S. India found a region which embraces Mysore and part of Telingana (in fact the kingdom of Vijayanagara), called the Karnatka country, and this was identical in application (and probably in etymology) with the Canara country (q.v.) of the older Portuguese writers. The Karnataka became extended, especially in connection with the rule of the Nabobs of Arcot, who partially occupied the Vijayanagara territory, and were known as Nawabs of the Kārṇatka, to the country below the Ghauts, on the eastern side of the Peninsula, just as the other form Canara had become extended to the country below the Western Ghauts; and eventually among the English the term Carnatic came to be understood in a sense more or less restricted to the eastern low country, though never quite so absolutely as Canara has become restricted to the western low country. The term Carnatic is now obsolete.

C. A. D. 550. — In the Brihat-Sanhita of Varahamihira, in the enumeration of peoples and regions of the south, we have in Kern's translation (J. R. As. Soc. N. S. v. 83) Kārṇatika; the original form, which is not given by Kern, is Karnata.

C. A. D. 1100. — In the later Sanskrit literature this name often occurs, e.g. in the Kathasarit Sagara, or 'Ocean of Rivers of Stories,' a collection of tales (in verse) of the beginning of the 12th century, by Somadeva, of Kashmir; but it is not possible to attach any very precise meaning to the word as there used. [See refs. in Tavency, tr. ii. 651.]

C. A. D. 1400. — The word also occurs in the inscriptions of the Vijayanagara dynasty, e.g. in one of C. A. D. 1400. — (Blem. of S. Indian Palaeography, 2nd ed. pl. xxx.)

1608. — "In the land of Kārṇata and Vidyānagara was the King Mahendra." — Taranatha's H. of Buddhism, by Schiefner, p. 267.

C. 1610. — "The Zamindars of Singaldip (Ceylon) and Kārnātaka came up with their forces and expelled Sho Rai, the ruler of the Dakhin."—Firiksha, in Elliot, vi. 549.

So also the coast of Canara seems meant in the following:

C. 1760. — "Though the navigation from the Carnatic coast to Bombay is of a very short run, of not above six or seven degrees. . . ." — Grove, i. 222.

1762. — "The Carnatic or province of Arcot . . . its limits now are greatly inferior to those which bounded the ancient Carnatic; for the Nabobs of Arcot have never extended their authority beyond the river Gondegama to the north; the great chain of mountains to the west; and the branches of the Kingdom of Trichinopoly, Tanjore, and Mainsore to the south; the sea bound it on the east." — Ibid. ii. viii.

(1). CARRACK, n.p. An island in the upper part of the Persian Gulf, which has been more than once in British occupation. Properly Kharak. It is so written in Jauberth's Edrisi (i. 364, 372). But Dr. Badger gives the modern Arabic as al-Khārij, which would represent old P. Khārij.

c. 880.—"Kharek . . . . cette ile qui a un farasch en long et en large, produit du bis, des palmiers, et des vignes."—Ibn Khurdadbeh, in J. As. ser. vi. tom. v. 268.

c. 1563.—"Partendosi da Basora si passa 200 miglia di Golfo co'l mare a banda destra sino che si giunge nell'isola di Caricki . . . . .

—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 386v.

1277.—"The Islands of Carickly, about West North West, 12 Leagues from Bouchier,"—A. Hamilton, i. 60.

1574.—"The Baron . . . . . immediately sailed for the little island of Kares, where he safely landed; having attentively surveyed the spot he at that time laid the plan, which he afterwards executed with so much success."—Ives, 212.

(2). CARRACK, s. A kind of vessel of burden from the Middle Ages down to the end of the 17th century. The character of the earlier carrack cannot be precisely defined. But the larger cargo-ships of the Portuguese in the trade of the 16th century were generally so styled, and these were sometimes of enormous tonnage, with 3 or 4 decks. Charnock (Marine Architecture, ii. p. 9) has a plate of a Genoese carrack of 1542. He also quotes the description of a Portuguese carrack taken by Sir John Barrough in 1592. It was of 1,600 tons burden, whereof 900 merchandize; carried 32 brace pieces and between 600 and 700 passengers (?); was built with 7 decks. The word (L. Lat.) carraca is regarded by Skeat as properly carrica, from carricare, It. caricare, 'to load, to charge.' This is possible; but it would be well to examine if it be not from the Ar. ħarākah, a word which the dictionaries explain as 'fire-ship'; though this is certainly not always the meaning. Dozy is inclined to derive carraca (which is old in Sp. he says) from ħārūk, the pl. of ħārūr or ħārūra (see CARACOA). And ħārūra itself he thinks may have come from carricare, which already occurs in St. Jerome. So that Mr. Skeat's origin is possibly correct. [The N.ED. refers to carraca, of which the origin is said to be uncertain.] Ibn Batuta uses the word twice at least for a state large or something of that kind (see Cathay p. 498, and Ibn Bat. ii. 118; iv. 269) The like use occurs several times in Makrizi (e.g. i. i. 143; i. ii. 66; and ii. i. 24), Quatrempar at the place first quoted observes that the ħārūkah was not a fire ship in our sense, but a vessel with a high deck from which fire could be thrown; but that it also could be used as a transport vessel, and so was used on sea and land.

1388.—". . . . after that we embarked at Venice on board a certain carrack, and sailed down the Adriatic Sea."—Friar Pasqual, in Cathay, &c., 231.

1383.—"Eodem tempore venit in magnâ tempestate ad Sandevici portum navis quam dicens carika (mirae) magnitudinis, plena divitiis, quae facile inopiam totius terrae relevare potuisse, si incolumar invidia permiscisset."—Walmingham, Hist. Anglic., by H. T. Riley, 1884, ii. 88-84.

1403.—"The prayer being concluded, and the storm still going on, a light like a candle appeared in the cage at the mast-head of the carraca, and another light on the spar that they call bowesprit (bauprés) which is fixed in the forecastle; and another light like a candle in una vara de espinelo (?) over the poop, and these lights were seen by as many as were in the carrack, and were called up to see them, and they lasted awhile and then disappeared, and all this while the storm did not cease, and by-and-by all went to sleep except the steersman and certain sailors of the watch."—Clavijo, § xiii. Comp. Markham, p. 13.

1548.—"De Theasaur nostro munitionis artillariorum, Tentorum, Paviliorum, pro Equis navibus carracatis, Galeis et alia navi- bus quibuscumque . . . . ."—Act of Edw. VI. in Rymer, xv. 175.

1652.—"Ils avaient 4 barques, grandes como des ħarrākah . . . . ."—Sidi 'Alī, p. 67.
1588-89—"...about the middle of the month of Ramzan, in the year 974, the inhabitants of Funan and Pandroseah [i.e. Ponany and Pandardhu, q.v.], having sailed out of the former of these ports in a fleet of 1200 vessels, captured a carrack belonging to the Franks, which had arrived from Bengal, and which was laden with rice and sugar... in the year 976 another party... in a fleet of 17 vessels... made capture off Shalesant (see OAHIL) of a large carrack, which had sailed from Cochin, having on board nearly 1000 Franks..."—Toft, vol. M. Machiade, p. 159.

1596—"It comes as farre short as... a cocke-boat of a Carrick."—T. Nash, Have with you to Saffron Walden, repr. by J. P. Collier, p. 72.

1613—"They are made like caracks, only strength and storage."—Beaug. & Flit., The Cuckcomb, i. 5.

1615—"After we had given her chase for about six hours and a half, we discovered her to be a very great Portuguese carrack bound for Goa."—Terry, in Purchas; [ed. 1777, p. 34].

1620—The harbor at Nangaskhe is the best in all Japon, where there may be 1000 scale of ships ride landlockt, and the greatest ships or carloches in the world... ride before the town the with a cable's length of the shore in 7 or 8 fathom water at least."—Cocks, Letter to Batavia, ii. 313.

CARRAWAY, s. This word for the seed of Carum carvi, L., is (probably through Sp. alcaravea) from the Arabic karawiya. It is curious that the English form is thus closer to the Arabic than either the Spanish, or the French and Italian carvi, which last has passed into Scotch as carry. But the Arabic itself is a corruption [not immediately, N. E. D.] of Lat. carum, or Gr. καρπος (Dozy).

CARTMEEL, s. This is, at least in the Punjab, the ordinary form that mail-cart takes among the natives. Such inversions are not uncommon. Thus Sir David Ochterlony was always called by the Sepoys Loni-okhtar. In our memory an officer named Holroyd was always called by the Sepoys Royddi, [and Brownlow, Lobrao. By another curious corruption Mackintosh becomes Makkhan-toosh, 'buttered toast'].

CARTOOGUE, s. A cartridge; käráus, Sepoy H.; [comp. TOSTDAUN].

CARYOTA, s. This is the botanical name (Caryota urens, L.) of a magnificent palm growing in the moister forest regions, as in the Western Ghauts and in Eastern Bengal, in Ceylon, and in Burma. A conspicuous character is presented by its enormous bipinnate leaves, somewhat resembling colossal bracken-fronds, 15 to 25 feet long, 10 to 12 in width; also by the huge pendent clusters of its inflorescence and seeds, the latter like masses of rosaries 10 feet long and upwards. It affords much Toddy (q.v.) made into spirit and sugar, and is the tree chiefly affording these products in Ceylon, where it is called Ktul. It also affords a kind of sago, and a woolly substance found at the foot of the leaf-stalks is sometimes used for caulking, and forms a good tinder. The sp. name urens is derived from the accid, burning taste of the fruit. It is called, according to Brandis, the Mhdar-palm in Western India. We know of no Hindustani or familiar Anglo-Indian name. [Watt, (Econ. Dict. ii. 206) says that it is known in Bombay as the Hill or Sago palm. It has penetrated in Upper India as far as Chunar.] The name Caryota seems taken from Pliny, but his application is to a kind of date-palm; his statement that it afforded the best wine of the East probably suggested the transfer.

1861.—"The next tree is the Kattale. It grew straight, but not so tall or big as a Oker-Net-Tree; the inside nothing but a white pith, as the former. It yieldeth a sort of Liquor... very sweet and pleasing to the palate. . . The which Liquor they boil and make a kind of brown sugar called Jagory [see JAGGERY], &c."—Kesar, p. 15.

1877.—"The Caryota trees, called the Saguru tree, grew between Saligada and Kopping, and was said to be the real tree from which the sago is made."—Thurberg, E. T. iv. 149. A mistake, however.

1861.—See quotation under PEELUL.

CASH, s. A name applied by Europeans to sundry coins of low value in various parts of the Indies. The word in its original form is of extreme antiquity, "Skt. karsha... a weight of silver or gold equal to 16 of a Tula" (Williams, Skt. Dict.; and see also a Note on the Kāraśa, or rather karēṣṭaṇa, as a copper coin of great antiquity, in E. Thomas's Pathin Kings of Delhi, 361-362). From the Tam. form kāra, or perhaps from some Konkani form which we have not traced, the Portuguese seem to have made cāsu, whence the English cash. In Singalese also kāre is used for 'coin' in general. The English term was appropriated in the monetary system which prevailed in S. India up to 1818; thus there was a copper coin for use in Madras struck in England in 1803, which bears on the reverse, "XX Cash." A figure of this coin is given in Ruding. Under this system 80 cash = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 star pagoda. But from an early date the Portuguese had applied cāsu to the small money of foreign systems, such as those of the Malay Islands, and especially to that of the Chinese. In China the word cash is used, by Europeans and their hangers-on, as the synonym of the Chinese le and tsien, which are those coins made of an alloy of copper and lead with a square hole in the middle, which in former days ran 1000 to the liang or tsai (v.v.), and which are strung in certain numbers on cords. [This type of money, as was recently pointed out by Lord Avebury, is a survival of the primitive currency, which was in the shape of an axe.] Rouleaux of coin thus strung are represented on the surviving bank-notes of the Ming dynasty (A.D. 1368 onwards), and probably were also on the notes of their Mongol predecessors.

The existence of the distinct English word cash may probably have affected the form of the corruption before us. This word had a European origin from L. cassus, French caisse, 'the-money-chest'; this word in book-keeping having given name to the heading of account under which actual disbursements of coin were entered (see Wedgwood and N. E. D. a.v.). In Minasheu (2nd ed. 1627) the present sense of the word is not attained. He only gives "a tradesman's cash, or Counter to keep money in."

1510.—"They have also another coin called cas, 16 of which go to a tare of silver."—Varthema, 180.

1598.—"In this country (Calicut) a great number of apes are produced, one of which is worth 4 cash, and one cash is worth a guattino."—Ibid. 172. (Why a monkey should be worth 4 cash is obscure.)

1609.—"You must understand that in Sunda there is also no other kind of money than certain coin copper mynt called Caiua, of the bignes of a Hollidés doite, but not half so thick, in the middle whereof is a hole to hang it on a string, for that commonlie they put two hundreth or a thousand vpon one string."—Linschoten, 34; [Hak. Soc. i. 113].

1600.—"Those (coins) of Lead are called caxas, whereof 1600 make one maa."—John Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

1621.—"In many places they throw abroad Cashes (or brasse money) in great quantety."—Cocks, Diary, ii. 202.

1711.—"Doodoe and Cash are Copper Coins, eight of the former make one Fanham, and ten of the latter one Doodoe."—Locke, 3. [Doodoe is the Tal. duddu, Skt. du, 'two'; a more modern scale is: 2 doogpanies = 1 doody: 3 doodies = 1 anna.—Mad. Gloss. a.v.]

1718.—"Cass (a very small coin, sightly whereof make one Fanoo)._—Propagation of the Gospel in the East, ii. 52.

1727.—"At Aboe they have a small coin of leaden Money called Cash, from 1878.—"This tree gives a fruit called commonly Caju; which being a good stomachic, and of good flavour, is much esteemed by all who know it. . . . This fruit does not grow everywhere, but is found in gardens at the city of Santa Cruz in the Kingdom of Cochín."—C. Acosta, Traductio, 324 seqq.

1875.—"Cajoo kernels.—Table of Customs Duties imposed in Br. India up to 1875.

CASHEMERE, n.p. The famous valley province of the Western Himalaya, H. and P. Kashmir, from Skt. Kasmi, and sometimes Kasira, alleged by Burnouf to be a contraction of Kājayamira. [The name is more probably connected with the Khāsa tribe.] Whether or not it be the Kaspatyrus or Kasapypurus of Herodotus, we believe it undoubtedly to be the Kasperia (kingdom) of Ptolemy.
Several of the old Arabian geographers write the name with the guttural ک, but this is not so used in modern times.

c. 630.—“The Kingdom of Kas-aff-kh-i-l (Kasimra) has about 7000 is of circuit. On all sides its frontiers are surrounded by mountains; these are of prodigious height; and although there are paths affording access to it, these are extremely narrow.”—H. T. Tung (Pak. Boudh.) ii. 167.

c. 940.—“Kashmir . . . is a mountainous country, forming a large kingdom, containing not less than 60,000 or 70,000 towns or villages. It is inaccessible except on one side, and can only be entered by one gate.”—Materials i. 375.

1275.—“Kashmir, a province of India, adjoining the Turks; and its people of mixt Turk and Indian blood excel all others in beauty.”—Zakartiya Kasimra, in Gildemeister, 210.

1298.—“Kashmir also is a province inhabited by a people who are idolaters and have a language of their own . . . this country is the very source from which idolatry has spread abroad.”—Marco Polo, i. 175.

1552.—“The Moguls hold especially towards the N.E. the region Sogdiana, which they now call Queximir, and also Mount Caulcaus which divides India from the other Provinces.”—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

1615.—“Chishmone, the chief City is called Sirimak.”—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1467; [so in Roe’s Map, vol. ii. Hak. Soc. ed.; Chismer in Foster, Letters, iii. 283].

1664.—“From all that hath been said, one may easily conjecture, that I am somewhat charmed with Kaschmir, and that I pretend there is nothing in the world like it for so small a kingdom.”—Bermier, E. T. 128; [ed. Constable, 400].

1676.—“A trial of your kindness I must make; Though not for mine, so much as virtue’s sake.

The Queen of Cassimere . . .”

Dryden’s Aurengzebe, iii. 1.

1814.—“The shawls of Cassimarer and the silks of Iran.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 177; [2nd ed. ii. 232]. (See KESEYME.)

OASIS, CAXIS, CACIZ, &c., a. This Spanish and Portuguese word, though Dozy gives it only as prêtre christian, is frequently employed by old travellers, and writers on Eastern subjects, to denote Mahomedan divines (mullahs and the like). It may be suspected to have arisen from a confusion of two Arabic terms ک (see CAEE) and ک (see CAXIS) or ك (see CACHIS), a ‘Christian Presbyter’ (from a Syriac root signifying sensuit). Indeed we sometimes find the precise word Kashish (Caxis) used by Christian writers as if it were the special title of a Mahomedan theologian, instead of being, as it really is, the special and technical title of a Christian priest (a fact which gives Mount Athos its common Turkish name of Kaşish Dağ). In the first of the following quotations the word appears to be applied by the Mussulman historian to pagan priests, and the word for churches to pagan temples. In the others, except that from Major Millingen, it is applied by Christian writers to Mahomedan divines, which is indeed its recognised signification in Spanish and Portuguese. In Jarric’s Thesaurus (Jesuit Missions, 1606) the word Caxisius is constantly used in this sense.

c. 1310.—“There are 700 churches (kastris) resembling fortresses, and every one of them overflowing with presbyters (kashishin) without faith, and monks without religion.”—Description of the Chinese City of Khansai (Hangchau) in Waeff’s History (see also Marco Polo, ii. 196).

1404.—“The town was inhabited by Moorish hermits called Caxires; and many people came to them on pilgrimage, and they healed many diseases.”—Marckham’s Clavijo, 78.

1514.—“And so, from one to another, the message passed through four or five hands, till it came to a Caxis, whom we should call a bishop or prelate, who stood at the King’s foot.”—Letter of Giov. de Empoli, in Archiv. Scor. Ital. Append. p. 56.

1538.—“Just as the Cryer was offering to deliver me unto whomsoever would buy me, in comes that very Caxis Moulanas, whom they held for a Saint, with 10 or 11 other Caxis his Inferiors, all Priests like himself of the same sect.”—F. M. Pinto (tr. by H. C.), p. 8.

1552.—Caxis in the same sense used by Barros, II. ii. 1.

1553.—See quotation from Barros under LAB.

[1554.—“Who was a Caxis of the Moors, which means in Portuguese an ecclesiastic.”—Castañeda, Bk. I. ch. 7.]

1561.—“The King sent off the Moor, and with him his Caxis, an old man of much authority, who was the principal priest of his Mosque.”—Correa, by Ed. Stanley, 113.

1567.—“. . . The Holy Synod declares it necessary to remove from the territories of His Highness all the infidels whose office it is to maintain their false religion, such as are the cadiim of the Moors, and the preachers of the Gentooos, Yogues, savers (letitceiros), jousis, grown (i.e. joshis or astrologers, and gurus), and whatsoever others make a business of religion among the infidels, and so also the bramans and patbus.
CASSANAR, CATTANAR. 170

Caste, s. The artificial divisions of society in India, first made known to us by the Portuguese, and described by them under their term caste, signifying 'breed, race, kind,' which has been retained in English under the supposition that it was the native name (Wedgwood, a.v.). [See the extraordinary derivation of Hamilton below.] Mr. Elphinstone prefers to write "Caste." We do not find that the early Portuguese writer Barbosa (1516) applies the word casta to the divisions of Hindu 1795. — "All the troopers in the King’s service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Burmanas." — Symes, p. 318.

CASSOWARY, s. The name of this great bird, of which the first species known (Casuarius galeatus) is found only in Ceram Island (Moluccas), is Malay kasawadi or kasuadi; [according to Scott, the proper reading is kaswedari, and he remarks that no Malay Dict. records the word before 1863]. Other species have been observed in N. Guinea, N. Britain, and N. Australia.

1682. — "And for pledge of the treaty, he gave him his name, and one of his chief chaplains, the which they call Cacida." — Castadeda, by N. L.

1688. — "Here is to be seen an admirably wrought tomb in which a certain Cacida lies buried, who was the Pedagogue or Tutor of a King of Gusarchitecture." — Van Twist, 15.

CASSAY, n.p. A name often given in former days to the people of Munsore (Manipur), on the eastern frontier of Bengal. It is the Burmane name of this people, Kaæ, or as the Burmane pronounce it, Kathë. It must not be confounded with Cathay (i.e.) with which it has nothing to do. [See Shan.]

1759. — In D’Hryme’s Orient. Repert. we find Cassay (i. 116).

1811. — "St. James his Ginny Hens, the Cassawawray moreover." — (Note by Coryat.)

1612. — "A few years ago there arose a dispute between a Brahman and a certain Cassanar on a matter of jurisdiction." — P. Vincentio Maria, 152.

1659. — "This aforesaid bird Cosebàres also will swallow iron and lead, as we once learned by experience. For when our Comestable once had been casting bullets on the Admiral’s Bastion, and then went to dinner, there came one of these Cosebàres on the bastion, and swallowed 50 of the bullets. And . . . next day I found that the bird after keeping them a while in his maw had regularly cast up again all the 50." — J. J. Saar, 26.

c. 1760.—"The distinction of the Gentoes into their tribes or castes, forms another considerable object of their religion."—Grose, i. 201.

1785.—"The castes or tribes into which the Indians are divided, are reckoned by travellers to be eighty-four."—Orme (ed. 1803), i. 4.

[1830.—"The Kayasthas (pronounced Kisthas, hence the word caste) follow next."—W. Hamilton, Descr. of Hindostan, i. 109.]

1787.—"There are thousands and thousands of these so-called castes; no man knows their number, no man can know it; for the conception is a very flexible one, and moreover new castes continually spring up and pass away."—F. Jager, Ost-Indische Handwörterbuch und Gewöhn, 13.

Castes are, according to Indian social views, either high or low.

1875.—"Low-caste Hindoos in their own land are, to all ordinary apprehension, slovenly, dirty, ungraceful, generally un-acceptable in person and surroundings. . . . Yet offensive as is the low-caste Indian, were I estate-owner, or colonial governor, I had rather see the lowest Pariahs of the low, than a single trim, smooth-faced, smooth-wayed, clever high-caste Hindoo, on my lands or in my colony."—W. G. Palegrave, in Fortnightly Rev., cxz. 226.

In the Madras Prea. castes are also 'Right-hand' and 'Left-hand.' This distinction represents the agricultural classes on the one hand, and the artisans, &c., on the other, as was pointed out by F. W. Ellis. In the old days of Ft. St. George, faction-fights between the two were very common, and the terms right-hand and left-hand castes occur early in the old records of that settlement, and frequently in Mr. Talboys Wheeler's extracts from them. They are mentioned by Couto. [See Nelson, Madura, Pt. ii. p. 4; Oppert, Orig. Inhabit. p. 67.]

Sir Walter Elliot considers this feud to be "nothing else than the occasional outbreak of the smouldering antagonism between Brahmanism and Buddhism, although in the lapsed ages both parties have lost sight of the fact. The points on which they split now are mere trifles, such as parading on horse-back or in a palanquin in procession, erecting a pandal or marriage-shed on a given number of pillars, and claiming to carry certain flags, &c. The right-hand party is headed by the Brahmans, and includes the Parias, who assume the van, beating their tom-toms when they come to blows. The chief of the left-hand are the Panchalars [i.e. the Five Classes, workers in metal and stone, &c.], followed by the Pallars and workers in leather, who sound their long trumpets and engage the Parias." (In Journ. Ethnol. Soc. N.S. 1869, p. 112.)

1612.—"From these four castes are derived 196; and those again are divided into two parties, which they call Valanga and Elange [Tam. valanga, idangar], which is as much as to say 'the right hand' and 'the left hand'."—Couto, u. s.

The word is current in French:

1842.—"Je suis &i sait que les castes n'ont jamais pu exister solidement sans une véritable conservation religieuse."—Comte, Cours de Phil. Positiv., vi. 606.

1877.—"Nous avons aboli les castes et les privileges, nous avons inscrit partout le principe de l'egalite devant la loi, nous avons donne le suffrage a tous, mais voila qu'on reclame maintenant l'egalite des conditions."—E. de Laveleye, De la Propriete, p. iv.

Caste is also applied to breeds of animals, as 'a high-caste Arab.' In such cases the usage may possibly have come directly from the Por. alta casta, casta boixa, in the sense of breed or strain.

CASTEES, s. Obsolete. The Indo-Portuguese formed from casta the word castico, which they used to denote children born in India of Portuguese parents; much as creole was used in the W. Indies.

1589.—"Liberi vero nati in Indiâ, utroque parente Lusitani, casticos vocantur, in omnibus fore Lusitanis similes, colore tamen mediam different, ut qui ad glivum non nihil defectant. Ex castisae deinde nati magis magisque gilvi sunt, a parentibus et mestiziae magis defectantes; porro et mestiziae nati por omnia indiginos respondent, ut in tertia generatione Lusitani reliquis India sunt simillimi."—De Bry, ii. 78; (Linneoten [Hak. Soc. i. 184]).

CASUARINA, s. A tree (Casuarina muricata, Roxb.—N. O. Casuarinae) indigenous on the coast of Chittagong and the Burmese provinces, and southward as far as Queensland. It was introduced into Bengal by Dr. F. Buchanan, and has been largely adopted as an ornamental tree both in Bengal and in Southern India. The tree has a considerable superficial resemblance to a larch or other finely-feathered conifer, making a very acceptable variety in the hot plains, where real pines will not grow. [The name, according to Mr. Scott, appears to be based on a Malayan name associating the tree with the Cassowary, as Mr. Skeat suggests from the resemblance of its needles to the quills of the bird.]

1861.—See quotation under PEEFUL.

1867.—"Our road lay chiefly by the seacoast, along the white sands, which were fringed for miles by one grand continuous line or border of casuarina trees."—Lt.-Col. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, 362.

1879.—"It was lovely in the white moon-light, with the curving shadows of palms on the dewy grass, the grace of the drooping casuarinas, the shining water, and the long drift of surf. . . ."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 275.
CATAMARÁN. 173 CATECHU.

CATAMARÁN, s. Also CUTF-MURAM, CUTMURAL. Tam. katru, 'binding,' maram, 'wood.' A raft formed of three or four logs of wood lashed together. The Anglo-Indian accentuation of the last syllable is not correct.

1583.—"Seven round timbers lashed together for each of the said boats, and of the said seven timbers five form the bottom; one in the middle longer than the rest makes a cutwater, and another makes a poop which is under water, and on which a man sits . . .
These boats are called Cetamarón."—Balbi, Viaggio, f. 82.

1810.—Williamson (V. M. i. 65) applies the term to the rafts of the Brazilian fishermen.

1838.—"None can compare to the Cattamarans and the wonderful people that mange them . . . each catamaran has one, two, or three men . . . they sit crouched upon their heels, throwing their paddles about very dexterously, but very unlike rowing."—Letters from Madras, 34.

1860.—"The Cetamarón is common to Ceylon and Coromandel."—Tennent, Ceylon,
i. 442.

[During the war with Napoleon, the word came to be applied to a sort of fire-ship. "Great hopes have been formed at the Admiralty (in 1804) of certain vessels which were filled with combustibles and called catamarans.
"—(La Stanhope, Life of Pitt, iv. 218.)
This may have introduced the word in English and led to its use as 'old cat' for a shrewish hag.]

CATECHU, also CUTF and CAU'T, s. An astringent extract from the wood of several species of Acacia (Acacia catechu, Wild..), the khair, and Acacia numia, Kurz, Ac. sundra, D. C. and probably more.
The extract is called in H. kath, [Skt. kvaith,
'to decoct'], but the two first com-merial names which we have given are doubtless taken from the southern forms of the word, e.g. Can. kachu, Tam. katu, Malay kachu. De Orta, whose judgments are always worthy of respect, considered it to be the lycium of the ancients, and always applied that name to it; but Dr.
Royle has shown that lycium was an extract from certain species of berberis, known in the bazars as rasot. Cutch is first mentioned by Barbosa, among the drugs imported into Malacca. But it remained unknown in Europe till brought from Japan about the middle of the 17th century. In the 4th ed.
of Schröder's Pharmacop. Medico-chy-mica, Lyons, 1654, it is briefly described as Catechu or Terra Japonica, genus terrae exoticae" (Hanbury and Flückiger, 214). This misnomer has long survived.

1871. — "For about three centuries the Northern Provinces of China had been detached from native rule, and subject to foreign dynasties; first to the Khitan... whose rule subsisted for 300 years, and originated the name of Khitan, Khata, or Cathay, by which for nearly 1000 years China has been known to the nations of Inner Asia, and to those whose acquaintance with it was got by that channel." — Marco Polo, Intro. ch. ii.

CAT'S-EYE, s. A stone of value found in Ceylon. It is described by Dana as a form of chalcedony of a greenish grey, with glowing internal reflections, whence the Portuguese call it Olho de gato, which our word translates. It appears from the quotation below from Dr. Royle that the Beli oculus of Pliny has been identified with the cat's-eye, which may well be the case, though the odd circumstance noticed by Royle may be only a curious coincidence. [The phrase billis ki ankh does not appear in Platt's Dict. The usual name is labhanty, 'like garlic.' The Burmese are said to call it kyong, 'a cat.]

c. d. 70. — "The stone called Belus eye is white, and hath within it a black apple, the midst whereof a man shall see to glitter like gold..." — Holland's Plinie, ii. 625. c. 1540. — "Quasad regiones monetam non habent, sed pro ea utuntur lapidibus quse diurnus Cat's Oculos." — Conti, in Pogg., De Var. Fortunae, lib. iv.

1516. — "And there are found likewise other stones, such as Olho de gato, Chrysolette, and amethysts, of which I do not treat because they are of little value." — Barbois, in Lieben Acad., ii. 390.

1599. — "Lapis insuper alius ibi vulgaris est, quem Lusitani olhos de gato, id est, oculum felinus vocant, propter quod cum eo et colore et facie conveniat. Nihil autem alium quam achates est." — De Bry, iv. 84 (after Linschoten); [Hak. Soc. i. 61, ii. 141].

1672. — "The Cat's-eyes, by the Portuguese called Olhos de Gatos, occur in Zeylon, Cambaya, and Pegu; they are more esteemed by the Indians than by the Portuguese; for some Indians believe that if a man wears this stone his power and riches will never diminish, but always increase." — Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 160.

1837. — "Beli oculus, mentioned by Pliny, xxxvi. c. 55, is considered by Hardouin to CATTY, s. A light rowing vessel used on the coast of Malabar in the early days of the Portuguese. We have not been able to trace the name to any Indian source, [unless possibly Skt. chatur, 'swift']. Is it not probably the origin of our 'cutter'? We see that Sir R. Burton in his Commentary on Camoens (vol. iv. 391) says: "Catur is the Arab. katirah, a small craft, our 'cutter.'" [This view is rejected by the N.E.D., which regards it as an English word from 'to cut.'] We cannot say when cutter was introduced in marine use. We cannot find it in Dampier, nor in Robinson Crusoe; the first instance we have found is that quoted below from Anson's Voyage. [The N.E.D. has nothing earlier than 1745.]

Bluteau gives catur as an Indian term indicating a small war vessel, which in a calm can be aided by oars. Jal (Archéologie Navales, ii. 259) quotes Witen as saying that the Caturi or Almadias were Calicut vessels, having a length of 12 to 13 paces (60 to 65 feet), sharp at both ends, and curving back, using both sails and oars. But there was a larger kind, 80 feet long, with only 7 or 8 feet beam.

1510. "There is also another kind of vessel. . . . These are all made of one piece . . . sharp at both ends. These ships are called Chaturi, and go either with a sail or oars more swiftly than any galley, futia, or brigantine."—Varthema, 154.

1549. "Naves item duas (quas Indi castres vocant) summa celeritate armari jussit, vt omam maritimam legentem, hostem commoneo prohiberent."—Gos, de Bello Camboico, 1831.

1552. "And this winter the Governor sent to have built in Cochín thirty Catures, which are vessels with oars, but smaller than brigantines."—Castanheda, iii. 271.

1601. "Biremes, seu Cathuris quam plurimae conduntur in Lasson, Javae civitate. . . ."—De Bry, iii. 109 (where there is a plate, iii. No. xxxvii.).

1688. "No man was so bold to contradict the man of God; and they all went to the Arsenal. There they found a good and sufficient bark of those they call Catur, besides seven old foystas."—Dryden, Life of Xaver, in Works, 1821, xvi. 300.

1742. "... to prevent even the possibility of the galleons escaping us in the night, the two Cutters belonging to the Centurions and the Gloucester were both manned and sent in shore. . . ."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. 1756, p. 251. Cutter also occurs pp. 111, 129, 150, and other places.

b. The word catty occurs in another sense in the following passage. A note says that "Catty or more literally Kutto is a Tamil word signifying batta." (q.v.). But may it not rather be a clerical error for batty?

1669. "If we should detain them longer we are to give them catty."—Letter in Wheeler, i. 182.

CATUR. 176
CAUVERY, n.p. The great river of S. India. Properly Tam. Ḫāviṁ, or rather Ḫāveṛi, and Sanscritized Ḫāveṛi. The earliest mention is that of Ptolemy, who writes the name (after the Skt. form) Ḫāveṛi (sc. ṭeṣṭa-moś). The Kaṃrāpa of the Periplus (c. A.D. 80-90) probably, however, represents the same name, the Ḫaṃrāpiś ḫuṭopān of Ptolemy. The meaning of the name has been much debated, and several plausible but unsatisfactory explanations have been given. Thus the Skt. form Ḫāveṛi has been explained from that language by Ḫāveṛa 'saffron.' A river in the Tamil country is, however, hardly likely to have a non-mythological Skt. name. The Cauvery in flood, like other S. Indian rivers, assumes a reddish hue. And the form Ḫāveṛi has been explained by Bp. Caldwell as possibly from the Dravidian κανρ, 'red ochre' or κα (κα-ε), 'a grove,' and ṭe-ũ, ṭe-ũ. 'a river,' ṭe-ũ, Tam. 'a sheet of water'; thus either 'red river' or 'grove river.'

The Madras Admin. Gloss. takes it from κα, Tam. 'grove,' and ṭe, Tam. 'tank,' from its original source in a garden tank.] Ḫāveṛi, however, the form found in inscriptions, affords a more satisfactory Tamil interpretation, viz. Ḫā-veṛi, 'grove-extender,' or developer. Any one who has travelled along the river will have noticed the thick groves all along the banks, which form a remarkable feature of the stream.

c. 150 A.D.—

" Ḫaṃrāpiś ṭeṣṭa-moś ḫaṃrāpiś ḫuṭōpān."—Ptolemy, lib. vii. 1.

The last was probably represented by Kāveṛipatan.

c. 545.—"Then there is Sielodēba, i.e. Taprobane . . . and then again on the Continent, and further back, is Marallo, which exports conch-shells: Kāber, which exports alabandum."—Commas, Topog. Christ. in Cnady, &c. clxxviii.

1810-11.—"After traversing the passes, they arrived at night on the banks of the river Kānōbari, and bivouacked on the sands."—Amr Khuru, in Elliot, ii. 90.

The Cauvery appears to be ignored in the older European account and maps.

CAVALLY, s. This is mentioned as a fish of Ceylon by Iova, 1775 (p. 57). It is no doubt the same that is described in the quotation from Pyrrard [see Gray's note, Hak. Soc. i. 388]. It may represent the genus Equula, of which 12 spp. are described by Day (Fishes of India, pp. 237-242), two being named by different zoologists E. caballa. But Dr. Day hesitates to identify the fish now in question. The fish mentioned in the fourth and fifth quotations may be the same species; but that in the fifth seems doubtful. Many of the spp. are extensively sun-dried, and eaten by the poor.

c. 1610.—"Ces Moucous pescheurs prennent entr' autres grandes quantités d'une sorte de petit poisson, qui n'est pas plus grande que la main et large comme un petit bremeau. Les Portugais l'appellent Pesche capallo. Il est le plus commun de toute ceste coste, et c'est de quoy ils font le plus grand trafic; car ils le fendent par le milieu, ils le salent, et le font secher au soleil."—Peyrayd de Laval, i. 278; see also 309; [Hak. Soc. i. 427; ii. 127, 294, 299].

1626.—"The Ile inrichit us with many good things; Buffois . . . oysters, Breams, Cavalloes, and store of other fish."—Sir T. Herbert, 28.

1652.—"There is another very small fish vulgarly called Cavalle, which is good enough to eat, but not very wholesome."—Philippus a Sanct. Trinitate, in Fr. Tr. 388.

1796.—"The ayía, called in Portuguese cavala, has a good taste when fresh, but when salted becomes like the herring."—Fra Paolini, E. T., p. 240.

1875.—"Caurey g dentor (Bl. Sbn.). This fish of wide range from the Mediterranean to the coast of Brazil, at St. Helena is known as the Cavally, and is one of the best table fish, being indeed the salmon of St. Helena. It is taken in considerable numbers, chiefly during the summer months, around the coast, in not very deep water: it varies in length from nine inches up to two or three feet."—St. Helena, by J. C. Meller, p. 106.

CAWNEY, CAWNY, a. Tam. κατι, 'property,' hence 'land,' [from Tam. kan, 'to see,' what is known and recognised,] and so a measure of land used in the Madras Presidency. It varies, of course, but the standard Cauney is considered to be = 24 manati or Grounds (q.v.), of 2,400 sq. f. each, hence 57,600 sq. f. or ac. 1-322. This is the only sense in which the word is used in the Madras dialect of the Anglo-Indian tongue. The 'Indian Vocabulary' of 1788 has the word in the form Conyns, but with an unintelligible explanation.

1807.—"The land measure of the Jaghir is as follows: 24 Adies square=1 Culy; 100 Culis=1 Canay. Out of what is called charity however the Culy is in fact a Bamboo 26 Adies or 22 feet 8 inches in length . . . the Ady or Malabar foot is therefore 10,66 inches nearly; and the customary canay contains 51,375 sq. feet, or 1,75 acres nearly; while the proper canay would only contain 43,778 feet."—F. Buchan, Mysoor, &c. i. 6.
CAYNPORE. 177

CAYNPORE, n.p. The correct name is Kanhpur, 'the town of Kanh, Kanhaiya or Krishna.' The city of the Doab so called, having in 1891 a population of 188,712, has grown up entirely under British rule, at first as the bazaar and dependence of the cantonment established here under a treaty made with the Nabob of Oudh in 1763, and afterwards as a great mart of trade.

CAYMAN, s. This is not used in India. It is an American name for an alligator; from the Carib acayuman (Littré). But it appears formerly to have been in general use among the Dutch in the East. [It is one of those words "which the Portuguese or Spaniards very early caught up in one part of the world, and naturalised in another." (N.E.D.).]

1530.—"The country is extravagantly hot; and the rivers are full of Caimans, which are certain water-lizards (lagartis)."—Nuncio de Gurmman, in Ramusio, iii. 389.

1598.—"In this river (Zaire or Congo) there are living divers kinds of creatures, and in particular, mighty great crocodiles, which the country people there call Caiman."—Pigafetta, in Harleson Coll. of Voyages, ii. 533.

This is an instance of the way in which we so often see a word belonging to a different quarter of the world undoubtingly ascribed to Africa or Asia, as the case may be. In the next quotation we find it ascribed to India.

1672.—"The figures so represented in Adam's footsteps were . . . 41. The King of the Caimans or Crocodiles."—Baldaeus (Germ. ed.), 148.

1692.—"Anno 1692 there were 3 newly arrived soldiers . . . near a certain gibbet that stood by the river outside the boom, so sharply pursued by a Kaileman that they were obliged to climb the gibbet for safety whilst the creature standing up on his hind feet reached with his snout to the very top of the gibbet."—Valentijn, iv. 291.

CAYOLAQUE, s. Kayu= 'wood,' in Malay. Laka is given in Crawford's Malay Dict. as "name of a red wood used as incense, Myristica inera." In his Descr. Dict. he calls it the "Tanarius major; a tree with a red-coloured wood, a native of Sumatra, used in dyeing and in pharmacy. It is an article of considerable native trade, and is chiefly exported to China" (p. 204). [The word, according to Mr. Skeat, is probably kayu, 'wood,' lakh, 'red dye' (see LAC), but the combined form is not in Klinkert, nor are these trees in Ridley's plant list. He gives Laka-laka or Malaka as the name of the phyllanthus emblica.]

1510.—"There also grows heri a very great quantity of lacca, for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts."—Varthema, p. 238.

c. 1560.—"I being in Canton there was a rich (bed) made wrought with Ieorie, and of a sweet wood which they call Cayolaque, and of Sandalum, that was prized at 1500 Crownes."—Gaspar Da Orus, in Purchas, iii. 177.

CAYZAEE, KAJEE, &c., s. Arab. kadi, 'a judge,' the letter swdd with which it is spelt being always pronounced in India like a z. The form Cadi, familiar from its use in the old version of the Arabian Nights, comes to us from the Levant. The word with the article, al-kadi, becomes in Spanish alcalde; * not aloside, which is from kaid, 'a chief;' nor alquacil, which is from waqir. So Dozy and Engelmann, no doubt correctly. But in Pinto, cap. 8, we find "ao guaiz da justicia q em elles he como corregezor entre nos"; where guaiz seems to stand for kadi.

It is not easy to give an accurate account of the position of the Kadi in British India, which has gone through variations of which a distinct record cannot be found. But the following outline is believed to be substantially correct.

* Dr. R. Rost observes to us that the Arabic letter swdd is pronounced by the Malays like l (see also Crawford's Malay Grammar, p. 7). And it is curious to find a transfer of the same letter into Spanish as id. In Malay kadi becomes kadiii.
Under Adawlut I have given a brief sketch of the history of the judiciary under the Company in the Bengal Presidency. Down to 1790 the greater part of the administration of criminal justice was still in the hands of native judges, and other native officials of various kinds, though under European supervision in varying forms. But the native judiciary, except in positions of a quite subordinate character, then ceased. It was, however, still in substance Mahommedan law that was administered in criminal cases, and also in civil cases between Mahommedans as affecting succession, &c. And a Kazi and a Mufti were retained in the Provincial Courts of Appeal and Circuit as the exponents of Mahommedan law, and the deliverers of a formal Futwa. There was also a Kazi-al-Kozmat, or chief Kazi of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, attached to the Sudder Courts of Dewanny and Nizamut, assisted by two Muftis, and these also gave written futwas on references from the District Courts.

The style of Kazi and Mufti presumably continued in formal existence in connection with the Sudder Courts till the abolition of these in 1868; but with the earlier abolition of the Provincial Courts in 1829-31 it had quite ceased, in this sense, to be familiar. In the District Courts the corresponding exponents were in English officially designated Law-officers, and I believe, in official vernacular, as well as commonly among Anglo-Indians, Moolveses (q.v.).

Under the article LAW-OFFICER, it will be seen that certain trivial cases were, at the discretion of the magistrate, referred for disposal by the Law-officer of the district. And the latter, from this fact, as well as, perhaps, from the tradition of the elders, was in some parts of Bengal popularly known as 'the Kazi.' "In the Magistrate's office," writes my friend Mr. Seton-Karr, "it was quite common to speak of this case as referred to the joint magistrate, and that to the Chota Sahib (the Assistant), and that again to the Kazi."

But the duties of the Kazi popularly so styled and officially recognised, had, almost from the beginning of the century, become limited to certain notarial functions, to the performance and registration of Mahommedan marriages, and some other matters connected with the social life of their co-religionists. To these functions must also be added as regards the 18th century and the earlier years of the 19th, duties in connection with distraint for rent on behalf of Zemindars. There were such Kasizes nominated by Government in towns and pargunnas, with great variation in the area of the localities over which they officiated. The Act XI. of 1864, which repealed the laws relating to law-officers, put an end also to the appointment by Government of Kasizes.

But this seems to have led to inconveniences which were complained of by Mahommedans in some parts of India, and it was enacted in 1880 (Act XII., styled "The Kasizes Act") that with reference to any particular locality, and after consultation with the chief Musulman residents therein, the Local Government might select and nominate a Kazi or Kasize for that local area (see FUTWA, LAW-OFFICERS, MUFFTY).

1388.—"They treated me civilly and set me in front of their mosque during their Easter; at which mosque, on account of its being their Easter, there were assembled from divers quarters a number of their Cadini, i.e. of their bishops."—Letter of Friar Pascal, in Cathay, &c., 285.

1791.—"The Judges of the Courts of Circuit shall refer to the Kadi and Mufti of their respective Courts all questions on points of law . . . regarding which they may not have been furnished with specific instructions from the G.-G. in C. or the Nizamut Adawlut . . ."—Regn. No. XXXV.

1792—Revenue Regulation of July 20, No. lxxv., empowers Landholders and Farmers of Land to distrain for Arrears of Rent by Revenue. The "Tazis of the Pegnumah" is the official under the Collector, repeatedly referred to as regulating and carrying out the distrain. So, again, in Regn. XVII of 1793.

1793.—"Ixvi. The Nizamut Adawlut shall continue to be held at Calcutta. . . .

"Ixxvii. The Court shall consist of the Governor-General, and the members of the Supreme Council, assisted by the head Caams of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, and two Muftis." (This was already in the Regulations of 1791.)—Regn. IX. of 1798. See also quotation under MUFTY.

1793.—"I. Caams are stationed at the Cities of Patna, Dacca, and Moorshedabad, and the principal towns, and in the pergunnah, for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages, and performing such religious duties or ceremonies prescribed by the Mahomedan law, as have been hitherto discharged by them under the British Government."—Reg. XXXIX. of 1798.

1803.—Regulation XLVI. regulates the appointment of Caams in towns and pergunnahs, "for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages, &c., but makes no allusion to judicial duties.

1824.—"Have you not learned this common saying—'Every one's teeth are blunted by acids except the caam's, which are by sweets.'"—Haji Baha, ed. 1835, p. 316.

1864.—"Whereas it is unnecessary to continue the offices of Hindo and Mahomedan Law-Officers, and is inexpedient that the appointment of Cazee-col-Coln, or of City, Town, or Pergunnah Caams should be made by Government, it is enacted as follows:— . . .

"II. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed so as to prevent a Cazee-col-Coln or other Cazee from performing, when required to do so, any duties or ceremonies prescribed by the Mahomedan Law."—Act No. XI. of 1864.

1880.—". . . whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of India the presence of Kasis appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages . . .—Bill introduced into the Council of Gov.-Gen., January 30, 1880.

"An Act for the appointment of persons to the office of Kasi.

"Whereas by the preamble to Act No. XI. of 1884 . . . it was (among other things declared inexpedient, &c.) . . . whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of India the presence of Kasis appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages and the performance of certain other rites and ceremonies, and it is therefore expedient that the Government should again be empowered to appoint such persons to the office of Kasi; It is hereby enacted . . ."—Act No. XII. of 1880.

1885.—"To come to something more specific. 'There were instances in which men of the most venerable dignity, persecuted without a cause by extortioners, died of rage and shame in the gripes of the vile alzans of Impey' [Macaulay's Essay on Hastings].
CEDED DISTRICTS. 180

CELEBES.

"Here we see one Cast turned into an indefinite number of 'men of the most venerable dignity'; a man found guilty by legal process of corruptly oppressing a helpless widow into 'men of the most venerable dignity' persecuted by extortioners without a cause; and a guard of sepoys, with which the Supreme Court had nothing to do, into 'tile alguazils of Impery.'"—Stephen, Story of Nuncomar, ii. 250-251.

Cazoo also is a title used in Nepal for Ministers of State.

1848.—"Kajees, Counsellors, and mitred Lamas were there, to the number of twenty, all planted with their backs to the wall, mute and motionless as statues."—Hooker’s Himalayan Journals, ed. 1855, 1. 286.

1868.—"The Durbar (of Nepal) have written to the four Kajees of Tibet enquiring the reason."—Letter from Col. R.
Lawrence, dated 1st April, regarding persecution of R. C. Missions in Tibet.

1878.—

"Ho, lamas, get ye ready,
Ho, Kard, clear the way;
The chief will ride in all his pride
To the Rangeet Stream to-day."— Wiltzid Beeley, A Lay of Modern Darjeling.

CEDED DISTRICTS, n.p. A name applied familiarly at the beginning of the last century to the territory south of the Tungabhadra river, which was ceded to the Company by the Nizam in 1800, after the defeat and death of Tippoo Sultan. This territory embraced the present districts of Bellary, Cuddapah, and Karnul, with the Pal-nad, which is now a subdivision of the Kistna District. The name perhaps became best known in England from Gleig’s Life of Sir Thomas Munro, that great man having administered these provinces for 7 years.

1878.—"We regret to announce the death of Lieut.-General Sir Hector Jones, G.C.B., at the advanced age of 86. The gallant officer now deceased belonged to the Madras Establishment of the E. I. Co.’s forces, and bore a distinguished part in many of the great achievements of that army, including the celebrated march into the Ceded Districts under the Collector of Canara, and the campaign against the Seminor of Madura."— The True Reformer, p. 7 ("writ serwastick").

CELEBES, n.p. According to Crawfurd this name is unknown to the natives, not only of the great island itself, but of the Archipelago generally, and must have arisen from some Portuguese misunderstanding or corruption. There appears to be no general name for the island in the Malay language, unless Tanah Bugis,
'the Land of the Bugis people' [see BUGIS]. It seems sometimes to have been called the Isle of Macassar. In form Celebes is apparently a Portuguese plural, and several of their early writers speak of Celebes as a group of islands. Crawfurd makes a suggestion, but not very confidently, that Pulo Sldbih, 'the islands over and above,' might have been vaguely spoken of by the Malays, and understood by the Portuguese as a name. [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this explanation: "The standard Malay form would be Pulau Jadibih, which in some dia-lектs might be Sd-lbh, and this may have been a variant of Si-Lbhb, a man's name, the si corresponding to the def. art. in the Germ. phrase 'der Hans.' Numerous Malay place-names are derived from those of people."]

1516.—"Having passed these islands of Maluco . . . at a distance of 120 leagues, there are other islands to the west, from which sometimes there come white people, naked from the waist upwards . . .
These people eat human flesh, and if the King of Maluco has any person to execute, they beg for him to eat him, just as one would ask for a pig, and the islands from which they come are called Celebes."—Barros, 282-3.

C. 1544.—"In this street (of Pago) there were six and thirty thousand strangers of two and forty different Nations, namely . . .
Papuans, Selbures, Mindanaos . . . and many others whose names I know not."—F. M.
Pinto, in Cogan’s tr., p. 200.

1552.—"In the previous November (1529) arrived at Ternate D. Jorge de Castro who came from Malaca by way of Borneo in a junk . . . and going astray passed along the Isle of Makasar . . ."—Barros, Dec. IV.
1. 18.

"The first thing that the Samarno did in this was to make Tristão de Taide believe that in the Isles of the Celebes, and of the Macapares and in that of Mindinhlo there was much gold."—Ibid. vi. 25.

1579.—"The 16 Day (December) wee had sight of the Island Celebes or Selibas."— Drake, World Encompassed (Hak. Soc.), p.
150.

1610.—"At the same time there were at Ternate certain ambassadors from the Isles of the Macapar (which are to the west of those of Maluco—the nearest of them about 60 leagues). . . These islands are many, and joined together, and appear in the sea-charts thrown into one very big island, extending, as the sailors say, North and South, and having near 100 leagues of compass. And this island imitates the shape of a big locust, the head of which (stretching to the south to 51 degrees) is formed by the Cellubes (also Celubes), which have a King over them. . . . These islands are ruled by many Kings, differing in language, laws, and customs. . . ."—Coutu, Dec. V. vii. 2.

CENTIPEDE. a. This word was perhaps borrowed directly from the Portuguese in India (centopéa). [The N.E.D. refers to it to Sp.]

1662.—"There is a kind of worm which the Portuguese call vn centopéa, and the Dutch also 'thousand-legs' (twaende-bein)."—T. Saat, 68.

GERAM, n.p. A large island in the Molucca Sea, the Serang of the Malays. [Klinkert gives the name Seran, which Mr. Skeat thinks more likely to be correct.]

GERAME, CARAME, &c., a. The Malayalam eramba, a gatehouse with a roof over the gate, and generally fortified. This is a feature of temples, &c., as well as of private houses, in Malabar [see Logan, i. 82]. The word is also applied to a chamber raised on four posts. [The word, as Mr. Skeat notes, has come into Malay as sarambi or sarambi, 'a house veranda.']

1500.—"He was taken to a cerame, which is a one-storied house of wood, which the King had erected for their meeting-place."—Custard, Bk. I. cap. 59, p. 103.]

1551.—". . . where stood the cerame of the King, which is his temple. . . ."—Ibid. iii. 2.

1562.—"Podralvares . . . was carried ashore on men's shoulders in an ander till he was set among the Gento Princes whom the Camorin had sent to receive him at the beach, whilst the said Camorin himself was standing within sight in the cerame awaiting his arrival."—Barros, I. v. 5.

1557.—The word occurs also in D'Albuquerque's Commentaries (Hist. Soc. tr. i. 115), but it is there erroneously rendered "jetty."

1558.—"Antes de entrar no Cerame vierão receber alguns senhores dos que ficávão com el Rei."—Dusm. de Goes, Chron. 76 (ch. liviii.).

CEYLON, n.p. This name, as applied to the great island which hangs from India like a dependent jewel, becomes usual about the 13th century. But it can be traced much earlier. For it appears undoubtedly to be formed from Sinhala or Sihala, 'lions' abode,' the name adopted in the island itself at an early date. This, with the addition of 'island,' Sihala-divpa, comes down to us in Cosmas as Σινελῆδης. There was a Pali form Sihalā, which, at an early date, must have been colloquially shortened to Siyān, as appears from the old Tamil name Iyam (the Tamil having no proper sibilant), and probably from this was formed the Sarandīp and Sarandīb which was long the name in use by mariners of the Persian Gulf.

It has been suggested by Mr. Van der Tuuk, that the name Sālān or Siyān was really of Javanese origin, as sele (from Skt. śīla, 'a rock, a stone') in Javanese (and in Malay) means 'a precious stone,' hence Pulo Selān would be 'Isle of Gems.' ["This," writes Mr. Skeat, "is possible, but it remains to be proved that the gem was not named after the island (i.e. 'Ceylon stone')." The full phrase in standard Malay is batu Selān, where batu means 'stone.' Klinkert merely marks Sālān (Ceylon) as Persian.] The island was really called anciently Ratnadīp, 'Isle of Gems,' and is termed by an Arab historian of the 9th century Jasarat-al-yakīt, 'Isle of Rubies.' So that there is considerable plausibility in Van der Tuuk's suggestion. But the genealogy of the name from Sīhala is so legitimate that the utmost that can be conceded is the possibility that the Malay form Selān may have been shaped by the consideration suggested, and may have influenced the general adoption of the form Saiādn, through the predominance of Malay navigation in the Middle Ages.

1827. — "The splendid procession, having entered the royal gardens, approached through a long avenue of lofty trees, a chabootra or platform of white marble canopyed by arches of the same material." — Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

1834. — "We rode up to the Chabootra, which has a large enclosed court before it, and the Daroga received us with the respect which my showy escort claimed." — Mem. of Col. Mountain, 183:

CHACKUR, s. P. — H. chakar, 'a servant.' The word is hardly ever now used in Anglo-Indian households except as a sort of rhyming amplification to Naukar (see NOKUB): "Naukar-chakar," the whole following. But in a past generation there was a distinction made between naukar, the superior servant, such as a munshi, a gomadhia, a chobdar, a khamsama, &c., and chaker, a menial servant. Williamson gives a curious list of both classes, showing what a large Calcutta household embraced at the beginning of last century (V. M. i. 186-187).

1810.—"Such is the superiority claimed by the natives, that to ask one of them 'whose chancer he is!' would be considered a gross insult."—Williamson, i. 187.

CHALIA, CHALÉ, n.p. Chaliam, Chaliyam, or Chalayam; an old port of Malabar, on the south side of the Beypur [see BEYROOR] R., and opposite Beypur. The terminal station of the Madras Railway is in fact where Chaliam was. A plate is given in the Lendas of Correa, which makes this plain. The place is incorrectly alluded to as Kalyan in Imp. Gazetteer, ii. 49; more correctly on next page as Chalium. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 75.]

c. 1380.—See in Abulfeda, "Shaliyat, a city of Malabar."—Gildemeister, 185.

c. 1344.—"I went then to Shaliyat, a very pretty town, where they make the stuffs that bear its name [see SHALEH]. . . . Thence I returned to Kalikut."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 109.

1516.—"Beyond this city (Calicut) towards the south there is another city called Chalýan, where there are numerous Moors, natives of the country, and much shipping."—Barbosa, 153.

c. 1570.—"And it was during the reign of the prince that the Franks erected their fort at Shalecat . . . it thus commanded the trade between Arabia and Calicut, since between the last city and Shalecat the distance was scarcely 2 parasangs."—Tahfut-ul-Mujahidern, p. 129.

CHAMPA, n.p. The name of a kingdom at one time of great power and importance in Indo-China, occupying the extreme S.E. of that region. A limited portion of its soil is still known by that name, but otherwise as the Binh-Thuân province of Cochin China. The race inhabiting this portion, Chams or Tsians, are traditionally said to have occupied the whole breadth of that peninsula to the Gulf of Siam, before the arrival of the Khmer or Kambojan people. It is not clear whether the people in question took their name from Champa, or Champa from the people; but in any case the form of Champa is Sanskrit, and probably it was adopted from India like Kamboja itself and so many other Indo-Chinese names. The original Champa was a city and kingdom on the Ganges, near the modern Bhagalpur. And we find the Indo-Chinese Champa in the 7th century called Mahd-champa, as if to distinguish it. It is probable that the Zdãs or Zdáas of Ptolemy represents the name of this ancient kingdom; and it is certainly the Sanf or Chamf of the Arab navigators 600 years later; this form representing Champ as nearly as is possible to the Arabic alphabet.

c. A.D. 640.—". . . plus loin à l'est, le royaume de Mo-ho-tchen-po" (Mahlpampi).—Hiouen Thang, in Pélerins Boudhh. iii. 83.

851.—"Ships then proceed to the place called Sanf (or Chamf) . . . there fresh water is procured; from this place is exported the aloes-wood called Chamf. This is a kingdom."—Relation des Voyages, &c., i. 18.

1298.—"You come to a country called Champa, a very rich region, having a King of its own. The people are idolaters, and pay a yearly tribute to the Great Kaan . . . there are a very great number of Elephants in this Kingdom, and they have lign-aloes in great abundance."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 6.

c. 1300.—"Passing on from this, you come to a continent called Jampa, also subject to the Kaan . . . ."—Rashiduddin, in Elcic, i. 71.

c. 1328.—"There is also a certain part of India called Champa. There, in place of horses, mules, asses, and camels, they make use of elephants for all their work."—Friar Jordanus, 87.

1516.—"Having passed this island (Borney) . . . towards the country of Ansam and China, there is another great island of Gentiles called Champa; which has a King and language of its own, and many elephants. . . . There also grows in it aloes-wood."—Barbosa, 204.
1552. — "Concorriam todolos navegantes dos mares Occidentaes da India, e dos Orientaes a ella, que ao as regioes di Sião, China, Champa, Cambôja. . . ."— Barros, ii. vi. 1.

1572. —

"Vee, corre a costa, que Champa se chama, Cuja mata he do pae cheioso ornada."

Câmbes, x. 129.

By Burton:

"Here coursest, see, the called Champa shore, with woods of odorous wood 'tis deckt and bright."

1608. — " . . . thence (from Assam) eastward on the side of the northern mountains are the Nangata [i.e. Nagra] lands, the land of Pukham lying on the ocean, Beigu [i.e. Pegu], the land Rakhang, Hamsavati, and the rest of the realm of Munyang; beyond these Champa, Kambuja, etc. All these are in general named Kôti."—Taranathâ (Tibetan) Hist. of Buddhism, by Schiefner, p. 262. The preceding passage of great interest as showing a fair general knowledge of the kingdoms of Indo-China on the part of a Tibetan priest, and also as showing that Indo-China was recognised under a general name, viz. Kôti.

1696. — "Mr. Bowyear says the Prince of Champa whom he met at the Cochin Chinese Court was very polite to him, and strenuously exhorted him to introduce the English to the dominions of Champa."—In Latriemple's Or. Repert. i. 67.

CHAMPANA, s. A kind of small vessel. (See SAMPAK.)

CHANDAUL, s. H. Chandal, an outcaste, 'used generally for a man of the lowest and most despised of the mixt tribes' (Williams); 'properly one sprung from a Sudra father and Brahman mother' (Wilson). [The last is the definition of the Ain (ed. Jarrett, iii. 116). Dr. Wilson identifies them with the Kandali or Gondali of Ptolemy (Ind. Cste, i. 87).]

712. — "You have joined those Chandlis and cowaiters, and have become one of them."—Chack-Nâmak, in Elliot, i. 193.

[1810. — "Chandals," see quotation under HALAILCORE.

CHANDERNAGORE, n.p. The name of the French settlement on the Hoogly, 24 miles by river above Calcutta, originally occupied in 1673. The name is alleged by Hunter to be properly Chandan(a)-nagara, 'Sandalwood City,' but the usual form points rather to Chandra-nagara, 'Moon City.'

[Natives prefer to call it Farash-danga, or 'The gathering together of Frenchmen.']

1727. — "He forced the Ostenders to quit their Factory, and seek protection from the French at Charnagar. . . . They have a few private Families dwelling near the Factory, and a pretty little Church to hear Mass in, which is the chief Business of the French in Bengal."—A. Hamilton, ii. 18.

[1758.—"Shondernagor." See quotation under CALCUTTA.]

CHANK, CHUNK, s. H. sankh, Skt. sankha, a large kind of shell (Turbinella raya) prized by the Hindus, and used by them for offering libations, as a horn to blow at the temples, and for cutting into armlets and other ornaments. It is found especially in the Gulf of Mannar, and the Chank fishery was formerly, like that of the pearl-oysters, a Government monopoly (see Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 556, and the references). The abnormal chank, with its spiral opening to the right, is of exceptional value, and has sometimes priced, it is said, at a lakk of rupees!

545. — "Then there is Diosediba, i.e. Taprobane . . . and then again on the continent, and further back is Maralle, which exports conch-shells (κοχλίους)."—Cosmas, in Cathay, i. clxviii.

851. — "They find on its shores (of Ceylon) the pearl, and the shank, a name by which they designate the great shell which serves for a trumpet, and which is much sought after."—Reinaud, Relations, i. 6.

1563. — " . . . And this chanco is a ware for the Bengal trade, and formerly it produced more profit than now. . . . And there was formerly a custom in Bengal that no virgin in honour and esteem could be corrupted unless it were by placing bracelets of chanco on her arms; but since the Patans came in this usage has more or less ceased; and so the chanco is rated lower now. . . ."—Garcia, f. 141.

1644. — "What they chiefly bring (from Tuticorin) are cloths called onchas . . . a large quantity of Chanco; these are large shells which they fish in that sea, and which supply Bengal, where the blacks make of them bracelets for the arm; also the biggest and best fowls in all these Eastern parts."—Bocarro, MS. 316.

1672. — "Garroude flew in all haste to Brahma, and brought to Kiana the chankar, or inkhorn, twisted to the right."—Baldanes, Germ. ed. 521.

* These are probably the same as Milburn, under Tuticorin, calls ketches. We do not know the proper name. (See Putten Ketches, under PIECE-GOODS.)
1673.—"There are others they call chanque; the shells of which are the Mother of Pearl."—Fryer, 222.

1727.—"It admits of some Trade, and produces Cotton, Corn, coars Cloth, and Cheunk, a Shell-fish in shape of a Peri-wiggle, but as large as a Man’s Arm above the Elbow. In Bengal they are saw’d into Rings for Ornaments to Women’s Arms."—
A. Hamilton, i. 131.

1734.—"Expended towards digging a foundation, where chanks were buried with accustomed ceremonies."—In Wheeler,
iii. 147.

1770.—"Upon the same coast is found a shell-fish called ranus, of which the Indians at Bengal make bracelets."—Raynal
(tr. 1777) i. 216.

1813.—"A chank opening to the right hand is highly valued ... always sells for its weight in gold."—Milburn, i. 357.

CHARPOY, a. H. charpada, from P. chādī-pāt (i.e. four-feet), the common Indian bedstead, sometimes of very rude materials, but in other cases handsomely wrought and painted. It is correctly described in the quotation from Ibn Batuta.

c. 1350.—"The beds in India are very light. A single man can carry one, and every traveller should have his own bed, which his slave carries about on his head.
The bed consists of four conical legs, on which four staves are laid; between they plait a sort of ribbon of silk or cotton.
When you lie on it you need nothing else to render the bed sufficiently elastic."—
iii. 280.

1540.—"Husain Khan Taqtdar was sent on some business from Bengal. He went on travelling night and day. Whenever slept came over him he placed himself on a bed (chādhr-pāt) and the villagers carried him along on their shoulders."—MS.
quoted in Elloit, iv. 418.

1662.—"Turban, long coats, traverses, shoes, and sleeping on charpāla, are quite usual."—H. of Mir Jumla's Invasion of Assam, trans. by Blockmann, J.A.S.B. xii. pt. i. 83.

1787.—"A syce at Monnurngur, lying

CHATTY, s. An earthen pot, spheri-oidal in shape. It is a S. Indian word, but is tolerably familiar in the Anglo-Indian parlance of N. India also, though the H. Ghurra (gharda) is more commonly used there. The word is Tam. shatti, chattı, Tel. chatiti, which appears in Pali as chatti.

1781.—"In honour of His Majesty’s birthday we had for dinner fowl cutlets and a four pudding, and drank his health in a chatty of sherbet."—Narr. of an Officer of Bailie’s Detachment, quoted in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 285.

Skert points out that Klinkert gives chambok or sambok, as Javanese forms, the standard Malay being chabok or chabuk; and this perhaps suggests that the word may have been introduced by Malay grooms once largely employed at the Cape.

Chebull. The denomination of one of the kinds of Myrobolans (q.v.) exported from India. The true etymology is probably Kabul, as stated by Thevenot, t.e. 'from Cabul.'

C. 1843.—"Chebull mirabolani."—List of Spices, &c., in Pegolotti (Della Decima, tii. 308).

C. 1685.—"De la Province de Caboul ... les Mirabolans croissent dans les Montagnes et c'est la cause pourquoi les Orientaux les appellent Cabuly."—Thevenot, v. 172.

Cheechee, adj. A disparaging term applied to half-castes or Eurasians (q.v.) (corresponding to the Lip-lap of the Dutch in Java) and also to their manner of speech. The word is said to be taken from chi (Fie!), a common native (S. Indian) interjection of reprobation or reproach, supposed to be much used by the class in question. The term is, however, perhaps also a kind of onomatopoeia, indicating the mincing pronunciation which often characterises them (see below). It should, however, be added that there are many well-educated East Indians who are quite free from this mincing accent.

1781.—"Pretty little Looking-Glasses, Good and cheap for Chee-chee Misses."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, March 17.

1873.—"He is no favourite with the pure native, whose language he speaks as his own in addition to the hybrid mixed English (known as chee-chee), which he also employs."—Fraser's Magazine, Oct., 437.

1880.—"The Eurasian girl is often pretty and graceful. ... 'What though upon her lips there hung The accents of her toli-toli tongue.'—Sir Ali Baba, 122.

1881.—"There is no doubt that the 'Chee Chee twang,' which becomes so objectionable to every Englishman before he has been CHEENAR. a. P. chinár, the Oriental Plane (Platanus orientalis) and platanus of the ancients; native from Greece to Persia. It is often by English travellers in Persia miscalled sycamore from confusion with the common British tree (Acer pseudoplatanus), which English people also habitually miscall sycamore, and Scotch people miscall plane-tree! Our quotations show how old the confusion is. The tree is not a native of India, though there are fine
chinar in Kash-mere, and a few in old native gardens in the Punjab, introduced in the days of the Moghul emperors. The tree is the Arb treo Sec of Marco Polo (see 2nd ed. vol. i. 131, 132). Chinar of especial vastness and beauty are described by Herodotus and Pliny, by Chardin and others. At Buyukdere near Constantinople, is still shown the Plane under which Godfrey of Boulogne is said to have encamped. At Tejirish, N. of Teheran, Sir H. Rawlinson tells us that he measured a great chinár which has a girth of 108 feet at 5 feet from the ground.

effects." —Beckly's Diary, Sept. 16.

1726. — "... the finest road that you can Asia is called the Chinhau, grows to the same of an oak, and has a taper straight

CHEENY, a. See under SUGAR.

1810. — "The superior kind (of raw sugar) which may often be had nearly white ... and sharp-grained, under the name of

CHEESE. a. This word is well known to be used in modern English slang for "anything good, first-rate in quality, genuine, pleasant, or advantageous" (Slang Dict.). And the most probable source of the term is P. and H. chiz, "thing." For the expression used to be common among Anglo-Indians, e.g.,
"My new Arab is the real chiz";
"These cheroots are the real chiz," i.e.
the real thing. The word may have been an Anglo-Indian importation, and it is difficult otherwise to account for it. [This view is accepted by the N.E.D. for other explanations see 1 ser. N. d Q. viii. 89; 3 ser. vii.
465, 505.]

CHEETA, a. H. chitl, the Felis jubata, Schreber, [Cynoelurus jubatus, Blanford], or "Hunting Leopard," so called from its being commonly trained to use in the chase. From Skt. chitraka, or chitraktya, lit. 'having a speckled body.'

1563. — "... and when they wish to pay him much honour they call him Rão; as for example Chita-Ráo, whom I am acquainted with; and this is a proud name, for Chita signifies 'Ounce' (or panther) and this Chita-Rao means 'King as strong as a Panther.' " —García, f. 36.

C. 1596. — "Once a leopard (shhta) had been caught, and without previous training, on a mere hint by His Majesty, it brought in the prey, like trained leopards." —Ain-i-Akbari, ed. Blochmann, i. 286.

1610. — Hawkins calls the Cheetas at Akbar's Court 'ounces for game.'—In Purchas, i. 218.
1613.-"The Cheetah-connah, the place where the Nabob's panthers and other animals for hunting are kept."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 463.

1652.—"The true cheetah, the Hunting Leopard of India, does not exist in Ceylon."—Temcent. i. 140.

1679.—"Two young cheetahs had just come in from Bombay; one of these was as tame as a house-cat, and like the puma, purred beautifully when stroked."—"Jamrach's," in Sat. Review, May 17, p. 612.

It has been ingeniously suggested by Mr. Aldis Wright that the word chester, as used by Shakspere, in the following passage, refers to this animal:

Falstaff: "He's no swaggerer, Hostess; a tame chester i' faith; you may stroke him gently as a puppy greyhound; he'll not swagger."—2nd Part King Henry IV. ii. 4.

Compare this with the passage just quoted from the Saturday Review! And the interpretation would rather derive confirmation from a parallel passage from Beaumont & Fletcher:

"... if you give any credit to the juggling rascal, you are worse than simple widows, and will be drawn into the net by this decoy-duck, this tame chester."—The Fair Maid of the Inn, iv. 2.

But we have not been able to trace any possible source from which Shakspere could have derived the name of the animal at all, to say nothing of the familiar use of it. [The N.E.D. gives no support to the suggestion.]

CHELING, CHELI, s. The word is applied by some Portuguese writers to the traders of Indian origin who were settled at Malacca. It is not found in the Malay dictionaries, and it is just possible that it originated in some confusion of Quelin (see KLING) and Chuli (see CHOLLIA), or rather of Quelin and Chetin (see CHETTY).

1567.—"From the cohabitation of the Cheilians of Malacca with the Christians in the same street (even although in divers houses) spring great offenses against God our Lord."—Decrees of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., Dec. 23.

1613.—"E depois daquelle porto aberto e franqueado aportarão mercadores de Choromandel; mormente aquelas chellis com roupas..."—Godião de Erédia, 4v.

"This settlement is divided into two parishes, S. Thome and S. Estevão, and that part of S. Thome called Campos Chelim extends from the shore of the Jaos Bazar to the N.W. and terminates at the Stone Bastion; in this part dwell the Cheils of Choromandel."—Godiâo de Erédia, 5e. See also f. 22, and under CAMFOO.

CHELINGO, s. Arab. shalandoi, whence Malayal. chalanu, Tam. shalangu; "djalanga, qui va sur l'eau; chalangue, barque, bateau dont les planches sont clouées." (Dict. Tam. Franc., Pondichéry, 1865). This seems an unusual word, and is perhaps connected through the Arabic with the medieval vessel chelania, chelandria, chelindras, chelande, &c., used in carrying troops and horses. [But in its present form the word is S. Indian.]

1725.—... as already a Chialeng (a sort of small native row-boat, which is used for discharging and loading cargo). "..."—Valentijn, V. Chor. 20.

1746.—"Chellinga hire ... 0 22 0"

Account charges at Fort St. David, Decr. 31, MS. in India Office.

1761.—"It appears there is no more than one frigate that has escaped; therefore don't lose an instant to send us chelangoes upon chelingoes loaded with rice. ..."—Lally to Raymond at Pulicat. In Comp. H. of the War in India (Tract), 1761, p. 55.

"No more than one frigate has escaped; lose not an instant in sending chelangoes upon chelingoes loaded with rice."—Carvaclacei's Life of Civas, i. 58.

CHEROOT, s. A cigar; but the term has been appropriated specially to cigars truncated at both ends, as the Indian and Manilla cigars always were in former days. The word is Tam. shurutu, [Mal. choruttu] 'a roll (of tobacco).' In the South cheroots are chiefly made at Trichinopoly and in the Godavery Delta, the produce being known respectively as Trichies and Lunkas. The earliest occurrence of the word that we know is in Father Beschi's Tamil story of Parmaartta Guru (c. 1725). On p. 1 one of the characters is described as carrying a firebrand to light his pugiyayalai shurutu, 'roll (cheroot) of tobacco.' [The N.E.D. quotes cheroots in 1669.]

Grose (1750-60), speaking of Bombay, whilst describing the cheroot does not use that word, but another which is, as far as we know, entirely obsolete in British India, viz. Buncus (q.v.).

1759.—In the expenses of the Nabob's entertainment at Calcutta in this year we find:

"60 lbs. of Masulipatam cheroots, Rs. 500."—In Long, 194.

1782.—"Our evening amusements instead of your stupid Harmonica, was playing Cards and Backgammon, chewing Beetle and smoking Cheroots."—Old Country Captain, in India Gazette, Febry. 24.

1782.—"Le tabac y réussit très bien ; les chirouttes de Manille sont renommées dans toute l'Inde par leur goût agréable; aussi les Dames dans ce pays fument-elles toute la journée."—Sarrer, Voyage, iii. 43.

1782.—"At that time (c. 1757) I have seen the officers mount guard many's the time and oft... neither did they at that time carry your fuses, but had a long Pole with an iron head to it... With this in one Hand and a Chillot in the other you saw them suluting away at the Main Guard."— Madras Courier, April 3.

1810.—"The lowest classes of Europeans, as also of the natives... frequently smoke cheroots, exactly corresponding with the Spanish cigar, though usually made rather more bulky."—Williams, V. M. i. 499.

1811.—"Dire que le Tcherout est la cigarette, c'est me dispenser d'en faire la description."—Solyms, iii.

[1823.—"He amused himself by smoking several carootes."—Owen, Narr. ii. 50.]

1875.—"The meal despatched, all who were not on duty lay down... almost too tired to smoke their cheroots before falling asleep."—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

CHERRY FOUL, s. H. chari-fauj ?

This curious phrase occurs in the quotations, the second of which explains its meaning. I am not certain what the first part is, but it is most probably chari, in the sense of 'movable,' 'locomotive,' so that the phrase was equivalent to 'flying brigade.' [It may possibly be charhi, for charhni, in the sense of 'preparation for battle.'] It was evidently a technicality of the Mahratta armies.

1803.—"The object of a cherry foul, without guns, with two armies after it, must be to fly about and plunder the richest country it can find, not to march through exhausted countries, to make revolutions in cities."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 59.

1809.—"Two detachments under... Mahratta chiefs of some consequence, are now employed in levying contributions in different parts of the Jyoor country. Such detachments are called chari-fauj; they are generally equipped very lightly, with but little artillery; and are equally formidable in their progress to friend and foe."— Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, 128; [ed. 1892, p. 96].

CHETTY, s. A member of any of the trading castes in S. India, answering in every way to the Banyans of W. and N. India, Malayal. chetti, Tam. setti, [Tel. setti, in Ceylon seddi]. These have all been supposed to be forms from the Skt. sreshthi; but C. P. Brown (MS.) denies this, and says "Shetti, a shop-keeper, is plain Telugu," and quite distinct from sreshthi. [The same view is taken in the Madras Gloss.] Whence then the H. Seth (see SETT)? [The word was also used for a 'merchantman'; see the quotations from Pyrard on which Gray notes: "I do not know any other authority for the use of the word for merchandises, though it is analogous to our 'merchants.']"

C. 1349.—The word occurs in Ibn Batuta (iv. 259) in the form sethi, which he says was given to very rich merchants in China; and this is one of his questionable statements about that country.

1611.—"The great Afonso Dalboquerque... determined to appoint Ninsachatu, because he was a Hindoo, Governor of the Quillins (Chelling) and Chettins."—Comment. of Af. Dalbog., Hak. Soc. iii. 128; [and see quotation from ibid. iii. 146, under KLING].

1516.—"Some of these are called Chettins, who are Gentiles, natives of the province of Cholmender."—Barbosa, 144.

1552.—"... whom our people commonly call Chetins. These are men with such a genius for merchandise, and so acute in every mode of trade, that among our people when they desire either to blame or praise any man for his subtlety and skill in merchant's traffic they say of him, 'he is a Chetim'; and they use the word chetinar for 'to trade,'—which are words now very commonly received among us."—Barros, I. ix. 3.

c. 1566.—"Ui sono uomini periti che si chiamano Chitini, li quali mettendo il prezzo alle perle."—Cesare Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 380.

1596.—"The vessels of the Chetins of these parts never sail along the coast of Malavar nor towards the north, except in aavour, in order to go and come more securely, and to avoid being cut off by the Malavars and other corsairs, who are continually roving in these seas."—Viceroy's Proclamation at Goa, in Archiv. Port. Or., fasc. 3, 661.

1598.—"The Souldiers in these dayes give themselves more to be Chetins [var. lect. Chatiins] and to deale in Merchandise, than to serve the King in his Armado."—Linschoten, 58; [Hak. Soc. i. 202].

[... Most of these vessels were Chetins, that is to say, merchandemen."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 345.] of the 17th, is made the source of most of the great rivers of Further India, including the Brahmaputra, the Irawadi, the Salwen, and the Menam. Lake Chiamay was the counterpart of the African lake of the same period which is made the source of all the great rivers of Africa, but it is less easy to suggest what gave rise to this idea of it. The actual name seems taken from the State of Zimmé (see JANGOMAY) or Chiang-mai.

c. 1544.—"So proceeding onward, he arrived at the Lake of Singijamor, which ordinarily is called Chiammay. . . ."—F. M. Pinto, Cogan's tr., p. 271.

1552.—"The Lake of Chiamai, which stands to the northward, 200 leagues in the interior, and from which issue six notable streams, three of which combining with others form the great river which passes through the midst of Siam, whilst the other three discharge into the Gulf of Bengal."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

"Olha o rio Menão, que se deerrama Do grande lago, que Chiamai so chama."—Cambes. x. 126.

1662.—"The Country of these Brames . . . extendeth Northwards from the nearest Pagan Kingdomes . . . watered with many great and remarkable Rivers, issuing from the Lake Chiamay, which though 600 miles from the Sea, and emptying itself continually into so many Channels, contains 400 miles in compass, and is nevertheless full of waters for the one or the other."—P. Heylin's Cosmographic, ii. 238.

CHICANE, CHICANERY. as.

These English words, signifying pettifogging, captious contention, taking every possible advantage in a contest, have been referred to Spanish chico, 'little,' and to Fr. chic, chiquet, 'a little bit,' as by Mr. Wedgwood in his Dict. of Eng. Etymology. See also quotation from Saturday Review below. But there can be little doubt that the words are really traceable to the game of chaugan, or horse-golf. This game is now well known in England under the name of Polo (q.v.). But the recent introduction under that name is its second importation into Western Europe. For in the Middle Ages it came from Persia to Byzantium, where it was popular under a modification of its Persian name (verb چاگان, playing ground چاگانی), and from Byzantium it passed, as a pedestrian game, to Languedoc, where it was called, by a further modification, chicanes (see
CHICANE, CHICANERY. 191

Ducange, Dissertations sur l'Histoire de St. Louis, viii., and his Glossarium Gracilatiss., s.v. 341 (f. 7 v.); also Ouseley's Travels, i. 345. The analogy of certain periods of the game of golf suggests how the figurative meaning of chicane might arise in taking advantage of the petty accidents of the surface. And this is the strict meaning of chicane, as used by military writers.

Ducange's idea was that the Greeks had borrowed both the game and the name from France, but this is evidently erroneous. He was not aware of the Persian chaugádn. But he explains well how the tactics of the game would have led to the application of its name to "those tortuous proceedings of pleaders which we old practitioners call barres." The indication of the Persian origin of both the Greek and French words is due to W. Ouseley and to Quatremère. The latter has an interesting note, full of his usual wealth of Oriental reading, in his translation of Makrizi's Mameluks Sultans, tom. i. pt. i. pp. 121 seqq.

The preceding etymology was put forward again in Notes upon Mr. Wedgwood's Dictionary published by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways, Sept. 1872, p. 186. The same etymology has since been given by Littré (s.v.), who says: "Des lors, la série des sens est: jeu de mail, puis action de disputer la partie, et enfin manœuvres procèseuses"; [and is accepted by the N.E.D. with the reservation that "evidence actually connecting the French with the Greek word appears not to be known.

The P. forms of the name are chaugádn and chaugánd; but according to the Bahári 'Ajam (a great Persian dictionary compiled in India, 1768) the primitive form of the word is chaugádn from chail, "bent," which (as to the form) is corroborated by the Arabic sauvádn. On the other hand, a probable origin of chaugádn would be an Indian (Praekrit) word, meaning "four corners" [Platte gives chaugáma, "four-fold"], viz. as a name for the polo-ground. The chaugán is possibly a "striving after meaning." The meanings are according to Vullers (1) any stick with a crook; (2) such a stick used as a drumstick; (3) a crook from which a steel ball is suspended, which was one of the royal insignia, otherwise called kaukaba [see Blochmann, Ain, vol. i. plate ix. No. 2];

(4) (The golf-stick, and) the game of horse-golf.

The game is now quite extinct in Persia and Western Asia, surviving only in certain regions adjoining India, as is specified under Polo. But for many centuries it was the game of kings and courts over all Mahommédan Asia. The earliest Mahommédan historians represent the game of chaugádn as familiar to the Sassanian kings; Ferdusi puts the chaugádn-stick into the hands of Siáwush, the father of Ká Khusrú or Cyrus; many famous kings were devoted to the game, among whom may be mentioned Núrúdinn the Just, Atábék of Syria and the great enemy of the Crusaders. He was so fond of the game that he used (like Akbar in after days) to play it by lamp-light, and was severely rebuked by a devout Mussulman for being so devoted to a mere amusement. Other zealous chaugádn-players were the great Saládín, Jaláluddín Mankbarní of Khwárízm, and Malík Bibars, Marco Polo's "Bendóquedárd Soldán of Babylon," who was said more than once to have played chaugádn at Damascus and at Cairo within the same week. Many illustrious persons also are mentioned in Asiatic history as having met their death by accidents in the maúdán, as the chaugádn-field was especially called; e.g. Kútúbúddín Íbák of Delhi, who was killed by such a fall at Lahore in (or about) 1207. In Makrizi (i. i. 121) we read of an Amír at the Mameluke Court called Húsamúddín Lajín 'Azízí the Jukándár (or Lord High Polo-stick).

It is not known when the game was conveyed to Constantinople, but it must have been not later than the beginning of the 8th century.* The fullest description of the game as played there is given by Johannes Cinnámus (c. 1190), who does not however give the barbarian name:

"The winter now being over and the gloom cleared away, he (the Emperor Manuel Comnenus) devoted himself to a certain sober exercise which from the first had been the custom of the Emperors and their sons to practise. This is the manner thereof. A party of young men divide into two equal bands, and in a flat space which has been measured out purposely they cast a leather ball in size somewhat like an apple; and setting this in the middle as if it were a prize to be contended for they rush into the contest at full speed, each grasping in his right hand a stick of moderate length which comes suddenly to a broad rounded end, the middle of which is closed by a network of dried catgut. Then each party strives who shall first send the ball beyond the goal planted conspicuously on the opposite side, for whenever the ball is struck by the netted stick through the goal at either side, that gives the victory to the other side. This is the kind of game, evidently a slippery and dangerous one. For a player must be continually throwing himself right back, or bending to one side or the other, as he turns his horse short, or suddenly dashes off at speed, with such strokes and twists as are needed to follow up the ball. And thus as the Emperor was rushing round in furious fashion in this game, it so happened that the horse which he rode came violently to the ground. He was prostrate below the horse, and as he struggled vainly to extricate himself from its incumbent weight his thigh and hand were crushed beneath the saddle and much injured. . . ."—In Bonn ed. pp. 263-264.

We see from this passage that at Byzantium the game was played with a kind of racket, and not with a polo-stick. We have not been able to find an instance of the medieval French chicane in this sense, nor does Littre's Dictionary give any. But Ducange states positively that in his time the word in this sense survived in Languedoc, and there could be no better evidence. From Henschel's Ducange also we borrow a quotation which shows choca, used for some game of ball, in French-Latin, surely a form of chawdn or chicane.

The game of chawdn, the ball (gē or gavi) and the playing-ground (maidān) afford constant metaphors in Persian literature.

c. 940.—"If a man dream that he is on horseback along with the King himself, or some great personage, and that he strikes the chukran (froa τρυκαρίς) he shall find grace and favour thereupon, conformable to the success of his ball and the dexterity of his horse." Again: "If the King dream that he has won in the chukran (βρή τρυκαρίς) he shall find things prosper with him."—The Dream Judgments of Achmet Ibn Seirim, from a MS. Greek version quoted by Ducange in Oeuv. Graciani.

c. 1560.—"His Majesty also plays at chawdn in dark nights . . . the balls which are used at night are set on fire . . . For the sake of adding splendour to the games . . . His Majesty has knobs of gold and silver fixed to the tops of the chawdn sticks. If one of them breaks, any player that gets hold of the pieces may keep them."—Ata-i-Akbars, i. 298; [ii. 303].

1837.—"The game of chowghun mentioned by Baber is still played everywhere in Tibet; it is nothing but 'hockey on horseback,' and is excellent fun."—Vigne, in J. A. S. Bengal, vi. 774.

In the following I would say, in justice to the great man whose words are quoted, that chicane is used in the quasi-military sense of taking every possible advantage of the ground in a contest:

1761.—"I do suspect that some of the great Ones have had hopes given to them that the Dutch may be induced to join us in this war against the Spaniards,—if such an Event should take place I fear some sacrifices will be made in the East Indies—I pray God my suspicions may be without foundation. I think Delays and Chicanery is allowable against those who take Advantage of the times, our Distresses, and situation." —Unpublished Holograph Letter from Lord Clive, in India Office Records. Dated Berkeley Square, and indorsed 27th Decr. 1761.

1881.—"One would at first sight be inclined to derive the French chic from the English 'cheek'; but it appears that the English is itself the derived word, chic being an old Romance word signifying finesse, or subtlety, and forming the root of our own word chicanery."—Sat. Rev., Sept. 10, p. 326 (Essay on French Slang).

a. H.—P. chik; a kind of screen-blind made of finely-slit bamboo, laced with twine, and often painted on the outer side. It is hung or framed in doorways or windows, both in houses and in tents. The thing [which is described by Roe, may possibly have come in with the Mongols, for we find in Kovalefski's Mongol Dict. (2174) "Tchik=Natte." The Ain (i. 226) has chigh. Chicks are now made in London, as well as imported from China and Japan. Chicks are described by Clavijo in the tents of Timour's chief wife:

1404.—"And this tent had two doors, one in front of the other, and the first door was of certain thin coloured wands, joined one to another like in a hurdle, and covered on the outside with a texture of rose-coloured silk, and finely woven; and these doors were made in this fashion, in order that when shut the air might yet enter, whilst those within could see those outside, but those outside could not see those who were within."—§ cxxvi.

[1618.—His wife "whose Curiosity made them break a little hole in a grate of reeds that hung before it to gaze on me."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 321.]

1673.—"Glass is dear, and scarcely purchasable... therefore their Windows are usually folding doors, screened with Cheeks or latisses."—Fryer, 92.

The pron. cheek is still not uncommon among English people:—"The Coach where the Women were was covered with cheeks, a sort of hanging Curtain, made with Bents variously coloured with Lacker, and Chequered with Packthread so artificially that you see all without, and yourself within unperceived."—Fryer, 80.

1810.—"Cheeks or Screens to keep out the glare."—Williams, V. M. ii. 43.

1825.—"The check of the tent prevents effectually any person from seeing what passes within..."—Heber (ed. 1844), i. 192.

b. Short for chicken, a sum of four rupees. This is the Venetian zecchino, ecchino, or sequin, a gold coin long current on the shores of India, and which still frequently turns up in treasure-trove, and in hoards. In the early part of the 15th century Nicolo Conti mentions that in some parts of India, Venetian ducats, i.e. sequins, were current (p. 30). And recently, in fact in our own day, chick was a term in frequent Anglo-Indian use, e.g. "I'll bet you a chick."

The word zecchino is from the Zeca, or Mint at Venice, and that name is of Arabic origin, from sikka, 'a coining die.' The double history of this word is curious. We have just seen how in one form, and by what circuitous secular journey, through Egypt, Venice, India, it has gained a place in the Anglo-Indian Vocabulary. By a directer route it has also found a distinct place in the same repository under the form Sicca (q.v.), and in this shape it still retains a ghostly kind of existence at the India Office. It is remarkable how first the spread of Saracenic power and civilisation, then the spread of Venetian commerce and coinage, and lastly the spread of English commerce and power, should thus have brought together two words identical in origin, after so widely divergent a career.

The sequin is sometimes called in the South shadross, because the Doge with his sceptre is taken for the Shadr, or toddy-drawer climbing the palm-tree! [See Burnett, Linneotumen, i. 243.] (See also VENETIAN.)

We apprehend that the gambling phrases 'chicken-stakes' and 'chicken-hazard' originate in the same word.

CHICKEN, s. Embroidery; Chickenwalla, an itinerant dealer in embroidered handkerchiefs, petticoats, and such like. P. chikin or chikin, 'art needlework.' [At Lucknow, the chief centre of the manufacture, this embroidery was formerly done in silk; the term is now applied to hand-worked flowered muslin. (See Hoey, Monograph, 88, Yusuf Ali, 89.)]

CHICKORE, s. The red-legged partridge, or its close congener Coccabas chukor, Gray. It is common in the Western Himalayas, in the N. Punjab, and in Afghanistan. The francoisin of Moorcroft's Travels is really the chickore. The name appears to be Skt. chakora, and this dispose of the derivation formerly suggested by one of the present writers, as from the Mongol tsokhor, 'dappled or pied' (a word, moreover, which the late Prof. Schiefner informed us is only applied to horses). The name is sometimes applied to other birds. Thus, according to Cunningham, it is applied in Ladak to the Snow-cock (Tetraogallus Himalayensis, Gray), and he appears to give chd-kor as meaning 'white-bird' in Tibetan. Jerdon gives 'snow chukor' and 'strath-chukor' as sportsmen's names for this fine bird. And in Bengal Proper the name is applied, by local English sportsmen, to the large handsome partridge (Ortygornis gularis, Tem.) of Eastern Bengal, called in H. kaiyj or ban-titar ('forest partridge'). See Jerdon, ed. 1877, ii. 576. Also the birds described in the extract from Mr. Abbott below do not appear to have been caccabis (which he speaks of in the same journal as 'red-legged partridge'). And the use of the word by Persians (apparently) is notable; it does not appear in Persian dictionaries. There is probably some mistake. The birds spoken of may have been the Large Sand-grouse (Pterocles cameraria, Pal.), which in both Persia and Afghanistan is called by names meaning 'Black-breast.' The belief that the chickore eats fire, mentioned in the quotation below, is probably from some verbal misconception (quasi dīsh-khōr?). [This is hardly probable as the idea that the partridge drinks the moonbeams is as old as the Brahma Vaivarta Purāṇa: "O Lord, I drink in with the partridges of my eyes thy face full of nectar, which resembles the full moon of autumn." Also see Katha Sarit Sāgara, tr. by Mr. Tawney (ii. 243), who has kindly given the above references.] Jerdon states that the Afghans call the bird the 'Fire-eater.'

c. 1190.—"... plantains and fruits, Koils, Chakors, peascococks, Sandoes, beautiful to behold."—The Prāthīrdīja Rānam of Chand Bardat, in Ind. Ant. i. 275.

In the following passage the word cator is supposed by the editor to be a clerical error for cakor or chacor.

1298.—"The Emperor has had several little houses erected in which he keeps in mew a huge number of cators, which are what we call the Great Partridge."—Marco Polo (2nd ed.), i. 287.

1520.—"Haidar Alemdār had been sent by me to the Kafers. He met me below the Pass of Bāttj, accompanied by some of their chiefs, who brought with them a few skins of wine. While coming down the Pass, he saw prodigious numbers of Chikura."—Baker, 282.

1814.—"... partridges, quails, and a bird which is called Cupk by the Persians and Afghans, and the ill Chikore by the Indians, and which I understand is known in Europe by the name of the Greek Partridge." — Elphinstone's Cawool, ed. 1839, i. 192; "the same bird which is called Chilaw by the natives and fire-eater by the English in Bengal." — Ibid. ii. 96.

c. 1815. "One day in the fort he found a hill-partridge enclosed in a wicker basket.

This bird is called the chukoor, and is said to eat fire."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog., 440.

1850. "A flight of birds attracted my attention; I imagine them to be a species of bustard or grouse—black beneath and with much white about the wings—they were beyond our reach; the people called them chukure." — K. Abbott, Notes during a Journey in Persia, in J. R. Geog. Soc. xxv. 41.

CHILAW, n.p. A place on the west coast of Ceylon, an old seat of the pearl-fishery. The name is a corruption of the Tam. saldhabam, 'the diving'; in Sinhalee it is Halavatta. The name was commonly applied by the Portuguese to the whole aggregation of shoals (Baixos de Chilao) in the Gulf of Manaar, between Ceylon and the coast of Madura and Tinnevelly.

1543. "Shoals of Chilao." See quotation under BEADALA.

1610. "La pesqueria de Chilao ... por haverse antiguamente in un puerto del mismo nombre en la isla de Selayan ... llamado asi por ista causa; por que chilao, en lengua Chinglea ... quiere decir pesqueria." — Teixeira, Pt. ii. 29.

CHILLUM, s. H. chilam; "the part of the hukta (see HOOKA) which contains the tobacco and charcoal balls, whence it is sometimes loosely used for the pipe itself, or the act of smoking it." (Wilson). It is also applied to the replenishment of the bowl, in the same way as a man asks for "another glass." The tobacco, as used by the masses in the hubble-bubble, is cut small and kneaded into a pulp with goor, i.e. molasses, and a little water. Hence actual contact with glowing charcoal is needed to keep it alight.

1781. "Dressing a hubble-bubble, per week at 3 chillum a day.

2s. 0. 6d. 3s. 3d. 0." — Prison Experiences in Captivity of Hon. J. Lindsay, in Lives of Laidneys, iii.

1811. "They have not the same scruples for the Chillum as for the rest of the Hooka, and it is often lent ... whereas the very proposition for the Hooka gives rise frequently to the most ridiculous quarrels." — Soleyza, iii.

1828. "Every sound was hushed but the noise of that wind ... and the occasional bubbling of my hookah, which had just been furnished with another chillum." — The Kuzzibook, i. 2.

1829. "Tugging away at your hookah, find no smoke; a thief having purloined your silver chilam and purpooce." — John Ship, ii. 159.

1848. "Joe however ... could not think of moving till his baggage was cleared, or of travelling until he could do so with his chillum." — Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxiii.

CHILLUMBRUM, n.p. A town in S. Aroet, which is the site of a famous temple of Siva, properly Shidamburam. Etym. obscure. [Garstin (Man. S. Aroet, 400) gives the name as Chedambram, or more correctly Chittambalam, 'the atmosphere of wisdom.']

1755. "Scheringham (Seringam), Schalembrum; and Gengey m'offrient également la retraite après laquelle je soupirais." — Anquetil du Perron, Sendav. Disc. Prelim. xxviii.

CHILLUMCHEE, s. H. chilamchi, also siflich, and sifpecht, of which chilamchi is probably a corruption. A basin of brass (as in Bengal), or tinned copper (as usually in the West and South) for washing hands. The form of the word seems Turkish, but we cannot trace it.

1715. "We prepared for our first present, viz., 1000 gold mohurs ... the unicorn's horn ... the azote (!) and chalumchee of Manilla work." ... In Wheeler, ii. 248.

1833. "Our supper was a peelor ... when it was removed a chillumchee and goblet of warm water was handed round, and each washed his hands and mouth." — P. Gordon, Fragment of the Journal of a Tour, &c.

1851. "When a Chillumchee of water sans soap was provided, 'Have you no soap!?' Sir C. Napier asked ——" — Maxwell, Indian Command of Sir C. Napier.

1857. "I went alone to the Fort Adjutant, to report my arrival, and inquire to what regiment of the Bengal army I was likely to be posted. "Army! — regiment!" was the reply. 'There is no Bengal Army; it is all in revolt ... Provide yourself with a campbedstead, and a chillumchee, and wait for orders.' "I saluted and left the presence of my superior officer, deeply pondering as to the possible nature and qualities of a chillumchee, but not venturing to inquire further." — Lt.-Col. Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 3.

There is an Anglo-Indian tradition, which we would not vouch for, that one of the orators on the great Hastings trial depicted the oppressor on some occasion, as "grasping his chillum in one hand and his chillumchee in the other."

The latter word is used chiefly by Anglo-Indians of the Bengal Presidency and their servants. In Bombay the article has another name. And it is told of a gallant veteran of the old Bengal Artillery, who was full of "Presidential" prejudices, that on hearing the Bombay army commended by a brother officer, he broke out in just wrath: "The Bombay Army! Don't talk to me of the Bombay Army! They call a chillumchee a grindy!—THE BEASTS!"

CHILLY. s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the pod of red pepper (Capsicum frutescens and C. annum, Nat. Ord. Solanaceae). There can be little doubt that the name, as stated by Bontius in the quotation, was taken from Chili in S. America, whence the plant was carried to the Indian Archipelago, and thence to India.

1604.—"... Indian pepper. ... In the language of Cusco, it is called Vehu, and in that of Mexico, chilli."—Grinnaton, tr. D'Acosta, H. W. Indies, I. Bk. iv. 269 (Starnf. Dict.)

1681.—"... eos addere fructum Ricini Americani, quod lada Chili Malaii vocant, quasi diess Piper e Chili, Brasiliae contermina regione."—J. Bontius, Dial. V. p. 10.

Again (lib. vi. cap. 40, p. 131) Bontius calls it 'piper Chilense,' and also 'Ricinus Brazilensis.' But his commentator, Piso, observes that Ricinus is quite improper; "vera Piperis sive Capsici Brazilensis species apparent." Bontius says it was a common custom of natives, and even of certain Dutchmen, to keep a piece of chillly continually chewed, but he found it intolerable.

1848.—"... Try a chilli with it, Miss Sharp," said Joseph, really interested. "A chilli?" said Rebecca, gasping. "Oh yes!..." How fresh and green they look," she said, and put one into her mouth. It was hotter than the curry; flesh and blood could bear it no longer."—Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

CHIMNEY-GLASS, s. Gardener's name, on the Bombay side of India, for the flower and plant Akamandha cathartica (Sir G. Birdwood).

CHINA, n.p. The European knowledge of this name in the forms Thinae and Sinas goes back nearly to the Christian era. The famous mention of the Sinim by the prophet Isaiah would carry us much further back, but we fear the possibility of that referring to the Chinese must be abandoned, as must be likewise, perhaps, the similar application of the name Chinas in ancient Sanskrit works. The most probable origin of the name—which is essentially a name applied by foreigners to the country—as yet suggested, is that put forward by Baron F. von Richthofen, that it comes from Jih-nan, an old name of Tongking, seeing that in Jih-nan lay the only port which was open for foreign trade with China at the beginning of our era, and that that province was then included administratively within the limits of China Proper (see Richthofen, China, i. 504-510; the same author's papers in the Trans. of the Berlin Geog. Soc. for 1876; and a paper by one of the present writers in Proc. R. Geog. Soc., November 1882.)

Another theory has been suggested by our friend M. Terrien de la Coperie in an elaborate note, of which we can but state the general gist. Whilst he quite accepts the suggestion that Kiao-chi or Tongking, anciently called Kiao-ti, was the Kaitsiga of Ptolemy's authority, he denies that Jih-nan can have been the origin of Sinas. This he does on two chief grounds: (1) That Jih-nan was not Kiao-chi, but a province a good deal further south, corresponding to the modern province of An (Nghe An, in the map of M. Dutreuil de Rhins, the capital of which is about 2° 17' in lat. S. of Hanoi). This is distinctly stated in the Official Geography of Annam. An was one of the twelve provinces of Cochin China proper till 1820-41, when, with two others, it was transferred to Tongking. Also, in the Chinese Historical Atlas, Jih-nan lies in Chenching, i.e. Cochin-China. (2) That the ancient pronunciation of Jih-nan, as indicated by the Chinese authorities of the Han period, was Nit-nam. It is still pronounced in Sinico-Annamite (the most archaic of the Chinese dialects) Nhat-nam, and in Cantonese Yat-nam. M. Terrien further points out that the export of Chinese goods, and the traffic with the south and west, was for several centuries B.C. monopolised by the State of Tsien (now pronounced in Sinico-Annamite Chen, and in Mandarin Tien), which corresponded to the centre and west of modern Yun-nan. The She-ki of Sze-ma Tsien (B.C. 91), and the Annals of the Han Dynasty afford interesting information on this subject. When the Emperor Wu-ti, in consequence of Chang-Kien's information brought back from Bactria, sent envoys to find the route followed by the traders of Shuh (i.e. Sze-chuen) to India, these envoys were detained by Tang-Kiang, King of Tsien, who objected to their exploring trade-routes through his territory, saying haughtily: "Has the Han a greater dominion than ours?"

M. Terrien conceives that as the only communication of this Tsen State with the Sea would be by the Song-Koi R., the emporium of sea-trade with that State would be at its mouth, viz. at Kiasoti or Kattigara. Thus, he considers, the name of Tsen, this powerful and arrogant State, the monopoliser of trade-routes, is in all probability that which spread far and wide the name of Chin, Sin, Sinas, Thinas, and preserved its predominance in the mouths of foreigners, even when, as in the 2nd century of our era, the great Empire of the Han has extended over the Delta of the Song-Koi.

This theory needs more consideration than we can now give it. But it will doubtless have discussion elsewhere, and it does not disturb Richthofen's identification of Kattigara.

[Prof. Giles regards the suggestions of Richthofen and T. de la Couperie as mere guesses. From a recent re-consideration of the subject he has come to the conclusion that the name may possibly be derived from the name of a dynasty, Ch'in or Tan, which flourished B.C. 255-207, and became widely known in India, Persia, and other Asiatic countries, the final a being added by the Portuguese.]

CHINA.

C. 1800.—"Large ships, called in the language of China 'junks,' bring various sorts of choice merchandize and cloths. . . ."—Reahtuddin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1516.—". . . there is the Kingdom of China, which they say is a very extensive dominion, both along the coast of the sea, and in the interior. . . ."—Barbarossa, 204.

1563.—"R. Then Ruelius and Mathioli of Siena say that the best camphor is from China, and that the best of all Camphor is that purified by a certain barbarian King whom they call King (of) China.

"O. Then you may tell Ruelius and Mathioli of Siena that though they are so well acquainted with Greek and Latin, there's no need to make such a show of it as to call every body 'barbarians' who is not of their own race, and that besides this they are quite wrong in the fact . . . that the King of China does not occupy himself with making camphor, and is in fact one of the greatest Kings known in the world. . . ."—Garcia De Orta, f. 456.

C. 1600.—"Near to this is Pegu, which former writers called Cessen, accounting this to be the capital city."—Ayesen, ed. 1600, ii. 4; [tr. Jarett, ii. 119]. (See MACEDON.)

CHINA, a. In the sense of porcelain this word (Chint, &c.) is used in Asiatic languages as well as in English. In English it does not occur in Minshew (2nd ed. 1627), though it does in some earlier publications. [The earliest quotation in N.E.D. is from Cogan's Pinto, 1663.] The phrase China-dishes as occurring in Drake and in Shakespere, shows how the word took the sense of porcelain in our own and other languages. The phrase China-dishes as first used was analogous to Turkey-carpets. But in the latter we have never lost the geographical sense of the adjective. In the word turquoises, again, the phrase was no doubt originally pierres turquoises, or the like, and here, as in china dishes, the specific has superseded the generic sense. The use of arab in India for an Arab horse is analogous to china. The word is used in the sense of a china dish in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. 492; [Burton, i. 375].

851.—"There is in China a very fine clay with which they make vases transparent like bottles; water can be seen inside of them. These vases are made of clay."—Reinaud, Relations, i. 34.

C. 1350.—"China-ware (al-fakhrāh al-Sūrī) is not made except in the cities of Zaltūn and of Sin Kalān. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 256.

C. 1580.—"I was passing one day along a street in Damascus, when I saw a slave-boy let fall from his hands a great China dish (pahfatt mi-al-bakhkār al-Sūrī) which they call in that country sahn. It broke, and a crowd gathered round the little Mameluks."—Ibn Batuta, i. 288.

1587.—"Le mercantile ch'anduano ogn' anno da Goa a Benzerger erano molti caussili Arabi . . . e anche pezzi di China, zafaran, e scarlatti."—Cesare de' Federici, in Raminun, iii. 889.

1579.—". . . we met with one ship more laden with linnen, China smike, and China dishes. . . ."—Drake, World Encompassed, in Hak. Soc. 112.

C. 1580.—"Usum vaseorum aureorum et argentorum Aegyptii rejecerunt ubi murphy vasa adinnervem ; quae ex India afferuntur, et ex eis regione quam Smī vocant, ubi conficiuntur ex variis lapidibus, præcipueque ex jasiphe."—Prop. Alpinus, Pt. 1. p. 56.

C. 1590.—"The gold and silver dishes are tied up in red cloths, and those in Copper and China (chin) in white ones."—Ains., i. 58.

C. 1608.—". . . as it were in a fruit-dish, a dish of some three pence, thy honour's have seen such dishes; they are not China dishes, but very good dishes."—Measure for Measure, ii. 1.

1608—9.—"A faire China dish (which cost ninetie Rupiuas, or forty-five Reals of eight) was broken."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 220.

1609.—"He has a lodging in the Strand for the purpose, or to watch when ladies are gone to the China-house, or the Exchange, that he may meet them by chance and give them presents. . . ."

"Ay, sir: his wife was the rich Chinawoman, that the courtiers visited so often."—Ben Jonson, Silent Woman, i. 1.

1615.—". . . Oh had I now my Wishes, Sure you should learn to make their China Dishes."—Doggrel prefixed to Coryat's Crudities.

C. 1690.—Kaeempfer in his account of the Persian Court mentions that the department where porcelain and plate dishes, &c., were kept and cleaned was called Chih-kihan, or the China-closet; and those servants who carried in the dishes were called Chinikrah.

1711.—"Purselains, or China-ware is so tender a Commodity that good Instructions are as necessary for Package as Purchase."—Lockyer, 126.

1747.—"The Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy; which far Exceeds any Thing of the Kind yet Published. By a Lady. London. Printed for the Author, and Sold by Mrs. Asburn a China Shop Woman, Corner of Fleet Ditch, MDCXLVII." This the title of the original edition of Mrs. glass's Cookery, as given by G. A. Sala, in Nid. News, May 12, 1888.
1876. — "Schuyler mentions that the best native earthenware in Turkistan is called Chint, and bears a clumsy imitation of a Chinese mark." — (See "Turkistan," i. 187.)

For the following interesting note on the Arabic use we are indebted to Professor Robertson Smith:

Shinay is spoken of thus in the Latifol' ma'rif of al-Thalibi, ed. De Jong, Leyden, 1867, a book written in A.D. 960. "The Arabs were wont to call all elegant vessels and the like Shinay (i.e. Chinese), whatever they really were, because of the specialty of the Chinese in objects of vertu; and this usage remains in the common word šišat (pl. of šiša) to the present day.

So in the Tujda-d-r-Ωmam of Ibn Maskowain (Fr. Hist. Ar. ii. 457), it is said that at the wedding of Mamun with Būrān "her grandmother strewed over her 1000 pearls from a šiša of gold." In Egypt the familiar round brass trays used to dine off, are now called šiša (vaša šiša, [the šiša, sent of N. India] and so is a European saucer.

The expression šišat al šiša, "A Chinese šiša," is quoted again by De Goeje from a poem of Abul-shibl Aga, xiii. 27. [See SNEAKER.]

[1615. — "I carid a jarr of China Beare." — Cock's Diary, 1. 34.]

CHINA-BUCKER, n. p. One of the chief Delta-mouths of the Irawadi is so called in marine charts. We have not been able to ascertain the origin of the name, further than that Prof. Forchhammer, in his Notes on the Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma (p. 16), states that the country between Rangoon and Bassin, i.e. on the west of the Rangoon River, bore the name of Pokhara, of which Buckere is a corruption. This does not explain the China.

CHINA-ROOT, n. p. A once famous drug, known as Radix Chinesae and Tuber Chinesae, being the tuber of various species of Smilax (N. O. Smilaccae, the same to which sarsaparilla belongs). It was said to have been used with good effect on Charles V. when suffering from gout, and acquired a great repute. It was also much used in the same way as sarsaparilla. It is now quite obsolete in England, but is still held in esteem in the native pharmacopoeias of China and India.

1563. — "R. I wish to take to Portugal some of the Root or Wood of China, since it is not a contraband drug. . . .

"O. This wood or root grows in China, an immense country, presumed to be on the confines of Muscovy . . . and because in all these regions, both in China and in Japan, there exists the marbo napocatano, the merciful God hath willed to give them this root for remady, and with it the good physicians there know well the treatment."

—Garcia, t. 177.

C. 1590. — "Sirar Silhet is very mountainous. . . China-Root (shob-chint) is produced here in great plenty, which was but lately discovered by some Turks." — Ayers Abb., by Gladwin, ii. 10; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 124].

1595. — "The roots of China is commonlie used among the Egyptian . . . specially for a consump[ti]on, for the which they seeth the roots China in broth of a henne or cooke, whereby they become whole and faire of face."—Dr. Patulaman, in Linschoten, 124, [Hak. Soc. ii. 112].

C. 1610. — "Quant à la verole, . . . Ils la guerissent sans surve du bois d'Eschine. . . ."—Pyrrard de Laval, ii. 9 (ed. 1679); [Hak. Soc. ii. 13; also see i. 182].

CHINAPATAM, n. p. A name sometimes given by the natives to Madras. The name is now written Shennai-Shenna-ppanam, Tam., in Tel. Chennapatamam, and the following is the origin of that name according to the statement given in W. Hamilton's Hindostan.

On this part of the Coast of Coromandel . . . the English . . . possessed no fixed establishment until A.D. 1639, in which year, on the Ist of March, a grant was received from the descendants of the Hindoo dynasty of Bijanagur, then reigning at Chandergherry, for the erection of a fort. This document from Sree Rung Rayasell expressly enjoins, that the town and fort to be erected at Madras shall be called after his own name, Sree Rungp Rayapatam; but the local governor or Nalk, Damerla Vencatadi, who first invited Mr. Francis Day, the chief of Armagon, to remove to Madras, had previously intimated to him that he would have the new English establishment founded in the name of his father Chenappa, and the name of Chenapapalam continues to be universally applied to the town of Madras by the natives of that division of the south of India named Dravida." — (Vol. ii. p. 413).

Dr. Burnell doubted this origin of the name, and considered that the actual name could hardly have been formed from that of Chenappa. It is possible that some name similar to

CHINCHEW, CHINCHEO, n.p.
A port of Fuhkien in China. Some ambiguity exists as to the application of the name. In English charts the name is now attached to the ancient and famous port of Chwan-chau-fu (Thsiovan-chou-fou of French writers), the Zayton of Marco Polo and other medieval travellers. But the Chincheo of the Spaniards and Portuguese to this day, and the Chincheo of the more recent English books, is, as Mr. G. Phillips pointed out some years ago, not Chwan-chau-fu, but Chang-chau-fu, distant from the former some 80 m. in a direct line, and about 140 by navigation. The province of Fuhkien is often called Chincheo by the early Jesuit writers. Changchau and its dependencies seem to have constituted the ports of Fuhkien with which Macao and Manilla communicated, and hence apparently they applied the same name to the port and the province, though Chang-chau was never the official capital of Fuhkien (see Encyc. Britann., 9th ed. a.v. and references there). Chincheos is used for "people of Fuhkien" in a quotation under COMPUND.

1517.—"... in another place called Chincheo, where the people were much richer than in Canton (Cantão). From that city used every year, before our people came to Malaca, to come to Malaca 4 junks loaded with gold, silver, and silk, returning laden with wares from India."—Correa, ii. 529.

CHIN-CHEIN. In the "pigeon English" of Chinese ports this signifies "salutation, compliments," or "to salute," and is much used by Englishmen as slang in such senses. It is a corruption of the Chinese phrase ts'ing-ts'ing, Pekingese chinching, a term of salutation answering to "thank-you," "adieu." In the same vulgar dialect chin-chin joss means religious worship of any kind (see JOSS). It is curious that the phrase occurs in a quaint story told to William of Rubruck by a Chinese priest whom he met at the Court of the Great Kaan (see below). And it is equally remarkable to find the same story related with singular closeness of correspondence out of "the Chinese books of Geography" by Francesco Carletti, 350 years later (in 1600). He calls the creatures Zinzin (Ragionamenti di F. C., pp. 138-9).

1253.—"One day there sate by me a certain priest of Cathay, dressed in a red cloth of exquisite colour, and when I asked him whence they got such a dye, he told me how in the eastern parts of Cathay there were lofty cliffs on which dwelt certain creatures in all things resembling of human form, except that their knees did not bend. . . . The hunters go thither, taking very strong beer with them, and make holes in the rocks which they fill with this beer. . . . Then they hide themselves and these creatures come out of their holes and taste the liquor, and call out 'Chin Chin.'—Itinerarium, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv. 328.

Probably some form of this phrase is intended in the word used by Pinto in the following passage, which Cogan leaves untranslated:

C. 1540.—"So after we had saluted one another after the manner of the Country, they went and anchored by the shore" (in orig. "despois de se fazerem as suas e aos nossas saldras a Charachima, como entre este gente se custuma")—in Cogan, p. 58; in orig. ch. xlvi.

1795.—"The two junior members of the Chinese deputation came at the appointed hour. . . . On entering the door of the marquee they both made an abrupt stop, CHINSURA, n.p. A town on the Hooghly River, 26 miles above Calcutta, on the west bank, which was the seat of a Dutch settlement and factory down to 1824, when it was ceded to us by the Treaty of London, under which the Dutch gave up Malacca and their settlements in continental India, whilst we withdrew from Sumatra. [The place gave its name to a kind of cloth, Chinechuras (see PIECE-GOODS).]

1684.—"This day between 3 and 6 o'clock in the Afternoon, Capt. Richardson and his Sergeant, came to my house in ye Chinchera, and brought me this following message from ye President. . . ."—Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 186.

1706.—"Le Loge appelée Chandernagor est une très-belle Maison située sur le bord d'un des bras du fleuve de Gange. . . À une lieue de la Loge il y a une grande Ville appelée Chinechura. . . ."—Lutwiler, 64-65.

1726.—"The place where our Lodge (or Factory) is is properly called Sinternu [i.e. Chinsura] and not Hoogly (which is the name of the village)."—Valentijn, v. 162.

1727.—"Chineshura, where the Dutch Emporium stands . . . the Factories have a great many good Houses standing pleasantly on the River-Side; and all of them have pretty Gardens."—A. Hamilton, ii. 20; ed. 1744, ii. 18.

[1763.—"Shinahura." See quotation under CALCUTTA.]

CHINTS, CHINOH, s. A bug. This word is now quite obsolete both in India and in England. It is a corruption of the Portuguese chinche, which again is from cimez. Mrs. Trollope, in her once famous book on the Domestic Manners of the Americans, made much of a supposed instance of affected squeamishness in American ladies, who used the word chintes instead of bugs. But she was ignorant of the fact that chints was an old and proper name for the objectionable exotic insect, 'bug' being originally but a figurative (and perhaps a polite) term, 'an object of disgust and horror' (Wedgwood). Thus the case was exactly the opposite of what she chose to imagine; chints was the real name, bug the more or less affected euphemism.

1616.—"In the night we were likewise very much disquieted with another sort, called Musquitoes, like our Gnats, but somewhat less; and in that season we were very much troubled with Chinches, another sort of little troublesome and offensive creatures, like little Tikas: and these annoyed us two ways: as first by their biting and stinging, and then by their stink."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 372; [ed. 1777, p. 117].

1645.—". . . for the most part the bedsteads in Italy are of forged iron gilded, since it is impossible to keep the wooden ones from the chimicoes."—Evelyn's Diary, Sept. 29.

1672.—". . . Our Bodies broke out into small fiery Wimples . . . augmented by Musquito-Bites, and Chinches raising Blisters on us."—Fryer, 35.

"Chints are venomous, and if squeezed leave a most Poysonous Stanch."—Ibid. 180.

CHINTZ. s. A printed or spotted cotton cloth; Port. chita; Mahr. chit, and H. chit. The word in this last form occurs (c. 1590) in the Ain-i-Akbār (i. 95). It comes apparently from the Skt. chitra, 'variegated, speckled.' The best chintzes were bought on the Madras coast, at Masulipatam and Sadras. The French form of the word is chince, which has suggested the possibility of our sheet being of the same origin. But chite is apparently of Indian origin, through the Portuguese, whilst sheet is much older than the Portuguese communication with India. Thus (1450) in Sir T. Cumberworth's will he directs his "wretched body to be beryd in a chitte with owte any kyste" (Academy, Sept. 27, 1879, p. 230).
The resemblance to the Indian forms in this is very curious.

1614.—"... chintz and chadors...."
—Peston, in Purchas, i. 590.

[1616.—"3 per Chint bramport."—Cocks's Diary, i. 171.]

[1666.—"Le principal traite des Hollandais à Amedabad, est de chites, qui sont de toiles peintes."—Thuren, v. 35. In the English version (1687) this is written schites (iv. ch. v.).]

1676.—"Chites or Painted Calicuts, which they call Calmendar, that is done with a pencil, are made in the Kingdom of Golconda, and particularly about Masulipatam."—Tavernier, E.T., p. 128; [ed. Ball, ii. 4].

1725.—"The returns that are injurious to our manufactures, or growth of our own country, are printed calicoes, chintz, wrought silks, stuffs, of herbas, and barks."—Defoe, New Voyage round the World. Works, Oxford, 1840, p. 161.

1728.—"The Warehouse Keeper reported to the Board, that the chintzes, being brought from painting, had been examined at the sorting godown, and that it was the general opinion that both the cloth and the paintings were worse than the models."—In Wheeler, ii. 407.

c. 1738.—

"No, let a charming chintz and Brussels lace Wrap my cold limbs, and shade my lifeless face."—Pope, Moral Essays, i. 248.

"And, when she sees her friend in deep despair, Observes how much a Chintz exceeds Mohair...."

Ibid. ii. 170.

1817.—"Blue cloths, and chintzes in particular, have always formed an extensive article of import from Western India."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 86; [2nd ed. i. 95, and comp. i. 190].

In the earlier books about India some kind of chintz is often termed pintado (q.v.). See the phraseology in the quotation from Wheeler above.

This export from India to Europe has long ceased. When one of the present writers was Sub-Collector of the Madras District (1866-67), chintzes were still figured by an old man at Sadras, who had been taught by the Dutch, the cambric being furnished to him by a Madras Chetty (q.v.). He is now dead, and the business has ceased; in fact the colours for the process are no longer to be had.* The former chintz manufactures of Pulicat are mentioned by Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, p. 567. Havart (1833) mentions the manufacture at Sadras (i. 99), and gives a good description of the process of painting these cloths, which he calls chitzen (iii. 13). There is also a very complete account in the Lettres Édifiantes, xiv. 116 seqq.

In Java and Sumatra chintzes of a very peculiar kind of marbled pattern are still manufactured by women, under the name of batik.

CHIPE.

In Portuguese use, from Tamil shippu, 'an oyster.' The pearl-osters taken in the pearl-fisheries of Tuticorin and Manar.

[1602.—"And the fishers on that coast gave him as tribute one day's oysters (hau dia de chite), that is the result of one day's pearl fishing."—Couto, Dec. 7, Bk. VIII. ch. ii.]

1685.—"The chipe, for so they call those

* I leave this passage as Dr. Burnell wrote it. But though limited to a specific locality, of which I doubt not it was true, it conveys the idea of the entire extinction of the ancient chinta production which I find is not justified by the facts, as shown in a most interesting letter from Mr. Furdon Clarke, C.S.I., of the India Museum. One kind is still made at Masulipatam, under the superintendence of Persian merchants, to supply the Indian market and the Mogul traders at Bombay. At Kuntack very peculiarly made, which are entirely Kala Kari work, or hand-painted (apparently the word now used instead of the Calmendar of Tavernier, see above, and under CAlAMANDER). This is a work of infinite labour, as the ground has to be stopped off with wax almost as many times as there are colours used. At Combercorn Sarongs (q.v.) are printed for the Straits. Very bold printing is done at Wallaipat in N. Arcot, for sale to the Moslems at Hyderabad and Bangalore.

An anecdote is told me by Mr. Clarke which indicates a caution as to many things than chinta printing. One particular kind of chinta met with in S. India, he was assured by the vendor, was printed at W——; but he did not recognize the locality. Shortly afterwards, visiting the second time the city of X. (we will call it), where he had already been assured by the collector's native aids that there was no such manufacture, and showing the stuff, with the statement of its being made at W——, 'Why,' said the collector, 'that is where I live!' Immediately behind his bungalow was a small caravan, and in this the work was found going on, though on a small scale. Just so we shall often find persons 'who have been in India, and on the spot' asseverating that at such and such a place there are no missions or no converts; whilst those who have cared to know, know better. (H. Y.)

[For Indian chintzes, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 90 seqq.; Mukarji, Art Manufactures of India, 1845 seqq.; S. H. Hadji, Mon. on Dyes and Dying in the N.W.P. and Oudh, 44 seqq.; Francis, Mon. on Punjab Cotton Industry, 6.]
The Indian Portuguese also use chito for escrito (Bluteau, Supplement). The Tamil people use shit for a ticket, or for a playing-card.

1673.—"I sent one of our Guides, with his Master's Chitty, or Pass, to the Governor, who received it kindly."—Fryer, 128.

1786.—"You are to sell rice, &c., to every merchant from Muscat who brings you a chitty from Meer Kaain."—Tippeo's Letters, 284.

CHITTAGONG, n.p. A town, port, and district of Eastern Bengal, properly written Chatgaun (see PORTO PIQUENO). Chittagong appears to be the City of Bengal of Varthema and some of the early Portuguese. (See BANDEL, BENGAL.)

C. 1846.—"The first city of Bengal that we entered was Sudder, a great place situated on the shore of the great Sea."—Ten Batuw, iv. 212.

1662.—"In the mouths of the two arms of the Ganges enter two notable rivers, one on the east, and one on the west side, both bounding this kingdom (of Bengal); the one of these our people call the River of Chaitagam, because it enters the Eastern estuary of the Ganges at a city of that name, which is the most famous and wealthy of that Kingdom, by reason of its Port, at which meets the traffic of all that Eastern region."—De Barros, Dec. IV. liv. ix. cap. i.

1886.—"Satagam." See quotation under HING.

1891.—"So also they inform me that Antonio de Sousa Goudinho has served me well in Benagua, and that he has made tributary to this state the Island of Bombay, and has taken the fortress of Chattagam by force of arms."—King's Letter, in Archivo Port. Orient., fasc. iii. 257.
1598.—"From this River Eastward 50 miles lyeth the towne of Chatigan, which is the chief towne of Bengal."—Linschoten, ch. xvi. [Hak. Soc. i. 94].

c. 1610.—Pyrard de la Val has Chartican, i. 294; [Hak. Soc. i. 526].

1727.—"Chittagong, or, as the Portuguese call it, Xatigam, about 50 Leagues below Douco."—A. Hamilton, ii. 24; ed. 1744, ii. 22.

1786.—"The province of Chatigan (vulgarly Chittagong) is a noble field for a naturalist. It is so called, I believe, from the chatag, which is the most beautiful little bird I ever saw."—Sir W. Jones, ii. 101.

Elsewhere (p. 81) he calls it a "Montpelier." The derivation given by this illustrious scholar is more than questionable. The name seems to be really a form of the Sanskrit Chaturgrāmanda (= Tetrpolis), [or according to others of Saptagrama, seven villages?], and it is curious that near this position Ptolemy has a Pentapolis, very probably the same place. Chaturgrāmanda is still the name of a town in Ceylon, lat. 6°, long. 81°.

CHITTLEDROOG, n.p. A fort S.W. of Bellary; properly Chitira Purgam, Red Hill (or Hill-Fort, or ['picturesque fort']) called by the Mahommadeans Chitaldur (C. P. B.).

CHITTORE, n.p. Chito or Chitorgarh, a very ancient and famous rock fortress in the Rajput State of Mewar. It is almost certainly the Tadrupa of Ptolemy (vii. 1).

1583.—"Badour (i.e. Bahādur Shāh) . . . in Champanell . . . sent to carry off a quantity of powder and stores for the attack on Chitor, which occasioned some delay because the distance was so great."—Correa, iii. 506.

1615.—"The two and twentieth (Dec.), Master Edwards met me, accompanied with Thomas Coryat, who had passed into India on foot. We dined at Chiter, an ancient Cityt ruined on a hill, but so that it appears a Tombe (Towne!) of wonderfull magnificence. . . ."—Sir Thomas Roe, in Purchas, i. 540; [Hak. CHOBDAAR, s. h. from P. chob-dar, 'a stick-bearer.' A frequent attendant of Indian nobles, and in former days of Anglo-Indian officials of rank. They are still a part of the state of the Viceroy, Governors, and Judges of the High Courts. The chobdars carry a staff overlaid with silver.

1442.—"At the end of the hall stand chobdars . . . drawn up in line."—Abdur-Razak, in India in the XV. Cent. 25.

1673.—"If he (the President) move out of his Chamber, the Silver Staves wait on him."—Pryer, 68.

1701.—". . . Yesterday, of his own accord, he told our Linguists that he had sent four Chobdars and 25 men, as a safeguard."—In Wheeler, i. 371.

1788.—"Chobdar . . . Among the Nabobs he proclaims their praises aloud, as he runs before their palankeens."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale's).

1793.—"They said a Chobdar, with a silverstick, one of the Sultan's messengers of justice, had taken them from the place, where they were confined, to the public Bazar, where their hands were cut off."—D'Inroy, Narrative, 235.

1798.—"The chief's Chobedar . . . also endeavoured to impress me with an ill opinion of these messengers."—G. Forster's Travels, i. 222.

1810.—"While we were seated at breakfast, we were surprised by the entrance of a Chobedar, that is, a servant who attends on persons of consequence, runs before them with a silver stick, and keeps silence at the doors of their apartments, from which last office he derives his name."—Maria Graham, 57.

This usually accurate lady has been here misled, as if the word were chap-dar, 'silence-keeper,' a hardly possible hybrid.

CHOBWA, a. Burmese Tsu-ho-pa, Siamese Chao, 'prince, king,' also Chaokphai (compounded with hpa, 'heaven'), and in Cushing's Shan Dicity, and cacography, sōw, 'lord, master,' sow-ha, a 'hereditary prince.' The word chu-ku, for 'chief,' is found applied among tribes of Kwang-si, akin to the Shan, in A.D. 1160 (Prof. T. de la Couperie). The designation of the princes of the Shan States on the east of Burma, many of whom are (or were till lately) tributary to Ava.
1795.—"After them came the Chobwas, or petty tributary princes: these are personages who, before the Birmans had extended their conquests over the vast territories which they now possess, had held small independent sovereignties which they were able to maintain so long as the balance of power continued doubtful between the Birmans, Peguans, and Siamese."—Symes, 386.

1819.—"All that tract of land... is inhabited by a numerous nation called Sciam, who are the same as the Lacs. Their kingdom is divided into small districts under different chiefs called Zabos, or petty princes."—Sangermano, 34.

1855.—"The Taungwas of all these principalities, even where most absolutely under Ava, retain all the forms and appurtenances of royalty."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 303.

1890.—"The succession to the throne primarily depends upon the person chosen by the court and people being of pronoey descent—all such are called chow or prince."—Halley, A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, p. 32.

CHOGA. s. Turki chophad. A long sleeved garment, like a dressing-gown (a purpose for which Europeans often make use of it). It is properly an Afghan form of dress, and is generally made of some soft woollen material, and embroidered on the sleeves and shoulders. In Bokhara the word is used for a furred robe. ["In Tibetan ch'uda; in Turki juba. It is variously pronounced chuba, juba or chogha in Asia, and shuba or shubka in Russia" (J.R.A.S., N.S. XXIII. 122).]

1883.—"We do not hear of 'shirt-sleeves' in connection with Henry (Lawrence), so often as in John's case; we believe his favourite dihabille was an Afghan choga, which like charity covered a multitude of sins."—Qu. Review, No. 310, on Life of Lord Lawrence, p. 303.

CHOKIDAR. s. A watchman. Derivative in Persian form from Choky. The word is usually applied to a private watchman; in some parts of India he is generally of a thieving tribe, and his employment may be regarded as a sort of blackmail to ensure one's property. [In N. India the village Chaukidar is the rural policeman, and he is also employed for watch and ward in the smaller towns.]

1699.—"And the Day following the Chocdars, or Souldiers were remov'd from before our Gates."—Owings, 416.

1810.—"The choky dar attends during the day, often performing many little offices, . . . at night parading about with his spear, shield, and sword, and assuming a most terrific aspect, until all the family are asleep; when he says TO SLEEP TOO."—Williamson, V. M. i. 295.

c. 1817.—"The birds were scarcely beginning to move in the branches of the trees, and there was not a servant excepting the chockdaurs, stirring about any house in the neighbourhood, it was so early."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, &c. (ed. 1873), 243.

1837.—"Every village is under a potait, and there is a purau or priest, and choukseenop (sic!) or watchman."—Phillips, Million of Facts, 320.

1884.—The church book at Peshawar records the death there of "The Revd. Mr. L——l, who on the night of the —th, 1884, while walking in his veranda was shot by his own chokidar"—to which record the hand of an injudicious friend has added: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant!" (The exact words will now be found in the late Mr. E. B. Eastwick's Panjab Handbook, p. 279).}

CHOKRA. a. Hind. chokrd, 'a boy, a youngster'; and hence, more specifically, a boy employed about a household, or a regiment. Its chief use in S. India is with the latter. (See CHUCKAROO.)

[1875.—"He was dubbed 'the chokra,' or simply 'boy.'"—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 136.]

CHOKY, a. H. chawkt, which in all its senses is probably connected with Skt. chatur, 'four'; whence chatuskha, 'of four,' 'four-sided,' &c.

a. (Perhaps first a shed resting on four posts); a station of police; a lock-up; also a station of palankin bearers, horses, &c., when a post is laid; a customs or toll-station, and hence, as in the first quotation, the dues levied at such a place; the act of watching or guarding.

[1855.—"They only pay the choquehs coming in ships from the Moluccas to Malacca, which amounts to 8 parts in 10 for the owner of the ship for choque, which is freight; that which belongs to His Highness pays nothing when it comes in ships. This choque is as far as Malacca, from whence to India is another freight as arranged between the parties. Thus when clovees are brought in His Highness's ships, paying the third and the choquees, there goes from every 30 bahars 16 to the King, our Lord."—Arrangement made by Nuno da Cunha, quoted in Botelho Tombo, p. 113. On this Mr. Whiteway remarks: "By this arrangement the King of Portugal did not ship any cloves of his own at the Moluccas, but he took one-third of every shipment..."

"And when they must rest, if they have no Tents, they must shelter themselves under Trees . . . unless they happen on a Chowkie, i.e., a Shed where the Custom keeps a Watch to take Custom." -Ibid. 410.

1682. "About 12 o'clock Noon we got to yon Chowkee, where after we had shown our Doxick and given our present, we were dismissed immediately." -Hedges, Diary, Dec. 17; [Hak. Soc. i. 58].

This word has passed into the English slang vocabulary in the sense of 'prison.'

b. A chair. This use is almost peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. Dr. John Muir [Orig. Skt. Text, ii. 5] cites it in this sense, as a Hindi word which has no resemblance to any Skt. vocable. Mr. Growse, however, connects it with chatur, 'four' (Ind. Antiq., i. 106). See also beginning of this article. Chau is the common form of 'four' in composition, e.g., chauhandi, (i.e. 'four fastening') the complete shoeing of a horse; chauhapa ('four watches') all night long; chauwpa, 'a quadruped'; chaukat and chaukhat ('four timber'), a frame (of a door, &c.). So chauki seems to have been used for a square-framed stool, and thence a chair.

1772. "Don't throw yourself back in your burra chokey, and tell me it won't do . . ." -W. Hastings to G. Vansittart, in Glei, i. 238.

c. 1782. "As soon as morning appeared he (Haidar) sat down on his chair (choaki) and washed his face." -H. of Hyder Nain, 505.

CHOLE, and CHOLERA MORBUS, s. The Disease. The term 'cholera,' though employed by the old medical writers, no doubt came, as regards its familiar use, from India. Littré alleges that it is a mistake to suppose that the word cholera (χολέρα) is a derivative from χόλη, 'bile,' and that it really means 'a gutter,' the disease being so called from the symptoms. This should, however, rather be due to χόλας, the latter word being anecdytically used for the intestines (the etym. given by the medical writer, Alex. Trallianus). But there is a discussion on the subject in the modern ed. of Stephani Thesaurus, which indicates a conclusion that the derivation from χόλη is probably right; it is that of Celsus (see below). [The N.E.D. takes the same view, but admits that there is some doubt.] For quotations and some particulars in reference to the history of this terrible disease, see under MORT-DE-CHIEN.

CHOOLA, s. H. chuliha, chulli, chul, fr. Skt. chcull. The extemporized cooking-place of clay which a native of India makes on the ground to prepare his own food; or to cook that of his master.

1814.—"A marble corridor filled up with choollas, or cooking-places, composed of mud, cowdung, and unburnt bricks."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 120; [2nd ed. ii. 185].

CHOOLIA, s. Châlîtâ or a name given in Ceylon and in Malabar to a particular class of Mahommmedans, and sometimes to Mahommmedans generally. There is much obscurity about the origin and proper application of the term. [The word is by some derived from Skt. châdâ, the top-knot which every Hindu must wear, and which is cut off on conversion to Islam. In the same way in the Punjab, chotkât, 'he that has had his top-knot cut off,' is a common form of abuse used by Hindus to Musulman converts; see Ibbetson, Panjâb Ethnog. p. 240.] According to Sonnerat (i. 108), the Chûlias are of Arab descent and of Shiâ profession. [The Madras Gloss. takes the word to be from the kingdom of Chola and to mean a person of S. India.]

1782.—"We had found... less of that foolish timidity, and much more disposition to intercourse in the Chollars of the country, who are Mahommmedans and quite distinct in their manners..."—Hugh Boyd, Journal of a Journey of an Embassy to Candy, in Misc. Works (1800), i. 155.

1783.—"During Mr. Saunders's government I have known Chûlia (Moors) vessels carry coco-nuts from the Nicobar Islands to Madras."—Forrest, Voyage to Mergui, p. v.

"Chûlias and Malabars (the appellations are I believe synonymous)."—Ibid. 24.

1836.—"Mr. Boyd... describes the Moors under the name of Chûlias, and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation Lubbies (see Lubbye). These epithets are, however, not admissible, for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter to the priests who officiate."—Casie Chitty, in J. R. A. Soc. iii. 388.

1879.—"There are over 15,000 Klings, Chûlias, and other natives of India."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 264.

CHOP, s. Properly a seal-impression, stamp, or brand; H. chhâp; the verb (chhâpâ) being that which is now used in Hindustani to express the art of printing (books).

The word chhâp seems not to have been traced back with any accuracy beyond the modern vernaculars. It has been thought possible (at least till the history should be more accurately traced) that it might be of Portuguese origin. For there is a Port. word chapa, 'a thin plate of metal,' which is no doubt the original of the Old English chape for the metal plate on the sheath of a sword or dagger.* The word in this sense is not in the Portuguese Dictionaries; but we find 'homem chapada,' explained as 'a man of notable worth or excellence,' and Bluteau considers this a metaphor 'taken from the chapas or plates of metal on which the kings of India caused their letters patent to be engraved.' Thus he would seem to have regarded, though perhaps erroneously, the chhâpâ and the Portuguese chapa as identical. On the other hand, Mr. Beames entertains no doubt that the word is genuine Hindi, and connects it with a variety of other words signifying striking, or pressing. And Thompson in his Hindi Dictionary says that chhâpâ is a technical term used by the Vaishnavas to denote the sectorial marks (lotus, trident, &c.), which they delineate on their bodies. Fallon gives the same meaning, and quotes a Hindi verse, using it in this sense. We may add that while chhâpâ is used all over the N.W.P. and Punjab for printed cloths, Drummond (1808) gives chhâpânîya, chhâpârâ, as words for 'Stampers or Printers of Cloth' in Guzerat, and that the passage quoted below from a Treaty made with an ambassador from Guzerat by the Portuguese in 1537, uses the word chapada for struck or coined, exactly as the modern Hindi verb chhâpâ might be used.† Chop, in writers

* Thus, in Shakspeare, "This is Monsieur Paroles, the gallant militarist... that had the whole theory of war in the knot of his scarft, the practice in the shape of his dagger."—All's Well that Ends Well, iv. b. And, in the Scottish Bates and Fairlawn, under 1612:

prior to the last century, is often used for the seal itself. "Owen Cambridge says the Mohr was the great seal, but the small or privy seal was called a 'chop' or 'stamp.'" (C. P. Brown).

The word chop is hardly used now among Anglo-Indians in the sense of seal or stamp. But it got a permanent footing in the 'Pigeon English' of the Chinese ports, and thence has come back to England and India, in the phrase "first-chop" i.e. of the first brand or quality.

The word chop (chop) is adopted in Malay [with the meanings of seal-impression, stamp, to seal or stamp, though there is, as Mr. Skeat points out, a pure native word tera or tra, which is used in all these senses] and chop has acquired the specific sense of a passport or licence. The word has also obtained a variety of applications, including that just mentioned, in the lingua franca of foreigners in the China seas. Van Braam applies it to a tablet bearing the Emperor's name, to which he and his fellow envoys made katow on their first landing in China (Voyage &c., Paris, An vi., 1798, i. 20-21). Again, in the same jargon, a chop of tea means a certain number of chests of tea, all bearing the same brand. Chop-houses are customs stations on the Canton River, so called from the chops, or seals, used there (Giles, Glossary). Chop-dollar is a dollar chopped, or stamped with a private mark, as a guarantee of its genuineness (ibid.). (Dollars similarly marked had currency in England in the first quarter of last century, and one of the present writers can recollect their occasional occurrence in Scotland in his childhood). The grand chop is the port clearance granted by the Chinese customs when all dues have been paid (ibid.). All these have obviously the same origin; but there are other uses of the word in China not so easily explained, e.g. chop, for 'a hulk'; chop-boat for a lighter or cargo-boat.

In Captain Forrest's work, quoted below, a golden badge or decoration, conferred on him by the King of Achin, is called a chapp (p. 56). The portrait of Forrest, engraved by Sharp, shows this badge, and gives the inscription, translated: "Capt. Thomas Forrest, Orancayo [see ORANKAY] of the Golden Sword. This chapp was conferred as a mark of honour in the city of Atcheen, belonging to the Faithful, by the hands of the Shabander [see SHABUNDER] of Atcheen, on Capt. Thomas Forrest."

1882.—"On the edge of the river facing the 'Pow-shan' and the Creek Hongs, were Chop houses, or branches of the Hoppo's department, whose duty it was to prevent smuggling, but whose interest it was to aid and facilitate the shipping of silk . . . at a considerable reduction on the Imperial tariff."—The Fakwacs at Canton, p. 25.

The writer last quoted, and others before him, have imagined a Chinese origin for chop, e.g., as "from chah, 'an official note from a superior,' or chah, 'a contract, a diploma, &c.,' both having at Canton the sound cháp, and between them covering most of the 'pigeon' uses of chop" (Note by Bishop Moule). But few of the words used by Europeans in Chinese trade are really Chinese, and we think it has been made clear that chop comes from India.

CHOP-CHOP. Pigeon-English (or -Chinese) for 'Make haste! look sharp!' This is supposed to be from the Cantonese, pron. kòp-kòp, of what is in the Mandarin dialect kip-kip. In the Northern dialects kwai-kwai, 'quick-quick' is more usual (Bishop Moule). [Mr. Skeat compares the Malay chepaut-cheput, 'quick-quick."

CHOPSTICKS, n. The sticks used in pairs by the Chinese in feeding themselves. The Chinese name of the article is 'kuai-tez,' 'speedy-ones.' "Possibly the inventor of the present word, hearing that the Chinese name had this meaning, and accustomed to the phrase chop-chop for 'speedily, used chop as a translation' (Bishop Moule). [Prof. Giles writes: 'The N.E.D. gives incorrectly kuai-tez, i.e. 'nimble boys,' 'nimble ones.' Even Sir H. Yule is not without blemish. He leaves the aspirate out of kuai, of which the official orthography is now k'uai-k'uai-tez, 'hasteners,' the termination -ere bringing out the value of tai, an enclitic particle, better than 'ones.' Bishop Moule's suggestion is on the right track. I think, however, that chopstick came from a Chinaman, who of course knew the meaning of k'uai and applied it accordingly, using the 'pidgin word chop as the, to him, natural equivalent."

1540.—". . . his young daughters, with their brother, did nothing but laugh to see us feed ourselves with our hands, for that is contrary to the custom which is observed throughout the whole empire of China, where the Inhabitants at their meat carry it to their mouths with two little sticks made like a pair of Cissors" (this is the translator's folly; it is really com duos paos feitos como fios—"like spindles."—Pinto, orig. cap. lxxxiii., in Cosgas, p. 103.

1876.—"Before each there will be found a pair of chopsticks, a wine-cup, a small saucer for soy . . . and a pile of small pieces of paper for cleaning these articles as required."—Giles, Chinese Sketches, 183-4.

CHOTA-HAZY, n. H. chhoit haziri, vulg. haziri, 'little breakfast'; refreshment taken in the early morning, before or after the morning exercise. The term (see HAZREE) was originally peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras the meal is called 'early tea.' Among the Dutch in Java, this meal consists (or did consist in 1860) of a large cup of tea, and a large piece of cheese, presented by the servant who calls one in the morning.

1858.—"After a bath, and hasty ante-breakfast (which is called in India 'a little breakfast') at the Euston Hotel, he proceeded to the private residence of a man of law."—Oakfield, ii. 179.

1866.—"There is one small meal . . . it is that commonly known in India by the Hindustani name of chota-haziri, and in our English colonies as 'Early Tea.' . . ."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 172.

1875.—"We took early tea, with him this morning."—The Dilemma, ch. iii.

CHOUL, CHAUL, n.p. A seaport of the Concan, famous for many centuries under various forms of this name, Cheniwall properly, and pronounced in Konkani Chennival (Sinclair, Ind. Ant. iv. 283). It may be regarded as almost certain that this was the Σιμωλα of Ptolemy's Tables, called by the nautes, as he says, Τιουωνα. It may be fairly conjectured that the true reading of this was Τιουωνα, or Τιουωνα. We find the sound ch of Indian names apparently represented in Ptolemy by τι (as it is in Dutch by t). Thus Tdroupana = Chitor, Tdour = Χαστάνα; here Tiouwa = Cheniwall; while Tdroupa and Tdowra probably stand for names like Chagara and Chauipa. Still more confidently Cheniwal may be identified with the Saimur (Chaimur) or Jaimur of the old Arab Geographers, a port at the extreme end of Lār or Guzerat. At Choul itself there is a tradition that its antiquity goes back beyond that of Suali (see SWALLY), Bassine, or Bombay. There were memorable sieges of Choul in 1570-71, and again in 1594, in which the Portuguese successfully resisted Mahommemedan.
attempts to capture the place. Dr. Burgess identifies the ancient Σημιαντα rather with a place called Cheumbur, on the island of Tromby, which lies immediately east of the island of Bombay; but till more evidence is adduced we see no reason to adopt this. Choul seems now to be known as Revadanda. Even the name is not to be found in the Imperial Gazetteer. Revadanda has a place in that work, but without a word to indicate its connection with this ancient and famous port. Mr. Gerson d'Acunha has published in the J. Bo. Br. As. Soc. vol. xii., Notes on the H. and Ant. of Choul.

CHOUTHRY, s. Peculiar to S. India, and of doubtful etymology; Malayā, chowth, Tel. chowthi, [telodhi, choh, Skt. chatur, 'four,' vitta, 'road,' a place where four roads meet]. In W. India the form used is chowry or chowree (Dakh. chitori). A hall, a shed, or a simple loggia, used by travellers as a resting-place, and also intended for the transaction of public business. In the old Madras Archives there is frequent mention of the "Justices of the Choultry." A building of this kind seems to have formed the early Court-house.

1673.—"Here (at Swally near Surat) we were welcomed by the Deputy President ... who took care for my Entertainment, which here was rude, the place admitting of little better Tenements than Booths stiled by the name of Choultries."—Fryer, 82.

CHOULTRY PLAIN. 212

[1778.—“A Choltré is not much unlike a large summer-house, and in general is little more than a bare covering from the inclemency of the weather. Some few indeed are more spacious, and are also endowed with a salary to support a servant or two, whose business is to furnish all passengers with a certain quantity of rice and fresh water.”—Iocs, 67.]

1792.—“Les fortunes sont employées à bâtir des Chandeliers sur les chemins.”—Sonnerat, i. 42.

1790.—“On ne rencontre dans ces voyages aucune Auberge ou hôtellerie sur la route; mais elles sont remplacées par des lieux de repos appelés schультris (chandeliers), qui sont des bâtiments ouverts et inhabités, où les voyageurs ne trouvent, en général, qu’un toit...”—Haugner, ii. 11.

1809.—“He resides at present in an old Choultry which has been fitted up for his use by the Resident.”—Ed. of Valention, i. 356.

1817.—“Another fact of much importance is, that a Mahomedan Sovereign was the first who established Choultries.”—Mill’s Hist. ii. 181.

1820.—“The Chowree or town-hall where the public business of the township is transacted, is a building 30 feet square, with square gable-ends, and a roof of tile supported on a treble row of square wooden posts.”—Acc. of Township of Loosny, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, ii. 181.

1833.—“Junar, 6th Jan. 1833. . . We at first took up our abode in the Chawadí, but Mr. Ecombe of the C. S. kindly invited us to his house.”—Smith’s Life of Dr. J. Wilson, 156.

1836.—“The roads are good, and well supplied with choultries or taverns” (!)—Phillips, Million of Facts, 319.

1879.—“Let an organised watch . . . be established in each village . . . armed with good tulwars. They should be stationed each night in the village chouri.”—Overland Times of India, May 12, Suppl. 76.

See also CHUTTRUM.

CHOULTRY PLAIN, n.p. This was the name given to the open country formerly existing to the S.W. of Madras. Choultry Plain was also the old designation of the Hd. Quarters of the Madras Army; equivalent to “Horse Guards” in Westminster (C. P. B. MS.).

1780.—“Every gentleman now possessing a house in the fort, was happy in accommodating the family of his friend, who before had resided in Choonly Plain. Note. The country near Madras is a perfect flat, on which is built, at a small distance from the fort, a small choultry.”—Hodges, Travels, 7.

CHOUSE, s. and v. This word is originally Turk. chaus, in former days a sergeant-at-arms, herald, or the like. [Vaméry (Sketches, 17) speaks of the Tchauss as the leader of a party of pilgrims.] Its meaning as a ‘cheat,’ or ‘to swindle’ is, apparently beyond doubt, derived from the anecdote thus related in a note of W. Gifford’s upon the passage in Ben Jonson’s Alchemist, which is quoted below. “In 1609 Sir Robert Shirley sent a messenger or chias (as our old writers call him) to this country, as his agent, from the Grand Signor and the Sophy, to transact some preparatory business. Sir Robert followed him, at his leisure, as ambassador from both these princes; but before he reached England, his agent had chauséd the Turkish and Persian merchants here of 4000L., and taken his flight, unconscious perhaps that he had enriched the language with a word of which the etymology would mislead Upton and puzzle Dr. Johnson.”—Ed. of Ben Jonson, iv. 27. “In Kattywar, where the native chiefs employ Arab mercenaries, the Chaus still flourish as an officer of a company. When I joined the Political Agency in that Province, there was a company of Arabs attached to the Residency under a Chaus.” (M.-Gen. Keatinge). [The N.E.D. thinks that “Gifford’s note must be taken with reserve.” The Stanf. Dict. adds that Gifford’s note asserts that two other Chiausés arrived in 1618–1625. One of the above quotations proves his accuracy as to 1618. Perhaps, however, the particular fraud had little to do with the modern use of the word. As Jonson suggests, chias may have been used for ‘Turk’ in the sense of ‘cheat’; just as Catanian stood for ‘thief’ or ‘rogue.’ For a further discussion of the word see N. & Q., 7 ser. vi. 387; 8 ser. iv. 129.]

1560.—“Cum vero me taederet inclusionis in sodem diversorio, ego cum meo Chiaus (genus id est, ut tibi scripsi alias, multiplices apud Taurus officii, quod etiam ad oratorum custodiam extenditur) ut mihi licite aere meo domum conducere . . .”—Busey, Epist. iii. p. 149.

1610.—“’Dapper. . . What do you think of me, that I am a chiaus? Face. What’s that?”

Dapper. The Turk was here.

As one would say, do you think I am a Turk?

1826.—“We started at break of day from the northern suburb of Ispahan, led by the chaouhes of the pilgrimage. . . .”—Haji Beba, ed. 1855, p. 6.

CHOW-CHOW, s. A common application of the Pigeon-English term in China is to mixed preserves; but, as the quotation shows, it has many uses;

the idea of mixture seems to prevail.

It is the name given to a book by Viscountess Falkland, whose husband was Governor of Bombay. There it seems to mean ‘a medley of trifles.’
Chow is in ‘pigeon’ applied to food of any kind. [“From the erroneous impression that dogs form one of the principal items of a Chinaman’s diet, the common variety has been dubbed the ‘chow dog’” (Ball, Things Chinese,
p. 179).] We find the word chow-chow in Blumenritt’s Vocabular of Manilla terms: “Chau-chau, a Tagal dish so called.”

1858.—“The word chow-chow is sug-uggestive, especially to the Indian reader, of a mixture of things: ‘good, bad, and indifferent,’ of sweet little oranges and bib rinds of unripe fruit, all concocted together, and made upon the whole into a very tolerable confection . . .

“Lady Falkland, by her happy selection of a name, to a certain extent deprecates and disarms criticism. We cannot complain that her work is without plan, unconnected, and sometimes trashy, for these are exactly the conditions implied in the word chow-chow.”—Bombay Quarterly Review, January,
p. 100.

1882.—“The variety of uses to which the compound word ‘chow-chow’ is put is almost endless. . . . A ‘No. 1 chow-chow’ thing signifies utterly worthless, but when applied to a breakfast or dinner it means unexceptionably good.” A ‘chow-chow’ cargo is an assorted cargo; a ‘general shop’ is a ‘chow-chow’ shop . . . one (factory) was called the ‘chow-chow’ from its being inhabited by divers Parsees, Moormen, or other natives of India.”—The Funkwoe,
p. 63.

CHOWDRY, s. H. chaudhari, lit.
‘a holder of four’; the explanation of which is obscure: [rather Skt. chakra-dharin, ‘the bearer of the discus as an esign of authority’]. The usual application of the term is to the headman of a craft in a town, and more particularly to the person who is selected by Government as the agent through whom supplies, workmen, &c., are supplied for public purposes.
[Thus the Chaudhari of carters provides carriage, the Chaudhari of Kahars bearers, and so on.] Formerly, in places, to the headman of a village; to certain holders of lands; and in Cuttack it was, under native rule, applied to a district Revenue officer.
In a paper of ‘Explanations of Terms’, furnished to the Council at Fort William by Warren Hastings, then Resident at Moradabagh (1758), chowdras are defined as "Landholders in the next rank to Zemindars." (In Long, p. 176.) [Comp. VENDU-MASTER.] It is also an honorific title given by servants to one of their number, usually, we believe, to the mali [see MOLLY], or gardener— as khalifa to the cook and tailor, jama'ddar to the bhiishi, mehtar to the sweeper, sirddar to the bearer.

c. 1800.— "... The people were brought to such a state of obedience that one revenue officer would string twenty ... chandharis together by the neck, and enforce payment by blows."—Zaid-ul-din Burnt, in Elliot, iii. 158.

c. 1843.— "The territories dependent on the capital (Delhi) are divided into hundreds, each of which has a Janthari, who is the Sheik or chief man of the Hindus."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 388.

[1772.— "Chowdrias, land-holders, in the next rank to Zemendars."—Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss. s.v.]

1788.— "Chowdry.— A Landholder or Farmer. Properly he is above the Zemindar in rank; but, according to the present custom of Bengal, he is deemed the next to the Zemindar. Most commonly used as the principal purveyor of the markets in towns or camps."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale's).

CHOWK, s. H. chauk. An open place or wide street in the middle of a city where the market is held, [as, for example, the Chandni Chauk of Delhi]. It seems to be adopted in Persian, and there is an Arabic form Sāţā, which, it is just possible, may have been borrowed and Arabized from the present word. The radical idea of chauk seems to be "four ways" [Skt. chatuska], the crossing of streets at the centre of business. Compare Carfax, and the Quattro Cantoni of Palermo. In the latter city there is a market place called Piazza Ballarò, which in the 16th century a chronicler calls Seggeballarath, or as Amari interprets, Sāţā-Ballarà.

CHOWNEE, s. The usual native name, at least in the Bengal Presidency, for an Anglo-Indian cantonment (q.v.). It is H. chhndoni, 'a thatched roof,' chhond, chhanda, v. 'to thatch.'

CHOWRINGHEE, n.p. The name of a road and quarter of Calcutta, in which most of the best European houses stand; Chaurangi.

1789.— "The houses ... at Chowringee also will be much more healthy."—Seton-Karr, ii. 206.

1790.— "To dig a large tank opposite to the Chowringhee Buildings."—Ibid. 13.

1791.— "Whereas a robbery was committed on Tuesday night, the first instant, on the Chowringhy Road."—Ibid. 54.

1792.— "For Private Sale. A neat, compact and new built garden house, pleasantly situated at Chowringhee, all Calcutta, in the 16th century for an Anglo-Indian cantonment (q.v.). The bushy tail of the Tibetan Yak (q.v.), often set in a costly decorated handle to use as a fly-flapper, in which form it was one of the insignia of ancient Asiatic royalty. The tail was also often attached to the horse-trappings of native warriors; whilst it formed from remote times the standard of nations and nomad tribes of Central Asia. The Yak-tails and their uses are mentioned by Aelian, and by Cosmas (see under YAK). Allusions to the chamar, as a sign of royalty, are frequent in Skt. books and inscriptions, e.g. in the Poet Kalidasa (see transl. by Dr. Mill in The common Anglo-Indian expression in the 18th century appears to have been "Cow-tails" (q.v.). And hence Bogle in his Journal, as published by Mr. Markham, calls Yaks by the absurd name of "cow-tailed cows" though "horse-tailed cows" would have been more germane!

1874.—"The Deb-Rajah on horseback ... a chowry-burdar on each side of him."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 24.

1888.—"... the old king was sitting in the garden with a chowry-burdar waving the flies from him."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 138.

CHOWT, CHOUT, s. Mehr. chauth, 'one fourth part.' The blackmail levied by the Marathas from the provincial governors as compensation for leaving their districts in immunity from plunder. The term is also applied to some other exactions of like ratio (see Wilson).

1659.—Mr. Whiteway refers to Couto (Dec. VII. bk. 6, ch. 6), where this word is used in reference to payments made in 1659 in the time of D. Constantine de Bragança, and in papers of the early part of the 17th century the King of the Chountas is frequently mentioned.

1644.—"This King holds in our lands of Daman a certain payment which they call Chout, which was paid him long before they belonged to the Portuguese, and so after they came under our power the payment continued to be made, and about these exactions and payments there have risen great disputes and contentions on one side and another."—Bocarro (MS.).

1763-78.—"They (the English) were ... not a little surprised to find in the letters now received from Balajerow and his agent to themselves, and in stronger terms to the Nabob, a peremptory demand of the Chout or tribute due to the King of the Marattas from the Nabobship of Arcot."—Orme, ii. 228-9.

1808.—"The Peshwa ... cannot have a right to two choutes, any more than to two revenues from any village in the same year."—Wellington Desp. (ed. 1887), ii. 175.

1858.—"... They (the Marathas) were accustomed to demand of the provinces they threatened with devastation a certain portion of the public revenue, generally the fourth part; and this, under the name of the Chout, became the recognised Maratta tribute, the price of the absence of their plundering hordes."—Whitney, Oriental and Ling. Studies, ii. 20-21.

CHOWRYBURDAR, s. The servant who carries the Chowry. H. P. chauri-burdar.

1774.—"The Deb-Rajah on horseback ... a chowry-burdar on each side of him."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 24.

1888.—"... the old king was sitting in the garden with a chowry-burdar waving the flies from him."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 138.

CHOYA, CHAYA, CHEY, s. A root, [generally known as chayroot] (Hedyotis umbellata, Lam., Oldenlandia umb., L.) of the Nat. Ord. Cinchonaceae, affording a red dye, sometimes called 'India Madder,' [Dye Root,' 'Rameshwaram Root']; from Tam. shdyavar, Malayil. chuyar (chuya, 'colour,' ver., 'root'). It is exported from S. India, and was so also at one time from Ceylon. There is a figure of the plant in Lettres Édip. xiv. 164.

1566.—"... Also from S. Tomé they layd great store of red yarne, of bombast died with a roote which they call salia, as aforesaid, which colour will never out."—Caesar Frederick, in Hali. [ii. 334].
1568.—“Ne vien anchora di detta saia da un altro luogo detto Petopol, e se ne tingono parimente in S. Thomè.”—Balbi, f. 107.

1672.—“Here groweth very good Zaye.”—Baldaeus, Ceylon.

[1679.—“... if they would provide musters of Chae and White goods.”—Memorial of S. Master, in Kistna Man., p. 181.]

1726.—“Saye (a dye-root that is used on the Coast for painting chintzes).”—Valentijn, Chen. 45.

1727.—“The Islands of Dyu (near Mafuspatam) produce the famous Dye called Shail. It is a Shrub growing in Grounds that are overflown with the Spring tides.”—A. Hamilton, i. 370; [ed. 1744, i. 374].

1860.—“The other productions that constituted the exports of the Island were sapan-wood to Persia; and choya-roots, a substitute for Madder, collected at Manasar... for transmission to Surat.”—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 54-55. See also Chitty's Ceylon Gazetteer (1834), p. 40.

CHUCKAROO, s. English soldier's lingo for Chokra (q.v.)

CHUCKER. From H. chakar, chakkar, chakra, Skt. chakra, 'a wheel or circle.'

(a.) s. A quoit for playing the English game; but more properly the sharp quoit or discus which constituted an ancient Hindu missile weapon, and is, or was till recently, carried by the Sikh fanatics called Akali (see AKALEE), generally encircling their peaked turbans. The thing is described by Tavernier (E. T. ii. 41: [ed. Ball, i. 82]) as carried by a company of Mahommadan Pakirs whom he met at Sherpur in Guzerat. See also Lt.-Col. T. Levis, A Fly, &c., p. 47: [Eyerton, Handbook, Pl. 15, No. 64].

1516.—“In the Kingdom of Dely... they have some steel wheels which they call chakaranii, two fingers broad, sharp outside like knives, and without edge inside; and the surface of these is the size of a small plate. And they carry seven or eight of these each, put on the left arm; and they take one and put it on the finger of the right hand, and make it spin round many times, and so they hurl it at their enemies.”—Barbosa, 100-101.

1630.—“In her right hand shee bare a chuckerey, which is an instrument of a round forme, and sharp-edged in the superficies thereof... and slung off, in the quickness of his motion, it is able to deliter or certain death to a farre remote enemy.”—Lord, Disc. of the Bastian Religion, 12.

(b) v. and s. To lunge a horse. H. chakarn or chakar karnd. Also 'the lunge.'

1829.—“It was truly tantalizing to see those fellows chuckering their horses, not more than a quarter of a mile from our post.”—John Skipp, i. 153.

[(c.) In Polo, a 'period.'

[1900.—“Two bouts were played to-day... in the opening chuckker Capt. — carried the ball in.”—Overland Mail, Aug. 13.]

CHUCKERBUTTY, n.p. This vulgarized Bengali Brahman name is, as Wilson points out, a corruption of chakravarti, the title assumed by the most exalted ancient Hindu sovereigns, an universal Emperor, whose chariot-wheels rolled over all (so it is explained by some).

(c. 400.—“Then the Bakshuni Uthala began to think thus with herself, 'To-day the King, ministers, and people are all going to meet Buddha... but I—a woman—how can I contrive to get the first sight of him?' Buddha immediately, by his divine power, changed her into a holy Chakravarti Raja.”—Travels of Fa-hian, tr. by Beale, p. 63.

(c. 460.—“On a certain day (Asoka), having... ascertained that the supernaturally gifted... Naga King, whose age extended to a Koppo, had seen the four Buddhas... he thus addressed him: ‘Beloved, exhibit to me the person of the omniscient being of infinite wisdom, the Chakkawati of the doctrine.’”—The Mahavamsa, p. 27.

1856.—“The importance attached to the possession of a white elephant is traceable to the Buddhist system. A white elephant of certain wonderful endowments is one of the seven precious things, the possession of which marks the Maha Chakravarti Raja... the holy and universal sovereign, a character which appears once in a cycle.”—Mission to the Court of Ava (Major's Phayre's), 1858, p. 154.

CHUCKLAH, s. H. chakla, [Skt. chakra, 'a wheel']. A territorial subdivision under the Mahommadan government, thus defined by Warren Hastings, in the paper quoted under CHOWDRY:

1759.—“The jurisdiction of a Phojdar (see FOUDA), who receives the rents from the Zemindars, and accounts for them with the Government.”

1760.—“In the treaty concluded with the Nawab Meer Mohummud Câsim Khan, on the 27th Sept. 1760, it was agreed that... the English army should be ready to assist him in the management of all affairs, and the land of the chuklahs (districts) of Burdwan, Midnapore and Chattagong, should be assigned for all the charges of the company and the army. . . .—Harinmton’s Analysis of the Laws and Regulations, vol. i. Calcutta, 1806-1809, p. 5.

CHUCKLER. s. Tan. and Malayal. shakkil, the name of a very low caste, members of which are tanners or cobblers, like the Chandris (see CHUMAR) of Upper India. But whilst the latter are reputed to be a very dark caste, the Chucklers are fair (see Elliot’s Gloss. by Beamis, i. 71, and Coldwell’s Gram. 574). [On the other hand the Madras Gloss. (a.v.) says that a rule they are of “a dark black hue.” Colloquially in S. India Chuckler is used for a native shoemaker.

C. 1580.—“All the Gentoos (Gentio) of these parts, especially those of Bissaga, have many castes, which take precedence one of another. The lowest are the Chakvilas, who make shoes, and eat all unclean flesh.”—Primor e Honra, &c., t. 95.

1759.—“Shackelays are shoemakers, and held in the same depreciable light on the Coromandel Coast as the Naadded and Pullines on the Malabar.”—Ives, 26.

C. 1790.—“Aussi n’est-ce que le rébut de la classe méprisée des parrias; savoir les techakelleis ou cordonniers et les vettians ou fosseuyers, qui s’occupent de l’enterrement et la combustion des morts.”—Baefner, ii. 60.

[1844.—“. . . the chuckly, who performs the degrading duty of executioner. . . .”—Society, Manners, &c., of India, ii. 282.]

1869.—“The Komatis or mercantile caste of Madras by long established custom, are required to send an offering of betel to the chucklers, or shoemakers, before contracting their marriages.”—Sir W. Elliot, in J. Edin. Soc., N. S. vol. i. 102.

CHUCKMUCK. s. H. chakmak. “Flint and steel.” One of the titles conferred on Haidar ‘Ali before he rose to power was ‘Chakmak Jang, ‘Firelock of War’? See H. of Hydur Naik, 112.

CHUCKRUM. s. An ancient coin once generally current in the S. of India, Malayal. chakram, Tel. chakrams; from Skt. chakra (see under CHUCKER). It is not easy to say what was its value, as the statements are inconsistent: nor do they confirm Wilson’s, that it was equal to one-tenth of a pagoda. [According to the Madras Gloss. (a.v.) it bore the same relation to the gold Pagoda that the Anna does to the Rupee, and under it again was the copper Cash, which was its sixteenth.] The denomination survives in Travancore, [where 28 Chukrum go to one rupee. (Ibid.)]

1554.—“And the fanoms of the place are called choordes, which are coins of inferior gold; they are worth 1 ¼ or 1:2 to the paradao of gold, reckoning the paradao at 360 reis.”—A. Nunes, Livro dos Pesos, 95.

1711.—“The Enemy will not come to any agreement unless we consent to pay 30,000 chuckruums, which we take to be 16,800 and odd pagodas.”—In Wheeler, ii. 165.

1813.—Milburn, under Tanjore, gives the chuckrum as a coin equal to 20 Madras, or ten gold fanams. 20 Madras fanams would be ⅓ of a pagoda.

[From the difficulty of handling these coins, which are small and round, they are counted on a chuckrum board as in the case of the Panam (q.v.).]

CHUDDER. s. H. chudder, a sheet, or square piece of cloth of any kind; the ample sheet commonly worn as a mantle by women in N. India. It is also applied to the cloths spread over Mahomedan tombs. Barbosa (1516) and Linschoten (1598) have chautars, chautares, as a kind of cotton piece-goods, but it is certain that this is not the same word. Chautars occur among Bengal piece-goods in Milburn, ii. 291. [The word is chauto, ‘anything with four threads,’ and it occurs in the list of cotton cloths in the Ain (i. 94). In a letter of 1610 we have “Chautares are white and well requested” (Dunsers, Letters, i. 75); “Chauters of Agra” (Foster, Letters, ii. 45); Cocks has “fine Casuoh or Chouter” (Diary, i. 86); and in 1616 they are called “Coutier” (Foster, iv. 51).]

1525.—“Chader of Cambaya.”—Lembrança, 56.

[C. 1610.—“From Bengal comes another sort of hanging, of fine linen painted and ornamented with colours in a very agreeable fashion; these they call tader.”—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 222.]

1614.—“Pintados, chints und chaders.”—Peyton, in Purchas, i. 590.

1673.—“The habit of these water-nymphs was fine Shudders of lawn embroidered on the neck, wrist, and skirt with a border of several coloured silks or threads of gold.”—Herbert, 3rd ed. 191.
CHUL, CHULLO.  213

CHULAM.

1832.—"Chuddur . . . a large piece of cloth or sheet, of one and a half or two breadths, thrown over the head, so as to cover the whole body. Men usually sleep rolled up in it."—Herkiels, Qanon-e-Islam, p. viii.

1878.—"Two or three women, who had been chattering away till we appeared, but who, on seeing us, drew their 'chadders . . . round their faces, and retired to the further end of the boat."—Life in the Mo-fussil, i. 79.

The Rampore Chudder is a kind of shawl, of the Tibetan shawl-wool, of uniform colour without pattern, made originally at Rampur on the Sutlej; and of late years largely imported into England: [(see the Panyud Mono. on Wool, p. 9). Curiously enough a claim to the derivation of the title from Rampur, in Rohilkhand, N.W.P. is made in the Imperial Gazetteer, 1st ed. (a.v.)].

CHULI! CHULLO! v. in imperative; 'Go on! Be quick.' H. chalo! imper. of chaño, to go, go speedily. [Another common use of the word in Anglo-Indian slang is—"It won't chul,' 'it won't answer, succeed.']

c. 1790.—"Je montai de trés-bonne heure dans mon palanquin.—Tshollo (c'est-à-dire, marche), crièrent mes couilles, et aussitôt le voyage commença."—Haafner, ii. 5.

[CHUMAR, s. H. Chamar, Skt. charmadraka, 'one who works in leather,' and thus answering to the Chuckler of S. India; an important caste found all through N. India, whose primary occupation is tanning, but a large number are agriculturists and day labourers of various kinds.

[1823.—"From this abomination, beef-eating . . . they [the Bheels] only rank above the Choomara, or shoemakers, who feast on dead carcases, and are in Central India, as elsewhere, deemed so unclean that they are not allowed to dwell within the precincts of the village."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 179.]

CHUMPUK, s. A highly ornamental and sacred tree (Michelia champaca, L., also M. Rhed.)i, a kind of magnolia, whose odorous yellow blossoms are much prized by Hindus, offered at shrines, and rubbed on the body at marriages, &c. H. champak, Skt. champaka. Drury strangely says that the name is "derived from Champa, an island between Cambogia and Cochin China, where the tree grows." Champa is not an island, and certainly derives its Sanskrit name from India, and did not give a name to an Indian tree. The tree is found wild in the Himalayas from Nepal, eastward; also in Pegu and Tenasserim, and along the Ghaunts to Travancore. The use of the term champaka extends to the Philippine Islands. [Mr. Skeat notes that it is highly prized by Malay women, who put it in their hair.]

1628.—"Among others they showed me a flower, in size and form not unlike our lily, but of a yellowish white colour, with a sweet and powerful scent, and which they call champak [champ]."—P. della Valle, ii. 517; [Hak. Soc. i. 40].

1786.—"The walks are scented with blossoms of the champac and naguar, and the plantations of pepper and coffee are equally new and pleasing."—Sir W. Jones, in Mem., &c., ii. 81.

1810.—"Some of these (birds) build in the sweet-scented champaka and the mango."—Maria Graham, 22.

1819.—"The wandering airs they faint
On the dark, the silent stream;
And the champak's odours fall
Like sweet thoughts in a dream."—Shelley, Lines to an Indian Air.

1821.—"Some champak flowers proclaim
It yet divine."—Medwin, Sketches in Hindoostan, 73.

CHUMÁM, s. Prepared lime; also specially used for fine polished plaster. Forms of this word occur both in Dravidian languages and Hind. In the latter chöma is from Skt. charmā, 'powder'; in the former it is somewhat uncertain whether the word is, or is not, an old derivative from the Sanskrit. In the first of the following quotations the word used seems taken from the Malayāl. chydaymba, Tam. chydaymbu.

1610.—"And they also eat with the said leaves (betel), a certain lime made from oyster shells, which they call chonama."—Varthema, 144.

1663.—". . . so that all the names you meet with that are not Portuguese are Malabar; such as bete (betel), chuna, which is lime. . . ."—Garçia. f. 57g.

c. 1610.—". . . l'vn porte son éventail, l'autre la boîte d'argent pleine de betel, l'autre une boîte où il y a du chunam, qui est de la chaux."—Pyrrard de Laval, ii. 84; [Hak. Soc. ii. 186].
1614.—"Having burnt the great idol into chunam, he mixed the powdered lime with pa leaves, and gave it to the Râjpûtes that they might eat the objects of their worship."—Fryer, 40.

1673.—"The Natives chew it (Betal) with Chinam (Lime of calcined Oyster Shells)."—Fryer, 40.

1689.—"Chinam is Lime made of Cockle-shells, or Lime-stone; and Pawn is the Leaf of a Tree."—Ovington, 128.

1750-60.—"The flooring is generally composed of a kind of loam or stucco, called chunam, being a lime made of burnt shells."—Gore, i. 52.

1763.—"In the Chuckleth of Silet for the space of five years, my pashadar and the Company's gomastâh shall jointly prepare chunam, of which each shall defray all expenses, and half the chunam so made shall be given to the Company, and the other half shall be for my use."—Treaty of Mir Jaffir with the Company, in Curran's L. of Oltr. i. 64.

1809.—"The row of chunam pillars which supported each side...were of a shining white."—Ld. Valentia, i. 81.

CHUNAM, TO, v. To set in mortar; or, more frequently, to plaster over with chunam.

1687.—"...to get what great jars he can, to put wheat in, and chunam them up, and set them round the fort curtain."—In Wheeler, i. 183.

1857.—"...having one...room...beautifully chunammed."—Ld. Valentia, i. 386.

Both noun and verb are used also in the Anglo-Chinese settlements.

CHUNÁBGURH, n.p. A famous rock-fort on the Ganges, above Benares, and on the right bank. The name is believed to be a corr. of Churana-giri, 'Foot Hill,' a name probably given from the actual resemblance of the rock, seen in longitudinal profile, to a human foot. [There is a local legend that it represents the foot of Vishnu. A native folk etymology makes it a corr. of Chandilgarh, from some legendary connection with the Bhangi tribe (see CHANDALU). (See Crooke, Tribes and Castes, i. 263.)]

1785.—"Sensible of the vast importance of the fort of Chunar to Sujah al Dowlah...we have directed Col. Barker to reinforce the garrison..."—Letter to Court of Directors, in Veritas, App. 78.

CHUPATTY, s. H. chappudi, an unleavened cake of bread (generally of coarse wheaten meal), patted flat with the hand, and baked upon a griddle; the usual form of native bread, and the staple food of Upper India. (See HOPPER.)

1615.—Parson Terry well describes the thing, but names it not: "The ordinary sort of people eat bread made of a coarse grain, but both toothsome and wholesome and hearty. They make it up in broad cakes, thick like our oatcakes; and then bake it upon a small round iron hearths which they carry with them."—In Furches, ii. 1468.

1810.—"Chow-patties, or bannocks."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 348.

1857.—"...From village to village brought by one messenger and sent forward by another passed a mysterious token in the shape of one of those flat cakes made from flour and water, and forming the common bread of the people, which in their language, are called chupatties."—Kaye's Neopy War, i. 570. [The original account of this by the Correspondent of the 'Times' dated "Bombay, March 3, 1857," is quoted in 2 ser. N. & Q. iii. 365.]

There is a tradition of a noble and gallant Governor-General who, when compelled to rough it for a day or two, acknowledged that "chupressies and musauchies were not such bad diet," meaning Chupatties and Mussalla.

CHUPKUN, s. H. chapkan. The long frock (or cassock) which is the usual dress in Upper India of nearly all male natives who are not actual labourers or indigent persons. The word is probably of Turki or Mongol origin, and is perhaps identical with the chakman of the Ain (i. 90), a word still used in Turkestan. [Vambéry, (Sketches, 121 seq.) describes both the Tchap or upper coat and the Tchkem or gown.] Hence Beames's connection of chapkan with the idea of chap as meaning compressing or clinging [Platts chapaknd, 'to be pressed'], "a tightly-fitting coat or cassock," is a little fanciful. (Comp. Gram. i. 212 seq.) Still this idea may have shaped the corruption of a foreign word.

1883.—"He was, I was going to say, in his shirt-sleeves, only I am not sure that he wore a shirt in those days— I think he had a chupkun, or native under-garment."—C. Ratles, in L. of Ed. Lawrence, i. 59.
CHUPRA, n.p. Chapra, [or perhaps rather Chhapa, 'a collection of straw huts,' (see CHOPPER),] a town and head-quarter station of the District Saraan in Bahar, on the north bank of the Ganges.

1665. "The Holland Company have a House there (at Patna) by reason of their trade in Salt Peter, which they refine at a great Town called Chuppar, ... 10 leagues above Patna."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 53; [ed. Ball, i. 122].

1728. "Chuppers, (Chupra)."—Valentinj, Chorom., &c., 147.

CHUPRASSY, s. H. chapra, the bearer of a chapra, i.e. a badge-plate inscribed with the name of the office to which the bearer is attached. The chapra is an office-messenger, or henchman, bearing such a badge on a cloth or leather belt. The term belongs to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras Peon is the usual term; in Bombay Puttywalla, (H. pattowlda), or "man of the belt." The etymology of chapra is obscure; [the popular account is that it is a corr. of P. chap-o-rat, 'left and right']; but see Beames, 's H. chaprasi, the usual term. The Swingning Festival of the Hindus, held on the Sūkh's entrance into Aries. The performer is sus-

CHURB, s. H. char, Skt. char, 'to move.' A sand-bank or island in the current of a river, deposited by the water, claims to which were regulated by the Bengal Reg. xi. 1825" (Wilson). A char is a new alluvial land deposited by the great rivers as the floods are sinking, and covered with grass, but not necessarily insulated. It is remarkable that Mr. Marsh mentions a very similar word as used for the same thing in Holland. "New sandbank land, covered with grasses, is called in Zeeland schor" (Man and Nature, p. 339). The etymologies are, however, probably quite apart.

1878. "In the dry season all the various streams . . . are merely silver threads wind-

CHURB, s. A wheel or any rotating machine; particularly applied to simple machines for cleaning cotton. Pers. charkā, 'the celestial sphere,' 'a wheel of any kind,' &c. Beng. charak is apparently a corruption of the Persian word, facilitated by the near-

CHURBUS, s.

a H. charas. A simple apparatus worked by oxen for drawing water from a well, and discharging it into irrigation channels by means of pulley ropes, and a large bag of hide (H. chara, Skt. charma). [See the description in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 153. Hence the area irrigated from a well.]

[1829.—"To each Chuttus, charus, or skin of land, there is attached twenty-five bighas of irrigated land."—Todd, Annals (Calcutta repr.), ii. 888.]

b. H. charus, [said to be so called because the drug is collected by men who walk with leather aprons through the field]. The resinous exudation of the hemp-plant (Cannabis Indica), which is the basis of intoxicating preparations (see BANG, GUNJA).

CHUTKARRY, CHATTAGAR, in S. India, a half-caste; Tam. shatti-kar, 'one who wears a waistcoat' (C. P. B).

CHUTNY, s. H. chatni. A kind of strong relish, made of a number of condiments and fruits, &c., used in India, and more especially by Mahomedans, and the merits of which are now well known in England. For native chutny recipes, see Herklotz, Qanoon-e-Islam, 2nd ed. xlvi. seqq.

1813.—"The Chatna is sometimes made with cocoa-nut, lime-juice, garlic, and chillies, and with the pickles is placed in deep leaves round the large cover, to the number of 30 or 40."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 50 seqq.; [2nd ed. i. 348].

1820.—"Chutnis, Chatnai, some of the hot spices made into a paste, by being bruised with water, the 'kitchen' of an Indian peasant."—Arc. of Township of Loony, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, ii. 194.

CHUT, s. H. chhat. The proper meaning of the vernacular word is 'a roof or platform.' But in modern Anglo-Indian its usual application is to the coarse cotton sheeting, stretched on a frame and whitewashed, which forms the usual ceiling of rooms in thatched or tiled houses; properly chadarr-chhat, 'sheet-ceiling.'

CHUTTANUTTY, n.p. This was one of the three villages purchased for the East India Company in 1866, when the agents found their position in Hugli intolerable, to form the settlement which became the city of Calcutta. The other two villages were Calcutta and Govindpur. Dr. Hunter spells it Sutanati, but the old Anglo-Indian orthography indicates Chattanati as probable. In the letter-books of the Factory Council in the India Office the earlier letters from this establishment are lost, but down to 27th March, 1700, they are dated from "Chuttanutte"; on and after June 8th, from "Calcutta"; and from August 20th in the same year from "Fort William" in Calcutta. [See Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lix.] According to Major Ralph Smyth, Chattanati occupied "the site of the present native town," i.e. the northern quarter of the city. Calcutta stood on what is now the European commercial part; and Govindpur on the present site of Fort William.*

CHUTTRUM. s. Tam shattiram, which is a corruption of Skt. sattra, 'abode.' In S. India a house where pilgrims and travelling members of the higher castes are entertained and fed gratuitously for a day or two. [See CHOULTRY, DURBTRALLA.]

1807.—"There are two distinct kinds of buildings confounded by Europeans under the name of Choultry. The first is that called by the natives Chatram, and built for the accommodation of travellers. These . . . have in general pent roofs . . . built in the form of a square enclosing a court . . . The other kind are properly built for the reception of images, when these are carried in procession. These have flat roofs, and consist of one apartment only, and by the natives are called Mundapam . . . Besides the Chatram and the Mundapam, there is another kind of building which by Europeans is called 'Choultry' in the Tamul language it is called Tun Pundal, or Water Shed . . . small buildings where weary travellers may enjoy a temporary repose in the shade, and obtain a draught of water or milk."—F. Buchanan, Mysore, i. 11, 15.

CINDERELLA'S SLIPPER. A Hindu story on the like theme appears among the Hala Kanara MSS. of the Mackenzie Collection:—

"Swarnadesi having dropped her slipper in a reservoir, it was found by a fisherman of Kansmukari, who sold it to a shopkeeper, by whom it was presented to the King's Upadhyako. The Prince, on seeing the beauty of the slipper, fell in love with the wearer, and offered large rewards to any person who should find and bring her to him. An old woman undertook the task, and succeeded in tracing the shoe to its owner."

—Mackenzie Collection, by H. H. Wilson, ii. 52. [The tale is not uncommon in Indian folk-lore. See Miss Cur, Cinderella (Folk-lore Soc.), ii. 91, 183, 465, &c.]

CINTRA ORANGES. See ORANGE and SUNGTTARA.

CIRCARS, n.p. The territory to the north of the Coromandel Coast, formerly held by the Nizam, and now forming the districts of Kistna, Godavari, Vizagapatam, Ganjam, and a part of Nellore, was long known by the title of "The Circars," or "Northern Circars" (i.e. Governments), now officially obsolete. The Circars of Chicacole (now Vizagapatam Dist.), Rajamandri and Ellore (these two embraced now in Godavari Dist.), with Condapilly (now embraced in Kistna Dist.), were the subject of a grant from the Great Mogul, obtained by Clive in 1765, confirmed by treaty with the Nizam in 1766. Guntur (now also included in Kistna Dist.) devolved eventually by the same treaty (but did not come permanently under British rule till 1803. [For the history see Madras Admin. Man. i. 179.] C. P. Brown says the expression "The Circars" was first used by the French, in the time of Bussy. [Another name for the Northern Circars was the Carling or Carlingo country, apparently a corr. of Kalinja (see KLING), see Pringle, Diary, &c., of Rt. St. George, 1st ser. vol. 2, p. 125. (See SIRCARS.)]

1767. —"Letter from the Chief and Council at Masulipatam . . . that in consequence of orders from the President and Council of Fort St. George for securing and sending away all vagrant Europeans that might be met with in the Circars, they have embarked there for this place . . ."—Fort William Coun., in Long, 476 seq.

1789. —"The most important public transaction . . . is the surrender of the Guntoo Circars to the Company, by which it becomes possessed of the whole Coast, from Jaggernaut to Cape Comorin. The Nizam made himself master of that province, soon after Hyder's invasion of the Carnatic, as an equivalent for the arrears of peacehath, due to him by the Company for the other Circars."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life by Glegg, i. 70.

1823. —"Although the Sirkars are our earliest possessions, there are none, perhaps, of which we have so little accurate knowledge in everything that regards the condition of the people."—Sir T. Munro, in Selections, &c., by Sir A. Arbutnot, i. 204.

We know from the preceding quotation what Munro's spelling of the name was.

1836. —"The district called the Circars, in India, is part of the coast which extends from the Carnatic to Bengal. . . . The domestic economy of the people is singular; they inhabit villages ('), and all labour is performed by public servants paid from the public stock."—Phillips, Million of Facts, 320.

1878. —"General Sir J. C., C.B., K.C.S.I. He entered the Madras Army in 1820, and in 1834, according to official despatches, displayed 'active zeal, intrepidity, and judgment' in dealing with the savage tribes in Orissa known as the Circars' (!!!).—Obituary Notice in Home Journal, April 21.

CIVILIAN, s. A term which came into use about 1750-1770, as a designation of the covenanted European servants of the E. I. Company, not in military employ. It is not used by Grose, c. 1760, who was himself of such service at Bombay. [The earliest quotation in the N.E.D. is of 1766 from Malcolm's L. of Clive, 54.] In Anglo-Indian parlance it is still appropriate to members of the covenanted Civil Service [see COVENANTED SERVANTS]. The Civil Service is mentioned in Carraccialli's L. of Clive, (c. 1785), iii. 164. From an early date in the Company's history up to 1833, the members of the Civil Service were classified during the first five years as Writers (q.v.), then to the 8th year as Factors (q.v.) ; in the 9th and 11th as Junior Merchants; and thenceforward as Senior Merchants. These names were relics of the original commercial character of the E. I. Company's transactions, and had long ceased to have any practical meaning at the time of their abolition in 1833, when the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 85), removed the last traces of the Company’s commercial existence.

1848.—(Lady O’Dowd’s) “quarrel with Lady Smith, wife of Mines Smith, the puisne Judge, is still remembered by some at Madras, when the Colonel’s lady snapped her fingers in the Judge’s lady’s face, and said she’d never walk behind ever a beggarly civilan.” — Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 85.

1872.—“You boasted civilians are never satisfied, retorted the other.” — A True Reformer, i. 4.

CLASSY, CLASHY. s. H. khalâs, usual etym. from Arab khalâs. A tent-pitcher; also (because usually taken from that class of servants) a man employed as chain-man or staff-man, &c., by a surveyor; a native sailor; or Matross (q.v.). Khalâs is constantly used in Hindustani in the sense of ‘liberation;’ thus, of a prisoner, a magistrate says ‘khalâs karo,’ ‘let him go.’ But it is not clear how Khalâs got its ordinary Indian sense. It is also written khalâshi, and Vollere has an old Pers. word khalashâ for a ship’s rudder. A learned friend suggests that this may be the real origin of khalâs in its Indian use. [Khalâs also means the ‘escape channel of a canal,’ and khalâs may have been originally a person in charge of such a work.]

1785.—“A hundred clashies have been sent to you from the presence.” — Tippo’s Letters, 171.

1801.—“The sepoy in a body were to bring up the rear. Our left flank was to be covered by the sea, and our right by Gopî Nath’s men. Then our clashies and other armed followers.”—Mt. Stewart Elphinstone, in Life, i. 27.

1824.—“If the tents got dry, the clashies (tent-pitchers) allowed that we might proceed in the morning prosperously.” — Heber, ed. 1844, i. 194.

CLEARING NUT, WATER FILTER NUT. s. The seed of Strychnos potatorum, L.; a tree of S. India; [known in N. India as nirmal, nirmali, ‘dirt-cleaner’]. It is so called from its property of clearing muddy water, if well rubbed on the inside of the vessel which is to be filled.

CLOVE, s. The flower-bud of Caryophyllum aromaticum, L., a tree of the Moluccas. The modern English name of this spice is a kind, of ellipsis from the French cloue de girofles, ‘Nails of Girofles,’ i.e. of garofola, Caryophyllus, &c., the name by which this spice was known to the ancients; the full old English name was similar, ‘clove gillofloure,’ a name which, cut in two like a polypus, has formed two different creatures, the clove (or nail) being assigned to the spice, and the ‘gillyflower’ to a familiar clove-smelling flower. The comparison to nails runs through many languages. In Chinese the thing is called ting-hvng, or ‘nail-spice’; in Persian mehak, ‘little nails,’ or ‘nailkins,’ like the German Nelken, Nögelchen, and Gewürz-nagel (spice nail).

[1602-3.—“Also be careful to get together all the clones you can.” — Birdwood, First Letter Book, 36.]

COAST, THE. n.p. This term in books of the 18th century means the ‘Madras or Coromandel Coast, and often ‘the Madras Presidency.’ It is curious to find Pârâlaha, “the Shore,” applied in a similar specific way, in Ptolemy, to the coast near Cape Comorin. It will be seen that the term “Coast Army,” for “Madras Army,” occurs quite recently. The Persian rendering of Coast Army by Bandari below is curious.

1781.—“Just imported from the Coast . . . a very fine assortment of the following cloths.” — India Gazette, Sept. 15.

1783.—“Unseduced by novelty, and un-influenced by example, the belles of the Coast have courage enough to be fashionable . . . and we still see their charming tresses flow in luxuriant ringlets.” — Hugh Boyd, 78.

1800.—“I have only 1892 Coast and 1200 Bombay sepoys.” — Wellington, i. 227.

1802.—“From Hydrubâd also, Colonels Roberts and Dalrymple, with 4000 of the Bandari or coast sipahes.” — H. of Reign of Tipû Sûltân, E. T. by Miles, p. 263.

1879.—“Is it any wonder then, that the Coast Army has lost its ancient renown, and that it is never employed, as an army should be, in fighting the battles of its country, or its employers!” — Pollok, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 26.

COBANG. See KOBANG.

COBILY MASH. s. This is the dried bonito (q.v.), which has for ages been a staple of the Maldive Islands. It is still especially esteemed in Achin and other Malay countries. The name is explained below by Pyrard as 'black fish,' and he is generally to be depended on. But the first accurate elucidation has been given by Mr. H. C. P. Bell, of the Ceylon C. S., in the Indian Antiquary for Oct. 1882, p. 294; see also Mr. Bell's Report on Maldive Islands, Colombo, 1882, p. 93, where there is an account of the preparation. It is the Maldive kalu-bili-mās, 'black-bonito-fish.' The second word corresponds to the Singhalese balaya.

c. 1345.—"Its flesh is red, and without fat, but it smells like mutton. When caught each fish is cut in four, slowly boiled, and then placed in baskets of palm-leaf, and hung in the smoke. When perfectly dry it is eaten. From this country it is exported to India, China, and Yemen. It is called Ko lbal-mās."—Ibn Batuta (on Maldives), iv. 112. and 311.

1578.—"... They eat it with a sort of dried fish, which comes from the Islands of Maledivia, and resembles jerked beef, and it is called Comalamaſh."—Acosta, 103.

c. 1610.—"Ce poisson qui se prend ainsi, s'appelle generalement en leur langue Cobbolly masse, c'est à dire du poisson noir. Ils le font cuire en de l'eau de mer, et puis le font secour au feu sur des cendres, en sorte qu'estant see il se garde fort long-temps."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 138; see also 141; [Hak. Soc. i. 190 (with Gray's note) and 194].

1727.—"The Bonetta is caught with Hook Line, or with nets... they cut the Fish from the Back-bone on each Side, and lay them in a Shade to dry, sprinkling them sometimes with Sea Water. When they are dry enough... they wrap them up in Leaves of Cocoa-nut Trees, and put them a Foot or two under the Surface of the Sand, and with the Heat of the Sun, they become baked as hard as Stock-fish, and Ships come from Aicheen... and purchase them with Gold-dust. I have seen Comelamash (for that is their name after they are dried) sell at Aicheen for 8l. Sterl. per 1000."—A. Hamilton, i. 347; [ed. 1744, i. 350].

1733.—"Many Maldivia boats come yearly to Aicheen, and bring chiefly dried bonetta in four pieces about two or three ounces each... this is a sort of staple article of commerce, many shops in the Bazar deal in it only, having large quantities piled up, put in mat bags. It is when properly cured, hard like horn in the middle; when kept long the worm gets to it."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 46.

1813.—"The fish called Comel mutch, so much esteemed in Malabar, is caught at Minioy."—Mulvern, i. 321, also 356.

1841.—"The Sultan of the Maldive Islands sends an agent or minister every year to the government of Ceylon with presents consisting of... a considerable quantity of dried fish, consisting of bonitos, albicorae, and fish called by the inhabitants of the Maldives the black' fish, or comboll mas."—J. R. As. Soc. vi. 717.

The same article contains a Maldivian vocabulary, in which we have "Bonito or goomulmutch... kuanaimas" (p. 49). Thus we have in this one paper three corrupt forms of the same expression, viz. comboll mas, kuanail mas, and goomulmutch, all attempts at the true Maldivian term kalubili-mās, 'black bonito fish.'

COBRA DE CAPELLO, or simply COBRA. s. The venomous snake Noja tripudiana. Cobra [Lat. colubra] is Port. for 'snake'; cobra de capello, 'snake of the hood.' [In the following we have a curious translation of the name: "Another sort, which is called Chapelsnakes, because they keep in Chapels or Churches, and sometimes in Houses" (A Relation of Two Several Voyages made into the East Indies, by Christopher Fryke, Surg. ... London, 1700, p. 291).]

1593.—"A few days before, cobras de capello had been secretly introduced into the fort, which bit some black people who died thereof, both men and women; and when this news became known it was perceived that they must have been introduced by the hand of some one, for since the fort was made never had the like been heard of."—Correas, ii. 778.

1539.—"... Adders that were copped on the crowns of their heads, as big as a man's thigh, and so venomous, as the Negros of the country informed us, that if any living thing came within the reach of their breath, it dyed presently..."—Cogan's Transl., p. 17.

1563.—"In the beautiful island of Ceylon... there are yet many serpents of the kind which are vulgarly called Cobras de capello; and in Latin we may call them regulus serpens."—Garcia, f. 156.

1672.—"In Jafnapatam, in my time, there lay among others in garrison a certain High German who was commonly known as the Snake-Catcher; and this man was summoned by our Commander to lay hold of a Cobra Capel that was in his Chamber. And this the man did, merely holding his hat before his eyes, and seizing it with his hand, without any damage... I had my suspicions that this was done by some devilry... but he maintained that it was all by natural means..."—Baldarus (Germ. ed.) 25.

Some forty-nine or fifty years ago a staff-sergeant at Delhi had a bull-dog that used to catch cobras in much the same way as this High-Dutchman did.

1710.—"The Brother Francisco Rodrigues persevered for the whole 40 days in these exercises, and as the house was of clay, and his cell adjoined the garden, it was invaded by cobra de capelo, and he made report of this inconvenience to the Father-Rector. But his answer was that these were not the snakes that did spiritual harm; and so left the Brother in the same cell. This and other admirable instances have always led me to doubt if S. Paul did not communicate to his Paulists in India the same virtue as of the tongues of S. Paul,* for the snakes in these parts are so numerous and so venomous, and though our Missionaries make such long journeys through wild uncultivated places, there is no account to this day that any Paulist was ever bitten."—F. de Souza, Oriente Conquistado, Conq. i. Div. i. cap. 78.

1711.—Bluteau, in his great Port. Dict., explains Cobra de Capelo as a "reptile (bicho) of Brazil." But it is only a slip; what is further said shows that he meant to say India.

c. 1713.—"En secouant la peau de cerf sur laquelle nous avons coutume de nous assosier, il en sortit un gros serpent de ceux qu'on appelle en Portugal Cobra de Capelo."—Lettres Ed., ed. 1781, xi. 83.

1838.—"In my walks abroad I generally carry a strong, supple walking cane. . . . Armed with it, you may rout and slaughter the hottest-tempered cobra in Hindustan. Let it rear itself up and spread its spectacle head-gear and bluster as it will, but one rap on the side of its head will bring it to reason."—Tribes on my Frontier, 188-9.

COBRA LILY, s. The flower Arum campanulatum, which stands on its curving stem exactly like a cobra with a reared head.

COBRA MANILLA, or MINELLE, s. Another popular name in S. India for a species of venomous snake, perhaps a little uncertain in its application. Dr. Russell says the Bungarius caeruleus was sent to him from Masulipatam, with the name Cobra Monti, whilst Günther says this name is given in S. India to the Daboia Russelli, or Tuc-Polonga (q.v.) (see Fairer's Thamnophsida, pp. 11 and 15). [The Madras Gloss. calls it the chain-viper, Daboia elegans.] One explanation of the name is given in the quotation from Lockyer. But the name is really Mahr. maver, from Skt. mansi, 'a jewel.' There are judicious remarks in a book lately quoted, regarding the popular names and popular stories of snakes, which apply, we suspect, to all the quotations under the following heading:

"There are names in plenty. . . . but they are applied promiscuously to any sort of snake, real or imaginary, and are therefore of no use. The fact is, that in real life, as distinguished from romance, snakes are so seldom seen, that no one who does not make a study of them can know one from the other."—Tribes on my Frontier, 197.

1773.—"The Cobra Manilla, or Minelle, is a small bluish snake, the size of a man's little finger, and about a foot long, very often seen about old walls."—*Isa. 43.

1780.—"The most dangerous of these reptiles are the coverymanil and the green snake. The first is a beautiful little creature, very lively, and about 6 or 7 inches long. It creeps into all private corners of houses, and is often found coiled up between the sheets, or perhaps under the pillow of one's bed. Its sting is said to inflict immediate death, though I must confess, for my own part, I never heard of any dangerous accident occasioned by it."—Munro's Narrative, 34.

1810.—". . . . Here, too, lurks the small bright speckled Cobra manilla, whose fangs convey instant death."—Maria Graham, 23.

1813.—"The Cobra minelle is the smallest and most dangerous; the bite occasions a speedy and painful death."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 42; [2nd ed. i. 27].

COCHIN, n.p. A famous city of Malabar, Malayal. Kochchi, ['a small place'] which the nasalising, so usual with the Portuguese, converted into Cochim or Cochin. We say "the Portuguese" because we seem to owe so many nasal terminations of words in Indian use to them; but it is evident that the real origin of this nasal was in some cases anterior to their arrival, as in the present case (see the first quotations), and in that of Acheen (q.v.). Padre Paolino says the town was called after the small river "Coci" (as he writes it). It will be seen that

* Lingue di Saraondo, is a name given to fossil sharks' teeth, which are commonly found in Malta, and in parts of Sicily.

* I have seen more snakes in a couple of months at the Bagli di Luca, than in any two years passed in India.—H. Y.

By Burton:

Cochin-China, n.p. This country was called by the Malays Kuchi, and apparently also, to distinguish it from Kuchi of India (or Cochim), Kuchi-China, a term which the Portuguese adopted as Coacli-China; the Dutch and English from them. Kuchi occurs in this sense in the Malay traditions called Sijara Malav (see J. Ind. Archip., v. 729). In its origin this word Kuchi is no doubt a foreigner's form of the Annamite Ku-choin (Chin. Kiu-Ching, South Chin. Kau-Chen), which was the ancient name of the province Thanh-hoa, in which the city of Hué has been the capital since 1398.*

1516.—"And he (Fernão Peres) set sail from Malaca . . . in August of the year 516, and got into the Gulf of Concom china, which he entered in the night, escaping by miracle from being lost on the shoals. . . ."—Correia, ii. 474.

COCHIN-LEG.  227  COCKROACH.

1662. — "Cochin-China is bounded on the West with the Kingdoms of Brama; on the East, with the Great Realm of China; on the North extending towards Tartary; and on the South, bordering on Cambodia." — P. Heylin, Cosmographie, iii. 239.

1727. — "Cochin-china has a large Seacoast of about 700 Miles in Extent . . . and it has the Conveniency of many good Harbours on it, tho' they are not frequented by Strangers." — A. Hamilton, ii. 208; [ed. 1744].

COCHIN-LEG.  A name formerly given to elephantiasis, as it prevailed in Malabar. [The name appears to be still in use (Bowdell, Man. of Nellore, 33). Linschoten (1598) describes it in Malabar (Hak. Soc. i. 288), and it was also called "St. Thomas's leg" (see an account with refs. in Gray, Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 392).]

1757. — "We could not but take notice at this place (Cochin) of the great number of the Cochin, or Elephant legs." — Isee, 198.

1818. — "Cochin-Leg, or elephantiasis." — Forbes, Or Mon. i. 327; [2nd ed. i. 207].

COCKATOOT, a. This word is taken from the Malay kakatwa. According to Crawfurd the word means properly 'a vice,' or 'gripe,' but is applied to the bird. It seems probable, however, that the name, which is asserted to be the natural cry of the bird, may have come with the latter from some remoter region of the Archipelago, and the name of the tool may have been taken from the bird. This would be more in accordance with usual analogy. [Mr. Skeat writes: "There is no doubt that Sir H. Yule is right here and Crawfurd wrong. Kakak tua (or tuo) means in Malay, if the words are thus separated, 'old sister,' or 'old lady.' I think it is possible that it may be a familiar Malay name for the bird, like our 'Polly.' The final k in kakak is a mere click, which would easily drop out.""]

1654. — "Some rarities of natural things, but nothing extraordinary save the skin of a jackall, a rarely colour'd jacatos or prodigious parrot." — Evelyn's Diary, July 11.

1705. — "The Crockodore is a Bird of various Sizes, some being as big as a Hen, and others no bigger than a Pidgeon. They are in all Parts exactly of the shape of a Parrot. . . . When they fly wild up and down the Woods they will call Crockodore, Crockodore; for which reason they go by that name." — Funnel, in Dampier, iv. 285-6.

1719. — "Maccaw, Cockatoons, plowers, and a great variety of other birds of curious colours." — Shelvoke's Voyage, 54-55.

1775. — "At Soloo there are no Loories, but the Cucatones have yellow tufts." — Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 295.

1843. — " . . . saucy Kroootoans, and gaudy-coloured Loris." — Belcher, Narr. of Voyage of Samarang, i. 16.

COCKROACH, a. This objectionable insect (Blatta orientalis) is called by the Portuguese cucalaca, for the reason given by Bontius below; a name adopted by the Dutch as kakeralik, and by the French as cancralat. The Dutch also apply their term as a slang name to half-caes. But our word seems to have come from the Spanish, cucaracha. The original application of this Spanish name appears to have been to a common insect found under water-vessels standing on the ground, &c. (apparently Oniscus, or woodlouse) ; but as cucaracha de Indias it was applied to the insect now in question (see Dic. de la Lengua Castellana, 1729).

1597. — "We were likewise annoyed not a little by the biting of an Indian fly called Caceracho, a name agreeable to its bad condition; for living it vast our flesh; and being kill'd smelt as loathsome as the French punaise, whose smell is odious." — Herbert's Travels, 3rd ed., 332-33.

1598. — "There is a kind of beast that flyeth, twice as big as a Bee, and is called Baratta (Blatta)." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 804.

1651. — "Scaraeaco autem hos Lusitani Caca-laccas vocant, quod ova quae excludunt, colorem et laevorem Laccas facitiae (i.e. of sealing-wax) referant." — Jac. Bontii, lib. v. cap 4.

c. 1775. — "Most of my shirts, books, &c., were gnawed to dust by the blatta or cockroach, called cuckerlukke in Surinam." — Steedman, i. 203.
COCKUP, s. An excellent table-fish, found in the mouths of tidal rivers in most parts of India. In Calcutta it is generally known by the Beng. name of bgtti or bhiki (see BHITY), and it forms the daily breakfast dish of half the European gentlemen in that city. The name may be a corruption, we know not of what; or it may be given from the erect sharp spines of the dorsal fin. [The word is a corr. of the Malay (skan) kakap, which Klinkert defines as a palatable sea-fish, Lat. nobilis, the more common form being siyakap.] It is Lat. calcarifer (Günther) of the group Percina, family Percidae, and grows to an immense size, sometimes to eight feet in length.

COCO, COCOA, COCOA-NUT, and (vulg.) COKER-NUT, s. The tree and nut Cocos nucifera, L.; a palm found in all tropical countries, and the only one common to the Old and New Worlds.

The etymology of this name is very obscure. Some conjectural origins are given in the passages quoted below. Ritter supposes, from a passage in Pigafetta's Voyage of Magellan, which we cite, that the name may have been indigenous in the Ladrones Islands, to which that passage refers, and that it was first introduced into Europe by Magellan's crew. On the other hand, the late Mr. C. W. Goodwin found in ancient Egyptian the word kuku used as "the name of the fruit of a palm 60 cubits high, which fruit contained water." (Chabas, Mêlanges Egyptologiques, ii. 239.) It is hard, however, to conceive how this name should have survived, to reappear in Europe in the later Middle Ages, without being known in any intermediate literature.*

The more common etymology is that which is given by Barros, Garcia de Orta, Linschoten, &c., as from a Spanish word coco applied to a monkey's or other grotesque face, with reference to the appearance of the base of the shell with its three holes. But after all may the term not have originated in the old Span. coca, 'a shell' (presumably Lat. concha), which we have also in French coque, properly an egg-shell, but used also for the shell of any nut. (See a remark under COFRATE.)

The Skt. narikula [nârikera, nârikâla] has originated the Pers. nàrgil, which Cosmas grecizes into ṣeṣgellôs, [and H. ndriyal].

Medieval writers generally (such as Marco Polo, F. Jordanus, &c.) call the fruit the Indian Nut, the name by which it was known to the Arabs (al jauas-al-Hindi). There is no evidence of its having been known to classical writers, nor are we aware of any Greek or Latin mention of it before Cosmas. But Brugsch, describing from the Egyptian wall-paintings of c. B.C. 1600, on the temple of Queen Hashop, representing the expeditions by sea which she sent to the Incense Land of Punt, says: "Men never seen before, the inhabitants of this divine land, showed themselves on the coast, not less astonished than the Egyptians. They lived on pile-buildings, in little dome-shaped huts, the entrance to which was effected by a ladder, under the shade of bowzû-bôwi laden with fruit, and splendid incense-trees, on whose boughs strange fowls rocked themselves, and at whose feet herds of cattle peacefully reposed." (H. of Egypt, 2nd ed., i. 353; [Maepero, Struggle of the Nations, 248].)

1292. — "The Indian Nuts are as big as melons, and in colour green, like gourds. Their leaves and branches are like those of the date-tree." — John of Monte Corvino, in do., p. 213.

*It may be noted that Theophrastus describes under the names of kokas and sóki a palm of Ethiopia, which was perhaps the Doom palm of Upper Egypt (Theop., H. E. ii. 6, 10). Schneider, the editor of Theop., states that Sprengel identified this with the coca-palm. See the quotation from Pliny below.*
minds they referred it to that "tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruit, and yielded her fruit every month" (Apocal. xxiii. 2).

c. 1340.—"Le nargil, appelé autrement noix d’Inde, auquel on ne peut comparer aucun autre fruit, est vert et remplit d’huile."—Shahabbudin Dimishki, in Not. et Err. xiii. 175.

c. 1550.—"Wonderful fruits there are, which we never see in these parts, such as the Nargil. Now the Nargil is the Indian Nut."—John Marquardt, in Cathay, p. 352.

1498-99.—"And we who were nearest boarded the vessel, and found nothing in her but provisions and arms; and the provisions consisted of coquos and of four jars of certain casks of palm-sugar, and there was nothing else but sand for ballast."—Riotteiro de Vasco da Gama, 94.

1510.—Varthema gives an excellent account of the tree; but he uses only the Malay name tenga. [Tam. tenga, ten, ‘south’ as it was supposed to have been brought from Ceylon.]

1516.—"These trees have clean smooth stems, without any branch, only a tuft of leaves at the top, amongst which grows a large fruit which they call tenga. We call these fruits quosas."

Barbois, 154 (collating Portuguese of Lisbon Academy, p. 346).

1519.—"Cocas (coche) are the fruits of palm-trees, and as we have bread, wine, oil, and vinegar, so in that country they extract all these things from one tree."

—Pigafetta, Viaggio intorno il Mondo, in Rasmuso, i. f. 356.

1553.—"Our people have given it the name of coco, a word applied by women to anything with which they try to frighten children; and this name has stuck, because nobody knew any other, though the proper name was, as the Malayars call it, tenga, or as the Canarins call it, narte."—Barros, Dec. III. liv. iii. cap. 7.

c. 1561.—Correia writes coquos.—I. i. 115.

1563.—"... We have given it the name of coco, because it looks like the face of a monkey, or of some other animal."—Garcia, 666.

"That which we call coco, and the Malayars Tenga."—Ibid. 675.

1578.—"The Portuguese call it coccus (because of those three holes that it has)."—Acosta, 98.

1598.—"Another that bears the Indian nuts called Cococos, because they have within them a certain shell that is like an ape; and on this account they use in Spain to show to children a Cococo when they would make them afraid."—English trans. of Pigafetta’s Congo, in Harleian Coll. ii. 553.

The parallel passage in De Bry runs: "Illes quoque quae nunc Indicas cocosas, id est Simias (intus enim simiae caput rerum) dictas palmas appellant."—i. 29.

Purchas has various forms in different narratives: Coccos (i. 37); Cokkers, a form which still holds its ground among London stall-keepers and coastmongers (i. 461, 502); coquer-nute (Terry, in i. 1480); coco (ii. 1006); coquo (Pilgrimage, 667), &c.

c. 1610.—"None, however, is more useful than the coco or Indian nut, which they (in the Maldives) call ronl (Mălă, rū)."—Pygurard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 113.]

c. 1690.—Rumphius, who has cocoas in Latin, and cocots in Dutch, mentions the derivation already given as that of Lin- schoten and many others, but proceeds:—

". . . in India Occidentali kokknoct vocatus . . ."—Ibid. p. 47.

One would like to know where Rumphius got the term Cock-Indi, of which we can find no trace.

1810.—

"What if he felt no wind! The air was still.
That was the general will Of Nature . . . .
Yon rows of rice erect and silent stand,
The shadow of the Coco’s lightest plume
Is steady on the sand."

Curse of Kohama, iv. 4.

1831.—"Among the popular French slang words for ‘head’ we may notice the term coco,” given—like our own ‘nut’—on account of the similarity in shape between a cocos-nut and a human skull:—

"‘Mal de ce franc picton de table
Qui rend spirituel, aimable,
Sans vous alourdir le coco,
Je m’en fourre à gogo.’—H. VALÊRE.

The Dict. Hist. d’Argot of Lérodan La Rochey, from which this seems taken, explains picton as ‘vin supérieur.’

COCO-DE-MEB, or DOUBLE COCO-NUT. s. The curious twin fruit so called, the produce of the Lodoices Sechellarum, a palm growing only in the Seychelles Islands, is cast up on the shores of the Indian Ocean, most frequently on the Maldives Islands, but occasionally also on Ceylon and S. India, and on the coasts of Zanzibar, of Sumatra, and some others of the Malay Islands, Great virtues as medicine and antidote were supposed to reside in these fruits, and extravagant prices were paid for them. The story goes that a "country captain," expecting to make his fortune, took a cargo of these nuts from the Seychelles Islands to Calcutta, but the only result was to destroy their value for the future.

The old belief was that the fruit was produced on a palm growing below the sea, whose fronds, according to Malay seamen, were sometimes seen in quiet bights on the Sumatran coast, especially in the Lampang Bay. According to one form of the story among the Malays, which is told both by Pigafetta and by Rumphius, there was but one such tree, the fronds of which rose above an abyss of the Southern Ocean, and were the abode of the monstrous bird Garuda (or Rukh of the Arabs—see BOC).* The tree itself was called Pausengi, which Rumphius seems to interpret as a corruption of Buwa-sangi, "Fruit of Zang" or E. Africa. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Rumphius is evidently wrong. . . . The first part of the word is 'Pau,' or 'Pauh,' which is perfectly good Malay, and is the name given to various species of mango, especially the wild one, so that 'Pausengi' represents (not 'Buwa,' but) 'Pauh Janggi,' which is to this day the universal Malay name for the tree which grows, according to Malay fable, in the central whirlpool or Navel of the Seas. Some versions add that it grows upon a sunken bank (têbing runtuk), and is guarded by dragons. This tree figures largely in Malay romances, especially those which form the subject of Malay shadow-plays (vide infra, Pl. 23, for an illustration of the Pauh Janggi and the Crab). Rumphius' explanation of the second part of the name (i.e. Janggi) is, no doubt, quite correct."—Malay Magic, pp. 6 seqq.) They were cast up occasionally on the islands off the S.W. coast of Sumatra; and the wild people of the islands brought them for sale to the Sumatran marts, such as Padang and Piamang. One of the largest (say about 12 inches across) would sell for 150 rix dollars. But the Malay princes coveted them greatly, and would sometimes (it was alleged) give a laden junk for a single nut. In India the best known source of supply was from the Maldive Islands. [In India it is known as Daryâ náriyal, or 'cocoa-nut of the sea,' and this term has been in Bombay corrupted into jakari (zahri) or 'poisonous,' so that the fruit is incorrectly regarded as dangerous to life. The hard shell is largely used to make Fakirs' water-bowls.] The medicinal virtues of the nut were not only famous among all the peoples of the East, including the Chinese, but are extolled by Piso and by Rumphius, with many details. The latter, learned and laborious student of nature as he was, believed in the submarine origin of the nut, though he discredited its growing on a great palm, as no traces of such a plant had ever been discovered on the coasts. The fame of the nut's virtues had extended to Europe, and the Emperor Rudolf II. in his later days offered in vain 4000 florins to purchase from the family of Wolfert Hermanzen, a Dutch Admiral, one that had been presented to that commander by the King of Bantam, on the Hollander's relieving his capital, attacked by the Portuguese, in 1602.

It will be seen that the Maldive name of this fruit was Têva-kârhi. The latter word is 'coco-nut,' but the meaning of tôva does not appear from any Malayive vocabulary. [The term is properly Têva'karhi, "the hard-shelled nut," (Gray, on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 231.) Rumphius states that a book in ãto (lotum opusculum) was published on this nut, at Amsterdam in 1634, by Augerius Clutius, M.D. [In more recent times the nut has become famous as the subject of curious speculations regarding it by the late Gen. Gordon.]

1522.—"They also related to us that beyond Java Major . . . there is an enormous tree named Camponganghi, in which dwell certain birds named Garuda, so large that they take with their claws, and carry away flying, a buffalo and even an elephant, to the place of the tree. . . . The fruit of this tree is called Buapanganghi, and is larger than a water-melon . . . it was understood that those fruits which are frequently found in the sea came from that place."—Pipefeda, Hak. Soc. p. 155.

The kernel of the fruit is looked upon here as a very efficacious antidote or a sovereign remedy against the Flux, the Epilepsy and Apoplexy. The inhabitants of the Maldives call it Tavacare. — Travels of Charles Peter Thunberg, M.D. (E.T.) iv. 209.

1833. — "The most extraordinary and valuable production of these islands (Seychelles) is the Coco Do Mar, or Maldivia nut, a tree which, from its singular character, deserves particular mention. — Owen, Narratives, ii. 186 sqq.

1882. — "Two minor products obtained by the islanders from the sea require notice. These are anbergris (M. gomum, malabarka) and the so-called 'sea-cocanutt' (M. teak-kahki) ... rated at so high a value in the estimation of the Maldivite Sultans as to be retained as part of their royalties." — H. C. P. Bell (Ceylon C. S.), Report on the Maldivian Islands, p. 87.

CODAVASCAM, n.p. A region with this puzzling name appears in the Map of Blaeu (c. 1650), and as Ryk van Codavascam in the Map of Bengal in Valentijn (vol. v.), to the E. of Chittagong. Wilford has some Willfordian nonsense about it, connecting it with the Tokordew R. of Potlemy, and with a Toussan which he says is mentioned by the "Portuguese writers" (in such case a criminal mode of expression). The name was really that of a Mahommedan chief, "hum Principe Mouro, grande Senhor," and "Vassalo del Rey de Bengala." It was probably "Khodabakhsh Khan." His territory must have been south of Chittagong, for one of his towns was Chakuria, still known as Chakiria on the Chittagong and Arakan Road, in lat 21° 45'. (See Barros, iv. ii. 8, and IV. ix. 1; and Couto, IV. iv. 10; also Correa, iii. 264-266, and again as below:

1858. — "But in the city there was the Rumi whose foist had been seized by Dimiko Bernalde; being a soldier (tavacora) of the King's, and seeing the present (offered by the Portugueses) he said: My lord, these are crafty robbers; they get into a country with their wares, and pretend to buy and sell, and make friendly gifts, whilst they go..."

COFFEE, s. Arab. kahva, a word which appears to have been originally a term for wine.* [So in the Arab. Nights, ii. 158, where Burton gives the derivation as akhd, fastidire facit, causing disinclination for food. In Nights, which a copy of an Arab.] It is possible, therefore, that a somewhat similar word was twisted into this form by the usual propensity to strive after meaning. Indeed, the derivation of the name Ltricta of the stricta of the plant, whilst some form of the word Bunn is that given to the plant, and Bun is the existing name of the plant in Shoa. This name is also that applied in Yemen to the coffee-berry. There is very fair evidence in Arabic literature that the use of coffee was introduced into Aden by a certain Sheikh Shihabuddin Dhabhani, who had made acquaintance with it on the African coast, and who died in the year H. 875, i.e. A.D. 1470, so that the introduction may be put about the middle of the 15th century, a time consistent with the other negative and positive data.† From Yemen it spread to Mecca (where there arose after some years, in 1116, a crusade against its use as unlawful), to Cairo, to Damascus and Aleppo, and to Constantinople, where the first coffee-house was established in 1564. [It is said to have been introduced into S. India some two centuries ago by a Mahomedan pilgrim, named Bābā Būdān, who brought a few seeds with him from Mecca: see Grigg, Nilagiri Man. 483; Rice, Mykore, i. 162.] The first European mention of coffee seems to be by Rauwolf, who knew it in Aleppo in 1573. [See 1 ser. N. & Q. i. 26 seqq.] It is singular that in the Observations of Pierre Belon, who was in Egypt, 1546-49, full of intelligence and curious matter as they are, there is no indication of a knowledge of coffee.

1573.—"Among the rest they have a very good Drink, by them called Chaube, that is almost black as Ink, and very good in illness, chiefly that of the Stomach; of this they drink in the Morning early in open places before everybody, without any regard, out of China cups, but not as they can; they put it often to their Lips, but drink but little at a Time, and let it go round as they sit. In the same water they take a Fruit called Bunn, which in its Bigness, Shape, and Colour, is almost like unto a Bay-berry, with two thin Shells... they agree in the Virtue, Figure, Look, and Name with the Buncho of Avica... and Buncha of Rasis ad Almans; exactly, therefore I take them to be the same."—Rauwolf, 92.

1598.—In a note on the use of tea in Japan, Dr. Paludanus says: "The Turkes hold almost the same matter of drinking of their Chaona (read Chaoma), which they make of a certaine fruit, which is like unto the Bakeier;† and by the Egyptians called Bon or Ban; they take of this fruites one pound and a half, and roast them a little in the fire, and then sieth them in twentie poundes of water, till the half be consumed away; this drinke they take everie morning fasting in their chambers, out of an earthen pot, being very hot, as we doe here drinke aqua composita in the morning; and they say that it strengtheneth them and maketh them warm, breaketh wind, and openeth any 1726.—"A certain gentleman, M. Paschius, maintains in his Latin work published at Leipizg in 1700, that the parched corn (1 Sam. xxv. 18) which Abigial presented with other things to David, to appease his wrath, was nought else but Coffl-beans."—Valentijn, v. 192.

COIMBATORE, n.p. Name of a District and town in the Madras Presidency. [Konî, the local goddess so called, muttu, 'pearl,' dr, 'village'.]

COIR, s. The fibre of the coco-nut husk, from which rope is made. But properly the word, which is Tam. kayuru, Malayal, kîyâr, from v. kîyârU, 'to be twisted,' means 'cord' itself (see the accurate Al-Birûnî below). The former use among Europeans is very early. And both the fibre and the rope made from it appear to have been exported to Europe in the middle of the 16th century. The word appears in early Arabic writers in the forms kânbar and kânbdr, arising probably from some misreading of the diacritical points (for kîyâr, and kîyârU). The Portuguese adopted the word in the form cairo. The form coir seems to have been introduced by the English in the 18th century. [The N.E.D. gives coir in 1697; coiir in 1779.] It was less likely to be used by the Portuguese because coiro in their language is 'leather.' And Barros (where quoted below) says allusively of the rope: "parece feito de coiro (leather) encolhendo e estendendo a vontade do mar," contracting and stretching with the movement of the sea.

c. 1846. —"They export ... cowries and jander; the latter is the name which they give to the fibrous husk of the coco-nut ... They make of it twines to stitch together the planks of their ships, and the cordage is also exported to China, India, and Yemen. This jander is better than hemp."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 121.

1510. —"The Governor (Alboquerque) ... in Cananor devoted much care to the preparation of cables and rigging for the whole fleet, for what they had was all rotten from the rains in Goa River; ordering that all should be made of coir (cairo), of which there was great abundance in Cananor; because a Moor called Mamalle, a chief trader there, held the whole trade of the Maldives islands by a contract with the kings of the isles ... so that this Moor came to be called the Lord of the Maldives, and that all the coir that was used in India had to be bought from the hands of this Moor ... The Governor, learning this, sent for the said Moor, and ordered him to abandon this island trade and to recall his factors. ... The Moor, not to lose such a profitable business, ... finally arranged with the Governor that the isles should not be taken from him, and that in return he would furnish for the king 1000 bahars (bars) of coarse coir, and 100 more of fine coir, each bahar weighing 4½ quintals; and this every year, and laid down at his own charges in Cananor and Cochyn, gratis and free of all charge to the King (not being able to endure that the Portuguese should frequent the isles at their pleasure)."—Correa, ii. 129-90.

Colao, s. Chin. kohn-lao. 'Council Chamber Elders' (Bp. Moule). A title for a Chinese Minister of State, which frequently occurs in the Jesuit writers of the 17th century.

Coleroon, n.p. The chief mouth, or delta-branch, of the Kaveri River (see Cauvery). It is a Portuguese corruption of the proper name Koliam, vulg. Kollam. This name, from Tam. kol, 'to receive,' and idam, 'place,' perhaps answers to the fact of this channel having been originally an escape formed at the construction of the great Tanjore irrigation works in the 11th century. In full flood the Cooreloon is now, in places, nearly a mile wide, whilst the original stream of the Kaveri disappears before reaching the sea. Besides the etymology and the tradition, the absence of notice of the Cooreloon in Ptolemy's Tables is (quantum valeat) an indication of its modern origin. As the sudden rise of floods in the rivers of the Coromandel coast often causes fatal accidents, there seems a curious popular tendency to connect the names of the rivers with this fact. Thus Kollidam, with the meaning that has been explained, has been commonly made into Kollidam, 'Killing-place.' [So the Madras Gloss, which connects the name with a tradition of the drowning of workmen when the Srirangam temple was built, but elsewhere (ii. 213) it is derived from Tam. kollay, 'a breach in a bank.'] Thus also the two rivers Penamar are popularly connected with pinam, 'corpse.' Fra Paolino gives the name as properly Colodru, and as meaning 'the River of Wild Boars.' But his etymologies are often wild.

1553.—De Barros writes Coloran, and speaks of it as a place (lugar) on the coast, not as a river.—Dec. i. liv. ix. cap. 1.

1672.—'From Trangalbar one passes by Trisömaas to Coledron; here a Sandbank stretches into the sea which is very dangerous.'—Baldacou, 160. (He does not speak of it as a River either.)

c. 1713.—'Les deux Princes ... se liguerent contre l'ennemi commun, à fin de le contraindre par la force des armes à rompre une digue si préjudiciable à leurs États. Ils faisaient déjà de grands préparatifs, lorsque le fleuve Coloran vençse par lui-même (comme on s'exprimoit ici) l'affront que le Roi faisait a ses eaux en les retenant captives.'—Lettres Edifiantes, ed. 1781, xi. 180.

1780.—'About 3 leagues north from the river Triminous [Tirumullavasal], is that of Coloran. Mr. Michelson calls this river Danecotta.'—Duns, N. Directory, 138.

The same book has 'Coloran or Colde- room.'

1785.—'Sundah Saheb having thrown some of his wretched infantry into a temple, fortified according to the Indian method, upon the river Kaldoron, Mr. Clive knew there was no danger in investing it.'—Caravaccio's Life of Clive, i. 29.

COLLECTOR, s. The chief administrative official of an Indian Zillah or District. The special duty of the office is, as the name intimates, the Collection of Revenue; but in India generally, with the exception of Bengal Proper, the Collector, also holding controlling magisterial powers, has been a small pro-consul, or kind of préfet. This is, however, much modified of late years by the greater definition of powers, and subdivision of duties everywhere. The title was originally no doubt a translation of tahsildar. It was introduced, with the office, under Warren Hastings, but the Collector's duties were not formally settled till 1783, when these appointments were reserved to members of the covenanted Civil Service.

1772.—'The Company having determined to stand forth as deras, the Supervisors should now be designated Collectors.'—Reg. of 14th May, 1772.

1773.—'Do not laugh at the formality with which we have made a law to change their name from supervisiors to collectors. You know full well how much the world's opinion is governed by names.'—W. Hastings to Jonas Dupre, in Gleig, i. 267.

1785.—'The numerous Collectors with their assistants had hitherto enjoyed very moderate allowances from their employers.'—Letter in Colbrook's Life, p. 16.

1838.—'As soon as three or four of them get together they speak about nothing but employment and promotion ... and if left to themselves, they sit and conjugate the verb 'to collect': I am a Collector—He was a Collector—We shall be Collectors—You ought to be a Collector—They would have been Collectors.'—Letters from Madras, 146.

1848.—'Yet she could not bring herself to suppose that the little grateful gentle governed would dare to look up to such a magnificent personage as the Collector of Boggleywallah.'—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

1871.—'There is no doubt a decay of discretionary administration throughout India ... it may be taken for granted that in earlier days Collectors and Commissioners changed their rules far oftener than does the Legislature at present."—Maine, Village Communities, 214.

1876.—"These 'distinguished visitors' are becoming a frightful nuisance; they think that Collectors and Judges have nothing to do but to act as their guides, and that Indian officials have so little work, and suffer so much from casual, that even ordinary thanks for hospitality are unnecessary; they take it all as their right."—Ext. of a Letter from India.

COLLEGE-PHEASANT. s. An absurd enough corruption of kalīṭṭā; the name in the Himalayas about Simla and Mussooree for the birds of the genus Gallophasnis of Hodgson, intermediate between the pheasants and the Jungle-fowls. "The group is composed of at least three species, two being found in the Himalayas, and one in Assam, Chittagong and Arakan." (Jerdon).

1882.—"Jungle-fowl were plentiful, as well as the black khalege pheasant."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years among Wild Beasts, 147.]

COLLEY, CALLEBY, &c. s. Properly Bengali ḍhāḷḍāṛī, 'a salt-pan, or place for making salt.'

[1787.—"... rents of the Collaries, the fifteen Dees, and of Calcutta town, are none of them included in the estimation I have laid before you."—Vermié, View of Bengal, App. 228.]

1788.—"... the Collector-general be desired to obtain as exact an account as he possibly can, of the number of Collaries in the Calcutta purgannhehs."—In Carraccioli's L. of Cithé, iv. 112.

COLLEY, n.p. The name given to a non-Aryan race inhabiting part of the country east of Madura. Tam. kullar, 'thieves.' They are called in Nelson's Madura, [Pt. ii. 44 seq.], Kallan; Kallan being the singular, Kullar plural.

1768.—"The Polynas Tondiman ... likewise sent 3000 Collaries; these are a people who, under several petty chiefs, inhabit the woods between Trichinopoly and Cape Comorin; their name in their own language signifies Thieves, and justly describes their general character."—Orme, i. 208.

c. 1785.—"Collaries, inhabitants of the woods under the Government of the Tondiman."—Carraccioli, Life of Cithé, iv. 561.

1790.—"The country of the Collaries ... extends from the sea coast to the confines of Madura, in a range of sixty miles by fifty-five."—Cal. Monthly Register or India Repository, i. 7.

COLLEY-HORN, s. This is a long brass horn of hideous sound, which is often used at native funerals in the Peninsula, and has come to be called, absurdly enough, Cholera-horn! [1832.—"Tooroo or Toortooroo, commonly designated by Europeans collery horn, consists of three pieces fixed into one another, of a semi-circular shape."—Herklots, Qanoos-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. liv. App.]

1879.—"... an early start being necessary, a happy thought struck the Chief Commissioner, to have the Amiladar's Cholera-horn man out at that hour to sound the rattle, making the sound of the camp."—Madras Mail, Oct. 7.

COLLEY-STICK, s. This is a kind of throwing-stick or boomerang used by the Colleries.

1801.—"It was he first taught me to throw the spear, and hurl the Collery-stick, a weapon scarcely known elsewhere, but in a skilful hand capable of being thrown to a certainty to any distance within 100 yards."—Welsh's Reminiscences, i. 180.

Nelson calls these weapons "Vallari Thadi's or boomerangs."—Madura, Pt. ii. 44. [The proper form seems to be Tam. kallaridādi; tādi, 'curved stick'; more usually Tam. kallaridādi, tādi, 'stick.'] See also Sir Walter Elliot in J. Ethnol. Soc., N. S., i. 112, seq.

COLOMBO, n.p. Properly Kolumb, the modern capital of Ceylon, but a place of considerable antiquity. The derivation is very uncertain; some suppose it to be connected with the adjoining river Kalani-gangi. The name Columb, used in several medieval narratives, belongs not to this place but to Kolum (see QULON).

C. 1346.—"We started for the city of Kalambu, one of the finest and largest cities of the island of Serendib. It is the residence of the Wazir, Lord of the Sea (Hākim-al-Bahr), Jalais, who has with him about 500 Habesha."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 185.

1517.—"The next day was Thursday in Passion Week; and they, well remembering this, and inspired with valour, said to the King that in fighting the Moors they would be insensible to death, which they greatly desired rather than be slaves to the Moors. ... There were not 40 men in all, whole and sound for battle. And one brave man made a cross on the tip of a cane, which he set in front for standard, saying that God was his Captain, and that was his Flag, under which they should march deliberately against Colombo, where the Moor was with his forces."—Correa, ii. 521.
COLUMBO ROOT.

Cambojas, or Khmer, as the native name is (see Reinaud, Rel. des Arabes, i. 97, ii. 48, 49; Gildemeister, 156 seqq.; Ibn Batuta, iv. 240; Abulfeda, Cathay and the Way Thither, 519, 569). Even the sagacious De Orta is misled by the Arabs, and confounds alcomari with a product of Cape Comorin (see Colloquus, f. 130v.).

COMBOY.

CóMATY, s. Telug. and Canar. kómati, 'a trader,' [said to be derived from Skt. go, 'eye,' mukshi, 'fist,' from their vigilant habits]. This is a term used chiefly in the north of the Madras Presidency, and corresponding to Chetty,[which the males assume as an affix].

1627.—"The next Tribe is there termed Commity, and these are generally the Merchants of the Place who by themselves or their servants, travel into the Country, gathering up Callicoes from the weavers, and other commodities, which they sell again in greater parcels."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 997.

1679.—"There came to us the Factory this day a Dowre an Indian of the Comittee Cast, he was he said 30 years old. . . . we measured him by the rule 46 inches high, all his limbs and his body straight and equal proportioned, of comely face, his speech small equaling his stature. . . ."—Streyns- sham Master, in Kistna Mar. 142.

1689.—"Komatis." See quotation under CHUCKLER.

CUMBACONUM, n.p., written Kumbakonam. Formerly the seat of the Chola dynasty. Col. Branfill gives, as the usual derivation, Skt. Kumbakona, 'brim of a water-pot'; [the Madras Gloss. Skt. kumbha, kona, 'lane'] and this form is given in Williams's Skt. Dict. as 'name of a town.' The fact that an idol in the Saiva temple at Combaconam is called Kumbhekaram ('Lord of the water-pot') may possibly be a justification of this etymology. But see general remarks on S. Indian names in the Introduction.

COMBOY. A sort of skirt or kilt of white calico, worn by Singhalese of both sexes, much in the same way as the Malay Barong. The derivation which Sir E. Tennent (Ceylon, i. 612, ii. 107) gives of the word is quite inadmissible. He finds that a Chinese author describes the people of Ceylon as wearing a cloth made of koo-pes, i.e. of cotton; and he assumes therefore that those people call their own dress by a Chinese name for cotton! The word, however, is not real Singhalese; and we can have no doubt that it is the proper name Campas. Pátios de Cábaya are mentioned early as used in Ceylon (Casteñeda, ii. 78), and Cambays by Forrest (Voyage to Mergus, 79). In the Government List of Native Words (Ceylon, 1869) the form used in the Island is actually Kambáya. A picture of the dress is given by Tennent (Ceylon, i. 612). It is now usually of white, but in mourning black is used.

1615. — "Taneho Samme, the King's kinsman, brought two pces. Cambala cloth."—Cocks's Diary, i. 15.

[1674-5. — "Cambaja Brawling."—Invoice in Birdwood, Report on Old Asia, p. 42.]

1726. — In list of cloths purchased at Porto Novo are "Cambayen."—Valentijn, Chorom. 10.

[1727. — "Cambaya Lungites." See quotation under Longhee.]

COMMERCOLLY, n.p. A small but well-known town of Lower Bengal in the Nadiya District; properly Kumdr-khali [Prince's Creek]. The name is familiar in connection with the feather trade (see Adjutant).

COMMISSIONER, a. In the Bengal and Bombay Presidencies this is a grade in the ordinary administrative hierarchy; it does not exist in Madras, but is found in the Punjab, Central Provinces, &c. The Commissioner is over a Division embracing several Districts or Zillahs, and stands between the Collectors and Magistrates of these Districts on the one side, and the Revenue Board (if there is one) and the Local Government on the other. In the Regulation Provinces he is always a member of the Covenanted Civil Service; in Non-Regulation Provinces he may be a military officer; and in these the District officers immediately under him are termed 'Deputy Commissioners.'

COMMISSIONER, CHIEF. A high official, governing a Province inferior to a Lieutenant-Governorship, in direct subordination to the Governor-General in Council. Thus the Punjab till 1859 was under a Chief Commissioner, as was Oudh till 1877 (and indeed, though the offices are united, the Lieut.-Governor of the N.W. Provinces holds also the title of Chief Commissioner of Oudh). The Central Provinces, Assam, and Burma are other examples of Provinces under Chief Commissioners.

COMORIN, CAPE, n.p. The extreme southern point of the Peninsula of India; a name of great antiquity. No doubt Wilson's explanation is perfectly correct; and the quotation from the Periplus corroborates it. He says: "Kumdrî... a young girl, a princess; a name of the goddess Durgâ, to whom a temple dedicated at the extremity of the Peninsula has long given to the adjacent cape and coast the name of Kumdrî, corrupted to Comorin..." The Tamil pronunciation is Kumdrî.

C. 80-90. — "Another place follows called Kômâr, at which place is (* * *) and a port; and here those who wish to consecrate the remainder of their life come and bathe, and there remain in celibacy. The same dowmen likewise. For it is related that the goddess there tarried a while and bathed."—Periplus, in Muller's Geogr. Gr. Misc. i. 300.

C. 150. — "Kômpaía ãkroν καλ ῥόδας."—Pol. [viii. § 9].

1298. — "Comari is a country belonging to India, and there you may see something of the North Star, which we had not been able to see from the Lesser Java thus far."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 28.

C. 1830. — "The country called Ma'bar is said to commence at the Cape Kumhari, a name applied both to a town and a mountain."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 185.

[1514. — "Comedis." See quotation under Malabar.]

1572. — "Ves corre a costa celebre Indiana Para o Sul até o cabo Comori Ja chamado Cori, que Tapobana (Que ora he Celilo) de frente tem de si."—Camões, v. 107.

Here Camões identifies the ancient Kôp or Koλ̄i, with Comorim. These are in Ptolemy distinct, and his Kôr appears to be the point of the Island of Râmevaram from which the passage to Ceylon was shortest. This, as Kôta, appears in various forms in other geographers as the extreme seaward point of India, and in the geographical poem of Dionysius it is described as towering to a stupendous height above the waves. Mela regards Cift as the turning point of the Indian coast, and even in Ptolemy’s Tables his Kory is further south than Komar, and is the point of departure from which he discusses distances to the further East (see Ptolemy, Bk. I. caps. 13, 14; also see Bishop Caldwell’s Com. Grammar, Intro., p. 108). It is thus intelligible how comparative geographers of the 16th century identified Kory with C. Comorin.

* There is here a doubtful reading. The next paragraph shows that the word should be koμαρή.

In 1684 the late venerated Bishop Cotton visited C. Comorin in company with two of his clergy (both now missionary bishops). He said that having bathed at Hardwar, one of the most northerly of Hindu sacred places, he should like to bathe at this, the most southerly. Each of the chaplains took one of the bishop’s hands as they entered the surf, which was heavy; so heavy that his right-hand aid was torn from him, and had not the other been able to hold fast, Bishop Cotton could hardly have escaped.

[1787.—“The pagoda of the Cunacu-mary belonging to Tinevelly.”—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 117.]

1817.—“... Lightly latticed in With odoriferous woods of Comorin.” Lalla Rookh, Mokanna.

This probably is derived from D’Herbelot, and involves a confusion often made between Comorin and Comar—the land of aloes-wood.

COMOTAY, COMATY, n.p. This name appears prominently in some of the old maps of Bengal, e.g. that embraced in the Magni Mogol Vratiscellum of Blaeu’s great Atlas (1645-50). It represents Kāmata, a State, and Kāmatapur, a city, of which most extensive remains exist in the territory of Koch Bihar in Eastern Bengal (see COOCH BEHAR). These are described by Dr. Francis Buchanan, in the book published by Montgomery Martin under the name of Eastern India (vol. iii. 426 seqq.). The city stood on the west bank of the River Darlā, which formed the defence on the east side, about 5 miles in extent. The whole circumference of the enclosure is estimated by Buchanan at 19 miles, the remainder being formed by a rampart which was (c. 1809) “in general about 130 feet in width at the base, and from 20 to 30 feet in perpendicular height.”

1553.—“Within the limits in which we comprehend the kingdom of Bengal are those kingdoms subject to it ... lower-down towards the sea the kingdom of Comotai.”—Barros, IV. ix. 1.

[c. 1596.—Kamṭha.” See quotation under COOCH BEHAR.]

1873.—“During the 15th century, the tract north of Rangpur was in the hands of the Rājāh of Kāmata. ... Kāmata was invaded, about 1498 A.D., by Husain Shāh.”—Blochmann, in J. As. Soc. Bengal, xiii. pt. i. 240.

COMPETITION-WALLAH, s. A hybrid of English and Hindustani, applied in modern Anglo-Indian colloquial to members of the Civil Service who have entered it by the competitive system first introduced in 1856. The phrase was probably the invention of one of the older or Haileybury members of the same service. These latter, whose nominations were due to interest, and who were bound together by the intimacies and esprit de corps of a common college, looked with some disfavour upon the children of Innovation. The name was readily taken up in India, but its familiarity in England is probably due in great part to the “Letters of a Competition-walas,” written by one who had no real claim to the title, Sir G.O. Trevelyan, who was later on member for Hawick Burghs, Chief Secretary for Ireland, and author of the excellent Life of his uncle, Lord Macaulay.

The second portion of the word, wald, is properly a Hindi adjectival suffix, corresponding in a general way to the Latin -arius. Its usual employment as affix to a substantive makes it frequently denote “agent, doer, keeper, man, inhabitant, master, lord, possessor, owner,” as Shakespeare vainly tries to define it, and as in Anglo-Indian usage is popularly assumed to be its meaning. But this kind of denotation is incidental; there is no real limitation to such meaning. This is demonstrable from such phrases as Kābul-wald ghord, “the Kabulian horse,” and from the common form of village nomenclature in the Panjāb, e.g. Mir-Khān-wald, Ganda-Singh-wald, and so forth, implying the village established by Mir-Khan or Ganda-Singh. In the three immediately following quotations, the second and third exhibit a strictly idiomatic use of wald, the first an incorrect English use of it.
1785.—

“‘Tho’ then the Bostonians made such a fuss,
Their example ought not to be followed by us,
But I wish that a band of good Patriot-wallahs...” — In Seton-Kerr, i. 98.

1814.—“Gungadhir Shastree is a person of great shrewdness and talent... Though a very learned shastree, he affects to be quite an Englishman, walks fast, talks fast, interrupts and contradicts, and calls the Peshwa and his ministers ‘old fools’ and... dam rascals.” He mixes English words with others, and will say of some one (Holkar for instance): Bhot trick-walla tha, tukren banna akulund, Kukhaye tha, (‘He was very tricky, but very sagacious’); he was cock-eyed.” — Elphinstone, in Life, i. 276.

1853.—“‘No, I’m a Suffolk-walla.” — Oakfield, i. 66.

1864.—“The stories against the Competition-wallahs, which are told and fondly believed by the Haileybury men, are all found more or less on the want of sense fairs. A collection of these stories would be a curious proof of the credulity of the human mind on a question of class against class.” — Trendelenburg, p. 9.

1867.—“From a deficiency of civil servants... it became necessary to seek reinforcements, not alone from Haileybury,
... but from new recruiting fields whence volunteers might be obtained... under the pressure of necessity, such an extensive measure was sanctioned by Parliament. Mr. Elliot, having been nominated as a candidate by Campbell Marjoribanks, was the first of the since celebrated list of the Competition-wallahs.” —Blog. Notice prefixed to vol. i. of Dowson’s Ed. of Elliot’s Historians of India, p. xxviii.

The exceptional arrangement alluded to in the preceding quotation was authorised by 7 Geo. IV. cap. 56. But it did not involve competition; it only authorised a system by which writerships could be given to young men who had not been at Haileybury College, on their passing certain test examinations, and they were ranked according to their merit in passing such examinations, but below the writers who had left Haileybury at the preceding half-yearly examination. The first examination under this system was held 29th March, 1837, and Sir H. M. Elliot headed the list. The system continued in force for five years, the last examination being held in April, 1842.
In all 85 civilians were nominated in this way, and, among other well-known names, the list included H. Torrens, Sir H. B.
Harington, Sir R. Montgomery, Sir J.
Cracroft Wilson, Sir T. Pycroft, W. Tayler, the Hon. E. Drummond.

sally into our ears the greatness of India.
... We are asked to feel awestruck and when we learn that the area of Madras far exceeds that of the United Kingdom.” —

COMPOUND. a. The enclosed ground, whether garden or waste, which surrounds an Anglo-Indian house. Various derivations have been suggested for this word, but its history is very obscure. The following are the principal suggestions that have been made:—*

(a.) That it is a corruption of some supposed Portuguese word.

(b.) That it is a corruption of the French campagne.

(c.) That it is a corruption of the Malay word kampung, as first (we believe) indicated by Mr. John Crawfurd.

(a.) The Portuguese origin is assumed by Bishop Heber in passages quoted below. In one he derives it from campaña (for which, in modern Portuguese at least, we should read campanha); but campanha is not used in such a sense. It seems to be used only for ‘a campaign,’ or for the Roman Campagna. In the other passage he derives it from campano (sic), but there is no such word.

It is also alleged by Sir Emerson Tennent (infra), who suggests campanho; but this, meaning ‘a small plain,’ is not used for compound.
Neither is the latter word, nor any word suggestive of it, used among the Indo-Portuguese.

In the early Portuguese histories of India (e.g. Castanheda, iii. 436, 442; vi. 3) the words used for what we term compound, are jardim, patio, horta. An examination of all the passages of the Indo-Portuguese Bible,

* On the origin of this word for a long time different opinions were held by my lamented friend Burnell and by me. And when we printed a few specimens in the Indian Antiquary, our different arguments were given in brief (see i. A., July 1876, pp. 203, 208). But at a later date he was much disposed to come round to the other view, insomuch that in a letter of Sept. 21, 1881, he says: “Compound can, I think, after all, be Malay kampung; take these lines from a Malay poem” —then giving the lines which I have transcribed on the following page. I have therefore had no scruple in giving the same unity to this article that had been unbroken in almost all other cases.—H. Y.
where the word might be expected to occur, affords only korta.

There is a use of campo by the Italian Capuchin P. Vincenzo Maria (Roma, 1672), which we thought at first to be analogous: “Gioni till porta della città (Aleppo) ... arrivati al Campo de’ Francesi; dove è la Dogana ...” (p. 475). We find also in Rauwolf’s Travels (c. 1573), as published in English by the famous John Ray: “Each of these nations (at Aleppo) have their peculiar Champ to themselves, commonly named after the Master that built it ...”; and again: “When ... the Turks have washed and cleansed themselves, they go into their Chappells, which are in the Middle of their great Campos or Carvatschas ...” (p. 84 and p. 259 of Ray’s 2nd edition). This use of Campo, and Champ, has a curious kind of analogy to compound, but it is probably only a translation of Maidan or some such Oriental word.

(b) As regards campagne, which once commended itself as probable, it must be observed that nothing like the required sense is found among the seven or eight classes of meaning assigned to the word in Littre.

The word campo again in the Portuguese of the 16th century seems to mean always, or nearly always, a camp. We have found only one instance in those writers of its use with a meaning in the least suggestive of compound, but in this its real meaning is ‘site’: “queymou a cidade toda ate não ficar mais que ho campo em que estevever.” (“They burned the whole city till nothing remained but the site on which it stood”—Castanheda, vi. 130). There is a special use of campo by the Portuguese in the Further East, alluded to in the quotation from Pallegoix’s Siam, but that we shall see to be only a representation of the Malay Kampung. We shall come back upon it. [See quotation from Correia, with note, under FACTORY.]

(c) The objection raised to kampung as the origin of compound is chiefly that the former word is not so used in Java by either Dutch or natives, and the author of Max Havelaar expresses doubt if compound is a Malay or Javanese word at all (pp. 360-361). Erf is the usual word among the Dutch.

In Java kampung seems to be used only for a native village, or for a particular ward or quarter of a town.

But it is impossible to doubt that among the English in our Malay settlements compound is used in this sense in speaking English, and kampung in speaking Malay. Kampung is also used by the Malays themselves, in our settlements, in this sense. All the modern dictionaries that we have consulted give this sense among others. The old Dictionarium Malaco-Latinum of David Haex (Romae, 1631) is a little vague:

Crawford (1852): “Kampung ... an enclosure, a space fenced in; a village; a quarter or subdivision of a town.”

Favre (1875): “Maison avec un terrain qui l’entoure.”

Pijnappel (1875), Maleisch-Hollandsch Woordenboek: “Kampoen—Omheind Erf, Wijk, Buurt, Kamp,” i.e. “Ground hedged round, village, hamlet, camp.”

And also, let it be noted, the Javanese Dict. of P. James (Javameesch-Nederlandsch Woordenboek, Samarang, 1876): “Kampoen—Omheind ef van Woning; wijk die onder een hoofd staat,” i.e. “Enclosed ground of dwellings; village which is under one Headman.”

Marre, in his Kata-Kata Malayou (Paris, 1875), gives the following expanded definition: “Village palissadé, ou, dans une ville, quartier séparé et généralement clos, occupé par des gens de même nation, Malais, Siamois, Chinois, Bouguis, &c. Ce mot signifie proprement un enclos, une entencie, et par extension quartier clos, faubourg, ou village palissadé. Le mot Kampong désigne parfois aussi une maison d’une certaine importance avec le terrain clos qui en dépend, et qui l’entoure” (p. 95).

We take Marsden last (Malay Dictionary, 1812) because he gives an illustration: “Kampung, an enclosure, a place surrounded with a paling; a fenced or fortified village; a quarter, district, or suburb of a city; a collection of buildings. Mem- biat [to make] rumah [house] serta daqgan [together with] kampong-nia [compound thereof], to erect a house with its enclosure... Ber-Kampong, to assemble, come together; mehgampong, to collect, to bring together."

The Reverse Dictionary gives: "YARD, alman, Kampong." [See also many further references much to the same effect in Scott, Malayan Words, p. 123 seq.]

In a Malay poem given in the Journal of the Ind. Archipelago, vol i. p. 44, we have these words:—

"Trulak ka kampong s'orange Saudagar."
["Passed to the kampong of a Merchant."] and

"Tudh bagindé rajá sultáni Kampong bidin gardangin šat."
["Thus said the Prince, the Raja Sultani, Whose kampong may this be?"]

These explanations and illustrations render it almost unnecessary to add in corroboration that a friend who held office in the Straits for twenty years assures us that the word kampong is habitually used, in the Malay there spoken, as the equivalent of the Indian compound. If this was the case 150 years ago in the English settlements at Bencoolen and elsewhere (and we know from Marsden that it was so 100 years ago), it does not matter whether such a use of kampong was correct or not, compound will have been a natural corruption of it. Mr. E. C. Baber, who lately spent some time in our Malay settlements in his way from China, tells me (H. Y.) that the frequency with which he heard kampong applied to the 'compound,' convinced him of this etymology, which he had before doubted greatly.

It is not difficult to suppose that the word, if its use originated in our Malay factories and settlements, should have spread to the continental Presidencies, and so over India.

Our factories in the Archipelago were older than any of our settlements in India Proper. The factors and writers were frequently moved about, and it is conceivable that a word so much wanted (for no English word now in use does express the idea satisfactorily) should have found ready acceptance. In fact the word, from like causes, has spread to the ports of China and to the missionary and mercantile stations in tropical Africa, East and West, and in Madagascar.

But it may be observed that it was possible that the word kampong was itself originally a corruption of the Port. campo, taking the meaning first of camp, and thence of an enclosed area, or rather that in some less definable way the two words reacted on each other. The Chinese quarter at Batavia, Kampong Teina—is commonly called in Dutch 'het Chinees Komp' or 'het Kamp der Chinezen.' Kampong was used at Portuguese Malacca in this way at least 270 years ago, as the quotation from Godinho de Eredia shows. The earliest Anglo-Indian example of the word compound is that of 1679 (below). In a quotation from Dampier (1688) under Cot, where compound would come in naturally, he says 'yard.'

1618.—(At Malacca). "And this settlement is divided into 2 parishes, S. Thomé and S. Stephen, and that part of S. Thomé called Campon Chelim extends from the shore of the Jao basar to N.W., terminating at the Stone Bastion; and in this dwell the Chelis of Coromandel... And the other part of S. Stephen's, called Campon China, extends from the said shore of the Jao Basar, and mouth of the river to the N.E.,... and in this part, called Campon China, dwell the Chinesos... and foreign traders, and native fishermen."—Godiak, de Eredia, H. H. In the plans given by this writer, we find different parts of the city marked accordingly, as Campon Chelim, Campon China, Campon Bendara (the quarter where the native magistrate, the Bendara lived). [See also CHELING and CAMPOO.]

1679.—(At Pollicull near Madapolam). "There the Dutch have a Factory of a large Compound, where they dye much blew cloth, having above 300 jars set in the ground for that work; also they make many of their best paintings there."—Port St. Geo. Cons. (on Tour), April 14. In Notes and Extracts, Madras 1871.

1696.—"The 27th we began to unlace, and come to their custom-houses, of which there are three, in a square Compound of about 100 paces over each way... The goods being brought and set in two Rooms in the middle of the square are one by one opened before the Mandarins."—Mr. Bowyer's Journal at Cochfa China, dated Foy-Foe, April 30. Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 79.

1772.—"YARD (before or behind a house), Aunglyin. Commonly called a Compound."—Vocabulary in Hadley's Grammar, 129. (See under MOORS.) 1781.—

"In common usage here a chit Serves for our business or our wit.
Banskal’s a place to lodge our ropes,
And Mango orchards are all Topes.
Godown usurps the ware-house place,
Compound denotes each walled space.
To Infortunias, Otors, Tsuds,
The English language owes no thanks;
Since Office, Essence, Fish-pond abow
We need not words so harsh and new.
Much more I could such words expose,
But Ghasts and Dawks the list shall close;
Which in plain English is no more Than Wharf and Post expressed before."

India Gazette, March 3.

1788.—"Compound—The court-yard belonging to a house. A corrupt word."—\textit{ibid.}, April 21.

1783.—"To be sold by Public Outcry... the House, Out Houses, and Compound, &c.—Bombay Courier, Nov. 2.

1810.—"The houses (at Madras) are usually surrounded by a field or compound, with a few trees or shrubs, but it is with incredible pains that flowers or fruit are raised."—\textit{Maria Graham}, 124.

1811.—"When I entered the great gates, and looked around for my palankeen... and when I beheld the beauty and extent of the compound... I thought that I was no longer in the world that I had left in the East."—\textit{An Account of Bengal, and of a Visit to Government House (at Calcutta) by Ibrahim the son of Candu the Merchant, ed.} p. 196. This is a Malay narrative translated by Dr. Leyden. Very probably the word translated compound was \textit{kampung}, but that cannot be ascertained.

1817.—"When they got into the compound, they saw all the ladies and gentlemen in the verandah waiting."—\textit{Mrs. Sherwood’s Stories, ed.} 1863, p. 6.

1824.—"He then proceeded to the rear compound of the house, returned, and said, ‘It is a tiger, sir.’"—\textit{Colly, Wonders of Eiltea, ch. i.}

1848.—"Lady O’Dowd, too, had gone to her bed in the nuptial chamber, on the ground floor, and had tucked her mosquito-curtains round her fair form, when the guard at the gates of the commanding officer’s compound beheld Major Dobbin, in the moonlight, rushing towards the house with a swift step."—\textit{Vanity Fair, ed.} 1867, ii. 93.

1880.—"Even amongst the English, the number of Portuguese terms in daily use is remarkable. The grounds attached to a house are its ‘compound,’ \textit{campinho}.”—\textit{Emerson Tractant, Ceylon, ii. 70.}

[1889.—"I obtained the use of a good-sized house in the \textit{Campong} Sirani (or Christian village)."—\textit{Wallace, Malay Archip., ed.} 1890, p. 258.]

We have found this word singularly transformed in a passage extracted from a modern novel:

1877.—"When the Rebellion broke out at other stations in India, I left our own compound."—\textit{Sat. Review, Feb.} 3, p. 148.

A little learning is a dangerous thing!

The following shows the adoption of the word in West Africa.

1880.—From West Afr. Mission, Port Lokkoh, Mr. A. Burchcassel writes: "Every evening we go out visiting and preaching the Gospel to our Timneh friends in their compounds."—\textit{Proceedings of C. M. Society for} 1878-9, p. 14.

\textbf{COMPARDORE, COMPADORE, &c., a Port. comprador, ‘purchaser,’ from comprar, ‘to purchase.’ This word was formerly in use in Bengal, where it is now quite obsolete; but it is perhaps still remembered in Madras, and it is common in China. In Madras the compradore is (or was) a kind of house-steward, who keeps the household accounts, and purchases necessaries. In China he is much the same as a Butler (q.v.). A new building was to be erected on the Bund at Shanghai, and Sir T. Wade was asked his opinion as to what style of architecture should be adopted. He at once said that for Shanghai, a great Chinese commercial centre, it ought to be Compradorie!}

1883.—"Antonio da Silva kept his own counsel about the (threat of) war, because during the delay caused by the exchange of messages, he was all the time buying and selling by means of his compradores."—\textit{Correr, iii. 382.}

1615.—"I understand that yesterday the Hollanders cut a slave of theirs a-peecea for theft, per order of his comprador (or cats buyer) out of dores for a lecherous knave..."—\textit{Cock’s Diary, i. 19.}

1711.—"Every Factory had formerly a Compradore, whose Business it was to buy in Provisions and other Necessaries. But the Hoppos have made them all such knaves..."—Lockyer, 108.

[1748.—"Compadrores." See quotation under BANKEHALL.]

1754.—"Compadres. The office of this servant is to go to market and bring home small things, such as fruit, &c."—Teece, 50.

1760-1810.—"All river-pilots and ships' Compadroses must be registered at the office of the Tung-che at Macao."—Eight Regulations, from the Fankwee at Canton (1882), p. 28.

1782.—"Le Compadre est celui qui fournit généralement tout ce dont on a besoin, excepté les objets de cargaison; il y en a un pour chaque Nation; il approvisionne la loge, et tient sous lui plusieurs commiss chargés de la fourniture des vaisseaux."—Sonnerat (ed. 1782), ii. 286.

1785.—"Compendui... Sicas Rs. 3."—In Seton-Karr, i. 107 (Table of Wages).

1810.—"The Compadres, or Kurs-burdar, or Butler-Konnah-Sirarc, are all designations for the same individual, who acts as purveyor... This servant may be considered as appertaining to the order of sirareas, of which he should possess all the cunning."—Williamson, V. M. i. 270.

See SIRCAR. The obsolete term Kurs-burdar always represents Kurnaghtur in charge of (daily expenditure).

1840.—"About 10 days ago... the Chinese, having kidnapped our Compendor, Parties were sent out to endeavour to recover him."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 164.

1876.—"We speak chiefly of the educated classes, and not of 'boys' and compadores, who learn in a short time both to touch their caps, and wipe their noses in their masters' pocket-handkerchiefs."—Obote, Chinese Sketches, [p. 15].

1876.—"'An' Massa Cee feel volly sore An' go an' scald he compadre.'

Leand, Pidgin English Sing-Song, 26.

1882.—"The most important Chinese within the Factory was the Compadre... all Chinese employed in any factory, whether as his own 'purser,' or in the capacity of servants, cooks, or coolies, were the Compadre's own people."—The Fankwee, p. 53.

CONBALINGUA. a. The common pumpkin, [cucurbita pepo]. The word comes from the Malayil, Tel. or Can. kumbalam; kumbalanu, the pumpkin.}

1510.—"I saw another kind of fruit which resembled a pumpkin in colour, is two spans in length, and has more than three fingers of pulp... and it is a very curious thing, and it is called Comolonda, and grows on the ground like melons."—Varthema, 161.

[1554.—"Conbalaginsa." See quotation under BRINJAL.]

[c. 1610.—Couto gives a tradition of the origin of the kingdom of Pegu, from a fisherman who was born of a certain flower; "they also say that his wife was born of a Combalanga, which is an apple (pomo) very common in India of which they make several kinds of preserve, so cold that it is used in place of sugar of roses; and they are of the size and fashion of large melons; and there are some so large that it would be as much as a lad could do to lift one by himself. This apple the Pegus call Npaca."—Dec. xii. liv. v. cap. iii.]

C. 1690.—"In Indiae insulis quaedam quoea Cucurbitae et Cucumeris reperientur species ab Europaeis diversae... harumque nobilissimae est Comolinge, quae maxima est specie Indicarum cucurbitarum."—Rumphius, Herb. Amb. v. 395.

CONCAN, n.p. Skt. konkana, [Tam. konkana], the former in the Pauranic lists the name of a people; Hind. Konkan and Konkan. The low country of Western India between the Ghauts and the sea, extending, roughly speaking, from Goa northward to Guzerat. But the modern Commissioner, or Civil Division, embraces also North Canara (south of Goa). In medieval writings we find frequently, by a common Asiatic fashion of coupling names, Konkan or Konkan-Tana; Tana having been a chief place and port of Konkan.

c. 70 A.D.—The Coonodas of Pliny are perhaps the Konkanas.

404.—"In the south are Ceylon (Lanka)... Konkan..." &c.—Brahmante, in J. R. A. S., N.S. v. 88.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Konkan and Tana; beyond them the country of Malabar."—Raskiduddin, in Elliot, i. 88.

c. 1385.—"When he heard of the Sultan's death he fled to a Kafir prince called Bumara, who lived in the inaccessible mountains between Danulatabad and Kulan-Tana."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 385.

c. 1580.—In the Portulano Medico in the Laurentian Library we have 'Cochnana,' and in the Catalan Map of 1375 'Cocintaya.'

1553.—"And as from the Ghauts (Gate) to the Sea, on the west of the Decan, all that strip is called Concun, so also from the Ghauts to the Sea, on the West of Canara (leaving out those forty and six leagues just spoken of, which are also parts of this same Canara), that strip which extends to Cape Comorin... is called Malabar..."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

[1563.—"Cuncam." See quotation under GAUT.]

1726.—"The kingdom of this Prince is commonly called Visinapore, after its capital, but it is properly called Gunkan."—Valentijn, iv. (Swarte), 243; [also see under DECCAN].
CONFIRMED. 245  CONGEVERAM.

C. 1782.—"Goo, in the Adel Shahi Kokan." —Kaff's Kaths, in Elliot, vii. 211.

1804.—"I have received your letter of the 28th, upon the subject of the landing of 3 French officers in the Konkan; and I have taken measures to have them arrested." —Wellington, iii. 33.

1813.—"... Concan or Cokun ..."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 189; [2nd ed. i. 102].

1819.—Mr. W. Erskine, in his Account of Elephantana, writes Kokan.—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bomb., i. 249.

CONFIRMED. p. Applied to an officer whose hold of an appointment is made permanent. In the Bengal Presidency the popular term is pucka; (q.v.); (also see CUTOCHA).

[1805.—"It appears not unlikely that the Government and the Company may confirm Sir G. Barlow in the station to which he has succeeded ..."—In L. of Colbroke, 228.]

1886.—"... one Marsden, who has paid his addresses to my daughter—a young man in the Public Works, who (would you believe it, Mr. Colborne?) has not even confirmed.

CONGEE, s. In use all over India for the water in which rice has been boiled. The article being used as one of invalid diet, the word is sometimes applied to such slops generally. Congee also forms the usual starch of Indian washermen. [A congee-cap was a sort of starched night-cap, and Mr. Draper, the husband of Sterne's Eliza, had it put on by Mrs. Draper's rival when he took his afternoon nap. (Douglas, Glimpses of Old Bombay, pp. 86, 201.)]

It is from the Tamil kanyā, 'boilings.' Congee is known to Horace, though reckoned, it would seem, so costly a remedy that the miser patient would as lief die as be plundered to the extent implied in its use:

"... Hunc medicus multum oleo atque adolio Excitat hoc pacto ...
... 'Agedum; sume hoc ptissinarium Oryzae.'
'Quanti emptas?' 'Parvo.' 'Quanti ergo.'
'Ocussibus.' 'Ehun!
Quid refert, morbo, an furtis persamve rapinas?"

Sat. II. iii. 147 sqq.

c. A.D. 70.—(Indi) "maxime quidem oryzaeudent, ex qua ptissinam conficiunt quam reliquis mortales ex hordeo."—Pliny, xviii. § 13.

1563.—"They give him to drink the water squeezed out of rice with pepper and cum-min (which they call canje)."—Garcia, t. 766.

1578.—"... Canja, which is the water from the boiling of rice, keeping it first for some hours till it becomes acid. ..."—Acosta, Tractado, 56.

1631.—"Potus quotidians itaque sit decoctum oryzae quod Cangie Indi vocant."—Jac. Bontii, Lib. II. cap. iii.

1672.—"... la can gia, ordinaria colazione degli Indiani ... quale usato del riso mal cotto."—P. Vinc. Maria, 3rd ed., 379.

1673.—"They have ... a great smooth Stone on which they beat their Cloths till clean; and if for Family use, starch them with Congee."—Fryer, 200.

1680.—"Le dejedné des noirs est ordinaire du Cangé, qui est une eau de ris elaisee."—Dellon, Inquisition at Goa, 136.

1796.—"Cangi, boiled rice water, which the Europeans call Canji, is given free of all expenses, in order that the traveller may quench his thirst with a cooling and wholesome beverage."—P. Paulinus, Voyages, p. 70.

"'Can't drink as it is hot, and can't throw away as it is Kanji.'"—Ceylon Proverb, Ind. Ant. i. 59.

CONGEE-HOUSE, CONJEE-HOUSE, s. The 'cells' (or temporary lock-up) of a regiment in India; so called from the traditional regiment of the inmates; [in N. India commonly applied to a cattle-pound].

1835.—"All men confined for drunkenness should, if possible, be confined by themselves in the Congee-House, till sober."—G. O., quoted in Awnou's Records of the Indian Command of Sir G. Napier, 101 note.

CONGEVERAM, n.p. An ancient and holy city of S. India, 46 m. S.W. of Madras. It is called Kachchi in Tamil literature, and Kachchipuram is probably represented by the modern name. [The Madras Gloss. gives the indigenous name as Cutchi (Kachchi), meaning 'the heart-leaved moon-seed plant,' tinoepula cordifolta, from which the Skt. name Kanchipuram, 'shining city,' is corrupted.]

c. 1080.—See Kanchi in Al-Biruni, under MALABAR.

1581.—"Some of them said that the whole history of the Holy House (of St. Thomas) was written in the house of the Pagoda which is called Camjeveram, twenty leagues distant from the Holy House, of which I will tell you hereafter. ..."—Correa, iii. 424.

1680.—"Upon a report that Podegra Lingape had put a stop to all the Dutch business of Policat under his government, CONGO-BUNDRE, CONG, n.p.

Kung bandar; a port formerly of some consequence and trade, on the north shore of the Persian Gulf, about 100 m. west of Gombroon. The Portuguese had a factory here for a good many years after their expulsion from Ormus, and under treaty with Persia, made in 1825, had a right of pearl-fishing at Bahrein and a claim to half of the customs of Cong. These claims seem to have been gradually disregarded, and to have had no effect after about 1870, though the Portuguese would appear to have still kept up some pretext of monopoly of rights there in 1877 (see Chardin, ed. 1735,
i. 348, and Bruce's Annals of the E.I.C., iii. 393). Some confusion is created by the circumstance that there is another place on the same coast, called Kongin, which possessed a good many ships up to 1859, when it was destroyed by a neighbouring chief (see Stiff's P. Gulf Pilot, 128). And this place is indicated by A. Hamilton (below) as the great mart for Bahrein pears, which Fryer and others assign to what is evidently Cong.

1652.—"Near to the place where the Euphrates falls from Balsara [see BALSORA] into the Sea, there is a little Island, where the Barques generally come to an Anchor . . .
There we stay'd four days, whence to Bandar- Congo it is 14 days Sail . . . .
This place would be a far better habitation for the Merchants than Ormusa, where it is very unwholesom and dangerous to live, but that which hinders the Trade from Bandar-Congo is, because the Road to Lar is so bad . . . . The 30th, we hird a Vessel for Bander- Abass, and after 8 or 4 balling we put into a Village . . . . in the Island of Kishim " (see KISHM). — Tavernier,
E.T. i. 94.

1653. — "Congre est une ville petit fort peuplée sur le fief Persique à trois jours de Bandar Abass, tariant à l'Ouest dominée par le Schah . . . les Portugais y ont un Feitor (see FACTOR) qui prend la moitié de la Doîante, et dont la permission aux barques de nauiger, en luy payant de tout droit, parceque toutes ces mens sont tribu-taires de la generalité de Masatî, qui est et l'entrée du fief Persique . . . . Cette ville est peuplée d'Arabes, de Peres et d'Indous qui ont leur Pagodes et lur Saintes hors la ville."—De la Boulay-le-Goû, ed. 1657,
p. 284.

1677.—"A Voyage to Congo for Pearl.—
Two days after our Arrival at Gombroon, I went to Congo . . . At noon we came to Busato (see BASSADO), an old ruined Town of the Portugals, fronting Congo . . .
Congo is something better built than Gombroon, and has some small Advantage of the Air" (Then goes off about pearls).—Fryer, 320.

1685.—"One Haggerton taken by ye Broom into his Service, was run away with a considerable quantity of Gold and Pearle, to ye amount of 30,000 Rupees, intrusted to him at Bussora (see BALSORA) and Cong, to bring to Suratt, to save Freight and Custom."—Hedges, Diary, i.
96 sq.

1685. — "May 27. — This afternoon it pleased God to bring us in safety to Cong Road. I went ashore immediately to Mr.
Broom's house (Supra Cargo of ye Sivas Merchant), and lay there all night."—Ibid.
i. 202.

1727. — "Congrns stands on the South side of a large River, and makes a pretty figure in Trade; for most of the Pearl that are sought at Barea, on the Arabian Side, are brought hither for a Market, and many fine Horaes are sent thence to India, when, they generally sell well.

CONICOPOLY, s. Literally 'Account-Man,' from Tam. kanakka,
'account' or 'writing,' and pillat,
'child' or 'person.' "The Kanakar are usually addressed as 'Pillay,' a title of respect common to them and the agricultural and shepherd castes (Madras Man. ii. 229)." In Madras, a native clerk or writer, [in particular a shipping clerk. The corresponding Tel. term is Curnum].

1544. — "Duc eò tecum . . . domesticos tuus; pueros et alquem Comacapulum qui norit scribere, quous manu exaratrs relinquere posses in quavis loco præfertum a Pueris et aliis Catechumenis edimendas."—Sei.

1564. — "So you must appoint in each village or station fitting teachers and Canacopoly, as we have already arranged, and these must assemble the children every day at a certain time and place, and teach and drive into them the elements of reading and religion."—Ditto, in Corderi's L. of his,
ii. 24.

1758. — "At Tanor in Malabar I was acquainted with a Nayre Canacopoly, a writer in the Camara del Rey at Tanor . . . who every day used to eat to the weight of 5 drachms (of opium), which he would take in my presence."—Acoost, Tractado, 415.
CONSOO-HOUSE. 947

C. 1580.—"One came who worked as a clerk, and said he was a poor canaappole, who had nothing to give."—Primer e Honra, &c., f. 94.

1673.—"Xaverius set everywhere teachers called Canaappole."—Baldaeus, Ceylon, 377.

1680.—"The Governor, accompanied with the Council and several Persons of the factory, attended by six files of Soldiers, the Company's Peons, 300 of the Washers, the Pedda Naigue, the Canoopy of the Towne and of the grounds, went the circuit of Madras ground, which was described by the Canoopy of the grounds, and lyse so intermixed with others (as is customary in these Countries) that 'tis impossible to be knowne to any others, therefore every Village has a Canoopy and a Parryar, who are employed in this office, which goes from Father to Son for ever."—Pt. 2nd, Gen. Comis. Sept. 21. In Notes and Jnns., No. iii. 94.

1718.—"Besides this we maintain seven Kanaappols, or Malabarick writers."—Propagation of the Gospel in the East, Pt. ii. 55.

1726.—"The Comanappules (commonly called Kanaappules) are writers."—Valentijns, Choro. 88.

1749.—"Canaappola," in Logan, Malabar, iii. 92.

1750.—"Concooplas," ibid. iii. 150.

1773.—"Concoopola. He keeps your accounts, pays the rest of the servants their wages, and assists the Dubeach in buying and selling. At Bengal he is called secretary. . . ."—Ives, 49.

CONSOO-HOUSE, n.p. At Canton this was a range of buildings adjoining the foreign Factories, called also the 'Council Hall' of the foreign Factories. It was the property of the body of Hong merchants, and was the place of meeting of these merchants among themselves, or with the chiefs of the Foreign houses, when there was need for such conference (see Fankhouse, p. 23). The name is probably a corruption of 'Council.' Bp. Moule, however, says: "The name is likely to have come from kung-su, the public hall, where a kung-su, a 'public company,' or guild, meets."

CONSUMAH, KHANSAMA, s. P. Khansamah; 'a house-steward.' In Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency, this is the title of the chief table servant and provider, now always a Mahomedan. [See BUTLER.] The literal meaning of the word is 'Master of the household gear'; it is not connected with khowdn, 'a tray,' as Wilson suggests. The analogous word Mir-ândm occurs in Elliot, vii. 153. The Anglo-Indian form Consumer seems to have been not uncommon in the 18th century, probably with a spice of intention. From tables quoted in Long, 182, and in Seton-Karr, i. 98, 107, we see that the wages of a "Consumah, Christian, Moor, or Gentoo," were at Calcutta, in 1759, 5 rupees a month, and in 1783, 8 to 10 rupees.

[1609.—"Emerese Noobherdee being called by the Canesamma."—Dancers, Letters, i. 24.]

C. 1664.—"Some time after ... she chose for her Kama-saman, that is, her Steward, a certain Persian called Nazerkhan, who was a young Omrah, the handsomest and most accomplished of the whole Court."—Berier, E.T., p. 4; [ed. Constable, p. 13].

1712.—"They were brought by a great circuit on the River to the Chamsamma or Steward (Dispenser) of the aforesaid Makal."—Valentijns, iv. (Surat) 381.

1759.—"Dustuck or Order, under the Chum Summer, or Steward's Seal, for the Honourable Company's holding the King's [i.e. the Great Mogul's] fleet." • • • • •

"At the back of this is the seal of Zecharial Doulat Tidaind Canu Bahadour, who is Cun Saman, or Steward to his Majesty, whose prerogative it is to grant this Order."—R. Owen Cambridge, pp. 281 seq.

1788.—"After some deliberation I asked the Khansaman, what quantity was remaining of the clothes that had been brought from Iran to camp for sale, who answered that there were 15,000 packages, and 12,000 pairs of khowdn drawers."—Mem. of Khojir Abdulkurreem, tr. by Gladwin, 55.

1810.—"The Kamsamah may be classed with the house-steward, and butler; both of which offices appear to unite in this servant."—Williamson, V. M., i. 199.

1831.—"I have taught my khansama to make very light iced punch."—Jacquemont, Letters, E.T., ii. 104.

COOCH AZO, or AZO simply, n.p. Koch Hidjo, a Hindu kingdom on the banks of the Brahmaputra R., to the E. of Koch Bihar, annexed by Jahangir's troops in 1637. See Blochmann in J.A.S.B. xi. pt. i. 53, and xlii. pt. i. 235. In Valentijn's map of Bengal (made c. 1660) we have Cos Assam with Azo as capital, and T'Ryk van Aze, a good way south and east of Silhet.

1753.—"Caste rivière (Brahmaputra), en remontant, conduit à Rangamati et à Azo, qui font la frontière de l'état du Mogol. Azo est une forteresse que l'Emir Jemi, sous le règne d'Aorengezébe, reprit COOCH BEHAR, n.p. Koch Bihār, a native tributary State on the N.E. of Bengal, adjoining Bhutan and the Province of Assam. The first part of the name is taken from that of a tribe, the Koch, apparently a forest race who founded this State about the 16th century, and in the following century obtained dominion of Coqeh, or Brahman, [See Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 491 seqq.] The site of the ancient monarchy of Kām-rūp is believed to have been in Koch Bihār, within the limits of which there are the remains of more than one ancient city. The second part of the name is no doubt due to the memory of some important Vihāra, or Buddhist Monastery, but we have not found information on the subject. [Possibly the ruins at Kamatapur, for which see Buchanan Hamilton, Eastern India, iii. 426 seqq.]

1585.—"I went from Bengal into the country of Couth, which lieth 25 days journey Northwards from Tanda."—R. Fick, in Hakt. ii. 397.

1598.—"To the north of Bengal is the province of Cough, the Chief of which commands 1,000 horse, and 100,000 foot. Kām-roop, which is also called Kamacco and Kuant (see COMOTAY) makes a part of his dominions."—Ayer (by Gladwin), ed. 1800, ii. 3; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 117.]

1728.—"Cous Bhaiar is a Kingdom of itself, the King of which is sometimes subject to the Great Mogol, and sometimes throws his yoke off."—Valentijn, v. 159.

1774.—"The country about Bahar is low. Two kos beyond Bahar we entered a thicket ... frogs, watery insects and dank air ... 2 miles farther on we crossed the river which separates the Koch Bahar country from that of the Deb Rājah, in sal country ..."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, &c., 14 seq.

(But Mr. Markham spoils all the original spelling. We may be sure Bogle did not write kos, nor "Koch Bahar," as Mr. M. makes him do.)

1791.—"The late Mr. George Bogle ... travelled by way of Coos-Beyhar, Tassaudon, and Paridrong, to Channamnong the then residence of the Lama."—Reynell (3rd ed.), 301.

COOJA, a. P. kāsa; an earthenware water-vessel (not long-necked, like the surāḥ;—see SERAI). It is a word used at Bombay chiefly, [but is not uncommon among Mahomedans in N. India].

1611.—"One silk of chaher to make coo."—Dunlap, Letters, i. 128.

1871.—"Many parts of India are celebrated for their cooja or jugs, but the finest are brought from Bumsorah, being light, thin, and porous, made from a whisht clay."—Riddell, Indian Domestic Economy, 7th ed., p. 362.

1883.—"They (tree-frogs) would perch pleasantly on the edge of the water cooja, or on the rim of a tumbler."—Tribes on my Frontier, 118.

COOK-ROOM, a. Kitchen; in Anglo-Indian establishments always detached from the house.

1758.—"We will not in future admit of any expenses being defrayed by the Company either under the head of cook-rooms, gardens, or other expenses whatever."—The Court's Letter, March 3, in Long, 130.

1789.—"I was one day watching an old female monkey who had a young one by her side to whom she was giving small bits of a piece of bread which she had evidently just received from my cook-room."—Life in the Mofussul, ii. 44.

COOLJOURNEE, a. This is the title of the village accountant and writer in some of the central and western parts of India. Mahr. kulkari, apparently from *kula, 'tribe,' and karana, writer, &c., the patrodi of N. India (see under CRANNY, CURNUM).

Kula "in the revenue language of the S. appears to be applied especially to families, or individual heads of families, paying revenue" (Wilson.)

win's Ayer Akbey, ii. 57; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228.]

1826.—"You potails, coolumnies, &c., will no doubt ... contrive to reap tolerable harvests."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 47.

COOLICOY, a. A Malay term, properly kulit-kayu, 'skin-wood,' explained in the quotation.

1784.—"The cooliteayo or coolicyo. ... This is a bark procured from some particular trees. (It is used for matting the sides of houses, and by Europeans as dunage in pepper cargoes.)"—Maren's H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 51.

COOLIN. adj. A class of Brahmans of Bengal Proper, who make extraordinary claims to purity of caste and exclusiveness. Beng. kulinas, from Skt. kula, 'a caste or family;' kulina, 'belonging to a noble family.' They are much sought in marriage for the daughters of Brahmans of less exalted pretensions, and often take many brides for the sake of the presents they receive. The system is one of the most abases in Bengali Hindooism. [Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 146 seqq.]

1820. "Some inferior Coolins marry many wives; I have heard of persons having 120; many have 15 or 20, and others 40 and 50 each. Numbers procure a subsistence by this excessive polygamy. . . ."—Ward, i. 81.

COOLUNG, COOLEN, and in W. India CULLUM, s. Properly the great grey crane (Grus cinerea), H. kulanq (said by the dictionaries to be Persian, but Jerdon gives Mahr. kullah, and Tel. kulanq, kolang, which seem against the Persian origin), [and Platts seems to connect it with Skt. kurkara, the Indian crane, Ardea Subrca (Williáms)]. Great companies of these are common in many parts of India, especially on the sands of the less frequented rivers; and their clanging, trumpet-like call is often heard as they pass high overhead at night.

"Ille grumus . . .
Clamor in aetheris dispersus nubibus austri." (Locr. iv. 182 seq.).

The name, in the form Coolen, is often misspelled to the Demoiselle Crane (Anthropoides virgo, L.), which is one of the best of Indian birds for the table (see Jerdon, ed. 1877, ii. 667, and last quotation below). The true Coolung, though inferior, is tolerably good eating. This bird, which is now quite unknown in Scotland, was in the 15th century not uncommon there, and was a favourite dish at great entertainments (see Acts. of L. H. Treasurer of Scotland, i. ccv.).

1888. "Peculiarly Brand-geese, Colum, and Sarus, a species of the former."—Fryer, 117.

C. 1800. "Large flocks of a crane called Kolong, and of another called Sarus (Ardea Antigone—see GURUS), frequent this district in winter. . . . They come from the north in the beginning of the cold season, and retire when the heats commence."—Buchanan's Runnpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 579.

1818. "Peacocks, partridges, quails, doves, and green pigeons supplied our table, and with the addition of two stately birds, called the Sarus and cullum, added much to the animated beauty of the country."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 29; [2nd ed. i. 881].

1883. "Not being so green as I was, I let the tempting herd of antelopes pass, but the kullum I cannot resist. They are feeding in thousands at the other end of a large field, and to reach them it will only be necessary to crawl round behind the hedge for a quarter of a mile or so. But what will one not do with roast kullum looming in the vista of the future?"—Tribes on my Frontier, p. 162.

" N.B.—I have applied the word kullum, as everybody does, to the demoiselle crane, which, however, is not properly the kullum but the Koonja."—Ibid. p. 171.

COOY, s. A hired labourer, or burden-carrier; and, in modern days especially, a labourer induced to emigrate from India, or from China, to labour in the plantations of Mauritius, Réunion, or the West Indies, sometimes under circumstances, especially in French colonies, which have brought the cooly's condition very near to slavery. In Upper India the term has frequently a specific application to the lower class of labourer who carries earth, bricks, &c., as distinguished from the skilled workman, and even from the digger.

The original of the word appears to have been a nomen gentile, the name (Koli) of a race or caste in Western India, who have long performed such offices as have been mentioned, and whose savagery, filth, and general degradation attracted much attention in former times, [see Hamilton, Descr. of Hindostan (1820), i. 609]. The application of the word would thus be analogous to that which has rendered the name of a Stavan, captured and made a bondservant, the word for such a bondservant in many European tongues. According to Dr. H. V. Carter the Kolis proper are a true hill-people, whose especial locality lies in the Western Ghats, and in the northern extension of that range, between 18° and 24° N. lat. They exist in large numbers in Guzerat, and in the Konkan, and in the adjoining districts of the Deccan, but not beyond these limits (see Ind. Antiquary, ii. 164). [But they are possibly kinsfolk of the Kola, an important Dravidian race in Bengal and the COOLY.

N.W.P. (see Risley, T. and C. of Bengal, ii. 101; Crooke, T. C. of N.W.P. iii. 294.) In the Râs Mâla [ed. 1878, p. 78 seqq.] the Koolies are spoken of as a tribe who lived long near the Indus, but who were removed to the country of the Null (the NaJ a P. SN.).

Though this explanation of the general use of the term Cooly is the most probable, the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to trace to the same origin. Thus in S. India there is a Tamil and Can. word kûli in common use, signifying 'hire' or 'wages,' which Wilson indeed regards as the true origin of Cooly. [Oppert (Orig. Inhabit. of Bharatavarsa, p. 131) adopts the same view, and disputing the connection of Cooly with Koli or Kol, regards the word as equivalent to 'hired servant' and originating in the English Factories on the E. coast.] Also in both Oriental and Osmanli Turkish kol is a word for a slave, whilst in the latter also kûlây means 'a male slave, a bondman' (Redhouse). Khol is in Tibetan also a word for a servant or slave (Note from A. Schiefner; see also Jâschke's Tibetan Dict., 1881, p. 59). But with this the Indian term seems to have no connection. The familiar use of Cooly has extended to the Straits Settlements, Java, and China, as well as to all tropical and sub-tropical colonies, whether English or foreign.

In the quotations following, those in which the race is distinctly intended are marked with an *.

*1548.—"And for the duty from the Collés who fish at the sea-stakes and on the river of Bacaim..."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 155.

*1558.—"Solot Bedur... ordered those pagans to be seized, and if they would not become Moors, to be flayed alive, saying that was all the black-mail the Collijs should get from Champanel."—Barros, Dec. IV. liv. v. cap. 7.

*1583.—"These Collés... live by robbing and thieving at this day."—Garcia, f. 84.

*1584.—"I attacked and laid waste nearly fifty villages of the Kolis and Giasias, and I built forts in seven different places to keep these people in check."—Tâbakât-i-Akbarî, in Eâliot, v. 447.

*1598.—"Others that yet dwell within the countrie called Collies: which Collies... doe yet live by robbing and stealing..."—Linschoten, ch. xxvii.; [Hak. Soc. l. 169].

*1616.—"Those who inhabit the country villages are called Coolies; these till the ground and breed up cattle."—Terry, in Purchas; [ed. 1777, p. 180].

Review, Aug. 16, 203.

1875.—"A long row of cottages, evidently pattern-built . . . announced the presence of Coolies, Indian or Chinese."—Palgrave, Dutch Guiana, ch. i.

The word Cooly has passed into English thieves' jargon in the sense of 'a soldier' (v. Slang Dict.).

COOMKEE, adj., used as sub. This is a derivative from P. kumak, 'aid,' and must have been widely diffused in India, for we find it specialised in different senses in the extreme West and East, besides having in both the general sense of 'auxiliary.'

[(a) In the Moghul army the term is used for auxiliary troops.

[c. 1590.—"Some troops are levied occasionally to strengthen the warratau, and they are called Kumakly (or auxiliaries)."—Gladin, Ayien Akbery, ed. 1800, i. 188; in Blockmann, i. 232, Kumakis.

[1858.—"The great landholders despise them (the ordinary levies) but respect the Komuky corps."—Sleeman, Journey through Oudh, i. 30.]

(b) Kumaki, in N. and S. Canara, is applied to a defined portion of forest, from which the proprietor of the village or estate has the privilege of supplying himself with wood for house-building, &c. (except from the reserved kinds of wood), with leaves and twigs for manure, fodder, &c. (See COOMBY). [The system is described by Sturrock, Man. S. Canara, i. 16, 224 seqq.]

(c). Koomkee, in Bengal, is the technical name of the female elephant used as a decoy in capturing a male.

1807.—"When an elephant is in a proper state to be removed from the Kedah, he is conducted either by koomkies (i.e. decoy females) or by tame males."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, folio ed., p. 30.

[1873.—"It was an interesting sight to see the captive led in between two koomkies or tame elephants."—Cooper, Miskhee Hills, 88.

[1882.—"Attached to each elephant hunting party there must be a number of tame elephants, or Koomkies, to deal with the wild elephants when captured."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 70.]
COOMBY, s. [Can. kumari, from Mahr. kumbari, 'a hill slope of poor soil.'] Kumari cultivation is the S. Indian (especially in Canara), [Sturrock, S. Canara Man. i. 17], appellation of that system pursued by hill-people in many parts of India and its frontiers, in which a certain tract of forest is cut down and burnt, and the ground planted with crops for one or two seasons, after which a new site is similarly treated. This system has many names in different regions; in the east of Bengal it is known as jhad (see JHOOm); in Burma as toungyam; [in parts of the N.W.P. dahiya, Skt. dahe, 'burning'; ponam in Malabar; pomacoud in Salem]. We find kumried as a quasi-English participle in a document quoted by the High Court, Bombay, in a judgment dated 27th January, 1879, p. 227.

COORG, n.p. A small hill State on the west of the table-land of Mysore, in which lies the source of the Cauvery, and which was annexed to the British Government, in consequence of cruel misgovernment in 1834. The name is a corruption of Koda, of which Gundert says: "perhaps from koda, 'steep,' or Tamil kada, 'west.'" [For various other speculations on the derivation, see Oppert, Original Inhabit., 182 seqq. The Madras Gloss. seems to refer to Skt. krodadesa, 'hag-land,' from "the tradition that the inhabitants had nails on hands and feet like a hoar.] Coor is also used for a native of the country, in which case it stands for Koda.

COORSY, s. H.—from Ar.—kursi [which is used for the stand on which the Koran is laid]. It is the word usually employed in Western India for 'a chair,' and is in the Bengal Presidency a more dignified term than chauki (see CHOKY). Kursi is the Arabic form, borrowed from the Aramaic, in which the emphatic state is kursyi. But in Hebrew the word possesses a more original form with Ba for As (kisw, the usual word in the O. T. for 'a throne'). The original sense appears to be 'a covered seat.'

1781.—"It happened, at this time, that the Nawab was seated on his koord, or chair, in a garden, beneath a banyan tree."—Hist. of Hydur Nait, 432.

COOSUMBA, s. H. kusum, kusum-bha, Saflower, q.v. But the name is applied in Rajputana and Guzerat to the tincture of opium, which is used freely by Rajputs and others in those territories; also (according to Shakespear) to an infusion of Bang (q.v.).

[1823.—"Several of the Rajput Princess West of the Chumbul seldom hold a Durbar without presenting a mixture of liquid opium, or, as it is termed, 'kusoombah,' to all present. The minister washes his hands in a vessel placed before the Rawul, after which some liquid opium is poured into the palm of his right hand. The first in rank who may be present then approaches and drinks the liquid."—Malcolm, Mem. of Central India, 2d ed. ii. 146, note.]

COOTUB, THE, n.p. The Kutb Minar, near Delhi, one of the most remarkable of Indian architectural antiquities, is commonly so called by Europeans. It forms the minaret of the Great Mosque, now long in ruins, which Kutb-uddin Ibak founded A.D. 1191, immediately after the capture of Delhi, and which was built out of the materials of numerous Hindu temples, as is still manifest. According to the elaborate investigation of Gen. A. Cunningham [Arch. Rep. i. 189 seqq.], the magnificent Minar was begun by Kutb-uddin Ibak about 1200, and completed by his successor Shamsuddin Iyaltimish about 1220. The tower has undergone, in its upper part, various restorations. The height as it now stands is 238 feet 1 inch. The traditional name of the tower no doubt had reference to the name of its founder, but also there may have been a reference to the contemporary Saint, Kutb-uddin Ushi, whose tomb is close by; and perhaps also to the meaning of the name Kutb-uddin, 'The Pole or the reign of Vassili III., about the middle of the 15th century, but only because regularly established in the coinage c. 1536. [See Tanga.]

1536.—"It was on this that the Grand Duchess Helena, 'mother of Ivan Vassilievitch, and regent in his minority, ordered, in 1535, that these new Dengui should be melted down and new ones struck, at the rate of 300 Dengui, or 3 Roubles of Moscow à la grivenka, in Kopecks. From that time accounts continued to be kept in Roubles, Kopecks, and Dengui."—Ghadoir, Apercus.

c. 1656.—"The pension in lieu of provisions was, for our Lord the Patriarch 25 copecks daily."—Travels of the Patriarch Macarius, Or. Tr. Fund, i. 281.

1783.—"The copeck of Russia, a copper coin, in name and apparently in value, is the same which was current in Tartary during the reign of Timur."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 332.

COPPERSMITH. s. Popular name both in H. (tambayar) and English of the crimson-breasted barbet (Xantho-lasma indica, Latham). See the quotation from Jerdon.

1862.—"It has a remarkably loud note, which sounds like toot-toot-took, and this it generally utters when seated on the top of some tree, nodding its head at each call, first to one side and then to another. . . . This sound and the motion of its head, accompanying it, have given origin to the name of 'Coppersmith.' . . ."—Jerdon, ed. 1877, i. 316.

1879.—". . . In the mango-sprays The sun-birds flashed; alone at his green forge Tolled the loud Coppersmith . . ."

The Light of Asia, p. 20.

1883.—"For the same reason mynas seek the tops, and the 'blue jay,' so-called, and the little green coppersmith hunting ventriloquistically."—Tribes on my Frontier, 154.

COPRAH. s. The dried kernel of the coco-nut, much used for the expression of its oil, and exported largely from the Malabar ports. The Portuguese probably took the word from the Malayal koppura, which is, however, apparently borrowed from the H. khopra, of the same meaning. The Axle of the Faith,' as appropriate to such a structure.

c. 1380.—"Attached to the mosque (of Delhi) is a tower for the call to prayer which has no equal in the whole world. It is built of red stone, with about 300 steps. It is not square, but has a great number of angles, is very massive at the base, and very lofty, equalling the Pharaoh of Alexandria."—Aboufeda, in Gildemeister, 160.

c. 1340.—"In the northern court of the mosque stands the minaret (al-pawma'a), which is without a parallel in all the countries of Islam. . . . It is of surpassing height; the pinnacle is of milk-white marble, and the globes which decorate it are of pure gold. The aperture of the staircase is so wide that elephants can ascend, and a person on whom I could rely told me that when the minaret was a-building, he saw an elephant ascend to the very top with a load of stones."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 151.

The latter half of the last quotation is fiction.

1663.—"At two Leagues off the City on Agra's side, in a place by the Mahumetans called Koja Kotbuddin, there is a very ancient Edifice which hath been a Temple of Idols. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 91.

It is evident from this that Bernier had not then visited the Kuli. [Constable in his tr. reads "Koja Kotbuddin," by which he understands Koh-i-Kotbuddin, the hill or eminence of the Saint, p. 283.]

1825.—"I will only observe that the Cittab Minar . . . is really the finest tower I have ever seen, and must, when its spire was complete, have been still more beautiful."—Heter, ed. 1844, i. 308.

COPECK, s. This is a Russian coin, 14 of a ruble. The degeneration of coin denominations is often so great that we may suspect this name to preserve that of the dinar Kopeki often mentioned in the histories of Timur and his family. Kopek is in Turki, 'dog,' and Charmoy explains the term as equivalent to Abd-kalb, 'Father of a dog,' originally applied in Egypt to Dutch crowns (Loven-thaler) bearing a lion. There could not be Dutch coins in Timur's time, but some other Frank coin bearing a lion may have been so called, probably Venetian. A Polish coin with a lion on it was called by a like name (see Macarius, quoted below, p. 169). Another etymology of kopek suggested (in Chaudoir, Apercus des Monnaies Russes) is from Russ. kopie, kopy, a pike, many old Russian coins representing the Prince on horseback with a spear. [This is accepted by the N.E.D.] Kopeks are mentioned in COPECK. 253 COPRAH.

Coral-tree. s. Erythrina indica. Lam., so called from the rich scarlet colour of its flowers.

[1869.]—"There are . . . two or three species of the genus Erythrina or Coral Tree. A small species of Erythrina, with reddish flowers, is famous in Buddhist mythology as the tree around which the Devas dance till they are intoxicated in Sudra's (1Indra's heaven)." Mason's Burmah, p. 331.—McMahan, Kares of the Golden Chersonese, p. ii.

Corcopali, s. This is the name of a fruit described by Varthema, Acosta, and other old writers, the identity of which has been the subject of much conjecture. It is in reality the Garcinia indica, Choisy (N. O. Guttiferae), a tree of the Concan and Canara, which belongs to the same genus as the mangosteen, and as the tree affording the gamboge (see Camboja) of commerce. It produces an agreeable, acid, purple fruit, which the Portuguese call brandoes. From the seeds a fatty oil is drawn, known as kokun butter. The name in Malayal is kodukka, and this possibly, with the addition of puli, "acid," gave rise to the name before us. It is stated in the English Cyclopedia (Nat. Hist. s.v. Garcinia) that in Travanore the fruit is called by the natives gharka puli, and in Ceylon goraka. Forbes Watson's 'List of Indian Productions' gives as synonyms of the Garcinia cambogia tree 'karka-puliemaram? 'Tam.; 'kurkapulik,' Mal.; and 'guraka-gass,' Ceyl. [The Madras Gloss. calls it Male mangosteen, a ship term meaning 'cook-room mangosteen'; Can. murginahulis, 'twisted tamarind'; Mal. punampuli, 'stiff tamarind.'] The Cyclopedia also contains some interesting particulars regarding the uses in Ceylon of the goraka. But this Ceylon tree is a different species (G. Gambogia, Desrous). Notwithstanding its name it does not produce gamboge; its gum being insoluble in water. A figure of G. indica is given in Beddome's Flora Sylvestrea, pl. lxxxv. [A full account of Kokam butter will be found in Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 487 seqq.]

1510.—"Another fruit is found here fashioned like a melon, and it has divisions after that manner, and when it is cut, three or four grains which look like grapes, or birdcherries, are found inside. The tree which bears this fruit is of the height of a quince tree, and forms its leaves in the same manner. This fruit is called Corcopal; it is extremely good for eating, and excellent as a medicine." Varthema (transl. modified from), Hak. Soc. 167.

1578.—"Caracapul is a great tree, both lofty and thick; its fruit is in size and aspect like an orange without a rind, all divided in lobes . . ."—Acosta, Tradicio, 357.

(This author gives a tolerable cut of the fruit; there is an inferior plate in Deby, iv. No. xvii.).

1672.—"The plant Caracapul is peculiar to Malabar. . . . The ripe fruit is used as ordinary food; the unripe is cut in pieces and dried in the sun, and is then used all the year round to mix in dishes, along with tamarind, having an excellent flavour, of a tempered acidity, and of a very agreeable and refreshing odour. The form is nearly round, of the size of an apple, divided into eight equal lobes of a yellow colour, fragrant and beautiful, and with another little fruit attached to the extremity, which is perfectly round," &c., &c.—P. Vincenzo Maria, 356.

CORGHE, COORGE, &c. A mercantile term for a score. The word is in use among the trading Arabs and others, as well as in India. It is established in Portuguese use apparently, but the Portuguese word is almost certainly of Indian origin, and this is expressly asserted in some Portuguese Dictionaries (e.g. Lacerda's, Lisbon, 1871). Korg is used exactly in the same way by natives all over Upper India. Indeed, the vulgar there in numeration habitually say do korg, tin korg, for 40, 60, and so forth. The first of our quotations shows the word in a form very closely allied to this, and explaining the transition. Wilson gives Telugun Khorgam, a bale or lot of 20 pieces, commonly called a corghe. [Madras Gloss. gives Can. korgi, Tel. khorjam, as meaning either a measure of capacity, about 44 maunds, or a Madras town cloth measure of 20 pieces.] But, unless a root can be traced, this may easily be a corruption of the trade-word. Littre explains corghe or corgue as "Paquet de tote de coton des Indes," and Marcel Devic says: "C'est vraisemblablement l'Arabe khordj"—which means a saddlebag, a portmanteau. Both the definition and the etymology seem to miss the essential meaning of corghe, which is that of a score, and not that of a packet or bundle, unless by accident.

1510.—"If they be stuffs, they deal by curia, and in like manner if they be jewels. By a curia is understood twenty."—Varthema, 170.

1525.—"A corde dos autonys grandes vale (250) tangamas."—Lembrança, das Costas da India, 48.

1654.—"The nut and mace when gathered were bartered by the natives for various kinds of cloth, and for each korja of these . . . they gave a baker of mace . . . and seven bakers of the nut."—Cudzuheda, vi. 8.

[1605-6.—"Note the cody or corghe is a bondell or set number of 20 pieces."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 80.]

1612.—"White caliuose from twenty to fortie Royals the Corghe (a Corghe being twenty pieces), a great quantity."—Capt. Saris, in Purchas, i. 347.

1612-13.—"They returning brought down the Mustruas of everie sort, and the prices demanded for them per Corghe."—Donaton, in Purchas, i. 289.

1644.—"To the Friars of St. Francis for their regular yearly allowance, a cow every week, 24 candies of wheat, 15 sacks of rice, 2 sexts of sugar, half a candy of zerno (qu. zerno, 'tallow,' 'grease,'! ¾ candy of coco-nut oil, 6 maunds of butter, 4 corjas of cotton stuffs, and 25,920 rs for dispensary medicines (mexinkas de botica)."—Bocarre, MS. i. 217.

1670.—"The Chites . . . which are made at Lahor . . . are sold by Corges, every Corghe consisting of twenty pieces. . . ."—Tavernier, On the Commodities of the Domin. of the Great Mogull, &c., E.T. p. 58; [ed. Bull, ii. 5].

1747.—"Another Sett of Madras Painters . . . being examined regarding what Goods were Remaining in their hands upon the Loss of Madras, they acknowledge to have had 15 Corges of Chints then under their Performance, and which they acquant us is all safe . . . but as they have lost all their Wax and Colours they request an Advance of 300 Pagodas for the Purchase of more. . . ."—Comars. Fort St. David, Aug. 19. MS. Records in India Office.

1784.—In a Calcutta Lottery-list of prizes we find 65 corghe of Pearls."—In Long, 239.

1810.—"I recollect about 29 years back, when marching from Berhampore to Cawn- pore with a detachment of European recruits, seeing several corghes (of sheep) bought for their use, at 3 and 3½ rupeesl at the latter rate 6 sheep were purchased for a rupees . . . five pence each."—Williamson, V. M. i. 285.

1813.—"Corges is 22 at Judda."—Milburn, i. 98.
CORINGA, n.p. Koringa; probably a corruption of Kalinga [see KLING]. [The Madras Gloss. gives the Tel. korangi, 'small cardamoms.'] The name of a seaport in Godavari Dist. on the northern side of the river. ["The only place between Calcutta and Trincomalee where large vessels used to be docked."—Morris, Godavery Man., p. 40.]

COBLE, s. Singh. kórale, a district.

1726.—"A Coraul is an overseer of a Corie or District. . ."—Valentijn, Names of Native Officers in the Villages of Ceylon, 1.

CORNAO, s. This word is used, by French writers especially, as an Indian word, and as the equivalent of Mahout (q.v.), or driver of the elephant. Littre defines: "Nom qu'on donne dans les Indes au conducteur d'un éléphant," &c., &c., adding: "Etym. Sanskrit karnikin, éléphant." "Dans les Indes" is happily vague, and the etymology worthless. Bluteau gives Cornaca, but no etymology. In Singhalese Kāraṇa = 'Elephant Stud.' (It is not in the Singhalese Dict., but it is in the official Glossary of Terms, &c.,) and our friend Dr. Rost suggests Kāraṇiyaka, 'Chief of the Kāraṇa' as a probable origin. This is confirmed by the form Curnakes in Valentijn, and by another title which he gives as used for the head of the Elephant Stable at Matura, viz. Gaṇiṇiṇaṅka (Names, &c., p. 11), i.e. Gaṇiṇiṇaṅka, from Gaṇa, 'an elephant.' [The N.E.D. remarks that some authorities give for the first part of the word Skt. kari, 'elephant.]

1672.—"There is a certain season of the year when the old elephant discharges an oil at the two sides of the head, and at that season they become like mad creatures, and often break the neck of their carac or driver."—Balsacra, Germ. ed. 422. (See MUST.)

1885.—"O cornaca q estava de baixo delle tinha hum laço que metia em huls das mãos ao bravó."—Ribiero, f. 49b.

1712.—"The aforesaid author (P. Fr. Gaspar de S. Bernardino in his Itinerary), relates that in the said city (Goa), he saw three Elephants adorned with jewels, adorning the most Holy Sacrament at the St. Gate on the Octave of Easter, on which day in India they make the procession of Corpus Domini, because of the calm weather. I doubt not that the Cornacas of these animals had taught them to perform these acts of apparent adoration. But at the same time there appears to be Religion and Fiety innate in the Elephant."—In Bluteau, s.v. Elephant.

1726.—"After that (at Mongeer) one goes over a great walled area, and again through a gate, which is adorned on either side with a great stone elephant with a Carnak on it."—Valentijn, v. 167.

1831.—"With the same judgment an elephant will task his strength, without human direction. 'I have seen,' says M. D'Oboenville, 'two occupied in beating down a wall which their cornees (keepers) had desired them to do. . . .'"—Library of Entertaining Knowledge, Quadrupeds, ii. 157.

1884.—"The cornac, or driver, was quite unable to control the beast, which roared and trumpeted with indignation."—C. Bock, Temples and Elephants, p. 22.

COROMANDEL, n.p. A name which has been long applied by Europeans to the Northern Tamil Country, or (more comprehensively) to the eastern coast of the Peninsula of India from P. Calimere northward to the mouth of the Kistna, sometimes to Orissa. It corresponds pretty nearly to the Maabar of Marco Polo and the Mahomedan writers of his age, though that is defined more accurately as from C. Comorin to Nellore.

Much that is fanciful has been written on the origin of this name. Tod makes it Kūṟṟumandalai, the Realm of the Kūṟṟus (Trans. R. As. Soc. iii. 157). Bp. Caldwell, in the first edition of his Dravidian Grammar, suggested that European traders might have taken this familiar name from that of Karumangal ("black sand"), the name of a small village on the coast north of Madras, which is habitually pronounced and written Coromandel by European residents at Madras. [The same suggestion was made earlier (see Wilks, Hist. Sketches, ed. 1869, i. 5, p. 22.]

* "This elephant is a very pious animal"—a German friend once observed in India, misled by the double sense of his vernacular from (barmless, tame) as well as 'pious or innocent'.

COROMANDEL.

The learned author, in his second edition, has given up this suggestion, and has accepted that to which we adhere. But Mr. C. P. Brown, the eminent Telugu scholar, in repeating the former suggestion, ventures positively to assert: "The earliest Portuguese sailors pronounced this Coromandel, and called the whole coast by this name, which was unknown to the Hindus";* a passage containing in three lines several errors. Again, a writer in the "Ind. Antiquary" (i. 380) speaks of this supposed origin of the name as "pretty generally accepted," and proceeds to give an imaginative explanation of how it was propagated. These etymologies are founded on a corrupted form of the name, and the same remark would apply to Khararamandalam, the 'hot country,' which Bp. Caldwell mentions as one of the names given, in Telugu, to the eastern coast. Padre Paolino gives the name more accurately as Chola (i.e. Chola) mandalam, but his explanation of it as meaning the Country of Cholam (or *uudrri—Sorghum vulgare, Pers.) is erroneous. An absurd etymology is given by Teixeira (Relacion de Harmuz, 28; 1610). He writes: "Choramadel or Choro Bädel, i.e. Rice Port, because of the great export of rice from thence." He apparently compounds H. *chau, chăwal, 'cooked rice' (i) and *bandel, i.e. *bandar (q.v.) 'harbour.' This is a very good type of the way etymologies are made by some people, and then confidently repeated.

The name is in fact Chôramandalam, the Realm of Chôra; this being the Tamil form of the very ancient title of the Tamil Kings who reigned at Tanjore. This correct explanation of the name was, already given by D'Anville (see Éclaircissements, p. 117), and by W. Hamilton in 1820 (ii. 405), by Ritter, quoting him in 1836 (Erdbkunde, vi. 296); by the late M. Reinaud in 1845 (Relation, &c., i. lxxxvi.); and by Sir Walter Elliot in 1869 (J. Ethnol. Soc. N.S. i. 117). And the name occurs in the forms Cholamandalam or Solamandalam on the great Temple inscription of Tanjore (11th century), and in an inscription of A.D. 1101 at a temple dedicated to Varahasvâmi near the Seven Pagodas. We have other quite analogous names in early inscriptions, e.g. Tâlamandalam (Ceylon), Cheramandalam, Tondaimandalam, &c.

Chola, as the name of a Tamil people and of their royal dynasty appears as Chola in one of Asoka's inscriptions, and in the Telugu inscriptions of the Châlukya dynasty. Nor can we doubt that the same name is represented by *Srâpa of Ptolemy who reigned at *Arkanô (Aracot), *Sôra-raô who reigned at *Orôoupâ (Warrûn), and the Srâpa royâdâs who dwelt inland from the site of Madras. The word Soli, as applied to the Tanjore country, occurs in Marco Polo (Bk. iii. ch. 20), showing that Chola in some form was used in his day. Indeed Soli is used in Ceylon.† And although the Choromandel of Baldaeus and other Dutch writers is, as pronounced in their language, ambiguous or erroneous, Valentijn (1726) calls the country *Sjola, and defines it as extending from Negapatam to Orissa, saying that it derived its name from a certain kingdom, and adding that mandalam is 'kingdom.'‡ So that this respectable writer had already distinctly indicated the true etymology of Coromandel.

Some old documents in Valentijn speak of the 'old city of Coromandel.' It is not absolutely clear what place was so called (probably by the Arabs in their fashion of calling a chief town by the name of the country), but the indications point almost certainly to Negapatam.§

The oldest European mention of the name is, we believe, in the "Roteiro de Vasco da Gama," where it appears as Chomandarla. The short Italian narrative of Hieronymo da Sto. Stefano is, however, perhaps earlier still, and he curiously enough gives the name in exactly the modern form "Coromandel," though perhaps his O

‡ "This coast bears commonly the corrupted name of Choromondel, and is now called only thus; but the right name is *Srâla-mandalam, after Srâla, a certain kingdom of that name, and mandalam, 'a kingdom,' one that used in the old times to be an independent and mighty empire."—Pal., v. 2.
§ e.g. 1675. "Hence the country ... has become very rich, wherefore the Portuguese were induced to build a town on the site of the old Gentoo (Jentius) city Chorondameland."—Report on the Dutch Conquests in Ceylon &c. India, by Eusebio Fonomen in Valenstjna, v. (Ceylon) 284.
had originally a cedilla (Ramusio, i. f. 345v). These instances suffice to show that the name was not given by the Portuguese. Da Gama and his companions knew the east coast only by hearsay, and no doubt derived their information chiefly from Mahommedan traders, through their "Moorish" interpreter. That the name was in familiar Mahommedan use at a later date may be seen from Rowlandson's Translation of the Tohfat-ul-Mujididin, where we find it stated that the Franks had built fortresses "at Meela (i.e. Malapuru or San Tome) and Nagapatam, and other ports of Solmundul," showing that the name was used by them just as we use it (p. 153). Again (p. 154) this writer says that the Mahommedans of Malabar were cut off from extra-Indian trade, and limited "to the ports of Guzerat, the Concan, Solmundul, and the countries about Kael." At page 160 of the same work we have mention of "Coromandel and other parts," but we do not know how this is written in the original Arabic. Varthema (1510) has Coromandel, i.e. Choromandel, but which Eden in his translation (1577, which probably affords the earliest English occurrence of the name) deforms into Cyromandel (f. 396a). [Albuquerque in his Cartas (see p. 135 for a letter of 1513) has Choromandel passim.] Barbosa has in the Portuguese edition of the Lisbon Academy, Obaramandel; in the Span. MS. translated by Lord Stanley of Alderley, Cholmenlel and Cholmender. D'Albuquerque's Commentaries (1557), Mendez Pinto (c. 1550) and Barros (1553) have Choromandel, and Garcia De Orta (1563) Charamandel. The ambiguity of the ch soft in Portuguese and Spanish, but hard in Italian, seems to have led early to the corrupt form Coromandel, which we find in Parkes's Mendesca (1589), and Coromandyll, among other spellings, in the English version of Castanheda (1582). Cesare Federici has in the Italian (1587) Obiaramandel (probably pronounced soft in the Venetian manner), and the translation of 1599 has Coromandel. This form thenceforward generally prevails in English books, but not without exceptions. A Madras document of 1672 in Wheeler has Cormandel, and so have the early Bengal records in the India Office; Dampier (1689) has Coromandel (i. 509); Lockyer (1711) has "the Coast of Coromandel"; A. Hamilton (1727) Choromandel (i. 349); ed. 1744, i. 531; and a paper of about 1759, published by Dalrymple, has "Choromandel Coast" (Orient. Repert. i. 120-121). The poet Thomson has Cormandel:

"...all that from the tract
Of woody mountains stretch'd through gorgeous Ind Fall on Cormandel's Coast or Malabar...."

Summer.

The Portuguese appear to have adhered in the main to the correcter form Choromandel: e.g. Archivo Port. Oriental, fasc. 3, p. 480, and passim. A Protestant Missionary Catechism, printed at Tranquebar in 1713 for the use of Portuguese schools in India has: "na costa dos Malabaros que se chama Cormandel." Bernier has "la cote de Koromandel" (Amst. ed. ii. 332). W. Hamilton says it is written Choromandel in the Madras Records until 1779, which is substantially correct. In the MS. "List of Persons in the Service of the Rt. Honble. E. I. Company in Fort St. George and other places on the Coast of Choromandel," preserved in the Indian Office, that spelling continues down to 1778. In that year it is changed to Coromandel. In the French translation of Ibn Batuta (iv. 142) we find Coromandel, but this is only the perverse and misleading manner of Frenchmen, who make Julius Caesar cross from "France" to "England." The word is Mabar in the original. [Albuquerque (Comm. Hak. Soc. i. 41) speaks of a violent squall under the name of vara de Cormandel.]

CORPORAL FORBES, a. A soldier's grimly jesting name for Cholera Morbus.

1829.—"We are all pretty well, only the regiment is sickly, and a great quantity are in hospital with the Corporal Forbes, which carries them away before they have time to die, or say who comes there."—In Ship's Memoirs, ii. 218.

CORRAL, a. An enclosure as used in Ceylon for the capture of wild elephants, corresponding to the Keddah of Bengal. The word is Sp. corral, 'a court,' &c., Port. curral, 'a cattle- pen, a paddock.' The Americans have the same word, direct from the Spanish, in common use for a cattle-pen; and they have formed a verb 'to corral,' i.e. to enclose in a pen, to pen. The word kural applied to native camps and villages at the Cape of Good Hope appears to be the same word introduced there by the Dutch. The word corral is explained by Bluteau: "A receptacle for any kind of cattle, with railings round it and no roof, in which respect it differs from corral, which is a building with a roof."

Also he states that the word is used especially in churches for septum nobilium feminarum, a pen for ladies.

c. 1270.—"When morning came, and I rose and had heard mass, I proclaimed a council to be held in the open space (corral) between my house and that of Montaragon."—

_Cron. of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, i. 65._

1404.—"And this mosque and these chapels were very rich, and very finely described."—

1672.—"About Mature they catch the Elephants with corala" (Coralen, but sing. Corral).—

_Baldacum, Ceylon, 188._

1880.—In Emerson Tennent's _Ceylon,_ Bk. VIII. ch. iv. the corral is fully described.

1880.—"A few hundred pounds expended in houses, and the erection of corralas in the neighbourhood of a permanent stream will form a basis of operations." (In Colorado.)—_Fortnightly Rev., Jan., 125._

CORUNDUM. s. This is described by Dana under the species Sapphire, as including the grey and darker coloured opaque crystallized specimens. The word appears to be Indian. Shakespeare gives Hind. kurand, Dakh. kurund. Littre attributes the origin to Skt. kuruvinda, which Williams gives as the name of several plants, but also as 'a ruby.' In Telugu we have kuruvindam, and in Tamil kurundam for the substance in present question; the last is probably the direct origin of the term.

COSMIN, n.p. This name is given by many travellers in the 16th and 17th centuries to a port on the western side of the Irawadi Delta, which must have been near _Bassein,* if not identical with it. Till quite recently this was all that could be said on the subject, but Prof. Forchhammer of Rangoon has now identified the name as a corruption of the classical name formerly borne by Bassein, viz. Kusuma or _Kusîmanagarâ,* a city founded about the beginning of the 6th century. Kusuma-mandala was the western province of the Delta Kingdom which we know as Pegu. The Burmese corrupted the name of Kusuma into _Kusmein* and _Kothein,* and Alompra after his conquest of Pegu in the middle of the 18th century, changed it to _Bassein.* So the facts are stated substantially by Forchhammer (see _Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma,* No. 2, p. 12); though familiar and constant use of the word _Persamin,* which appears to be a form of _Bassein,* in the English writings of 1750-60, published by Dalrymple (Or. _Reperitory, passim*), seems hardly consistent with this statement of the origin of _Bassein._ [Col. Temple (Ind. _Ani.* xxii. 19 seqq.; _J. R. A. S._ 1893, p. 885) disputes the above explanation. According to him the account of the change of name by Alompra is false history; the change from initial _p_ to _k_ is not isolated, and the word _Bassein* itself does not date beyond 1780.]

The last publication in which _Cosmin* appears is the "Draught of the River Irawaddy or Irabatty," made in 1796, by Ensign T. Wood of the Bengal Engineers, which accompanies Symes's _Account_ (London, 1800). This shows both _Cosmin,* and _Persamin* or _Bassein,* some 30 or 40 miles apart. But the former was probably taken from an older chart, and from no actual knowledge.

c. 1165.—"Two ships arrived at the harbour _Kusuma* in Aramana, and took in battle and laid waste country from the port _Sapattota,* over which Kurtipuranam was governor."—_J. A. S. Bengal,* vol. xli. pt. i. P. 198.

1516.—"Anrique Leme set sail right well equipped, with 60 Portuguese. And pursuing his voyage he captured a junk belonging to Pegu merchants, which he carried off towards Martaban, in order to send it with a cargo of rice to Malacca, and so make a great profit. But on reaching the coast he could not make the port of Martaban, and had to make the mouth of the River of Pegu. . . . Twenty leagues from the bar there is another city called _Cosmin,* in which merchants buy and sell and do business. . . ."—_Correa,* ii. 474.
1545.—"... and 17 persons only out of 88 who were on board, being saved in the boat, made their way for 5 days along the coast; intending to put into the river of Cosmin, in the kingdom of Pegu, there to embark for India (i.e. Goa), to the king's slacker ship..."—F. M. Pinto, ch. cxvil.

1554.—"Cosmin... the currency is the same in this part that is used in Pegu, for this is a seaport by which one goes to Pegu."—A. Nunes, 38.

1566.—"In a few days they put into Cosmin, a port of Pegu, where presently they gave out the news, and then all the Talapouns came in haste, and the people who were dwelling there..."—Couto, Dec. viii. cap. 13.

c. 1670.—"They go it vp the river in four daies... with the flood, to a City called Cosmin... whither the Customer of Pegu comes to take the note or markes of every man... Norwe from Cosmin to the citie Pegu... it is all plains and a goodly Country, and in 3 days you may make your voyage..."—Oscar Frederike, in Hakti, ii. 366-7.

1568.—"So the 5th October we came to Cosmin, the territory of which, from side to side is full of woods, frequented by parrots, tigers, boars, apes, and other like creatures."—G. Balbi, i. 94.

1587.—"We entered the barre of Negrais, which is a brane barre, and hath 4 fadomes water where it hath least. Three daies after we came to Cosmin, which is a very pretie towns, and standeth very pleasantly, very well furnished with all things... the houses are all high built, set vp on great high postes... for fears of the Tuygers, which be very many."—R. Fitz, in Hakti, ii. 390.

1618.—"The Portuguese proceeded without putting down their arms to attack the Banha Dela's (position), and destroyed it entirely, burning his factory and compelling him to flee to the kingdom of Prom, so that there now remained in the whole realm of Pegu only the Banho of Cosmin (a place adjoining Negrais) calling himself vassal of the King of Arracan."—Bocarro, 132.

COSPETIR, n.p. This is a name which used greatly to perplex us on the 16th and 17th century maps of India, e.g. in Blaueu's Atlas (c. 1650), appearing generally to the west of the Ganges Delta. Considering how the geographical names of different ages and different regions sometimes get mixed up in old maps, we at one time tried to trace it to the Kauvdruous of Herodotus, which was certainly going far afield! The difficulty was solved by the sagacity of the deeply-lamented Prof. Blochmann, who has pointed out (J. As. Soc. Beng., xlii. pt. i. 224) that Cospetir represents the Bengali genitive of Gajpati, 'Lord of Elephants,' the traditional title of the Kings of Orissa. The title Gajpati was that of one of the Four Great Kings who, according to Buddhist legend, divided the earth among them in times when there was no Chakravarti, or Universal Monarch (see CHUCKERBUTTY). Gajapatii rules the South; Aisvpati (Lord of Horses) the North; Chakrpati (Lord of the Umbrella) the West; Narapatii (Lord of Men) the East. In later days these titles were variously appropriated (see Lassen, ii. 27 seq.). And Akbar, as will be seen below, adopted these names, with others of his own devising, for the suits of his pack of cards. There is a Raja Gajpati, a chief Zamindar of the country north of Patna, who is often mentioned in the wars of Akbar (see Elliot, v. 399 and passim, vi. 55, &c.) who is of course not to be confounded with the Orissa Prince.

c. 700 (?).—"In times when there was no Chakravarti King... Chen-pu (Sambdivpa) was divided among four lords. The southern was the Lord of Elephants (Gajpati), &c. ..."—Introod. to Si-ya-ti (in Phelsera Boudh.), ii. lxv. 1565.—"On the other or western side, over against the Kingdom of Orixa, the Bengalis (as Bengalos) hold the Kingdom of Cospetir, whose plains at the time of the risings of the Ganges are flooded after the fashion of those of the River Nile."—Barros, Dec. IV. ix. cap. 1.

This and the next passage compared show that Barros was not aware that Cospetir and Gajpati were the same.

"Of this realm of Bengal, and of other four realms its neighbours, the Gen-toos and Moors of those parts say that God has given to each its peculiar gift: to Bengal infantry numberless; to the Kingdom of Orixa elephants; to that of Bimaga men most skilful in the use of sword and shield; to the Kingdom of Dely multitudes of cities and towns; and to Cou a vast number of horses. And so naming them in this order they give them these other names, viz.: Espatii, Ganeptii, Norapatii, Bupatii, and Cospatii."—Barros, ibid. [These titles appear to be Aisvpatii, "Lord of Horses"; Gajpatii; Narapatii, "Lord of Men"; Bhipatii, "Lord of Earth"; Gopati, "Lord of Cattle"];"

c. 1690.—"His Majesty (Akbar) plays with the following suits of cards. 1st. Aisvpatii, the lord of horses. The highest card represents a King on horseback, resembling the King of Dihli. . . 2nd. Gajpatii, the King whose power lies in the number of his elephants, as the ruler of Orisha. . . 3rd.
gols into India, and modified the previous kroba? But this is met by the existence of the word kos in Pali, as mentioned above.

In ancient Indian measurement, or estimation, 4 krobas went to the yojana. Sir H. M. Elliot deduced from distances in the length of the Chinese pilgrim Fa-hian that the yojana of his age was as nearly as possible 7 miles. Cunningham makes it 7½ or 8, Ferguson 6; but taking Elliot's estimate as a mean, the ancient kos would be 1½ miles.

The kos as laid down in the Ain [ed. Jarrett, iii. 414] was of 6000 gas [see GUDGE]. The official decision of the British Government has assigned the length of Akbar's Idhti gas as 33 inches, and this would make Akbar's kos = 2 m. 4 f. 183¼ yards. Actual measurement of road distances between 5 pair of Akbar's kos-mindra, near Delhi, gave a mean of 2 m. 4 f. 158 yards.

In the greater part of the Bengal Presidency the estimated kos is about 2 miles, but it is much less as you approach the N.W. In the upper part of the Doab, it is, with fair accuracy, 1½ miles. In Bundelkhand again it is nearly 3 m. (Carnegy), or, according to Beames, even 4 m. [In Madras it is 2½ m., and in Mysore the Sultan's kos is about 4 m.] Reference may be made on this subject to Mr. Thomas's ed. of Princep's Essays, ii. 129; and to Mr. Beames's ed. of Elliot's Glossary ("The Races of the N.-W. Provinces," ii. 194). The latter editor remarks that in several parts of the country there are two kinds of kos, a pakki and a kachcha kos, a double system which pervades all the weights and measures of India; and which has prevailed also in many other parts of the world [see PUCKA].

COSACK, s. It is most probable that this Russian term for the military tribes of various descent on what was the S. frontier of the Empire has come originally from kazzak, a word of obscure origin, but which from its adoption in Central Asia we may venture to call Turki. [Schuyler, Turkistan, i. 8.] It appears in Pavet de Courteille's Dict. Turk-Oriental as "vagabond; aventurier . . . onagre que ses compagnons crient loin d'eux."

But in India it became common in the sense of 'a predatory horseman' and freebooter.

1866.—"On receipt of this bad news I was much dispirited, and formed to myself three plans; 1st. That I should turn Cosack, and never pass 24 hours in one place, and plunder all that came to hand."—Mem. of Timurt, tr. by Stewart, p. 111.

[1808.—In a Letter from the Company to the factors at Bantam mention is made of one "Sophony Coske", or as he is also styled in the Court Minutes "the Russe."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 288.]

1818.—"Cosacks (Cosacki) . . . you should know, is not the name of a nation, but of a collection of people of various countries and sects (though most of them Christians) who without wives or children, and without horses, acknowledge obedience to no prince; but dwelling far from cities in fastnesses among the woods or mountains, or rivers . . . live by the booty of their words . . . employ themselves in perpetual inroads and incursions by land and sea to the detriment of their nearest enemies, i.e. of the Turks and other Mahometans . . . As I have heard from them, they promise themselves one day the capture of Constantinople, saying that Fate has reserved for them the liberation of that country, and that they have clear prophecies to that effect."—P. della Valle, i. 614 sq.

1813.—"By the bye, how do Clarke's friends the Cosacks, who seem to be a band of Circassians and other Sarmatians, come to be called by a name which seems to belong to a great Torkée tribe on the banks of the Jaxartes? Kussank is used about Delhi for a highwayman. Can it be (as I have heard) an Arabic Mosâlîg (exaggeration) from bît (plunder) applied to all predatory tribes?"—Elphinston, in Life, i. 264.

1819.—"Some dashing leader may . . . gather a predatory band round his standard, which, composed as it would be of desperate adventurers, and commanded by a professional Kussank, might still give us an infinite deal of trouble."—Ibíd. ii. 68.

c. 1823.—"The term Cosack is used because it is the one by which the Mahrattas describe their own species of warfare. In their language the word Coass (borrowed like many more of their terms from the Moghuls) means predatory."—Malcolm, Central India, 3d ed. i. 69.

It was the site of one of the most important factories of the East India Company in their mercantile days, and was indeed a chief centre of all foreign trade in Bengal during the 17th century. ["In 1668 the Company established a factory at Cossimibazar, Castle Bazaar."—(Birdwood Rep. on Old Rec. 219.)] Fryer (1673) calls it Castle Buzar (p. 38).

* This gloss is a mistake.

Kadi, the first syllable being a prefix denoting the plural. The name of a hill people of Mongolid character, occupying the mountains immediately north of Silhet in Eastern Bengal. Many circumstances in relation to this people are of high interest, such as their practice, down to our own day, of erecting rude stone monuments of the menhir and dolmen kind, their law of succession in the female line, &c. Shillong, the modern seat of administration of the Province of Assam, and lying midway between the proper valley of Assam and the plain of Silhet, both of which are comprehended in that government, is in the Kasia country, at a height of 4,900 feet above the sea. The Kasia seem to be the people encountered near Silhet by Ibn Batuta as mentioned in the quotation:

1346.—"The people of these mountains resemble Turks (i.e. Tartars), and are very strong labourers, so that a slave of their race is worth several of another nation."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 216. [See KHASYA.]

1780.—"The first thing that struck my observation on entering the arena was the similarity of the dresses worn by the different tribes of Cossybas or native Tartars, all dressed and armed agreeable to the custom of the country or mountain from whence they came."—H. R. Lindsey, in Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 182.

1789.—"We understand the Cossyahs who inhabit the hills to the north-westward of Silhet, have committed some very daring acts of violence."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 218.

1790.—"Agreed and ordered, that the Trade of Silhet... be declared entirely free to all the natives... under the following Regulations:—1st. That they shall not supply the Cossyahs or other Hill-people with Arms, Ammunition or other articles of Military store..."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 31.

COSTUS. (See FUTCHOCK.)

COT, s. A light bedstead. There is a little difficulty about the true origin of this word. It is universal as a sea-term, and in the South of India. In Northern India its place has been very generally taken by charpoys (q.v.), and cot, though well understood, is not in such prevalent European use as it formerly was, except as applied to barrack furniture, and among soldiers and their families. Words with this last characteristic have very frequently been introduced.
from the south. There are, however, both in north and south, vernacular words which may have led to the adoption of the term cot in their respective localities. In the north we have H. khat and khatu, both used in this sense, the latter also in Sanskrit; in the south, Tam. and Malayal. kattil, a form adopted by the Portuguese. The quotations show, however, no Anglo-Indian use of the word in any form but cot.

The question of origin is perhaps further perplexed by the use of quatre as a Spanish term in the West Indies (see Tom Cringle below). A Spanish lady tells us that catre, or catre de tigera ("scissors-cot") is applied to a bedstead with X-trestles. Catre is also common Portuguese for a wooden bedstead, and is found as such in a dictionary of 1611. These forms, however, we shall hold to be of Indian origin; unless it can be shown that they are older in Spain and Portugal than the 16th century. The form quatre has a curious analogy (probably accidental) to chdrpd1.

1553.—"The Camarij (Zamorin) who was at the end of a house, placed on a bedstead, which they call catle. . . ."—De Barros, Dec. I. liv. iv. cap. viii.

1567.—"The king commanded his men to furnish a tent on that spot, where the interview was to take place, all carpeted inside with very rich tapestries, and fitted with a sofa (catle) covered over with a silken cloth."—Alboquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 204.

1566.—"The king was set on a catel (the name of a kind of field bedstead) covered with a cloth of white silk and gold. . . ."—Donian de Godo, Chron. del R. Dom Emanuel, 48.

1600.—"He retired to the hospital of the sick and poor; and there had his cell, the walls of which were of coarse palm-mat. Inside there was a little table, and on it a crucifix of the wood of St. Thomé, covered with a cloth, and a breviary. There was also a catle of coir, with a stone for pillow; and this completes the inventory of the furniture of that house."—Lucena, V. do P. P. Xavier, 199.

COTAMALUCO, n.p. The title by which the Portuguese called the kings of the Golconda Dynasty, founded, like the other Mahomedan kingdoms of S. India, on the breaking up of the Bahmani kingdom of the Deccan. It was a corruption of Kuth-ul-Mulk, the designation of the founder, retained as the style of the dynasty by Mahomedans as well as Portuguese (see extract from Akbar-ndma under DALLENG).

1643.—"When I daneheard this reply he was in great fear . . . and by night made his escape with some in whom he trusted (very few they were), and fled in secret, leaving his family and his wives, and went to the territories of the Imam Malucco (see NIZAMALUCO), his neighbour and friend . . . and made matrimonial ties with the Imam Malucco, marrying his daughter, on which they arranged together; and there also came into this concert the Madremaluco, and Cotamaluco, and the COTWAL, CUTWAUL.

Cutwal, Cutwaul, a. A police-officer; superintendent of police; native town magistrate. P. kotwal, 'a seneschal, a commandant of a castle or fort.' This looks as if it had been first taken from an Indian word, kotwal; [Skt. kotha- or kotha pãd 'castle-porter']; but some doubt arises whether it may not have been a Turki term. In Turki it is written kotuâl, kotuwal, and seems to be regarded by both Vâmbéry and Pavet de Courteille as a genuine Turki word. V. defines it as: "Katul, garde de forteresse, chef de la garnison; nom d'un tribu d'Ozbeke;" P. "kotuwal, kotuwal, gardien d'une citadel." There are many Turki words of analogous form, as kardwal, 'a vidette,' bakwal, 'a table-steward,' yashwal, 'a chamberlain,' tangdwal, 'a patrol,' &c. In modern Bokhara Kataul is a title conferred on a person who superintends the Amir's buildings (Khanikoof, 241). On the whole it seems probable that the title was originally Turki, but was shaped by Indian associations.

[The duties of the Kotwal, as head of the police, are exhaustively laid down in the Ain (Jarrett, ii. 41). Amongst other rules: "He shall amputate the hand of any who is the pot-companion of an executioner, and the finger of such as converse with his family."]

The office of Kotwal in Western and Southern India, technically speaking, ceased about 1862, when the new police system (under Act, India, V. of 1861, and corresponding local 1553.—"The Captains of the Kingdom of the Deccan added to their proper names other honorary ones which they affected more, one calling himself Inua Malmuno, which is as much as to say 'Spear of the State,' Cota Malmuno, i.e. 'Fortress of the State,' Adelchan, 'Lord of Justice'; and we, corrupting these names, call them Nizamalnou, Cotamalnou, and Hidalcham."—Boros, iv. 18; [and see Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 172]. These same explanations are given by Garcia de Orta (Colloquios, f. 36v), but of course the two first are quite wrong. Inua Malmuno, as Barros here writes it, is Ar. An-Naja wul Malik, "the Administrator of the State," not from P. nee, 'a spear.' Cotamalnou is Ks. ul-Mulk, Ar. 'the Pivot (or Pole-star) of the State,' not from H. kafa, 'a fort.'

COTAN. a. A fast-sailing vessel, with two masts and lateen sails, employed on the Malabar coast. Kottiya is used in Malayal.; [the Madras Gloss. writes the word kotêk], and says that it comes from Ceylon; yet the word hardly appears to be Indian. Bluteau however appears to give it as such (iii. 590).

1602.—"... embarking his property on certain Cotias, which he kept for that purpose."—Orto, Dec. IV. liv. i. cap. viii.

COTAN. a. H. kattha. A small land-measure in use in Bengal and Bahar, being the twentieth part of a Bengal bighâd (see BEEGAH), and containing eighty square yards.

[1767.—"The measurement of land in Bengal is thus estimated: 16 Sundays make 1 Cotta; 20 Cottas, 1 Bega, or about 16,000 square feet."—Veresal, View of Bengal, 221, note.]

1784.—"... An upper roomed House standing upon about 5 cottas of ground.

... "—Selon Karr, i. 84.

COTAN, a. We do not seem to be able to carry this familiar word further back than the Ar. ktn, ktn, or kutan, having the same meaning, whence Prov. cotan, Port. cotâo, It. cotone, Germ. Kattun. The Sp. keeps the Ar. article, algodon, whence old Fr. auquoton and ogqueton, a coat quilted with cotton. It is only by an odd coincidence that Pliny adds on a like-sounding word in his account of the arbores lanuginæ: "ferunt mali cotonei amplitudine cucurbitas, quae maturitae ruptae ostendunt lanuginis pilas, ex quibus vestae pretioso linseo faciunt"—xii. 10 (21). [On the use and cultivation of cotton in the ancient world, see the authorities collected by Frazer, Pausanius, iii. 470, seqq.]

[1880.—"The dress of the great is on the Persian model; it consists of a shirt of kutum (a kind of linen of a wide texture, the best of which is imported from Aleppo, and the common sort from Persia). ..."—Ephrinos's Cuvbl, i. 351.]

COTTON-TREE, SILK. (See SEEMUL.)
COUNSELLER, s. This is the title by which the natives in Calcutta generally designate English barristers. It is the same use as the Irish one of Counsellor, and a corruption of that word.

COUNTRY, adj. This term is used colloquially, and in trade, as an adjective to distinguish articles produced in India (generally with a sub-indication of disparagement), from such as are imported, and especially imported from Europe. Indeed Europe (q.v.) was, and still occasionally is, used as the contrary adjective. Thus, country harness is opposed to Europe harness; country-born people are persons of European descent, but born in India; country horses are Indian-bred in distinction from Arabs. Walers (q.v.), English horses, and even from 'stud-breds,' which are horses reared in India, but from foreign sires; country ships are those which are owned in Indian ports, though often officered by Europeans; country bottled beer is beer imported from England in cask and bottled in India; ['country-wound' silk is that reeled in the crude native fashion]. The term, as well as the H. desi, of which country is a translation, is also especially used for things grown or made in India as substitutes for certain foreign articles. Thus the Cica disticha in Bombay gardens is called 'country gooseberry'; Convolvulus batatas, or sweet potato, is, sometimes called the 'country potato.' It was equally with our quotidian root which has stolen its name, a foreigner in India, but was introduced and familiarised at a much earlier date. Thus again desi badam, or 'country almond,' is applied in Bengal to the nut of the Terminalia Catappa. On desi, which is applied, among other things, to silk, the great Ritter (dormitans Homerus) makes the odd remark that desi is just Seide reversed! But it would be equally apposite to remark that Trigon-ometry is just Country-ometry reversed!

Possibly the idiom may have been taken up from the Portuguese, who also use it, e.g. açafrao da terra, 'country saffron,' i.e. safflower, otherwise called bastard saffron, the term being sometimes applied to turmeric. But the source of the idiom is general, as the use of desi shows. Moreover the Arabic baladi, having the same literal meaning, is applied in a manner strictly analogous, including the note of disparagement, insomuch that it has been naturalised in Spanish as indicating 'of little or no value.' Illustrations of the mercantile use of baladi (i.e. baladi) will be found in a note to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 370. For the Spanish use we may quote the Dict.
of Cobarruvias (1611): "Baludi, the thing which is produced at less cost, and is of small duration and profit." (See also Dory and Engelmann, 232 seq.)

COUNTRY-CAPTAIN, s. This is in Bengal the name of a peculiar dry kind of curry, often served as a breakfast dish. We can only conjecture that it was a favourite dish at the table of the skippers of 'country ships,' who were themselves called 'country captains,' as in our first quotation. In Madras the term is applied to a spatchcock dressed with onions and curry stuff, which is probably the original form. [Riddell says: "Country-captain.—Cut a fowl in pieces; shred an onion small and fry it brown in butter; sprinkle the fowl with fine salt and curry powder and fry it brown; then put it into a stewpan with a pint of soup; stew it slowly down to a half and serve it with rice" (Ind. Dom. Econ. 176).]

COVENANTED SERVANTS. This term is specially applied to the regular Civil Service of India, whose members used to enter into a formal covenant with the East India Company, and do now with the Secretary of State for India. Many other classes of servants now go out to India under a variety of contracts and covenants, but the term in question continues to be appropriated as before. [See CIVILIAN.]
COVID, s. Formerly in use as the name of a measure, varying much locally in value, in European settlements not only in India but in China, &c. The word is a corruption, probably an Indo-Portuguese form, of the Port. coovado, a cubit or ell.

[1612.—"A long coovad within 1 inch of our English yard, wherewith they measure cloth, the short coovad is for silks, and containeth just as the Portuguese coovad."—Danvers, Letters, i. 241.]

[1616.—"Clothes of gold : ... were worth 100 rupies a cobode."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 203.]

[1672.—"Measures of Surat are only two; the Lessar and the Greater Coovaid [probably misprint for Coovad], the former of 27 inches English, the latter of 36 inches English."—Fryer, 206.]

[1720.—"Item. I leave 200 pagodas for a tomb to be erected in the burial place in form as follows. Four large pillars, each to be six coudias high, and six coudia distance one from the other; the top to be arched, and on each pillar a cherubim; and on the top of the arch the effigy of Justice."—Treatise of Charles Daws, Merchant, in Wheeler, ii. 338.]

[1726.—"Cobidass. See quotation under LOONGEE.]
c. 1760.—According to Grose the covid at Surat was 1 yard English [the greater coovad of Fryer], at Madras ½ a yard; but he says also: "At Bengal the same as at Surat and Madras."

[1794.—"To be sold, on very reasonable terms, About 8000 covites of 2-inch Calcut Planks."—Bombay Courier, July 19.

The measure has long been forgotten under this name in Bengal; though used under the native name hath. From Milburn (i. 334, 341, &c.) it seems to have survived on the West Coast in the early part of last century, and possibly may still linger.

[1612.—"½ corge of pintadoes of 4 hastas the piece."—Danvers, Letters, i. 232.]

COVIL, s. Tam. ka-v-il, 'God-house,' a Hindu temple; and also (in Malabar) a palace, [also in the form Colghum, for Kovilagam]. In colloquial use in S. India and Ceylon. In S. India it is used, especially among the French, for 'a church'; also among the uneducated English.

[1796.—"I promise to use my utmost endeavours to procure for this Raja the colghum of Fychi for his residence. ..."—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 254.]

COWCOOLY, n.p. The name of a well-known lighthouse and landmark at the entrance of the Hoogly, in Midnapur District. Properly, according to Hunter, Geokhdti. In Thornton's English Pilot (pt. iii. p. 7, of 1711) this place is called Cockoly.

COW-ITCH, s. The irritating hairs on the pod of the common Indian climbing herb Mucuna pruriens, D.C., N. O. Leguminosae, and the plant itself. Both pods and roots are used in native practice. The name is doubtless the Hind. kowitch (Skt. kapikachchu), modified in Hobson-Jobson fashion, by the 'striving after meaning.'

[1778.—"Cow-itch. This is the down found on the outside of a pod, which is about the size and thickness of a man's little finger, and of the shape of an Italian S."—Ivo, 494.]

COWLE, s. A lease, or grant in writing; a safe-conduct, amnesty, or in fact any written engagement. The Emperor Sigismund gave Cowle to John Huse—and broke it. The word is Ar. kawl, "word, promise, agreement," and it has become technical in the Indian vernaculars, owing to the prevalence of Mahomedan Law.

[1611.—"We desired to have a cowle of the Shabbunder to send some persons aland."—Danvers, Letters, i. 133.]

[1613.—"Procured a cowle for such ships as should come."—Foster, Letters, ii. 17.]

1680.—"A Cowle granted by the Right Worshipful Straynham Master, Esq., Agent and Governour for affairs of the Honorable East India Company in fort St. George at Chinapetnam, by and with the advice of his Councell to all the Pegn Ruby Marchants. ..."—Fort St. George Cons. Feb. 23, in Notes and Extracts, No. iii. p. 10.

1688.—"The President has by private correspondence procured a Cowle for renting the Town and customs of S. Thomé."—Wheeler, i. 176.
1758.—"The Nawaub ... having mounted some large guns on that hill ... sent to the Killadar a Kowle-nama, or a summons and terms for his surrender."—H. of Hydur Naik, 128.
Sir A. Wellesley often uses the word in his Indian letters. Thus:

1800.—"One tanda of brinjaries ... has sent to me for owle. ..."—Wellington Dep. (ed. 1837), i. 59.

1804.—"On my arrival in the neighbourhood of the petta I offered owle to the inhabitants."—Ibid. ii. 193.

COWRY. 269 COWRY.

1780.—"This Cauel was confirmed by another King of Gingy ... of the Brahmin Caste."—Dunn, New Directory, 140.

COVRY, s. Hind. kauri (kauḍi), Mahr. kawḍi, Skt. kaparda, kapardika. The small white shell, Cypraea moneta, current as money extensively in parts of S. Asia and of Africa.

By far the most ancient mention of shell currency comes from Chinese literature. It is mentioned in the famous "Tribute of Yi" (or Yi-Kung); in the Shu-King (about the 14th cent. B.C.); and in the "Book of Poetry" (Shi-King), in an ode of the 10th cent. B.C. The Chinese seem to have adopted the use from the aborigines in the East and South; and they extended the system to tortoise-shell, and to other shells, the cowry remaining the unit. In 338 B.C., the King of Tsim, the supply of shells failing, suppressed the cowry currency, and issued copper coin, already adopted in other States of China. The usurper Wang Mang, who ruled A.D. 9-23, tried to revive the old systems, and issued rules instituting, in addition to the metallic money, ten classes of tortoise-shell and five of smaller shells, the value of all based on the cowry, which was worth 3 cash.* [Cowries were part of the tribute paid by the aborigines of Puanit to Metesouphis I. (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 427).]

The currency of cowries in India does not seem to be alluded to by any Greek or Latin author. It is mentioned by Manü (c. 943), and their use for small change in the Indo-Chinese countries is repeatedly spoken of by Marco Polo, who calls them poulcellin, the name by which this kind of shell was known in Italy (porcellane) and France. When the Mahommedans conquered Bengal, early in the 13th century, they found the ordinary currency composed exclusively of cowries, and in some remote districts this continued to the beginning of the last century. Thus, up to 1801, the whole revenue of the Silhet District, amounting then to Rs. 250,000, was collected in these shells, but by 1813 the whole was realised in specie. Interesting details in connection with this subject are given by the Hon. Robert Lindsay, who was one of the early Collectors of Silhet (Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 170).

The Sanskrit vocabulary called Trikandakesha (iii. 3, 206) makes 20 kapardika (or kauris)=⅓ pan; and this value seems to have been pretty constant. The cowry table given by Mr. Lindsay at Silhet, circa 1778, exactly agrees with that given by Milburn as in Calcutta use in the beginning of last century, and up to 1854 or thereabouts it continued to be the same:

<thead>
<tr>
<th>Amount in Cowries</th>
<th>Equivalent in Rupees</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>4 kauris</td>
<td>=1 ganda</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20 gandaus</td>
<td>=1 pan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4 pan</td>
<td>=1 āna</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4 ānas</td>
<td>=1 kāthā, or about ¼ rupee</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

This gives about 6120 cowries to the Rupee. We have not met with any denomination of currency in actual use below the cowry, but it will be seen that, in a quotation from Mrs. Parkes, two such are indicated. It is, however, Hindu idiosyncrasy to indulge in imaginary submultiples as well as imaginary multiples. (See a parallel under LACC.)

In Bastar, a secluded inland State between Orissa and the Godavery, in 1870, the following was the prevailing table of cowry currency, according to Sir W. Hunter's Gazetteer:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Amount in Cowries</th>
<th>Equivalent in Rupees</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>28 kauris</td>
<td>=1 bori</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12 boris</td>
<td>=1 dugdāni</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12 dugdānis</td>
<td>=1 Rupee, i.e. 2880 cowries</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

Here we may remark that both the pan in Bengal, and the dugdāni in this secluded Bastar, were originally the names of pieces of money, though now in the respective localities they represent only certain quantities of cowries. (For pan, see under FANAM; and as regards dugdāni, see Thomas' Patan Kings of Delhi, pp. 218 seq.). [*"Up to 1865 bee-a or cowries were in use in Sinam; the value of these was so small that from 800 to 1500 went to a fangh (7½ cents)."—Ballet, A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, p. 164. Cowries were at one time imported into England in considerable quantities for use in the African slave-trade. "For this purpose," says Milburn, "they should be small, clean, and white, with a beautiful gloss" (i. 273). The duty on this importation was £53, 16s. 3d. per cent. on the sale value, with 4 added for war-tax. In 1803, 1418 cwt. were sold at the E. I. auctions, fetching £3,626; but after that few were sold at all. In the height of slave-trade, the great mart for cowries was at Amsterdam, where there were spacious warehouses for them (see the Voyage, &c., quoted 1747).

A kg would seem here to be equivalent to ½ of a cowry. Wilson, with (?) as to its origin [perhaps P. kāk, ‘minute’], explains it as “a small division of money of account, less than a paisa of Kauria.” Yet is properly the seamoom seed, applied in Bengal, Wilson says, “in account to ½ of a kauri.” The Table would probably thus run: 10 til = 1 kg, 4 kg = 1 kauri, and so forth. CRAN, s. Pers. krān. A modern Persian silver coin, worth about a franc, being the tenth part of a Tomann.

1880.—“A couple of mules came clattering into the courtyard, driven by one muleteer. Each mule carried 2 heavy sacks . . . which jingled pleasantly as they were placed on the ground. The sacks were afterwards opened in my presence, and contained no less than 35,000 silver kerans. The one muleteer without guard had brought them across the mountains, 170 miles or so, from Tehran.”—MS. Letter from Col. Bateman-Champion, R.E.

[1891.—“I on my arrival took my servants’ accounts in tomans and kerans, afterwards in kerpas and shales, and at last in kerans and pula.”—Wills, Land of the Lion, 63.]

CRANCHEE, s. Beng. H. kardnchri. This appears peculiar to Calcutta, [but the word is also used in N. India]. A kind of rickety and sordid carriage resembling, as Bp. Heber says below, the skeleton of an old English hackney-coach of 1800-35 (which no doubt was the model), drawn by wretched ponies, harnessed with rope, and standing for native hire in various parts of the city.

1823.—“. . . a considerable number of caranchies, or native carriages, each drawn by two horses, and looking like the skeletons of hackney coaches in our own country.”—Heber, i. 28 (ed. 1844).

1834.—“As Lady Wroughton guided her horse through the crowd to the right, a kuranchey, or hackney-coach, suddenly passed her at full speed.”—The Baboo, i. 228.

CRANGANORE, n.p. Properly (according to Dr. Gundert), Kōtunḍirā, more generally Kōtunḍalā, [the Madras Gloss. gives Mal. Kotannalir, kōta, ‘west,’ kori, ‘palace,’ ur, ‘village’]. An ancient city and port of Malabar, identical with the Māyirī-kódū of an ancient copper-plate inscription,* with the Mouspins of Ptolemy’s Tables and the Periplus, and with the Muzzirs primum emporium Indiae of Pliny (Bk. vi. cap. 23 or 26) [see Logan, Malabar, i. 80]. "The traditions of Jews, Christians, Brahmans, and of the Kērāla Ulpatti (legendary History of Malabar) agree in making Kōtunḍalā the residence of the Perumāls (ancient sovereigns of Malabar), and the first resort of Western shipping" (Dr. Gundert in Madras Journal, vol. xiii. p. 120). It was apparently the earliest settlement of Jew and Christian immigrants. It is prominent in all the earlier narratives of the 16th century, especially in connection with the Malabar Christians; and it was the site of one of the seven churches alleged in the legends of the latter to have been founded by St. Thomas.† Cranganor was already in decay when the Portuguese arrived. They eventually established themselves there with a strong fort (1523), which the Dutch took from them in 1662. This fort was dismantled by Tippo’s troops in 1790, and there is now hardly a trace left of it. In Baldaeus (Malabar und Coromandel, p. 109, Germ. ed.) there are several good views of Cranganore as it stood in the 17th century. [See Shinkall.]

CRANNY, s. In Bengal commonly used for a clerk writing English, and thence vulgarly applied generally to the East Indians, or half-caste class, from among whom English copyists are chiefly recruited. The original is Hind. karni, kirdni, which Wilson derives from Skt. karan, 'a doer.'

Karan is also the name of one of the (so-called) mixt castes of the Hindus, sprung from a Sudra mother and Vaisya father, or (according to some) from a pure Kshatriya mother by a father of degraded Kshatriya origin. The occupation of the members of this mixt caste is that of writers and accountants; [see Rieley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 424 seq.].

The word was probably at one time applied by natives to the junior members of the Covenanted Civil Service—"Writers," as they were designated. See the quotations from the "Seir Mutaqherin" and from Hugh Boyd. And in our own remembrance the "Writers' Buildings" in Calcutta, where those young gentlemen were at one time quartered (a range of apartments which has now been transfigured into a splendid series of public offices, but, wisely, has been kept to its old name), was known to the natives as Karani ki Barik.

c. 1850.—"They have the custom that when a ship arrives from India or elsewhere, the slaves of the Sultan... carry with them complete suits... for the Rababs or skipper, and for the Karran, who is the ship's clerk."—Ibn Batuta, i. 198.

1810.—"The Cranny, or clerk, may be either a native Armenian, a native Portuguese, or a Bengalhee."—Williamson, V. M. i. 209.
It is curious to find this word explained by an old French writer, in almost the modern application to East Indians. This shows that the word was used at Goa in something of its Hindu sense of one of mixed blood.

1653.—"Les karanes sont engendres d'un Mestis, et d'une Indienne, lesquels sont cianasters. Ce mot de Karanes vient a mon avis de Karu, qui signifie en Turc la terre, ou bien la couleur noire, comme si l'on voulait dire par Karanes les enfants du paix, ou bien les noirs : ils ont les mêmes avantages dans leurs professions que les autres Mestis."—De la Boullaye-le-Goues, ed. 1657, p. 226.

Compare in M. Polo, Bk. 1., ch. 18, his statement about the Caramas, and note thereon.

GRAPE, s. This is no Oriental word, though grape comes from China. It is the French grepe, i.e. cruste, Lat. crustum, meaning frizzed or minutely curled. As the word is given in a 16th century quotation by Littre, it is probable that the name was first applied to a European texture. [Its use in English dates from 1638, according to the N.E.D.]

"I own perhaps I might desire
Some shawls of true Cashmere—
Some narrow grapes of China silk,
Like wrinkled skins, or scalded milk.
O. W. Holmes, 'Contestment.'

CREASE, CRIS, &c., s. A kind of dagger, which is the characteristic weapon of the Malay nations; from the Javanese name of the weapon, adopted in Malay, kris, kirti, or kres (see Favre, Dict. Javanais-Francais, 1878, Oswefurd's Malay Dict. s.v., Jans, Javanash-Nederland. Woordenboek, 203).

The word has been generalised, and is often applied to analogous weapons of other nations, as 'an Arab crease,' &c. It seems probable that the H. word kirih, applied to a straight sword, and now almost specifically to a sword of European make, is identical with the Malay word kris. See the form of the latter word in Barossa, almost exactly kirih. Perhaps Turki kiltch is the original. [Platts gives Skt. kirti, 'a sort of knife or dagger.'] If Reinard is right in his translation of the Arab Relations of the 9th and 10th centuries, in correcting a reading, otherwise unintelligible, to kirih, we shall have a very early adoption of this word by Western travellers. It occurs, however, in a passage relating to Ceylon.

c. 910.—"Formerly it was common enough to see in this island a man of the country walk into the market grasping in his hand a kirih, i.e. a dagger peculiar to the country, of admirable make, and sharpened to the finest edge. The man would lay hands on the wealthiest of the merchants that he found, take him by the throat, brandish his dagger before his eyes, and finally drag him outside of the town..."—Relation, &c., par Reinard, p. 186; and see Arabic text, p. 120, near bottom.

It is curious to find the cris adopted by Albuquerque as a piece of state costume. When he received the ambassadors of Sheikh Ismael, i.e. the Shah of Persia, Ismael Sufi, at Ormuz, we read:

1515.—"For their reception there was prepared a dais of three steps... which was covered with carpets, and the Governor seated thereon in a decorated chair, arrayed in a tunic and surcoat of black damask, with his collar, and his golden cris, as I described before, and with his big, long snow-white beard; and at the back of the dais the captains and gentlemen, handsomely attired, with their swords girt, and behind them their pages with lances and targets, and all uncovered."—Correia, ii. 428.

The portrait of Albuquerque in the 1st vol. of Mr. Birch's Translation of the Commentaries, realises the snow-white beard, tunic, and black surcoat, but the cris is missing. [The Malay Creese is referred to in iii. 85.]

1516.—"They are girt with belts, and carry daggers in their waists, wrought with rich inlaid work, these they call quexiz."—Barbosa, i. 47.

c. 1850-60.—"They (the English) chew hashish, cut themselves with poisoned crissers ... taste every poison, buy every secret."—Emerson, English Traits [ed. 1866, ii. 59].

The Portuguese also formed a word crisada, a blow with a criss (see Castanheda, iii. 379). And in English we find a verb to 'creese'; see in Purchas, i. 532, and this:

1604.—"This Boyhog we tortured not ... because of his confession, but amused him."—Scott's Discoveries of India, in Purchas, i. 175.

[1704.—"At which our people ... were most of them creesus."—Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 400xxvii.]

Also in Bradde's Abstract of the Sijara Malayu:

"He was in consequence creased at the shop of a sweetmeat seller, his blood flowed on the ground, but his body disappeared miraculously."—Sijara Malayu, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 818.

CREDEDE, DEL. An old mercantile term.

1813.—"Del credere, or guaranteeing the responsibility of persons to whom goods were sold—commission 2 per cent."—Milburn, i. 236.

CREOLE, s. This word is never used by the English in India, though the mistake is sometimes made in England of supposing it to be an Anglo-Indian term. The original, so far as we can learn, is Span. criollo, a word of uncertain etymology, whence the French créole, a person of European blood but colonial birth. See Scott, who concludes that criollo is a negro corruption of criadillo, dim. of criado, and is = 'little nursing.' Criollos, criadas, according to Pyrrard de Laval, [Hak. Soc. ii. 89 seq.] were used at Goa for male and female servants. And see the passage quoted under MEELAM from Coreea, where the words 'apparel and servants' are in the original 'todo e fato e criadas.'

1782.—"Mr. Macintosh being the son of a Scotch Planter by a French Creole, of one of the West India Islands, is as swarthy and ill-looking a man as is to be seen on the Portuguese Walk on the Royal Exchange."—Price's Observations, &c. in Price's Tracts, i. 9.

CROCODILE, s. This word is seldom used in India; alligator (q.v.) being the term almost invariably employed.

c. 1538.—"There be also coquodridies, which are vulgarly called calcutis [Lat. calcutris, 'a cockatrice']. . . . These animals be like lizards, and have a tail stretched over all like unto a lizard's," &c.—Frer Jordanus, p. 19.

1690.—"One Crocodile was so huge and greedy that he devoured an Alibamba, that is a chained company of sight or nine slaves; but the indigestible Iron paid him his wages, and murthered the murtherer."—Andrew Batel (West Africa), in Purchas, ii. 985.

[1870.—"... I have been compelled to amputate the limbs of persons seized by crocodiles (Mugger) . . . The Alligator (gharial) sometimes devours children. . . ."—Chevers, Mea. Jurispr. in India, 366 seq.].
CRORE.

One hundred lakhs, i.e., 10,000,000. Thus a crore of rupees was for many years almost the exact equivalent of a million sterling. It had once been a good deal more, and has now been for some years a good deal less. The H. is kāro, Skt. koti.

CRORE, s. The possessor or collector of a krore, or ten millions, of any given kind of money; it was especially applied as an official designation, under the Mohammedan government, to a collector of revenue to the extent of a krore of dāms, or 250,000 rupees, who was also at various times invested with the general superintendence of the lands in his district, and the charge of the police.

CROW-PHEASANT, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of a somewhat ignoble bird (Fam. Cuculidae), common all over the plains of India, in Burma, and the islands, viz. Centropus rufulus, Illiger. It is held in India to give omen.

1875.—"The crow-pearl stands past with his chestnut wings drooping by his side." — Phil. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 7.

1883.—"There is that ungainly object the crow-pearl, jungle-crow, or whatever else you like to call the miscellaneous thing, as it clammers through a creeper-laden bush or spreads its reddish-bay wings and makes a slow voyage to the next tree. To judge by its appearance only it might be a crow developing for a peacock, but its voice seems to have been borrowed from a black-faced monkey." —Tribes on my Frontier, 155.

CUBEB.

CUCUYA, CUCUYADA. A. A cry of alarm or warning; Malayal. kakwaya, 'to cry out'; not used by English, but found among Portuguese writers, who formed cucuyada from the native... word, as they did Cridada from kris (see CREASE). See Correa, Londes, ii. 2. 926. See also quotation from Tennent, under COSS, and compare Australian cooeey.

1525.—"On this immediately some of his Nairs who accompanied him, desired to smite the Portuguese who were going through the streets; but the Regedor would not permit it; and the Caimal approaching the King's palace, without entering to speak to the King, ordered those cries of theirs to be made which they call cucuyadas, and in a few minutes there gathered together more than 2000 Nairs with their arms."—Correé, ii. 926.

1543.—"At the house of the pagod there was a high enclosure-wall of stone, where the Governor collected all his people, and those of the country came troop ing with bows and arrows and a few matchlocks, raising great cries and cucuyadas, such as they employ to call each other to war, just like oranes when they are going to take wing."—Ind. iv. 927.

CUDDALORE, n.p. A place on the marine backwater 16 m. S. of Pondicherry, famous in the early Anglo-Indian history of Coromandel. It was settled by the Company in 1682-3, and Fort St. David's was erected there soon after. Probably the correct name is Kadal-sr, 'Sea-Town.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Tam. kadal, 'junction,' thir, 'village,' because it stands on the confluence of the Kadilam and Paravanar Rivers.]

[1778.—"Fort St. David is . . . built on a rising ground, about a mile from the Black-Town, which is called Cuddalore."—José, p. 18.]

CUDDAPA, n.p. Tel. kadopa, ['threshold,' said to take its name from the fact that it is situated at the opening of the pass which leads to the holy town of Tripatty (Gribble, Man. of Cuddapa, p. 3); others connect it with Skt. kripa, 'pity,' and the Skt. name is Kripanagara]. A chief town and district of the Madras Presidency. It is always written Kurpak in Kirkpatrick's Translation of Tippoo's Letters, and see Wilks, Mysore, ed. 1869, i. 303]. It has been suggested as possible that it is the KAPITAH (for KAPITH) of Ptolemy's Tables. [Kurpak indigo is quoted on the London market.]

1768.—"The chiefs of Shanoor and Kirpa also followed the same path."—H. of Hyder Nâík, 189.

CUDDOOL, s. A generic name for pumpkins, [but usually applied to the musk-melon, cucurbita moschata (Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 640)]. Hind. Kadá.

CUDDY, s. The public or captain's cabin of an Indianam or other passenger ship. We have not been able to trace the origin satisfactorily. It must, however, be the same with the Dutch and Germ. kajute, which has the same signification. This is also the Scandinavian languages, Sw. in kajuta, Dan. kahyt, and Grimm quotes kajute, "Casteria," from a vocabulary of Saxon words used in the first half of 16th century. It is perhaps originally the same with the Fr. cabute, 'a novel,' which Littré quotes from 12th century as quahute. Ducange has L. Latin cabus, 'cass, tugurium,' but I a little doubtfully. [Burton (Ar. Nights, xi. 169) gives P. kadah, 'a room,' and compares CUMRA. The N.E.D. leaves the question doubtful.]

1726.—"Neither will they go into any ship's Cayuyt so long as they see any one in the Skipper's cabin or on the half-deck."—Valentijn, Chorom. (and Popu), 134.

1769.—"It was his (the Captain's) inva riable practice on Sunday to let down a canvas curtain at one end of the cuddy and to read the church service, a duty which he considered a complete clearance of the sins of the preceding week."—Life of Lord Teignmouth, i. 12.

1848.—"The youngsters among the passengers, young Chaffers of the 16th, and poor little Ricketts, coming home after his third fever, used to draw out Sedley at the cuddy-table, and make him tell prodigious stories about himself and his exploits against tigers and Napoleon."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 255.

CULGE, s. A jewelled plume surmounting the sivpeach or aigrette upon the turban. Shakespeare gives kalghi as a Turki word. [Platts gives kalghà, kalghi, and refers it to Skt. kalaka, 'a spire.']

c. 1514.—"In this manner the people of Bârn catch great numbers of herons. The Kâliki-saj [Plumes worn on the cap or turban on great occasions.] Also see Fumoh Trade Report, App., p. cxxv.] are of the heron's feathers."—Baker, 154.

1715.—"John Surman received a vest and Culgee set with precious stones."—Wheeler, ii. 246.
1759.—"To present to Omed Roy, viz.:
1 Cullah
1 Surpajo (eirpoo, or sigrette). 600 0 0
1 Kilgot (see Kilgot). 250 0 0

1788.—"Three Kulgies, three Surpajas (see eirpoo), and three Padaks (?) (padak, H. ‘a badge, a flat piece of gold, a neck ornament’) of the value of 36,320 rupees have been despatched to you in a casket."—Tipпо’s Letters, 283.

[1892.—Of a Banjiar ox—"Over the beast’s forehead is a shaped frontlet of cotton cloth bordered with patterns in colour with pieces of mirror sewn in, and crowned by a kalghi or sigrette of peacock feather tips."—L. Kipling, Butt and Man in India, 147.

The word was also applied to a rich silk cloth imported from India.

[1714.—In a list of goods belonging to sub-governors of the South Seas C.—‘A pair of culgee window curtains.’—2 ser. Notes & Q. VI. 244.]

CULMUREEA, KOORMUREEA.

1. Nautical H. kalmariya, ‘a calm’, taken direct from Port. calmaria (Rose-buck).

CULSEY, s. According to the quotation a weight of about a candy (q.v.). We have traced the word, which is rare, also in Prinsep’s Tables (ed. Thomas, p. 115), as a measure in Bhāj, kalī. And we find R. Drummond gives it: ‘Kulse or Culey (Guz.). A weight of sixteen maunds (the Guzerat maunds are about 40 lbs., therefore kalī=about 640 lbs.). [The word is probably Skt. kalaś, ‘a water jar, and hence a grain measure. The Madras Gloss. gives Can. kalasi as a measure of capacity holding 14 Beers.]” 1813.—‘So plentiful are mangos . . . that during my residence in Guzerat they were sold in the public markets for one rupee the culsey; or 600 pounds in English weight.”—Forbes, Orient. Mem. i. 80; [2d. ed. i. 80].

CUMBLY, CUMLY, CUMMUL, s. A blanket; a coarse woollen cloth. Skt. kāmbala, appearing in the vernaculars in slightly varying forms, e.g. H. kamālt. Our first quotation shows a curious attempt to connect this word with the Arāb. kamālät ‘a porter’ (see HUMMAUL), and with the camel’s hair of John Baptist’s raiment. The word is introduced into Portuguese as cambolim, ‘a cloak.’

CUMMERBUND, s. A girdle. H. from P. kamar-band, i.e. ‘join-band.’ Such an article of dress is habitually worn by domestic servants, peons, and irregular troops; but any waist-belt is so termed.

[1584.—‘And tying on a cummerbund (cummarbando) of yellow silk.”—Correa, iii. 588. Cummarbandes in Dalloquiraes, Comm. H. Sac. iv. 104.]

1552.—‘The Governor arriving at Goa received there a present of a rich cloth of Persia which is called cammarbidos, being of gold and silk.”—Osulahova, iii. 396.

*Cumall (=fasciis) survives from the Arabic in some parts of Sicily.
CUMQUOT

1616.—"The nobleman of Xarma sent to have a sample of gallie pottes, jugges, po- dingers, lookinglasses, table bookes, chint brampton, and commarbonds, with the prices."—Cocks's Diary, i. 147.

1688.—"It is sorrent a vesta d'vn cen- ture, qu'ils appellent Commernant."—Man- delido, 228.

1648.—"In the middle they have a well adjusted girdle, called a Commernant."—Van Twii, 55.

1727.—"They have also a fine Turband, embroidered Shoes, and a Daggar of Value, stuck into a fine Commerbund, or Sash."—
A. Hamilton, i. 229; [ed. 1744, ii. 233].

1810.—"They generally have the turbans and cummer-bunds of the same colour, by way of livery."—Williamson, V. M. i. 274.

[1828.—"My white coat was loose, for want of a gemberbund."—Pandwarung Hari, ed. 1828, i. 275.]

1880.—"... The Punjab seems to have found out Manchester. A meeting of native merchants at Umritezr ... describes the effects of a shower of rain on the English-made turbans and Kummerbunds as if their heads and loins were enveloped by layers of starch."—Pioneer Mail, June 17.

CUMQUOT, s. The fruit of Citrus japonica, a miniature orange, often sent in jars of preserved fruits, from China. Kumkowit is the Canton pronunciation of kin-ki, 'gold orange,' the Chinese name of the fruit.

CUMRA, s. H. kamed, from Port. comara; a chamber, a cabin. [In Upper India the drawing-room is the gol kamed, so called because one end of it is usually semi-circular.]

CUMBUNGA, s. See CARAM- BOLA.

CUMSHAW, s. Chin. Pigeon-English for buckshaw (q.v.), or a present of any kind. According to Giles it is the Amoy pron. (kam-ri) of two characters signifying 'grateful thanks.' Bp. Moule suggests kam-siu (or Cantonese) kam-sau, 'thank-gift.'

1879.—"... they pressed upon us, blocking out the light, uttering discordant cries, and clamouring with one voice, Kum-sa, i.e. backshaw, looking more like demons than living men."—Miss Bird's Golden Chero- nese, 70.

1882.—"As the ship got under weigh, the Compradore's cummahs, according to 'old custom,' were brought on board ... dried lycohe, Nankin dates ... baskets of oranges, and preserved ginger."—The Fan- kwae, 183.

CUNCHUNEE, s. H. kanchan. A dancing-girl. According to Shakes- spear, this is the feminine of a caste, Kanchan, whose women are dancers. But there is doubt as to this: [see Crooke, Tribes and Castes, N.W.F. iv. 364, for the Kanchan caste.] Kanchan is 'gold;' also a yellow pigment, which the women may have used; see quotation from Bernier. [See DANCING-GIRL.]

C. 1660.—"But there is one thing which seems to me a little too extravagant ... the publick Women, I mean not those of the Bazar, but those more retired and con- siderable ones that go to the great marriages at the houses of the Omrah and Mansab- dars to sing and dance, those that are called Kanchan, as if you should say the guided the blossoming ones ..."—Bernier, E.T. 88; [ed. Constable, 273 seq.]

1661.—"On regala dans le Serrail, toutes ces Dames Etrangères, de festins et des danses des Quenchenes, qui sont des femmes et des filles d'une Caste de ce nom, qui n'ont point d'autre profession que celle de la danse."—Therenot, v. 151.

1688.—"And here the Dancing Wenches, or Quenchenes, entertain you, if you please."—Ovington, 257.

1799.—"In the evening the Canchaunis ... have exhibited before the Prince and court."—Diary in Life of Colebrooke, 158.

1810.—"The dancing-women are of different kinds ... the Meerutseens never perform before assemblies of men .... The Kunchenes are of an opposite stamp; they dance and sing for the amusement of the male sex."—Williamson, V. M. i. 385.

CURIA MURIA, n.p. The name of a group of islands off the S.E. coast of Arabia (Kharyd Moryd, of Edriai). 1527.—"Thus as they sailed, the ship got lost upon the shore of Fanque in (the region of) Curia Muria; and having swum ashore they got along in company of the Moros by land to Celeyrate, and thence on to Ormus."—Correa, iii. 582; see also i. 386.

C. 1535.—"Dopo Adem à Fanque, e le isole Curia, Muria ..."—Sommario de Regni, in Ramusio, i. 325.

1540.—"We lotted not to discover the Isles of Curia, Muria, and Abaadacuria (in orig. Abadacuria)."—Menex Pinto, E.T. p. 4.

[1555.—See quotation under ROSAL- GAT.]
in N. India) in the form of flour baked into unleavened gmin, Kanta, apsli ancient ruin on the hilla in the Gaya district. 1874. — "The next place to Saugor is Koorya Moorya Bay." — J. R. Geog. Soc. ii. 206.

CURNUM. s. Tel. karanamu; a village accountant, a town-clerk. Acc. to Wilson from Skt. karana; (see GRANNY). [It corresponds to the Tam. kanakan (see CONICOPOLY).]

1827. — "Very little care has been taken to preserve the survey accounts. Those of several villages are not to be found. Of the remainder only a small share is in the Collector's cutcherry, and the rest is in the hands of curnums, written on cadjans."
—Minute by Sir T. Munro, in Arch. Soc. i. 285.

CUBOUNDU. s. H. karaunda. A small plum-like fruit, which makes good jelly and tarts, and which the natives pickle. It is borne by Carissa carandas, L., a shrub common in many parts of India (N.O. Apocynaceae).

[1870. — Riddell gives a receipt for kurundar jelly, Ind. Dom. Econ. 388.]

CURREIG JEMA, adj. A corr. of H. khadrij jama, "separated or detached from the rental of the State, as lands exempt from rent, or of which the revenue has been assigned to individuals or institutions" (Wilson).

[1867. — "... that whenever they have a mind to build Factories, satisfying for the land where it was Curreig Jema, that is over measure, not entred in the King's books, or paying the usual and accustomed Rent, no Government should molest them."
—Yule, Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxiii.]

CURRUMBUMSHAW HILLS. n.p. This name appears in Rennell's Bengal Atlas, applied to hills in the Gaya district. It is ingeniously supposed by F. Buchanan to have been a mistake of the geographer's, in taking Karana-Chaupdr (Karana's place of meeting or teaching), the name of an ancient ruin on the hills in question, for Karnachaw Pahdr (Pahdr = Hill). — (Eastern India, i. 4).

CURRY, s. In the East the staple food consists of some cereal, either (as in N. India) in the form of flour baked into unleavened cakes, or boiled in the grain, as rice is. Such food having little taste, some small quantity of a much more savoury preparation is added as a relish, or 'kitchen,' to use the phrase of our forefathers. And this is in fact the proper office of curry in native diet. It consists of meat, fish, fruit, or vegetables, cooked with a quantity of bruised spices and turmeric [see MUSSALLA]; and a little of this gives a flavour to a large mess of rice. The word is Tam. kari, i.e. "sauce"; [kari, v. 'to eat by biting']. The Canarese form karil was that adopted by the Portuguese, and is still in use at Goa. It is remarkable in how many countries a similar dish is habitual; pildo [see PILLAU] is the analogous mess in Persia, and khusku in Algeria; in Egypt a dish well known as ruza muksal [Lane, Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, i. 185], or "peppered rice." In England the proportions of rice and "kitchen" are usually reversed, so that the latter is made to constitute the bulk of the dish.

The oldest indication of the Indian cuisine in this kind, though not a very precise one, is cited by Athenaeus from Megasthenes: "Among the Indians, at a banquet, a table is set before each individual ... and on the table is placed a golden dish on which they throw, first of all, boiled rice ... and then they add many sorts of meat dressed after the Indian fashion" (Athen., by Yonge, iv. 39). The earliest precise mention of curry is in the Mahavanso (c. A.D. 477), where it is said of Kassapo that "he partook of rice dressed in butter, with its full accompaniment of curries." This is Turnour's translation, the original Pali being stupa.

It is possible, however, that the kind of curry used by Europeans and Mohammedans is not of purely Indian origin, but has come down from the spiced cookery of medieval Europe and Western Asia. The medieval spiced dishes in question were even coloured like curry. Turmeric, indeed, called by Garcia de Orta, Indian saffron, was yet unknown in Europe, but it was represented by saffron and sandalwood. A notable incident occurs in the old English poem of King Richard, wherein the Lion-heart feasts on the head of a Saracen—

"soden full hastily
With powder and with spysorie,
And with saffron of good colour."
Moreover, there is hardly room for doubt that _capsicum_ or red pepper (see _CHILLY_) was introduced into India by the Portuguese (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 407); and this spice constitutes the most important ingredient in modern curries. The Sanskrit books of cookery, which cannot be of any considerable antiquity, contain many recipes for curry without this ingredient. A recipe for curry (carill) is given, according to Bluteau, in the Portuguese Arte de Cozinha, p. 101. This must be of the 17th century.

It should be added that _kari_ was, among the people of S. India, the name of only one form of 'kitchen' for rice, viz. of that in consistency resembling broth, as several of the earlier quotations indicate. Europeans have applied it to all the savoury concoctions of analogous spicy character eaten with rice. These may be divided into three classes—viz. (1), that just noticed; (2), that in the form of a stew of meat, fish or vegetables; (3), that called by Europeans 'dry curry.' These form the successive courses of a Hindu meal in S. India, and have in the vernaculars several discriminating names.

In Java the Dutch, in their employment of curry, keep much nearer to the original Hindu practice. At a breakfast, it is common to hand round with the rice a dish divided into many sectoral spaces, each of which contains a different kind of curry, more or less liquid.

According to the _Famkeva at Canton_ (1882), the word is used at the Chinese ports (we presume in talking with Chinese servants) in the form _kaarli_ (p. 62).

1582.—"Then the Captain-major commanded them to cut off the hands and ears of all the crew, and put all that into one of the small vessels, into which he ordered them to put the friar, also without ears or nose or hands, which he ordered to be strung round his neck with a palm-leaf for the King, on which he told him to have a curry (carill) made of all that his friar brought him."—Correa, Three Voyages, Hak. Soc. 331. The "Frier" was a Brahman, in the dress of a friar, to whom the odious Russian Vasco da Gama had given a safe-conduct.

1593.—"They made dishes of fowl and fish, which they call carill."—Garcia, f. 68.

c. 1590.—"The victual of these (renegade soldiers) is like that of the barbarous people; that of Moors all brings [birjam, 'rice']; that of Gentoo rice-caril."—Prior & Hours, &c., f. 96.

1598.—"Most of their fish is eaten with rice, which they seeth in broth, which they put upon the rice, and is somewhat sour, as if it were sodden in gooseberries, or unripe grapes, but it tasteth well, and is called _carill_ (v.l. _Carril_), which is their daily meat."—Linckotes, 88; [Hak. Soc. ii. 11]. This is a good description of the ordinary tamarind curry of S. India.

1606.—"Their ordinary food is boiled rice with many varieties of certain soups which they pour upon it, and which in these parts are commonly called _caril._"—Gowes, 61b.

1609.-1610.—"... me disoist qu'il y aoit plus de 40 ans, qu'il exista esclaue, et auoit gagne bon argent a celuy qui le possedoit; et toute fois qu'il ne luy donnait pour toute viure qu'une mesure de ris cru par iour sans autre chose ... et quelquefois deux bavaruques, qui sont quelque deux demiers (see _Sudgboek_), pour auoir du _Carril_ a mettre au-dessus le ris."—Morret, Voyages, 387.

1623.—"In India they give the name of _kari_ to certain messes made with butter, with the kernel of the coco-nut (in place of which might be used in our part of the world milk of almonds) ... with spiceries of every kind, among the rest cardamom and ginger ... with vegetables, fruits, and a thousand other condiments of sorts ... and the Christians, who eat everything, put in also flesh or fish of every kind, and sometimes eggs ... with all which things they make a kind of broth in the fashion of our _guazetti_ (or hotoh-potches) ... and this broth with all the said condiments in it they pour over a good quantity of rice boiled simply with water and salt, and the whole makes a most savoury and substantial mess."—F. della Valle, ii. 709; [Hak. Soc. ii. 326.]

1681.—"Most sorts of these delicious Fruits they gather before they be ripe, and boil them to make _carises_, to use the Portuguese word, that is somewhat to eat with and relish their Rice."—Kanga, p. 12. This perhaps indicates that the English _curry_ is formed from the Port. _caris_, plural of _caril_.

c. 1690.—"Curcumia in Indiā tam ad cibus quam ad medicam admixture, Indiā enim ... ad ex ipse adueta sunt ut cum cunctis admissis condimentis et piscibis, praesertim autem isti quod _karri_ ipse vocatur."—Rumphius, Pars Vta. p. 166.

c. 1759-60.—"The _curries_ are infinitely various, being a sort of fricacees to eat with rice, made of any animals or vegetables."—Groce, i. 150.

1781.—"To-day have _curry_ and rice for my dinner, and plenty of it as C—my messmate, has got the gpires, and cannot eat his share."—Hon. J. Lindays's _Improvisement_, in Lives of Lindays, iii. 286.

1794-97.—"The Bengal squad he fed so wondrous nice, Baring his _currie_ took, and Scott his rice._

CURRY-STUFF.

This shows that curry was not a domesticated dish in England at the date of publication. It also is a sample of what the wit was that ran through so many editions.

c. 1830.—"J'ai substitué le lait à l'eau pour boisson... c'est une sorte de contre-poison pour l'essence de feu que forme la sauce enragée de mon sempiternel cura."—Jacqueton, Correspondance, i. 196.

1848.—"Now we have seen how Mrs. Sedley had prepared a fine curry for her son."—Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

1860.—"... Vegetables, and especially farinaceous food, are especially to be commended. The latter is indeed rendered attractive by the unrivalled excellence of the Singhalese in the preparation of innumerable curries, each tempered by the delicate creamy juice expressed from the flesh of the cocoanut, after it has been reduced to a pulp."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 77.

N.B. Tennent is misled in supposing (p. 168) that chillies of the nut, after it is dried, are kept in a hoo with 'vetiver,' which is the Tam. name vetiver, 'the root which is dug up.' In some of the N. Indian vernaculars khashkas is 'a poppy-head'; but this is a different word, Skt. khashkas, and compare P. khashkas.

The Dutch use the word as Kerrie or Karrie; and Kari à l'Indienne has a place in French cartes.

CURRY-STUFF, s. Onions, chillies, &c.; the usual material for preparing curry, otherwise mussalla (q.v.), represented in England by the preparations called curry-powder and curry-paste.

1840.—"... with plots of esculents and curry-stuffs of every variety, onions, chillies, yams, cassavas, and sweet potatoes."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 468.

CUSSEAH, s. Ar.—H. kasba, kajaba; the chief place of a pergunnah (q.v.).

1548.—"And the casaba of Tanas is rented at 4450 paraeas."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 180.

[c. 1590.—"In the fortieth year of his Majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of one hundred and five Sircars, sub-divided into thirty seven and hundred and thirty-seven kusbas."—Ayes, tr. Gladwin, ii. 1; Jarrett, ii. 115.]

1644.—"On the land side are the houses of the Vazador (I) or Possessor of the Casaba, which is as much as to say the town-or aldea of Mombaym (Bombay). This town of Mombaym is a small and scattered affair.—Basoa, M. S. fol. 227.

c. 1844-45.—"In the centre of the large Cussah of Streemgoonam exists an old sand fort, or rather wall of about 20 feet high, surrounding some 120 houses of a body of people calling themselves Kowrii Vellala,—that is, 'Fort Vellala.' Within this wall no police officer, warrant or Poon ever enters... The females are said to be kept in a state of great degradation and ignorance. They never pass without the walls alive; when dead they are carried out by night in sacks."—Report by Mr. E. B. Thomas, Collector of Timeevally, quoted in Lord Stanhope's Miscellanea, 2nd Series, 1872, p. 182.

CUSSEAH, CURRY-STUFF, CURRY, s. Pers.—H. khashkas. The roots of a grass [called in N. India sentha or P. khashkas, and compare P. khashkas], which abounds in the drier parts of India, Antherum muricatum (Beauv.), Andropogon muricatus (Retz.), used in India during the hot dry winds to make screens, which are kept constantly wet, in the window openings, and the fragrant evaporation from which greatly cools the house (see TATTY). This device seems to be ascribed by Abul Fazl to the invention of Akbar. These roots are well known in France by the name vetiver, which is the Tam. name vetiver, 'the root which is dug up.' In some of the N. Indian vernaculars khashkas is 'a poppy-head'; but this is a different word, Skt. khashkas, and compare P. khashkas.

c. 1590.—"But they (the Hindus) were notorious for the want of cold water, the intolerable heat of their climate... His Majesty remedied all these evils and defects. He taught them how to cool water by the help of mu. He ordered mats to be woven of a cold odoriferous mot called khars... and when wetted with water on the outside, those within enjoy a pleasant cool air in the height of summer."

1590.—"The Kuss-Kuss... when fresh, is rather fragrant, though the scent is somewhat terreneous."—Williamson, V. M. i. 285.

1824.—"We have tried to keep our rooms cool with 'tatties,' which are mats formed of the Kusikos, a peculiar sweet-scented grass..."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 59.

It is curious that the coarse grass which covers the more naked parts of the Islands of the Indian Archipelago appears to be called kusu-kusu (Wallace, 2nd ed. ii. 74). But we know not if there is any community of origin in these names.
In the sense of poppy-seed or poppy-head, this word is P.; De Orta says Ar. [see above.]

1653.—"... at Cambaisa, seeing in the market that they were selling poppy-heads big enough to fill a casada, and also some no bigger than ours, and asking the name, I was told that it was cazaot (cashash)—and that in fact is the name in Arabic—and they told me that of these poppies was made opium (amfado), cute being made in the poppy-head, so that the opium exudes."—Garcia De Orta, f. 165.

1621.—"The 24th of April public proclamation was made in Isphahan by the King's order... that on pain of death, no one should drink coacour, which is a liquor made from the husk of the capsule of opium, called by them khash-khash."—P. della Valle, ii. 209; [coacour is P. toknâr].

CUSPADORE, s. An old term for a spittoon. Port.'cupõdâre, from cuspir, [Lat. conspuerre], to spit. Usipidâr would be properly quasi mulitum spuit.

1654.—Speaking of the greatness of the Sultan of Bengal, he says to illustrate it—'From the camphor which goes with his spittle when he spits into his gold spittoon (coespidor) his chamberlain has an income of 2000 cruzados.'—Custandezia, Bk. iv. ch. 88.]

1672.—"Here maintain themselves three of the most powerful lords and Naiks of this kingdom, who are subject to the Crown of Veisour, and pay its tribute of many hundred Pagodas... viz. Vitupa-naik of Madere. The King's Cuspadore-bearer, 200 Pagodas, Cristopa-naik of Ohegar, the King's Beti-server, 200 pagodas, the Naik of Tanjouer, the King's Warder and Umbrella carrier, 400 Pagodas..."—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 153.

1736.—In a list of silver plate we have 5 cuspadores."—Wheeler, iii. 189.

1775.—"Before each person was placed a large brass salver, a black earthen pot of water, and a brass cuspadore."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, &c. (at Magindanao), 235.

CUSPADORE. 284

CUSPADORE, s. The name in India of a fruit (Anona squamosa, L.) originally introduced from S. America, but which spread over India during the 16th century. Its commonest name in Hindustan is sharifa, i.e. 'noble'; but it is also called Shiaphal, i.e. 'the FRUIT OF SITA,' whilst another Anoma ('bullock's heart,' A. reticulata, L., the custard-apple of the W. Indies, where both names are applied to it) is called in the south by the name of her husband Rama. And the Shiaphal and Ramaphal have become the subject of Hindu legends (see Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 410). The fruit is called in Chinese fan-i-chi, i.e. foreign leechee.

A curious controversy has arisen from time to time as to whether this fruit and its congers were really imported from the New World, or were indigenous in India. They are not mentioned among Indian fruits by Baber (c. A.D. 1530), but the translation of the Ain (c. 1590) by Prof. Blochmann contains among the "Sweet Fruits of Hindustan," Custard-apple (p. 68). On referring to the original, however, the word is sataphal (fructus perennis), a Hind. term for which Shakespear gives many applications, not one of them the anona. The bel is one (Aegle marmelos), and seems as probable as any (see BIEL). The custard-apple is not mentioned by Garcia de Orta (1693), Linschoten (1697), or even by P. della Valle (1624). It is not in Bontius (1631), nor in Piso's commentary on Bontius (1668), but is described as an American product in the West Indian part of Piso's book, under the Brazilian name Araticu. Two species are described as common by P. Vincenzo Maria, whose book was published in 1672. Both the custard-apple and the sweet-sop are fruits now generally diffused in India; but of their having been imported from the New World, the name Anona, which we find in Oviedo to have been the native West Indian name of one of the species, and which in various corrupted shapes is applied to them over different parts of the East, is an indication. Crawford, it is true, in his Malay Dictionary explains nona or buah- ('fruit') nona in its application to the custard-apple as fructus virginalis, from nona, the term applied in the Malay countries (like missy in India) to an unmarried European lady. But in the face of the American word this becomes out of the question.

It is, however, a fact that among the Bharutt sculptures, among the carvings dig up at Muttra by General Cunningham, and among the copies...
CUSTARD-APPLE.

from wall-paintings at Ajanta (as pointed out by Sir G. Birdwood in 1874, (see Athenæum, 28th October), [Bombay Gazetteer, xi. 490]) there is a fruit represented which is certainly very like a custard-apple (though an abnormally big one), and not very like anything else yet pointed out. General Cunningham is convinced that it is a custard-apple, and urges in corroboration of his view that the Portuguese in introducing the fruit (which he does not deny) were merely bringing coals to Newcastle; that he has found extensive tracts in various parts of India covered with the wild custard-apple; and also that this fruit bears an indigenous Hindi name, \textit{dd} or \textit{dt}, from the Sanskrit \textit{diripya}.

It seems hard to pronounce about this \textit{diripya}. A very high authority, Prof. Max Müller, to whom we once referred, doubted whether the word (meaning ‘delightful’) ever existed in real Sanskrit. It was probably an artificial name given to the fruit, and he compared it aptly to the fictitious Latin of \textit{aurum malum} for “orange,” though the latter word really comes from the Sanskrit \textit{nāranga}. On the other hand, \textit{diripya} is quoted by Rāja Rādhaṅkant Deb, in his Sanskrit dictionary, from a medieval work, the \textit{Dravyaguna}. And the question would have to be considered how far the MSS. of such a work are likely to have been subject to modern interpolation. Sanskrit names have certainly been invented for many objects which were unknown till recent centuries. Thus, for example, Williams gives more than one word for \textit{cactus}, or prickly pear, a class of plants which was certainly introduced from America (see \textit{Vidara} and \textit{Vivusaraka}, in his Skt. Dictionary).

A new difficulty, moreover, arises as to the indigenous claims of \textit{dd}, which is the name for the fruit in Malabar as well as in Upper India. For, on turning for light to the splendid works of the Dutch ancients, Rheede and Rumphius, we find in the former (\textit{Hortus Malabaricus}, part iv.) a reference to a certain author, ‘Recchus de Plantis Mexicanis,’ as giving a drawing of a custard-apple tree, the name of which in Mexico was \textit{ahal} or \textit{áté}, “fructu apud Mexicanos praecellenti arbor nobilis” (the expressions are noteworthy, for the popular Hindustani name of the fruit is \textit{sharīfa} = “nobilis”). We also find in a Manilla Vocabulary that \textit{ate} or \textit{até} is the name of this fruit in the Philippines. And from Rheede we learn that in Malabar the \textit{dd} was sometimes called by a native name called “the Manilla jack-fruit”; whilst the \textit{Anona reticulata}, or sweet-sop, was called by the Malabars “the Parangi (i.e. Firingi or Portuguese) jack-fruit.”

These facts seem to indicate that probably the \textit{dd} and its name came to India from Mexico \textit{via} the Philippines, whilst the \textit{anona} and its name came to India from Hispaniola \textit{via} the Cape. In the face of these probabilities the argument of General Cunningham from the existence of the tree in a wild state loses force. The fact is undoubted and may be corroborated by the following passage from “\textit{Observations on the nature of the Food of the Inhabitants of South India},” 1864, p. 12:—“I have seen it stated in a botanical work that this plant (\textit{Anona sq.}) is not indigenous, but introduced from America, or the W. Indies. If so, it has taken most kindly to the soil of the Deccan, for the jungles are full of it”: [also see \textit{Watt, Econ. Dict.} ii. 259 seq., who supports the foreign origin of the plant]. The author adds that the wild custard-apples saved the lives of many during famine in the Hyderabad country. But on the other hand, the \textit{Argemone Mexicana}, a plant of unquestioned American origin, is now one of the most familiar weeds all over India. The cashew (\textit{Anacardium occidentale}), also of American origin, and carrying its American name with it to India, not only forms tracts of jungle now (as Sir G. Birdwood has stated) in Canara and the Concan (and, as we may add from personal knowledge, in Tanjore), but was described by P. Vincenzo Maria, more than two hundred and twenty years ago, as then abounding in the wilder tracts of the western coast.

The question raised by General Cunningham is an old one, for it is alluded to by Rumphius, who ends by leaving it in doubt. We cannot say that we have seen any satisfactory suggestion of another (Indian) plant as that represented in the ancient sculpture of Bharhut. [Dr. Watt says: “They may prove to be conventional representations of the jack-fruit tree or some other allied plant; they are not unlike the flower-heads of the sacred kadamba or Anthocopephalus," (loc. cit. i. 260). But it is well to get rid of fallacious arguments on either side.

In the "Materia Medica of the Hindus" by Udy Chand Dutt, with a Glossary by G. King, M.B., Calc. 1877," we find the following synonyms given:

"Anona reticulata: Skt. Lavali; Beng. Lont." *

1672.—"The plant of the Atta in 4 or 5 years comes to its greatest size ... the fruit ... under the rind is divided into so many wedges, corresponding to the external compartments ... The pulp is very white, tender, delicate, and so delicate that it unites to agreeable sweetness a most delightful fragrance like rose-water ... and if presented to one unacquainted with it he would certainly take it for a blanmange. ... The Anona," &c., &c.—P. Vincenzo Maria, pp. 346-7.

1690.—"They (Hindus) feed likewise upon Fine-Apples, Custard-apples, so called because they resemble a Custard in Colour and Taste ..."—Orentius, 308.

1820.—"... the custard-apple, like russet bags of cold pudding."—Tom Ongeline's Log, ed. 1863, p. 140.

1878.—"The gushing custard-apple with its crust of stones and luscious pulp."—P. Robinson, In my Indian Garden, [49].

CUSTOM, s. Used in Madras as the equivalent of Dustoor, Dustoory, of which it is a translation. Both words illustrate the origin of Customs in the solemn revenue sense.

1688.—"Thoore and Barker positively denied ye overweight, ye Merchants proved it by their books; but ye scayne out of every draught was confess, and claimed as their due, having been always the custom."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 88.

1768-71.—"Banyans, who ... serve in this capacity without any fixed pay, but they know how much more they may charge upon every rupee, than they have in reality paid, and this is called costumado."—Stavrovinas, E.T., i. 622.

CUSTOMER, s. Used in old books of Indian trade for the native official who exacted duties. [The word was in common use in England from 1448 to 1748; see N.E.D.]

[1809.—"His houses ... are seized on by the Customer."—Daunser, Letters, i. 25; and comp. Foster, ibid., ii. 226.

[1815.—"The Customer should come and visit them."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 44.

1822.—"The several affronts, insolences, and abuses daily put upon us by Bookhund, our chief Customer."—Hedges, Diary, [Hak. Soc. i. 83].

CUTCH, s. See CATECHU.

CUTCH, n.p. Properly Kachch, a native State in the West of India, immediately adjoining Sind, the Raja-ruler of which is called the Râo. The name does not occur, as far as we have found, in any of the earlier Portuguese writers, nor in Linschoten, [but the latter mentions the gulf under the name of Jaquta (Hak. Soc. i. 56 seq.). The Skt. word kachchha seems to mean a morass or low, flat land.

1090.—"At this place (Mansura) the river (Indus) divides into two streams, one empties itself into the sea in the neighbourhood of the city of Lothhrâni, and the other branches off to the east to the borders of Kach."—Al-Birûtî, in Elliot, i. 49.

Again, "Kach, the country producing gum" (i.e. wukal or beldiwm), p. 69.

The port mentioned in the next three extracts was probably Mandavi (this name is said to signify "Custom-House"; [mandu, 'a temporary hut,' is a term commonly applied to a bazaar in N. India].

1611.—"Cucha-nagara, a place not far from the River of Zinde."—Nic. Downton, in Purchas, i. 307.

[1612.—"The other ship which proved of Cuta-nagara."—Daunser, Letters, i. 179.]

1615.—"Francisco Sodre ... who was serving as captain-major of the fortress of Dio, went to Cache, with twelve ships and a sangwiel, to inflict chastisement for the arrogance and insolence of these blacks ("... pula soberbâ e desâvor de sestes negros. ..."), "Of these niggers!", thinking that he might do it as easily as Gaspar de Mello had punished those of Por."—Boocaro, 257.

[c. 1651.—"Dara ... traversing with speed the territories of the Raja Katcha soon reached the province of Guzarate. ..."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 78.]

1727.—"The first town on the south side of the Indus is Cutch-naggen."—A. Hamilton, i. 181; [ed. 1744].
Cutch Gundava, n.p. Kachchh Gandara or Kachchh, a province of Biluchistan, under the Khan of Kela't, adjoining our province of Sind; a level plain, subject to inordinate heat in summer, and to the visitation of the simya. Across the northern part of this plain runs the railway from Sukkur to Sibi. Gandara, the chief place, has been shown by Sir H. Elliot to be the Kandtbil or Kandkbil of the Arab geographers of the 9th and 10th centuries. The name in its modern shape, or what seems intended for the same, occurs in the Persian version of the Chachdnmah, or H. of the Conquest of Sind, made in A.D. 1216 (see Elliot, i. 166).

Cutch, Kutch, adj. Hind. kachchh, 'raw, crude, unripe, uncooked.' This word is with its opposite pukka (see Pucka) among the most constantly recurring Anglo-Indian colloquial terms, owing to the great variety of metaphorical applications of which both are susceptible. The following are a few examples only, but they will indicate the manner of use better than any attempt at comprehensive definition:—

A cutcha Brick is a sun-dried brick.

House is built of mud, or of sun-dried brick.
Road is earthwork only.
Appointment is acting or temporary.
Settlement is one where the land is held without lease.
Account or Estimate, is one which is rough, superficial, and untrustworthy.
Maund, or Seer, is the smaller, where two weights are in use, as often happens.
Major is a brevet or local Major.
Colour is one that won't wash.
Fever is a simple ague or a light attack.
Pice generally means one of those amorphous copper, current in up-country bazaars at varying rates of value.
Cost—see analogy under Maund above.
Roof: A roof of mud laid on beams; or of thatch, &c.
Scoundrel, a limb and fatuous knave.
Seam (nilá) is the tailor's tack for trying on.

1763.—"Il paraît que les cutcha coisses sont plus en usage que les autres coisses dans le gouvernement du Deccan."—Lettres Edifiantes, xv. 190.

1863.—"In short, in America, where they cannot get a puka railway they take a kutcha one instead. This, I think, is what we must do in India."—Lord Belin, in Letters and Journals, 432.

Captain Burton, in a letter dated Aug. 26, 1879, and printed in the "Academy" (p. 177), explains the gypsy word gorgio, for a Gentile or non-Rommany, as being kachha or cutcha. This may be, but it does not carry conviction.

Cutch-Puka, adj. This term is applied in Bengal to a nixt kind of building in which burnt brick is used, but which is cemented with mud instead of lime-mortar.

Cutcherry, and in Madras.}

Cutcherry, s. An office of administration, a court-house. Hind. kachahri; used also in Ceylon. The word is not usually now, in Bengal, applied to a merchant's counting-house, which is called dutfer, but it is applied to the office of an Indigo-Planter or a Zemindar, the business in which is more like that of a Magistrate's or Collector's Office. In the service of Tippoo Sahib cutcherry was used in peculiar senses besides the ordinary one. In the civil administration it seems to have been used for something like what we should now call Department (see e.g. Tippoo's Letters, 292); and in the army for a division or large brigade (e.g. ibid. 332; and see under JYSHE and quotation from Wilks below).

1610.—"Over against this seat is the Cutcherry or Court of Rolls, where the King's Visiter sits with the three hours, by whose hands pass all matters of Rents, Grants, Lands, Firmsan, Debts, &c."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 439.

1673.—"At the lower End the Royal Exchange or Cutcherry . . . opens its folding doors."—Fryer, 261.

[1702. — "But not making an early escape themselves were carried into the Cacherra or publick Gaol."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cxi.]

1763.—"The Secretary acquaints the Board that agreeably to their orders of the 9th May, he last Saturday attended the Court of Cutcherry, and acquainted the Members with the charge the President of the Court had laid against them for non-attendance."—In Long, 316.

"The protection of our Gomastahs and servants from the oppression and jurisdiction of the Zemindars and their Cutcherries has been ever found to be a liberty highly essential both to the honour and interest of our nation."—From the Chief and Council at Dacca, in Van Sittard, i. 247.

c. 1765.—"We can truly aver that during almost five years that we presided in the Cutcherry Court of Calcutta, never any murder or atrocious crime came before us but it was proved in the end a Brama was at the bottom of it."—Holwell, Interesting Historical Events, Pt. II. 122.

1783.—"The moment they find it true that the English Government shall remain as it is, they will divide sugar and sweetmeats among all the people in the Cutcheree; then every body will speak sweet words."—Native Letter, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 227.

1786.—"You must not suffer any one to come to your house; and whatever business you may have to do, let it be transacted in our Kutcherry."—Tippoo's Letters, 303.

1791.—"At Seringapatam General Matthews was in confinement. James Skurry was sent for one day to the Kutcherry there, and some pewter plates with marks on them were shown to him to explain; he said they were property; 'I am indebted to the Malabar Christians on account of the Public Service 40,000 Rs.; the Company owes me (about) 30,000 Rs.; I have taken Poison and am now within a short time of Death; whoever communicates this to the Bombay Govt. or to my wife will be amply rewarded. (Signed) Richard Matthews."—Narrative of Mr. William Drake, and other Prisoners (in Mysore), in Madras Courier, 17th Nov.

c. 1796.—". . . the other Asaf Miran Hussein, was a low fellow and a debauche, . . . who in different . . . towns was carried in his palik on the shoulders of dancing girls as ugly as demons to his Kutchari or hall of audience."—H. of Tippe Sultan, E.T. by Miles, 246.

". . . the favour of the Sultan towards that worthy man (Dundas Wagh) still continued to increase . . . but although, after a time, a Kutchari, or brigade, was named after him, and orders were issued for his release, it was to no purpose."—Ibid. 248.

[c. 1810.—"Four appears to have been the fortunate number (with Tippoo; four companies (yenis), one battalion (teep), four teeps one cuskoon (see KOBOON): . . . four cuskoons, one Cutcherry. The establishment . . . of a cutcherry . . . 5,688, but these numbers fluctuated with the Sultan's caprices, and at one time a cuskoon, with its cavalry attached, was a legion of about 3,000."—Wilks, Mysore, ed. 1860, ii. 182.]

1834.—"I mean, my dear Lady Wroughton, that the man to whom Sir Charles is most heavily indebted, is an officer of his own Cutcherjee, the very scion who cringes to you every morning for orders."—The Baboo, i. 126.

1860.—"I was told that many years ago, what remained of the Dutch records were removed from the record-room of the Colonial Office to the Cutcherry of the Government Agent."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. xxvii.

1873.—"I'd rather be out here in a tent any time . . . than be stewing all day in a stuffy Kutcherry listening to Ram Buksh and Co. perjuring themselves till they are nearly white in the face."—The True Reformer, i. 4.

1883.—"Surrounded by what seemed to me a mob of natives, with two or three dogs at his feet, talking, writing, dictating,—in short doing Cutcherry."—O. Radke, in Bosworth Smith's Lord Lawrence, i. 59.

OUTCHNAR, s. Hind. kach奶r, Skt. kфnchandra (कचनचरा, 'gold') the beautiful flowering tree Bauhinia variegata, L., and some other species of the same genus (N. O. Leguminosae).

1855. — "Very good fireworks were exhibited . . . among the best was a sort of maypole hung round with minor fireworks which were loaded with gunpowder, leaving disclosed a tree hung with quivering flowers of purple flame, evidently intended to represent the Kachnar of the Burmese forests."—Fyle, Mission to Ava, 95.
CUTTACK. 289

CUTTACK, n.p. The chief city of Orissa, and district immediately attached. From Skt. kataka, 'an army, a camp, a royal city.' This name Al-kataka is applied by Ibn Batuta in the 14th century to Deogiri in the Deccan (iv. 46), or at least to a part of the town adjoining that ancient fortress.

[c. 1567. — "Citta di Cathoca." — Ceure Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 392. [Catecha, in Hakt. ii. 388.]

[c. 1590. — "Attoc on the Indus is called Atak Benares in contrast to Katak Benares in Orissa at the opposite extremity of the Empire." — Asia, ed. Garrett, ii. 311.]

1633. — "The 30 of April we set forward in the Morning for the City of Cutteka (it is a city of seven miles in compass, and it standeth a mile from Malandy where the Court is kept." — Bruton, in Hakt. v. 49.

CUTTANCE. s. Some kind of piece-goods, apparently either of silk or mixed silk and cotton. Kutta, Pera, is flax or linen cloth. This is perhaps the word. [Kattan is now used in India for the waste selavage in silk weaving, which is sold to Patwas, and used for stringing ornaments, such as joshans (armlets of gold or silver beads) bedaubands (armlets with folding bands), &c. (Yew sk. Ait, Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 68.)] Cuttances appear in Milburn's list of Calcutta piece-goods.

[1593. — "Cotomias, which are like canvas." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 60.]

1648. — "Contamia." See under ALCATIF.

1673. — "Cuttane breeches." See under ATLAS.

[1690. — "... rich Silks, such as Atlases, Cuttanes, ..." — See under ALLEJA.

1734. — "They manufacture ... in cotton and silk called Cuttannes." — A. Hamilton, i. 120; ed. 1744.]

CUTTRY. See KHUTTRY.

CYRUS, SYRAS, SARUS, &c. A common corruption of Hind. suras, [Skt. sarasa, the 'lake bird,'] or (corruptly) sārhas, the name of the great grey crane, Grus Antigone, L., generally found in pairs, held almost sacred in some parts of India, and whose "fine trumpet-like call, uttered when alarmed or on the wing, can be heard a couple of miles off" (Jordin). [The British soldier calls the bird a 'Sarova,' and is fond of shooting him for the pot.] 1672. — "... peculiarly Brand-geese, Colum [see COOLUNG], and Saras, a species of the former." — Fryer, 117.

1807. — "The argelah as well as the cyrus, and all the aquatic tribe are extremely fond of snakes, which they ... swallow down their long throats with great dispatch." — Williamson, Gr. Field Sports, 27.

[1809. — "Saras." See under COOLUNG.]

1813. — In Forbes's Or. Mem. (ii. 277 seqq.; 2nd ed. i. 502 seqq.), there is a curious story of a cyrus or Sahra (as he writes it) which Forbes had tamed in India, and which nine years afterwards recognised its master when he visited General Conway's menagerie at Park Place near Henley.

1840. — "Bands of gobbling pelicans" (see this word, probably ADJUTANTS are meant) "and groups of tall cyruses in their half-Quaker, half-lancer plumage, consulted and conferred together, in seeming perplexity as to the nature of our intentions." — Mrs. Mackenzie, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, i. 108.

D

DABUL, n.p. Dabhol. In the later Middle Ages a famous port of the Konkan, often coupled with Choul (q.v.), carrying on extensive trade with the West of Asia. It lies in the modern dist. of Ratnagiri, in lat. 17° 34', on the north bank of the Anjanwel or Vashishti R. In some maps (e.g. A. Arrowsmith's of 1816, long the standard map of India), and in W. Hamilton's Gazetteer, it is confounded with Dapoli, 12 m. north, and not a seaport.

[c. 1475. — "Dabyl is also a very extensive seaport, where many horses are brought from Mysore, * Rabat [Arabistan!] i.e. Arabia, Khurasan, Turkistan, Noghoostan." — Nikifor, p. 20. "It is a very large town, the great meeting-place for all nations living along the coast of India and of Ethiopia." — Ibid. 80.

1602. — "The gale abated, and the caravels reached land at Dabule, where they rigged their latesen sails, and mounted their artillery." — Correa, Three Voyages of V. da Gama, Hak. Soc. 308.

1610. — "Having seen Cavel and its customs, I went to another city, distant from it two days journey, which is called Dabułlo. ... There are Moormah merchants here in very great numbers." — Vartthag, 114.

* Mysore is nonsense. As suggested by Sir J. Campbell in the Bombay Gazetteer, After (Egypt) is probably the word.
1516.—"This Dabul has a very good harbour, where there always congregate many Moorish ships from various ports, and especially from Mekkah, Aden, and Ormus with horses, and from Cambay, Diu, and the Malabar country."—Barbour, 72.

1554.—"23d Voyage, from Dabul to Aden."—The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Beng., v. 464.

[c. 1665.—"The King of Bijapur has three good ports in this kingdom: these are Rajapur, Dabhol, and Karapur."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 181 seq.]

DACCA. n.p. Properly Dhakit, ['the wood of dhak (see DHAWK) trees'; the Imp. Gaz. suggests Dhakeswari, 'the concealed goddess']. A city in the east of Bengal, once of great importance, especially in the later Mahommedan history; famous also for the "Dacca muslins" woven there, the annual advances for which, prior to 1801, are said to have amounted to $250,000. [Taylor, Descr. and Hist. Account of the Cotton Manufacture of Dacca in Bengal].

Daka is throughout Central Asia applied to all muslins imported through Kabul.

[c. 1617.—"... liberos Osmanis asecutus vivos cepit, eosque cum elephantibus et omnibus thesauris defuncti, post quam Dacca Bengalae metropolitum est reversus, misit ad regem."—De Laet, quoted by Blochmann, Asia, i. 521.]

[c. 1660.—"Dakaka" in Sir T. Roe's List, Hak. Soc. i. 538.]

1818.—"Dacca is a great Town, that extends itself only in length; every one coveting to have an House by the Ganges side. The length . . . is above two leagues. . . . These Houses are properly no more than paltry Huts built up with Bambouc's, and daub'd over with fat Earth."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 55; [ed. Ball, i. 128].

1822.—"The only expedient left was for the Agent to go himself in person to the Nabob and Dawa at Decous."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 33].

DACOIT, DACOO. s. Hind. dákait, dákayat, dákä; a robber belonging to an armed gang. The term, being current in Bengal, got into the Penal Code. By law, to constitute dacoity, there must be five or more in the gang committing the crime. Beames derives the word from dákän, 'to shout,' a sense not in Shakespeare's Dict. [It is to be found in Platts, and Fallon gives it as used in E. H. It appears to be connected with Skt. dákñta, 'pressed together.']

1810.—"Decoits, or water-robbers."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 396.

1812.—"Decoits, a species of depredators who infest the country in gangs."—Fifth Report, p. 9.

1817.—"The crime of dacoity" (that is, robbery by gangs), says Sir Henry Strachey, "... has, I believe, increased greatly since the British administration of justice."—Mill, H. of B. I., v. 466.

1834.—"It is a conspiracy! a false warrant!—they are Dakoos! Dakoos!"—The Baboo, ii. 202.

1837.—"Daroga! Why, what has he come here for? I have not heard of any dacoity or murder in the Village."—Govinda Samanta, i. 264.

DADNY, s. H. dādana, [P. dāda, 'to give']; an advance made to a craftsman, a weaver, or the like, by one who trades in the goods produced.

1878.—"Wee met with some trouble About ye Investment of Taffetas we hath Continued ever Since, Soc ye wee had not been able to give out any dādūna on Muxadav Side many weanours absentee themselves. . . ."—MS. Letter of 3d June, from Cassumbazar Factory, in India Office.

1888.—"Chuttermull and Deepchund, two Cassumbazar merchants this day assured me Mr. Charnock gives out all his new Sīca ārupes for Dadny at 2 per cent., and never gives the Company credit for more than 1½ rupees—by which he gains and puts in his own pocket Rupees 2½ cent. of all the money he pays, which amounts to a great Summe in ye Yeare; at least £1,000 sterling."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 121, also see i. 85.]

1748.—"The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Fillick Chund, Gosserain, Goore, and Otterum, they being of a different caste, and consequently they could not do business with them, upon which they refused Dadnay, and having the same objection to make this year, they propose taking their shares of the Dadnay."—Jt. William Cons., May 23. In Long, p. 9.

1772.—"I observe that the Court of Directors have ordered the gomastaks to be withdrawn, and the investment to be provided by Dadnay merchants."—Warren Hastings to J. Purling, in Gleig, i. 227.

DAGBAIL, s. Hind. from Pers. ḍagh-i-bel, 'spade-mark.' The line dug to trace out on the ground a camp, or a road or other construction. As the central line of a road, canal, or railroad it is the equivalent of English 'lockspit.'

DAGOBA. a. Singhalese dagaba, from Pali dhátugabba, and Sansk. dhátu-garbhá, 'Relic-receptacle'; applied to any dome-like Buddhist shrine (see TOPE, FAGODA). Gen. Cunningham alleges that the Chátiyá was usually an empty tope dedicated to the Adi-Buddha (or Supreme, of the quasi-Theistic Buddhists), whilst the term Dhátu-garbhá, or Dagoba, was properly applied only to a tope which was an actual relic-shrine, or repository of ashes of the dead (Bhilas Topes, 9, 9). "The Shan word 'Hták,' or 'Ták,' and the Siamese 'Sat-oop,' for a pagoda placed over portions of Gaudama's body, such as his flesh, teeth, and hair, is derived from the Sanskrit 'Dhátu-garbhá,' a relic shrine" (Hallett, A Thousand Miles, 308.)

We are unable to say who first introduced the word into European use. It was well known to William von Humboldt, and to Ritter; but it has become more familiar through its frequent occurrence in Ferguson's Hist. of Architecture. The only surviving example of the native use of this term on the Continent of India, so far as we know, is in the neighbourhood of the remains of the great Buddhist establishments at Nalanda in Behar. See quotation below.

1806. "In this irregular excavation are left two dagopes, or solid masses of stone, bearing the form of a cupola."—Salt, Cases of Sawle, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 47, pub. 1819.

1823. "... from the centre of the screens or walls, projects a dagope."—Des. of Cases near Nasick, by Lt.-Col. Delamaine in As. Journal, N.S. 1836, vol. iii. 276.

1834. "... Mihindu- Kumara... preached in that island (Ceylon) the Religion of Buddha, converted the foremost King, built Dagobas (Dagope, i.e. sanctuaries under which the relics or images of Buddha are deposited) in various places."—Ritter, Aria, Bd. iii. 1162.

1835. "The Temple (cave at Násiék) ... has no interior support, but a rock-celling richly adorned with wheel-ornaments and lions, and in the end-niche a Dagop ...

1836. "Although the Dagope, both from varying size and from the circumstance of their being in some cases independent erections and in others only elements of the internal structure of a temple, have very different aspects, yet their character is universally recognised as that of closed masses devoted to the preservation or concealment of sacred objects."—W. v. Humboldt, Kawi-Sprache, i. 144.

1840. "We performed pradakshina round the Daghoba, reclining on the living couches of the devotees of Nirvan."—Letter of Dr. John Wilson, in Life, 282.

1853. "At the same time he (Sakya) foresaw that a dagoba would be erected to Kantaka on the spot. . . ."—Hardy, Manual of Buddhism, 160.

1855. "All kinds and forms are to be found ... the bell-shaped pyramid of dead brickwork in all its varieties ... the bluff knob-like dome of the Ceylon Dagobas. . . ."—Fule, Mission to Ava, 35.

1872. "It is a remarkable fact that the line of mounds (at Nalanda in Bihar) still bears the name of 'dagop' by the country people. Is not this the dagoba of the Pal annals?"—Brothwell, Budd. Remains of Bihár, in J.A.S.B. xlii. Pt. i. 305.

DAGON, n.p. A name often given by old European travellers to the place now called Rangoon, from the great Relic-shrine or dagoba there, called Shwe (Golden) Dagón. Some have suggested that it is a corruption of dagoba, but this is merely guesswork. In the Talaing language ták-bôn signifies 'athwart,' and, after the usual fashion, a legend has grown up connecting the name with the story of a tree lying 'athwart the hill-top,' which supernaturally indicated where the sacred relics of one of the Buddhas had been deposited (see J.A.S.B. xxviii. 477). Prof. Forchhammer recently (see Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of B. Burma, No. 1) explained the true origin of the name. Towns lying near the sacred site had been known by the successive names of Asaktuña-nagarà and Ukkanagarà. In the 12th century the last name disappears and is replaced by Tíkumbha-nagarà, or in Pali form Tíkumbha-nagarà, signifying '3-Hill-city.' * The Kályáni inscription near Pegu contains both forms. Tíkumbha gradually in popular utterance became Tíkum, Tíkun, and Tíkun, whence Dagón. The classical name of the great Dagoba is Tíkumbha-chetti, and this is still in daily Burman use.

* Kámbha means an earthen pot, and also the 'frontal globe on the upper part of the forehead of the elephant.' The latter meaning was, according to Prof. Forchhammer, that intended, being applied to the hillocks on which the town stood, because of their form. But the Burmese applied it to 'alms-bowls,' and invented a legend of Buddha and his two disciples having buried their alms-bowls at this spot.
When the original meaning of the word Takum had been effaced from the memory of the Talaings, they invented the fable alluded to above in connection with the word tukkum. This view has been disputed by Col. Temple (Ind. Ant., Jan. 1893, p. 27). He gives the reading of the Kalyani inscription as Tigumpanagara and goes on to say: “There is more in favour of this derivation (from dagoba) than of any other yet produced. Thus we have dagaba, Singhalese, admittedly from dhatugabbha, and as far back as the 16th century we have a persistent word digumpa or digumpa (dagon, digon) in Burma with the same meaning. Until a clear derivation is made out, it is, therefore, not unsafe to say that dagon represents some medieval Indian current form of dhatugabbha. This view is supported by a word gompa, used in the Himālayas about Sikkim for a Buddhist shrine, which looks prima facie like the remains of some such word as gabbha, the latter half of the compound dhatugabbha.

Neither Tríkumbha-nagara in Stk. nor Tikumbha-nagara in Pali would mean ‘Three-hill-city,’ kumbha being in no sense a ‘hill’ which is káta, and there are not three hills on the site of the Shwe-Dagon Pagoda at Rangoon.”

c. 1546.—“He hath very certaine intelligence, how the Zemindooh hath raised an army, with an intent to fall upon the Towns of Conmyn and Dala (DALA), and to gain all along the rivers of Digon and Meeduc, the whole Province of Dangdial, even to Annelas (hod. Donspuy and Hensenda).”—F. M. Pinto, tr. by H. C. 1658, p. 288.

c. 1585.—“After landing we began to walk, on the right side, by a street some 50 paces wide, all along which we saw houses of wood, all gilt, and set off with beautiful gardens in their fashion, in which dwell all the Talapoes, which are their Friars, and the rulers of the Pagode or Varella of Dagon.”—Caspur Balbi, f. 98.

c. 1687.—“About two dayes journey from Pegu there is a Varella (see VARELLA) or Pagode, which is the pilgrimage of the Peguans: it is called Dogomma, and is of a wonderfulle bignesse and all gilded from the foot to the toppe.”—R. Fich, in Hakt. ii. 398, [393].

c. 1755.—Dagon and Dagoon occur in a paper of this period in Dallyrmount’s Oriental Repertory, i. 141, 177; (Col. Temple adds: “The word is always Dagon in Floquet’s account of his travels in 1788 (Twaung Pao, vol. i. Les Francais en Birmanie au xviije Siecle, passim). It is always Digon (except once: “Dygone capitale del Pegh,” p. 149) in Quirini’s Viti di Monsignor G. M. Peroni, 1781; and it is Digon in a map by Antonio Zitoe e figli Venezia, 1789. Symes, Embassy to Ava, 1803 (pp. 18, 23) has Dagon. Crawford, 1829, Embassy to Ava (pp. 348-7), calls it Dagong. There is further a curious word, ‘Too Dagon,’ in one of Mortier’s maps, 1740.”]

DAIBUL, n.p. See DIULSIND.

DAIMIO, s. A feudal prince in Japan. The word appears to be approximately the Jap. pronunciation of Chin. tainin, ‘great name.’ [“The Daimyōs were the territorial lords and barons of feudal Japan. The word means literally ‘great name.’ Accordingly, during the Middle Ages, warrior chiefs of lesser degree, corresponding, as one might say, to our knights or barons, were known by the correlative title of Shōmyō, that is, ‘small name.’ But this latter fell into disuse. Perhaps it did not sound grand enough to be welcome to those who bore it.” (Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 101 seq.).]

DAISEYE, s. This word, representing Desai, repeatedly occurs in Kirkpatrick’s Letters of Tippeo (e.g. p. 196) for a local chief of some class. See DESSAYE.

DALA, n.p. This is now a town on the (west) side of the river of Rangoon, opposite to that city. But the name formerly applied to a large province in the Delta, stretching from the Rangoon River westward.

1564.—See Pinto, under DAGON.

1685.—“The 2d November we came to the city of Dala, where among other things there are 10 halls full of elephants, which are here for the King of Pegu, in charge of various attendants and officials.”—Caspur Balbi, f. 95.

DALAWAY, s. In S. India the Commander-in-chief of an army; [Tam. talakad, Skt. dala, ‘army,’ wah, ‘to lead’; Can. and Mal. dhalady and dalady, Old Can. dhal, H. dal, ‘an army.’

1615.—“Caeterum Deleusius ... vehementer à rege contendit, ne comitteret vt vtilum condenda nova hac urbe Aronganganensis portus antiquissimum detrimentum caperet.”—Varro, Thesaurus, i. p. 179.

1700.—“Le Talava, c’est le nom qu’on donne au Prince, qui gouverne aujourd’hui le Royaume sous l'autorité de la Reine."—

Lettres Edif. x. 162. See also p. 178 and
xi. 90.

c. 1747.—"A few days after this, the Dulriw sent for Hydwr, and seating him on a musumd with himself, he consulted with him on the re-establishment of his own affaire, complaining bitterly of his own distress for want of money."—H. of Hydwr Naik, 44. (See also under DHUENA.)

1754.—"You are imposed on, I never wrote to the Muisoree King or Dalloway any such thing, nor they to me; nor had I a knowledge of any agreement between the Nabob and the Dalloway."—Letter from Gov.
Sauders of Madras to French Deputies in Cambridge's Act. of the War, App. p. 29.

1763-78.—"He (Haidar) has lately taken the King (Mysiore) out of the hands of his Uncle, the Dalloway."—Wills, Mysiore, Pref. ed. 1869, p. xi.)

DALOYET, DELOYET, s. An armed attendant and messenger, the same as a Peon. H. dhalat, dhalatjat, from dhal, 'a shield.' The word is never now used in Bengal and Upper India.

1772.—"Suppose every farmer in the province was enjoined to maintain a number of good serviceable bullocks . . . obliged to furnish the Government with them on a requisition made to him by the Collector in writing (not by sepoys, delecta (sic), or herecarras" (see HURCARBA).—
W. Hastings, to G. Vansittart, in Grec, i. 237.

1809.—"As it was very hot, I immediately employed the daloyets to keep off the owds."—Ed. Valentia, i. 339. The word here and elsewhere in that book is a misprint for deloyets.

DAM, s. H. dám. Originally an actual copper coin, regarding which we find the following in the Ain, i. 31, ed. Blochmann:—"1. The Dám weighs 5 tánks, i.e. 1 tolah, 8 madhas, and 7 surks; it is the forty-fifth part of a rupee. At first this coin was called Paisax, and also Babboe; now it is known under this name (dám). On one side the place is given where it was struck, on the other the date.
For the purpose of calculation, the dám is divided into 25 parts, each of which is called a jetal. This imaginary division is only used by accountants.

"2. The adhelak is half of a dám.
3. The Páulah is a quarter of a dám.
4. The damri is an eighth of a dám."

It is curious that Akbar's revenues were registered in this small currency, viz. in laks of dám. We may compare the Portuguese use of reis [see REAS].

The tendency of denominations of coins is always to sink in value. The jetal [see JEETUL], which had become an imaginary money of account in Akbar's time, was, in the 14th century, a real coin, which Mr. E. Thomas, chief of Indian numismatologists, has unearthed [see Chron. Pathan Kings, 231]. And now the dám itself is imaginary. According to Elliot the people of the N.W.P. not long ago calculated 25 dám to the paisa, which would be 1600 to a rupee. Carnegy gives the Oudh popular currency table as:

| 26 kauris | = | 1 damri |
| 1 damri  | = | 3 dám |
| 20 "    | = | 1 dnd |
| 25 dám  | = | 1 pice. |

But the Calcutta Glossary says the dám is in Bengal reckoned as an dand, i.e. 320 to the rupee. ["Most things of little value, here as well as in Bhagalpur (writing of Behar) are sold by an imaginary money called Takā, which is here reckoned equal to two Payseas. There are also imaginary monies called Chalddm and Damri; the former is equal to 1 Payso or 25 cowries, the latter is equal to one-eighth of a Payso." (Buchanan, Eastern Ind.
i. 382 seq.]). We have not in our own experience met with any reckoning of dáms. In the case of the damri the denomination has increased instead of sinking in relation to the dám. For above we have the damri=3 dám, or according to Elliot (Beames, ii. 296)= $\frac{3}{4}$ of a dám, instead of $\frac{1}{4}$ of a dám as in Akbar's time. But in reality the damri's absolute value has remained the same. For by Carnegy's table 1 rupee or 16 anas would be equal to 320 damris, and by the Ain, 1 rupee = 40 x 8 damris = 320 damris. Damri is a common enough expression for the infinitesimal in coin, and one has often heard a Briton in India say: "No, I won't give a damree!" with but a vague notion what a damri meant, as in Scotland we have heard, "I won't give a plack," though certainly the speaker could not have stated the value of that ancient coin. And this leads to the suggestion that a like expression, often heard from coarse talkers in England as well as in India, originated in the latter country, and that whatever profanity there may be in the animus, there is none in the etymology, when such an one blurts out "I don't care a damn!" i.e. in other words, "I don't care a brass farthing!"

If the Gentle Reader deems this a far-fetched suggestion, let us back it by a second. We find in Chaucer (The Miller's Tale):

"——ne caught he not a horse," which means, "he recked not a cress" (ne flacci quidem); an expression which is also found in Piers Plowman:

"Wisdom and witte is nowe not worth a horse."

And this we doubt not has given rise to that other vulgar expression, "I don't care a curse";—curiously parallel in its corruption to that in illustration of which we quote it.

This suggestion about damn was made by a writer in Asiat. Res., ed. 1803, vii. 461: 'This word was perhaps in use even among our forefathers, and may innocently account for the expression 'not worth a fig,' or a damn, especially if we recollect that bo-dam, an almond, is to-day current in some parts of India as small money. Might not dried figs have been employed ancienly in the same way, since the Arabic word fooloos, a halfpenny, also denotes a cossa bean, and the root fuls means the scale of a fish. Mankind are so apt, from a natural depravity, that 'flesh is heir to,' in their use of words, to pervert them from their original sense, that it is not a convincing argument against the present conjecture our using the word curse in vulgar language in lieu of damn." The N.E.D. disposes of the matter: "The suggestion is ingenious, but has no basis in fact." In a letter to Mr. Ellis, Macaulay writes: "How they settle the matter I care not, as the Duke says, one twopenny damn!" and Sir G. Trevelyan notes: "It was the Duke of Wellington who invented this oath, so disproportioned to the greatness of its author." (Life, ed. 1876, ii. 257.)

1692.—'The revenue of all the territories under the Emperors of Delhi amounts, according to the Royal registers, to 6 arb and 80 kros of damas. One arb is equal to 100 kros (a kros being 10,000,000), and a hundred kros of damas are equal to 2 kros and 50 lacs of rupees."—Muhammad Shairf Haniy, in Elliot, vii. 138.

C. 1840.—"Charles Greville saw the Duke soon after, and expressing the pleasure he had felt in reading his speech (commanding the conduct of Capt. Charles Elliot in China), added that, however, many of the party were angry with it; to which the Duke replied,—'I know they are, and I don't care a damn. I have no time to do what is right.'

"A twopenny damn was, I believe, the form usually employed by the Duke, as an expression of value: but on the present occasion he seems to have been less precise."—Autobiography of Sir Henry Taylor, i. 296. The term referred to seems curiously to preserve an unconscious tradition of the pecuniary, or what the idiotic jargon of our time calls the 'monetary,' estimation contained in the expression.

1881.—"A Bavarian printer, jealous of the influence of capital, said that 'Cladstone baid millions of money to the beeble to fote for him, and Beegonsfeel would not bey them a tam, so they fote for Cladstone.'—A Socialistic Picnic, in St. James's Gazette, July 6.

[1900.—"There is not, I dare wager, a single bishop who cares one 'twopenny-halfpenny dime' for any of that plenteousness for himself."—R. Bell, Vicar of Muncaster, in Times, Aug. 31.]

DAMAN, n.p. Damān, one of the old settlements of the Portuguese which they still retain, on the coast of Guzerat, about 100 miles north of Bombay; written by them Damādo.

1554.—"... the pilots said: 'We are here between Diu and Damān; if the ship sinks here, not a soul will escape; we must make sail for the shore.'"—Sid's Ali, 80.

[1607-8.—"Then that by no means or ships or men can goe saffellie to Suratt, or theare expect any quiett for the many dangers likele to happen vnto them by the Portugalls Chief Comanders of Dīu and Damān and places there aboute. ..."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 247.]

1623.—"Il capitano ... sperava che potessimo esser vicini alla città di Damān; quai etta dentro il golfo di Cambaia a man destra. ..."—P. della Valle, ii. 499 [Hak. Soc. i. 15.]

DAMANI. s. Applied to a kind of squall. (See ELEPHANTA.)

DAMMER. s. This word is applied to various resins in different parts of India, chiefly as substitutes for pitch. The word appears to be Malay-Javanese damar, used generically for resins, a class of substances the origin of which is probably often uncertain. [Mr. Skeat notes that the Malay damar means resin and a torch made of resin, the latter consisting of a regular cylin-suitable material, filled to the top with resin and ignited.] To one of the dammer-producing trees in the Archipelago the name Dammara alba, Rumph. (N. O. Coniferae), has been given, and this furnishes the 'East India Dammer' of English varnish-makers. In Burma the dammer used is derived from at least three different genera of the N. O. Depleroocarpacea; in Bengal it is derived from the sal tree (see Baul-Wood) (Shorea robusta) and other Shorees, as well as by importation from transmarine sources. In S. India "white dammer," "Dammer Pitch," or Piney resin, is the produce of Vateria indica, and "black dammer" of Canarium strictum; in Cutch the dammer used is stated by Liet. Leech (Bombay Selections, No. xv. p. 215-216) to be made from chandrass (or chandras = copal) boiled with an equal quantity of oil. This is probably Fryer's 'resin taken out of the sea' (infra). [On the other hand Mr. Pringle (Diary, &c., Fort St. George, i. 1st ser. iv. 178) quotes Crawfurd (Malay Archip. i. 465) : (Dammer) "exudes through the bark, and is either found adhering to the trunk and branches in large lumps, or in masses on the ground, under the trees. As these often grow near the seashore or on banks of rivers, the damar is frequently floated away and collected at different places as drift"; and adds: "The dammer used for caulking the masula boats at Madras when Fryer was there, may have been, and probably was, imported from the Archipelago, and the fact that the resin was largely collected as drift may have been mentioned in answer to his enquiries." Some of the Malay dammer also seems, from Major M'Nair's statement, to be, like copal, fossil. [On this Mr. Skeat says: "It is true that it is sometimes dug up out of the ground, possibly because it may form on the roots of certain trees, or because a great mass of it will fall and partially bury itself in the ground by its own weight, but I have never heard of its being found actually fossilised, and I should question the fact seriously."]

The word is sometimes used in India [and by the Malays, see above] for a torch, because torches are formed of rags dipped in it. This is perhaps the use which accounts for Haex's explanation below.

1584. — "Dammar (for dammar) from Siacoa and Billiton" (i.e. Siak and Billiton). —Barret, in Hali. ii. 43.

1631. — In Haex's Malay Vocabulary: "Dammr, Lumen quod accenditur."

1673. — "The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers as ours are, the bended Planks are sowded together with Rope-yarn of the Cooce, and caulked with Dammar (a sort of Rosin taken out of the sea)." —Fryer, 37.

"The long continued Current from the Inland Parts (at Surat) through the vast Wildernesses of huge Woods and Forests, wafts great Rafts of Timber for Shipping and Building: and Dammar for Pitch, the finest sented Bitumen (if it be not a gum or Rosin) I ever met with." —Ibid. 121.

1727. — "Damar, a gum that is used for making Pitch and Tar for the use of Shipping." —A. Hamilton, ii. 73; [ed. 1744, ii. 72].

1755. — "A Dammar-Boy (Torch-boy)." —Ibid. 50.

1835. — "This dammar, which is the general Malayan name for resin, is dug out of the forests by the Malays, and seems to be the fossilised juices of former growth of jungle." —McNair, Peruk, &c., 188.

1885. — "The other great industry of the place (in Sumatra) is dammar collecting. This substance, as is well known, is the resin which exudes from notches made in various species of coniferous and diptereocarpous trees; ... out of whose stem, or the native cuts large notches up to a height of 40 or 50 feet from the ground. The tree is then left for 3 or 4 months when, if it be a very healthy one, sufficient dammar will have exuded to make it worth while collecting; the yield may then be as much as 94 Amsterdam pounds." —H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 138.

DANA, s. H. dama, literally 'grain,' and therefore the exact translation of gram in its original sense (q.v.). It is often used in Bengal as synonymous with gram, thus: "Give the horse his dama." We find it also in this specific way by an old traveller:

1616. — "A kind of grain called Donna, somewhat like our Pease, which they Boyle, and when it is cold give them mingled with course Sugar, and twice or thrice in the Weeke, Butter to secure their Bodies." —Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

DANCING-GIRL, s. This, or among the older Anglo-Indians, Dancing-Wench, was the representative of the (Portuguese Baileadeira) Bayadère, or Naughty-girl (q.v.), also Ounchune. In S. India dancing-girls are all Hindus, [and known as Devadasi or Bhogam-dasi:] in N. India they are both Hindu, called Rāmjani (see RUM-JOHNNY), and Mussulman, called Kaniche (see CUNCHUNEE). In Dutch the phrase takes a very plain-spoken form, see quotation from Valentinij; others are equally explicit, e.g. Sir T. Roe (Hak. Soc. i. 146) and P. della Valle, ii. 282.]

1608.—See description by Gouver, t. 39.

1673.—“After supper they treated us with the Dancing Wenchens, and good soops of Brandy and Delf Beer, till it was late enough.”—Fryer, 152.

1701.—“The Governor conducted the Nabob into the Consultation Room ... after dinner they were diverted with the Dancing Wenchens.”—In Wheeler, i. 377.

1726.—“Wat de dans-Hoeren (anders Devatazchi (Deva-diat) ... geneesd, en an de Goden hunner Pagoden als getrouwd) belanged.”—Valentinij, Chor. 54.

1763-78.—“Mandelsow tells a story of a Nabob who cut off the heads of a set of dancing girls ... because they did not come to his palace on the first summons.”—Orme, i. 28 (ed. 1803).

1789.—“... dancing girls who display amazing agility and grace in all their motions.”—Maruo, Narrative, 73.

c. 1812.—“I often sat by the open window, and there, after night, I used to hear the songs of the unhappy dancing girls, accompanied by the sweet yet melancholy music of the cithira.”—Mrs. Sherwood’s Autobiog. 423.

[1813.—Forbes gives an account of the two classes of dancing girls, those who sing and dance in private houses, and those attached to temples.—Or. Mem. 2nd ed i. 61.

1815.—“Dancing girls were once numerous in Persia; and the first poets of that country have celebrated the beauty of their persons and the melody of their voices.”—Malcolm, H. of Persia, ii. 587.

1888.—“The Maharajah sent us in the evening a new set of dancing girls, as they were called, though they turned out to be twelve of the ugliest old women I ever saw.”—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, 154.

1848.—“We decorated the Temples of the false gods. We provided the dancing girls. We gilded and painted the images to which our ignorant subjects bowed down.”—Macaulay’s Speech on the Somnath Proclamation.

DANDY, s.

(a). A boatman. The term is peculiar to the Gangetic rivers. H. and Beng. dándi, from dánd or dand, ‘a staff, an oar.’

1885.—“Our Dankees (or boatmen) boiled their rice, and we supped here.”—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 176].

1863.—“The oppressions of your officers were carried to such a length that they put a stop to all business, and plundered and seized the Dandies and Mangies” [see MANJEE] vessel.”—W. Hastings to the Nawab, in Long, 347.

1869.—“Two naked dandyas paddling at the head of the vessel.”—Ed. Valentia, i. 67.

1874.—“I am indeed often surprised to observe the difference between my dandees (who are nearly the colour of a black teapot) and the generality of the peasants whom we meet.”—Bp. Heber, i. 149 (ed. 1844).

(b). A kind of ascetic who carries a staff. Same etymology. See Soleyms, who gives a plate of such an one.

[1828.—“... the Dandi is distinguished by carrying a small Dand, or wand, with several processes or projections from it, and a piece of cloth dyed with red ochre, in which the Brahmanical cord is supposed to be enshrined, attached to it.”—H. H. Wilson, Sketch of the Religious Sects of the Hindus, ed. 1861, i. 193.]

(c). H. same spelling, and same etymology. A kind of vehicle used in the Himalayas, consisting of a strong cloth slung like a hammock to a bamboo staff, and carried by two (or more) men. The traveller can either sit sideways, or lie on his back. It is much the same as the Malabar muncheel (q.v.), [and P. della Valle describes a similar vehicle which he says the Portuguese call Rete (Hak. Soc. i. 183)].

1875.—“The nearest approach to travelling in a dandi I can think of, is sitting in a half-reefed top-sail in a storm, with the head and shoulders above the yard.”—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 103.

1876.—“In the lower hills when she did not walk she travelled in a dandy.”—Kinloch, Large Game Shooting in Thibet, 2nd S., p. vii.

DANGUR, n.p. H. Dhngar, the name by which members of various tribes of Chättí Nágã, but especially of the Orção, are generally known when they go out to distant provinces to seek employment as labourers (“coolies”). A very large proportion of those who emigrate to the tea-plantations of E. India, and also to Mauritius and other colonies, belong to the Orção tribe. The etymology of the term Dhngar is doubtful. The late Gen. Dalton says: “It is a word that from its apparent derivation (dang or dhng, ‘a hill’) may mean any hillman; but amongst several tribes of the Southern tributary Mahals, the terms Dhangar and Dhangarin mean the youth of the two sexes, both in highland and lowland villages, and it cannot be considered the national designation of any particular tribe" (Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal, 245) [and see Risley, Tribes and Castes, i. 219].

DARCHEENEE, s. P. dår-chini, "China-stick," i.e. cinnamon.

1563. — "... The people of Ormus, because this bark was brought for sale there by those who had come from China, called it dår-chini, which in Persian means "wood of China," and so they sold it in Alexandria. . . ."—Garcia, f. 59-60.

1621. — "As for cinnamon which you wrote was called by the Arabs darzandai, I assure you that the dar-siti, as the Arabs say, or dar-chini as the Persians and Turks call it, is nothing but our ordinary cassula." —P. della Valle, ii. 300-1.

DARJEELING, DARBILING, n.p. A famous sanitarium in the Eastern Himalaya, the cession of which was purchased from the Raja of Sikkim in 1835; a tract largely added to by annexation in 1849, following on an outrage committed by the Sikkim Minister in imprisoning Dr. (afterwards Sir) Joseph Hooker and the late Dr. A. Campbell, Superintendent of Darjeeling. The sanitarium stands at 6500 to 7500 feet above the sea. The popular Tibetan spelling of the name is, according to Jaeschke, tDar-je-glin, 'Land of the Dorje,' i.e. 'of the Adamant or thunderbolt,' the ritual sceptre of the Lamas. But 'according to several titles of books in the Petersburg list of MSS. it ought properly to be spelt Dar-rgyas-glin' (Tib. Enc. Dict. p. 287).

DAROGA, s. P. and H. ddrogh. This word seems to be originally Mongol (see Kovalewsky's Dict. No. 1672). In any case it is one of those terms brought by the Mongol hosts from the far East. In their nomenclature it was applied to a Governor of a province or city, and in this sense it continued to be used under Timur and his immediate successors. But it is the tendency of official titles, as of denominations of coin, to descend in value; and that of ddroghil has in later days been bestowed on a variety of humbler persons. Wilson defines the word thus: "The chief native officer in various departments under the native government, a superintendent, a manager: but in later times he is especially the head of a police, customs, or excise station." Under the British Police system, from 1793 to 1862-63, the Darogha was a local Chief of Police, or Head Constable, [and this is still the popular title in the N.W.P. for the officer in charge of a Police Station.] The word occurs in the sense of a Governor in a Mongol inscription, of the year 1314, found in the Chinese Province of Shensi, which is given by Pauthier in his Marc. Pol., p. 773. The Mongol Governor of Moscow, during a part of the Tartar domination in Russia, is called in the old Russian Chronicles Doroga (see Hammer, Golden Horde, 384). And according to the same writer the word appears in a Byzantine writer (unnamed) as άρνγλας (bid. 238-9). The Byzantine form and the passages below of 1404 and 1665 seem to imply some former variation in pronunciation. But Clavijo has also desroga in § clii.

c. 1220.—"Tuli Khan named as Daragha at Merv one called Barmas, and himself marched upon Nishapur."—Abulghazi, by Desmaisons, 135.

1404.—"And in this city (Tauria) there was a kinsman of the Emperor as Magistrate thereof, whom they call Daroga, and he treated the said Ambassador with much respect."—Clavijo, § lixiti. Comp. Markham, 90.

1441. — "... I reached the city of Kerman. . . . The darogha (governor) the Emir Hadji Mohamed Kaiseschari, being then absent. . . ."—Abdurasset, in India in the Xvth Cent., p. 5.

c. 1590. — "The officers and servants attached to the Imperial Stables. 1. The Ategi. . . . 2. The Darogha. There is one appointed for each stable."—Ab, t. Rieckhaus, i. 137.

1621.—"The 10th of October, the daroga, or Governor of Isphahan, Mir Abduszaizin, the King's son-in-law, who, as was afterwards seen in that charge of his, was a downright madman. . . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 166.

1665.—"There stands a Daroga, upon each side of the River, who will not suffer any person to pass without leave."—Tavernier, E.T., ii. 52; [ed. Bull, i. 117]

1673.—"The Droger, or Mayor of the City, or Captain of the Watch, or the Rounds; it is his duty to preside with the Main Guard a nightes before the Palace-gates."—Fryer, 339.
1673.—"The Droger being Master of his Science, persists; what comfort can I reap from your Disturbance!"—Fryer, 389.

1682.—"I received a letter from Mr. Hill at Rajesmaul advising ye Droga of ye Mint would not obey a Copy, but required at least a sight of ye Original."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 57].

c. 1781.—"About this time, however, one day being very angry, the Darogha, or master of the mint, presented himself, and asked the Nawaub what device he would have struck on his new copper coinage. Hydur, in a violent passion, told him to stamp an obscene figure on it."—Hydur Nait, tr. by Miles, 488.

1812.—"Each division is guarded by a Darogha, with an establishment of armed men."—Fifth Report, 44.

DATCHIN.

s. This word is used in old books of Travel and Trade for a steelyard employed in China and the Archipelago. It is given by Leyden as a Malay word for ‘balance,’ in his Comp. Vocab. of Barma, Malay and Thas, Serampore, 1810. It is also given by Crawfurd as dachin, a Malay word from the Javanese. There seems to be no doubt that in Peking dialect ch'eng is ‘to weigh,’ and also ‘steelyard;’ that in Amoy a small steelyard is called ch'ìn; and that in Canton dialect the steelyard is called t'ouk-ch'ing. Some of the Dictionaries also give ta 'chêng,' ‘large steelyard.’ Datchin or dotchin may therefore possibly be a Chinese term; but considering how seldom traders’ words are really Chinese, and how easily the Chinese monosyllables lend themselves to plausible combinations, it remains probable that the Canton word was adopted from foreigners. It has sometimes occurred to us that it might have been adopted from Achin (d'Achin); see the first quotation. [The N.E.D., following Prof. Giles, gives it as a corruption of the Cantonese name taok-ch'ing (in Court dialect ta-ch'ing) from toh ‘to measure,’ ch'ing, ‘to weigh.’ Mr. Skeat notes: "The standard Malay is daching, the Javanese dachin (v. Kinkert, s.v.). He gives the word as of Chinese origin, and the probability is that the English word is from the Malay, which in its turn was borrowed from the Chinese. The final suggestion, d' Achin, seems out of the question."] Favre's Malay Dict. gives (in French) "daring (Ch. pa-tchen), steelyard, balance," also "ber-daring, to weigh," and Javan. "darius, a weight of 100 kätia." Gericke's Javan. Dict. also gives "datain-Picol," with a reference to Chinese. [With reference to Crawford's statement quoted above, Mr. Pringle (Diary, Ft. St. George, 1st ser. iv. 179) notes that Crawford had elsewhere adopted the view that the yard and the designation of it originated in China and passed from thence to the Archipelago (Malay Archip. i. 275). On the whole, the Chinese origin seems most probable.]

1554.—At Maiacca. "The bar of the great Dachem contains 200 cates, each cate weighing two arratels, 4 ounces 6 eighteens, 15 grains, 3 tenths. . . . The Bar of the little Dachem contains 200 cates; each cate weighing two arratels."—A. Nunes, 38.

[1684-5.—". . . he replied That he was now Content yt ye Honble Company should solely enjoy ye Custome of ye Place on condition yt ye People of ye Place be free from all dutys & Custumes and yt ye Profit of ye Dutchin be his. . . ."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 12.]

1696.—"For their Dotchin and Ballance they use that of Japan."—Bowyer's Journal at Cochín-China, in Dalrymple, O. R. i. 88.

1711.—"Never weigh your Silver by their Dotchins, for they have usually two Pair, one to receive, the other to pay by."—Lockyer, 113.

"In the Dotchins, an expert Weigher will cheat two or three per cent. by placing or shaking the Weight, and minding the Motion of the Pole only."—Ibid. 115.

". . . every one has a Chopchia and Dotchin to cut and weigh Silver."—Ibid. 141.

1748.—"These scales are made after the manner of the Roman balance, or our English Ruillery, called by the Chinese Litang, and by us Dotchin."—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748, &c., London, 1762, p. 324. The same book has, in a short vocabulary, at p. 265, "English scales or dodgeons . . . Chinese Litang."

s. This Latin-like name is really Skt. dāttārā, and so has passed into the derived vernaculars. The widely-spread Datura Stramonium, or Thorn-apple, is well known over Europe, but is not regarded as indigenous to India; though it appears to be wild in the Himalaya from Kashmir to Sikkim. The Indian species, from which our generic name has been borrowed, is Datura alba, Nees (see Hanbury and Flickeger, 415) (D. fastuosa, L.). Garcia de Orta mentions the common use of this by thieves in India. Its effect on the victim was to produce temporary alienation of mind, and violent laughter, permitting the thief to act unopposed. He describes his own practice in dealing with such cases, which he had always found successful. Datura was also often given as a practical joke, whence the Portuguese called it Burdadora ('Joker'). De Orta strongly disapproves of such pranks. The criminal use of datura by a class of Thugs is rife in our own time. One of the present writers has judicially convicted many. Coiles returning with fortunes from the colonies often become the victims of such crimes. [See details in Chevers, Ind. Med. Jour. 179 seqq.]

1598.—"Maid servant. A black woman of the house has been giving datura to my mistress; she stole the keys, and the jewels that my mistress had on her neck and in her jewel box, and has made off with a black man. It would be a kindness to come to her help."—Garcia, Colloquios, f. 83.

1578.—"They call this plant in the Malabar tongue wamata caya [wamata-kaya] . . . in Canarese Datiyro . . ."—Acosta, 87.

c. 1580.—"Nascitur et . . . Datura Indorum, quorum ex seminibus Latrones bellaria parant, quae in caravans mercatoribus exhibentes largumque somnum, profundumque inducentes aurum gemmasque surripuit et abuent."—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. I. 190-1.

1586.—"They name [have] likewise an herb called Deutros, which beareth a seede, whereof bruising out the sap, they put it into a cup, or other vessel, and give it to their husbands, eyther in meate or drinks, and presently therewith the Man is as though hee were Liff out of his wits."—Linschoten, 60; [Hak. Soc. i. 209].

1606-10.—"Mais ainsi de mesme les femmes quand elles sçavent que leurs maris en entretiennement quelqu'autre, elles s'en desfont par poison ou autrement, et se servent fort à cela de la semence de Datura, qui est d'une estrange vertu. Ce Datura ou Dutros, espèces de Stramonium, est une plante grande et haute qui porte des fleurs blanches en Campane, comme le Gimmepelo, mais plus grande."—Mocquet, Voyages, 312.

[1610.—"In other parts of the Indies it is called Dutros."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 114.]

[1621.—"Garcias ab Horto . . . makes mention of an herb called Datura, which, if it be eaten, for 24 hours following, takes away all sense of grief, makes them incline to laughter and mirth."—Burton, Anatomy of Mfr., Pt. 2, Soc. 5 Mem. I. Subs. 5.]

1678.—"Dutry, the deadliest sort of Solarium (Solanus) or Nightshade."—Fryer, 82.

1678.—"Make lechers and their punks with dewtry Commit fantastical advowtry."

Hudibras, Pt. iii. Canto 1.

1690.—"And many of them (the Moors) take the liberty of mixing Dutry and Water together to drink . . . which will intoxicate almost to Madness."—Ovington, 236.

1810.—"The dutry that grows in every part of India."—Williams, V. M. ii. 155.

1874.—"Datura. This plant, a native of the East Indies, and of Abyssinia, more than a century ago had spread as a naturalized plant through every country in Europe except Sweden, Lapland, and Norway, through the aid of gipsy quacks, who used the seed as anti-spasmodylic, or for more questionable purposes."—R. Brown in Geog. Magazine, i. 371. Note.—The statements derived from Hanbury and Flitciger in the beginning of this article disagree with this view, both as to the origin of the European Datura and the identity of the Indian plant. The doubts about the birthplace of the various species of the genus remain in fact undetermined. [See the discussion in Wirt, Econ. Dict. iii. 29 seqq.]

Datura, Yellow, and Yellow Thistle. These are Bombay names for the Argemone mexicana, fico del inferno of Spaniards, introduced accidentally from America, and now an abundant and pestilent weed all over India.

Dawk, s. H. and Mahr. dak; 'Post,' i.e. properly transport by relays of men and horses, and thence 'the mail' or letter-post, as well as any arrangement for travelling, or for transmitting articles by such relays. The institution was no doubt imitated from the barid, or post, established throughout the empire of the Caliphs and the securing of accurate intelligence from the court on one side and the army on the other was a great public benefit."—Zia-uddin Barani, in Elliot, iii. 208.

1310.—"It was the practice of the Sultan (Ala-ud-din) when he sent an army on an expedition to establish posts on the road, wherever posts could be maintained. . . . At every half or quarter kos runners were posted . . . the securing of accurate intelligence from the court on one side and the army on the other was a great public benefit."—Zia-uddin Barani, in Elliot, iii. 208.

c. 1340.—"The foot-post (in India) is thus arranged: every mile is divided into three equal intervals which are called Dawah, which is as much as to say 'the third part of a mile' (the mile itself being called in India Korah). At every third of a mile there is a village well inhabited, outside of which are three tents where men are seated ready to start. ..."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 95.

c. 1840.—"So he wrote to the Sultan to announce our arrival, and sent his letter by the dāwak, which is the foot post, as we have told you. ..."—Ibid. 145.

"At every mile (i.e. Korsa or less) from Delhi to Deulatabad there are three dāwāk or posts."—Ibid. 191-2. It seems probable that this dāwāk is some misunderstanding of dāk.

"There are established, between the capital and the chief cities of the different territories, places at certain distances from each other, which are like the post-relays in Egypt and Syria ... but the distance between them is not more than four bowshouts or even less. At each of these posts ten swift runners are stationed ... as soon as one of these men receives a letter he runs off as rapidly as possible. ... At each of these post stations there are mowahēs, where prayers are said, and where the traveller can find shelter, reservoirs full of good water, and markets ... so that there is very little necessity for carrying water, or food, or tents."—Shahabadia Dimishk, in Elliot, iii. 581.

1528.—"... that every ten kas he should erect a yam, or post-house, which they call a dāk-choki, for six horses. ..."—Baber, 383.

c. 1612.—"He (Akbar) established posts throughout his dominions, having two horses and a set of footmen stationed at every five kas. The Indians call this establishment 'Dāk chowky.'"—Birrak, by Briggs, ii. 280-1.

1657.—"But when the intelligence of his (Dara-Shekoh's) officious meddling had spread abroad through the provinces by the dāk khavki. ..."—Khaft Khan, in Elliot, vi. 214.

1727.—"The Post in the Mogul's Dominions goes very swift, for at every Caravan-serai, which are built on the High-roads, about ten miles distant from one another, Men, very swift of Foot, are kept ready. ... And these Curriers are called Dog Chowkies."—A. Hamilton, i. 149; [ed. 1744, i. 150].

1771.—"I wrote to the Governor for permission to visit Calcutta by the Dawk. ..."—Letter in the Inquiries of a Nabob, &c., 76.

1781.—"I mean the absurd, unfair, irregular and dangerous Mode, of suffering People to paw over their Neighbours' Letters at the Door. ..."—Letter in Hicky's Bengal Gazette, Mar. 24.

1796.—"The Honble. the Governor-General in Council has been pleased to order the re-establishment of Dawk Bearers upon the new road from Calcutta to Benares and Patna. ... The following are the rates fixed. ..."—From Calcutta to Benares. ... Sissa Rupees 500."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 185.

1809.—"He advised me to proceed immediately by Dawk. ..."—Ed. Valentia, i. 62.

1824.—"The dāk or post carrier having passed me on the preceding day, I dropped a letter into his leathern bag, requesting a friend to send his horse on for me."—Selig, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iv. A letter so sent by the post-runner, in the absence of any receiving office, was said to go "by outside dawk."

1843.—"Jam: You have received the money of the British for taking charge of the dawk; you have betrayed your trust, and stopped the dawk. ... If you come in and make your salām, and promise fidelity to the British Government, I will restore to you your lands ... and the superintendence of the dawks. If you refuse I will wait till the hot weather has gone past, and then I will carry fire and sword into your territory ... and if I catch you, I will hang you as a rebel."—Sir C. Napier to the Jam of the Jokees (in Life of Dr. J. Wilson, P. 440).

1875.—"... the true reason being, Mr. Barton declared, that he was too stingy to pay her dawk."—The True Reformer, i. 68.

DAWK, s. Name of a tree. See DHAWE.

DAWK, To lay a, v. To cause relays of bearers, or horses, to be posted on a road. As regards palankin bearers this used to be done either through the post-office, or through local chowdries (q.v.) of bearers. During the mutiny of 1857-58, when several young surgeons had arrived in India, whose services were urgently wanted at the front, it is said that the Head of the Department to which they had reported themselves, directed them immediately to 'lay a dawk.' One of them turned back from the door, saying: 'Would you explain, Sir; for you might just as well tell me to lay an egg!'

DAWK BUNGALOW. See under BUNGALOW.

DAYE, DHYE, s. A wet-nurse; used in Bengal and N. India, where this is the sense now attached to the word. Hind. dāy, Skt. ddtriakā; conf. Pers. dāyah, a nurse, a midwife. The word also in the earlier English Regulations is applied, Wilson states, to "a female commissioner employed to interrogate and swear native women of condition, who could not appear to give evidence in a Court."

1578.—"The whole plant is commonly known and used by the Dayas, or as we call them comadres" ("gossips", midwives).—Acosta, Fratkadæ, 282.

1782.—In a Table of monthly Wages at Calcutta, where the Prakrit form of Skt. daksinapatha ("Southern region", whence the Greek form in our first quotation), and daksinatya ("Southern", qualifying some word for "country"). So, in the Panvchatantra: "There is in the Southern region (daksinatya janapada) a town called Mihilâropya.

6150.—"But immediately after Barygaza the adjoining continent extends from the North to the South, wherefore the region is called Dachinabadês (Adyavâdha), for the South is called in their tongue Dachanaos (Adyavos)."—Perpûtus M. E., Geog. Gr. Min. i. 254.

1510.—"In the said city of Decan there reigns a King, who is a Mahomedan."—Ibid. Hak. Soc. i. 192. [Here the term is applied to the city and kingdom of Bijapur].

1517.—"On coming out of this Kingdom of Guzerat and Cambay towards the South, and the inner parts of India, is the Kingdom of Decan, which the Indians call Decan."—Barboza, 69.

1552.—"Of Deccan or Daqué as we now call it."—Castanheda, ii. 50.

1608.—"For the Portugalos of Daman had wrought with an ancient friend of theirs a Raga, who was absolute Lord of a Province (betweene Damas, Guzerat, and Decan) called Cruylly, to be readie with 200 Horsesmen to stay my passage."—Capt. W. Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 209.

1612.—"The Deccana, a people bordering on them (Portuguese) have besieged six of their port towns."—Davies, Letters, i. 258.

1516.—"... his son Sultan Coron, who he designed, should command in Deccan."—Sir T. Roe.

[. . . ] THERE IS A RESOLUTION TAKEN THAT SULTAN CARONNE SHALL GO TO THE DECCAN WARRIES."—Ibid. Hak. Soc. i. 192.

1623.—"A Moor of Decan."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 225.

1667.—"But such as at this day, to Indians known, In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms."—Paradise Lost, ix. [1102-3].

1726.—"Decan [as a division] includes Decan, Cunkum, and Balagatta."—Valentijn, v. 1.
DECCAN.

DECCANY. adj., also used as subst. Properly dakhnî, dakkhînî, dakhnî. Coming from the Deccan. A (Mohammedan) inhabitant of the Deccan. Also the very peculiar dialect of Hindustani spoken by such people.

1516.—"The Deccan language, which is the natural language of the country."—Barbour, 77.

1572.—"... and the Deccans... (butea superba) are very conspicuous."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd. ed. i. 185.

1861.—"Ah, I rode a Deccanees charger, with a saddle-cloth gold laced, And a Persian sword, and a twelve-foot spear, and a pistol at my waist."—Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

DECK, s. A look, a peep. Imp. of Hind. dekh-nd, 'to look.'

1854.—"... these formed the whole assembly, with the occasional exception of some officer, stopping as he passed by; returning from his morning ride 'just to have a dekh at the steamer.'"—W. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 85.

DEEN, s. Ar. Hind. din, 'the faith.' The cry of excited Mohammedans, Din, Din!

1764.—"When our sepoys observed the enemy they gave them a ding or huzza."—Carraccioli, Life of Clive i. 57.

DELI, n.p. The famous capital of the great Moghuls, in the latter years of that family; and the seat under various names of many preceding dynasties, going back into ages of which we have no distinct record. Dilli is, according to Cunningham, the old Hindu form of the name; Dilî is that used by Mahommedans. According to Panjab Notes and Queries (i. 117 seq.), Dilapat is traditionally the name of the Dilli of Prithví Ráj. Dil is an old Hindi word for an eminence; and this is probably the etymology of Dilapat and Dilli. The second quotation from Correa curiously illustrates the looseness of his geography. [The name has become unpleasantly familiar in connection with the so-called 'Delli boiler,' a form of Oriental sore, similar to Biskra Button, Aleppo Evil, Lahore or Multan Sore (see Delhi Gazetteer, 15, note.).]

1205.—(Muhammad Ghorî marched "towards Delli (may God preserve its prosperity, and perpetuate its splendour!), which is among the chief (mother) cities of Hind."—Hasan Nizâmi, in Elliot, ii. 216.

1830.—"Dilli... a certain traveller relates that the brick-built walls of this great city are loftier than the walls of Hamath; it stands in a plain on a soil of mingled stones and sand. At the distance of a parasang runs a great river, not so big, however, as Euphrates."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 189 seq.

1875.—The Carta Catalana of the French Library shows ciutat de Dilli and also Lo Rey Dilli, with this rubric below it: "Ari esta un soldat gran e podaros molt rich. Aquest soldat ha uoc orifans e o militia homens a cavall sot to seu imperi. Ha encara pacons sen nombre. . . ."

1459.—Fra Mauro's great map at Venice shows Delhi cittade grandissima, and the rubrick Questa cittade nobilissima et dominatulo et pas de deli over India Prima.

1516.—"This king of Dely confines with Tatars, and has taken many lands from the King of Cambay; and from the King of DELING. 303  DELLY, MOUNT.

DELLING, his m-ta and captab with many of the people, took much, and afterwards in time they revolted, and set themselves up as kings."—Barbeau, p. 100.

1583.—"And this kingdom to which the Badur proceeded was called the Dely; it was very great, but it was all disturbed by wars and the risings of one party against another, because the King was dead, and the sons were fighting with each other for the sovereignty."—Correa, iii. 506.

"This Kingdom of Dely is the greatest that is to be seen in those parts, for one point that it holds is in Persia, and the other is in contact with the Loochoos (os Leguins) beyond China."—Ibid. iii. 572.

c. 1568.—"About sixteen years past this King (of Cuttack), with his Kingdom, were destroyed by the King of Patn-tane, which was also King of the greatest part of Bengal . . . but this tyrant enjoyed his Kingdom but a small time, but was conquered by another tyrant, which was the great Mogul King of Agra, Delly, and of all Cambayas."—Caesar Frederick in Hakt. ii. 352.

1611.—"On the left hand is seen the car-kase of old Dely, called the nine castles and fifteen-two gates, now inhabited only by Goggers . . . The city is 2d between Gate and Gate, begirt with a strong wall, but much ruinous. . . ."—W. Finch, in Purkhas, i. 480.

DELLING, a. This was a kind of hammock conveyance, suspended from a pole, mentioned by the old travellers in Pegu. The word is not known to Burmese scholars, and it is perhaps a Persian word. Meninski gives "deleng, adj. pendulus, suspenus." The thing seems to be the Malayalam Manchil. (See MUNCHHEL and DANDY.)

1569.—"Carried in a closet which they call Deling, in the which a man shall be very well accommodated, with cushions under his head."—Caesar Frederick, in Hakt. ii. 357.

1585.—"This Delingo is a strong cotton cloth doubled, . . . as big as an ordinary rug, and having an iron at each end to attach it by, so that in the middle it hangs like a pouch or purse. These iron are attached to a very thick cane, and this is borne by four men . . . When you go on a journey, a cushion is put at the head of this Delingo, and you get in, and lay your head on the cushion," &c.—Gaspavo Balbi, f. 99b.

1587.—"From Girion we went to Macao, which is a pretty townes, where we left our boats and Pares, and in the morning taking Delinggeses, which are a kind of Coches made of cords and cloth quilted, and carried vpon a stang between 3 and 4 men: we came to Pegu the same day."—R. Fitch, in Hakt. ii. 391.

DELLY, MOUNT, n.p. Port. Monte D'Eli. A mountain on the Malabar coast which forms a remarkable object from seaward, and the name of which occurs sometimes as applied to a State or City adjoining the mountain. It is prominently mentioned in all the old books on India, though strange to say the Map of India in Keith Johnstone's Royal Atlas has neither name nor indication of this famous hill. [It is shown in Constable's Hand Atlas.] It was, according to Correa, the first Indian land seen by Vasco da Gama. The name is Malayal. Eli mala, 'High Mountain.' Several erroneous explanations have however been given. A common one is that it means 'Seven Hills.' This arose with the compiler of the local Skt. Mahatmya or legend, who rendered the name Saptapala, 'Seven Hills,' confounding elli with elli, 'seven,' which has no application. "Again we shall find it explained as 'Rat-hill'; but here elli is substituted for elli. [The Madras Gloss. gives the word as Mal. eschimala, and explains it as 'Rat-hill,' "because infected by rats."] The position of the town and port of Ely or Hili mentioned by the older travellers is a little doubtful, but see Marco Polo, notes to Bk. III. ch. xxiv. The Ely-Masde of the Peutingerian Tables is not unlikely to be an indication of Ely.

1298.—"Eli is a Kingdom towards the west, about 800 miles from Comari. . . . There is no proper harbour in the country, but there are many rivers with good estuaries, wide and deep."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 24.

c. 1380.—"Three days journey beyond this city (Manjarir, i.e. Mangalore) there is a great hill which projects into the sea, and is desird by travellers from afar, the promontory called Hill."—AbuFeda, in Gil- demeister, 185.

c. 1343.—"At the end of that time we set off for Hill, where we arrived two days later. It is a large well-built town on a great bay (or estuary) which big ships enter."— Ibn Batuta, iv. 51.

c. 1440.—"Proceeding onwards he . . . arrived at two cities situated on the sea shore, one named Pacamuria, and the other Kelly."—Nicolo Conti, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 6.

1516.—"After passing this place along the coast is the Mountain Dely, on the edge of the sea; it is a round mountain, very lofty, in the midst of low land; all the ships of the Moors and the Gentiles . . .
sight this mountain... and make their reckoning by it."—Barbosa, 149.

c. 1562.—"... In twenty days they got sight of land, which the pilots foretold before that they saw it, this was a great mountain which is on the coast of India, in the Kingdom of Cannar, which the people of the country in their language call the mountain Deily, city meaning 'the rat,' and they call it Mount Deily, because in this mountain there are so many rats that they could never make a village there."—Correa, Three Voyages, &c., Hak. Soc. 145.

1579.—"... Malik Ben Habeeb... proceeded first to Quilon... and after erecting a mosque in that town and settling his wife there, he himself journeyed on to [Hill Marawi]..."—Rowlandson's Tr. of Toluf-ul-Mujahidin, p. 54. (Here and elsewhere in this ill-edited book Hilt Marawt is read and printed Hubbae Mawrote).

[1623.]-... a high Hill, inland near the seashore, call'd Monte Dell."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 355.

1688.—"... Sur le midy nous passames à la veille de Monte-Loune, qui est une haute montagne dont les Malabares descourent de loin les vaisseaux, qu'ils peussent attaqueer avec advantage."—Mandella, 275.

1727.—"... And three leagues south from Mount Dolly is a spacious deep River called Balliapakin, where the English Company had once a Factory for Pepper."—A. Hamilton, i. 291; [ed. 1744, ii. 293].

1759.—"... We are further to remark that the late troubles at Telliccherry, which proved almost fatal to that settlement, took rise from a dispute with our linguist and the Prince of that Country; relative to lands he, the linguist, held at Mount Deily."—Court's Letter of March 25. In Long, 198.

DEOLL, s. A broker; H. from Ar. dalal; the literal meaning being one who directs (the buyer and seller to their bargain). In Egypt the word is now also used in particular for a broker of old clothes and the like, as described by Lane below. (See also under NEELAM.)

[c. 1665.—"... He spared also the house of a deceased Deoll or Gentle broker, of the Dutch."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 188. In the first English trans. this passage runs: "He has also regord to the House of the Deceased De Lale."]

1864.—"... Five Deolls, or Brokers, of Deccan, after they had been with me went to Mr. Beard's chamber. ..."—Hedges, Diary, July 25; [Hak. Soc. i. 152].

1754.—"... Mr. Beallie at Jugdea, accused by these villains, our dulolls, who carried on for a long time their most flagrant rascality. The Dulolls at Jugdea found to charge the Company 15 per cent. beyond the price of the goods."—Fort Wm. Cons. In Long, p. 50.

1824.—"... I was about to answer in great wrath, when a dalal, or broker, went by, loaded with all sorts of second-hand clothes, which he was hawking about for sale."—Haji Baba, 2d ed. i. 183; [ed. 1851, p. 81].

1835.—"... In many of the sooks in Cairo, auctions are held... once or twice a week. They are conducted by 'dellális' (or brokers). ... The 'dellális' carry the goods up and down, announcing the sums hidden by the cries of 'hard.'"—Lane, Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1860, p. 317; [6th ed. ii. 18].

DEMIOH, s. A large glass bottle holding 20 or 30 quarts, or more. The word is not Anglo-Indian, but it is introduced here because it has been supposed to be the corruption of an Oriental word, and suggested to have been taken from the name of Damaghân in Persia. This looks plausible (compare the Persian origin of carboy, which is another name for just the same thing), but no historical proof has yet been adduced, and it is doubted by Mr. Marsh in his Notes on Wedgwood's Dictionary, and by Doxy (Sup. aux Dict. Arabes). It may be noticed, as worthy of further enquiry, that Sir T. Herbert (192) speaks of the abundance and cheapness of wine at Damaghân. Niebuhr, however, in a passage quoted below, uses the word as an Oriental one, and in a note on the 5th ed. of Lane's Mod. Egyptians, 1860, p. 149, there is a remark quoted from Hammer-Purgstall as to the omission from the detail of domestic vessels of two whose names have been adopted in European languages, viz. the garra or jarra, a water 'jar,' and the demijan or demijan, 'la dame-jeanne.' The word is undoubtedly known in modern Arabic. The Mohit of B. Bistānī, the chief modern native lexicón, explains Damijana as 'a great glass vessel, big-bellied and narrow-necked, and covered with wickerwork; a Persian word.'* The vulgar use the forms damajana and damanjana. Dame-jeanne appears in P. Tichelaar, Dict. de la Langue Frang. (1759), with this definition: "[Lagena amplior] Nom que les matelots donnent à une grande bouteille couverte

* Probably not much stress can be laid on this last statement. (The N.E.D. thinks that the Arabic word came from the West).
DENGUE. It is not in the great Castilian Dict. of 1729, but it is in those of the last century, e.g. Dict. of the Span. Academy, ed. 1869. "DamaEuapa, f. Provincia de) And(auicia, CASTANincluded..."and castañ was explained as a "great vessel of glass or terra cotta, of the figure of a chestnut, and used to hold liquor." [See N.E.D. which believes the word adopted from dame-jeanne, on the analogy of 'Bellarmine' and 'Greybeard.]

1762.—"Notre vin est de grands faisons de verre (Damasjanas) dont chacun teneit pres de 20 bouteilles."—Niebuhr, Voyage, i. 171.

DENGUE, a. The name applied to a kind of fever. The term is of West Indian, not East Indian, origin, and has only become known and familiar in India within the last 30 years or more. The origin of the name which seems to be generally accepted is, that owing to the stiff un-bending carriage which the fever induced in those who suffered from it, the negroes in the W. Indies gave it the name of 'dandy fever'; and this name, taken up by the Spaniards, was converted into deny or dengu. [But according to the N.E. D. both 'dandy' and 'dengu' are corruptions of the Swahili term, ka dingo pepo, 'sudden cramp-like seizure by an evil spirit.]

Some of its usual characteristics are the great suddenness of attack; often a red eruption; pain amounting sometimes to anguish in head and back, and shifting pains in the joints; excessive and sudden prostration; after-pains of rheumatic character. Its epidemic occurrences are generally at long intervals.

Omitting such occurrences in America and in Egypt, symptoms attach to an epidemic on the Coromandel coast about 1780 which point to this disease; and in 1892 an epidemic of the kind caused much alarm and suffering in Calcutta, Berhampore, and other places in India. This had no repetition of equal severity in that quarter till 1871-72, though there had been a minor visitation in 1853, and a succession of cases in 1868-69. In 1872 it was so prevalent in Calcutta that among those in the service of the E. I. Railway Company, European and native, prior to August in that year, 70 per cent. had suffered from the disease; and whole households were sometimes attacked at once. It became endemic in Lower Bengal for several seasons. When the present writer (H. Y.) left India (in 1869) the name dengu may have been known to medical men, but it was quite unknown to the lay European public.

1885.—THE CONTAGION OF DENGUE FEVER. "In a recent issue (March 14th, p. 551) under the heading 'Dengue Fever in New Caledonia,' you remark that, although there had been upward of nine hundred cases, yet, 'curiously enough,' there had not been one death. May I venture to say that the 'curiosity' would have been much greater had there been a death? For, although this disease is one of the most infectious, and as I can testify from unpleasant personal experience, one of the most painful that there is, yet death is a very rare occurrence. In an epidemic at Bermuda in 1882, in which about five hundred cases came under my observation, not one death was recorded. In a single instance, which attacked both whites and blacks impartially, inflammation of the cellular tissue, affecting chiefly the face, neck, and scrotum, was especially prevalent as a sequela, none but the lightest cases escaping. I am not aware that this is noted in the text-books as a characteristic of the disease; in fact, the descriptions in the books then available to me, differed greatly from the disease as I then found it, and I believe that was the experience of other medical officers at the time. During the epidemic of dengu above mentioned, an officer who was confined to his quarters, convalescing from the disease, wrote a letter home to his father in England. About three days after the receipt of the letter, that gentleman complained of being ill, and eventually, from his description, had a rather severe attack of what, had he been in Bermuda, would have been called dengu fever. As it was, his medical attendant was puzzled to give a name to it. The disease did not spread to the other members of the family, and the patient made a good recovery.—Henry J. Barnes, Surgeon, Medical Staff, Fort Pitt, Chatham." From British Medical Journal, April 25.

DEODAR. s. The Cedrus deodara, Loud., of the Himalayas, now known as an ornamental tree in England for some seventy-five years past. The finest specimens in the Himalayas are often found in clumps shadowing a small temple. The Deodar is now regarded by botanists as a variety of Cedrus Libani. It is confined to the W. Himalaya from Nepal to Afghanistan; it reappears as the Cedar of Lebanon in Syria, and on through Cyprus and Asia Minor; and emerges... once more in Algeria, and thence westwards to the Rif Mountains in Morocco, under the name of C. Atlantica. The word occurs in Avicenna, who speaks of the Deudar as yielding a kind of turpentine (see below). We may note that an article called Deodar-wood Oil appears in Dr. Forbes Watson's "List of Indian Products" (No. 2941) [and see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 285].

Deodar is by no means the universal name of the great Cedar in the Himalayas. It is called so (Deodar, Diār, or Dydr [Drew, Jummeo, 100]) in Kashmir, where the deodar pillars of the great mosque of Srinagar date from A.D. 1401. The name, indeed (deva-dārū, 'timber of the gods'), is applied in different parts of India to different trees, and even in the Himalaya to more than one. The list just referred to (which however has not been revised critically) gives this name in different modifications as applied also to the pencil Cedar (Juniperus excelsa), to Guatteria (or Uvaria) longiflora, to Selaia Indica, to Erythroxylon oreolatum, and (on the Ravi and Sutlej) to Cupressus torulosa.

The Deodar first became known to the Europeans in the beginning of the last century, when specimens were sent to Dr. Roxburgh, who called it a Pinus. Seeds were sent to Europe by Capt. Gerard in 1819; but the first that grew were those sent by the Hon. W. Leslie Melville in 1822.

c. 1080.—"Deudar (or rather Duddar) est ex generis abhel (i.e. juniper) quae dietur pinus Inda, et Syr deudar (Milk of Deodar) est ejus lac (turpentine)."—Avicenna, Lat. Transl. p. 297.

c. 1220.—"He sent for two trees, one of which was a . . . white poplar, and the other a deodor, that is a fir. He planted them both on the boundary of Kashmir."—Chach Nāmah in Elliot, i. 144.

DERRISHACST, adj. This extraordinary word is given by C. B. P. (M3) as a corruption of P. daryshikast, 'destroyed by the river.'

DESVISH, s. P. darwsh; a member of a Mahomedan religious order. The word is hardly used now among Anglo-Indians, fakir [see FAKIER] having taken its place. On the Mahomedan confraternities of this class, see Herklot, 179 seqq.; Lane,

c. 1540.—"The dog Cossa Acen . . . crying out with a loud voyce, that everyone might hear him . . . To them, To them, for as we are assured by the Book of Flowers, wherein the Prophet Noby doth promise eternal delights to the Darveshes of the House of Meesus, that he will keep his word both with you and me, provided that we bathe ourselves in the blood of these dogs without Law!"—Pisto (esp. liv.), in Cogan, 72.

1554.—"His multa didicimus a monachis Turciciis, quos Dervis vocant."—Busby, Epist. I. p. 93.

1616.—"Among the Mahomes are many called Dervizches, which relinquish the World, and spend their days in Solitude."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1477.

[c. 1639.—"Dervisini." See TALISMAN.]

1658.—"Il estoit Dervische ou Facis et menoit une vie solitaire dans les bois."—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 182.

1670.—"Aureng-Zobe . . . was reserved, crafty, and exceedingly versed in dissembling, insomuch that for a long time he made profession to be a Fakire, that is, Poor, Dervich, or Devout, renouncing the World."—Bernier, E.T. 3; [ed. Constable, 10].

1673.—"The Dervises professing Poverty, assume this Garb here (i.e. in Persia), but not with that state they ramble up and down in India."—Pryer, 302.

DESSAYE, s. Mahr. dawli; in W. and S. India a native official in charge of a district, often held hereditarily; a petty chief. (See DESAYE.)

[1811.—"Daiseriy."—Kirkpatrick, Letters of Tipper, p. 196.]

1888.—"The Desai of Sawantwari has arrived at Delhi on a visit. He is accompanied by a European Assistant Political Officer and a large following. From Delhi his Highness goes to Agra, and visits Cuttack before returning to his territory, vid Madras."—Pioneer Mail, Jan. 24.

The regular title of this chief appears to be Sar-Dehti.

DESTOO, s. A Parsee priest; P. dastūr, from the Pahlavi daštōr, 'a prime minister, councillor of State . . . a high priest, a bishop of the Parsees; a custom, mode, manner' (Haug, Old Pahlavi and Persian Glossary). (See DUSTOO.)
DEUTI, DUTY, a. H. divit, devri, devr, Skt. ḍṛṣṭa, ‘a lamp’; a lampstand, but also a link-bearer.

DÉVADĀŚI, s. H. ‘Slave-girl of the gods’; the official name of the male children who are devoted to dancing and prostitution in the idol-temples, of Southern India especially. “The like existed at ancient Corinth under the name of σεμιβουλος, which is nearly a translation of the Hindi name...” —Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 336. These appendages of Aphrodite worship, borrowed from Phoenicia, were the same thing as the κακοδῆθ, repeatedly mentioned in the Old Testament, e.g. Deut. xxiii. 18: “Thou shalt not bring the wages of a κακοδῆθ into the House of Jehovah.” [See Chesne, in Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1964 seq.] Both male and female σεμιβουλος are mentioned in the famous inscription of Citrum in Cyprus (Corp. Inscriptionum Semitic. No. 86); the latter under the name of ‘alma, curiously near that of the modern Egyptian ‘alima. (See DANCING-GIRL.)

DEUTI, DUTY. 307

DEVIL, s. A petty whirlwind, or circular storm, is often so called. (See PISACHEE, SHAITAN, TYPHOON.)

DEVIL-BIRD, s. This is a name used in Ceylon for a bird believed to be a kind of owl—according to Haeckel, quoted below, the Syrmium Indravas of Sykes, or Brown Wood Owl of Jerdon. Mr. Mitford, quoted below, however, believes it to be a Podarce, or Night-hawk.

c. 1790.—“La principale occupation des devadaschies est de danser devant l’image de la divinité qu’elles servent, et de chanter ses louanges, soit dans son temple, soit dans les rues, lorsqu’on porte l’idole dans des processions.” —Hauteriu. ii. 105.

1688.—“The Dasis, the dancing girls attached to Pagodas. They are each of them married to an idol when quite young. Their male children... have no difficulty in acquiring a decent position in society. The female children are generally brought up to the trade of their mothers... It is customary with a few castes to present their superfluous daughters to the Pagodas...” —Nelson’s Madura, Pt. 2, p. 79.

DEVIL-BIRD. This is a name used for a bird believed to be a kind of owl—according to Haeckel, quoted below, the Syrmium Indravas of Sykes, or Brown Wood Owl of Jerdon. Mr. Mitford, quoted below, however, believes it to be a Podarce, or Night-hawk.

1813.—“...we were often surrounded by the little whirlwinds called bygíasas, or Devilis.” — Forbes, Or. Men. 2nd ed. i. 118.

1606-10.—“Often you see coming from afar great whirlwinds which the sailors call dragons.” —Pyrard de Lassé, Hik. Soc. i. 11.

1863.—“...the little whirlwinds called bygíasas, or Devilis.” — Forbes, Or. Men. 2nd ed. i. 118.
1880.—"The Devil-Bird, is not an owl... its ordinary note is a magnificent clear shout like that of a human being, and which can be heard at a great distance. It has another cry like that of a hen just caught, but the sounds which have earned for it its bad name... are indescribable, the most appalling that can be imagined, and scarcely to be heard without shuddering; I can only compare it to a boy in torture, whose screams are being stopped by being strangled."—Mr. Misford's Note in Tennent's Ceylon, i. 167.

1881.—"The uncanny cry of the devil-bird, Surnia Indrani..."—Haeckel's Visit to Ceylon, 285.

DEVIL'S REACH, n.p. This was the old name of a reach on the Hoogly R. a little above Pulta (and about 15 miles above Calcutta). On that reach are several groups of dewals, or idol-temples, which probably gave the name.

1884.—"August 28.—I borrowed the late Dutch Fiscaal's Budgero (see BUDGEROW), and went in Company with Mr. Beard, Mr. Littleton...as far as y* Devil's Reach, where I caused y* tents to be pitched in expectation of y* President's arrival and lay here all night."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 156.

1717.—"From the lower Point of Devil's Reach you must keep mid-channel, or nearest the Starboard Shore, for the Larnboard is shoal until you come into the beginning of Pulta or Pouto Reach, and there abreast of a single great Tree, you must edge over to the East Shore below Pulta."—The English Pilot, 54.

DEVIL WORSHIP. This phrase is a literal translation of bhātā-pūjā, i.e. worship of bhātas [see BHOOT], a word which appears in slightly differing forms in various languages of India, including the Tamil country. A bhāta, or as in Tamil more usually, pēy, is a malignant being which is conceived to arise from the person of anyone who has come to a violent death. This superstition, in one form or another, seems to have formed the religion of the Dravidian tribes of S. India before the introduction of Brahmanism, and is still the real religion of nearly all the low castes in that region, whilst it is often patronized also by the higher castes. These superstitions, and especially the demonolatrous rites called 'devil-dancing,' are identical in character with those commonly known as SHAMANISM [see SHAMAN], and which are spread all over Northern Asia, among the red races of America, and among a vast variety of tribes in Ceylon and in Indo-China, not excluding the Burmese. A full account of the demon-worship of Tinnevelly was given by Bp. Caldwell in a small pamphlet on the "Tinnevelly Shanars" (Madras 1849), and interesting evidence of its identity with the Shamanism of other regions will be found in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed. 579 seq.); see also Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 79 seq.; [Oppert. Orig. Inhabit. of Bharatarvaria, 554 seq.]

DÉWAL, DÉWALÉ, a. H. dewal, Skt. deva-dālaya; a Temple or pagoda. This, or Dewaldark, is the phrase commonly used in the Bombay territory for a Christian church. In Ceylon DÉWALÉ is a temple dedicated to a Hindu god.

1831.—"The second order of Priests are those called Koppuku, who are the Priests that belong to the Temples of the other Gods (i.e. other than Boddon, or Buddhas). Their Temples are called Dewals."—Knox, Ceylon, 79.

[1797.—"The Company will settle... the dewal or temple charge."—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 285.

[1813.—"They plant it (the nayna tree) near the dewals or Hindoo temples, improperly called Pagodas."—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed. i. 16.]

DEWALEEA, s. H. diwāliyaq, 'a bankrupt,' from diwālī, 'bankruptcy,' and that, though the etymology is disputed, is alleged to be connected with dīpa, 'a lamp'; because "it is the custom... when a merchant finds himself failing, or failed, to set up a blazing lamp in his house, shop, or office, and abscond therefrom for some time until his creditors are satisfied by a disclosure of his accounts or dividend of assets."—Drummond's Illustrations (s.v.).

DEWALLY, s. H. diwālī, from Skt. dīpa-ālikā, 'a row of lamps,' i.e. an illumination. An autumnal feast attributed to the celebration of various divinities, as of Lakshmi and of Bhavāni, and also in honour of Krishna's slaying of the demon Naraka, and the release of 16,000 maidens, his prisoners. It is held on the last two days of the dark half of the month Akrīna or Akān, and on the new moon and four following days of Karttika, i.e.
usually some time in October. But there are variations of Calendar in different parts of India, and feasts will not always coincide, e.g. at the three Presidency towns, nor will any curt expression define the dates. In Bengal the name Dívālī is not used; it is Kālī Pūjā, the feast of that grim goddess, a midnight festival on the most moonless nights of the month, celebrated by illuminations and fireworks, on land and river, by feasting, carousing, gambling, and sacrifice of goats, sheep, and buffaloes.

1613.—"... no equinoció do entrada de libra, día chamado Diwály, tem tal privilegio e vertude que obriga falar as arvores, plantas e ervas..."—Godoim de Brandua, i. 380.

1661.—"In the month of October, eight days after the full moon, there is a feast held in honour of Vishnu, which is called Dipáwálī."—A. Rogerius, De Open-Deure.

1673.—"The first New Moon in October is the Banyan’s Dúlláy."—Fryer, iv. 110.

1820.—"The Dewalies, Deepawulies, or Time of Lights, takes place 20 days after the Dusseras, and lasts three days; during which there is feasting, illumination, and fireworks."—T. Cole, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., ii. 211.

1883.—"The Dīwān is celebrated with splendid effect at Benares. ... At the approach of night small earthen lamps, fed with oil, are prepared by millions, and placed quite close together, so as to mark out every line of mansion, palace, temple, minarets, and dome in streaks of fire."—Monier Williams, Religious Thought and Life in India, 432.

DEWAUN, s. The chief meanings of this word in Anglo-Indian usage are:

1. Under the Mahommedan Government, which preceded us, “the head financial minister, whether of the state or a province... charged, in the latter, with the collection of the revenue, the remittance of it to the imperial treasury, and invested with extensive judicial powers in all civil and financial causes” (Wilson). It was in this sense that the grant of the Dewaun (q.v.) to the E. I. Company in 1765 became the foundation of the British Empire in India. (2) The prime minister of a native State. (3) The chief native officer of certain Government establishments, such as the Mint; or the native manager of a Zemindary. (4) (In Bengal) a native servant in confidential charge of the dealings of a house of business with natives, or of the affairs of a large domestic establishment. These meanings are perhaps all reducible to one conception, of which ‘Steward’ would be an appropriate expression. But the word has had many other ramifications of meaning, and has travelled far.

The Arabian dīwān is, according to Lane, an Arabicized word of Persian origin (though some hold it for pure Arabic), and is in original meaning nearly equivalent to Persian dāftar (see DUFTER), i.e. a collection of written leaves or sheets (forming a book for registration); hence ‘a register of accounts’; a ‘register of soldiers or pensioners’; a ‘register of the rights or dues of the State, or relating to the acts of government, the finances and the administration’; also any book, and especially a collection of the poems of some particular poet. It was also applied to signify ‘an account’; then a ‘writer of accounts’; a ‘place of such writers of accounts’; also a ‘council, court, or tribunal’; and in the present day, a ‘long seat formed of a mattress laid along the wall of a room, with cushions, raised or on the floor’; or ‘two or more of such seats.’ Thus far (in this paragraph) we abstract from Lane.

The Arabian historian Bilādurī (c. 860) relates as to the first introduction of the dīwān that, when ‘Omar was discussing with the people how to divide the enormous wealth derived from the conquests in his time, Walid bin Hishām bin Moghāira said to the caliph, ‘I have been in Syria, and saw that its kings make a dīwān; do thou the like.’ So ‘Omar accepted his advice, and sent for two men of the Persian tongue, and said to them: 'Write down the people according to their rank' (and corresponding pensions).*

We must observe that in the Mahomedan States of the Mediterranean the word divan became especially applied to the Custom-house, and thus passed into the Romance languages as adwana, douane, dogana, &c. Littré indeed avoids any decision as to the etymology of douane, &c. And Hyde (Note on Abr. Perret, in Syntagma Divisoni. i. 101) derives dogana from docdn (i.e. P. dukdn, officina, a shop'). But such passages as that below from Ibn Jubair, and the fact that, in the medieval Florentine treaties with the Mahomedan powers of Barbary and Egypt, the word divan in the Arabic texts constantly represents the dogana of the Italian, seem sufficient to settle the question (see Amari, Diplomi Arabi del Real Archivo, &c.; e.g. p. 104, and (Latin) p. 306, and in many other places).† The Spanish Dict. of Cobarruvias (1611) quotes Urrea as saying that" from the Arabic noun Divanum, which signifies the house where the duties are collected, we form divana, and thence adwana, and lastly adwana."

At a later date the word was re-imported into Europe in the sense of a hall furnished with Turkish couches and cushions, as well as of a couch of this kind. Hence we get cigar-divans, et hoc genus omne. The application to certain collections of poems is noticed above. It seems to be especially applied to assemblages of short poems of homogeneous character. Thus the Odos of Horace, the Sonnets of Petrarch, the In Memoriam of Tennyson, answer to the character of Divan so used. Hence also Goethe took the title of his West-Östliche Divan.

c. A. D. 636.—"... in the Caliphate of Omar the spoil of Syria and Persia began in ever-increasing volume to pour into the treasury of Medina, where it was distributed almost as soon as received. What was easy in small beginnings by equal sharing or discretionary preference, became now a heavy task. . . . At length, in the 2nd or 3rd year of his Caliphate, Omar determined that the distribution should be regulated on a fixed and systematic scale. . . . To carry out this last design, a Registar had to be drawn and kept up of every man, woman, and child, entitled to a stipend from the State. . . . The Register itself, as well as the office for its maintenance and for pensionary account, was called the Dewau or Department of the Exchequer."—Muir's Annals, &c., pp. 225-9.

As Minister, &c.

[1610.—"We propose to send you the copy hereof by the old scrivano of the Divan."—Dewau, Letters, i. 51.

[1611.—"Sheak Isph Dyvon of Amdavas."—Poster, Letters, iv. 311.

1690.—"Fearing miscarriage of yr Originall scruvilles [Sthrig-kahf], Ar. 'a deed of release,' variously corrupted in Indian technical use we have herewith Sent you a Copyy Attested by Hugly Caeez, hoping yr Divan may be Satisfied therewith," MS. Letter in Incl. Office, from Job Charmock and others at Chuttanette to Mr. Ch. Eyre at Ballasore.

c. 1718.—"Even the Divan of the Qalissah Office, who is, properly speaking, the Minister of the finances, or at least the accomptant general, was become a mere cypher, or a body without a soul."—Seir Mutlaherin, i. 110.

1762.—"A letter from Dacca states that the Hon'ble Company's Dewau (Manikchand) died on the morning of this letter. . . . As they apprehend he has died worth a large sum of money which the poor unfortunate people (i.e. of the Nawáb) may be desirous to possess to the injury of his lawful heirs, they request the protection of the flag . . . to the family of a man who has served the Company for upwards of 30 years with care and fidelity."—Ft. Wm. Cons., Nov. 29. In Long, 268.

1786.—"There then resided at his Court a Gentle named Alius Chams, who had been many years Dewan to Soojah Khan, by whom he was much revered for his great age, wisdom, and faithful services."—Holwell, Hist. Events, i. 74.

1771.—"By our general address you will be informed that we have to be dissatisfied with the administration of Mahomet Reza Cawn, and will perceive the expediency of our diverting him of the rank and influence he holds as Naib Dewan of the Kingdom of Bengal."—Court of Directors to W. Hastings, in Glege, i. 121.

1785.—"The Committee, with the best intentions, best abilities, and steadiest of application, must after all be a tool in the hands of their Dewan."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 74.
In the following quotations the identity of divān and dawān or dogana is shown more or less clearly.

A.D. 1178.—"The Moslem were ordered to dismember their goods (at Alexandria), and what remained of their stock of provisions; and on the shore were officers who took them in charge, and carried all that was landed to the Diwan. They were called forward one by one; the property of each was brought out, and the Diwan was satisfied with the crowd. The search fall on every article, small or great; one thing got mixt up with another, and hands were thrust into the midst of the packages to discover if anything were concealed in them. Then, after this, an oath was administered to the owners that they had nothing more than had been found. Amid all this in the confusion of hands and the greatness of the crowd many things went amiss. At length the passengers were dismissed after a scene of humiliation and great ignominy, for which we pray God to grant an ample recompense. But this, past doubt, is one of the things kept hidden from the great Sultan Salih-ud-din, whose well-known justice and benevolence are such that, if he knew it, he would certainly abolish the practice" [viz. as regards Mecca pilgrims].—Ibn Jubair, orig. in Wright's ed., p. 36.

C. 1340.—"Daua, in all the cities of the Saracen, in Sicily, in Naples, and throughout the Kingdom of Naples... Dazio at Venice; Gabella throughout Tuscan... Costums throughout the Island of England... All these names mean duties which have to be paid for goods and wares, other things, imported or, exported for one passed through the countries and places detailed."—Francesco Balducci Pegolotti, see Catay, &c., ii. 285-6.

C. 1348.—"Then they order the skipper to state in detail all the goods that the vessel contains... Then everybody lands, and the keepers of the custom-house (al-divān) sit and pass in review whatever one has."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 295.

The following medieval passage in one of our note-books remains a fragment without date or source:

* The present generation in England can have no conception how closely this description applies to what took place at many an English port before Sir Robert Peel's great changes in the import tariff. The present writer, in landing from a P. & O. steamer at Portsmouth in 1848, after four or five days' quarantine in the Solent, had to go through six to eight hours of such treatment as Ibn Jubair describes, and his feelings were very much the same as the Moor's.—[H. Y.]

1440.—The Handbook of Giovanni da Uzzano, published along with Pegolotti by Pagnini (1765-66) has for custom-house Daua, which corroborates the identity of Dogana with Diwan.

A Council Hall:

1367.—"Huseyn, fearing for his life, came down and hid himself under the tower, but his enemies... surrounded the mosque, and having found him, brought him to the (Dyuan-Khane) Council Chamber."—Mem. of Timur, tr. by Stewart, p. 190.

1554.—"Utunque sit, cum mane in Diwanum (is concilii vs alias dixi locus est) imprudentes omnium venissent..."—Busbe- qni Epistolae, ii. p. 188.

A place, fitted with mattresses, &c., to sit in:

1676.—"On the side that looks towards the River, there is a Diwan, or a kind of out-jutting Balcony, where the King sits."—Taverner, E.T. ii. 49; [ed. Ball], i. 108.

[1785. —"It seems to have been intended for a Danan Komma, or eating room."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 393.]

A Collection of Poems:

1788.—"One (writer) died a few years ago at Benares, of the name of Bouns, who composed a Dewan in Moors."—Toigmanee, Mem. i. 105.

DEWAUNY, DEWANNY, &c., s. Properly, divān; popularly, dowān. The office of divān (Dewan); and especially the right of receiving as divān the revenue of Bengal, Behar, and Orients, conferred upon the E. I. Company by the Great Mogul Shih ʻAlam in 1765. Also used sometimes for the territory which was the subject of that grant.

1765.—(Lord Clive) "visited the vezir, and having exchanged with him some sumptuous entertainments and curious and magnificent presents, explained the project he had in his mind, and asked that the Company should be invested with the Divanaship (no doubt in orig. Divān) of the three provinces..."—Seir Mutasherin, ii. 384.

1773. —(The opium monopoly) "is stated to have began at Patna so early as the year 1761, but it received no considerable degree of strength until the year 1765; when the acquisition of the Dunaane opened a wide field for all projects of this nature."—Report of a Committee on Affairs of India, in Burke's Works, vi. 447.
DEWAUNY, DEWANNY. adj. Civil, as distinguished from Criminal; e.g. Divani 'Adalat as opposite to Faujidari Adalat. (See ADAWULUT). The use of Divani for civil as opposed to criminal is probably modern and Indian. For Kaempfer in his account of the Persian administration at the end of the 17th century, has: "Divan bey, id est, Supremus crimin- alis Judicis Dominus . . . de latrociniis et homicidis non modo in hac Regiæ metropoli, verum etiam in toto Regno disponendì facultatem habet."—Amoenit. Exot. 80.

DALL, DOLL, s. Hind. dāl, a kind of pulse much used in India, both by natives as a kind of porridge, and by Europeans as an ingredient in kedgeree (q.v.), or to mix with rice as a breakfast dish. It is best represented in England by what are called 'split pease.' The proper dāl, which Wilson derives from the Skt. root dāl, 'to divide' (and which thus corresponds in meaning also to 'split pease'), is, according to the same authority, Phaseolus aureus: but, be that as it may, the dāl most commonly in use are varieties of the shrubby plant Cajanus Indicus, Spreng., called in Hind. arkar, rahar, &c. It is not known where this is indigenous; [De Candolle thinks it probably a native of tropical Africa, introduced perhaps 3,000 years ago into India; it is cultivated throughout India. The term is also applied occasionally to other pulses, such as māng, urd, &c. (See MOONG, OORD.) It should also be noted that in its original sense dāl is not the name of a particular pea, but the generic name of pulses prepared for use by being broken in a hand-mill; though the peas named are those commonly used in Upper India in this way.

1678.—"At their coming up out of the Water they bestow the largess of Rice or Doll (an Indian Bean)."—Fryer, 101.

1690.—"Kicherar . . . made of Doll, that is, a small round Pea, and Rice boiled together, and is very strengthening, tho' not very savoury."—Ovington, 310.

1727.—"They have several species of Le- gumæ, but those of Doll are most in use, for some Doll and Rice being mingled together and boiled, make Kicherar."—A Hamilton, i. 162; [ed. 1744].

1776.—"If a person hath bought the seeds of . . . doll . . . or such kinds of Grain, without Inspection, and in ten Days discovers any Defect in that Grain, he may return such Grain."—Halhed, Code, 178.

1778.—". . . the essential articles of a Sepoy's diet, rice, doll (a species of pea), ghee (an indifferent kind of butter), &c., were not to be purchased."—Acc. of the Gallant Defence made at Mangalore.

1809.—". . . doll, split country peas."—Maria Graham, 25.

[1813.—"Taur (cytisus cajan, Lin.) . . . is called Dohli . . . "—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 35.]

DHAWK, s. Hind. dhak; also called pald. A small bushy tree, Butea frondosa (N. O. Leguminosae), which forms large tracts of jungle in the Punjab, and in many dry parts of India. Its deep orange flowers give a brilliant aspect to the jungle in the early part of the hot weather, and have suggested the occasional name of 'Flame of the Forest.' They are used for dyeing basanto, basanti, a fleeting yellow; and in preparing Holi (see HOOLY) powder. The second of the two Hindi words for this tree gave a name to the famous village of Plassy (Paldi), and also to ancient Magadh or Behar as Palāsa or Pardha, whence Pardthiya, a man of that region, which, if Gen. Cunningham's suggestion be accepted, was the name represented by the Præst of Strabo, Pliny, and Arrian, and the Pharrarsi of Curtius (Anc. Geog. of India, p. 454). [The derivation of the word from Skt. Pradhyā "Inhabi- tants of the east country," is supported by McCrindle, Ancient India, 366 seq. So the dhak tree possibly gave its name to Dacca].

1761.—"The pioneers, agreeably to orders, dug a ditch according to custom, and placed along the brink of it an abattis of dhak trees, or whatever else they could find."—Saiyid Ghalâm 'Ali, in Elliot, viii. 400.

DHoby, Dobie, s. A washer- man; H. dhobi, [from dhm, Skt. dhāna 'to wash.] In colloquial Anglo-Indian use all over India. A common H. proverb runs: Dhobi kā kutta kā sū, na ghar kā na ghāte kā, i.e. "Like a Dhoby's dog belonging neither to the house nor to the river side." [Dhoby's itch is a troublesome cutaneous disease supposed to be communicated by clothes from the wash, and Dhoby's earth is a whitish-grey sandy efflorescence, found in many places, from which by boiling and the addition of quicklime an alkali of considerable strength is obtained.

[c. 1804.—"Dobes." See under DIR-KEE].

BHOLY, DOOLIE, s. A covered litter; Hind. dolī. It consists of a cot or frame, suspended by the four corners from a bamboo pole, and is carried by two or four men (see figure in Herklotz, Qamoon-e-Islam, pl. vii. fig. 4). Dolī is from dolīd, ‘to swing.’ The word is also applied to the meat- (or milk-) safe, which is usually slung to a tree, or to a hook in the veranda. As it is lighter and cheaper than a palanquin it costs less both to buy or hire and to carry, and is used by the poorer classes. It also forms the usual ambulance of the Indian army. Hence the familiar story of the orator in Parliament who, in celebrating a battle in India, spoke of the ‘ferocious Dolīs rushing down from the mountain and carrying off the wounded’; a story which, to our regret, we have not been able to verify. [According to one account the words were used by Burke: “After a sanguinary engagement, the said Warren Hastings had actually ordered ferocious Doolies to seize upon the wounded” (2nd ser. Notes & Queries, iv. 367).

[But Burke knew too much of India to make this mistake. In the Calcutta Review (Dec. 1846, p. 286, footnote) Herbert Edwardes, writing on the first Sikh War, says: “It is not long since a member of the British Legislature, recounting the incidents of one of our Indian fights, informed his countrymen that ‘the ferocious Dolīs’ rushed from the hills and carried off the wounded soldiers.”] Dōlī occurs in Ibn Batuta, but the translators render ‘palanquin,’ and do not notice the word.

c. 1843.—“The principal vehicle of the people (of Malabar) is a dūlī, carried on the shoulders of slaves and hired men. Those who do not ride in one, whoever they may be, go on foot.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 73.

c. 1590.—“The Rākhrs or Pākhl-bearers. They form a class of foot servants peculiar to India. With their pākhl...and dolīs, they walk so even that the man inside is not inconvenienced by any jolting.”—Atv, i. 254; [and see the account of the sultāns, ibid. ii. 122].

1602.—“He turned Moore, and bereaved his elder Brother of this holde by this stratageme. He invited him and his women to a Banket, which his Brother requisitioning with like imitation of him and his, in stead of women he sends choice Souldiers well appointed, and close covered, two and two in a Dowlie.”—Headly, in Purchas, i. 485.

1662.—“The Rajah and the Padhiks travel in singhasans, and chiefs and rich people in dūlīs, made in a most ridiculous way.”—Mir Jumlah’s Invasion of Aam, tr. by Blockmann, in J. As. Soc. Ben., xii., pt. 1. 80.

1702.—“. . . un Doulī, c’est une voiture moins honorable que le palanquin.”—Lettres Edif., xi. 143.

c. 1760.—“Doolies are much of the same material as the andolās [see ANDOL]; but made of the meanest materials.”—Grose, i. 155.

c. 1768.—“. . . leaving all his wounded . . . on the field of battle, telling them to be of good cheer, for that he would send Doolies for them from Astarā. . . .”—H. of Hyder Nāzīr, 226.

1774.—“If by a dooley, chairs, or any other contrivance they can be secured from the fatigues and hazards of the way, the expense is to be of no objection.”—Letter of W. Hastings, in Markham’s Tibet, 18.

1785.—“You must despatch Doolies to Dhārwār to bring back the wounded men.”—Letters of Tipoo, 183.

1789.—“. . . doolies, or sick beds, which are a mean representation of a palanquin: the number attached to a corps is in the proportion of one to every ten men, with four bearers to each.”—Munro, Narrative, 184.

1845.—“Head Qrs., Kurnaché, 27 Decr., 1845.

“The Governor desires that it may be made known to the Doolies-vaillas and Camel-men, that no increase of wages shall be given to them. They are very highly paid. If any man deserts, the Governor will have him pursued by the police, and if caught he shall be hanged.”—G. O. by Sir Charles Napier, 115.

1872.—“At last . . . a woman arrived from Dargānagar with a dūlī and two bearers, for carrying Matāī.”—Govinda Samanta, ii. 7.

1880.—“The consequence of holding that this would be a Trust enforceable in a Court of Law would be so monstrous that persons would be probably startled . . . if it be a Trust, then every one of those persons in England or in India—from persons of the highest rank down to the lowest doolie-bearer, might file a bill for the administration of the Trust.”—Ed. Justice James, Judgment on the Kirwée and Banda Prize Appeal, 13th April.

1883.—“I have great pleasure here in bearing my testimony to the courage and devotion of the Indian dhoole-bearers. I . . . never knew them shrink from the dangers of the battle-field, or neglect or forsake a wounded European. I have several times seen one of these bearers killed and many of them disabled while carrying a wounded soldier out of action.”—Surman-DHOON. a. Hind. dūn. A word in N. India specially applied to the flat valleys, parallel to the base of the Himalayas, and lying between the rise of that mountain mass and the low tertiary ranges known as the sub-Himalayan or Siwalik Hills (q.v.), or rather between the interior and exterior of these ranges. The best known of these valleys is the Dūn of Dehra, below Mussooree, often known as "the Dhoon"; a form of expression which we see by the second quotation to be old.

1596.—"In the language of Hindustān they call a Ḏalpa (or dale) Dūn. The finest running water in Hindustān is that in this Dūn."—Babir, 299.

1654-55.—"Khalilu-īla Khan... having reached the Dūn, which is a strip of country lying outside of Srinagar, 20 kos long and 5 broad, one extremity of its length being bounded by the river Jumna, and the other by the Ganges."—Shāh-Jahān-Nāma, in Bhīti, v. 106.

1814.—"Me voici in the far-famed Dhoon, the Temple of Asia... The fort stands on the summit of an almost inaccessible mountain... it will be a tough job to take it; but by the 1st proximo I think I shall have it, ansprès De."—In Asiatic Journal, ii. 151; ext. of letter from Sir Rollo Gillese before Kailan, dated 29th Oct. He fell next day.

1879.—"The Sub-Himalayan Hills... as a general rule... consist of two ranges, separated by a broad flat valley, for which the name 'dūn' (Doom) has been adopted... When the outer of these ranges is wanting, as is the case below Naini Tāl and Darjiling, the whole geographical feature might escape notice, the inner range being confounded with the spurs of the mountains."—Manual of the Geology of India, 521.

DHOTY, s. Hind. dhotī. The loin-cloth worn by all the respectable Hindu castes of Upper India, wrapt round the body, the end being then passed between the legs and tucked in at the waist, so that a festoon of calico hangs down to either knee. [It is mentioned, not by name, by Arrian (Indika, 16) as "an under garment of cotton which reaches below the knee, half way to the ankle"; and the Orissa dhoti of 1300 years ago, as shown on the monuments, does not differ from the mode of the present time, save that men of rank wore a jewelled girdle with a pendant in front. (Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187.) The word dūtī in old trade lists of cotton goods is possibly the same; [but at the present time a coarse cotton cloth woven by Dhers in Surat is known as Dōtī.]

1609.—"Here is also a strong sort of cloth called Dhootie."—Danvers, Letters, i. 29.

1614.—"20 corse of strong Dutties, such as may be fit for making and mending sails."—Forster, Letters, ii. 219.

1615.—"200 peeces Dutte."—Cook's Diary, i. 83.

1622.—"Price of calicoes, dutties fixed."...

"List of goods sold, including diamonds, pepper, bastas, (read bayzes), dutties, and silks from Persia."—Court Minutes, &c., in Sawaihn, iii. 24.

1810.—"... a dotee or waist-cloth."—Williamson, V. M. i. 247.

1872.—"The human figure which was moving with rapid strides had no other clothing than a dhoti wrapped round the waist, and descending to the knee-joints."—Govinda Samanta, i. 8.

DHOW, DOW, s. The last seems the more correct, though not perhaps the more common. The term is common in Western India, and on various shores of the Arabian sea, and is used on the E. African coast for craft in general (see Burton, in J.R.G.S. xxix. 239); but in the mouths of Englishmen on the western seas of India it is applied specially to the old-fashioned vessel of Arab build, with a long grabstem, t.s. rising at a long slope from the water, and about as long as the keel, usually with one mast and lateen-rig. There are the lines of a dōv, and a technical description, by Mr. Edie, in J. R. As. Soc., vol. i. p. 11. The slaving dōw is described and illustrated in Capt. Colomb's Slave-catching in the Indian Ocean; see also Capt. W. F. Owen's Narrative (1833), p. 285, [i. 384 seq.]. Most people suppose the word to be Arabic, and it is in (Johnson's) Richardson (dō) as an Arabic word. But no Arabic scholar whom we have consulted admits it to be genuine Arabic. Cap it possibly have been taken from Pers. dāv, 'running'! [The N.E.D. remarks that if Tava (in Ath. Nābitān, below) be the same, it would tend to localise the word at Ormus in the Persian Gulf.] Capt. Burton identifies it with the word zabra applied in the Roteiro of Vasco’s Voyage (p. 37) to a native vessel at Mombasa. But zabra or zabra was apparently a Basque name for a kind of craft in Biscay (see a.v. Bluteau, and the Dicc. de la Língua Cast. vol. vi. 1739). Ddo or Ddoa is indeed in Molesworth’s Mahr. Dict. as a word in that language, but this gives no assurance of origin. Anglo-Indians on the west coast usually employ dhow and buggalo interchangeably. The word is used on Lake V. Nyansa.

c. 1470.—“I shipped my horses in a Tava, and sailed across the Indian Sea in ten days to Moshkat.”—Ath. Nikitin, p. 8, in India in X Vth Cent.

1785.—“A Dow, the property of Ruth Jee and Jeewun Doss, merchants of Muscat, having in these days been dissipated in a storm, came into Byte Koal (see BAGCUL), a seaport belonging to the Sircar. . . .’”—Tipoo’s Letters, 181.

1786.—“We want 10 shipwrights acquainted with the construction of Down. Get them together and despatch them hither.”—Tipoo to his Agent at Muskat, ibid. 224.

1810.—“Close to Calcutta, it is the busiest scene we can imagine; crowded with ships and boats of every form,—here a fine English East India man, there a grab or a dhow from Arabia.”—Maria Graham, 142.

1814.—“The different names given to these ships (at Jeddah), as Say. Seem. Merke, Sambok [see SAMBOOK] Dow, denote their size; the latter only being the largest, perform the voyage to India.”—Burckhardt, Tr. of Arabia, 1829, 4to, p. 22.

1837.—“Two young princes . . . nephews of the King of Hizzuza or Joanna . . . came in their own dhow on a visit to the Government.”—Smith, Life of J. Wilson, 258.

1844.—“I left the hospitable village of Takanugu in a small boat, called a ‘Daw’ by the Suahillis . . . the smallest sea-going vessel.”—Karpf, p. 117.

1865.—“The goods from Zanzibar (to the Seychelles) were shipped in a dhow, which ran across in the month of May; and this was, I believe, the first native craft that had ever made the passage.”—*Pelly in J.R.G.S. xxxv. 254.

1873.—“If a pear be sharpened at the thin end, and then cut in half longitudinally, two models will have been made, resembling in all essential respects the ordinary slave dhow.”—Colomb, 35.

1880.—“The third division are the Mozambique or African slaves, who have been brought into the country from time immemorial by the Arab slave-trading dhows.”—Sibb's Great African Island, 182.

1883.—“Dhau is a large vessel which is falling into disuse. . . . Their origin is in the Red Sea. The word is used vaguely, and is applied to baghlas (see BUGGALLOW).”—Bombay Gazetteer, xili. 717 seq.

DHURMSALLA, a. H. and Mahr. dharm-salla, ‘pious edifice’; a rest-house for wayfarers, corresponding to the S. Indian Ghoultary or Chuttrum (q.v.).

1836.—“We alighted at a durhmsallah where several horsemen were assembled.”—Pandrung Hari, 254; [ed. 1873, ii. 66].

DHURNA, to sit, v. In H. dharnā danda or bāthna, Skt. dhrī, ‘to hold.’ A mode of extorting payment or compliance with a demand, effected by the complainant or creditor sitting at the debtor’s door, and there remaining without taking food till his demand shall be complied with, or (sometimes) by threatening to do himself some mortal violence if it be not complied with. Traces of this custom in some form are found in many parts of the world, and Sir H. Maine (see below) has quoted a remarkable example from the Irish Brehon Laws. There was a curious variety of the practice, in arrest for debt, current in S. India, which is described by Marco Polo and many later travellers (see M. P. 2nd ed., ii. 327, 335, [and for N. India, Crooke, Pop. Rel. and Folklore, ii. 42, seq.]). The practice of dharnā is made an offence under the Indian Penal Code. There is a systematic kind of dharnā practised by classes of beggars, e.g. in the Punjab by a class called Tasmivdās, or ‘strap-riggers,’ who twist a leather strap round the neck, and throw themselves on the ground before a shop, until alms are given; [Dorivdās, who threaten to hang themselves; Dandivdās, who rattle sticks, and stand cursing till they get alms; Urinums, who simply stand before a shop all day, and Gurusmāres and Chharimāres, who cut themselves with knives and spiked club] (see Ind. Antiq. i. 162, Herklotz, Qamoon-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. 193 seq.). It appears from Elphinston (below) that the custom sometimes received the Ar.
Pers. name of *takdz/, ‘dunning’ or ‘importunity.’

C. 1747.—‘While Nundi Raj, the Dulwai (see DALAWAY), was encamped at Sutti Mangul, his troops, for want of pay, placed him in Dhurana... Hurree Singh, forgetting the ties of salt or gratitude to his master, in order to obtain his arrears of pay, forbade the sleeping and eating of the Dulwai, by placing him in Dhurana... and that in so great a degree as to stop the water used in his kitchen. The Dulwai, losing heart from this rigour, with his clothes and the vessels of silver and gold used in travelling, and a small sum of money, gaged him off and discharged him.’ —H. of Hyder Naiz, iv. 41 seq.

C. 1794.—‘The practice called dhurana, which may be translated caption, or arrest.’ —Sir J. Shore, in As. Res. iv. 144.

1806.—‘A remarkable circumstance took place yesterday. Some Sirdars put the Maharan (Sindia) in dhurna. He was extremely angry, and threatened to put them to death. Bhugwunt Bas Bye, their head, said, ‘Sit still; put us to death.’ Sindia was enraged, and ordered him to be paid and driven from camp. He refused to go. The bazaars were shut the whole day; troops were posted to guard them and defend the tents. At last by the sign of the Sirdars money was paid off, and all was settled.’ —Elphinstone’s Diary, in Life, i. 179 seq.

1809.—‘Seendhiya (i.e. Sindia), who has been lately plagued by repeated dhurnas, seems now resolved to partake also in the active part of the amusement: he had permitted this same Patunkur, as a signal mark of favour, to borrow 60,000 rupees from the Khasee, or private treasury. The time elapsed without the agreement having been fulfilled; and Seendhiya immediately dispatched the treasurer to sit Dhurana on his behalf at Patunkur’s tents.’ —Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, 169 seq.; [ed. 1892, 127].

1812.—Moriér (Journey through Persia, 32) describes similar proceedings by a Dervish at Bushire.

1819.—‘It is this which is called takdz by the Mahrattas. If a man have demand from (I upon) his inferior or equal, he places him under restraint, prevents his leaving his house or eating, and even compels him to sit in the sun until he comes to some accommodation. If the debtor were a superior, the creditor had first recourse to supplications and appeals to the honour and sense of shame of the other party; if he laid himself on his threshold, threw himself in his road, clamoured before his door, or he employed others to do this for him; he would even sit down and fast before the debtor’s door, during which time the other was compelled to fast also; or he would appeal to the gods, and invoke their curses upon the person by whom he was injured.’ —Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 57.

1837.—‘Whoever voluntarily causes or attempts to cause any person to do anything which that person is not legally bound to do... inducing... to believe that he... will become... by some act of the offender, an object of the divine displeasure if he does not do the thing... shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.’

‘(a) A sits dhurana at Z.’s door with the intention of causing it to be believed that by so sitting he renders Z. an object of divine displeasure. A. has committed the offence defined in this section.

‘(b) A. threatens Z. that unless Z. performs a certain act A. will kill one of A.’s own children, under such circumstances that the killing would be believed to render Z. an object of the divine displeasure. A. has committed the offence described in this section.’ —Indian Penal Code, 508, in Chap. XXII., Criminal Intimidation, Insult, and Annoyance.

1875.—‘If you have a legal claim against a man of a certain rank and you are desirous of compelling him to discharge it, the Sanchus Mor tells you ‘to fast upon him.’ The institution is unquestionably identical with one widely diffused throughout the East, which is called by the Hindoos ‘sitting dhurna.’ It consists in sitting at the debtor’s door and starving yourself till he pays. From the English point of view the practice has always been considered barbarous and immoral, and the Indian Penal Code expressly forbids it. It suggests, however, the question—what would follow if the debtor simply allowed the creditor to starve! Undoubtedly the Hindoo supposes that some supernatural penalty would follow; indeed, he generally gives definiteness to it by retaining a Brahmin to starve himself vicariously, and no Hindoo doubts what would come of causing a Brahmin’s death.’ —Maine, Hist. of Early Institutions, 40. See also 297-304.

1885.—‘One of the most curious practices in India is that still followed in the native states by a Brahman creditor to compel payment of his debt, and called in Hindi dhurna, and in Sanskrit akartha, ‘customary proceeding,’ or Prtyopesavana, ‘sitting down to die by hunger.’ This procedure has long since been identified with the practice of ‘fasting upon’ (trusand for) a debtor to God or man, which is so frequently mentioned in the Irish so-called Brehon Laws.... In a MS. in the Bodleian... there is a Middle-Irish legend which tells how St. Patrick ‘fasted upon’ Loegaire, the unbelieving over-king of Ireland. Loegaire’s pious queen declares that she will not eat anything while Patrick is fasting. Her son Enna seeks for food.

"It is not fitting for thee," says his mother, "to eat food while Patrick is fasting upon you." . . . It would seem from this story that in Ireland the wife and children of the debtor, and, a fortiori, the debtor himself, had to fast so long as the creditor fasted."

Letter from Mr. Whitley Stokes, in Academy, Sept. 12th.

A striking story is told in Forbes's Ras Malá (ii. 393 seq.; [ed. 1878, p. 657]) of a farther proceeding following upon an unsuccessful dharmá, put in practice by a company of Chārans, or bards, in Kathiawār, to enforce payment of a debt by a chief of Jaiḷā to one of their number. After fasting three days in vain, they proceeded from dharmá to the further rite of trāga (q.v.). Some hacked their own arms; others decapitated three old women of their party, and hung their heads up as a garland at the gate. Certain of the women cut off their own breasts. The bards also pierced the throats of four of the older men with spikes, and took two young girls and dashed their brains out to the town-gate. Certain of the bards cut off their own breasts. The bards also pierced the throats of four of the older men with spikes, and took two young girls and dashed their brains out to the town-gate. Certain of the bards cut off their own breasts.

As he burned to death he cried out, "I am now dying, but I will become a headless ghost (Kavī) in the Palace, and will take the chief's life, and cut off his posterity!"

DIAMOND HARBOUR, n.p. An anchorage in the Hooghly below Calcutta, 30 m. by road, and 41 by river. It was the usual anchorage of the old Indiamen in the mercantile days of the E. I. Company. In the oldest charts we find the "Diamond Sand," on the western side of what is now called Diamond Harbour, and on some later charts, Diamond Point.

DIGINBOY, DIGRĪ, DEGEE, s. Anglo-Hindustani of law-court jargon for 'decree.'

[1886.—"This is grand, thought bold Bhuvanee Singh, diggree to pāh, lekin roopya to morpās bāh, 'He has got his decree, but I have the money.'—Confessions of an Orderly, 158.]

DIKK, s. Worry, trouble, botheration; what the Italians call seccaturra. This is the Anglo-Indian use. But the word is more properly adjective, Ar.-P.-H. diktor, dikktor, 'vexed, worried,' and so dikktor honā, 'to be worried.' (The noun dikktor, worry,' in vulgar usage, has become an adjective.)

1873.—

"And Beaufort learned in the law,
And Atkinson the Sage,
And if his locks are white as snow,
'Tis more from dikktor than age!"

Wilfrid Kosley, A Lay of Modern Darjeeling.

[1889.—"Were the Company's pumps to be beaten by the vagaries of that dikktor Arahandum nuddie?"]—R. Kipling, In Black and White, 52.)

DINAPORE, n.p. A well-known cantonment on the right bank of the Ganges, being the station of the great city of Patna. The name is properly Dāndāpur. Ives (1755) writes Dunapoor (p. 167). The cantonment was established under the government of Warren Hastings about 1772, but we have failed to ascertain the exact date.

[Cruso, writing in 1785, speaks of the cantonments having cost the Company 25 lakhs of rupees. (Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 445). There were troops there in 1773 (Gleig, Life of Warren Hastings, i. 297.)]

DINĀR, s. This word is not now in any Indian use. But it is remarkable as a word introduced into Skt. at a comparatively early date. "The names of the Arabic pieces of money are all taken from the coins of the Lower Roman Empire. Thus, the copper piece was called fals from follis; the silver dirham from drachma, and the gold dinār, from denarius, which, though properly a silver coin, was used generally to denote coins of came to mean in India a gold ornament we may learn from a passage in the 'Life of Mahârâva. There it is said that a lady had around her neck a string of grains and golden dinâras, and Stevenson adds that the custom of stringing coins together, and adorning with them children especially, is still very common in India."—Max Müller, Hist. of Sanskrit Literature, 247.

DINGY, DINGHY. s. Beng. dingi; [H. dingi, dengi, another form of donzi, Skt. droma, 'a trough.'] A small boat or skiff; sometimes also 'a canoe,' i.e. dug out of a single trunk. This word is not merely Anglo-Indian; it has become legitimately incorporated in the vocabulary of the British navy, as the name of the smallest ship's boat; [in this sense, according to the N.E.D., first in Midshipman Easy (1836).]

Dingâ occurs as the name of some kind of war-boat used by the Portuguese in the defence of Hugli in 1631 ("Sixty-four large dingas"; Elliot, vii. 34). The word dingi is also used for vessels of size in the quotation from Tippoo. Sir J. Campbell, in the Bombay Gazetteer, says that dhangi is a large vessel belonging to the Mâkrân coast; the word is said to mean "a log" in Bilâchî. In Guzerat the larger vessel seems to be called danga; and besides this there is dhangi, like a canoe, but built, not dug out.

1705.—"... pour aller à terre on est obligé de se servir d'un petit Bateau dont les bords sont très hauts, qu'on appelle Dingeses..."—L'huîître, 39.

1786.—"Propose to the merchants of Muscát... to bring hither, on the Dingeses, such horses as they may have for sale; which, being sold to us, the owner, can carry back the produce in rice."—Letters of Tippoo, 6.

1810.—"On these larger pieces of water there are usually canoes, or dinghes."—Williams, V.M., ii. 59.

1813.—"The Indian pomegranates... are by no means equal to those brought and the Persian silver drachmas, both of which were at hand, and to judge for himself which suggested the greater monarch. "Now the nomisma was a coin of right good ring and fine ruddy gold, bright in metal and elegant in execution, for such coins are picked on purpose to take thither, whilst the milliariées (or drachmas), to say it in one word, was of silver, and of course bore no comparison with the gold coin," &c. In another passage he says that a nomisma in Tappobana was worth 50 to 100 nomismata and more, which seems to imply that the gold ñadars were actually current in Ceylon. See the passages at length in Cathay, &c., pp. clixix-clix.

1810.—"The dirijees, or tailors, in Bombay, are Hindoos of respectable caste."—Maria Graham, 30.

DISPATCHADORE, s. This curious word was apparently a name given by the Portuguese to certain officials in Cochin-China. We know it only in the document quoted:

1696.—"The 23 I was sent to the Under-Dispatchadores, who found with my Secretaire before him. I having the key, he desired me to open it."—Bowyer's Journal at Cochin China, in Dalmatie, Or. Rep. i. 77; also "was made Under-Customer or Dispatchadores" (ibid. 81); and again: "The Chief Dispatchadores of the Strangers." (84).

DISSAVE, DISSAVA, &c., s. Singh. desa (Skt. desa, 'a country,' &c.), 'Governor of a Province,' under the Cundyan Government. Dianne, as used by the English in the gen. case, adopted from the native expression disave mahatma, 'Lord of the Province.' It is now applied by the natives to the Collector or 'Government Agent.' (See DISSAVE.)

DIU, n.p. A port at the south end of Peninsular Guzerat. The town stands on an island, whence its name, from Skt. deva, 'a god.' The Portuguese were allowed to build a fort here by treaty with Bahadur Shah of Guzerat, in 1635. It was once very famous for the sieges which the Portuguese successfully withstood (1638 and 1646) against the successors of Bahadur Shah [see the account in Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 37 seq.]. It still belongs to Portugal, but is in great decay. [Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 35) dwells on the advantages of its position.]

c. 700.—Chinese annals of the Tang dynasty mention Tsu as a port touched at by vessels bound for the Persian Gulf about 10 days before reaching the Indus. See Desguignes, in Mem. de l'Acad. Inscript. xxxii. 567.

1516.—"... there is a promontory, and joining close to it is a small island which contains a very large and fine town, which the Malabars call Diuza and the Moors of the country call it Diu. It has a very good harbour," &c.—Barbaro, 59.

1572,—"Succeder-lhe-ha alli Castro, que o estandarte Português terá sempre levantado, Conforme sucessor ao succedido: Que hum ergue Diu, outro o defende erguido."—Camões, x. 67.

By Burton:

"Castro succeeds, who Lusias estandard shall bear for ever in the front to wave; Succeessor the Succeded's work who endeth; that buildeth Diu, this builded Diu defendeth."

1648.—"At the extremity of this Kingdom, and on a projecting point towards the south lies the city Diu, where the Portuguese have 3 strong castles; this city is called by both Portuguese and Indians Diu (the last letter, s, being pronounced somewhat softly), a name which signifies 'Island.'"—Vas Temp., 13.

1727.—"Diu is the next Port. . . . It is one of the best built Cities, and best fortified by Nature and Art, that I ever saw in India, and its stately Buildings of free Stone and Marble, are sufficient Witnesses of its ancient Grandeur and Opulency; but at present not above one-fourth of the City is inhabited."—A. Hamilton, i. 187; [ed. 1744, i. 136].
DIUL-SIND.

DIUL-SIND.

n.p. A name by which Sind is often called in early European narratives, taken up by the authors, no doubt, like so many other prevalent names, from the Arab traders who had preceded them. Deval or Daoil was a once celebrated city and seaport of Sind, mentioned by all the old Arabian geographers, and believed to have stood at or near the site of modern Badal, preceded them. That we are aware and on the pole quoted by Eugueran. In this the ship, after leaving Tiya (Din) sailed 10 days further to another Tiya near the great river Atian or Sindu. This was no doubt, Deval near the great Minara or Sindu, i.e. Indus.—Mém. de l'Acad. des ins. xxii. 367.

c. 700.—The earliest mention of Deval that we are aware of is in a notice of Chinese Voyages to the Persian Gulf under the T'ang dynasty (7th and 8th centuries) quoted by Dugnius. In this the ships, after leaving Tiya (Din) sailed 10 days further to another Tiya near the great river Atian or Sindu. This was no doubt, Deval near the great Minara or Sindu, i.e. Indus.—Mém. de l'Acad. des ins. xxii. 367.

c. 880.—"There was at Debal a lofty temple (bud) surrounded by a long pole, and on the pole was fixed a red flag, which when the breeze blew was unfurled over the city. . . . Muhammad informed Hajjāj of what he had done, and solicited advice. . . . One day a reply was received to this effect: —"Fix the manjash . . . call the manjash-master, and tell him to aim at the flagstaff of which you have given a description." So he brought down the flagstaff, and it was broken; at which the infidels were sore afflicted."—Biladuri, in Elliot, i. 120.

c. 900.—"From Narisr to Debal is 8 days' journey, and from Debal to the junction of the river Minbān with the sea, is 2 parasangas."—Ibn Khordādhbeh, in Elliot, i. 15.

976.—"The City of Debal is to the west of the Minbān, towards the sea. It is a large mart, and the port not only of this, but of the neighbouring regions."—Ibn Haukal, in Elliot, i. 37.

c. 1150.—"The place is inhabited only because it is a station for the vessels of Sind and other countries . . . ships laden with the productions of Úmān, and the vessels of China and India come to Debal."—Idirsi, in Elliot, i. p. 77.

d. 1228.—"All that country down to the seashore was subdued. Malik Simān-ud-din Hanbah, chief of Deval and Sind, came and did homage to the Sultan."—Tabakāt-i-Nasiri, in Elliot, ii. 326.

[1518.—"And thence we had sight of Dihlindāy."—Alberquerque, Cartas, p. 259.]

1518.—"Leaving the Kingdom of Ormuz, the coast goes to the South-east for 172 leagues as far as Dihlindā, entering the Kingdom of Ulcinde, which is between Persia and India."—Barbares, 49.

1553.—"From this Cape Jasque to the famous river Indus are 200 leagues, in which space are these places Guadel, Calara, Calama, and Dīul, the last situated on the most westerly mouth of the Indus."—De Barros, Dec. II. liv. ix. cap. i.

c. 1554.—"If you guess that you may be drifting to Jaked . . . you must try to go to Karanush, or to enter Khur (the estuary of Dīl Sind)."—The Mohi, in J. As. Soc. Beng. v. 463.

—"He offered me the town of Habor, i.e. Dīl Sind, but as I did not accept it I begged him for leave to depart."—Sidi 'Ali Kapudān, in Journ. As. 1st Ser. tom. ix. 131.

[1557.—Couto says that the Italians who travelled overland before the Portuguese discovered the sea route 'found on the other side on the west those people called Dīlais, so called from their chief city named Dīl, where they settled, and whence they passed to Cinde.]

1572.—"Olha a terra de Ulicinde fertilissima . . . E de Jaquesta a intima ensesada."—Cambes, x. ovi.

1614.—"At Dihlindā the Expedition in her former Voyage had delivered Sir Robert Shelley the Persian Embassador."—Capt. W. Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

[1616.—"The river Indus doth not powre himself into the sea by the bay of Cambaya, but far westward, at Sindu."—Sir T. Kor, Hak. Soc. i. 122.]

1638.—"Les Penses et les Arabes donnent au Royanne de Sindo le nom de Dil."—Mandelbrot, 114.

c. 1650.—Dīl is marked in Blaeu's great Atlas on the W. of the most westerly mouth of the Indus.

c. 1666.—". . . la ville la plus Méridionale est Dīl. On la nomme encore Dīl Sind, et autrfois on l'appella Dobii. . . . Il y a des Orientaux qui donnent le nom de Dīl au Pays de Sinde."—Theselin, v. 158.

1727.—"All that shore from Jasque to Sinday, inhabited by uncivilised People, who admit of no Commerce with Strangers, tho' Guardel and Dīl, two Sea-ports, did about a Century ago afford a good Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 115 ; [ed. 1744].

1753.—"Celui (le bras du Sind) de la droite, après avoir passé à Fairuz, distant ce Mansour de trois journées selon Edrisi, se rend à Dīl ou Dīwīl, au quel nom on ajoute quelque fois celui de Sīndi. . . . La ville est située sur une langue de terre en forme de péninsule, d' où je pense que lui vient son nom actuel de Dīl ou Dīwīl, DOAB, s. and n.p. P.—H. dodd, ‘two waters,’ i.e. ‘Mesopotamia,’ the tract between two confluent rivers. In Upper India, when used absolutely, the term always indicates the tract between the Ganges and Jumna. Each of the like tracts in the Punjab has its distinctive name, several of corn-

Lower Yrdu, lying between the Kistna and Che&b, 'tract between two confluent rivers. In the emperor Akbar. [Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 311 seg.] The only Dodb known familiarly by that name in the south of India is the Raichur Dodb in the Nizam’s country, lying between the Kistna and Tungabhadra.

DOAI! DWYE! Interj. Properly H. dohay, or dahay, Gujarati dawodhi, an exclamation (hitherto of obscure etymology) shouted aloud by a petitioner for redress at a Court of Justice, or as any one passers who is supposed to have it in his power to aid in rendering the justice sought. It has a kind of analogy, as Thvenot pointed out over 200 years ago, to the old Norman Haro! Haro! viens à mon aide, mon Prince!* but does not now carry the privilege of the Norman cry; though one may conjecture, both from Indian analogies and from the statement of Ibn Batuta quoted below, that it once did. Every Englishman in Upper India has often been saluted by the calls of, ‘Dohay Khudduvand ki! Dohay Mahardaj! Dohay Kompant Bahadur! ‘Justice, my Lord! Justice, O King! Justice, O Company’!—perhaps in consequence of some oppression by his followers, perhaps in reference to some grievance with which he has no power to interfere. “Until 1860 no one dared to ignore the appeal of dohay to a native Prince within his territory. I have heard a serious charge made against a person for calling the dohay needlessly” (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

Wilson derives the exclamation from da, ‘two’ or repeatedly, and hāti ‘alas,’ illustrating this by the phrase ‘dohay tāhāi karnā, to make exclamation (or invocation of justice) twice and thrice.’ [Platts says, do-hāy, Skt. hṛ-ḥāda, a crying twice “alas!”] This phrase, however, we take to be merely an example of the ‘striving after meaning,’ usual in cases where the real origin of the phrase is forgotten. We cannot doubt that the word is really a form of the Skt. dṛohā, ‘injury, wrong.’ And this is confirmed by the form in Ibn Batuta, and the Mahr. durdhi; “an exclamation or expression used in prohibiting in the name of the Raja... implying an imprecation of his vengeance in case of disobedience” (Molesworth’s Dict.); also Tel. and Canar. dārāx, ‘protest, prohibition, caveat, or veto in arrest of proceedings’ (Wilson and C. P. B., MS.)

c. 1340.—“It is a custom in India that when money is due from any person who is favoured by the Sultan, and the creditor wants his debt settled, he lies in wait at the Palace gate for the debtor, and when the latter is about to enter he assails him with the exclamation Darūhāi wa-Sultan/ ‘O Enemy of the Sultan.—I swear by the head of the King thou shalt not enter till thou hast paid me what thou owes.’ The debtor cannot then stir from the spot, until he has satisfied the creditor, or has obtained his consent to the respite.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 412. The significant assignment to the words by the Moorish traveller probably only shows that the real meaning was unknown to his Musulman friends at Delhi, whilst its form strongly corroborates our etymology, and shows that it still kept close to the Sanskrit.

1609.—“He is severe enough, but all helpeth not; for his poor Riats or clownes complaines of Injustice done them, and cry for justice at the King's hands.”—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 223.

c. 1666.—“Quand on y veut arreté une personne, on cite seulement Dōa padecha; cette clamoure a autant de force que celle de haro en Normandie; et si on defend à quelquin’un de sortir, du lieu ou il est, on ditant Dōa padecha, il ne peut partir sans se rendre criminal, et il est obligé de se presenter à la Justice.”—Thevenot, v. 61.

1834.—“The servant woman began to make a great outcry, and wanted to leave the ship, and cried Dōaee to the Company, for she was murdered and kidnapped.”—The Baboo, ii. 242.

DOAB, n.p. A name applied to the strip of moist land, partially cultivated with rice, which extends at the foot of the Himālaya mountains to Bhotan. It corresponds to the Terai further west; but embraces the conception of the passes or accesses to the hill country from this last verge of the plain, and is apparently the Skt. dōtra, a gate or entrance. [The E. Dwars of Goalpara District, and the W. Dwars of Jalpaiguri were annexed in 1864 to stop the raids of the Bhūtas.]

DOBUND, s. This word is not in the Hind. Dicts. (nor is it in Wilson), but it appears to be sufficiently elucidated by the quotation:

1787.—"That the power of Mr. Fraser to make dozubs, or new and additional embankments in aid of the old ones . . . was a power very much to be suspected, and very improper to be entrusted to a contractor who had already covenanted to keep the old ones in perfect repair." —Articles against W. Hastings, in Burke, vii. 98.

DOLLY, s. Hind. dāli. A complimentary offering of fruit, flowers, vegetables, sweetmeats and the like, presented usually on one or more trays; also the daily basket of garden produce laid before the owner by the Māli or gardener ("The Molly with his dolly"). The proper meaning of dāli is a 'branch' or 'twig' (Skt. dār); then a 'basket', a 'tray', or a 'pair of trays slung to a yoke', as used in making the offerings. Twenty years ago the custom of presenting dāli was innocent and merely complimentary; but, if the letter quoted under 1889 is correct, it must have grown into a gross abuse, especially in the Punjab. [The custom has now been in most Provinces regulated by Government orders.]

1882.—"A Dhoonde is a flat basket, on which is arranged in neat order whatever fruit, vegetables, or herbs are at the time in season."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 383.

1880.—"Brass dishes filled with pistachio nuts are displayed here and there; they are the oblations of the would-be visitors. The English call these offerings dollsies; the natives dāli. They represent in the profuse East the visiting cards of the meagre West."—Ali Baba, 84.

1882.—"I learn that in Madras dollsies are restricted to a single gilded orange or lime, or a tiny sugar pagoda, and Madras officers who have seen the baskets of fruit, nuts, almonds, sugar-candy . . . &c., received by single officials in a single day in the N.W. Provinces, and in addition the number of bottles of brandy, champagne, liquors, &c., received along with all the preceding in the Punjab, have been . . . astounding that such a practice should be countenanced by Government."—Letter in Pioneer Mail, March 18.

DOME, DHOME; in S. India commonly Dombaree, Dombar, s. Hind. Dōm or Dōmer. The name of a very low caste, representing some old aboriginal race, spread all over India. In many places they perform such offices as carrying dead bodies, removing carrion, &c. They are often musicians; in Oudh sweepers; in Champāran professional thieves (see Elliot's Races of the N.W.P.,[Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, s.v.]). It is possible, as has been suggested by some one, that the Gypsy Romany is this word.

... c. 1528.—"There be also certain others which be called Dumbri who eat carrion and carasses; who have absolutely no object of worship; and who have to do the drudgeries of other people, and carry loads."—Friar Jordanus, Hak. Soc. p. 21.

1817.—"There is yet another tribe of vagrants, who are also a separate sect. They are the class of mountebanks, buffoons, posture-masters, tumblers, dancers, and the like. . . . The most dissolute body is that of the Dumbars or Dumbarn."—Abū Dubois, 488.

DONDERA HEAD, n.p. The southernmost point of Ceylon; called after a magnificent Buddhist shrine there, much frequented as a place of pilgrimage, which was destroyed by the Portuguese in 1687. The name is a corruption of Deva-nagara, in Elu (or old Singalese) Deva-nawora; in modern Singalese Devendra (Ind. Antig. i. 329). The place is identified by Tennent with Ptolemy's "Dagana, sacred to the moon." Is this name in any way the origin of the opprobrium 'dunderhead'? [The N.E.D. gives no countenance to this, but leaves the derivation doubtful; possibly akin to duner]. The name is so written in Dunn's Directory, 5th ed. 1780, p. 59; also in a chart of the Bay of Bengal, without title or date in Dalrymple's Collection.

1844.—"We travelled in two days to the city of Dinawar, which is large, near the sea, and inhabited by traders. In a vast temple there, one sees an idol which bears the same name as the city. . . . The city and its revenues are the property of the idol."—Ibn Batute, iv. 184.

1553.—"Tambatari." See under GALLE, POINT DE.]
DONEY, DHONY, s. In S. India, a small native vessel, properly formed (at least the lower part of it) from a single tree. Tamil doa. Dr. Gundert suggests as the origin Skt. drowa, 'a wooden vessel.' But it is perhaps connected with the Tamil tonduga, 'to scoop out'; and the word would then be exactly analogous to the Anglo-American 'dug-out.' In the J.R.A.S. vol. i. is a paper by Mr. Edye, formerly H.M.'s Master Shipwright in Ceylon, on the native vessels of South India, and among others he describes the Doni (p. 13), with a drawing to scale. He calls it 'a huge vessel of ark-like form, about 70 feet long, 20 feet broad, and 12 feet deep; with a flat bottom or keel part, which at the broadest place is 7 feet; ... the whole equipment of these rude vessels, as well as their construction, is the most coarse and unseaworthy that I have ever seen.' From this it would appear that the doney is no longer a 'dug-out,' as the suggested etymology, and Pyrard de Laval's express statement, indicate it to have been originally.

1552.—Castanheda already uses the word as Portuguese: 'foi logo córta ho tóma.'

1553.—'Vasco da Gama having started ... on the following day they were becalmed rather more than a league and a half from Calicut, when there came towards them more than 60 tomás, which are small vessels, crowded with people.'—Barros, L. iv., 22.

1561.—The word constantly occurs in this form (tomé) in Correa, e.g. vol. i. pt. 1, 408, 502, &c.

1599.—'... certaine scutes or Skiffes called Tomes.'—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 56.

1606.—There is a good description of the vessel in Goova, i. 26.

c. 1610.—'Le bateau s'appelle Domy, c'est à dire doney, pour qu'il estoit pro-\mier de voiles.'—Pyrard de Laval, i. 65; [Hak. Soc. i. 66].

'Le plupart de leurs vaisseaux sont d'une seule piece, qu'ils appellent Tommy, et les Portugais Almedissi (Almadési),' Ibid. i. 278; [Hak. Soc. i. 389].

1644.—'They have in this city of Cochin certain boats which they call Tomes, in which they navigate the shallow rivers, which have 5 or 6 palms of depth, 16 or 20 cubits in length, and with a broad parson of 5 or 6 palms, so that they build above an upper story called Bayles, like a little house, thatched with Ox (Ollah), and closed at the sides. This contains many passengers, who go to amuse themselves on the rivers, and there are spent in this way many thousands of cruzados.'—Bocarro MS.

1666.—'... with 110 parose, and 100 cutares (see Prowse Cataph) of broad beam, full of people ... the enemy displayed himself on our caravels.'—Faria y Sousa, Asia Portug. i. 66.

1672.—'... four fishermen from the town came over to us in a Tony.'—Baldaeus, Ceylon (Dutch ed.), 89.

[1821.—In Travels on Foot through the Island of Ceylon, by J. H. Haefner, translated from the Dutch (Phillips's New Voyages and Travels, v. 6, 79), the words 'thonny,' 'thonny's' of the original are translated Funny, Funnies; this is possibly a misprint for Tunnies, which appears on p. 65 as the rendering of 'thonny's.' See Notes and Queries, 9th ser. iv. 183.]

1860.—'Amongst the vessels at anchor (at Galle) lie the downs of the Arabs, the Fatamars of Malabar, the dhonays of Coromandel.'—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 103.

DOBE, s. H. dób, from Skt. dôra. A very nutritious creeping grass (Cymodocon dactylon, Pers.), spread very generally in India. In the hot weather of Upper India, when its growth is scanty, it is eagerly sought for horses by the 'grass-cutters.' The natives, according to Roxburgh, quoted by Drury, cut the young leaves and make a cooling drink from the roots. The popular etymology, from dôr, 'sunshine,' has no foundation. Its merits, its lowly gesture, its spreading quality, give it a frequent place in native poetry.

1810.—'The doob is not to be found everywhere; but in the low countries about Duoco ... this grass abounds; attaining to a prodigious height.'—Williamson, V. M. i. 258.

DOOCAUN, s. Ar. dukkân, Pers. and H. dukán, 'a shop'; dukândar, 'a shopkeeper.'

1554.—'And when you buy in the dukân (nos duces), they don't give piotta (see Picota), and so the Dükânars (or Dukamdares) gain ...'—A. Nunes, 22.

1810.—'L'estraade elevée sur laquelle le marchand est assis, et d'où il montre sa marchandise aux acheteurs, est proprement ce qu'on appelle dukân; mot qui signifie, suivant son étymologie, une estrade ou plateforme, sur laquelle on se peut tenir assis, et que nous traduisons improprement par boutique.'—Note by Silvestre de Sacy, in Relation de l'Egypte, 304.

[1832.—'The Dükhausas (shops) small, with the whole front open towards the street.'—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, ii. 36.]
DOOMBUR, s. The name commonly given in India to the fat-tailed sheep, breeds of which are spread over West Asia and East Africa. The word is properly Pers. *dumba, dumba; damb, 'tail,' or especially this fat tail. The old story of little carts being attached to the quarters of these sheep to bear their tails is found in many books, but it is difficult to trace any modern evidence of the fact. We quote some passages bearing on it:

1298.—"Then there are sheep here as big as asses; and their tails are so large and fat, that one tail shall weigh some 30 lbs. They are fine fat beasts, and afford capital mutton."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 18.

1436.—"Their fiftieth kinds of beasts are sheep, which be unreasonable great, long legged, longe wolle, and great tayles, that wase about xij. a piece. And some such I have seene as have drawn a whole wheele after them, their tayles being holden vp."—Jos. Barbaro, Hak. Soc. 21.

[1615.—"... dubeties gouserams."—Foster, Letters, iii. 156.]

DOORGA POOJA, s. Skt. Durgapujy, 'Worship of Durga.' The chief Hindu festival in Bengal, lasting for 10 days in September—October, and forming the principal holiday-time of all the Calcutta offices. (See DUSSEERA.) [The common term for these holidays nowadays is 'the Poojahs.']

1835.—"And every Doorga Pooja would good Mr. Simme explore The famous river Hoogly up as high as Barrackpore."

Lines in honour of the late Mr. Simme, Bole Ponja, 1857, ii. 220.

1900.—"Calcutta has been in the throes of the Poojahs since yesterday."—Pioneer Mail, Oct. 5.

DOORSUMMUND, n.p. Darasmand; a corrupt form of *Dvārā-Samudra (Gate of the Sea), the name of the capital of the Balās, a medieval dynasty in S. India, who ruled a country generally corresponding with Mysore. [See Rice, Mysore, ii. 353.] The city itself is identified with the fine ruins at Halabidu [Hale-bidū, 'old capital'], in the Hassan district of Mysore.
c. 1900.—"There is another country called Deogir. Its capital is called Dur Samundur."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 73. (There is confusion in this.)

1309.—"The royal army marched from this place towards the country of Dur Samund."—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 49.

1310.—"On Sunday, the 23rd . . . he took a select body of cavalry with him, and on the 5th Shawwal reached the fort of Durt Samund, after a difficult march of 12 days."—Amir Khwārī, ibid. 88. See also Notices et Extraits, xiii. 171.

DORADO. s. Port. A kind of fish; apparently a dolphin (not the cetacean animal so called). The Coryphaena Hippurus of Day's Fishes is called by Cuvier and Valenciennes C. dorado. See also quotation from Drake. One might doubt, because of the praise of its flavour in Bontius, whilst Day only says of the C. hippocrepis that "these dolphins are eaten by natives." Fryer, however, uses an expression like that of Bontius:—"The Dolphin is ex- tolled beyond these,"—i.e. Bonito and Albicore (p. 19).

1578.—"When he is chased of the Bonito, or great mackerel (whom the Aurata or Dolphin also pursueth)."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 92.

1631.—"Pices Dorados dicti a Portugal-enasbus, ab aureo quem ferunt in cute colore . . . hic species est longe optimi saporis, Bonitas bonitate excellens."—Jac. Bontii, Lib. V. cap. xix. 73.

DORAY, DURAI. s. This is a South Indian equivalent of Sahib (q.v.); Tel. dora, Tam. turai, 'Master.' Sinhaturai, 'small gentleman' is the equivalent of Chhota Sahib, a junior officer; and Tel. doraatu, Tam. turaiatai (cor ruptly doratsai) of 'Lady' or 'Madam.'

1680.—"The delivery of three Iron guns to the Deura of Rama-cole at the rate of 15 Pagodas per candy is ordered . . . which is more than what they cost."—Fort St. Geo. Consl. Aug. 5. In Notes and Extracts, No. iii. p. 31.

1837.—"The Vakeela stand behind their masters during all the visit, and discourse with them all that A—says. Sometimes they tell him some bare-faced lie, and when they find he does not believe it, they turn to me grinning, and say, 'Ma'am, the Doory plenty cunning gentleman.'"—Letters from Madras, 86.

1882.—"The appellation by which Sir T. Munro was most commonly known in the Ceded Districts was that of 'Colonel Dora.' And to this day it is considered a sufficient answer to inquiries regarding the reason for any Revenue Rule, that I was laid down by the Colonel Dora."—Arbuthnot's Memoir of Sir T. M., p. xcviii.

A village up the Godaverry, on the left bank, is inhabited by a race of people known as Doraylu, or 'gentlemen.' That this is the understood meaning is shown by the fact that their women are called Doressandu, i.e. 'ladies.' These people rifle their arrow feathers, i.e. give them a spiral." (Reference lost.) [These are perhaps the Koils, who are called by the Telingas Koothara, 'the word choru meaning gentleman' or Sahib."

(Central Prov. Gaz. 500; also see Ind. Ant. viii. 34).

DORIA. s. H. dorīya, from dōr, dōri, 'a cord or leash'; a dog-keeper.

1781.—"Stolen . . . The Dog was taken out of Capt. Law's Baggage Boat . . . by the Durrer that brought him to Calcutta."—India Gazette, March 17.

[Dorīya is also used for a kind of cloth. "As the characteristic pattern of the charkhana is a check, so that of the dorīya is stripes running along the length of the tdhn, i.e. in warp threads. The dorīya was originally a cotton fabric, but it is now manufactured in silk, silk-and-cotton, tasar, and other combinations" (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 94).]

[c. 1590.—In a list of cotton cloths, we have "Doriyah, per piece, 6R. to 2R."—Ain, i. 85.

[1683.—". . . 3 piece Dooress."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.]

DOSOOTY. s. H. do-ṣūṭi, do-ṣūṭa, 'double thread,' a kind of cheap cotton stuff woven with threads doubled.

[1843.—"The other pair (of travelling baskets) is simply covered with dosootee (a coarse double-threaded cotton)."

—Davidson, Diary in Upper India, i. 10.]

DOUBLE-GRILL. s. Domestic H. of the kitchen for 'a devil' in the culinary sense.

DOUR. s. A foray, or a hasty expedition of any kind. H. daur, 'a run. Also to dour, 'to run,' or 'to make such an expedition.'

1853.—"Halloa! Oakfield,' cried Perkins, as he entered the mess tent . . . 'don't look down in the mouth, man; Attock taken, Chutter Sing dancing down like the devil—march to-morrow. . . .'"—Oakfield, ii. 67.

DOW. s. H. dā, [Skt. dātra, da, 'to cut'.] A name much used on the Eastern frontier of Bengal as well as by Europeans in Burma, for the hewing knife or bill, of various forms, carried by the races of those regions, and used both for cutting jungle and as a sword. Dha is the true Burmese name for their weapon of this kind, but we do not know if there is any relation but an accidental one with the Hind. word. [See drawing in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, p. 84.]

[1870.—"The Dac is the bill knife... It is a blade about 18 inches long, narrow at the haft, and square and broad at the tip; pointless, and sharpened on one side only. The blade is set in a handle of wood; a bamboo root is considered the best. The fighting dac is differently shaped; this is a long pointless sword, set in a wooden or ebony handle; it is very heavy, and a blow of almost incredible power can be given by one of these weapons... The weapon is identical with the "parang latak" of the Malays..."—Levine, Wild Races of S.E. India, 35 seq.

DOWLE. s. H. daul, daulā. The ridge of clay marking the boundary between two rice fields, and retaining the water; called commonly in S. India a bund. It is worth noting that in Sussex doole is "a small conical heap of earth, to mark the bounds of farms and parishes in the downs" (Wright, Dict. of Obs. and Prov. English). [The same comparison was made by Sir H. Elliot (Surr. Gloss, s.v. Doula); the resemblance is merely accidental; see N.E.D. s.v. Doool.]

1851.—"In the N.W. corner of Suffolk, where the country is almost entirely open, the boundaries of the different parishes are marked by earthen mounds from 3 to 6 feet high, which are known in the neighbourhood as doolas."—Notes and Queries, 1st Series, vol. iv. p. 161.

DOWBA. s. A guide. H. daurtha, daurahā, daurā, 'a village runner, a guide' from daurnā, 'to run,' Skt. drava, 'running.'

[1900.—"The mule race for Drabis and grass-cutters was entertaining."—Pioneer Mail, March 16.]

DRAVIDIAN. adj. The Skt. term Dravid seems to have been originally the name of the Conjevaram Kingdom (4th to 11th cent. A.D.), but in recent times it has been used as equivalent to 'Tamil.' About A.D. 700 Kumārila Bhaṭṭa calls the language of the South Andhra-dravidā-bhāṣā, meaning probably, as Bishop Caldwell suggests, what we should now describe as 'Telugu-Tamil-language.' Indeed he has shown reason for believing that Tamil and Dravid, of which Drahā (written Tiramā), and Drāmāri are old forms, are really the same word. [Also see Oppert, Orig. Inhab. 26 seq., and Drāvira, in a quotation from Al-biruni under Malārāb.] It may be suggested as possible that the Tropina of Pliny is also the same (see below). Dr. Caldwell proposed Dravidian as a convenient name for the S. Indian languages which belong to the Tamil family, and the cultivated members of which are Tamil, Malayālām, Canarese, Tulu, Kudagu (or Coorg), and Telegu; the uncultivated Toda, Kōta, Gōnd, Khon, Orāon, Rājmahālī. [It has also been adopted as an anthropological term to designate the non-Aryan races of India (see Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. Intro. xxxi.).]

C. A.D. 70.—"From the mouth of Ganges where he entereth into the sea unto the cape Calingon, and the town Dandagula, are counted 726 miles; from thence to Tropina, where standeth the chief market towns of merchandise in all India, 1225 miles. Then to the promontorie of Perimula they reckon 750 miles, from which to the town abovesaid Patale... 620."—Pliny, by Phil. Holland, vi. chap. xx.

A.D. 404.—In a south-western direction are the following tracts... Surasatrians, Bādāras, and Drāvidas.—Vardia-mikira, in J.R.A.S., 2nd ser. v. 84.

"The eastern half of the Narbadda district... the Pulindas, the eastern half of the Drāvidas... of all these the Sun is the Lord."—Ibid. p. 231.

C. 1045.—"Moreover, chief of the sons of Bharata, there are, the nations of the South, the Drāvidas... the Karnatikas, Māśīakas..."—Vīyasa Purdana, by H. H. Wilson, 1865, ii. 177 seq.

1856.—"The idioms which are included in this work under the general term 'Dra-vidian' constitute the vernacular speech of the great majority of the inhabitants of S. India."—Caldwell, Comp. Grammar of the Dravidian Languages, 1st ed.

1869.—"The people themselves arrange their countrypeople under two heads; five termed Pasch-pavra, belonging to the Hindi, or as it is now generally called, the Aryan group, and the remaining five, or Panch-Davrada, to the Tamil type."—Sir W. Elliot, in J. Ethn. Societies N.S. i. 94.

DRAWERS, LONG. s. An old-fashioned term, probably obsolete except in Madras, equivalent to pyjamas (q.v.).

1794.—"The contractor shall engage to supply . . . every patient . . . with . . . a clean gown, cap, shirt, and long drawers."—In Jetem-Karr, ii. 115.

DRESSING-BOY, DRESS-BOY, s. Madras term for the servant who acts as valet, corresponding to the bearer (q.v.) of N. India.
1887.—See Letters from Madras, 106.

DRUGGERMAN, s. Neither this word for an 'interpreter,' nor the Levantine dragomen, of which it was a quaint old English corruption, is used in Anglo-Indian colloquial; nor is the Arab taryumdn, which is the correct form, a word usual in Hindustani. But the character of the two former words seems to entitle them not to be passed over in this Glossary. The Arabic is a loan-word from Aramaic targedmun, 'an interpreter;' the Jewish Targum, or Chaldee paraphrases of the Scriptures, being named from the same root. The original force of the Aramaic root is seen in the Assyrian raqdmu, 'to speak,' rigma, 'the word.' See Proc. Soc. Bibl. Arch., 1883, p. 73, and Delitzsch, The Hebrew Language, viewed in the Light of Assyrian Research, p. 50. In Old Italian we find a form somewhat nearer to the Arabic. (See quotation from Pegolotti below.)

1270.—"After this my address to the assembly, I sent my message to Ely by a dragoman (trujaman) of mine."—Chron. of James of Aragons, tr. by Foster, ii. 588.

Villesardouin, early in the 18th century, uses draguement [and for other early forms see N.E.D. s.v. Dragoman.]

1569.—"Il aven gens ille qui savoient le Sarraissinnois et le françons que l'on appele draguemenis, qui enromanoient le Sarraissinois au Conte Perron."—Joinville, ed. of Wadley, 182.

1548.—"And at Tana you should furnish yourself with dragomans (turchmani)."—Pegolotti's Handbook, in Cathey, &c., ii. 281, and App. iii.

1404.—". . . el maestro en Teologia dixo por su Truximnan que dixesse al Señor q aquella carta que se fijo el rey le embara non la sabia otro leer, salvo el . . ."—Giosefo, 446.

1595.—". . . e dopo m'esseravi procuristi di va buonissimo dragomano, et interprete, fu inteso il suono delle trombette le quali annuntiavano l'audienza del Re" (di Pegh.)—Gaspardo Balbi, f. 102v.

1613.—"To the Trojan Shore, where I landed Feb. 22 with fourteene English men more, and a low or Druggerman."—T. Coryat, in Purchas, i. 1813.

1615.—"E distro, a cavallo, i dragomanni, cioè interpreti della repubblica e con loro tutti i dragomanni degli altri ambasciatori ai loro luoghi."—P. della Valle, i. 89.

1788.—"Till I cried out, you prove yourself so able, Pity! you was not Druggerman at Babel! For had they found a linguist half so good, I make no question that the Tower had stood."—Pope, after Donne, Sat. iv. 81.

Other forms of the word are (from Span. trujaman) the old French truchement, Low-Latin drucamundus, turchmannus, Low Greek dragoburopo, &c.

DRUMSTICK. s. The colloquial name in the Madras Presidency for the long slender pods of the Moringa pterygosperma, Gaertner, the Horse-Radish Tree (q.v.) of Bengal.

1790.—"Mon domestique étot occupé à me préparer un plat de mornages, qui sont une espèce de fèves longues, auxquelles les Européens ont donné, à cause de leur forme, le nom de baguettes à tambour. . ."—Hausner, ii. 26.

DUB. s. Telugu dabbu, Tam. idappu; a small copper coin, the same as the doody (see CASH), value 20 cash; whence it comes to stand for money in general. It is curious that we have also an English provincial word, "Dubs—money, E. Sussex" (Halloway, Gen. Dict. of Provincialisms, Lewes, 1838). And the slang 'to dub up,' for to pay up, is common (see Slang Dict.).
1781. — "In "Table of Prison Expenses and articles of luxury only to be attained by the opulent, after a length of saving" (i.e. in captivity in Mysore), we have—

"Eight cheroots . . . 0 1 0."

"The prices are in fanams, dabs, and cash. The fanam changes for 11 dabs and 4 cash."—In Lives of the Lascars, iii. c. 1790. — "J'eu pour quatre dabons, qui font environ cinq sous de France, d'excellent poisson pour notre souper."—Haafner, ii. 75.

DUBASH, DOBASH, DEBASH.

S. H. dubhdsahiya, dobaehi (lit. 'man of two languages'), Tam. tupdshi. An interpreter; obsolete except at Madras, and perhaps there also now, at least in its original sense; [now it is applied to a dressing-boy or other servant with a European.] The Dubash was at Madras formerly a usual servant in every household; and there is still one attached to each mercantile house, as the broker transacting business with natives, and corresponding to the Calcutta banyan (q.v.). According to Drummond the word has a peculiar meaning in Guzerat: "A Doobasheo in Guzerat is viewed as an evil spirit, who by telling lies, sets people by the ears." This illustrates the original meaning of dubash, which might be rendered in Bunyan's fashion as Mr. Two-Tongues.

[1566. — "Bring troops and interpreter, Antonio Fernandez."—India Office MSS. Gaveta's agreement with the jangadas of the fort of Quilon, Aug. 13.]

[1664. — "Per nostra conta a ambos por manilha 400 fanocim o ao tupay 50 fanocim."

—Letter of Zamorin, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 1.]

[1783. — "The Moors are very grave and haughty in their Demeanor, not vouchsafing to return an Answer by a slave, but by a Dubaeh."—Fryer, 30.]

[1679. — "The Dubbass of this Factory having to regain his freedom."—S. Master, in Mon. of Kistna Dist. 128.]

[1693. — "The chief Dubaosh was ordered to treat . . . for putting a stop to their proceedings."—Wheeler, i. 279.]

[1790. — "He ordered his Dubash to give the messenger two pagodas (sixteen shillings);—it was poor reward for having received two wounds, and risking his life in bringing him intelligence."—Letter of Sir T. Musgro, in Life, i. 26.]

[1800. — "The Dubash were ought to be hanged for having made difficulties in collecting the rice."—Letter of Sir A. Wallasey, in Go. 258.]

[1804. — "I could neither understand them nor they me; but they would not give me up until a Debash, whom Mrs. Sherwood had hired . . . came to my relief with a palaquin."—Autobiog. of Mrs. Sherwood, p. 272.]

[1809. — "He (Mr. North) drove at once from the court to the tribe of Aumils and Dubashes."—Ed. Valentina, i. 316.]

[1810. — "In this first boat a number of Dabashes are sure to arrive."—Williamson, V. M. i. 138.]

[1850. — "The moodliars and native officers . . . were superseded by Malabar Dubashes, men aptly described as enemies to the religion of the Singhaless, strangers to their habits, and animated by no impulse but extortion."—Temple's Ceylon, ii. 72.]

DUBBER, s. P.-H. dabr, 'a writer or secretary.' It occurs in Pehlevi as debir, connected with the old Pers. dipt, 'writing.' The word is quite obsolete in Indian use.

1760. — "The King . . . referred the adjustment to his Dubbeer, or minister, which, amongst the Indians, is equivalent to the Duan of the Mahomedan Princes."—Orme, ii. § 601.

DUBBER, s. Hind. (from Pers.) dabbah; also, according to Wilson, Guzerat* tabar; Mahr. dabaar. A large oval vessel, made of green buffalo-hide, which, after drying and stiffening, is used for holding and transporting ghee or oil. The word is used in North and South alike.

1554. — "Butter (d matiipa, i.e. ghee) sells by the maund, and comes hither (to Ormus) from Bacosra and from Reyxel (see RESH-IRE); the most (however) that comes to Ormus is from Dital and from Mangalore, and comes in certain great jars of hide, dabasas."—A. Nunez, 28.

1673. — "Did they not boil their Butter it would be rank, but after it has passed the Fire they keep it in Duppers the year round."—Fryer, 118.

1727. — (From the Indus Delta.) "They export great quantities of Butter, which they gently melt and put up in Jars called Duppas, made of the Hides of Cattle, almost in the Figure of a Glob, with a Neck and Mouth on one side."—A. Hamilton, i. 126; [ed. 1744, i. 127].

1808. — "Purbhooas Shot of Broach, in whose books a certain Mahratta Sirdar is said to stand debtor for a Crore of Rupees . . . in early life brought . . . ghee in dubbers upon his own head hither from Baroda, and retailed it . . . in open Basar."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.
1810.—“... dubbahs or bottles made of green hide.” —Williams, V. M. ii. 139.

1845.—“I find no account made out by the prisoner of what became of these dubbahs of ghee.” —G. O. by Sir C. Napier, in Sind, 35.

DUCKS, s. The slang distinctive name for gentlemen belonging to the Bombay service; the correlative of the Mulls of Madras and of the Qui-His of Bengal. It seems to have come from the term next following.

1803.—“I think they manage it here famously. They have neither the comforts of a Bengal army, nor do they rough it, like the Ducks.” —Elphinstone, in Life, i. 83.

1860.—“Then came Sire Jhonne by Waye of Beldagh and Hormuz to y8 Costys of Ynde... And ase what Place y8 Kayghte came to Londe, thorey y8 ffolke clepen Ducks (quasi DUCES INDIAE).”—Extract from a MS. of the Travels of Sir John Maundevill in the E. Indies, lately discovered (Calcutta).

In the following the word is a corruption of the Tam. takku, a weight equal to 1/2 viss, about 3 lbs. 13 oz.

1787.—“We have fixed the produce of each vine at 4 ducks of wet pepper.” —Pursuivant of Tipoo Sultan, in Logan, Malabar, i. 125.

DUCKS, BOMBAY. See BUMELO.

1860.—“A fish nearly related to the salmon is dried and exported in large quantities from Bombay, and has acquired the name of Bombay Duck.” —Mason, Burma, 273.

DUFFADAR, s. Hind. (from Arabo-Pers.) daffadar, the exact rationale of which name it is not easy to explain, [daffa, a small body, a section, daffadar, a person in charge of a small body of troops]. A petty officer of native police (v. burkundar, v.); and in regiments of Irregular Cavalry, a non-commissioned officer corresponding in rank to a corporal or naik.

1803.—“The pay ... for the duffadars ought not to exceed 35 rupees.” —Wallington, ii. 242.

DUFTER, s. Ar.—H. dafar. Colloquially ‘the office,’ and interchangeable with cutcherry, except that the latter generally implies an office of the nature of a Court. Dafar-khadd is more accurate, [but this usually means rather a record-room where documents are stored.]

original Arab. daftar is from the Greek δαφθησ = membranum, ‘a parchment,’ and thin ‘paper’ (whence also diphtheria), and was applied to loose sheets filed on a string, which formed the record of accounts; hence dafar becomes ‘a register,’ a public record.

In Arab. any account-book is still a dafar, and in S. India daftar means a bundle of connected papers tied up in a cloth, [the basta of Upper India].

1590.—“Honest experienced officers upon whose forehead the stamp of correctness shines, write the agreement upon loose pages and sheets, so that the transaction cannot be forgotten. These loose sheets, into which all suisads are entered, are called the daftar.” —Ar. i. 280, and see Blackman's note there.

[1757.—“... that after the expiration of the year they take a discharge according to custom, and that they deliver the accounts of their Zemindary agreeable to the stated forms every year into the Dufter Cana of the Sircar...”—Sunnud for the Company's Zemindary, in Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 147.]

DUFTERDAR, s. Ar.—P. — H. dafftardar, is or was “the head native revenue officer on the Collector’s and Sub-Collector’s establishment of the Bombay Presidency” (Wilson). In the provinces of the Turkish Empire the Daftardar was often a minister of great power and importance, as in the case of Mahommed Bey Daftardar, in Egypt in the time of Mahommed Ali Pasha (see Lane’s Mod. Egyptia, ed. 1860, pp. 127-128). The account of the constitution of the office of Daftardar in the time of the Mongol conqueror of Persia, Hulagu, will be found in a document translated by Hammer-Purgstall in his Gesch. der Goldenen Horde, 497-501.

DUFTERY, s. Hind. daftari. A servant in an Indian office (Bengal), whose business it is to look after the condition of the records, dusting and binding them; also to pen-mending, paper-ruling, making of envelopes, &c. In Madras these offices are done by a MOOCHY. [For the military sense of the word in Afghanistan, see quotation from Ferrier below.]

1810.—“The Dufters or office-keeper attends solely to those general matters in an office which do not come within the notice of the cressier, or clerks.” —Williams, V. M. i. 275.
DUGGIE, s. A word used in the Pegu teak trade, for a long squared timber. Milburn (1813) says: 4Duggies are timbers of teak from 27 to 30 feet long, and from 17 to 24 inches square." Sir A. Phayre believes the word to be a corruption of the Burmese 4k9p-434. The first syllable means the 'cross-beam of a house,' the second, 'big;' hence 'big-beam.'

DUGONG, s. The cetaceous mammal, Halicore dugong. The word is Malay d4yung, also Javan. d4yung; Macasser, ruyun. The etymology we do not know. [The word came to us from the name Duyung, used in the Philippine island of Leyte, and was popularised in its present form by Buffon in 1765. See N.E.D.]

DUMBOOW, v., and DUMB-GOWED, participle. To brow-beat, to cow; and cowed, brow-beaten, set-down. This is a capital specimen of Anglo-Indian dialect. Dm kh4nd, 'to eat one's breath,' is a Hind. idiom for 'to be silent.' Hobson-Jobson converts this into a transitive verb, to d4m.kh4nd, and both spelling and meaning being affected by English suggestions of sound, this comes in Anglo-Indian use to imply cowing and silencing. [A more probable derivation is from Hind. dh4m.kh4nd, 'to chide, scold, threaten, to repress by threats or reproof' (Platts, H. Dict.).]

DUMDUM, n.p. The name of a military cantonment 41/2 miles N.W. of Calcutta, which was for seventy years (1783-1853) the head-quarters of that famous corps the Bengal Artillery. The name, which occurs at intervals in Bengal, is no doubt P.-H. dam-dama, 'a mound or elevated battery.' At Dumdum was signed the treaty which restored the British settlements after the re-capture of Calcutta in 1767. [It has recently given a name to the dumdum or expanding bullet, made in the arsenal there.]

[1858.—"The whole Afghan army consists of the three divisions of Kabul, Kandahar, and Herat; of these, the troops called Darbars (which receive pay), present the following effective forces."—Ferrier, H. of the Afghans, 315 seq.]

DUNGAREE, s. A kind of coarse and inferior cotton cloth; the word is not in any dictionary that we know. [Platts gives H. dungri, 'a coarse kind of cloth.' The Madras Gloss. gives Tel. dangida, which is derived from Dangidi, a village near Bombay. Molesworth in his Mahr. Dict. gives: 'Dongari Kadpa, a term originally for the common country cloth sold in the quarter contiguous to the Dongari Killa (Fort George, Bombay), applied now to poor and low-priced cotton cloth. Hence in the corruption Dungaris." He traces the word to dongari, "a little hill." Dungaree is woven with two or more threads together in the web and woof. The finer kinds are used for clothing by poor people; the coarser for sails for native boats and tents. The same word seems to be used of silk (see below).]

1913.—"We traded with the Natives for Cloves . . . by bartering and exchanging cotton cloth of Camboy and Coronamelled for Cloves. The sorts requested, and prices that they yielded. Candakens of Barochie, 6 Cattees of Cloves. . . . Dungareens, the finest, twelve."—Capt. Saris, in Purchas, i. 363.

1673.—"Along the Coasts are Bombaim . . . Carwar for Dungarees and the weightiest pepper."—Fryer, 66.

[1812.—"The Prince's Messenger . . . told him, 'Come, now is the time to open your purse-strings; you are no longer a merchant or in prison; you are no longer to sell Dungarees' (a species of coarse linen)."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 26.

1813.—"Dungarees (pieces to a ton) 400."—Milburn, ii. 221.

[1859.—"In addition to those which were real . . . were long lines of sham batteries known to sailors as Dungaree forts, and which were made simply of coarse cloth or canvas, stretched and painted so as to resemble batteries."—L. Oliphant, Narr. of Ld. Elgin's Mission, ii. 6.]

1868.—"Such dungarees as you now pay half a rupee a yard for, you could then buy from 20 to 40 yards per rupee."—Miss Freer's Old Deccan Days, p. xiv.

[1900.—"From this thread the Dongari Tamor is prepared, which may be compared to the organzine of silk, being both twisted and doubled."—Yunuf Ali, Mem. on Silk, 35.]

DURBAR. s. A Court or Levee. Pers. durbar. Also the Executive Government of a Native State (Carnegie). "In Kattywar, by a curious idiom, the chief himself is so addressed: 'Yes, Durbar'; 'no, Durbar,' being common replies to him."—(M.-Gen. Keatinge).

1609.—"On the left hand, throw another gate you enter into an inner court where the King keeps his Durbar."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 482.

1616.—"The tenth of January, I went to Court at foure in the evenning to the Durbar, which is the place where the Mogoll sits out daily, to entertain strangers, to receive Petitions and Presents, to give commands, to see and to be seen."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 541. [with some slight differences of reading, in Hak. Soc. i. 106.]

1633.—"This place they call the Derba (or place of Council) where Law and Justice was administered according to the Custome of the Country."—W. Bruton, in Hakl. v. 51.

1809.—"It was the durbar of the native Gentoo Princes."—Ed. Valentia, i. 362.

1826.—". . . a Durbar, or police-officer, should have men in waiting. . . ."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 128.

1875.—"Sitting there in the centre of the durbar, we assisted at our first nuptia."—Sir M. E. Grant Duff, in Contemp. Rev., July.

1881.—"Near the centre (at Amritsar) lies the sacred tank, from whose midst rises the Durbar Sahib, or great temple of the Sikh faith."—Imperial Gazetteer, i. 186.

DUBGAH, s. P. dargah. Properly a royal court. But the habitual use of the word in India is for the shrine of a (Mahomedan) Saint, a place of religious resort and prayer.

1782.—"Adjoining is a durgaw or burial place, with a view of the river."—Hodges, 102.

1807.—"The dhurgaw may invariably be seen to occupy those sites pre-eminent for comfort and beauty."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, 24.

1828.—". . . he was a relation of the . . . superior of the Dubga, and this is now a sufficient protection."—The Kuzilbash, H. 273.

DURIAN, DORIAN, s. Malay duren, Molucca form duruyan, from duri, 'a thorn or prickle,' [and in, the common substantival ending]; Mr. Skeat gives the standard Malay as duriyan or durian; the great fruit of the tree (N. O. Bombacae) called by botanists Durio zibethinus, D. C. The tree appears to be a native of the Malay Peninsula, and the nearest islands; from which it has been carried to Tenasserim on one side and to Mindanao on the other.
The earliest European mention of this fruit is that by Nicolò Conti. The passage is thus rendered by Winter Jones: "In this island (Sumatra) there also grows a green fruit which they call duriano, of the size of a cucumber. When opened five fruits are found within, resembling oblong oranges. The taste varies like that of cheese." (In India in the XVth Cent., p. 9.) We give the original Latin of Poggio below, which must be more correctly rendered thus: "They have a green fruit which they call durian, as big as a water-melon. Inside there are five things like elongated oranges, and resembling thick butter, with a combination of flavours." (See Carletti, below.)

The dorian in Sumatra often forms a staple article of food, as the jack (q.v.) does in Malabar. By natives and old European residents in the Malay regions in which it is produced the dorian is regarded as incomparable, but novices have a difficulty in getting over the peculiar, strong, and offensive odour of the fruit, on account of which it is usual to open it away from the house, and which procured for it the inelegant Dutch nickname of stancker. "When that aversion, however, is conquered, many fall into the taste of the natives, and become passionately fond of it." (Crawfurd, H. of Ind. Arch. i. 419.) [Wallace (Malay Arch. 57) says that he could not bear the smell when he "first tried it in Malacca, but in Borneo I found a ripe fruit on the ground, and, eating it out of doors, I at once became a confirmed Dorian eater ... the more you eat of it the less you feel inclined to stop. In fact to eat Durians is a new sensation, worth a voyage to the East to experience." Our forefathers had not such delicate noses, as may be gathered from some of the older notices. A Governor of the Straits, some forty-five years ago, used to compare the Dorian to 'carrioon in custard.'

1540.—"Fructum viridem habent nomine durianum, magnitudine cucumis, in qua sunt quinque veluti malarancia oblonga, varias saporis, instar butyri coagulat."—Poggi, de Varietate Fortunae, Lib. iv.

1552.—"Durions, which are fashioned like artichokes" (!)—Castañeda, ii. 355.

1553.—"Among these fruits was one kind now known by the name of durions, a thing greatly esteemed, and so luscious that the Malacca merchants tell how a certain trader came to that port with a ship load of great value, and he consumed the whole of it in guzzling durions and in gallantries among the Malay girls."—Barros, II. vi. i.

1588.—"A gentleman in this country (Portuguese India) tells me that he remembers to have read in a Tuscan version of Pliny, 'some durianes.' Now the Malaos used to ask him to find the passage in order that I might trace it in the Latin, but up to this time he says he has not found it."—Garcia, f. 85.

1588.—"There is one that is called in the Malacca tongue durion, and is so good that I have heard it affirmed by many that have gone about the world, that it doth exceed in savour all others that ever they have seen or tasted ... Some do say that they cannot bring it that it seemeth to be that wherewith Adam did transgress, being carried away by the singular savour."—Parke's Mendoza, ii. 318.

1598.—"Duryoen is a fruit yet only growneth in Malacca, and is so much comèdè by those which have proued ye same, that there is no fruit in the world to bee compared with it."—Linskolen, 102; [Hak. Soc. i. 511].

1599.—"The Dorian, Carletti thought, had a smell of onions, and he did not at first much like it, but when at last he got used to this he liked the fruit greatly, and thought nothing of a simple and natural kind could be tasted which possessed a more complex and elaborate variety of colours and flavours than this did. —See Viaggi, Florence, 1701; Pt. ii. p. 211.

1601.—"Duryoen ... ad aptensionem primam ... putridum ooepe redolto, sed dotem tamen divinam illam omnem gustui profundit."—Doby, iv. 85.

1610.—"The Dorian tree nearly resembles a pear tree in size."—Pyra'ad de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 368.

1615.—"There groweth a certaine fruit, prickled like a ches-nut, and as big as one's fist, the best in the world to eate, these are somewhat costly, all other fruits being at an easie rate. It must be broken with force and therein is contained a white liquor like vino creame, never the lees it yeelds a very unsurement like to rotten cyzium, and it is called Esturion" (probably a misprint).—De Monfart, 27.

1727.—"The Durean is another excellent Fruit, but offensive to some People's Noses, for it smells very like ... but when once tasted the smell vanishes."—A. Hamilton, ii. 81; [ed. 1744, ii. 80].

1856.—"The fetid Dorian, prince of fruits to those who like it, but chief of abominations to all strangers and novices, does not grow within the present territories of Ava, but the King makes great efforts to obtain a supply in eatabale condition from the Tenasserim Coast. King Tharawadi used to lay post-horses from Martaban to Ava, to bring his odoriferous delicacy."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 161.
1878.—"The Durian will grow as large as a man's head, is covered closely with terribly sharp spines, set hexagonally upon its hard skin, and when ripe it falls; if it should strike any one under the tree, severe injury or death may be the result."—

M. Nair, Perak, 60.

1885.—"I proceeded . . . under a continuous shade of tall Durian trees from 35 to 40 feet high. . . . In the flowering time it was a most pleasant shady wood; but later in the season the chance of a fruit now and then descending on one's head would be less agreeable." Note.—"Of this fruit the natives are passionately fond; . . . and the elephants flock to its shade in the fruiting time; but, more singular still, the tiger is said to devour it with avidity."—

DURJUN. s. H. darjan, a corr. of the English dozen.

DURWAUN. s. H. from P. dar-wan, darbūn. A doorkeeper. A domestic servant so called is usual in the larger houses of Calcutta. He is porter at the gate of the compound (q.v.).

[c. 1590.—"The Darbans, or Porters. A thousand of these active men are employed to guard the palace."—Ains. i. 258.]

[c. 1755.—"Darwan."—List of servants in Ives, 50.

1781.—(After an account of an alleged attempt to seize Mr. Hickey's Darwans). "Mr. Hickey begs leave to make the following remarks. That he is clearly of opinion that these horrid Assassins wanted to dispatch him whilst he lay asleep, as a Door-avan is well known to be the alarm of the House, to prevent which the Villians wanted to carry him off, and their precipitate flight the moment they heard Mr. Hickey's Voice puts it past a Doubt."—Reflections on the consequence of the late attempt made to Assassinate the Printer of the original Bengal Gazette (in the same, April 14).

1784.—"Yesterday at daybreak, a most extraordinary and horrid murder was committed upon the Darwan of Thomas Martin, Esq."—In Seton-Karr. i. 12.

"In the entrance passage, often on both sides of it, is a raised floor with one or two open cells, in which the Darwans (or doorkeepers) sit, lie, and sleep—in fact dwell."—Calc. Review, vol. ix. p. 207.

DURWAUZA-BUND. The formula by which a native servant in an Anglo-Indian household intimates that his master or mistress cannot receive a visitor—'Not at home'—without the untruth. It is elliptical for darwaza band hat, 'the door is closed.'

1877.—"When they did not find him there, it was Darwa.bund."—A[Har-dyce, The City of Sunshine, i. 125.]

DUSSEERA, DASSORA, DASHERHA. s. Skt. dasähārd, H. dasharbeit, Mahr. dāra; the nine-nights' or ten days' festival in October, also called Durgā-pūjā (see DOOBGA-P.). In the west and south of India this holiday, taking place after the close of the wet season, became a great military festival, and the period when military expeditions were entered upon. The Mahrattas were alleged to celebrate the occasion in a way characteristic of them, by destroying a village! The popular etymology of the word and that accepted by the best authorities, is dār, 'ten (sins) and hār, 'that which takes away (or expiates).' It is, perhaps, rather connected with the ten days' duration of the feast, or with its chief day being the 10th of the month (Aśvina); but the origin is decidedly obscure.

C. 1590.—"The autumn harvest he shall begin to collect from the Desāhreh, which is another Hindoo festival that also happens differently, from the beginning of Virgo to the commencement of Libra."—Ayeen, tr. Gladwin, ed. 1800, i. 307; [tr. Jarrett, ii. 46].

1785.—"On the anniversary of the Dus-harah you will distribute among the Hindoos, composing your escort, a goat to every ten men."—Tipoo's Letters, 162.

1812.—"The Courts . . . are allowed to adjourn annually during the Hindoo festival called dusserah."—Fifth Report, 37.

1813.—"This being the deserah, a great Hindoo festival . . . we resolved to delay our departure and see some part of the ceremonies."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 97; [2nd ed. ii. 450].

DUSTOOR, DUSTOORY. s. P.—H. dastār, 'custom' [see DESTOOR,] dastārī, 'that which is customary.' That commission or percentage on the money passing in any cash transaction which, with or without acknowledgment or permission, sticks to the fingers of the agent of payment. Such 'customary' appropriations are, we believe, very nearly as common in England as in India; a fact of which newspaper correspondence from time to time makes us aware, though Europeans in India, in condemning the natives, often forget, or are ignorant of this. In India the practice is perhaps more distinctly recognised, as the word denotes. Ibn Battuta tells us that at the Court of Delhi, in his time (c. 1340), the custom was for the officials to deduct \( \lambda \) of every sum which the Sultan ordered to be paid from the treasury (see I. B. pp. 408, 428, &c.).

[1616.-"The dusturia in all bought goodes... is a great matter."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 350.]

1680.—"It is also ordered that in future the Vakils (see VAREEL), Mutusaddas (see MOOTSHUDDY), or Writers of the Tagadgers, Dumiers, (1) or overseers of the Weavers, and the Picars and Poders shall not receive any monthly wages, but shall be content with the Dustoor, of a quarter anna in the rupee, which the merchants and weavers are to allow them. The Dustoor may be divided twice a year or oftener by the Chief and Council among the said employers."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 69.

1780.—"It never can in the power of a superintendent of Police to reform the numberless abuses which servants of every Denomination have introduced, and now support on the broad Basis of Dustoor."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 29.

1785.—"The Public are hereby informed that no Commission, Brokerage, or Dustoor is charged by the Bank, or permitted to be taken by any Agent or Servant employed by them."—In Seton-Karr, i. 180.

1795.—"All servants belonging to the Company's Shed have been strictly prohibited from demanding or receiving any fees or dustoors on any pretence whatever."—Ibid. ii. 16.

1824.—"The profits however he made during the voyage, and by a dustoor on all the alms given or received... were so considerable that on his return some of his confidential disciples had a quarrel with him."—Héber, ed. 1844, i. 198.

1886.—"... of all taxes small and great the heaviest is dustoorree."—Trecseyan, Dueh Bungaloa, 217.

DUSTUCK, s. P. dastak, [a little hand, hand-clapping to attract attention, a notice]. A pass or permit. The dustucks granted by the Company's covenanted servants in the early half of the 18th century seems to have been a constant instrument of abuse, or bone of contention, with the native authorities in Bengal. [The modern sense of the word in N. India is a notice of the revenue demand served on a defaulter.]

1716.—"A passport or dustuck, signed by the President of Calcutta, should exempt the goods specified from being visited or stopped."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 21.

1748.—"The Zemindar near Pulkah having stopped several boats with English Dustucks and taken money from them, and disregarding the Phussdar's orders to clear them..."—In Long, 6.

1782.—"Dusticks."—See WRITTER.

1785.—"The dignity and benefit of our Dustucks are the chief badges of honour, or at least interest, we enjoy from our Phirmanand."—From the Chief and Council at Dacca, in Van Sittert, i. 210.

1789.—"Dusticks."—See under Hos-Bolhookum.

[1886.—"It is a practice of the Revenue Courts of the stream to issue Dustuck for the malgooseree the very day the kist (installment) became due."—Confessions of an Orderly, 132.]

DWARIA, n.p. More properly Dedrakot or Dedrika, quasi śārnabūras, 'the City with many gates,' a very sacred Hindu place of pilgrimage, on the extreme N.W. point of peninsular Guzerat; the alleged royal city of Krishna. It is in the small State called Okha, which Gen. Legrand Jacob pronounces to be "barren of aught save superstition and piracy" (Tr. Bo. Geog. Soc. vii. 161). Dedrakot is, we apprehend, the szapary of...
Ptolemy. Indeed, in an old Persian map, published in Indian Antiq. i. 370, the place appears, transcribed as Bharraky.

c. 1580.—"The Fifth Division is Jugdet (see JACQUETE), which is also called Damora. Kishen came from Mehta, and dwelt at this place, and died here. This is considered as a very holy spot by the Brahmins."—Agam, by Gladwin, ed. 1800, ii. 76; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 248].

EAGLE WOOD, s. The name of an aromatic wood from Camboja and some other Indian regions, chiefly trans-gangetic. It is the "odorous wood" referred to by Camoes in the quotation under CHAMPA. We have somewhere read an explanation of the name as applied to the substance in question, because this is flecked and mottled, and so supposed to resemble the plumage of an eagle! [Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 395; Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 120, 150.] The word is in fact due to a corrupt form of the Skt. name of the wood, agaru, aguru. A form, probably, of this is avil, aki, which Gundert gives as the Malayal. word.* From this the Portuguese must have taken their aquilas, as we find it in Barbosas (below), or pao (wood) d'aquilas, made into aquilas, whence French bois d'aigle, and Eng. eagle-wood. The Malays call it Kayu (wood)-gahru, evidently the same word, though which way the etymology flowed it is difficult to say. [Mr. Skeat writes: "the question is a difficult one. Klinkert gives gara (garos) and gaharu (gaharos), whence the trade names 'Garros' and 'Garro'; and the modern standard Malay certainly corresponds to Klinkert's forms, though I think gaharu should rather be written gharu, i.e. with an aspirated g, which is the way the Malays pronounce it. On the other hand, it seems perfectly clear that there must have been an alternative modern form agaru, or perhaps even aguru, since otherwise such trade names as 'ugger' and (f) 'tugger' could not have arisen. They can scarcely have come from the Skt. In Ridley's Plant List we have gaharu and gahaven, which is the regular abbreviation of the reduplicated form gahru-gahru identified as Aquilaria Malaccensis, Lam." [See CAMBULAC.]

The best quality of this wood, once much valued in Europe as incense, is the result of disease in a tree of the N. O. Leguminosae, the Alceaylon agallochum, Loureiro, growing in Camboja and S. Cochin China, whilst an inferior kind, of like aromatic qualities, is produced by a tree of an entirely different order, Aquilaria agallocha, Roxb. (N. O. Agaricaceae), which is found as far north as Silhet.*

Eagle-wood is another name for alos-wood, or aloe (q.v.) as it is termed in the English Bible. [See Encycl. Bibl. i. 120 seq.] It is curious that Bluteau, in his great Portuguese Vocabulary, under Pao d'Aquila, jumps up this aloe-wood with Socotrine Aloes. Aqulaloxor was known to the ancients, and is described by Dioscorides (c. A.D. 65). In Liddell and Scott the word is rendered "the bitter aloe"; which seems to involve the same confusion as that made by Bluteau.

Other trade-names of the article given by Forbes Watson are Garroo, and Garroo-wood, agla-wood, upper-, and tugger- (?) wood.

1516.—"Das Dragoaerias, e propos que ellas salem en Calicut . . . . . .

And at one time that wood used to be exported to Bengal under the name of aquila bruas; but since then the Bengalis have got more knowing, and buy it no longer. . . . ."—Garcia, f. 119r.-120.

* Royle says "Malayan agila," but this is apparently a misprint for Malayalam.

† We do not find information as to which tree produces the eagle-wood sold in the Tenasserim bazaar. [It seems to be A. agallocha: see Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 279 ed.].

† This lign alos, "genuine, black, heavy, very choice," is presumably the fine kind from Champa; the agila the inferior product.

The existence of the agulla tree (darakhi-st-ud) in the Silhet hills is mentioned by Abu'l Fazl (Gladwin's Ayen, ii. 10; ed. Jarrett, ii. 172; orig. i. 391).

EARTH-OIL. s. Petroleum, such as that exported from Burma. The term is a literal translation of that used in nearly all the Indian vernaculars. The chief sources are at Ye-nan-gyoung on the Irrawadi, lat. c. 20° 22'.

1755.—"Raynun-Goung ... at this Place there are about 200 Families, who are chiefly employed in getting Earth-oil out of Pitta, some five miles in the Country."—Baker, in Dalrymple's Or. Rep. i. 172.

EKA, s. A small one-horse carriage used by natives. It is Hind. ekka, from ek, 'one.' But we have seen it written acres, and panned upon as quasi-acker, by those who have travelled by it! [Something of the kind was perhaps known in very early times, for Arrian (Indika, xvii.) says: "To be drawn by a single horse is considered no distinction." For a good description with drawing of the ekka, see Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 190 seq.]

EED, s. Arab. 'Id. A Mahomedan holy festival, but in common application in India restricted to two such, called there the bari and idhut (or Great and Little) 'Id. The former is the commemoration of Abraham's sacrifice, the victim of which was, according to the Mahomedans, Ishmael. [See Hughes, Dict. of Islam, 192 seqq.] This is called among other names, Bakr 'Id, the 'Bull 'Id, Bakrah 'Id, 'the cow festival,' but this is usually corrupted by ignorant natives as well as Europeans into Bakri 'Id (Hind. bakra, f. bakri, 'a goat'). The other is the 'Id of the Ramazan, viz. the termination of the annual fast; the festival called in Turkey Bairam, and by old travellers sometimes the "Mahomedan Easter."

Mus. dans l'Inde, 9 seq.

EEDGAH, s. Ar.—P. 'Idgah, 'Place of 'Id.' (See EED.) A place of assembly and prayer on occasion of Musulman festivals. It is in India usually a platform of white plastered brickwork, enclosed by a low wall on... three sides, and situated outside of a town or village. It is a marked characteristic of landscape in Upper India. [It is also known as Namadgh, or 'place of prayer,' and a drawing of one is given by Herkiot, Qanoon-e-Islam, Pl. iii. fig. 2.]

EKTENG. adj. The native representation of the official designation 'acting' applied to a substitute, especially in the Civil Service. The manner in which the natives used to explain the expression to themselves is shown in the quotation.

1833.—"Lawrence had been only 'acting' there; a term which has suggested to the minds of the natives, in accordance with their pronunciation of it, and with that straining after meaning in syllables which leads to so many etymological fallacies, the interpretation ek-tang, 'one-leg,' as if the temporary incumbent had but one leg in the official stirrup."—H. Y. in Quarterly Review (on Bosworth Smith's Life of Lord Lawrence), April, p. 297.

ELOEHEE, a. An ambassador. Turk. icli, from il, a (nomad) tribe, hence the representative of the il. It is a title that has attached itself particularly to Sir John Malcolm, and to Sir Stratford Canning, probably because they were personally more familiar to the Orientals among whom they served than diplomats usually are.

For they knew that with ambassadors coming they would have a black day of it; and so they fled as if the devil had got among them."—Clarije, xvii. Comp. Markham, p. 111.

ELEPHANT. a. This article will be confined to notes connected with the various suggestions which have been put forward as to the origin of the word—a sufficiently ample subject.

The oldest occurrence of the word (δέφας—φαρρός) is in Homer. With him, and so with Hesiod and Pindar, the word means 'ivory.' Herodotus first uses it as the name of the animal (iv. 191). Hence an occasional, probably an erroneous, assumption that the word δέφας originally meant only the material, and not the beast that bears it.

In Persian the usual term for the beast is kal, with which agree the Aramaic kal (already found in the Chaldee and Syriac versions of the O. T.), and the Arabic kal. Old etymologists tried to develop elephant out of kal; and it is natural to connect with it the Spanish for 'ivory' (marfil, Port. marfim), but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given of the first syllable of that word. More certain is the fact that in early Swedish and Danish the word for 'elephant' is kal, in Icelandic kel; a term supposed to have been introduced by old traders from the East visit Russia. The old Swedish for 'ivory' is felen.

* The oldest Hebrew mention of ivory is in the notice of the products brought to Solomon from Ophir, or India. Among these are ivory tusks—chen-flabim, i.e. 'teeth of habbim,' a word which has been interpreted as from Skt. abha, elephant. But it is entirely doubtful what this habbim, occurring here only, really means. We know

* Plur, for elephant, occurs in certain Sanskrit books, but it is regarded as a foreign word.
† See Lassen, i. 818; Max Müller's Lectures on Sc. of Language, 1st 8. p. 189.
‡ "As regards the interpretation of habbim, a δαραξ κέρν., in the passage where the state of the text, as shown by comparison with the LXX, is very unsatisfactory, it seems impossible to say anything that can be of the least use in clearing from other evidence that ivory was known in Egypt and Western Asia for ages before Solomon. And in other cases the Hebrew word for ivory is simply shen, corresponding to den in Ovid and other Latin writers. In Ezekiel (xxvii. 15) we find karnoth shen burnt cornua dantis.' The use of the word 'horns' does not necessarily imply a confusion of these great curved tusks with horns; it has many parallels, as in Pliny's, "cum arbre excavant lomentque cornua elephanti" (xvii. 7); in Martial's "Indique cornu" (i. 73) in Aelian's story, as alleged by the Mauritanians, that the elephants shed their horns every ten years ('sector trecedi a capara excerto' —xiv. 6); whilst Clesby quotes from an Icelandic saga 'olifant-horn' for 'ivory.'

We have mentioned Skt. ibha, from which Lassen assumes a compound ibhadantia for ivory, suggesting that this, combined by early traders with the Arabic article, formed al-ibhadantia, and so originated Oliphant. Pott, besides other doubts, objects that ibhadantia, though the name of a plant (Tiaridium indicum, Lehm.), is never actually a name of ivory.

Pott's own etymology is alaf-hindi, 'Indian ox,' from a word existing in sundry resembling forms, in Hebrew and in Assyrian (alif, alop).* This has met with favour; though it is a little hard to accept any form like Hindi as earlier than Homer.

Other suggested origins are Pictet's from airavata (lit. 'proceeding from water'), the proper name of the elephant of India, or Elephant of the Eastern Quarter in the Hindu Cosmology.† This is felt to be only too ingenious, but as improbable. It is, however, suggested, it would seem independently, by Mr. Kittel (Indian Antiquary, i. 128), who supposes the first part of the word to be Dravidian, a transformation from dane, 'elephant.'

up the origin of elephant. The O. T. speaks so often of ivory, and never again by this name, that kabbas must be either a corruption or some trade-name, presumably for some special kind of ivory. Personally, I believe it more likely that kabbas is at bottom the same as hobbin (ebony) associated with shen in Ezekiel xxvii. 15, and that the passage once ran 'ivory and ebony' (W. Robertson Smith); (also see Eay. Bib. ii. 2397 seq.).

Pictet, finding his first suggestion not accepted, has called up a Singhalese word aliya, used for 'elephant,' which he takes to be from dla, 'great'; thence aliya, 'great creature'; and proceeding further, presents a combination of dla, 'great,' with Skt. phata, sometimes signifying 'a tooth,' thus ali-pha, 'great tooth' = elephantus.*

Hodgson, in "Notes on Northern Africa" (p. 19, quoted by Pott), gives elef amostr ("Great Boar," elef being 'boar') as the name of the animal among the Kabyles of that region, and appears to present it as the origin of the Greek and Latin words.

Again we have the Gothic ubandus, 'a camel,' which has been regarded by some as the same word with elephantus. To this we shall recur.

Pott, in his elaborate paper already quoted, comes to the conclusion that the choice of etymologies must lie between his own alaf-hindi and Lassen's al-ibha-dantia. His paper is 50 years old, but he repeats this conclusion in his Wurzel-Worterbuch der Indo-Germanische Sprachen, published in 1871,† nor can I ascertain that there has been any later advance towards a true etymology. Yet it can hardly be said that either of the alternatives carries conviction.

Both, let it be observed, apart from other difficulties, rest on the assumption that the knowledge of Olipa, whether as fine material or as monstrous animal, came from India, whilst nearly all the other or less-favoured suggestions point to the same assumption.

But knowledge acquired, or at least taken cognizance of, since Pott's latest reference to the subject, puts us in possession of the new and surprising fact that, even in times which we are entitled to call historic, the elephant existed wild, far to the westward of India, and not very far from the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean. Though the fact was indicated from the wall-paintings by Wilkinson some 65 years ago,‡ and has more recently been amply displayed in historical works which have circulated by scores in popular libraries, it is singular how little attention or interest it seems to have elicited.*

The document which gives precise Egyptian testimony to this fact is an inscription (first interpreted by Ebers in 1875)† from the tomb of Amenem-hib, a captain under the great conqueror Thotmes III. [Thothmosis], who reigned B.C. c. 1600. This warrior, speaking from his tomb of the great deeds of his master, and of his own right arm, tells how the king, in the neighbourhood of Nin, hunted 120 elephants for the sake of their tusks; and how he himself (Amenemhib) encountered the biggest of them, which had attacked the sacred person of the king, and cut through its trunk. The elephant chased him into the water, where he saved himself between two rocks; and the king bestowed on him rich rewards.

The position of Nin is uncertain, though some have identified it with Nineveh.‡ [Maspero writes: "Nin, long confounded with Nineveh, after Champollion (Gram. égyptienne, p. 150), was identified by Lenormant (Les Ora- gines, vol. iii. p. 316 et seq.) with Nimus Vetus, Membidj, and by Max Müller (Asien und Europa, p. 267) with Balis on the Euphrates: I am inclined to make it Kefer-Naya, between Aleppo and Turmanin" (Struggle of the Nations, 144, note).] It is named in another inscription between Amin and Abe- rith, as, all three, cities of Naharin or Northern Mesopotamia, captured by Amenhotep II., the son of Thotmes III. Might not Nin be Nisibis? We shall find that Assyrian inscriptions of later date have been interpreted as placing elephant-hunts in the land of Harran and in the vicinity of the Chab- oras.

If then these elephant-hunts may be located on the southern skirts of Taurus, we shall more easily understand how a tribute of elephant-tusks should have been offered at the court of Egypt by the people of Rutennu or Northern Syria, and also by the people of the adjacent Ashti or Cyprus, as we find repeatedly recorded on the Egyptian monuments, both in hieroglyphic writing and pictorially.*

What the stones of Egypt allege in the 17th cent. B.C., the stones of Assyria 500 years afterwards have been alleged to corroborate. The great inscription of Tighlath-Pileser I., who is calculated to have reigned about B.C. 1120-1100, as rendered by Lotz, relates:

"Ten mighty Elephants
Slew I in Haran, and on the banks of the Haboras.
Four Elephants I took alive;
Their hides,
Their teeth, and the live Elephants
I brought to my city Assur." †

The same facts are recorded in a later inscription, on the broken obelisk of Assurazirpal from Kouyunjik, now in the Br. Museum, which commemo- rates the deeds of the king's ancestor, Tighlath Pileser.‡

In the case of these Assyrian inscriptions, however, elephant is by no means an undisputed interpretation. In the famous quadruple test exercise on this inscription in 1867, which gave the death-blow to the doubts which some sceptics had emitted as to the genuine character of the Assyrian interpretations, Sir H. Rawlinson, in this passage, rendered the animals slain and taken alive as wild buffaloes. The ideogram given as teeth he had not interpreted. The question is argued at length by Lotz in the work already quoted, but it is a question for cuneiform experts, dealing, as it does, with the interpretation of more than one ideogram, and enveloped as yet in uncertainties. It is to be observed, that in 1857 Dr. Hincks, one of the four test-translators,§ had rendered the passage almost exactly as Lotz has done 23 years later, though I cannot see that Lotz makes any allusion to this fact. [See Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1893.]

Apart from arguments as to decipherment and ideograms, it is certain that probabilities are much affected by the publication of the Egyptian inscription of Amenhotep, which gives a greater plausibility to the rendering 'elephant' than could be ascribed to it in 1857. And should it eventually be upheld, it will be all the more remarkable that the sagacity of Dr. Hincks should then have ventured on that rendering.

In various suggestions, including Pott's, besides others that we have omitted, the etymology has been based on a transfer of the name of the ox, or some other familiar quadruped. There would be nothing extraordinary in such a transfer of meaning. The reference to the bos Luca is trite; the Tibetan word for ox (glin) is also the word for 'elephant'; we have seen how the name 'Great Boar' is alleged to be given to the elephant among the Kabyles; we have heard of an elephant in a menagerie being described by a Scotch rustic as 'a muckle sow'; Paussanias, according to Bochart, calls rhinoceroses 'Aethiopic bulls' [Bk. ix. 21, 2]. And let me finally illustrate the matter by a circumstance related to me by a brother officer who accompanied Sir Neville Chamberlain on an expedition among the turbulent Pathan tribes c. 1860. The women of the villages gathered to gaze on the elephants that accompanied the force, a stranger sight to them than it would have been to the women of the most secluded village in Scotland. 'Do you see these?' said a soldier of the Frontier Horse; 'do you know what they are? These are the Queen of England's buffaloes that give 5 maunds (about 160 quarts) of milk a day!'

Now it is an obvious suggestion, that if there were elephants on the skirts of Taurus down to B.C. 1100, or even (taking the less questionable evidence) down only to B.C. 1600, it is highly improbable that the Greeks would have had to seek a name for the animal, or its tusk, from Indian trade. And if the Greeks had a vernacular name for the elephant, there is also a proba-

Here is the origin of Tennyson's 'serpent-hands' quoted under HATTY. The title bos Luca is explained by St. Isidore:

Hos bosse Lucanos vocabant antiqui Romanii: bosque quos multum grandidus vidiebant; Lucanos quis in Locana illos primus Fyrhhus in prolixo object Romanis."—Ibid. Hippal, lib. xii. Origines, cap. 2.

bility, if not a presumption, that some tradition of this name would be found, mutatis mutandis, among other Aryan nations of Europe.

Now may it not be that Alectos— φαρρος in Greek, and ubandus in Moeso-Gothic, represent this vernacular name? The latter form is exactly the modification of the former which Grimm's law demands. Nor is the word confined to Gothic. It is found in the Old H. German (olpëtis); in Anglo-Saxon (*olpæ, olpæn, &c.); in Old Swedish (elpend, elpandyr, olp³wlóid); in Icelandic (olfaði). All these Northern words, it is true, are used in the sense of camel, not of elephant. But instances already given may illustrate that there is nothing surprising in this transfer, all the less where the animal originally indicated had long been lost sight of. Further, Jülg, who has published a paper on the Gothic word, points out its resemblance to the Slav forms velblond, velblón, or vielblad, also meaning 'camel' (compare also Russian verblýud). This, in the last form (vielblad, may, he says, be regarded as resolvable into 'Great beast.' Herr Jülg ends his paper with a hint that in this meaning may perhaps be found a solution of the origin of elephant (an idea at which Pictet also transiently pointed in a paper referred to above), and half promises to follow up this hint; but in thirty years he has not done so, so far as I can discover. Nevertheless it is one which may yet be pregnant.

Nor is it inconsistent with this suggestion that we find also in some of the Northern languages a second series of names designating the elephant—not, as we suppose ubandus and its kin to be, common vocables descend-}

* [The N.E.D. regards the derivation as doubtful, but considers the theory of Indian origin improbable.]

[A curious instance of misapprehension is the use of the term 'Chain elephants.' This is a misunderstanding, of the ordinary locution sanjir-i-nil when speaking of elephants. Sanjir is literally a 'chain,' but is here akin to our expressions, a 'pair,' 'couple,' 'brace' of anything. It was used, no doubt, with reference to the iron chain by which an elephant is hobbled. In an account 100 elephants would be entered thus: Fl, Sanjir, 100. (See NUMERICAL AFFIXES.)

[1826.—"Very frequent mention is made in Asiatic histories of 'chains—elephants;' which always mean elephants trained for war; but it is not very clear why they are so denominated."—Rankine, Hist. Res. on the Wars and Sports of the Mongols and Romans, 1826, intro. p. 12.]

ELEPHANTA.

An island in Bombay Harbour, the native name of which is Ghārāpurī (or sometimes, it would seem, shortly, Puri), famous for its magnificent excavated temple, considered by Burgess to date after the middle of the 8th cent. The name was given by the Portuguese from the life-size figure of an elephant, hewn from an isolated mass of trap-rock, which formerly stood in the lower part of the island, not far from the usual landing-place. This figure fell down many years ago, and was often said to have disappeared. But it actually lay in situ till 1864-5, when (on the suggestion of the late Mr. W. E. Frere) it was removed by Dr. (now Sir) George Birdwood to the Victoria Gardens at Bombay, in order to save the relic from destruction. The elephant had originally a smaller figure on its back, which several of the earlier authorities speak of as a young elephant, but which Mr. Erskine and Capt. Basil Hall regarded as a tiger. The horse mentioned by Fryer remained in 1712; it had disappeared apparently before Niebuhr's visit in 1764. [Compare the recovery of a similar pair of elephant figures at Delhi, Cunningham, Archael. Rep. i. 225 seq.]

c. 1821.—"In quod dum sic ascendisset, in xxviii. dictis me transtuli usque ad Tanum—hace terras multum bene est situata. ... Haec terrae antiquitas fuit valide magna. Nam ipsa fuit terrae regis Pori, qui cum regre Alexandro praesulium maximum committit."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., App. p. v.

We quote this because of its relation to the passages following. It seems probable that the alleged connection with Purus and Alexander may have grown out of the name Purī or Pori.

[1539.—Mr. Whiteway notes that in João de Castro's Log of his voyage to Diu will be found a very interesting account with measurements of the Elephants' Caves.]

1548.—"And the Isle of Pory, which is that of the Elephant (do Aflante), is leased to João Pires by arrangements of the said Governor (dom João de Castro) for 150 pardas."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 158.

1580.—"At 3 hours of the day we found ourselves abreast of a cape called Bombain, where is to be seen an ancient Roman temple, hollowed in the living rock. And above the said temple are many tamarind-trees, and below it a living spring, in which they have never been able to find bottom. The said temple is called Aelphante, and is adorned with many figures, and inhabited by a great multitude of bats; and here they say that Alexander Magnus arrived, and for memorial thereof caused this temple to be made, and further than this he advanced not."—Gaupora Balb, f. 62v-63.

1618.—"There is yet an other Pagode, which they hold and esteem for the highest and chiefest Pagode of all the rest, which standeth in a little Island called Pory; this Pagode by the Portingalls is called the Pagode of the Elephant. In that Island standeth an high hill, and on the top thereof there is a hole, that goeth down into the hill, digged and carved out of the hard rock or stones as big as a great cloyster ... round about the walls are cut and formed, the shapes of Elephants, Lions, tigers, & a thousand such like wild and cruel beasts ... ."—Einschoten, ch. xiliv.; [Hak. Soc. i. 291].

"This notable and above all others astonishing Pagoda of the Elephant stands on a small islet, less than half a league in compass, which is formed by the river of Bombain, where it is about to discharge itself southward into the sea. It is so called because of a great elephant of stone, which one sees in entering the river. They say that it was made by the orders of a heathen king called Banasur, who ruled the whole country inland from the Ganges. ... On the left side of this chapel is a doorway 6 palms in depth and 5 in width, by which one enters a chamber which is nearly square and very dark, so that there is nothing to be seen there; and with this ends the fabric of this great pagoda. It has been in many parts demolished; and what the soldiers have left is so maltreated that it is grievous to see destroyed such a work as one of the Wonders of the World. It is now 50 years since I went to see this marvellous Pagoda; and as I did not then visit it with such curiosity as I should now feel in doing so, I failed to remark many particulars which exist no longer. But I do remember me to have seen a certain Chapel, not to be seen now, open on the whole façade (which was more than 40 feet in length), and which along the rock formed a plinth the whole length of the edifice, fashioned like our altars both as to breadth and height; and on this was many very remarkable things to be seen. Among others I remember to have noticed the story of Queen Pasiphae and the bull; also the Angel with naked sword thrusting forth from below a tree two beautiful figures of a man and a woman, who were naked, as the Holy Scripture paints for us the appearance of our first parents Adam and Eve."—Cuvier, Dec. VII. liv. iii. cap. xi.

1644.—"... an islet which they call Ilheu do Elefante... In the highest part of this Ilset is an eminence on which there is a mast from which a flag is unfurled when there are pows (paras) about, as often happens, to warn the small unarmed vessels to look out. ... There is on this island a pagoda called that of the Elephant, a work of extraordinary magnitude, being cut out of the solid rock," &c.—Bocarro, H.S.

1679.—"... We steered by the south side of the Bay, purposely to touch at Elephant, so called from a monstrous Elephant cut out of the main Rock, bearing a young one on its back; not far from it the Effigies of a Horse stuck up to the Belly in the Earth in the Valley; from whence we clambered up the highest Mountain on the Island, on whose summit was a miraculous Piece hewed out of solid Stone: It is supported by 42 Corinian Pillars," &c.—Pryer, 75.

1690.—"At 3 Leagues distance from Bombay is a small Island called Elephant, from the Statue of an Elephant cut in Stone. ... Here likewise are the just dimensions of a Horse Carved in Stone, so lively that many have rather fancied it, at a distance, a living Animal. ... But that which adds the most Remarkable Character to this Island, is the fam'd Pagoda at the top of it; so much spoke of by the Portuguese, and at present admired by the present Queen Dowager, that she cannot think any one has seen this part of India, who comes not Freighted home with some Account of it."—Ovington, 168-9.

1712.—"... The Island of Elephants ... takes its name from an elephant in stone, with another on its back, which stands on a small hill, and serves as a sea mark. ... As they advanced towards the Pagoda through a smooth narrow pass cut in the rock, they observed another hewn figure which was called Alexander's horse."—From an account written by Captain Pyle, on board the Stringer East Indians, and ill. by drawings. Read by A. Dalrymple to the Soc. of Antiquaries, 10th Feb. 1780, and printed in Antiquaries, Orig. of the plates (xxi) shows the elephant having on its back distinctly a small elephant, whose proboscis comes down into contact with the head of the large one.

1727.—"A league from thence is another larger, called Elephanto, belonging to the Portuguese, and serves only to feed some Cattle. I believe it took its name from an Elephant carved out of a great black Stone, about Seven Foot in Height."—A. Hamilton, i. 240; [ed. 1744, i. 241].

1760.—"Le lendemain, 7 Decembre, des que le jour partit, je me transportai au bas de la seconde montagne, ou se trouve le Bay- baye, dans un coin de l'Ile, oh est l'Elephant qui a fait donner a Galipouri le nom d'Elephantes. L'animal est de grandeur naturelle, d'une pierre noire, et destaque du sol, et paroit porter son petit sur son dos."—Anqueuil du Perron, I. cocoxIII.

1761.—"... The work I mention is an artificial cave cut out of a solid Rock, and decorated with a number of pillars, and gigantic statues, some of which discover ye work of a skilfull artist; and I am informed by an acquaintance who is well read in ye ancient history, and has minutely considered ye figures, that it appears to be ye work of King Bessostris after his Indian Expedition."—MS. Letter of James Rennell.

1784.—"Plusieurs Voyageurs font bien mention du vieux temple Payen sur la petite Isle Elephant, près de Bombay, mais ils n'en parlent qu'en passant. Je le trouve si curieux et si digne de l'attention des Amateurs d'Antiquités, que j'y fis trois fois le Voyage, et que j'y demeus tout ce que s'y trouve de plus remarquable."—Curtain Niebuhr, Voyages, ii. 25.

1789.—"... Pas loin du Rivage de la Mer, et en pleine Campagne, on voit encore un Elephant d'une pierre dure et noiret... La Statue... porte quelque chose sur le dos, mais que le temps a rendu entièrement méconnaissable... Quant au Cheval dont Ovington et Hamilton font mention j'en l'ai pas vu."—Ibid. 33.

1789.—"... That which has principally attracted the attention of travellers is the small island of Elephants, situated in the east side of the harbour of Bombay. ... Near the south end is the figure of an elephant rudely cut in stone, from which the island has its name. ... On the back are the remains of something that is said to have formerly represented a young elephant, though no traces of such a resemblance are now to be found."—Account, &c. By Mr. William Hunter, Surgeon in the E. Indies, Archaeologia, vii. 286.

1789.—In vol. viii. of the Archaeologia, p. 251, is another account in a letter from Hector Macneil, Esq. He mentions "the elephant cut out of stone," but not the small elephant, nor the horse.

1813.—Account of the Cave Temple of Elephants by Wm. Erakine, Trans. Bombay Lit. Soc. i. 196 sqq. Mr. Erakine says in regard to the figure on the back of the large elephant: "The remains of its paws, and also the junction of its belly with the larger animal, were perfectly distinct; and the appearance it offered is represented on the annexed drawing made by Captain Hall (Pl. II.), who from its appearance concluded that it must be a tiger rather than an elephant; an idea in which I feel disposed to agree."—Ibid. 208.

b. s. A name given, originally by the Portuguese, to violent storms occurring at the setting-in, through some travellers describe it as at the setting-in, of the Monsoon. [The Portuguese, however, took the name from the H. hathiyd, Skt. hasta, the 13th lunar Asterism, connected with kastin, an elephant, and hence sometimes called 'the sign of the elephant.' The hathiyd is at the close of the Raina.]

1664.—"The Desman, that is to say a violent storm arise; the kind of storm is known under the name of the Elephant; it blows from the west."—Sid's At. p. 75.

[1611.—"The storm of Ofante doth begin."—Deane's, Letters, i. 125.]

c. 1616.—"The 20th day (August), the night past fell a storm of rains called the Olphant, usual at going out of the raines."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 549; [Hak. Soc. i. 247].

1669.—"The boldest among us became dismayed; and the more the whole culminated in such a terrific storm that we were compelled to believe that it must be that yearly raging tempest which is called the Elephant. This storm, annually, in September and October, makes itself heard in a frightful manner, in the Sea of Bengal."—Waller Schultus, 67.

c. 1665.—"Il y fait si mauvais pour le Vaisseauz au commencement de ce mois à cause d'un Vent d'Orient qui y souffle en ce temps-là avec violence, et qui est toujours accompagné de gros nuages qu'on appelle Elphantz, parce qu'ils en ont la figure ...."—Taveraus, v. 38.

1673.—"Not to deviate any longer, we are now winding to the South-West part of Ceylon; where we have the Tail of the Elephant full in our mouth; a constellation by the Portugals called Rabo del Elephanto, known for the breaking up of the Monsouns, which is the last Flory this season makes."—Fryer, 48.

[1690.—"The Monsouns (Monsoon) are rude and boisterous in their departure, as well as at their coming in, which two seasons are called the Elephant in India, and just before their breaking up, take their farewell for the most part in very rugged puffed weather."—Ovington, 137.]

1756.—"9th (October). We had what they call here an Elephants, which is an excessive hard gale, with very severe thunder, lightning and rain, but it was of short continuance. In about 4 hours there fell 2 (inches)."—Ices, 42.

c. 1760.—"The setting in of the rains is commonly ushered in by a violent thunder-storm, generally called the Elephants."—Grose, i. 53.

ELEPHANT-CREEPERT, s. Argyreia speciosa, Sweet. (N. O. Convolvulaceae). The leaves are used in native medicine as poultices, &c.

ELK, s. The name given by sportsmen in S. India, with singular impropriety, to the great stag Rusa Aristotelis, the sambar (see BAMBER) of Upper and W. India.

[1813.—"In a narrow defile ... a male elk (ceruis alce, Lin.) of noble appearance, followed by twenty-two females, passed majestically under their platform, each as large as a common-sized horse."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 508.]

ELL'OEA, (though very commonly called Ellera), n.p. Properly Elurd, [Tel. elu, 'rule,' eru, 'village.'] otherwise Vérula, a village in the Nizam's territory, 7 m. from Daulatbād, which gives its name to the famous and wonderful rock-caves and temples in its vicinity, excavated in the crescent-shaped scar of a plateau, about 1½ m. in length. These works are Buddhist (ranging from a.d. 460 to 700), Brahminical (c. 650 to 700), and Jain (c. 800-1000).

c. 1665.—"On m'avait fait a Sourat grande estime des Pagodes d'Ellora ... (and after describing them) ... Quoiqu'il en soit, si l'on considère cette quantité de Temples spacieux, remplis de piliastres et de colonnes, et tant de milliers de figures, et le tout taillé dans le roc vif, on peut dire avec vérité que ces ouvrages surpassent la force humaine; et qu'au moins les gens du siècle dans lequel ils ont été faits, n'étaient pas tout-à-fait barbares."—Themenut, v. p. 222.

1684.—"Muhammad Shah Malik Jfn, son of Tughlik, selected the fort of Deogir as a central point whereat to establish the seat of government, and gave it the name of Daulatbād. He removed the inhabitants of Delhi thither. ... Ellora is only a short distance from this place. At some very remote period a race of men, as if by magic, excavated caves high up among the defiles of the mountains. These rooms extended over a breadth of one kos. Carvings of various designs and of correct execution adorned all the walls and ceilings; but the outside of the mountain is perfectly level, and there is no sign of any dwelling. From the long period of time these Pagans remained masters of this territory, it is reasonable to conclude, although historians differ, that to them is to be attributed the construction of these places."—Satt Malda-

'iud Khan, Mu-sir-‘Alamgir, in Elliot, vii. 189 seq.

1760.—"Je descendis ensuite par un sentier frayé dans le roc, et après m'ètre muni de deux Brahmes que l'on me donna pour fort instruit je commençai la visite de ce que j'appelle les Pagodes d'Eloura."—

ELU, HELU, n.p. This is the name by which is known an ancient form of the Singhalese language from which the modern vernacular of Ceylon is immediately derived, "and to which" the latter "bears something of the same relation that the English of today bears to Anglo-Saxon. Fundamentally Elu and Singhalese are identical, and the difference of form which they present is due partly to the large number of new grammatical forms evolved by the modern language, and partly to an immense influx into it of Sanskrit nouns, borrowed, often without alteration, at a comparatively recent period. . . . The name Elu is no other than Sinhala much corrupted, standing for an older form, Hela or Helu, which occurs in some ancient works, and this again for a still older, Saha, which brings us back to the Pali Sihala." (Mr. R. C. Childers, in J.R.A.S., N.S., vii. 36.) The loss of the initial sibilant has other examples in Singhale-se. (See also under CEYLON.)

ENGLISH-BAZAR, n.p. This is a corruption of the name (Angrezabad—‘English-town’) given by the natives in the 17th century to the purilieu of the factory at Malda in Bengal. Now the Head-quarters Station of Malda District.

1688.—“I departed from Casambar with designs (God willing) to visit ye factory at Englesavad.”—Hedges, Diary, May 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 86; also see i. 71]

1878.—“These ruins (Gaur) are situated about 8 miles to the south of Angrezabad (English Bazaar), the civil station of the district of Malda. . . .”—Ravannah’s Gaur,
p. 1.

[ESTIMAUZE, a. A corruption of the Ar.—P. ultimé, "a prayer, petition, humble representation."

1687.—“The Arddest (Ura) with the Esti-mauze concerning your twelve articles which you sent to me arrived."—In Yule, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxx.

EURASIAN, a. A modern name for persons of mixt European and Indian blood, devised as being more euphemistic than Half-caste and more precise than East-Indian. [“No name has yet been found or coined which correctly represents this section.
Eurasian certainly does not. When the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association was established 17 years ago, the term Englo-Indian, after much consideration, was adopted as best designating this community.— (Procs. Imperial Anglo-Indian Ass., in Pioneer Mail, April 13, 1900.)

1844.—“The Eurasian Belle, is a few

1886.—See quotation under KHUDD.

1888.—"The shovel-hats are surprised that the Eurasian does not become a missionary or a schoolmaster, or a policeman, or something of that sort. The native papers say, ‘Deport him’; the white prints say, ‘Make him a soldier’; and the Eurasian himself says, ‘Make me a Commissioner, give me a pension.’”—Ali Baba, 123.

EUROPE, adj. Commonly used in India for “European,” in contradis-tinction to country (q.v.) as qualifying goods, viz. those imported from Europe. The phrase is probably obsolescent, but still in common use.
“Europe shop” is a shop where European goods of sorts are sold in an up-country station. The first quotation applies the word to a man. [A “Europe morning” is lying late in bed, as opposed to the Anglo-Indian’s habit of early rising.]

1673.—“The Enemies, by the help of an Europe Engineer, had sprung a Mine to blow up the Castle.”—Fryer, 87.

1682-3.—“Ordered that a sloop be sent to Conimero with Europe goods . . .”— Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Cre., 1st ser. ii. 14.]
factor, a. Originally a commercial agent; the executive head of a factory. Till some 65 years ago the Factors formed the third of the three classes into which the covenanted civil servants of the Company were theoretically divided, viz. Senior Merchants, Junior Merchants, factors and writers. But these terms had long ceased to have any relation to the occupation of these officials, and even to have any application at all except in the nominal lists of the service. The titles, however, continue (through vis inertiae of administration in such matters) in the classified lists of the Civil Service for years after the abolition of the last vestige of the Company's trading character, and it is not till the publication of the E. I. Register for the first half of 1842 that they disappear from that official publication. In this the whole body appears without any classification; and in that for the second half of 1842 they are divided into six classes, first class, second class, &c., an arrangement which, with the omission of the 6th class, still continues. Possibly the expressions Factor, Factory, may have been adopted from the Portuguese Feitor, Feitoria. The formal authority for the classification of the civilians is quoted under 1675.

1501.—"With which answer night came on, and there came aboard the Captain Mor that Christian of Calcut sent by the Factor (feitor) to say that Cojebequi assured him, and he knew it to be the case, that the King of Calcut was arming a great fleet."—Corros, i. 250.

1582.—"The Factor and the Catull having seen these parcels began to laugh thereat."—Castañeda, tr. by N. L., f. 460.

1600.—"Capt. Middleton, John Havard, and Francis Barne, elected the three principal Factors. John Havard, being present, willingly accepted."—Sainsbury, i. 111.

1610.—"Les Portugais de Malaca ont des commis et facteurs par toutes ces Isles pour le trafic."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 106. [Hak. Soc. ii. 170].

1655.—"Feitor est vn terme Portugais signifiant vn Consul aux Indes."—De la Boullaye-le-Gonu, ed. 1657, p. 333.

1698.—"The Viceroy came to Cochín, and there received the news that Antonio de Sa, Factor (Fator) of Cochin, with all his officers, had been slain by the Moors."—Faria y Sousa, i. 35.

1675-6.—"For the advancement of our Apprentices, we direct that, after they have served the first five years, they shall have £10 per annum, for the last two years; and having served these two years, to be entered as their degree of Factor, which otherwise would have been ten years. And knowing that a distinction of titles is, in many respects necessary, we do order that when the Apprentices have served their times, they be stiled Writers; and when the Writers have served their times, they be stiled Factors, and Factors having served their times to be stiled Merchants; and Merchants having served their times to be stiled Senior Merchants."—Est. of Court's Letter in Bruce's Annals of the E. I. Co., ii. 374-5.
1899.—“These are the chief Places of Note and Trade where their Presidents and Agents reside, for the support of whom, with their Writers and Factors, large Privileges and Salaries are allowed.”—Evington, 386. (The same writer tells us that Factors got £200 a year; junior Factors, £15; Writers, £7. Peons got 4 rupees a month. P. 382.)

1711.—Lockyer gives the salaries at Madras as follows: “The Governor, £300 and £100, gratuity; 6 Councillors, of whom the chief (2nd I) had £100, 3d. £70, 4th. £50, the others £40, which was the salary of 6 Senior Merchants. 2 Junior Merchants £20 per annum; 5 Factors, £15; 10 Writers, £5; 2 Ministers, £100; 1 Surgeon, £25.

“Attorney-General has 50 Pagodas per Annum gratuity.
“Scavenger 100 do.”

(p. 14.)

C. 1748.—“He was appointed to be a Writer in the Company’s Civil Service, becoming... after the first five (years) a factor.”—Orme, Fragments, viii.

1781.—“Why we should have a Council and Senior and Junior Merchants, factors and writers, to load one ship in the year (at Penang), and to collect a very small revenue, appears to me perfectly incomprehensible.”—Corresp. of Ed. Cornwallis, i. 390.

1786.—In a notification of Aug. 10th, the subsistence of civil servants out of employ is fixed thus:—
A Senior Merchant—£400 sterling per ann.
A Junior Merchant—£200
Factors and Writers—£200

In Seton-Karr, i. 151.

FACTORY, s. A trading establishment at a foreign port or mart (see preceding).

1600.—“And then he sent ashore the Factor Ayres Correa with the ship’s carpenters... and sent to ask the King for timber... all which the King sent in great sufficiency. and he sent orders also for him to have many carpenters and labourers to assist in making the houses; and they brought much plank and wood, and palm-trees which they cut down at the Point, so that they made a great Camp, in which they made houses for the Captain Mór, and for each of the Captains, and houses for the people, and they made also a separate large house for the factory (factoria).”—Corres., i. 183.

1582.—“... he sent a Nayre... to the intent hee might remaine in the Factory.”—Castaadana (by N. L.), ft. 545.

1606.—“In which time the Portugall and Tydoryan Slaves had sacked the towne, setting fire to the factory.”—Middleton’s Voyage, G. (4).

1615.—“The King of Acheen desiring that the Hector should leave a merchant in his country... it has been thought fit to settle a factory at Acheen, and leave Juxon and Nicolls in charge of it.”—Sainsbury, i. 415.

1809.—“The factory-house (at Cuddalore) is a chaste piece of architecture, built by my relative Diamond Pitt, when this was the chief station of the British on the Coromandel Coast.”—Ed. Valiant, i. 372.

We add a list of the Factories established by the E. I. Company, as complete as we have been able to compile. We have used Milburn, Sainsbury, the “Charters of the E. I. Company,” and “Robert Burton, The English Acquisitions in Guinea and East India, 1729,” which contains (p. 184) a long list of English Factories. It has not been possible to submit our list as yet to proper criticism. The letters attached indicate the authorities, viz. M. Milburn, S. Sainsbury, C. Charters, B. Burton. FAGHFÚR, n.p. "The common Moslem term for the Emperors of China ; in the Kamus the first syllable is Zammated (Fugh); in Al-Maḥḍūdi (chap. xiv.) we find Baghfu and in Al-Idrisi Baghbugh or Baghbûn. In Al-Asma'î Bagh=god or idol (Pehlewí and Persian) ; hence according to some Baghdād (?) and Bâghisân, a pagoda (?) . Sprunger (Al-Maḥḍūd, p. 327) remarks that Baghfur is a literal translation of Tien-tee, and quotes Visделю : "pour mieux faire comprendre de quel ciel ils veulent parler, ils poussent la généalogie (of the Emperor) plus loin. Ils lui donnent le ciel pour père, la terre pour mère, le soleil pour frère ainé, et la lune pour sœur ainée."—Burton, Arabian Nights, vi. 190-191."

FAILSOOF, s. Ar.—H. fazlîf, from φιλοσοφία. But its popular sense is a 'crafty schemer,' an 'artful dodger.' Filosofo, in Manilla, is applied to a native who has been at college, and returns to his birthplace in the provinces, with all the importance of his acquisitions, and the affectation of European habits (Blumentritt, Vocabular.).

FAKEER, s. Hind. from Arab. faṭīr ('poor'). Properly an indigent person, but specially 'one poor in the sight of God,' applied to a Mahommedan religious mendicant, and then, loosely and inaccurately, to Hindu devotees and naked ascetics. And this last is the most ordinary Anglo-Indian use.

1604.—"Fokers are men of good life, which are only given to peace. Leo calls them Hermites ; others call them Tâbîins and Saints."—Collection of things...of Barbarie, in Purchas, ii. 857.

"Muley Bofmer sent certaine Fokers, held of great estimation amongst the Moors, to his brother Muley Sidan, to treate conditions of Peace."—Ibid.

1683.—"Also they are called' Faqkeeres, which are religious names."—W. Bruton, in Halk. v. 56.

1685.—"Fârîr signifie pauvre en Turc et Persan, mais en Indien signifie...vne especce de Religieux Indou, qui fouillent le monde aux pieds, et ne s'habillent que de haillons qu'ils ramassent dans les rutes."—De la Boullaye-le-Gen, ed. 1657, 588.

C. 1660.—"I have often met in the Field, especially upon the Lands of the Rajas, whole squadrions of these Faquires, altogether naked, dreadful to behold. Some held their Arms lifted up...; others had their terrible Hair hanging about them...; some had a kind of Hercules's Club; others had dry and stiff Tiger-skins over their Shoulders..."—Bernier, E.T. p. 102; [ed. Constable, 317].

1768.—“Received a letter from Dacca dated 29th Novr., desiring our orders with regard to the Fakirs who were taken prisoners at the retaking of Dacca.”—Fl. William Cons. Dec. 5, in Long, 342. On these latter Fakirs, see under SUNYASEE.

1770.—“Singlar expedients have been tried by men jealous of superiority to share with the Bramins the veneration of the multitude; this has given rise to a race of monks known in India by the name of Fakirs.”—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 49.

1774.—“The character of a fakir is held in great estimation in this country.”—Bogle, in Markham’s Tibet, 23.

1856.—“There stands a row of Hindoo devotees, Bedaubed with ashes, their foul matted hair Down to their heels; their clear eye fiercely scowl Beneath their painted brows. On this side struts A Mussulman Fakker, who tells his beads, By way of prayer, but cursing all the while The heathen.”—The Banyan Tree.

FAULAIUN, a. Ar. falân, fulân, and H. fulâna, fâlâna, ‘such an one,’ ‘a certain one’; Span. and Port. fulano, Heb. Fulâns (Ruth iv. 1). In Eliphinstone’s Life we see that this was the term by which he and his friend Strachey used to indicate their master in early days, and a man whom they much respected, Sir Barry Close. And gradually, by a process of Hobson-Jobson, this was turned into Forlorn.

1808.—“The General (A. Wellesley) is an excellent man to have a peace to make. . . . I had a long talk with him about such a one; he said he was a very sensible man.”—Op. cit. i. 81.

1824.—“This is the old ghaft down which we were so glad to retreat with old Forlorn.”—iv. 164. See also i. 56, 108, 345, &c.

FANÁM, a. The denomination of a small coin long in use in S. India, Malayal. and Tamil painnam, ‘money,’ from Skt. pana, [rt. pan, ‘to barter’]. There is also a Dekhani form of the word, fâlâm. In Telugu it is called râka. The form fanam was probably of Arabic origin, as we find it long prior to the Portuguese period. The fanam was anciently a gold coin, but latterly of silver, or sometimes of base gold. It bore various local values, but according to the old Madras monetary system, prevailing till 1818, 42 fanams went to one star pagoda, and a Madras fanam was therefore worth about 2d. (see Prinsep’s Useful Tables, by E. Thomas, p. 18). The weights of a large number of ancient fanams given by Mr. Thomas in a note to his Fakans’ Kings of Delhi’s show that the average weight was 6 grs. of gold (p. 170). Fanams are still met with on the west coast, and as late as 1862 were received at the treasuries of Malabar and Calicut. As the coins were very small they were used to be counted by means of a small board or dish, having a large number of holes or pita. On this a pile of fanams was shaken, and then swept off, leaving the holes filled. About the time named Rs. 5000 worth of gold fanams were sold off at those treasuries. [Mr. Logan names various kinds of fanams: the viârdy, or gold, of which 4 went to a rupee; new viârdy, or gold, 3½ to a rupee; in silver, 5 to a rupee; the râdu fanam, the most ancient of the indigenous fanams, now of fictitious value; the viâdan fanam of Tippoo in 1790-92, of which 3½ went to a rupee (Malabar, ii. Gloss. cxxix.).]

c. 1724.—“A hundred fânâm are equal to 6 golden dinâr” (in Ceylon).—Ton Batuta, iv. 174.

c. 1738.—“And these latter (Malabar Christians) are the Masters of the public steelyard, from which I derived, as a perquisite of my office as Pope’s Legate, every month a hundred gold fan, and a thousand when I left.”—John Marignoli, in Cathay, 343.

1842.—“In this country they have three kinds of money, made of gold mixed with alloy . . . the third called fanom, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last mentioned coin” (pardô, vid. pardao).—Abdurrazak, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 28.

1498.—“Fifty fanomens, which are equal to 3 cruzados.”—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 107.

1505.—“Quivi spendeno duaci d’aur venesiani e monete di auro et argento e metalle, chiamano vna moneta de argento fanone. XX vagliono vna dueto. Tara e vna altra moneta de metalle. XV vagliono vna Fanome.”—Italian version of Letter from Dom Manuel of Portugal (Reprint by A. Burnell, 1881), p. 12.

1510.—“He also coins a silver money called tav, and others of gold, 20 of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of these small coins of silver, there go sixteen to a fanom.”—Varthema, Hak. Soc. 180.

[1515.—“They would take our cruzados at 19 fanomas.”—Albuquerque’s Treaty with FANÁM.

349 FARÁSH, FERÁSH, FRASH.

1516.—"Eight fine rubies of the weight of one fanão... are worth fanões 10."—Barbosa (Liverpool ed.), 384.

1553.—"In the ceremony of dubbing a knight he is to go with all his kinsfolk and friends, in pomp and festival procession, to the House of the King... and make him an offering of 60 of those pieces of gold which they call fanões, each of which may be worth 20 reis of our money."—De Barros, Dec. ii. liv. ix. cap. iii.

1582.—In the English transl. of 'Castañas' is a passage identical with the preceding, in which the word is written "Pannon."—Fol. 366.

[c. 1610.—"Ils nous donnent tous les jours a chacun un Fanon, qui est une pièce d'or monnaye du Roy qui vaut environ quatre sols et demy."—Pynard de Laval, i. 256; [Hak. Soc. i. 350; in i. 365 Fananta.]

1678.—"2. Whosoever shall profane the name of God by swearing or cursing, he shall pay 4 fanas to the use of the poore for every oath or curse."—Orders agreed on by the Governor and Council of Pt. St. Geo. Oct. 28. In Notes and Exts. No. i. 86.

1752.—"N.B. 36 Fanas to a Pagoda, is the exchange, by which all the servants belonging to the Company receive their salaries. But in the Bazar the general exchange in Trade is 40 to 42."—T. Brooks, p. 8.

1784.—"This is probably the word which occurs in a "Song by a Gentleman of the Navy when a Prisoner in Bangalore Jail" (temp. Hyder Ali).

"Ye Bucks of Seringapatam,
Ye Captives so cheerful and gay;
How sweet with a golden sanam
You spun the slow moments away."

In Soton-Karr, i. 19.

1785.—"You are desired to lay a silver fanam, a piece worth three pence, upon the ground. This, which is the smallest of all coins, the elephant feels about till he finds it."—Caraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 288.

1803.—"The pay I have given the boatmen is one gold fanam for every day they do not work, and two gold fanamos for every day they do."—From Sir A. Wellesley, in Life of Moore, i. 342.

FAN-PALM, a. The usual application of this name is to the Borassus flabelliformis, L. (see BRAB, PALMYRA), which is no doubt the type on which our ladies' fans have been formed. But it is also sometimes applied to the Talipot (q.v.); and it is exceptionally (and surely erroneously) applied by Sir L. Pelly (J.R.G.S. xxxv. 229) to the "Traveler's Tree," i.e. the Madagascar Raveharia (Urania speciosa).

FANQUI, a. Chin. fan-kwoi, 'foreign demon'; sometimes with the affix tze or tsé, 'son'; the popular Chinese name for Europeans. ["During the 16th and 16th centuries large numbers of black slaves of both sexes from the E. I. Archipelago were purchased by the great houses of Canton to serve as gate-keepers. They were called 'devil slaves,' and it is not improbable that the term 'foreign devil,' so freely used by the Chinese for foreigners, may have had this origin."—Ball, Things Chinese, 535.]

FARÁSH, FERÁSH, FRASH, s. Ar.—H. Farrak [farash, 'to spread (a carpet')] A menial servant whose proper business is to spread carpets, pitch tents, &c., and, in fact, in a house, to do housemaid's work; employed also in Persia to administer the bastinado. The word was in more common use in India two centuries ago than now. One of the highest hereditary officers of Sindhi's Court is called the Farash-khán-wáli. [The same word used for the tamarisk tree (Tamarix gallica) is a corr. of the Ar. fards.]

1300.—"Se grande richeza apparend un pavillon che li roye d'Ermenie envoya au roye de France, qui valoit bien cinq cents livres; et li manda li roye d'Herminie que uns ferrais au Soudan dou Coyne li avoit donné. Ferrais est cil qui tient les pavillons au Soudane et qui li nettoie ses meisons."—Jean, Seigneur de Joinville, ed. De Wailly, p. 78.

1513.—"And the gentlemen rode... upon horses from the king's stables, attended by his servants whom they call farasbas, who groom and feed them."—Correa, Lendas, ii. f. 364. (Here it seems to be used for Byco (q.v.) or groom).

[1548.—"Pfarasas." See under Batta, a.]

1590.—"Besides, there are employed 1000 Farasháses, natives of Irán, Turán, and Hindostán."—Afu, i. 47.
FEDEA, FUDDEA. a. A denomination of money formerly current in Bombay and the adjoining coast; Mahr. phadya (qu. Ar. fidya, ransom?). It constantly occurs in the account statements of the 16th century, e.g. of Nunez (1554) as a money of account, of which 4 went to the silver tanga, [see TANGA] 20 to the Pardoa. In Milburn (1813) it is a piece or copper coin, of which 50 went to a rupee. Prof. Robertson Smith suggests that this may be the Ar. denomination of a small coin used in Egypt, fadda (i.e. 'silverling'). It may be an objection that the letter sodd used in that word is generally pronounced in India as a z. The fadda is the Turkish döra, a of a piaster, an infinitesimal value now. [Burton (Arabian Nights, xi. 98) gives 2000 faddals as equal about 1. 2d.] But, according to Lane, the name was originally given to half-dirhema, coined early in the 15th century, and these would be worth about 54d. The fedea of 1584 would be about 4½d. This rather indicates the identity of the names.

FEBAZEE, a. Properly Ar. farāzi, from farāt (pl. of far) 'the divine ordinances.' A name applied to a body of Mahomedan Puritans in Bengal, kindred to the Wahabis of Arabia. They represent a reaction and protest against the corrupt condition and pagan practices into which Mahomedanism in Eastern India had fallen, analogous to the former decay of native Christianity in the south (see MALABAR RITES). This reaction was begun by Haji Shariyatullah, a native of the village of Daulatpūr, in the district of Faridpūr, who was killed in an agrarian riot in 1831. His son Dūdū Mīyān succeeded him as head of the sect. Since his death, some 35 years ago, the influence of the body is said to have diminished, but it had spread very largely through Lower Bengal. The Fardīs wraps his dhōty (q.v.) round his loins, without crossing it between his legs, a practice which he regards as heathenish, as a Bedouin would.

PEROZESHUHUR, PERO-SHUHR, PERUSHHAHR. n.p. The last of these appears to be the correct representation of this name of the scene of the hard-fought battle of 21st-22nd December, 1845. For, according to Col. R. C. Temple, the Editor of Panjab Notes and Queries, ii. 116 (1885), the village was named after Bhādi Pherū, a Sikh saint of the beginning of the century, who lies buried at Mīān-ka-Tahsīl in Lahore District.

FETISH. a. A natural object, or animal, made an object of worship. From Port. fetico, feitiço, or feitico (old Span. fechico), apparently from factitus, signifying first 'artificial,' and then 'unnatural,' 'wrought by charm,' &c. The word is not Anglo-Indian; but it was at an early date applied by the Portuguese to the magical figures, &c., used by natives in Africa and India, and has thence been adopted into French and English. The word has of late years acquired a special and technical meaning, chiefly through the writings of Comte. [See Jevons. Intr. to the Science of Rel. 166 seqq.] Raynouard (Lex. Roman.) has fachurier, fachilador, for 'a sorcerer,' which he places under fat, i.e. fatum, and cites old Catalan fadador, old Span. hadador, and then Port. freticiero, &c. But he has mixed up the derivatives of two different words, fatum and factitus. Prof. Max Müller quotes from Muratori, a work of 1311 which has: "incantationes, sacrilegia, auguria, vel maleficia, quae facturas seu præstigia vulgariter appellant." And Baymard himself has in a French passage of 1446: "par leurs sorceries et fœturières."

A curious question has been discussed among entomologists, &c., of late years, viz. as to the truth of the alleged rhythmical or synchronous flashing of fireflies when visible in great numbers. Both the present writers can testify to the fact of a distinct effect of this kind. One of them never forget an instance in which he witnessed it, twenty years or more before he was aware that any one had published, or questioned, the fact. It was in descending the Chândor Ghât, in Nâsik District of the Bombay Presidency, in the end of May or beginning of June 1843, during a fine night preceding the rains. There was a large amphitheatre of forest-covered hills, and every leaf of every tree seemed to bear a firefly. They flashed and intermitted throughout the whole area in apparent rhythm and sympathy. It is, we suppose, possible that this may have been a deceptive impression, though it is difficult to see how it could originate.

The suggestions made at the meetings of the Entomological Society are utterly unsatisfactory to those who have observed the phenomenon. In fact it may be said that those suggested explanations only assume that the so-called observers did not observe what they alleged. We quote several independent testimonies to the phenomenon.

Baymard himself has in a French passage of 1446: "par leurs sorceries et fœturières."

FIREFLY, a. Called in South Indian vernaculars by names signifying 'Lightning Insect.'
They gather in the rainy season in great multitudes in the bushes and trees, and live on the flowers of the trees. There are various kinds."—Newhall, ii. 321.

1764.—

"Ere fireflies trimmed their vital lamps, and ere Dun Evening trod on rapid Twilight's heel, His knell was rung."—Grainger, Bk. I.

1824.—

"Yet mark! as fade the upper skies,
Each thicket opes ten thousand eyes.
Before, behind us, and above,
The fire-fly lights his lamp of love,
Retreating, chasing, sinking, soaring,
The darkness of the closing exploring."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 258.

1865.—"The bushes literally swarm with fireflies, which flash out their intermittent light almost contemporaneously; the effect being that for an instant the exact outline of all the bushes stands prominently forward, as if lit up with electric sparks, and next moment all is jetty dark—darker from the momentary illumination that preceded. These flashes succeed one another every 3 or 4 seconds for about 10 minutes, when an interval of similar duration takes place; as if to allow the insects to regain their electric or phosphoric vigour."—Cameron Our Tropical Possessions in Malayan India, 80-81.

The passage quoted from Mr. Cameron's book was read at the Entom. Soc. of London in May 1865, by the Rev. Hamlet Clarke, who added that:

"Though he was utterly unable to give an explanation of the phenomenon, he could so far corroborate Mr. Cameron as to say that he had himself witnessed this simultaneous flashing; he had a vivid recollection of a particular glen in the Organ Mountains where he had on several occasions noticed the contemporaneous exhibition of their light by numerous individuals, as if they were acting in concert."

Mr. McLachlan then suggested that this might be caused by currents of wind, which by inducing a number of the insects simultaneously to change the direction of their flight, might occasion a momentary concealment of their light.

Mr. Bates had never in his experience received the impression of any simultaneous flashing. ... he regarded the contemporaneous flashing as an illusion produced probably by the swarms of insects flying among foliage, and being continually, but only momentarily, hidden behind the leaves.—Proc. Entom. Soc. of London, 1865, pp. 94-95.

Fifteen years later at the same Society:

"Sir Sidney Saunders stated that in the South of Europe (Corfu and Albania) the simultaneous flashing of Luciola typica, with intervals of complete darkness for some seconds, was constantly witnessed in the dark summer nights, when swarming myriads were to be seen. ... He did not concur in the hypothesis propounded by Mr. McLachlan, ... the facts are certainly intermittent ... the simultaneous character of these coruscations among vast swarms would seem to depend upon an instinctive impulse to emit their light at certain intervals as a protective influence, which intervals became assimilated to each other by imitative emulation. But whatever be the causes ... the fact itself was incontestable."—Ibid. for 1880, Febry. 24, p. ii.; see also p. vii.

1888.—"At Singapore ... the little luminous beetle commonly known as the firefly (Lampyris, sp. ignis) is common ... clustered in the foliage of the trees, instead of keeping up an irregular twinkle, every individual shines simultaneously at regular intervals, as though by a common impulse; so that their light pulsates, as it were, and the tree is for one moment illuminated by a hundred brilliant points, and the next is almost in total darkness. The intervals have about the duration of a second, and during the intermission only one or two remain luminous."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, p. 255.

1880.—"HARRINGERS OF THE MONSOON.

—One of the surest indications of the approach of the monsoon is the spectacle presented nightly in the Mawul tulaks, that is, at Khondalla and Lenoil, where the trees are filled with myriads of fireflies, which flash their phosphoric light simultaneously. Each tree suddenly flashes from bottom to top. Thousands of trees presenting this appearance simultaneously, afford a spectacle beautiful, if not grand, beyond conception. This little insect, the female of its kind, only appears and displays its brilliant light immediately before the monsoon."—Deser. Herald. (From Pioneer Mail, June 17).

FIRINGHEE. s. Pers. Farangi, Firingi; Ar. Al-Farangi, Ifranjî, Firanjî, i.e. a Frank. This term for a European is very old in Asia, but when now employed by natives in India is either applied (especially in the South) specifically to the Indian-born Portuguese, or, when used more generally, for 'European,' implies something of hostility or disparagement. (See Sonnerat and Elphinstones below.) In South India the Tamil Parangi, the Singhalese Parangi, mean only 'Portuguese,' (or natives converted by the Portuguese, or by Mahommades, any European (Madras Gloss. a.v.). St. Thomas’s Mount is called in Tam. Parsangi Malai, from the original Portuguese settlement. Piringee is in Tel. = ‘cannon,’ (C. B. P.), just as in the medieval Mahommedan historians we find certain mangonels for sieges called maghribi or ‘Westerners.’ [And so Farhangi or Phiringani is used for the straight cut and thrust swords introduced by the Portuguese into India, or made there in imitation of the foreign weapon (Sir W. Elliot, Ind. Antiq. x. 20).] And it may be added that Baber, in describing the battle of Panipat (1526) calls his artillery Farangitha (see Autob. by Leyden and Erskine, p. 306. note. See also paper by Gen. R. Macclagan, R.E., on early Asiatic fire-works, in J.A.S. Beng. xliv. Pt. i. pp. 66–67). [c. 985.—“The Afranjah are of all those nations the most warlike... the best organised, the most submissive to the authority of their rulers.”—Mas‘udi, iii. 65.]

c. 1340.—“They call Franci all the Christians of these parts from Romania westward.”—Pegolotti, in Cutethy, &c., 252.

c. 1580.—“Franks. For so they term us, not indeed from France, but from Frankland (non a Francic sed a Frangiqui).”—Marignoli, ibid. 386.

In a Chinese notice of the same age the horses carried by Marignoli as a present from the Pope to the Great Khan are called “horses of the kingdom of Funganked,” i.e. of Faraq or Europe.

1384.—“E quello nominare Franci procede da’ Franceschi, che tutti ci appellano Francesco.”—Frascobaldi, Viaggio, p. 23.

1386.—“At which time, talking of Cataro, he told me howe the chief of that Princes corte knewe well enough what the Franci were... Thou knowest, said he, how seere was bee unto Capea, and that we practise thither continually...” “Add this further, We Catani have two eyes, and yo’ Franchi one, whereas yo’ (torneth him towards the Tartares that were with him) have never a one.”—Barbora, Hak. Soc. 68.

c. 1440.—“Hi nos Francos appellant, aiuntque cum ceteras gentes coecos vocent, se duobis oculis, nos unius esse, superiores existimantse se esse prudens.”—Conti, in Poggio, de Var. Fortunae, iv.

1496.—“And when he heard this he said that such people could be none other than the Francos, for so they call us in those parts.”—Neveo de V. da Gama, 97.

1560.—“Habitatio aqui (Tabris) duas nações de Christos... e huns delles a qui chamão Frangues, estes tem o costume e fé, como nos... e outros são Armencos.”—A. Tenreio, Itinerario, ch. xv.

1565.—“Suddenly news came from Thatta that the Firinges had passed Lehori Bandar, and attacked the city.”—Turkistan-i-Tahrir, in Elliot, i. 276.

c. 1610.—“La renommée des Français a été telle par leur conquêtes en Orient, que leur nom y est demeuré pour mémoire éternelle, en ce qu’encore aujourd’hui par toute l’Asie et Afrique on appelle du nom de Franghi tous ceux qui viennent d’Occident.”—Mooritt, 24.

1616.—“... alli Caffres et Cafaroos es dicunt, alli Francos, quo nomine omnes passim Christiani... dicuntur.”—Jarric, Thesaurus, iii. 217.

[1628.—“Franchi, or Christians.”—P. delle Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 261.] 1632.—“... he shew’d two Passes from the Portugals which they call by the name of Fringises.”—W. Brunton, in Hakkuyt, v. 32.

1648.—“Mais en ce repas-là tout fut bien accommodé, et il y a apparence qu’un cuisinier Frangui s’en estoit mâlé.”—Tavernier, V. des Indes, iii. ch. 23; [ed. Ball, ii. 385].

1653.—“Frank signifie en Turqu vn Europpe, ou plutost vn Chrestien ayant des cheueux et vn chapeau comme les Francs, Angliot...”—De la Boulaye-Le Goux, ed. 1635, 638.

1660.—“The same Fathers say that this King (Jehan-Ouire), to begin in good earnest to countenance the Christian Religion, design’d to put the whole Court into the habit of the Franqui, and that after he had... even dress’d himself in that fashion, he called to him one of the chief Ombras... this Omrah... having answered him very seriously, that it was a very dangerous thing, he thought himself obliged to change his mind, and turned all to raillery.”—Berner, E.T. 92; [ed. Constable, 287; also see p. 3].

1673.—“The Artillery in which the Fringis are Listed; formerly for good Pay, now very ordinary, having not above 80 or 40 Rupees a month.”—Fryer, 195.

1682.—“... whether I had been in Turkey and Arabia (as he was informed) and could speak those languages... with which they were pleased, and admired; to hear from a Frangue (as they call us).”—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 29; [Hak. Soc. i. 44].

1712.—“Johan Whelo, Serdar Frengeiian, or Captain of the Europeans in the Emperour’s service...”—Valentiya, iv. (Suratte) 295.

1755.—“By Feringy I mean all the black mustes (see MUSTEES) Portuguese Christians residing in the settlement as a people distinct from the natural and proper subjects of Portugal; and as a people who sprung originally from Hindoos or Musulmen.”—Hothwell, in Long, 56.

1774.—“He said it was true, but everybody was afraid of the Firingees.”—Bogue, in Markham’s Tibet, 176.
1782.—"Ainsi un Européen est tout ce que les Indiens connaissent de plus méspris-able; ils le nomment Firmaun, nom qu'ils donnèrent aux Portugais, lorsque ceux-ci abordèrent dans leur pays, et c'est un terme qui marque le souverain méspris qu'ils ont pour toutes les nations de l'Europe."—Sonnert, i. 102.

1791.—"... il demande à la passer (la nuit) dans un des logements de la pagoda; mais on lui refuse d'y coucher, à cause qu'il était François !!"—B. de St. Pierre, Chausrière Indien, vol. ii. p. 21.

1794.—"Feringha. The name given by the natives of the Deccan to Europeans in general, but generally understood by the English to be confined to the Portuguese."—Moore's Narrative, 504.

[1620.—"In the southern quarter of Backergunj there still exist several original Portuguese colonies. ... They are a meagre, puny, imbecile race, blacker than the natives, who hold them in the utmost contempt, and designate them by the appellation of Cawla Feringhies, or black Europeans."—Hamilton, Dess. of Hindoostan, i. 133; for an account of the Feringhies of Sibpur, see Beveridge, Baktarganj, 110.]

1824.—"'Now Hajji,' said the ambassador. ... 'The Franks are composed of many, many nations. As fast as I hear of one hog, another begins to grunt, and then another and another, until I find that there is a whole herd of them.'"—Hajji Baba, ed. 1886, p. 432.

1825.—"Europeans, too, are very little known here, and I heard the children continually calling out to us, as we passed through the villages, 'Feringhee, we Feringhees!'"—Heber, ii. 43.

1828.—"'Mr. Elphinstone adds in a note that in India it is a positive affront to call an Englishman a Feringhee.'—Life of E. ii. 207.

[1681.—"There goes my lord the Feringhee, who talks so civil and bland.
But raves like a soul in Jehannum if I don't quite understand—
He begins by calling me Sahib, and ends by calling me fool. ..."
Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindare.

The Tibetans are said to have corrupted Feringhee into Pelong (or Phila). But Jaeschke disputes this origin of Pelong.

FIRMAUN, s. Pers. faram, 'an order, patent, or passport,' der. from faramadan, 'to order.' Sir T. Roe below calls it firma, as if suggestive of the Italian for 'signature.'

[1561.—"... wrote him a letter called Firmao. ..."—Custanceks, Bk. viii. ch. 99.
1602.—"They said that he had a Firmao of the Grand Turk to go overland to the Kingdom of (Portugal). ..."—Cazzo, Dec. viii. ch. 15.]

1606.—"We made our journey having a Firmao (Firmado) of safe conduct from the same Soltan of Shiras."—Gower, f. 1400.

[1614.—"But if possible, bring their chaps, their Firmao, for what they say or promise."—Foster, Letters, ii. 23.]

1616.—"Then I moved him for his favour for an English Factory to be resident in the Towne, which hee willingly granted, and gave present order to the Busy to draw a Firmao ... for their residence."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 541; [Hak. Soc. i. 93; also see i. 47.]

1648.—"The 21st April the Basse sent me a Firmaon or Letter of credentials to all his lords and Governours."—T. Van den Broecke, 32.

1673.—""Our Usage by the Phirmaund (or charters) granted successively from their Emperors, is kind enough, but the better because our Naval Power curbs them."—Fryer, 115.

1683.—""They (the English) complain, and not without a Cause; they having a Phirmaund, and Hodgee Sophee Cauo's Perwaans thereon, in their hands, which cleared them thereof; and to pay Custome now they will not consent, but will rather withdraw their trading. Wherefore their desire is that for 3,000 rup. Piscak (as they paid formerly at Hugly) and 2,000 r. more yearly on account of Judgez, which they are willing to pay, they may on that condition have a grant to be Custome Free."—Nabob's Letter to Viner (MS.), in Hedges Diary, July 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 101.]

1689.—"... by her came Bengal Peons who brought in several letters and a Firmaun from the new Nabob of Bengal."—Wheeler, i. 213.

c. 1690.—"Now we may see the Mogul's Stile in his Firmaund to be sent to Surat, as it stands translated by the Company's Interpreter."—A. Hamilton, l. 227; [ed. 1744, i. 280.]

FISCAL, s. Dutch Fiscal; used in Ceylon for 'Sheriff'; a relic of the Dutch rule in the island. [It was also used in the Dutch settlements in Bengal (see quotation from Hedges, below).] "In Malabar the Fiscal was a Dutch Superintendent of Police, Justice of the Peace and Attorney General in criminal cases. The office and title of Fiscal was retained in British Cochin till 1869, when the designation was changed into Tahsildar and Sub-Magistrate."—(Logan, Malabar, iii. Gloss. s.v.)

[1684.—"... the late Dutch Fiscal's Budgero. ..."—See quotation from Hedges, under DEVIL'S BEACH.]
FLORICAN, FLORIKIN. A name applied in India to two species of small bustard, the 'Bengal Florican' (Syrhomides bengalensis, Gimelin), and the Lesser Florican (S. auritis, Latham), the latter of Hind., a word which is not in the dictionaries. [In the N.W.P. the common name for the Bengal Florican is charas, P. charz. The name Cur-moor in Bombay (see quotation from Forbes below) seems to be khar-mor, the 'grass peacock.' Another Mahr. name, tanamora, has the same meaning.] The origin of the word Florican is exceedingly obscure; see Jerdon below. It looks like Dutch. [The N.E.D. suggests a connection with Flandrensis, a native of Flanders.] Littre has: "Florican ... Nom à Ceylon d'un grand échassier que l'on prêsume être un grue." This is probably mere misapprehension in his authority.

1780.—"The floriken, a most delicious bird of the bustard (sic!) kind."—Munro's Narrative, 199.

1785.—"A floriken at eve we saw And kill'd in yonder glen, When I! it came to table raw, And roused (sic) the rage of Ben." In Seton-Karr, i. 98.

1807.—"The floriken is a species of the bustard ... The cock is a noble bird, but its flight is very heavy and awkward ... if only a wing be broken ... he will run off at such a rate as will baffle most spaniels. ... There are several kinds of the floriken ... the bastard floriken is much smaller. ... Both kinds ... delight in grassy plains, being clear of heavy cover."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, 104.

1813.—"The florican or curmoo (Otis horizontalis, Lin.) exceeds all the Indian wild fowl in delicacy of flavour."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 275; [2nd ed. i. 501].

1824.—"... bringing with him a brace of florikens, which he had shot the previous day. I had never seen the bird before; it is somewhat larger than a blackcock, with brown and black plumage, and evidently of the bustard species."—Heber, i. 253.

1882.—"I have not been able to trace the origin of the Anglo-Indian word 'Florican,' but was once informed that the Little Bustard in Europe was sometimes called Flandrina. Latham gives the word 'Fletcher' as an English name, and this, apparently, has the same origin as Florican."—Jerdon's Birds, 2nd ed. ii. 639. (We doubt if Jerdon has here understood Latham correctly. What Latham writes is, in describing the Passerage Bustard, which, he says, is the size of the Little Bustard: "Inhabits India. Called Passerage Plover. ... I find that it is known in India by the name of Oorwal; by some of the English called Fletcher." (Sedg. to Gen. Synopsis of Birds, 1787, 229.) Here we understand "the English" to be the English in India, and Fletcher to be a clerical error for some form of "floriken." [Fletcher is not in N.E.D.]

1875.—"In the rains it is always matter of emulation at Rajkot, who shall shoot the first purple-created florican."—Wylie's Essays, 358.

FLOWERED-SILVER. A term applied by Europeans in Burma to the standard quality of silver used in the ingot currency of Independent Burma, called by the Burmese yovet-ni or 'Red-leaf.' The English term is taken from the appearance of stars and radiating lines, which forms on the surface of this particular alloy, as it cools in the crucible. The Ava standard is, or was, of about 14½ per cent. alloy, the latter containing, besides copper, a small proportion of lead, which is necessary, according to the Burmese, for the production of the flowers or stars (see Yule, Mission to Ava, 258 sq.).

[1744.—"Their way to make flower'd Silver is, when the Silver and Copper are mix'd and melted together, and while the Metal is liquid, they put it into a Shallow Mould, of what Figure and Magnitude they please, and before the Liquidity is gone, they blow on it through a small wooden Pipe, which makes the Face, or Part blown upon, appear with the Figures of Flowers or Stars, but I never saw any Europeans or other Foreigner at Pegu, have the Art to make those Figures appear, and if there is too great a Mixture of Alloy, no Figures will appear."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 41.]

FLY, s. The sloping, or roof part of the canvas of a tent is so called in India; but we have not traced the origin of the word; nor have we found it in any English dictionary. [The N.E.D. gives the primary idea as "something attached by the edge," as a strip on a garment to cover the button-holes.] A tent such as officers generally use has two flies, for better protection from sun and rain. The vertical canvas walls are called Kandi (see GANATT). [Another sense of the word is "a quick-travelling carriage" (see quotation in Forbes below).]

[1784.—"We all followed in fly-palanhins."—Sir J. Day, in Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 88.]

FLYING-FOX, s. Popular name of the great bat (Pteropus Edwardsii, Geoff). In the daytime these bats roost in large colonies, hundreds or thousands of them pendent from the branches of some great ficus. Jordon says of these bats: "If water is at hand, a tank, or river, or the sea, they fly cautiously down and touch the water, but I could not ascertain if they took a sip, or merely dipped part of their bodies in" (Mammals of India,
p. 18). The truth is, as Sir George Yule has told us from his own observation, that the bat in its skimming flight dips its breast in the water, and then imbibes the moisture from its own wet fur. Probably this is the first record of a curious fact in natural history. "I have been positively assured by natives that on the Odeypore lake in Rajputana, the crocodiles rise to catch these bats, as they follow in line, touching the water. Fancy fly-fishing for crocodile with such a fly!" (Communication from M.-Gen. R. H.
Keatinge.) [On the other hand Mr.
Blanford says: "I have often observed this habit: the head is lowered, the animal pauses in its flight, and the water is just touched, I believe, by the tongue or lower jaw. I have no doubt that some water is drunk, and this is the opinion of both Tickell and M'Master. The former says that flying-foxes in confinement drink at all hours, lapping with their tongues.
The latter has noticed many other bats drink in the evening as well as the flying-foxes." (Mammalia of India, 268.)]

goshawk!"—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 17.

just like great fruit on the tree."—Friar Jordanas, p. 19.

1555.—"On the road we occasionally saw

FOGASS, s. A word of Port. origin used in S. India; fogass, from fogo, 'fire,' a cake baked in embers. It is composed of minced radish with chillies, &c., used as a sort of curry, and eaten with rice.

FOOL'S RACK, s. (For Rack see ABRACK.) Fool Rack is originally, as will be seen from Garcia and Acosta, the name of the strongest distillation from toddy or swra, the 'flower' (phal, in H. and Mahr.) of the spirit. But the 'striving after meaning' caused the English corruption of this name to be applied to a peculiarly abominable and pernicious spirit, in which, according to the statement of various old writers, the stinging sea-blubber was mixed, or even a distillation of the same, with a view of making it more ardent.

1563. — "... this wine they distil like brandy (aqua ardens); and the result is a liquor like brandy; and this fine spirit they call Fulla, which means 'flower'; and the other quality that remains they call Otraca, mixing with it a small quantity of the first kind...." — Garcia, f. 67.

1578. — "... la qual (sura) on vasos despues distilan, para hazer agua ardiente, de la qual una que ellos llaman Fulla, que quier es desir 'flor,' es mas fina, y la segunda, que llaman Otraca, no tanto." — Acosta, p. 101.

1588. — "This Sura being [beeing] distilled, is called Fula or Nipe [see NIPA], and is an excellent aqua vitae as any is made in Dort of their best renish [rennish] wine, but this is of the finest kindes of distillation." — Lineschotes, 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

1673. — "Among the worst of these (causes of disease) Fool Rack (Brandy made of Blubber or Fulla, by the Portugese) because it swims always in a Blubber, as if nothing else were in it; but touch it, and it stings like nettles; the latter, because sailing on the Waves it bears up like a Portuguese Carril (see CARAVEL): It is, being taken, a Gelly, and distilled causes that take it to be Fools. ..." — Pryer, 68-69.

FOOZILOW, TO. v. The imperative p'husld of the H. verb p'husldad, 'to flatter or cajole,' used, in a common Anglo-Indian fashion (see BUNNOW, PUCKASOW, LUGOW), as a verbal infinitive.

FORAS LANDS, s. This is a term peculiar to the island of Bombay, and an inheritance from the Portuguese. They are lands reclaimed from the sea, by the construction of the Vellard (q.v.) at Breech-Candy, and other embankments, on which account they are also known as 'Salt Batty [see BATTAA] (i.e. rice) -grounds.' The Court of Directors, to encourage reclamation, in 1703 authorised these lands to be leased rent-free to the reclaimers for a number of years, after which a small quit-rent was to be fixed. But as individuals would not undertake the maintenance of the embankments, the Government stepped in and constructed the Vellard at considerable expense. The lands were then let on terms calculated to compensate the Government. The tenure of the lands, under these circumstances, for many years gave rise to disputes and litigation as to tenant-right, the right of Government to resume, and other like subjects. The lands were known by the title FORAS, from the peculiar tenure, which should perhaps be FORO, from foro, 'a quit-rent.' The Indian Act VI. of 1851 arranged for the termination of these differences, by extinguishing the disputed rights of Government, except in regard to lands taken up for public purposes, and by the constitution of a Foras Land Commission to settle the whole matter. This work was completed by October 1853. The roads from the Fort crossing the "Flata," or FORAS LANDS, between Malabar Hill and Farell were generally known as "the FORAS Roads"; but this name seems to have passed away, and the Municipal Commissioners have superseded that general title by such names as Clerk Road, Bellasis Road, Falkland Road. One name, "Comattee-poors Forest Road," perhaps preserves the old generic title under a disguise.

Forasdars are the holders of FORAS LANDS. See on the whole matter Bombay Selections, No. III., New Series, 1854. The following quaint quotation is from a petition of Forasdars of Mahim and other places regarding some points in the working of the Commission:

1852. — "... that the case with respect to the old and new salt batty grounds, may it please your Honble. Board to consider deeply, is totally different, because in their original state the grounds were not of the nature of other sweet waste grounds on the island, let out as foras, nor these grounds were of that state as one could saddle himself at the first undertaking thereof with leases or grants even for that smaller rent as the foras is under the denomination of FOUJDABRY, PHOUSDABBY, s. P. faujdar, a district under a faujdar (see FOUJDAR); the office and jurisdiction of a faujdar; in Bengal and Upper India, 'police jurisdiction,' 'criminal' as opposed to 'civil' justice. Thus the chief criminal Court at Madras and Bombay, up to 1863, was termed the Foujdar Adawlut, corresponding to the Nizamut Adawlut of Bengal. (See ADAWULT.)

1802.—"The Governor in Council of Fort St. George has deemed it to be proper at this time to establish a Court of Foujdar Adawlut."—Procl. in Logan, Malabar, ii. 350; iii. 361.

FOWBA, s. In Upper India, a mattock or large hoe; the tool generally employed in digging in most parts of India. Properly speaking (H.) phord. (See MAMOOTTY.)

1679.—(Speaking of diamond digging) "Others with iron pawres or spades heave it up to a heap."—S. Master, in Kistna Man. 147.

1848.—"On one side Bedullab and one of the grasscutters were toiling away with fourrabs, a kind of spade-pickaxe, making water-courses."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, i. 373.

1880.—"It so fell out the other day in Cawapore, that, when a pustari endeavoured to remonstrate with some cultivators for taking water for irrigation from a pond, they knocked him down with the handle of a pharca and cut off his head with the blade, which went an inch or more into the ground, whilst the head rolled away several feet."—Pioneer Mail, March 4.

FOX, FLYING. (See FLYING-FOX.)

FRAZALA, FARASOLA, FRASIL, FRAIL, s. Ar. fsralsa, a weight formerly much used in trade in the Indian sea. As usual, it varied much locally, but it seems to have run from 20 to 30 lbs., and occupied a place intermediate between the (smaller) maund and the Bahar; the fsralsa being generally equal to ten (small) maunds, the bahar equal to 10, 15, or 20 fsralsas. See Barboza (Hak. Soc.) 224; Milburn, i. 83, 87, &c.; Princeps's Useful Tables, by Thomas, pp. 116, 119.

1610.—"They deal by farasola, which farasola weighs about twenty-five of our livre."—Varchema, p. 170. On this Dr.
FREGUEZIA. s. This Portuguese word for 'a parish' appears to have been formerly familiar in the west of India.

c. 1760.—"The island... still continues divided into three Roman Catholic parishes, or Freguesias, as they call them; which are Bombay, Mahim, and Salwaam."—Grose, i. 45.

FULEETA, s. Properly P. patita or fastitia, 'a slow-match,' as of a matchlock, but its usual colloquial Anglo-Indian application is to a cotton slow-match used to light cigars, and often furnished with a neat or decorated silver tube. This kind of cigar-light is called at Madras Ramasammy (q.v.).

FULEETA-PUP, s. This, in Bengal, is a well-known dish in the repertory of the ordinary native cook. It is a corruption of 'friller-puff'!

FURLOUGH, s. This word for a soldier's leave has acquired a peculiar citizenship in Anglo-Indian colloquial, from the importance of the matter to those employed in Indian service. It appears to have been first made the subject of systematic regulation in 1768. The word seems to have come from England from the Dutch Verlof, 'leave of absence,' in the early part of the 17th century, through those of our countrymen who had been engaged in the wars of the Netherlands. It is used by Ben Jonson, who had himself served in those wars:

FUTWA, s. Ar. futud. The decision of a council of men learned in Mahommedan law, on any point of Moslem law or morals. But technically and specifically, the deliverance of a Mahommedan law-officer on a case put before him. Such a deliverance was, as a rule, given officially and in writing, by such an officer, who was attached to the Courts of British India up to a little later than the middle of last century, and it was more or less a basis of the judge's decision. (See more particularly under ADAWUT, CAZEE and LAW-OFFICER.)

1796.—"In all instances wherein the Putwa of the Law-officers of the Nizamat-Adalat shall declare the prisoners liable to more severe punishment than under the evidence, and all the circumstances of the case shall appear to the Court to be just and equitable. . . ."—Regn. VI. of 1796, § ii.

1836.—"And it is hereby enacted that no Court shall, on a Trial of any person accused of the offence made punishable by this Act require any Putwa from any Law-Officer. . . ."—Act XXX. of 1836, regarding Thuggye, § iii.

[1813.—". . . the greatest gales, or abuse, resounded throughout the camp."—Broughton, Letters from a Makr. Camp, ed. 1892, p. 206.

1877.—"You provoke me to give you gâl (abuse), and then you cry out like a neglected wife."—Allardyc, The City of Sunshine, ii. 2.]

GALLEECE, s. Domestic Hindustani galî, 'a pair of brace,' from the old-fashioned gallowes, now obsolete, except in Scotland, [S. Ireland and U.S.,] where the form is gallowses.

GALLEE, POINT DB, n.p. A rocky cape, covering a small harbour and a town with old fortifications, in the S.W. of Ceylon, familiar to all Anglo-Indians for many years as a coaling-place of mail-steamers. The Portuguese gave the town for crest a cock (Gallo), a legitimate pun. The serious derivations of the name are numerous. Pridham says that it is Galla, 'a Rock,' which is probable. But Chitty says it means 'a Pound,' and was so called according to the Malabars (i.e. Tamil people) from "... this part of the country having been anciently set aside by Ravana for the breeding of his cattle" (Ceylon Gazetteer, 1832, p. 92). Tennent again says it was called after a tribe, the Gallas, inhabiting the neighbouring district (see ii. 105, &c.). [Prof. Childers (5 ser. Notes & Queries, iii. 155) writes: "In Sinhalese it is Galla, the etymology of which is unknown; but in any case it can have nothing to do with 'rock,' the Sinhalese for which is gala with a short a and a single l'""] Tennent has been entirely misled by Reinaud in supposing that Galle could be the Kala of the old Arab voyages to China, a port which certainly lay in the Malay seas. (See GALAY.)

1518.—"He tried to make the port of Colombo, before which he arrived in 3 days, but he could not make it because the wind was contrary, so he stayed about for 4 days till he made the port of Galle, which is in the south part of the island, and entered it with his whole squadron; and then our people went ashore killing cows and plundering whatever they could find."—Corres. II. 540.

1558.—"In which Island they (the Chinese), as the natives say, left a language which they call Chingalla, and the people themselves Chingalllas, particularly those who dwell from Ponta de Galle onwards, facing the south and east. For adjoining that point they founded a City called Tanabaré (see DONNER HEAD), of which a large part still stands; and from being hard by that Cape of Galle, the rest of the people, who dwelt from the middle of the island upwards, called the inhabitants of this part Chingalla, and their language the same, as if they would say language or people of the Charis of Galle."—Barros, III. ii. cap. 1. (This is, of course, all fanciful.)

1554.—"He went to the port of Gallequama, which our people now call Porto de Gala."—Cavalcado, ii. ch. 23.

1691.—"We passed by Cape Comoryn, and came to Fungale."—Valentijn, ii. 540.

GALLEGALLE, s. A mixture of lime and linseed oil, forming a kind of mortar impenetrable to water (Shakespeare), Hind. galgal.

1621.—"Also the justis, Tacaoonou Done, sent us word to give over making gallegalle in our hose; we hired of China Capt., because the white lyne did trouble the player or singing man, next neighbour..."—Cock's Diary, ii. 190.

GALLEVAT, s. The name applied to a kind of galley, or war-boat with oars, of small draught of water, which continued to be employed on the west coast of India down to the latter half of the 18th century. The work quoted below under 1717 explains the galley-watts to be "large boats like Gravesend Tilt-boats; they carry about 6 Carvel-Guns and 60 men at small arms, and Oars; They sail with a Peak Sail like the Mixen of a Man-of-War, and row with 30 or 40 Oars. . . . They are principally used for landing Troops for a Descent. . . ."(p. 23). The word is highly interesting from its genealogical tree; it is a descendant of the great historical and numerous family of the Galley (galley, galiot, galleon, galeese, galleida, galeoncino, &c.), and it is almost certainly the immediate parent of the hardly less historical Jolly-boat, which plays so important a part in British naval annals. [Prof. Skeat takes jolly-boat to be an English adaptation of Danish jolle, "a yawl"]; Mr. Foster remarks that jollywatt as an English word, is at least as old as 1495-97 (Oppenheim, Naval Accounts and Inventories, Navy Rec. Soc. viii. 193) (Letters, iii. 396).] If this be true, which we can hardly doubt, we shall have three of the boats of the British man-of-war owing their names (quod minus minus raris) to Indian originals, viz. the Cutter, the Dingy, and the Jolly-boat to catur, dingy and gallevat. This last derivation we take from Sir J. Campbell's Bombay Gazetteer (xiii. 417), a work that one can hardly mention without admiration. This writer, who states that a form of the same word, galbat, is now generally used by the natives in Bombay waters for large foreign vessels, such as English ships and steamers, is inclined to refer it to jaiba, a word for a small boat used on the shores of the Red Sea (see Dozy and Eng., p. 276), which appears below in a quotation from Ibn Batuta, and which vessels were called by the early Portuguese geluas. Whether this word is the parent of galley and its derivatives, as Sir J. Campbell thinks, must be very doubtful, for galley is much older in European use than he seems to think, as the quotation from Asser shows. The word also occurs in Byzantine writers of the 9th century, such as the Continuator of Theophanes quoted below, and the Emperor Leo. We shall find below the occurrence of galley as an Oriental word in the form jala, which looks like an Arabized adoption from a Mediterranean tongue. The Turkish, too, still has kaldan for a ship of the line, which is certainly an adoption from galeote. The origin of galley is a very obscure question. Amongst other suggestions mentioned by Diez (Etym. Wörterb., 2nd ed. i. 198-199) is one from γαλάτα, a shark, or from γαλεόνη, a sword-fish—the latter very suggestive of a galley with its aggressive beak; another is from γαλήνη, a word in Hesychius, which is the apparent origin of 'gallery.' It is possible that galeota, galiote, may have been taken directly from the shark or sword-fish, though in imitation of the galea already in use. For we shall see below that galiot was used for a pirate. [The N.E.D. gives the European synonymous words, and regards the ultimate etymology of galley as unknown.]

The word gallewat seems to come directly from the galeota of the Portuguese and other S. European nations, a kind of inferior galley with only one bank of oars, which appears under the form galiom in Joinville, infra (not to be confounded with the galeonas of a later period, which were larger vessels), and often in the 13th and 14th centuries as galeota, galiotes, &c. It is constantly mentioned as forming part of the Portuguese fleets in India. Bluteau defines galeota as "a small galley with one mast, and with 15 or 20 benches a side, and one oar to each bench."

1518.—"The Governor put on great pressure to embark the force, and started from Cochín the 20th September, 1518, with 17 sail, besides the Goz foteis, taking 3 galleys (galeys) and one galeota, two brigantines (bargantins), four caravels, and the rest round ships of small size."—Correa, ii. 589.

1548.—". . . pero a guayasa en que ha d'andar o alcaide do mar."—S. Botehko, Tombo, 239.
1562. "...As soon as this news reached The Sublime Porte the Sandjak of Katif was ordered to send Murad-Beg to take command of the fleet, enjoining him to leave in the port of Basore one or two ships, five galleys, and a galloot."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 48.

"...They (the Portuguese) had 4 ships as big as carracks, 3 ghuraba or great (rowing) vessels, 6 Portuguese caravels and 12 smaller ghurabs, i.e. galloes with oars."—Ibid. 67-68. Unfortunately the translator does not give the original Turkish word for galloot.

c. 1610. "...Es grandes Galeres il y peut deuX et trois cens hommes de guerre, et en d'autres grandes Galotes, qu'ill nomme Fregates, il y en peut cent..."—Pyrrard de Laval, ii. 72; [Hak. Soc. ii. 113].

[1665. "He gave a sufficient number of galotes to escort them to sea."—Tavernier, ed. Balf. i. 193.]

1899. "He embarked about the middle of October in the year 1642, in a galloot, which carried the new Captain of Comorin."—Dryden, Life of Xavier. (In Works, ed. 1822, xvi. 87.)

GAMBIER. s. The extract of a climbing shrub (Uncaria Gambier, Roxb. ? Naucea Gambier, Hunter; N.O. Rubiaceae) which is a native of the regions about the Straits of Malacca, and is much grown in plantations in Singapore and the neighbouring islands. The substance in chemical composition and qualities strongly resembles cutch (q.v.), and the names Catechu and Terra Japonica are applied to both. The plant is mentioned in Debray, 1601 (iii. 99), and by Rumphius, c. 1690 (v. 63), who describes its use in mastication with betel-nut; but there is no account of the catechu made from it, known to the authors of the Pharmacographia, before 1780. Crawford gives the name as Javanese, but Hanbury and Flückiger point out the resemblance to the Tamil name for catechu, Katta Kamba (Pharmacographia, 298 seqq.). [Mr. Skeat points out that the standard Malay name is gambit, of which the origin is uncertain, but that the English word is clearly derived from it.]

GANDA, s. This is the H. name for a rhinoceros, gainda, genda from Skt. gandaka, gandāka, gojendra). The note on the passage in Barboes by his Hak. Soc. editor is a marvel in the way of error. The following is from a story of Correa about a battle between "Bober Mirza" (i.e. Sultan Baber) and a certain King "Cacandar" (Sikandar ?), in which I have been unable to trace even what events it misrepresents. But it keeps Fernan Mendez Pinto in countenance, as regards the latter's statement about the advance of the King of the Tartars against Peking with four score thousand rhinoceroses!

"...The King Cacandar divided his army into five battles well arrayed, consisting of 140,000 horse and 280,000 foot, and in front of them a battle of 800 elephants, which fought with swords upon their tusks, and on their backs castles with archers and musketeers. And in front of the elephants 80 rhinoceroses (gandas), like that which went to Portugal, and which they call bichs (?); these on the horn which they have over the smout carried three-pronged iron weapons with which they fought very stoutly...and the Mogors with their arrows made a great discharge, wounding many of the elephants and the gandas, which as they felt the arrows, turned and fled, breaking up the battles..."—Correa, iii. 573-574.
Nature has created after the elephant, and the great enemy of the latter . . . which the natives of the land of Cambaya, whence this one came, call Ganda, and the Greeks and Latins Rhinoceros. And Alfonso d’Alboquerque sent this to the King Don Manuel, and it came to this Kingdom, and it was afterwards lost on its way to Rome, when the King sent it as a present to the Pope.”—Barros, Dec. II. liv. x. cap. 1. [Also see d’Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. iv. 104 seq.].

GANTON, s. This is mentioned by some old voyagers as a weight or measure by which pepper was sold in the Malay Archipelago. It is presumably Malay gantang, defined by Crawford as “a dry measure, equal to about a gallon.” [Klinkert has: “gantang, a measure of capacity 5 katis among the Malays; also a gold weight, formerly 6 suku, but later 1 bongkal, or 8 suku.” Gantang-gantang is ‘cartridge-case.’] 1564.—“Also a candy of Goa, answers to 140 gantmas, equivalent to 16 paraas, 30 medidas at 42 medidas to the paraa.”—A. Nunes, 39.

[1615.—“ . . . 1000 gantuas of pepper.”
— Foster, Letters, iii. 185.]

I meant to borrow 4 or 5 gantmas of oyle of Yasemun Dono. . . . But he returned answer he had none, when I know, to the contrary, he bought a parcel out of my handes the other day.”—Cocke’s Diary, i. 6.

GANZA, s. The name given by old travellers to the metal which in former days constituted the inferior currency of Pegu. According to some it was lead; others call it a mixt metal. Lead in rude lump is still used in the bazaars of Burma for small purchases. (Yule, Mission to Ava, 259.) The word is evidently Skt. karsa, ‘bell-metal,’ whence Malay gangsa, which last is probably the word which travellers picked up.

1564.—“In this Kingdom of Pegu there is no coined money, and what they use commonly consists of dishes, pans, and other utensils of service, made of a metal like froxleyra (?), broken in pieces; and this is called gansa . . . .”—A. Nunes, 39.

“ . . . vn altra statua cosi fatta di Gansa; che a vn metallo di che fanno le lor monet, fate di rame e di piombo messolatinsieme.”—Cesare Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 394v.

c. 1567.—“The current money that is in this Cittie, and throughout all this kingdom, is called Gansa or Ganza, which is made of copper and lead. It is not the money of the king, but every man may stamp it that will.”—Cesare Federici, E.T., in Purchas, iii. 1717-18.

1726.—“Rough Peguan Gana (a brass mixt with lead). . . .”—Valentijn, Chr. 84.

1727.—“Plenty of Ganae or Lead, which passeth all over the Pegu Dominions, for Money.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 41; [ed. 1744, ii. 40].

GARDEE, s. A cubic measure for rice, &c., in use on the Madras coast, as usual varying much in value. Buchanan (infra) treats it as a weight. The word is Tel. gudris, gudris, Can. garaaee, Tam. karisii. [In Chingleput salt is weighed by the Garce of 124 maunds, or nearly 5,152 tons (Ovole, Man. 68); in Salem, 400 Markals (see MErcALL) are 185-2 cubic feet, or 18 quarters English (Le Fanu, Man. ii. 329); in Malabar, 120 Paras of 25 Macleod seers, or 10,800 lbs. (Logan, Man. ii. clxxix). As a superficial measure in the N. Circars, it is the area which will produce one Garce of grain.

[1865.—“A Generall to Conimeer of this day date enordring them to provide 200 garas of salt . . . .”—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 40, who notes that a still earlier use of the word will be found in Notes and Eacts. i. 97.]

1752.—“Grain Measures.
1 Measure weighs about 26 lb. 1 oz. avd.
8 Do. is 1 Mereal 21
3200 Do. is 400 do., or
1 Garce 8400
Brooks, Weights and Measures, &c., p. 6.
1759.—“ . . . a garce of rice . . . .”—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 120.

1784.—“The day that advice was received . . . (of peace with Tippool) at Madras, the price of rice fell there from 115 to 80 pagodas the garce.”—In Seton-Karr, i. 13.

1807.—“The proper native weights used in the Company’s Jaghire are as follows: 10 Varu hun (Pagodas)=1 Polam, 40 Polams =1 Visoy, 8 Visoy (Vrees)=1 Manung, 20 Manungus (Maunds)=1 Barways, 20 Barways (Candies)=1 Gurry, called by the English Garse. The Varu hun or Star Pagoda weighs 552 grains, therefore the Visoy is nearly three pounds avoirdupois (see VI53); and the Garse is nearly 1285 lbs.”—F. Buchanan, Myseore, &c., i. 8.

By this calculation, the Garse should be 9600 lbs. instead of 1285 as printed.

GARDEE, s. A name sometimes given, in 18th century, to native soldiers disciplined in European fashion, i.e. sepoyys (q.v.). The Indian Vocabulary (1788) gives: “Gardee—a tribe inhabiting the provinces of Bijapore, &c., esteemed good foot soldiers.” The word may be only a corruption of 'guard,' but probably the origin assigned in the second quotation may be well founded; 'Guard' may have shaped the corruption of Gharbi. The old Bengal sepoys were commonly known in the N.W. as Purbias or Easterns (see POORBB) [Women in the Amazon corps at Hyderabad (Deccan), known as the Zafar Paltan or 'Victorious Battalion,' were called gardunsee (Gardani), the feminine form of Graud or Guard.]

1762.—"A coffro who commanded the Telingas and Gardese ... asked the horseman whom the horse belonged to."—Native Letter, in Van Sittart, i. 141.

1780.—"... originally they (Sipahas) were commanded by Arabians, or those of their descendants born in the Canara and Coenam or Western part of India, where those foreigners style themselves Gharbies or Western. Moreover these corps were composed mostly of Arabs, Negroes, and Habissians, all of which bear upon that coast the same name of Gharbi. ... In time the word Gharbi was corrupted by both the French and Indians into that of Gardi, which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India save Bengal ... where they are stilled Telingas."—Note by Tranal of Sir Mutagherin, ii. 93.

[1815.—"The women composing them are called gardunsee, a corruption of our word Guard."—Blackar, Mem. of the Operations in India in 1817-19, p. 213 note.]

GARDENS, GARDEN-HOUSE, s. In the 18th century suburban villas at Madras and Calcutta were so called. 'Garden Reach' below Fort William took its name from these.

1692.—"Early in the morning I was met by Mr. Littleton and most of the Factory near Hugly, and about 9 or 10 o'clock by Mr. Vincent near the Dutch Garden, who came attended by several Boats and Budge-rowers guarded by 35 Firelocks, and about 50 Rashpoors and Peons well armed."—Hedges, Diary, July 24; [Hak. Soc. i. 82].

1685.—"The whole Council ... came to attend the President at the garden house..."—Pringle, Diary, Fort St. Geo. let ser. iv. 115; in Wheeler, i. 139.

1747.—"In case of an Attack at the Garden House, if by a superior Force they should be oblige'd to retire, according to the orders and send a Horseman before them to advise of the Approach ..."—Report of Council of War at Fort St. David, in India Office M.S. Records.

1772.—"The place of my residence at present is a garden-house of the Nabob, about 6 miles distant from Moorshedabad."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 34.

1782.—"A body of Hyder's horse were at St. Thomas's Mount on the 28th ult. and Gen. Munro and Mr. Brodie with great difficulty escaped from the General's Gardens. They were pursued by Hyder’s horse within a mile of the Black Town."—India Gazette, May 11.

1809.—"The gentlemen of the settlement live entirely in their garden-houses, as they very properly call them."—Id. Valeria, i. 389.

1810.—"... Rural retreats called Garden-houses."—Williamson, V. M. i. 137.

1873.—"To let, or for sale, Sorie's Gardens at Adyar.—For particulars apply," &c.—Madras Mail, July 3.

GARRY, GHARRY, s. H. gdr, a cart or carriage. The word is used by Anglo-Indians, at least on the Bengal side, in both senses. Frequently the species is discriminated by a distinctive prefix, as palkee-garry (palankin carriage), sej-garry (chaise), rel-garry (railway carriage), &c. [The modern dawk-garry was in its original form called the "Equirotal Carriage," from the four wheels being of equal dimensions. The design is said to have been suggested by Lord Ellenborough. (See the account and drawing in Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 3 seq.).]

1810.—"The common ghorry ... is rarely, if ever, kept by any European, but may be seen plying for hire in various parts of Calcutta."—Williamson, V. M. i. 322.

1811.—The Cary is represented in Solyn's engravings as a two-wheeled rath [see BUT] (i.e., the primitive native carriage, built like a light hackery) with two ponies.

1866.—"My husband was to have met us with a two-horse gharee."—Trevelyan, Dawk Bungalow, 384.

[1892.—The bram gari, brougham; the faton gari, phaeton or barouche; the ediat, waggonette, are now built in most large towns ... The ediat seems likely to be the carriage of the future, because of its capacity."—R. Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 193.]

GAUM, GONG, s. A village, H. gdon, from Skt. grdma.

1519.—"In every one of the said villages, which they call gudco."—Gaz Proclam. in Arch. Port. Oriental, fasc. 5, 93.

Gomacca occurs in the same vol. (p. 76), under the forms gowcara and gwacara, for the village heads in Port. India.
GAURIAN, adj. This is a convenient name which has been adopted of late years as a generic name for the existing Aryan languages of India, i.e. those which are radically sprung from, or cognate to, the Sanskrit. The name (according to Mr. E. L. Brandreth) was given by Prof. Hoernle; but it is in fact an adoption and adaptation of a term used by the Pandits of Northern India. They divide the colloquial languages of (civilised) India into the 5 Gauras and 5 Draviras [see DEAVIDIAN]. The Gauras of the Pandits appear to be (1) Bengalee (Bangali) which is the proper language of Gawda, or Northern Bengal, from which the name is taken (see GOUR c.), (2) Oriya, the language of Orissa, (3) Hindi, (4) Panjabi, (5) Sindhi; their Draviras are (1) Telinga, (2) Karnataka (Canarese), (3) Marathi, (4) Gurjara (Gujarati), (5) Dravira (Tamil). But of these last (3) and (4) are really to be classed with the Gauran group, so that the latter is to be considered as embracing 7 principal languages. Kashmiri, Singhalese, and the languages or dialects of Assam, of Nepal, and some others, have also been added to the list of this class.

The extraordinary analogies between the changes in grammar and phonology from Sanskrit in passing into those Gaurian languages, and the changes of Latin in passing into the Romance languages, analogies extending into minute details, have been treated by several scholars; and a very interesting view of the subject is given by Mr. Brandreth in vola. xi. and xii. of the J.E.A.S., N.S.

GAUTAMA, n.p. The surname, according to Buddhist legend, of the Sakya tribe from which the Buddha Sakya Muni sprung. It is a derivative from Gotama, a name of “one of the ancient Vedic bard-families” (Oldenberg). It is one of the most common names for Buddha among the Indo-Chinese nations. The Sommuna-codom of many old narratives represents the Pali form of Sranama Gautama, “The Ascetic Gautama.”

1545.—“I will pass by them of the sect of Godarmm, who spend their whole life in crying day and night on those mountains, Godarmm, Godomam, and desist not from it until they fall down stark dead to the ground.”—F. M. Pinto, in Cogn, p. 222.

1560.—See under Godammary passage from Afs, where Gotam occurs.

1566.—“J'ai cru devoir expliquer toutes ces choses avant que de parler de Sommum-R kodom (c'est ainsi que les Siamois appellent le Dieu qu'ils adorent à présent).”—Voy. de Siam, Des Péres Jesuites, Paris, 1666, p. 387.

1587-88.—“Now tho' they say that several have attained to this Felicity (Nirvapes, i.e. Nirvana) ... yet they honour only one alone, whom they esteem to have surpassed all the rest in Vertue. They call him Sommuna-Codom: and they say that Codom was his Name, and that Sommons signifies in the Balte Tongue a Talapoir of the Woods.”—Hist. Rel. of Siam, by De La Louebe, E.T. i. 130.

[1727.—“... inferior Gods, such as Somma Cuddom...” —A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 54.]

1782.—“Les Peguins et les Behamans. ... Quant à leurs Dieux, ils en comptent sept principaux. ... Cependant ils n'en adorent qu'un seul, qu'ils appellent Godeman...”—Somner, ii. 299.

1800.—“Gom, or Goutum, according to the Hindoos of India, or Gauduma among the inhabitants of the more eastern parts, is said to have been a philosopher... he taught in the Indian schools, the heterodox religion and philosophy of Boudh. The image that represents Boodh is called Gautama, or Goutum. ...”—Symes, Embassy, 299.

1828.—“The titles or synonyms of Buddha, as they were given to me, are as follow: "Kotamo (Gautama)... Somma kotamo, agreeably to the interpretation given me, means in the Pali language, the priest Gauhtama.”—Crawford, Emb. to Siam, p. 367.

GAVEE, a. Topsail. Nautical jargon from Port. gava, the top. (Roebuck).

GAVIAL, a. This is a name adopted by zoologists for one of the alligators of the Ganges and other Indian rivers, Gaviais gangeticus, &c. It is the less dangerous of the Gantetic saurians, with long, slender, subcylindrical jaws expanding into a protuberance at the muzzle. The name must have originated in some error, probably a clerical one, for the true word is Hind. ghariyd, and gavial is nothing. The term (gariyila) is used by Baber (p. 410), where the translator's note says: “The gairial is the round-mouthed crocodile,” words which seem to indicate the megar GAZAT. 367 GENTOO.

(see MUGGUR) (Crocodilus biporatus) not the grayjawed.

c. 1809.—"In the Brohmoputro as well as in the Ganges there are two kinds of crocodile, which at Gopalpurs are both called Kuser; but each has a specific name. The Crocodilus Gangesicus is called Grayjawed, and the other is called Bongaica."—Buchanan's Runpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 581-2.

GAZAT. s. This is domestic Hind. for 'dessert.' (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 184).

GECKO. s. A kind of house lizard. The word is not now in Anglo-Indian use; it is a naturalist's word; and also is French. It was no doubt originally an onomatopoeia from the creature's reiterated utterance. Marcel Devic says the word is adopted from Malay gekot [gekoq]. This we do not find in Crawford, who has toki, tokik, and gol, all evidently attempts to represent the utterance. In Burma the same, or a kindred lizard, is called tokik, in like imitation.

1631.—Bontius seems to identify this lizard with the Guna (q.v.), and says its bite is so venomous as to be fatal unless the part be immediately cut out, or cauterised. This is no doubt a fable. "Nosteratis ipsum animal apposito vocabulo gecko voscant: quippe non seco se Coccys apud nos sumum centum iterat, etiam gecko assiduo sonat, prius edito striodore qualam Pius emittit."—Lib. V. cap. 5. p. 57.

1711.—"Chacooas, as Cuckoos receive their Names from the Noise they make. . . . They are much like lizards, but larger. 'Tis said their Dung is so venomous," &c. —Lockyer, 84.

1725.—"They have one dangerous little Animal called a Jackass, in shape almost like a Lizard. It is very malicious . . . and wherever the Liquor lights on an Animal Body, it presently kanners the Flesh."—A. Hamilton, ii. 131; [ed. 1744. ii. 136].

This is still a common belief. (See BISOBORA.)

1883.—"This was one of those little house lizards called gekkos, which have pellets at the ends of their toes. They are not repulsive brutes like the garden lizard, and I am always on good terms with them. They have full liberty to make use of my house, for which they seem grateful, and say chuck, chuck, chuck."—Tribe on My Frontier, 88.

GENTOO. s. and adj. This word is a corruption of the Portuguese Gentio, 'a gentile' or heathen, which they applied to the Hindus in contradistinction to the Moros or 'Moors,' i.e. Mahommedanas. [See MOOR.] Both terms are now obsolete among English people, except perhaps that Gentio still fingers at Madras in the sense b; for the terms Gentio and Gentoo were applied in two senses:

a. To the Hindus generally.

b. To the Telugu-speaking Hindus of the Peninsula specially, and to their language.

The reason why the term became thus specifically applied to the Telugu people is probably because, when the Portuguese arrived, the Telugu monarchy of Vijayanagara, or Bijanagar (see BISNAGAR, NARSENGA) was dominant over great part of the Peninsula. The officials were chiefly of Telugu race, and thus the people of this race, as the most important section of the Hindus, were per excellence the Gentiles, and their language the Gentile language. Besides these two specific senses, Gentio was sometimes used for heathen in general. Thus in F. M. Pinto: "A very famous Corsair who was called Himililau, a Chinese by nation, and who from a Gentio as he was, had a little time since turned Moor. . . ."—Ch. L.

56.——"The Religious of this territory spend so largely, and give such great alms at the cost of your Highness's administration that it disposes of a good part of the funds. . . . I believe indeed they do all this in real zeal and sincerity . . . but I think it might be reduced a half, and all for the better; for there are some of them who often try to make Christians by force, and worry the Gentoes (gentios) to such a degree that it drives the population away."—Simao Botelho Cartas, 95.

1568.—". . . Among the Gentiles (Gentios) Rão is as much as to say 'King.'"—Garcia, i. 365.

1569.—"This ambergris is not so highly valued among the Moors, but it is highly prized among the Gentiles."—Ibid. f. 14.

1882.—"A gentile . . . whose name was Canaca."—Custuumez, trans. by N. L., f. 81.

1888.—In a letter of this year to the Viceroy, the King (Philip II.) says he 'understands the Gentios are much the best persons to whom to farm the alfandegas (customs, &c.), paying well and regularly, and it does not seem contrary to canon-law to farm to them, but on this he will consult the learned.'—In Arch. Port. Orient. fasc. 3. 185.

C. 1610.—"Ils (les Portugains) exercent ordinairement de semblables cruautés lors qu'ils sortent en troupe le long des cotes, braulans et saccoeans ces pauuues Gentiles qui ne desirent que leur bonne grace, et leur amitie mais ils n'en ont pas plus de pitie pour cela."—Mocquet, 349.

1630.—"... which Gentiles are of two sorts... first the purer Gentiles... or else the impure or vulnene Gentiles... such are the husbandsmen or inferior sort of people called the Cowlies."—H. Lord, Display, &c., 85.

1673.—"The finest Dames of the Gentuses disdained not to carry Water on their Heads."—Fryer, 116.

"Gentuus, the Portuguese idiom for Gentiles, are the Aborigines."—Ibid. 27.

1679.—In Fort St. Geo. Cons. of 29th January, the Black Town of Madras is called "the Gentus Town."—Notes and Ezts., No. ii. 3.

1682.—"This morning a Gentoo sent by Bulchund, Governor of Hugly and Casembar, made complaint to me that Mr. Charnock did shamefully — to y° great scandal of our Nation — keep a Gentoo woman of his kindred, which he has had these 19 years."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 1.; [Hak. Soc. i. 52].

1683.—"The ceremony used by these Gentu's in their sickness is very strange: they bring y° sick person... to y° brink of y° River Ganges, on a Cot..."—Ibid. May 10.; [Hak. Soc. i. 86].

In Stevenson's Trans. of Faria y Sousa (1695) the Hindus are still called Gentiles. And it would seem that the English form Gentoo did not come into general use till late in the 17th century.

1767.—"In order to transact Business of any kind in this Country you must at least have a Smattering of the Language... The original Language of this Country (or at least the earliest we know of) is the Bengal or Gentoo; this is commonly spoken in all parts of the Country. But the polite Language is the Moors or Mussulmans, and Persian."—M.S. Letter of James Rennell.

1772.—"It is customary with the Gentooos, as soon as they have acquired a moderate fortune, to dig a pond."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 36.

1774.—"When I landed (on Island of Ball) the natives, who are Gentooos, came on board in little canoes, with outriggers on each side."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 169.

1776.—"A Code of Gentoo Laws or Ordinances of the Pundits. From a Persian Translation, made from the original written in the Shanekrit Language. London, Printed in the Year 1776."—(Title of Work by Nathaniel Brassey Halded.)

1778.—"The peculiar patience of the Gentooos in Bengal, their affection to business, and the peculiar cheapness of all productions either of commerce or of necessaries. For of necessity it concurred to render the details of the revenue the most minute, voluminous, and complicated system of accounts which exist in the universe."—Orme, ii. 7 (Reprint).

1817.—The third grammar of the Telugu language, published in this year, is called a 'Gentoo Grammar.'

1837.—'I mean to amuse myself with learning Gentoo, and have brought a Moon-shee with me. Gentoo is the language of this part of the country [Godavery delta], and one of the prettiest of all the dialects.'—Letters from Madras, 189.

GHAUT. a. Hind. ghaut.

- A landing-place; a path of descent to a river; the place of a ferry, &c. Also a quay or the like.

- A path of descent from a mountain; a mountain pass; and hence

- As n.p. The mountain ranges parallel to the western and eastern coasts of the Peninsula, through which the ghats or passes lead from the table-lands above down to the coast and lowlands. It is probable that foreigners hearing these tracts spoken of respectively as the country above and the country below the Ghats (see BALAGHAUT) were led to regard the word Ghats as a proper name of the mountain range itself, or (like De Barros below) as a word signifying range. And this is in analogy with many other cases of mountain nomenclature, where the name of a pass has been transferred to a mountain chain, or where the word for ‘a pass’ has been mistaken for a word for ‘mountain range.’ The proper sense of the word is well illustrated from Sir A. Wellesley, under b.

1809.—"The dandys there took to their paddles, and keeping the beam to the current the whole way, contrived to land us at the destined gaut."—Ed. Valentia, i. 185.

1824.—"It is really a very large place, and rises from the river in an amphitheatral form ... with many very fine ghats descending to the water's edge."—Heber, i. 167.

1815.—"In 17 more days they arrived at Gurgaw. During these 17 days the Ghats were passed, and great heights and depths were seen amongst the hills, where even the elephants became nearly invisible."—Amír Khurr, in Elliot, iii. 86.

This passage illustrates how the transition from b to c occurred. The Ghats here meant are not a range of mountains so called, but, as the context shows, the passes among the Vindhyas and Satpura hills. Compare the two following, in which ‘down the ghauts’ and ‘down the passes’ mean exactly the same thing, though to many people the former expression will suggest ‘down through a range of mountains called the Ghauts.’

1808.—"The enemy are down the ghauts in great consternation."—Wellington, ii. 333.

"The enemy have fled northward, and are getting down the passes as fast as they can."—M. Elphinstone, in Life by Colbrooke, i. 71.

1826.—"Though it was still raining, I walked up the Bohr Ghát, four miles and a half, to Candaulah."—Heber, ii. 186, ed. 1844. That is, up one of the Passes, from which Europeans called the mountains themselves "the Ghauts." The following passage indicates that the great Sir Walter, with his usual sagacity, saw the true sense of the word in its geographical use, though misled by books to attribute to the (so-called) 'Eastern Ghauts' the character that belongs to the Western only.

1827.—"... they approached the Ghauts, those tremendous mountain passes which descend from the table-land of Mysore, and through which the mighty streams that arise in the centre of the Indian Peninsula find their way to the ocean."—The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

1553.—"The most notable division which Nature hath planted in this land is a chain of mountains, which the natives, by a generic appellation, because it has no proper name, call Gate, which is as much as to say Serra."—De Barros, Dec. i. liv. iv. cap. vii.

1561.—"This Serra is called Gate."—Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, 56.

1583.—"The Cucam, which is the land skirting the sea, up to a lofty range which they call Ghats."—Garcia, i. 346.

1572.—"De terra os Naturaes le chamam Gate, Do pe do qual pequena quantidade Se estende hts fraldas estreitas, que combate Do mar a natural ferociade. ..."—Campos, vii. 22.

Engaged by Burton:

"The country-people call this range the Ghaut, and from its foot-hills scanty breadth there be, whose seaward-sloping coast-plain long hath fought 'gainst Ocean's natural ferocity. ..."

1623.—"We commenced then to ascend the mountain-(range) which the people of the country call Gat, and which traverses in the middle the whole length of that part of India which projects into the sea, bathed on the east side by the Gulf of Bengal, and on the west by the Ocean, or Sea of Goa."

1673. — "The Mountains here are one continued ridge . . . and are all along called Gatte." — Fyser, 187.

1685. — "On les appelle, montagnes de Gatte, c'est comme qui disent montagnes de montagnes, Gatte en langue du pays ne signifiant autre chose que montagne." (quote wrong).—Rébeiro, Ceylas, (Fr. Transl.), p. 4.

1727. — "The great Rains and Dews that fall from the Mountains of Gatü, which lie 25 or 30 leagues up in the Country."—A. Hamilton, i. 282; [ed. 1744, ii. 285].

1785. — "The revenus of the city of Decos . . . amount annually to two thousand (see GEHE), proceeding from the customs and duties levied on ghee."—Curzacioli L. of Chins, i. 172.

1817. — "The great luxury of the Hindu is butter, prepared in a manner peculiar to himself, and called by him ghee."—Mill, Hist. i. 410.

GHILZAI, n.p. One of the most famous of the tribes of Afghanistan, and probably the strongest, occupying the high plateau north of Kandahar, and extending (roundly speaking) eastward to the Sulimānī mountains, and north to the Kābul River. They were supreme in Afghanistan at the beginning of the 18th century, and for a time possessed the throne of Īsphān. The following paragraph occurs in the article AFGHANISTAN, in the 9th ed. of the Encyc. Britan., 1874 (i. 325), written by one of the authors of this book:—

"It is remarkable that the old Arab geographers of the 10th and 11th centuries place in the Ghilzai country" (i.e. the country now occupied by the Ghilzais, or nearly so) "a people called Khlījīs, whom they call a tribe of Turks, to whom belonged a famous family of Delhi Kings. The probability of the identity of the Khlījīs and Ghilzais is obvious, and the question touches others regarding the origin of the Afghans; but it does not seem to have been gone into."

Nor has the writer since ever been able to go into it. But whilst he has never regarded the suggestion as more than a probable one, he has seen no reason to reject it. He may add that on starting the idea to Sir Henry Rawlinson (to whom it seemed new), a high authority on such a question, though he would not accept it, he made a candid remark to the effect that the Ghilzais had undoubtedly a very Turk-like aspect. A belief in this identity was, as we have recently noticed, entertained by the traveller Charles Masson, as is shown in a passage quoted below. And it has also been maintained by Surgeon-Major Bellew, in his Races of Afghanistan (1880), [who (p. 100) refers the name to Khlīchī, a swordman. The folk etymology of De Guignes and D'Herbelot is Kall, 'repose,' at, 'hungry,' given to an officer by Ogouz Khan, who delayed on the road to kill game for his sick wife].

All the accounts of the Ghilzais indicate great differences between them and the other tribes of Afghanistan; whilst there seems nothing impossible, or even unlikely, in the partial assimilation of a Turki tribe in the course of centuries to the Afghans who surround them, and the consequent assumption of a quasi-Afghan genealogy. We do not find that Mr. Elphinstone makes any explicit reference to the question now before us. But two of the notes to his History (5th ed. p. 322 and 384) seem to indicate that it was in his mind. In the latter of these he says: "The Khiljis . . . though Turks by descent . . . had been so long settled among the Afghans that they had almost become identified with that people; but they probably mixed more with other nations, or at least with their Turki brethren, and would be more civilized than the generality of Afghan mountaineers." The learned and eminently judicious William Erskine was also inclined to accept the identity of the two tribes, doubting (but perhaps needlessly) whether the Khilji had been really of Turki race. We have not been able to meet with any translated author who mentions both Khilji and Ghilzai. In the following quotations all the earlier refer to Khilji, and the later to Ghilzai. Attention may be called to the expressions in the quotation from Ziauddin Barni, as indicating some great difference between the Turk proper and the Khilji even then. The language of Baber, again, so far as it goes, seems to indicate that by his time the Ghilzais were regarded as an Afghan clan.

c. 940.—"Hajjaj had delegated 'Abdallah ibn Mahmomed ibn al-Ash'ath to Sijistān, Bost and Rakhaj (Arschaolia) to make war on the Turk tribes diffused in those regions, and who are known as Ghūz and Khulj . . ."—Magūdāt, v. 802.

c. 950.—"The Khulj is a Turk tribe, which in ancient times migrated into the country that lies between India and the parts of Sijistān beyond the Ghūz. They are a pastoral people and resemble the Turks in their natural characteristics, their dress and their language."—Istakhrī, from De Goeje's text, p. 245.

c. 1080.—"The Afghāns and Khuljīs having submitted to him (Saḵtāḡīn), he admitted thousands of them . . . into the ranks of his armies."—Al-'Ubić, in Eliot, ii. 24.

c. 1150.—"The Khiljka (read Khiljī) are people of Turk race, who, from an early date invaded this country (Dīwar, on the banks of the Helmand), and whose dwellings are spread abroad to the north of India and on the borders of Ghaur and of Western Sijistān. They possess cattle, wealth, and the various products of husbandry; they all have the aspect of Turks, whether as regards features, dress, and customs, or as regards their arms and manner of making war. They are pacific people, doing and thinking no evil."—Edriśī, i. 457.

1289.—"At the same time Jalālū-d din (Khilji), who was 'Ariz-i-mamduh (Mustermaster-general), had gone to Behes rpdr, attended by a body of his relations and friends. Here he held a muster and inspection of the forces. He came of a race different from that of the Turks, so he had no confidence in them, nor would the Turks own him as belonging to the number of their friends. . . . The people high and low . . . were all troubled by the ambition of the Khiljīs, and were strongly opposed to Jalālū-d din's obtaining the crown. . . . Sultan Jalālū-d din Piros Khiljī the Khiljīs occupying the throne in the . . . year 688 A.H. . . . The people of the city (of Delhi) had for 80 years been governed by sovereigns of Turk extraction, and were averse to the succession of the Khiljīs . . . they were struck with admiration and amazement at seeing the Khiljīs occupying the throne of the Turks, and wondered how the throne had passed from the one to the other."—Zāvū-d-dīn Barnī, in Eliot, iii. 134-136.

14th cent.—The continuator of Rashiduddin enumerates among the tribes occupying the country which we now call Afghanistan, Ghūrīs, Heravīs, Neguwardīs, Sejīs, Khiljīs, Bālūch and Afghāns. See Notices et extraits, xiv. 494.

c. 1507.—"I set out from Kābul for the purpose of plundering and beating up the quarters of the Ghiljīs . . . a good farewell from the Ghilji camp, we showed no fearfulness, which was either owing to the Ghiljīs being in motion, or to smoke. The young and inexperienced men of the army all set forward full speed; I followed them for two kos, shooting arrows at their horses, and at length checked their speed. When five or six thousand men set out on a pillaging party, it is extremely difficult to maintain discipline . . . A minaret of skulls was erected of the heads of these Afghāns."—Baber, pp. 220-221; see also p. 225.

[1758.—"The Ghiljīs knowing that his troops must pass thro' their mountains, waited for them in the desiles, and successively defeated several bodies of Mahmomed's army."—Hawwāy, Hist. Acc. iii. 24.]

1842.—"The Ghiljī tribes occupy the principal portion of the country between Kandahār and Ghazni. They are divided over, the most numerous of the Afghan tribes, and if united under a capable chief might . . . become the most powerful. . . . They are brave and warlike, but have a sternness of disposition amounting to ferocity. . . . Some of the inferior Ghiljīs are so violent in their intercourse with strangers that they can scarcely be considered in the light of human beings, while no language can describe the terrors of a transit through their country, or the indignities which have to be endured. . . . The Ghiljis, although considered, and moreover employing the Pashto, or Afghan dialect, are undoubtedly a mixed race.

"The name is evidently a modification or corruption of Khalji or Khilji, that of a great Turki tribe mentioned by Sharifudin in his history of Taimur."—Ch. Mason, Nat. of various Journeys, &c., ii. 204, 206, 207.

1854.—"The Ghurri was succeeded by the Khilji dynasty; also said to be of Turkic extraction, but which seems rather to have been of Afghan race; and it may be doubted if they are not of the Ghilji Afghanas."—Eskine, Baber and Humayun, i. 404.

1880.—"As a race the Ghilji mix little with their neighbours, and indeed differ in many respects, both as to internal government and domestic customs, from the other races of Afghanistan . . . the great majority of them are pastoral in their habits of life, and migrate with the seasons from the lowlands to the highlands with their families and flocks, and easily portable black hair tents. They never settle in the cities, nor do they engage in the ordinary handicraft trades, but they manufacture carpets, felts, &c., for domestic use, from the wool and hair of their cattle . . . Physically they are a remarkably fine race . . . but they are a very barbarous people, the pastoral class especially, and in their wars excessively savage and vindictive.

"Several of the Ghilji or Ghilzai-clans are almost wholly engaged in the carrying trade between India and Afghanistan, and the Northern States of Central Asia, and have been so for many centuries."—Races of Afghanistan, by Bello, p. 103.

GHOUl. s. Ar. ghūl, P. ghūl. A goblin, ēfrouwa, or man-devouring demon, especially haunting wilder-nesses.

1270.—"In the deserts of Affricke yee shall meet oftentimes with fairies, appearing in the shape of men and women; but they vanish soon away, like fantastical illusions."—Pitay, by Ph. Holland, vii. 2.

1340.—"The Arabs relate many strange stories about the Ghūl and their transformations . . . The Arabs allege that the two feet of the Ghūl are ass's feet . . . These Ghūl appeared to travellers in the night, and at hours when one meets with no one on the road; the traveller taking them for some of their companions followed them, but the Ghūl led them astray, and caused them to lose their way."—Ma'ṣūdī, iii. 314 seqq. (There is much more after theoppus and higgledy-piggledy Plinian fashion of this writer.)

* There is no justification for this word in the Latin.

1420.—"In exitu deserti . . . rem mirandam dicti contigisse. Nam cum circiter medium noctem quiescentis magno muro muro strepituque audito suspicamenturomnes, Arabes praecedentes ad se suspicandos venire . . . viderunt plurimos aquitum turmas transcendentium . . . Plures qui id antequam viderant, daemones (ghūls, no doubt) esse per desertum vagantes assueruere."—Nic. Conti, in Poggio, iv.

1814.—"The Afghans believe each of the numerous solitudes in the mountains and deserts of their country to be inhabited by a lonely daemon, whom they call Ghooolds Beabava (the Goul or Spirit of the Waste); they represent him as a gigantic and frightful spectre (who devours any passenger whom chance may bring within his haunts)."—Elphinstone's Cabul, ed. 1839, i. 291.

\[GHURRA, a. Hind. ghar, Skt. ghaṭa. A water-pot made of clay, of a spheroidal shape, known in S. India as the chatty.\]

[1857.—". . . the Rajah sent . . . 60 Gurras (earth vessels holding a gallon) of sugar-candy and sweetmeats."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, 66.]

Ghurry, Gurree. s. Hind. ghari. A clepsydra or water-instrument for measuring time, consisting of a floating cup with a small hole in it, adjusted so that it fills and sinks in a fixed time; also the gong by which the time so indicated is struck. This latter is properly ghariyal. Hence also a clock or watch; also the 60th part of a day and night, equal therefore to 24 minutes, was in old Hindu custom the space of time indicated by the clepsydra just mentioned, and was called a ghari. But in Anglo-Indian usage, the word is employed for 'an hour,' [or some indefinite period of time]. The water-instrument is sometimes called Pun-Ghurry (pañghara mistransl. pāṇi-ghari); also the Sun-dial, Dhoop-Ghurry (dhoop, 'sunshine'); the hour-glass, Ret-Ghurry (red, reda, 'sand').

(Ancient)—"The magistrate, having employed the first four Ghurries of the day in bathing and praying, . . . shall sit upon the Judgment Seat."—Code of the Gentoos Laws (Hathed, 1776), 104.

[1526.—"Ghert." See under Puhur.

[c. 1590.—An elaborate account of this method of measuring time will be found in Ais, ed. Garrett, iii. 15 seq.]

[1616.—"About a quarly after, the rest of my company arrived with the money."—Foster, Letters, iv. 243.]
1638.—“First they take a great Pot of Water . . . and putting therein a little Pot (this lesser pot having a small hole in the bottome of it), the water issuing into it, having filled it, then they strike on a great plate of brasse, or very fine metal, which stroak maketh a very great sound; this stroak or parcel of time they call a Goome, the small Pot being full they call a Greee, 8 grees make a Par, which Par (see POURBE) is three hours by our accont.”—W. Hakluyt, Hakl. v. 51.

1709.—“Or un garð est de leurs heures, mais qui est bien petite en comparaison des nôtres; car elle n’est que de vingt-neuf minutes et environ quarante-trois secondes.”[i]—Lettres Edifi. xi. 233.

1785.—“We have fixed the Cost at 6,000 Guz, which distance must not be travelled according to this rate . . . you must flg the Hurkdrer belonging to you.”—Tippoo’s Letters, 215.

1859.—Wallace describes an instrument of this kind, and uses it on board a native vessel. “I tested it with my watch and found that it hardly varied a minute from one hour to another, nor did the motion of the vessel have any effect upon it, as the water in the bucket of course kept level.”—Wallace, Malay Archip., ed. 1890, p. 314.

2. GINDY, s. The original of this word belongs to the Dravidian tongues; Malayal. kindi; Tel. gindri; Tam. kinti, from v. ki, to be hollow; and the original meaning is a basin or pot, as opposed to a flat dish. In Malabar the word is applied to a vessel resembling a coffee-pot without a handle, used to drink from. But in the Bombay dialect of H., and in Anglo-Indian usage, gindri means a wash-hand basin of tinned copper, such as is in common use there (see under CHILLUMCHEE).

1561.—“. . . guindis of gold. . . .”—Corne, Lendas, ii. i. 218.

1582.—“After this the Capitaine Generall commanded to discharge their Shippe, which were taken, in the whiche was bound store of rich Merchandize, and amongst the same these peeces following: Fourre great Gyundes of silver. . . .”—Castanheda, by N. L., f. 106.

1613.—“At the English tables two servants attend after dinner, with a gindrey and ewer of silver or white copper.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 397; [2nd ed. ii. 30; also i. 383].

1651.—“. . . a tinned basin, called a gendee . . . .”—Burton, Scinde, or the Unhappy Valley, i. 6.

GINGALL, JINJALL, s. H. jinjal, a swivel or wall-piece; a word of uncertain origin. [It is a corruption of the Ar. jazd’il (see JUZAIL).] It is in use with Europeans in China also.

1818.—“There is but one gun in the fort, but there is much and good sniping from matchlocks and gingals, and four Europeans have been wounded.”—Elphinstone, Life, ii. 31.

1829.—“The moment the picket heard them, they fired their long ginjals, which kill a mile off.”—Skipp’s Mem. iii. 40.

1900.—“Gingals, or Jingals, are long tapering guns, six to fourteen feet in length, borne on the shoulders of two men and fired by a third. They have a stand, or tripod, reminding one of a telescope . . .”—Ball, Things Chinese, 38.

GINGELI, GINGELLY, &c. s. The common trade name for the seed and oil of Sesamum indicum, v. orientale. There is a H. [not in Platts’ Dict.] and Mahr. form jinjali, but most probably this also is a trade name introduced by the Portuguese. The word appears to be Arabic al-juljalud, which was pronounced in Spain al-jonjolí (Dozy and Engelmann, 146-7), whence Spanish aljonjoli, Italian gruggiolino, serrafino, &c., Port. gergelim, xerzelim, &c., Fr. jugeolino, &c., in the Philippine Islands ajonjoli. The proper H. name is til. It is the σιραμος of Dioscorides (ii. 121), and of Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. i. 11). [See Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. ii. 510 seqq.]

1510.—“Much grain grows here (at Zella) . . . oil in great quantity, made not from olives, but from serrafino.”—Varthema, 86.

1552.—“There is a great amount of gergelim.”—Castanheda, 24.

1554.—“. . . oil of Jergelim and quocco (Coco).”—Botelho, Tombo, 54.

1606.—“They performed certain anointings of the whole body, when they baptized, with oil of coco-nut, or of gergelim.”—Gomara, f. 59.

1638.—“T’achetay de ce poison frit en l’huile de gergelin (petite sémence comme nauste dont il font huile) qui est de tres-mauvais goust.”—Mocquet, 222.

c. 1661.—“La gente più bassa adopra un’ altro olio di certo nome detto Telselin, che è una specie di seta un po’ amarognolo.”—Vig. del P. Gio. Gruber, in Thevenot, Voyages Divers.
GINGER.

1873.—"Dragmas de Sonsumo ou graine de Georgelina."—App. to Journal d'Ant. Galland, ii. 206.

1875.—"Also much Oil of Sesamum or Jujolne is there expressed, and exported thence."—T. Heiden, Veranerlyke Schipsbruuck, 81.

1726.—"From Oriza are imported hither (Pulecat), with much profit, Paddy, also... Ginigel-seed Oil..."—Valentijn, Chor. 14.

"An evil people, gold, a drum, a wild horse, an ill conditioned woman, sugar-cane, Gergelina, a Balleta (or cultivator) without foresight—all these must be wrought sorely to make them of any good."—Native Apothegms translated in Valentijn, v. (Ceylon) 380.

1727.—"The Men are bedaubed all over with red Earth, or Vermillion, and are continually squirting gingerly Oyl at one another."—A. Hamilton, i. 128; [ed. 1744, i. 180].

1807.—"The Oil chiefly used here, both for food and unguent, is that of Sesamum, by the English called Ginigel, or sweet oil."—F. Buchanan, Mysore, &c. i. 8.

1874.—"We know not the origin of the word Ginigel, which Roxburgh remarks was (as it is now) in common use among Europeans."—Hawardy & Fluckiger, 426.

1875.—"Oils, Jujil or Til..."—Table of Customs Duties, imposed on Imports into B. India, up to 1875.

1876.—"There is good reason for believing that a considerable portion of the olive oil of commerce is but the Jujil, or the ground-nut, oil of India, for besides large exports, of both oils to Europe, several thousand tons of the sesamum seed, and ground-nuts in smaller quantities, are exported annually from the south of India to France, where their oil is expressed, and finds its way into the market, as olive oil."—Suppl. Report on Supply of Drugs to India, by Dr. Paul, India Office, March, 1876.

GINGER, s. The root of Zingiber officinale, Roxb. We get this word from the Arabic xanjabil, Sp. agegibre (al-xanjabil), Port. gingebre, Latin zingiber, Ital. zenzero, gengiovo, and many other old forms.

The Skt. name is sringavera, professedly connected with srnga, a horn, from the antler-like form of the root. But this is probably an introduced word shaped by this imaginary etymology. Though ginger is cultivated all over India, from the Himalaya to the extreme south, the best is grown in Malabar, and in the language of that province (Malayalam) green ginger is called inchi and inchi-ver, from inchi, 'root.' Inchi was probably in an earlier form of the language nisch or chiichi, as we find it in Canarese still sanis, which is perhaps the true origin of the H. south for 'dry ginger,' [more usually connected with Skt. sunthi, sunth, 'to dry'].

It would appear that the Arabs, miled by the form of the name, attributed xanjabil or sinjabil, or ginger, to the coast of Zinj or Zanzibar; for it would seem to be ginger which some Arabic writers speak of as 'the plant of Zinj.' Thus a poet quoted by Kazwini enumerates among the products of India the shajar al-Zanj or Arbor Zingitana, along with shisham-wood, pepper, steel, &c. (see Gilde-meister, 318). And Abulfeda says also: "At Melinda is found the plant of Zinj" (Geog. by Reinaud, i. 267). In Marino Sanudo's map of the world also (c. 1320) we find a rubric connecting Zinsiber with Zing. We do not indeed find ginger spoken of as a product of eastern continental Africa, though Barbosa says a large quantity was produced in Madagascar, and Varthema says the like of the Comoro Islands.

c. A.D. 65.—"Ginger (Zygybethus) is a specialty of the plant produced for the most part in Trogloytide Austria, where they use the green plant in many ways, as we do rue (ruyay), boiling it and mixing it with drinks and stews. The roots are small, like those of cypress, whitish, and peppery to the taste and smell..."—Dioscorides, ii. cap. 189.

c. A.D. 70.—"This pepper of all kinds is most biting and sharpe... The blacke is more kindly and pleasant... Many have taken Ginger (which some call Zimbiperl and others Zingiberti) for the root of that tree; but it is not so, although in taste it somewhat resembleth pepper... A pound of Ginger is commonly sold at Rome for 6 deniers..."—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, xii. 7.

c. 620-80.—"And therein shall they be given to drink a cup of wine, mixed with the water of Zanjebil..."—The Koren, ch. lxxvi. (by Sale).

c. 940.—"Andalusia possesses considerable silver and quicksilver mines... They export from it also saffron, and roots of ginger (l'araq al-xanjabil)..."—Massardi, i. 367.

1286.—"Good ginger (zengibre) also grows here (at Colom—see Quillon), and it is known by the same name of Cortesius, after the country."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 22.
GINGERLY.  s. A coin mentioned as passing in Arabian ports by Milburn (i. 87, 91). Its country and proper name are doubtful. [The following quotations show that Gingerlee or Gergelin was a name for part of the E. coast of India, and Mr. Whiteway (see GINGELI) conjectures that it was so called because the oil was produced there.] But this throws no light on the gold coin of Milburn.

1690-91.—"The form of the pass given to ships and vessels, and Register of Passes given (18 in all), bound to Jafrapatam, Manilla, Mocchin, Gingerlee, Tenasserim, &c."—Fort St. Geo. Cons. Notes and Exts., App. No. iii. p. 47.

1701.—The Carte Marine depuis Sheratte jusqu'au Detroit de Malaca, par le R. Père P. P. Tachard, shows the coast tract between Visagapatam and Iagnrane as Gergelin.

1758.—"Some authors give the Coast between the points of Devi and Gaudswari, the name of the Coast of Gergelin. The Portuguese give the name of Gergelimo to the plant which the Indians call Ella, from which they extract a kind of oil."—D'Anville, 134.

[Mr. Pringle (Diary Fort St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 170) identifies the Gingerly Factory with Visagapatam. See also i. 109; ii. 99.]

* Geheli, Ar. "of the hills." Nei is also read deiry, probably for d'Eli (see Delly, Mount). The Ely ginger is mentioned by Barbosa (p. 320).

GINGHAM.  s. A kind of stuff, defined in the Draper's Dictionary as made from cotton yarn dyed before being woven. The Indian gingham were apparently sometimes of cotton mixt with some other material. The origin of this word is obscure, and has been the subject of many suggestions. Though it has long passed into the English language, it is on the whole most probable that, like chintz and calico, the term was one originating in the Indian trade.

We find it hardly possible to accept the derivation, given by Littre, from "Guingamp, ville de Bretagne, où il y a des fabriques de tissus." This is also alleged, indeed, in the Encycl. Britannica, 8th ed., which states, under the name of Guingamp, that there are in that town manufactories of gingham, to which the town gives its name. [So also in 9th ed.] We may observe that the productions of Guingamp, and of the Côtes-du-Nord generally, are of linen, a manufacture dating from the 15th century. If it could be shown that gingham was either originally applied to linen fabrics, or that the word occurs before the Indian trade began, we should be more willing to admit the French etymology as possible.

The Penny Cyclopaedia suggests a derivation from guingois, "array." "The variegated, striped, and crossed patterns may have suggested the name." 'Civilis,' a correspondent of Notes and Queries (5 ser. ii. 366, iii. 30) assigns the word to an Indian term, gingham, a stuff which he alleges to be in universal use by Hindu women, and a name which he constantly found, when in judicial employment in Upper India, to be used in inventories of stolen property and the like. He mentions also that in Sir G. Wilkinson's Egypt, the word is assigned to an Egyptian origin. The alleged Hind. word is unknown to us and to the dictionaries; if used as 'Civilis' believes, it was almost certainly borrowed from the English term.

It is likely enough that the word came from the Archipelago. Janz's Javanese Dict. gives "ginggang, a sort of striped or chequered East Indian bijouwond," the last word being applied to cotton as well as linen stuffs, equivalent to French toile. The verb ginggang in Javanese is given as meaning GINGHAM.

GINGI, JINJEE.

‘to separate, to go away,’ but this seems to throw no light on the matter; nor can we connect the name with that of a place on the northern coast of Sumatra, a little E. of Acheen, which we have seen written Gingam (see Bennett’s Wanderings, ii. 5, 6; also Elmore, Directory to India and China Seas, 1802, pp. 63-64). This place appears prominently as Gingion in a chart by W. Herbert, 1762. Finally, Bluteau gives the following:—"Gingam. So in some parts of the kingdom (Portugal) they call the excrement of the Silkworm, Bom ric s excrementum. Guingão. A certain stuff which is made in the territories of the Mogul. Beirutens, guingoens, Canegue, &c. (Godinho, Viagem da India, 44)." Wilson gives kindan as the Tamil equivalent of gingham, and perhaps intends to suggest that it is the original of this word. The Tamil Dict. gives "kindan, a kind of coarse cotton cloth, striped or chequered." The Madras Gloss. gives Can. ginta, Tel. gigenta, Tam. kindam, with the meaning of "double-thread texture." The N.E.D., following Scott, Malayan Words in English, 142 seq., accepts the Javanese derivation as given above:—"Malay ginggang ... a striped or checkered cotton fabric known to Europeans in the East as 'gingham.' As an adjective, the word means, both in Malay and Javanese, where it seems to be original, 'striped.' The full expression is kain ginggang, 'striped cloth' (Grashwitz). The Tamil 'kindam, a kind of coarse cotton cloth, striped or chequered' (quoted in Yule), cannot be the source of the European forms, nor, I think, of the Malayan forms. It must be an independent word, or a perversion of the Malayan term." On the other hand, Prof. Skeat rejects the Eastern derivation on the ground that "no one explains the spelling. The right explanation is simply that gingham is an old English spelling of Guingamp. See the account of the 'towne of Gyngham' in the Paston Letters, ed. Gairdner, iii. 367." (6th ser. Notes and Queries, iv. 386.)

c. 1567.—Cesare Federici says there were at Tana many weavers who made "ormesini e gingani di lana e di bombascio."—ginghams of wool and cotton.—Ramusio, iii. 887.

1602.—"With these toiles they got to Arakan, and took possession of two islets which stood at the entrance, where they immediately found on the beach two sacks of mouldy biscuit, and a box with some gingham (gingoës) in it."—De Costo, Dec. iv. iv. cap. 10.

1615.—"Captain Cock is of opinion that the gingham’s, both white and brown, which you sent will prove a good commodity in the Kinge of Shashmahic country, who is a Kinge of certaine of the most westermost ilandes of Japon ... and hath conquered the ilandes called The Loques."—Letter appd. to Cock’s Diary, ii. 272.

1648.—"The principal names (of the stuffs) are these: Gamiguins, Baffas, Chelaz (see PIECE-GOODS), Assamamis (asamânis i sky-blues), Madafomco, Beronis (see BERO- MEE), Trianandas, Chites (see CHINTZ), Langans (see LUNGOOTY), Taffochillen (Ta/1a, a gold stuff from Mooc; see ADATI, ALLIA), Douais (see DHOTY)."—Van Twist, 63.

1726.—In a list of cloths at Pulicat:

Geoperdi Gingagga (Twilled gingham)
Ditto Chialones (shalloons)!—Valentijn, Chor. 14.

Also

"Bore (!) Ginghames driedroom."—v. 126.

1770.—"Une centaine de ball-de monchoirs, de ponges, et de guingans, d’un trés beau rouge, que les Malabares fabriquent à Gaffanapatam, où ils sont Stables depuis très longtemps."—Raynal, Hist. Philos., ii. 15, quoted by Littré.

1781.—"The trade of Fort St. David’s consists in longcloths of different colours, sailampores, moeros, dimities, Gingham, and succatones."—Carraccioli’s L. of Olivo, i. 5. [Mr. Whiteway points out that this is taken word for word from Hamilton, New Account (1. 555), who wrote 40 years before.]

"Sudras est renommé par ses guingans, ses toiles peintes; et Palicasts par ses mouchaus."—Somerset, i. 41.

1793.—"Even the gingham waistcoats, which striped or plain have so long stood their ground, must, I hear, ultimately give way to the stronger karsyarmas (q.v.)."—Hugh Boyd, Indian Observer, 77.

1796.—"Guingan are cotton stuffs of Bengal and the Coromandel coast, in which the cotton is interwoven with thread made from certain barks of trees."—Fra Paolino, Viaggio, p. 35.

GINGI, JINJEE, &c., n.p. Properly Chenji, [Shenji; and this from Tam. shinji, Skt. srangi, ‘a hill’]. A once celebrated hill-fortress in S. Arcot, 50 [44] m. N.E. of Cuddalore, 35 m. N.W. from Pondicherry, and at one time the seat of a Maharatta principality. It played an important part in the wars of the first three-quarters of the 18th century, and was held by the French from 1750 to 1761. The place is now entirely deserted.
c. 1616.—"And then they were to publish a proclamation in Negapatam, that no one was to trade at Tevenapatam, at Porto Novo, or at any other port of the Naik of Ginja, or of the King of Massulapatam, because these were declared enemies of the state, and all possible war should be made on them for having received among them the Hollanders."—Boccaccio, p. 619.

1675.—"Approve the treaty with the Cawna [see KHAN of Chingle]."—Letter from Court to Fort St. Geo. In Notes and Jour., No. i. 5.

1680.—"Advice received that the younger brother of Savage's, has seized upon Rognaut Pandit, the Soobidar of Chingle Country, and put him in irons."—Ibid. No. iii. 44.

1752.—"It consists of two towns, called the Great and Little Gingee. They are both surrounded by one wall, 3 miles in circumference, which incloses the two towns, and five mountains of rugged rock, on the summits of which are built 3 strong forts. The place is inaccessible, except from the east and south-east. The place was well supplied with all manner of stores, and garrisoned by 150 Europeans, and sepoys and black people in great numbers."—Cambridge, Account of the War, &c., 32-33.

GINSENG, a. A medical root which has an extraordinary reputation in China as a restorative, and sells there at prices ranging from 6 to 400 dollars an ounce. The plant is Aralia Ginseng, Benth. (N.O. Araliaceae). The second word represents the Chinese name Jén-Shén. In the literary style the drug is called simply Shén. And possibly Jén, or 'Man,' has been prefixed on account of the forked radish, man-like aspect of the root. European practitioners do not recognize its alleged virtues. That which is most valued comes from Corea, but it grows also in Mongolia and Manchuria. A kind much less esteemed, the root of Panax quinquefolium, L., is imported into China from America. A very closely-allied plant occurs in the Himalaya, A. Pseudo-Ginseng, Benth. Ginseng is first mentioned by Alv. Semedo (Madrid, 1642). [See Ball, Things Chinese, 268 seq., where Dr. P. Smith seems to believe that it has some medicinal value.]

GIRAFFE, a. English, not Anglo-Indian. Fr. giraffe, It. giraffa, Sp. and Port. girafa, old Sp. azorafa, and these from Ar. al-zārīf, a camelopard. The Pers. surndapa, surndpa, seems to be a form curiously divergent of the same word, perhaps nearer the original. The older Italians sometimes make giraffe into seraph. It is not impossible that the latter word, in its biblical use, may be radically connected with giraffe.

The oldest mention of the animal is in the Septuagint version of Deut. xiv. 6, where the word zōdēr, rendered in the English Bible 'chamois,' is translated καμηλοπάρδαλις; and so also in the Vulgate camelopardalis, [probably the 'wild goat' of the Targums, not the giraffe (Encycl. Bibl. i. 728)]. We quote some other ancient notices of the animal, before the introduction of the word before us:

c. B.C. 20.—"The animals called camelopards (καμηλοπαρδάλεοι) present a mixture of both the animals comprehended in this appellation. In size they are smaller than camels, and shorter in the neck; but in the distinctive form of the head and eyes. In the curvature of the back again they have some resemblance to a camel, but in colour and hair, and in the length of tail, they are like panthers."—Diodorus, ii. 51.

c. A.D. 20.—"Camelopards (καμηλοπαρδάλεοι) are bred in these parts, but they do not in any respect resemble leopards, for their variegated skin is more like the streaked and spotted skin of fallow deer. The hinder quarters are so very much lower than the fore quarters, that it seems as if the animal sat upon its rump. . . . It is not, however, a wild animal, but rather like a domesticated beast; for it shows no sign of a savage disposition."—Strabo, Bk. XVI. iv. § 18, E.T. by Hamilton and Falconer.

c. A.D. 210.—Atheneus, in the description which he quotes of the wonderful procession of Ptolemy Philadelphus at Alexandria, besides many other strange creatures, details 130 Ethiopian sheep, 20 of Euboa, 12 white koli, 26 Indian oxen, 8 Aethiopic, a huge white bear, 14 pardales and 16 panthers, 4 lynxes, 3 arkeloi, one camelopards, 1 Ethio-opic Rhinoceros.—Bk. V. cap. xxxii.

"Εστειλε μοι κάτασκευή, πολύδορο Μύτου λυγέα, μικτά φώτισα θυρών, διήθησε κεκερασμένα, φύλα, παραβίοι αλοκρυστών δούμι ευφή τε κάρψουλον. . . . . . .

Δειρή ού ταμάνθ, στικτών δέμας, οπατα θαλα, ψιλών έπρεπε κάρη, δολοχή τόθε εθή νοράρα, κόψων ήν ήκ άλτα μέτρα, τόθε τ' ων πάλμων δούμιοι, ἄλλ' οι πρώτοι βεβαιο δρέμεις, έπετοίνδι δέ πολλάς διήντεροι.—κ. τ. λ.

Oppiani Synecdotics, iii. 461 seq.

c. 380.—"These also presented gifts, among which besides other things a certain Species of animal, of nature both extraordinary and wonderful. In size it was equal to a camel, but the surface of its skin marked with flower-like spots. Its hinder parts and flanks were low, and lived as those of a lion, but the shoulders and forelegs and chest were much higher in proportion than the other limbs. The neck was slender, and in regard to the bulk of the rest of the body was like a swan’s throat in its elongation. The head was in form like that of a camel, but in size more than twice that of a Libyan ostrich. Its legs were not moved alternately, but by pairs, those on the right side being moved together, and those on the left together, first one side and then the other. When this creature appeared the whole multitude was struck with astonishment, and its form suggesting a name, it got from the populace, from the most prominent features of its body, the improvised name of camelopardus.”—Heid融合, Athiopica, x. 27.

c. 940.—“The most common animal in those countries is the giraffe (Zarifa) . . . some consider its origin to be a variety of the camel; others say it is owing to a union of the camel with the panther: others in short that it is a particular and distinct species, like the horse, the ass, or the ox, and not the result of any cross-bred. . . . In Persian the giraffe is called Uskheryo (‘camel-cow’). It used to be sent as a present from Nubia to the kings of Persia, as in later days it was sent to the Arab princes, to the first khalifs of the house of Abbas, and to the Sultans of Misd. . . . The origin of the giraffe has given rise to numerous discussions. It has been noticed that the panther of Nubia attains a great size, whilst the camel of that country is of low stature, with short legs,” &c., &c.—Magщий, iii. 3-5.

c. 1253.—“Entre les autres joyaux que il (le Vieil de la Montagne) envoi au Roy, il envoia un oliphant de cristal fort bien fait, et une beste que l’on appelle orafa, de cristal aussi.”—Joinville, ed. de Wailly, 250.

c. 1271.—“In the month of Jumada II. a female giraffe in the Castle of the Hill (at Cairo) gave birth to a young one, which was named after a cow.”—Mabriz (by Quatremère), t. pt. 2, 106.

c. 1286.—“Mais bien ont giraffes assez qui naissent en leur pays.”—Marco Polo, Facsmier’s ed., p. 701.

c. 1356.—“Vidi in Kadro (Cairo) animal garaatam nomine, in anteriori parte multum elevatum, et longissimum collum habens, ut ita de securis solidum aliquid simile commendare possit. Retro ita demersum est ut dorsum ejus manu hominis tangi possit. Non est ferox animal, sed ad modum jumenti pacificum, colore albo et rubro pellem habens ordinatissime decoratam.”—Gul. de Boldensale, 248-249.

c. 1384.—“Ora racconteremo della giraffa che bestia ella è. La giraffa è fatta quasi come lo ostricho, salvo che l’imbruto suo non ha penne (‘just like an ostrich, except that it has no feathers on its body’) anzi ha lana branchisima . . . ella è veramente a vedere una cosa molto contraffatta.”—Simone Sigoli, V. al Monte Sinai, 162.

1404.—“When the ambassadors arrived in the city of Khoi, they found in it an ambassador, whom the Sultan of Babylon had sent to Timour Bey. . . . He had also with him 6 rare birds and a beast called jorna.” (then follows a very good description).—Clavijo, by Parkham, pp. 86-87.

c. 1430.—“Item, I have also been in Lesser India, which is a fine Kingdom. The capital is called Dily. In this country are many elephants, and animals called surnase (for surrafa), which is like a stag, but is a tall animal and has a long neck, 4 fathoms in length or longer.”—Schallerger, Hak. Soc. 47.

1471.—“After this was brought forth a giraffe, which they call Girafen, a beast as long legged as a great horse, or rather more; but the hinder legs are half a foote shorter than the former,” &c. (The Italian in Rassuwio, ii. f. 102, has “vna Zirapha, la quale esse chiamano Zirapha ouer Girafen.”)—Joseph Barurbo, in Venientes in Persia, Hak. Soc. 54.

1554.—“Il ne fut une que les grands seigneurs quelques barbares qu’ils aient este, s’aimassent qu’on leurs presentast les destes d’estranges pais. Aussi en aucun lieu plusieurs au chasteau du Caire . . . entre lesquelles est celle qu’il syn montent vulgaremment Zurnape.”—P. Belon, f. 118. It is remarkable to find Belon adopting this Persian form in Egypt.

GIRJA. a. This is a word for a Christian church, commonly used on the Bengal side of India, from Port. igreja, itself a corruption of ecclesia. Khâfi Khân (c. 1790) speaking of the Portuguese at Hoogly, says they called their places of worship Kališ (Elliot, v. 211). No doubt Kališ, as well as igreja, is a form of ecclesia, but the superficial resemblance is small, so it may be suspected that the Muslim writer was speaking from book-knowledge only.

1885.—“It is related that a certain Maulwi, celebrated for the power of his curses, was called upon by his fellow religious to curse a certain church built by the English in close proximity to a Madras. Anxious to stand well with them, and at the same time not to offend his English rulers, he got out of the difficulty by cursing the building thus:

‘Girjā ghar! Girjā ghar! Girjā!’ (i.e.) ‘Fall down, house! Fall down, house! Fall down!’ or simply ‘Church-house! Church-house! Church!’”—W. J. D’Oreyther, in Punjab Notes and Queries, ii. 126.

The word is also in use in the Indian Archipelago:

1885.—"The village (of Wai in the Moulucas) is laid out in rectangular plots. . . One of its chief edifices is the Gredja, whose grandeur quite overwhelmus us; for it is far more elaborately decorated than many a rural parish church at home."—H. D. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 294.

GOA, n.p. Properly Gova, Gova, Mahr. Gover, [which the Madras Gloss. connects with Skt. go, 'a cow;' in the sense of the 'cowherd country']. The famous capital of the Portuguese dominions in India since its capture by Albuquerque in 1610. In earlier history and geography the place appears under the name of Sindahr or Sandahur (Sundahur) (q.v.). Govt. or Kuva was an ancient name of the southern Konkan (see in H. H. Wilson's Works, Vishnu Purana, ii. 164, note 20). We find the place called by the Turkish admiral Sidi 'Ali Gowal-Sindahr, which may mean "Sandahr of Gova."

1291. In a copper grant of this date (S. 1313) we have mention of a chief city of Konkan (see CONJAH) called Gowa and Gowaqa. See the grant as published by Major Legrand Jacob in J. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. iv. 107. The translation is too loose to make it work while to transcribe a quotation; but it is interesting as mentioning the reconquest of Goa from the Turco-Arabs, i.e. Turks or foreign Mahomedans. We know from Ibn Batuta that Mahomedan settlers at Hunikwar had taken the place about 1344.

1510 (but referring to some years earlier).—"I departed from the city of Dabuli aforesaid, and went to another island which is about a mile distant from the mainland and is called Goga. . . In this island there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain who is called Savain, who has 400 mamelukes, he himself being also a mame-luke."—Varthema, 115-116.

c. 1520.—"In the Island of Tiswory, in which is situated the city of Goa, there are 21 aldeas, and these are as follows. . ."—In Arctic. Port. Orient., facs. 5.

c. 1564.—"At these words (addressed by the Vizir of Guzerat to a Portuguese Envoy) my wrath broke out, and I said: 'Maladministration! You have found me with my fleet gone to wreck, but please God in his mercy, before long, under favour of the Pâdshah, you shall be driven not only from Hormus, but from Diu and Gowa too!'"—Sidi 'Ali Kapudan, in J. Asiat. Ser. L tom. ix. 70.

1602.—"The island of Goa is so old a place that one finds nothing in the writings of the Canaras (to whom it always belonged) about the beginning of its population. But we find that it was always so frequented by strangers that they used to have a proverbial saying: 'Let us go and take our case among the cool shades of Goa wood, which in the old language of the country means the cool fertile land.'"—Coulot, IV. x. cap. 4.

1648.—"All those that have seen Europe and Asia agree with me that the Port of Goa, the Port of Constantinople, and the Port of Toulos, are three of the fairest Ports of all our vast continent."—Tansarter, E.T. ii. 74; [ed. Ball, i. 186].

GOA PLUM. The fruit of Parinari excelsum, introduced at Goa from Mozambique, called by the Portuguese Matomba. "The fruit is almost pure brown sugar in a paste" (Birdwood, MS.).

GOA POTATO. Dioscorea aculeata (Birdwood, MS.).

GOA POWDER. This medicine, which in India is procured from Goa, is invaluable in the virulent eczema of Bombay, and other skin diseases. In eczema it sometimes acts like magic, but smart like the cutting of a knife. It is obtained from Andra Araroba (N.O. Leguminosae), a native (we believe) of S. America. The active principle is Chrysophanic acid (Commn. from Sir G. Birdwood).

GOA STONE. A factitious stone which was in great repute for medical virtues in the 17th century. See quotation below from Mr. King. Sir G. Birdwood tells us it is still sold in the Bombay Bazar.

1673.—"The Pauilines enjoy the biggest of all the Monasteries at St. Roch; in it is a Library, an Hospital, and an Apothecary's Shop well furnished with Medicines, where Gasper Antonio, a Florentine, a Lay-Brother of the Order, the Author of the Goa-Stones, brings them in 50,000 Ko- pineas, by that invention Annually; he is an Old Man, and almost Blind."—Fryer, 149-150.

1690.—"The double excellence of this Stone (snake-stone) recommends its worth very highly . . . and much excels the deservedly famed Gasper Anthony, or Goa Stone."—Ovington, 262.

1711.—"Goa Stones or Pedro de Gasper Antonio, are made by the Jesuits here: They are from ½ to 8 Ounces each; but the size makes no Difference in the Price: We bought 11 Ounces for 20 Reises. They are often counterfeited, but 'tis an easie Matter for one who has seen the right Sort, to discover it. ... Manook's Stones at Fort St. George come the nearest to them ... both Sorts are deservedly cried up for their Virtues."—Lockyer, 268.

1788-71.—"Their medicines are mostly such as are produced in the country. Amongst others, they make use of a kind of little artificial stone, that is manufactured at Goa, and possesses a strong aromatic scent. They give scrapings of this, in a little water mixed with sugar, to their patients."—Skarowius, E.T. i. 454.

1867.—"The Goa-Stone was in the 16th (!) and 17th centuries as much in repute as the Bezoar, and for similar virtues ... It is of the shape and size of a duck's egg, has a greyish metallic lustre, and though hard, is friable. The mode of employing it was to take a minute dose of the powder scraped from it in one's drink every morning ... So precious was it esteemed that the great usually carried it about with them in a casket of gold filigree."—Nat. Hist. of Gems, by C. W. King, M.A., p. 256.

— GOBANG, n. The game introduced some years ago from Japan. The name is a corr. of Chinese K'y-p'an, 'checker-board.'

[1898.—"Go, properly gomoku narabe, often with little appropriateness termed 'checker,' by the Japanese, is the most popular of the indoor pastimes of the Japanese,—a very different affair from the simple game known to Europeans as Goban or Gobang, properly the name of the board on which go is played."—Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed., 190 seq., where a full account of the game will be found.]

GODAVERY, n.p. Skt. Godavari, 'giving kine.' Whether this name of northern etymology was a corruption of some indigenous name we know not. [The Dravidian name of the river is Gode (Tel. gode, 'limit'), of which the present name is possibly a corruption.] It is remarkable how the Godavery is ignored by writers and map-makers till a comparatively late period, with the notable exception of D. João de Castro, in a work, however, not published till 1843. Barros, in his trace of the coasts of the Indies (Dec. I. ix. cap. 1), mentions Godavari as a place adjoining a cape of the same name (which appears in some much later charts as C. Gordenor), but takes no notice of the great river, so far as we are aware, in any part of his history. Linschoten also speaks of the Punto de Guadovary, but not of the river. Nor does his map show the latter, though showing the Kistna distinctly. The small general map of India in "Cambridge's Acc. of the War in India," 1761, confounds the sources of the Godavery with those of the Mahanadi (of Orissa) and carries the latter on to combine with the western rivers of the Ganges Delta. This was evidently the prevailing view until Rennell published the first edition of his Memoir (1783), in which he writes:

"The Godavery river, or Gonga Godowry, commonly called Ganga in European maps, and sometimes Gang in Indian histories, has generally been represented as the same river with that of Cattack.

"As we have no authority that I can find for supposing it, the opinion must have been taken up, on a supposition that there was no opening between the mouths of the Kistna and Mahanadie (or Cattack river) of magnitude sufficient for such a river as the Ganges." (pp. 74-75) [also ibid. 2nd ed. 244]. As to this error see also a quotation from D'Anville under REDDIERRASA.

It is probable that what that geographer says in his Éclairissemens, p. 135, that he had no real idea of the Godavery. That name occurs in his book only as "la pointe de Gaudevari." This point, he says, is about E.N.E. of the "river of Naraspur," at a distance of about 12 leagues; "it is a low land, intersected by several rivers, forming one of those arms in which the maps, esteemed to be most correct, call Wensern; and the river of Naraspur is itself one of those arms, according to a MS. map in my possession." Nartharam is the name of a taluk on the westernmost delta branch, or Vanishta Godavri [see Morris, Map. of Godavery Dist., 185]. Wensern appears on a map in my possession, and the name of one of the two mouths of the Eastern or Gautami Godavri, entering the sea near Coringa. It is perhaps the same name as Inajar in that branch, where there was an English Factory for many years.

In the neat map of "Regionum Choromandel, Golconda, et Orissa," which is in Baldaeus (1672), there is no indication of it whatever except as a short inlet from the sea called Gondewary.

1588.—"The noblest rivers of this province (Dauam or Decom) are six in number, to wit: Cova (Krásca), in many places known as Hinapur, because it passes by a city of this name (Hinadapór); Bivra (read Bima!); these two rivers join on the borders of the Decom and the land of Canara (q.v.), and after traversing great distances enter the sea in the Oriu territory; Malaprade (Malprabhā); Gudavam (read Guodavari) otherwise called Gangua; Purnadi; The Moont. Of these the Moont enters the sea in the Oriu territory, and so does the Guodivam; but Purnadi and Tapi enter the Gulf of Cambay at different points."—João de Castro, Primeiro Relato da Costa da India, pp. 6, 7.
GODDESS. 381 GODOWN.

C. 1590.—"Here (in Berar) are rivers in abundance; especially the Gangs of Gotam, which they also call Godovairi. The Ganga of Hindustan they dedicate to Mahadeo, but this Gang to Gotam. And they tell wonderful legends of it, and pay it great adoration. It has its springs in the Sabhyl Hills near Trimbak, and passing through the Wilayat of Ahmednagar, enters Berar and thence flows on to Tlingana."—Ait. in Akbari (orig.) i. 476; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228.]
We may observe that the most easterly of the Delta branches of the Godavery is still called Gavami.

GODDESS, a. An absurd corruption which used to be applied by our countrymen in the old settlements in the Malay countries to the young women of the land. It is Malay gaddie, 'a virgin.'

C. 1772.—"And then how strange, at night oppress
By toils, with songs you're lulled to rest;
Of rural goddesses the guest,
"Delightful!"
W. Marden, in Memoirs, 14.

1784.—"A lad at one of these entertainments, asked another his opinion of a goddess who was then dancing. 'If she were plated with gold,' replied he, 'I would not take her for my concubine, much less for my wife.'"—Marden's Hist. of Sumatra, 2nd ed., 280.

GODOWN, a. A warehouse for goods and stores; an outbuilding used for stores; a store-room. The word is in constant use in the Chinese ports as well as in India. The H. and Beng. gaddam is apparently an adoption of the Anglo-Indian word, not its original. The word appears to have passed to the continent of India from the eastern settlements, where the Malay word godong is used in the same sense of 'store-room,' but also in that of 'a house built of brick or stone.' Still the word appears to have come primarily from the South of India, where in Telugu gaddangi, gaddangi, in Tamil kidang, signify 'a place where goods lie,' from kidu, 'to lie.' It appears in Singhalese also as gudama. It is a fact that many common Malay and Javanese words are Tamil, or only to be explained by Tamil. Free intercourse between the Coromandel Coast and the Archipelago is very ancient, and when the Portuguese first appeared at Malacca they found there numerous settlers from S. India (see s.v. KLING). Bluteau gives the word as palavra da India, and explains it as a "logos quasi debaixo de chao" ("almost under ground"), but this is seldom the case.

[1512.—"... in which all his rice and a Gudam of rice was burned."—Letter of P. F. Andrade to Albuquerque, Feb. 22, India Office, MSS. Corpo Chronologico, vol. i.
[1552.—"At night secretly they cleared their Gudams, which are rooms almost under ground, for fear of fire."—Burros, Dec. II. Bk. vi. ch. 3.]
[1552.—"... and ordered them to plunder many godowns (gudoms) in which there was such abundance of clove, nutmeg, mace, and sandal wood, that our people could not transport it all till they had called in the people of Malacca to complete its removal."—Castanheda, ii. 276-7.
[1560.—"... Godowns (Gudoms), which are strong houses of stone, having the lower part built with lime."—Correa, ii. 236. (The last two quotations refer to events in 1511.)

The Choultry Justices having produced examinations taken by them concerning the murder of a child in the Black town, and the robbing of the same, within this week,—it is ordered that the Judge-Advocate do cause a session to be held on Tuesday the 11th for the trial of the criminals."—Official Memorandum, in Wheeler, i. 303.

[1809.—The cook-room and Zodoun at the Laul Baug are covered in."—Wellington, i. 66.]

1809.—"The Black Hole is now part of a godown or warehouse: it was filled with goods, and I could not see it."—Ed. Valentine, i. 297.

1830.—"These 'Godowns'... are one of the most marked features of a Japanese town, both because they are white where all else is gray, and because they are solid where all else is perishable."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 284.

GOGLET, GUGLET. s. A water-bottle, usually earthenware, of globular body with a long neck, the same as what is called in Bengal more commonly a surahi (see SERAI, b. KOOZA). This is the usual form now; the article described by Linschoten and Pyrard, with a sort of culledender mouth and pellbes shut inside, was somewhat different. Corruptated from the Port. gorgoletta, the name of such a vessel. The French have also in this sense gargoylet, and a word gargoille, our medieval gargoyle; all derivations from gorga, garga, gorga, 'the throat,' found in all the Romance tongues. Tom Cringle shows that the word is used in the W. Indies.

1598.—"These cruces are called Gorgoletta."—Linschoten, 60; [Hak. Soc. i. 297.]

1699. In Debry, vii. 28, the word is written Gorgolane.

c. 1610.—"Il y a une piece de terre fort delicate, et tout percée de petits trou façonnes, et au dedans y a de petites pierres qui ne peuvent sortir, c'est pour nettoyer le vase. Ils appellent cela gorgoletta : l'eau n'en sort que peu à la fois."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 43; [Hak Soc. ii. 74, and see i. 329.]

[1616.—"... gorgoletta."—Foster, Letters, iv. 196.]

1648.—"They all drink out of Gorgolanes, that is out of a Pot with a Spout, without setting the Mouth there to."—T. Van Spilbergen's Voyage, 37.

c. 1670.—"Quand on est à la maison on a des Gorgoulantes ou aiguières d'une certaine forme poreuse."—Bernier (ed. Amat.), ii. 214; [and comp. ed. Constable, 356.]

1688.—"L'on donne à chacun de ceux que leur malheur conduit dans ces saintes prisons, un pot de terre plein d'eau pour se laver, un autre plus propre de ceux qu'on appelle Gorgouletas, aussi plein d'eau pour boire."—Dellon, Rel. de l'Inquisition de Goa, 136.

c. 1690.—"The Siamese, Malayas, and Macassar people have the art of making from the larger coco-nut shells most elegant drinking vessels, cups, and those other receptacles for water to drink called Gorgeletas, which they set with silver, and which no doubt by the ignorant are supposed to be made of the precious Maldivo cocom."—Rumphius, i. iii.

1698.—"The same way they have of cooling their Liquors, by a wet cloth wrapped about their Gurguletas and Jars, which are vessels made of a porous Kind of Earth."—Fryer, 47.

1796.—"However, they were much astonished that the water in the Gorguletas in that tremendous heat, especially out of doors, was found quite cold."—Valentijn, Choro. 59.

1796. —"I perfectly remember having said that it would not be amiss for General Carnac to have a man with a Goglet of water ready to pour on his head, whenever he should begin to grow warm in debate."—Lord Clive's Comm. Fort William, Jan. 29. In Long, 406.

1829.—"Dressing in a hurry, find the drunken bohey... has mistaken your boot for the goglet in which you carry your water on the line of march."—Skipp's Memoirs, ii. 149.

C. 1830.—"I was not long in finding a bottle of very tolerable rum, some salt junk, some biscuit, and a goglet, or porous earthen jar of water, with some capital cigars."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 152.

1832.—"Murwan sent for a woman named Joada, and handing her some virulent poison folded up in a piece of paper, said, 'If you can throw this into Hussun's goglet, he on drinking a mouthful or two of water will instantly bring up his liver piece-meal.'"—Herkletz, Quoos-o-Islam, 156.

1855.—"To do it (gild the Rangoon Pagoda) they have enveloped the whole in an extraordinary scaffolding of bamboo, which looks as if they had been enclosing the pagoda in basketwork to keep it from breaking, as you would do with a water goglet for a ddk journey."—In Blackwood's Mag., May, 1855.

GOGO, GOGA. n.p. A town on the inner or eastern shore of Kattywar Peninsula, formerly a seaport of some importance, with an anchorage sheltered by the Isle of Peram (the Beivran of the quotation from Ibn Batuta). Gogo appears in the Catalan map of 1375. Two of the extracts will show how this unhappy city used to suffer at the hands of the Portuguese. Gogo is now superseded to a great extent by Bhaunagar, 8 m. distant.

1321.—"Dated from Caga the 12th day of October, in the year of the Lord 1321."—Letter of Fr. Jordamus, in Osthay, ed. i. 223.

C. 1343.—"We departed from Beiram and arrived next day at the city of Kaka, which is large, and possesses extensive bazaars. We anchored 4 miles off because of the ebb tide."—Tom Botaca, iv. 80.

1531.—"The Governor (Nuno da Cunha) took counsel to order a fleet to remain behind to make war upon Cambay, leaving Antonio de Saldanha with 50 sail, to wit: 4 galleons, and the rest galleys and galeots, and rowing-vessels of the King's, with some private ones eager to remain, in the greed for prize. And in this fleet there stayed one of the.

Antonio de Saldanha with 50 sail, to wit before them, and foreignen."—Cm, vi. cap. 5.

1536.—"From the city they came to a city called Goga, peopled by rich merchants; and the fleet entering by a very great plain, and from certain ruins of buildings still visible, seems to have been in old times a very great place, and under the dominion of certain foreigners."—Couto, IV. vii. cap. 5.

1614.—"The passage across from Surrate to Goga is very short, and so the three fleets, starting at 4 in the morning, arrived there at nightfall. . . . The next day the Portuguese returned to the city and entering the city they set fire to it in all quarters, and it began to blaze with such fury that there was burnt a great quantity of merchandise (fasesna de porte), which was a huge loss to the Moors. . . . After the burning of the city they abode there 3 days, both captains and soldiers content with the abundance of their booty, and the fleet stood for Diu, taking, besides the goods that were on board, many boats in tow laden with the same."—Bocarro, Decade, 333.

[1500.—"A man on foot going by land to a small village named the Ganges, and from thence crossing the end of the Gulf, can go from Diu to Surat in four or five days. . . ."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 37.]

1727.—"Goga is a pretty large Town . . . has some Trade. . . . It has the Conveniences of a Harbour for the largest Ships, though they lie dry on soft Mud at low Water."—A. Hamilton, i. 143.

GOGOLLA, GOGALA n.p. This is still the name of a village on a peninsula sandy spit of the mainland, opposite to the island and fortress of Diu, and formerly itself a fort. It was known in the 16th century as the Villa dos Rumes, because Melique Az (Malik Ayaz, the Mahom. Governor), not much trusting the Rumes (i.e. the Turkish Mercenaries), "or willing that they should be within the Fortress, sent them to dwell there." (Barros, II. iii. cap. 6).

1625.—"Paga dyo e gogolla a el Rey de Cambaya treze layques om tagas . . . xii layques."—Lembrança, 34.

1638.—In Botelho, Tombo, 230, 239, we find "Alfandega de Gogualaa." 1639.—". . . terminating in a long and narrow tongue of sand, on which stands a fort which they call Gogala, and the Portuguese the Villa dos Rumes. On the point of this tongue the Portuguese made a beautiful round bulwark."—João de Castro, Primeiro Roteiro, p. 218.

7 GOLAH, s. Hind. golá (from gol, 'round'). A store-house for grain or salt; so called from the typical form of such store-houses in many parts of India, viz. a circular wall of mud with a conical roof. [One of the most famous of these is the Golá at Patna, completed in 1786, but never used.]

[1785.—"We visited the Gola, a building intended for a public granary."—In Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 445.]

1810.—"The golah, or warehouse."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 348.

1878.—"The villagers, who were really in want of food, and maddened by the sight of those golahs stored with grain, could not resist the temptation to help themselves."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 77.

GOLD MOHR FLOWER. s. Caesalpinia pulcherrima, Sw. The name is a corruption of the H. gulmor, which is not in the dictionaries, but is said to mean 'peacock-flower.'

[1877.—"The crowd began to press to the great Gool-mohur tree."—Atalayce, City of Sunshine, iii. 207.]

GOLE, s. The main body of an army in array; a clustered body of troops; an irregular squadron of horsemen. P.—H. ghul; perhaps a confusion with the Arab. jaut (gaut), 'a troop': [but Platts connects it with Skt. kula, 'an assemblage'].

1507.—"As the right and left are called Beranghár and Sewanghár . . . and are not included in the centre which they call ghul, the right and left do not belong to the ghul."—Baber, 227.
1809.—"When within reach, he fired a few rounds, on which I formed my men into two gholu... Both gholu attempted to turn his flanks, but the men behaved ill, and we were repulsed."—Shinner, Mil. Mem. i. 298.

1849.—"About this time a large gale of horsemen came on towards me, and I proposed to charge; but as they turned at once from the fire of the guns, and as there was a wall of front, I refrained from advancing after them."—Brigadier Lockwood, Report of 2nd Cavalry Division at Battle of Coorgat.

GOMASTA, GOMASHTAH. A Hind. from Pers. gundashah, part. 'appointed, delegated.' A native agent or factor. In Madras the modern application is to a clerk for vernacular correspondence.

1747.—"As for the Salem Cloth they beg leave to defer settling any Price for that some three months; they can be advd from the Gost Masters [i.] in that Province."—Pt. St. David Conn., May 11. MS. Records in India Office.

1762.—"You will direct the gentleman, Gomastha, Muttarudies (see MOOT-SUDDY), and Moonshias, and other officers of the English Company to relinquish their farms, taduceas [see TALOOK], gunasse, and goulahs."—The Nabob to the Governor, in Van Sittert, i. 299.

1776.—"The Magistrate shall appoint some one person his gomastah or Agent in each Town."—Halhed's Code, 56.

1778.—"The Company determining if possible to restore their investment to the former condition... sent gomastahs, or Gentoo factors in their own pay."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 57.

1785.—"I wrote an order to my gomastah in the factory of Hughly."—Cavassioleti's Life of Clive, iii. 448.

1817.—"The banyan hires a species of broker, called a Gomasth, at so much a month."—Mills' Hist. iii. 13.

1887.—"... (The Rajah) sent us a very good breakfast; when we had eaten it, his gomasth (a sort of secretary, at least more like that than anything else) came to say..."—Letters from Madras, 128.

GOMBOON, n.p. The old name in European documents of the place on the Persian Gulf now known as Bandar 'Abbas, or 'Abbad. The latter name was given to it when Shāh 'Abbās, after the capture and destruction of the island city of Hormuz, established a port there. The site which he selected was the little town of Gamrūn. This had been occupied by the Portuguese, who took it from the 'King of Lor' in 1612, but two years later it was taken by the Shāh. The name is said (in the Geog. Magazine, i. 17) to be Turkish, meaning 'a Custom House.' The word alluded to is probably gumrū, which has that meaning, and which is again, through Low Greek, from the Latin commercium.

But this etymology of the name seems hardly probable. That indicated in the extract from A. Hamilton below is from Pars. kamrān, 'a shrimp,' or Port. camarão, meaning the same.

The first mention of Gomboon in the E. I. Papers seems to be in 1616, when Edmund Connock, the Company's chief agent in the Gulf, calls it "Gombraun, the best port in all Persia," and "that hopeful and glorious port of Gomboon." (Sainsbury, i. 484-5; [Poster, Letters, iv. 264]). There was an English factory here soon after the capture of Hormuz, and it continued to be maintained in 1768, when it was taken by the Comte d'Estaing. The factory was re-established, but ceased to exist a year or two after.

[1565.—"Bamul Gombrū, so-called in Persian and Turkish, which means Custom-house."—Mestre Afonso's Overland Journey, Ann. Maritim. e Colon. ser. 4. p. 217.]

1614.—(The Captain-major) "under orders of Dom Luis da Gama returned to succour Comorão, but found the enemy's fleet already there and the fort surrendered... News which was heard by Dom Luis da Gama and most of the people of Ormus in such way as might be expected, some of the old folks of Ormus prognosticating at once that in losing Comorão Ormus itself would be lost before long, seeing that the former was like a barbarian or outwork on which the rage of the Persian enemy spent itself, giving time to Ormus to prepare against their coming thither."—Bocarro, Decada, 349.

1622.—"That evening, at two hours of the night, we started from below that fine tree, and after travelling about a league and a half... we arrived here in Combra, a place of decent size and population on the sea-shore, which the Persians now a days laying aside as it were the old name, call the 'Port of Abbas,' because it was wrested from the Portuguese, who formerly possessed it, in the time of the present King Abbas."—P. della Valle, ii. 413; [in Hak. Soc. i. 3, he calls it Combra].

c. 1630.—"Gumbrown (or Gomroon, as some pronounce it) is by most Persians Kar' ḍōghī called Bandar or the Port Towne... some (but I commend them not) write it Gamrou, others Gomrow, and other-some, Commorom. At all events it is of no Antiquity, rising daily out of the ruins of late glorious (now most wretched) Ormus."—Sir T. Herbert, 121.
GOMUTÍ. 385  GONG.

1673. — "The Seilors had stigmatised this place of its Excessive Heat, with this sarcastical Saying, That there was but an Inch-Deal between Gombron and Hell."—Fryer, 224.

Fryer in another place (marginal rubrio, p. 386) says: "Gombroom ware, made of Earth, the best next China." Was this one of the first attempts of manufacture of the Persian porcelain now so highly prized? ["The main varieties of this Perso-Chinese are the following:—(1) A sort of semi-porcelain, called by English dealers, quite without reason, "Gombroom ware," which is pure white and semi-transparent, but, unlike Chinese porcelain, is soft and friable where not protected by the glaze."—Ency. Brit. 9th ed. xix. 621.]

1727. — "This Gombroom was formerly a Fishing Town, and when Shaw Abbas began to build it, had its Appellation from the Portuguese, in Derision, because it was a good place for catching Prawns and Shrimps, which they call Camaron."—A. Hamilton, i. 92; [ed. 1744, i. 93].

1782. — "As this officer (Comte d'Estaing) . . . broke his parole by taking and destroying our settlements at Gombroom, and upon the west Coast of Sumatra, at a time when he was still a prisoner of war, we have laid before his Majesty a true state of the case."—In Long, 288.

GOMUTÍ. s. Malay gomutí [Scott gives gomuti]. A substance resembling horseshoe, and forming excellent cordsage (the cabos negros of the Portuguese—Marre, Kata-Kata Malayou, p. 92), sometimes improperly called coir (q.v.), which is produced by a palm growing in the Archipelago, Arenga eschcharifera, Labill. (Borassus Gomutus, Lour.). The tree also furnishes kalams or reed-pens for writing, and the material for the poisoned arrows used with the blow-tube. The name of the palm itself in Malay is anau. (See SAQWIRE.) There is a very interesting account of this palm in Rumphius, Herb. Amb., i. pl. xiii. Dampier speaks of the fibre thus:

1686. — "... There is another sort of Coire cables ... that are black, and more strong and lasting, and are made of Strings that grow like Horse-hair at the Heads of certain Trees, almost like the Coco-trees. This sort comes mostly from the Island of Timor."—i. 295.

GONG. s. This word appears to be Malay (or, according to Crawford, originally Javanese), gong or agong. ["The word gong is often said to be Chinese. Clifford and Svettenham so mark it; but no one seems to be able to point out the Chinese original." (Scott, Malayen Verbs in English, 53.)] Its well-known application is to a disk of thin bell-metal, which when struck with a mallet, yields musical notes, and is used in the further east as a substitute for a bell. ["The name gong, agong, is considered to be imitative or suggestive of the sound which the instrument produces" (Scott, loc. cit. 51).] Marcel Devic says that the word exists in all the languages of the Archipelago; [for the variants see Scott, loc. cit.]. He defines it as meaning "instrument de musique aussi appelé tam-tam"; but see under TOM-TOM. The great drum, to which Dampier applies the name, was used like the metallic gong for striking the hour. Systems of gongs variously arranged form harmonious musical instruments among the Burmese, and still more elaborately among the Javanese.

The word is commonly applied by Anglo-Indians also to the H. qantía (qanta, Dec.) or ghari, a thicker metal disc, not musical, used in India for striking the hour (see GHURRY). The gong being used to strike the hour, we find the word applied by Fryer (like gurry) to the hour itself, or interval denoted.

1590. — "In the morning before day the Generall did strike his Gongo, which is an instrument of War that soundeth like a Bell."—(This was in Africa, near Benguela), Adv. of Andrew Bate, in Purchas, ii. 970.

1673. — "They have no Watches nor Hour-Glasses, but measure Time by the dropping of Water out of a Brass Basin, which holds a Ghong, or less than half an Hour; when they strike once distinctly, to tell them it's the First Ghong, which is renewed at the Second Ghong for Two, and so Three at the End of it till they come to Eight; when they strike on the Brass Vessel at their liberty to give notice the Pore (see FUGHU) is out, and at last strike One leisurely to tell them it is the First Pore."—Fryer, 186.

1686. — "In the Sultan's Mosque (at Mindanaco) there is a great Drum with but one Head, called a Gong; which is instead of a Clock. This Gong is beaten at 12 a Clock, at 3, 6, and 9."—Dampier, i. 383.

1726. — "These gongs (gongen) are beaten very gently at the time when the Prince is going to make his appearance."—Valentijn, iv. 58.

1750-52. — "Besides these (in China) they have little drums, great and small kettle drums, gungungs or round brass basons like frying pans."—Olof Toreen, 248.

1817. — "War music bursting out from time to time With gong and tymbalon's tremendous chime."—Lalla Rookh, Mokanna.

Tremendous sham poetry!
1878.—"... le nom patronymique... sonna dans les salons... Comme un coup de cymbale, un de ces gongs qui sur les théâtres de féerie annoncent les apparitions fantastiques."—Aph. Daudet, Le Nabab, ch. 4.

GOODBY, s. A quilt; H. gudr. [The gudr, as distinguished from the raddi (see ROZYE), is the bundle of rags on which Fakirs and the very poorest people sleep.]

1598.—"They make also faire couerlits, which they call Godorins [or] Colchas, which are very faire and pleasant to the eye, stitched with silke; and also of cotton of all colours and stitchinges."—Linschoten, ch. 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 61].

c. 1610.—"Les matelas et les couvertures sont de soye ou de toile de coton faconnée à toutes sortes de figures et couleur. Ils appellent cela Goudrina."—Pyrrard de Laval, ii. 3; [Hak. Soc. ii. 4].

1653.—"Goudrina est un terme Indou et Portugais qui signifie des couvertures piquées de cotton."—De la Boulaye-le-Geus, ed. 1657, p. 589.

[1819.—"He directed him to go to his place, and take a goudhra of his (a kind of old patched counterpane of shreds, which Fauques frequently have to lie down upon and throw over their shoulders)."—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 113.]

GOOGUL, s. H. gugal, guggul, Skt. guggula, guggulu. The aromatic gum-resin of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker (Amyris agallocha, Roxb.), the mufl of the Arabs, and generally supposed to be the bellowium of the ancients. It is imported from the Beyla territory, west of Sind (see Bo. Govt. Selections (N.S.), No. xvii. p. 396).

1526.—(Prices at Cambay). "Guggall d'orumus (the maund), 16 fidaas."—Lembrança, 43.

1818.—"Gogul is a species of bitumen much used at Bombay and other parts of India, for painting the bottom of ships."—Milburn, i. 137.

GOOJUR, n.p. H. Gujar, Skt. Gujar-jara. The name of a great Hindu clan, very numerous in tribes and in population over nearly the whole of Northern India, from the Indus to Rohilkhand. In the Delhi territory and the Doab they were formerly notorious for thiefings and robberies, and are still much addicted to cattle-theft; and they are never such steady and industrious cultivators as the Jats among whose villages they are so largely interspersed. In the Punjab they are Mahommedans. Their extensive diffusion is illustrated by their having given name to Gujarát (see GOOZERAT), as well as to Gujrat and Gurjranwala in the Punjab. And during the 18th century a great part of Sahânpur District in the Northern Doab was also called Gujrat (see Elliot's * Races*, by Beames, i. 99 seqq.).

[1785.—"The road is infested by tribes of banditti called googurs and mawattas."—In Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 426.]

GOOLAIL, s. A pellet-bow. H. gule, probably from Skt. guda, gula, the pellet used. [It is the Arabic Kaus-al-bandāb, by using which the unlucky Prince in the First Kalandar's Tale got into trouble with the Wazir (Burton, Arab. Nights, i. 98).]

1650.—Busbeck speaks of being much annoyed with the multitude and impudence of kites at Constantinople: "ego interim cum manual balista post columnam sto, modo hujus, modo illius cædæ vel alarum, ut casus tulerit, pinnae testaceœ globis verborum, donec mortifero iuctu nonum aut alterationem percussam decusio..."—Busbq. Epist. iii. p. 163.

[1690.—"From the general use of pellet bows which are fitted with bowstrings, sparrows are very scarce (in Kashmir)."— Ata, ed. Jarrett, ii. 351. In the original banda-i-guroh, guruh, according to Stein-gass, Dict., being "a ball... ball for a cannon, balista, or cross-bow."]

1600.—"O for a stone-bow to hit him in the eye."—Twelfth Night, ii. 5.

1611.—"Children will shortly take him for a wall, and set their stone-bows in his forehead."

Beaum. & Flep., A King and No King, V.

[1870.—"The Gooolall-bans, or pellet-bow, generally used as a weapon against cows, is capable of inflicting rather severe injuries."

GOOMLAUL, GOOLMOOL, s. H. gol-mul, 'confusion, jumble'; gol-mul karnd, 'to make a mess.'

[1877.—"The boy has made such a golmol (uproar) about religion that there is a risk in having anything to do with him."—Allardice, City of Sunshine, ii. 106.]

GOOMTEE, n.p. A river of the N.W.P., rising in the Shâhjahânpur District, and flowing past the cities of Lucknow and Jaunpur, and joining the Ganges between Benares and GOONT, s. H. gunt, gath. A kind of pony of the Himalayas, strong but clumsy.

c. 1590.—"In the northern mountainous districts of Hindustan a kind of small but strong horses are bred, which is called gùt; and in the confines of Bengal, near Kích, another kind of horses occurs, which rank between the gùt and Turkish horses, and are called tànghan (see TANGUN); they are strong and powerful."—Aes, i. 139; [also see ii. 280].

1609.—"On the further side of Ganges lyeth a very mighty Prince, called Raise Roderov, holding a mountainous Country . . . thence commeth much Muske, and heere is a great breed of a small kind of Horse, called Guntse, a true travelling scale-cliffe beast."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 438.

1831.—"In Casmire I shall buy, without regard to price, the best ghounte in Tibet."—Jacquetin’s Letters, E.T. i. 288.

1838.—"Give your gunt his head and he will carry you safely . . . any horse would have struggled, and been killed; these gunts appear to understand that they must be quiet, and their master will help them."—Pamph. Parkes, Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 226.

GOORKA, GOORKALLY, n.p. H. Gurkhā, Gurkhālā. The name of the race now dominant in Nepal, and taking their name from a town so called 53 miles W. of Kathmandu. [The name is usually derived from the Skt. go-rakha, ’cow-keeper.’ For the early history see Wright, H. of Nepal, 147.] They are probably the best soldiers of modern India, and several regiments of the Anglo-Indian army are recruited from the tribe.

1787.—"I believe, Sir, you have before been acquainted with the situation of Nepal, which has long been besieged by the Goorkully Rajah.”—Letter from Chief at Patna, in Long, 596.

[’’ "The Rajah being now dispossessed of his country, and shut up in his capital by the Rajah of Gurcumil, the usual channel of commerce has been obstructed.”—Letter from Council to E.I. Co., in Verey, View of Bengal, App. 86.]

GOOROO, s. H. guru, Skt. guru; a spiritual teacher, a (Hindu) priest.

(Ancient).—"That brahman is called guru who performs according to rule the rites on conception and the like, and feeds (the child) with rice (for the first time).”—Manu, ii. 142.

(1550).—"You should do as you are told by your parents and your Guru.”—Rāmāyana of Tulsi Dās, by Grous (1783), 43.

1587.—"Grous. See quotation under OASIS.

1736.—"There was a famous Prophet of the Ethnikes, named Guru.”—Purshas, Pilgrimage, 520.

1700.—". . . je suis fort surprise de voir à la porte . . . le Pénitent au coqier, qui demandait à parler au Gourou.”—Letters Edif., x. 95.

1810.—"Persons of this class often keep little schools . . . and then are designated gooroo; a term implying that kind of respect we entertain for pastors in general."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 317.

1822.—"The Adventures of the Gooroo Paramartan; a tale in the Tamil Language" (translated by E. Babington from the original of Padre Beschi, written about 1720-1790), London.

1867.—"Except the guru of Bombay, no priest on earth has so large a power of acting on every weakness of the female heart as a Mormon bishop at Salt Lake.”—Dixon’s New America, 280.

GOOBUL, s. H. gurul, goral; the Himalayan chamois; Nemorhoedus Goral of Jerdon. [Cemas Goral of Blanford (Mammalia, 516).]

1821.—"The flesh was good and tasted like that of the ghorul, so abundant in the hilly belt towards India.”—Lloyd de Gerard’s Narr., ii. 112.

1836.—"On Tuesday we went to a new part of the hill to shoot ‘guru,’ a kind of deer, which across a khud, looks remarkably small and [more like a hare than a deer].”—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 285.

GOORZEBURDAR, s. P. gurz-bardar, ‘a mace-bearer.’

1663.—"Among the Kours and the Mansebars are mixed many Goorze-bardars, or mace-bearers chosen for their tall and handsome persons, and whose business it is to preserve order in assemblies, to carry the King’s orders, and execute his commands with the utmost speed.”—Berner, ed. Constable, 267.

1717.—"Everything being prepared for the Goorzeburdar’s reception.”—In Yale, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cclix.

1727.—"Goosberdar. See under HOS-BOLHOOKUM.”
Goozerat, Guzerat. n.p. The name of a famous province in Western India, Skt. Gurjiara, Gurjira-redstra, Prakrit passing into H. and Mahr. Gujrat, Gujrati, taking its name from the Gaekwar (see Guicowan) of Baroda, and a multitude of native States. It is also often used as including the peninsula of Kathiawar or Surashtra, which alone embraces 180 petty States.

C. 640.—Hwen T'sang passes through Kiuschi-lo, i.e. Gurjiara, but there is some difficulty as to the position which he assigns to it.—Pereins Boudah., ii. 166; [Cunningham, Arch. Rep. ii. 70 seqq.]

1288.—"Gorurut is a great Kingdom. ... The people are the most desperate pirates in existence. ..."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 26.

C. 1300.—"Gurzerat, which is a large country, within which are Kambay, Somnat, Kankan-Tana, and several other cities and towns."—Rashkuddin, in Elliot, i. 67.

1300.—"The Sultan despatched Ulugh Khán to Maabar and Gujarut for the destruction of the idol-temple of Somnáth, on the 20th of Jamúd-i awwal, 698 H. ..."—Amir Khurús, in Elliot, iii. 74.

C. 1330.—"Jurrut." See under LAb.

1554.—"At last we made the land of Gujarut in Hindustan."—Said 'Ali, p. 79.

The name is sometimes used by the old writers for the people, and especially for the Hindu merchants or banyans (q.v.) of Guzerat. See Sainbury, i. 445 and passim.

C. 1605.—"And also the Guzatts do saile in the Portugalls shiппs in every porle of the East Indies ..."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 85.

Gozulkhana, s. A bathroom; H. from Ar.—P. ghust-khana, of corresponding sense. The apartment so called was used by some of the Great Moghuls as a place of private audience.

1616.—"At eight, after supper he comes down to the guzelkan (v.l. guselcan), a faire Court wherein in the middest is a Throne erected of freestone."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, ii. [Hak. Soc. i. 106].

"The thirteenth, at night I went to the Gussen Chan, where is best opportunitie to doe business, and tooke with me the Italian, determining to walk no longer in darkness, but to procure the King. ..."—Ibid. p. 543; [Hak. Soc. i. 202, Guselchan; in i. 459, Gusbel choos].

C. 1660.—"The grand hall of the Am-Kas opens into a more retired chamber, called the gosul-khana, or the place to wash in. But few are suffered to enter there. ... There it is where the king is seated in a chair ... and writeth a more particular Audience to his officers."—Berenger, E.T. p. 85; [ed. Constable, 265; ibid. 361 goose-khana].

Gopura, s. The meaning of the word in Skt. is 'city-gate,' go 'eye,' pura, 'city.' But in S. India the gopuram is that remarkable feature of architecture, peculiar to the Peninsula, the great pyramidal tower over the entrance-gate to the precinct of a temple. See Ferguson's Indian and Eastern Architecture, 325, &c. [The same feature has been reproduced in the great temple of the Seth at Brindabán, which is designed on a S. Indian model. (Grousse, Mathura, 260.)] This feature is not, in any of the S. Indian temples, older than the 15th or 16th cent, and was no doubt adopted for purposes of defence, as indeed the Silpa-śāstra ('Books of Mechanical Arts') treatises imply. This fact may sufficiently dispose of the idea that the feature indicates an adoption of architecture from ancient Egypt.

1602.—"The gopurams or towers of the great pagoda."—Markham, Peru and India, 408.

Gora, s. H. gorda, 'fair-complexioned.' A white man; a European soldier; any European who is not a sahib (q.v.). Plural gordl-bog, 'white people.'

[1861.—"The cavalry ... rushed into the lines ... declaring that the Gora Log (the European soldiers) were coming down upon them."—Cave Brosoun, Punjab and Delhi, i. 243.]

Gorawallah, s. H. ghorda-wala, ghord, 'a horse.' A groom or horsekeeper; used at Bombay. On the Bengal side syce (q.v.) is always used, on the Madras side horsekeeper (q.v.).

1680.—Gurrils, apparently for ghorawalls (Gurrils would be alligators, Gavial), are allowed with the horses kept with the Hoogly Factory.—See Fort St. Geo. Cons. on Tour, Dec. 12, in Notes and Exts., No. ii. 63.

C. 1848.—"On approaching the different points, one knows Mrs. — is at hand, for her Gorawallahs wear green and gold puggrires."—Chow-Chow, i. 151.
GORAYT. a. H. goret, goraft, [which has been connected with Skt. ghur,
'to shout']; a village watchman and messenger, [in the N.W.P. usually of a lower grade than the chokidar, and not, like him, paid a cash wage, but remunerated by a piece of rent-free land; one of the village establishment, whose special duty it is to watch crops and harvested grain.]
[c. 1808.—"Fifteen messengers (goraita) are allowed to sit on the man of grain, and from 1 to 5 biggahs of land each."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 231.]

GORDOWER, GOORDORE, a. A kind of boat in Bengal, described by Ives as "a vessel pushed on by paddles." Etym. obscure. Ghurdaur is a horse-race, a race-course; sometimes used by natives to express any kind of open-air assemblage of Europeans for amusement. [The word is more probably a corr. of P. girdwara,
' a patrol'; girdwara, 'all around, a supervisor,' because such boats appear to be used in Bengal by officials on their tours of inspection.]
1757.—"To get two boias (see BOLIAH), a goordore, and 87 dandies (q.v.) from the Nazir."—Ives, 157.

GOSAIN, GOSSYNE, &c. a. H. and Mahr. Gosain, Goshi, Gosdi, Guestin, &c., from Skt. Gossin, 'Lord of Passions' (lit. 'Lord of cows'), i.e.
one who is supposed to have subdued his passions and renounced the world.
Applied in various parts of India to different kinds of persons not necessarily celibates, but professing a life of religious mendicancy, and including some who dwell together in convents under a superior, and others who engage in trade and hardly pretend to lead a religious life.
1774.—"My hopes of seeing Teshu Lama were chiefly founded on the Gosain."— Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 46.
c. 1781.—"It was at this time in the hands of a Gosine, or Hindoo Religious."— Hodges, 112. (The use of this barbarism by Hodges is remarkable, common as it has become of late years.)
[1813.—"Unlike the generality of Hindoos, these Gosains do not burn their dead . . ."
Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 312-3; in i.
544 be writes Gosains.)
1836.—"I found a lonely cottage with a light in the window, and being attired in the habit of a gosain, I did not hesitate to request a lodging for the night."—Pandurang Hari, 389; [ed. 1873, ii. 275].

GOSBECK, COSBEAGUE, a. A coin spoken of in Persia (at Gombroon and elsewhere). From the quotation from Fryer it appears that there was a Goss and a Gosbeig, corresponding to Herbert's double and single Cosbeg.
Mr. Wollaston in his English-Persian Dict. App. p. 436, among "Moneys now current in Persia," gives "5 dinar = 1 ghaz; also a nominal money."
The ghaz, then, is the name of a coin (though a coin no longer), and ghazbegi was that worth 10 dinars.
Marsden mentions a copper coin, called kasbeig=60 (nominal) dinars, or about 34d. (Numism. Orient. 456.) But the value in dinars seems to be in error. [Prof. Browne, who referred the matter to M. Husayn Kuli Khân, Secretary of the Persian Embassy in London, writes: "This gentleman states that he knows no word ghaz-beg, or gaz-beg, but that there was formerly a coin called ghaz, of which 5 went to the shahi; but this is no longer used or spoken of." The ghaz was in use at any rate as late as the time of Hajji Baba; see below.]

[1615.—"The chiefest money that is current in Persia is the Akbae, which weigheth 2 meticales. The second is the mamele, which is half an abase. The third is the shaheb and is a quarter of an abase. In the rial of eight are 13 shayes. In the chetah of Venetia 20 shayes. In a shaye are 24 bitties or cosbegos 10. A bittie is 2 tanges or 2 ymals. The Akbae, mamele and Shaheb and bittie are of silver; the rest are of copper like to the pissa of India."—Forster, Letters,
iii. 176.]
c. 1630.—"The Akbas is in our money sixteen pence; Larree ten pence; Momodde eight pence; Bittie two pence; double Cosbeg one penny; single Cosbeg one half-penny; Flues are ten to a Cosbeg."—Sir T.
Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 231.
1673.—"A Banyan that seemingly is not worth a Gosbeck (the lowest coin they have)."—Fryer, 113. See also p. 343.
10 costanages is a Shahee; 4
Shahes is one Akbas or 10d. —Ibid. 211.
"Brass money with characters,
Are a Goss, ten whereof compose a Shahee,
A Cosbeg, five of which go to a Shahee."—
Ibid. 407.
1711.—"10 Cox, or Pice, a Copper Coin, are 1 Shahee."—Lockyer, 241.
1727.—"1 Shahee is . . . 10 Goss or Cosbeages."—A. Hamilton, ii. 311; [ed. 1744].
1752.—"10 costanague or Pice (a Copper Coin) are 1 Shahes" (read Shahee).— Brooks, p. 37. See also in Hanway, vol. i.
p. 292, Kasbegie; [in ii. 21, Kasbekie].
[1824.—"But whatever profit arose either from these services, or from the spoils of my monkey, he alone was the gainer, for I never touched a ghaus of it."—Haji Bada, 52 seq.]

1825.—"A toman contains 100 mamoodies; a new abassee, 2 mamoodies or 4 shakkas...a shakke, 10 002 or corbangus, a small copper coin."—Miltburn, 2nd ed. p. 96.

GOSHA. adj. Used in some parts, as an Anglo-Indian technicality, to indicate that a woman was secluded, and cannot appear in public. It is short for P. goshanishin, 'sitting in a corner'; and is much the same as parda-nishin (see PURDAH).

GOUNG. s. Burn. gaung; a village head man. ["Under the Thuggee were Roa-goung, or heads of villages, who aided in the collection of the revenue and were to some extent police officials." (Gazetteer of Burma, i. 460.)]

GOUR, s. H. gaur, gauri gade, (but not in the dictionaries). [Platts gives gaur, Skt. gaura, 'white, yellowish, reddish, pale red'] The great wild ox, Gazaurus Gaurus, Jerd.; [Boa gaurus, Blanford (Mammalia), 484 seq.], the same as the Bison (q.v.). [The classical account of the animal will be found in Forsyth, Highlands of Central India, ed. 1889, pp. 105 seq.]

1806.—"They erect strong fences, but the buffaloes generally break them down...They are far larger than common buffaloes. There is an account of a similar kind called the Gora; one distinction between it and the buffalo is the length of the hoof."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 156.

GOUR, s. Properly Can. gaud, gaur, gauda. The head man of a village in the Canarese-speaking country; either as corresponding to patel, or to the Zemindar of Bengal. [See F. Buchanan, Mysore, i. 266; Rice, Mysore, i. 579.]

1800.—"Every Tehsildary is farmed out in villages to the Gouras or head-men."—In Mu'are's Life, iii. 92.

GOUR, n.p. Gaur, the name of a medieval capital of Bengal, which lay immediately south of the modern civil station of Malda, and the traces of which, with occasional Mahomedan buildings, extend over an immense area, chiefly covered with jungle. The name is a form of the ancient Gauda, meaning, it is believed, 'the country of sugar,' a name applied to a large part of Bengal, and specifically to the portion where those remains lie. It was the residence of a Hindu dynasty, the Senas, at the time of the early Mahomedan invasions, and was popularly known as Lakhnadot; but the reigning king had transferred his seat to Nadiya (70 m. above Calcutta) before the actual conquest of Bengal in the last years of the 12th century. Gaur was afterwards the residence of several Musulman dynasties. [See Ravneshwar, Gaur, its Ruins and Inscriptions, 1878.]

1556.—"But Xarcanor [Shir Khan Sur, afterwards King of Hindustan as Shir Shab] after his success advanced along the river till he came before the city of Gour to besiege it, and ordered a lodgment to be made in front of certain verandahs of the King's Palace which looked upon the river; and as he was making his trenches certain Rumi who were resident in the city, desiring that the King should prize them highly (d'elles fiesse cadre) as he did the Portuguese, offered their service to the King to go and prevent the enemy's lodgment, saying that he should also send the Portuguese with them."—Correa, iii. 720.

[1552.—"Gaur." See under BURRAM-POOTER.]

1563.—"The chief city of the Kingdom (of Bengal) is called Gouro. It is situated on the banks of the Ganges, and is said to be 3 of our leagues in length, and to contain 200,000 inhabitants. On the one side it has the river for its defence, and on the landward faces a wall of great height...the streets are so thronged with the concourse and traffic of people...that they cannot force their way past...a great part of the houses of this city are stately and well-wrought buildings."—Barros, IV. ix. cap. i.

1586.—"From Patanaw I went to Tanda, which is in the land of the Goure. It hath in times past been a kingdom, but is now subdued by Zelabdin Eschebar..."—R. Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii. 389.

1683.—"I went to see ye famous Ruins of a great City and Palace called [of] GOWRE...we spent 31 hours in seeing ye ruins especially of the Palace which has been...in my judgment considerably bigger and more beautiful than the Grand Seignor's Seraglio at Constantinopie or any other Palace that I have seen in Europe...Hedges, Diary, May 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 88].

GOVERNOR'S STRAITS, n.p. This was the name applied by the Portuguese (Estreito do Gobernador) to the Straits of Singapore, i.e. the straits south of that island (or New Strait). The reason of the name is given in our first quotation. The Governor in question was the Spaniard Dom João da Silva.

1615. — "The Governor sailed from Manilia in March of this year with 10 galleons and 2 galleys. . . Arriving at the Straits of Sincapur, * * * * and passing by a new strait which since has taken the name of Estreito do Governador, there his galleon grounded on the reef at the point of the strait, and was a little grazed by the top of it." — Bocarro, 428.

1727. — "Between the small Carimons and Tanjong-belong on the Continent, is the entrance of the Straights of Sincapw, and was a little grazed by the top of it." — Bocarro, 428.

1780. — "Directions for sailing from Malacca to Pulo Timan through Governor's Straits, commonly called the Straits of Sincapw." — Dunn's N. Directory, 5th ed. p. 474. See also Letters Edify., 1st ed. ii. 118.

1841. — "Singapore Strait, called Governor Strait, or New Strait, by the French and Portuguese." — Horsh bourgh, 5th ed. ii. 894.

GOW, GAOU, s. Dak. H. gau. An ancient measure of distance preserved in S. India and Ceylon. In the latter island, where the term still is in use, the gau (or gow) is a measure of about 4 English miles. It is Pali gavuta, one quarter of a yojana, and that again is the Skt. garyati with the same meaning. There is in Moleshworth's Mahr. Dictionary, and in Wilson, a term gauks (see COSS), 'a land measure' (for which read 'distance measure'), the distance at which the lowing of a cow may be heard. This is doubtless a form of the same term as that under consideration, but the explanation is probably modern and incorrect. The yojana with which the gau is correlated, appears etymologically to be 'a yoking,' viz. "the stage, or distance to be gone in one harnessing without unyoking" (Williams); and the lengths attributed to it are very various, oscillating from 2$\frac{1}{2}$ to 9 miles, and even to 8 kroas (see COSS). The last valuation of the yojana would correspond with that of the gau at $\frac{1}{4}$.

c. 545. — "The great Island (Taprobane), according to what the natives say, has a length of 300 grandas, and a breadth of the same, i.e. 900 miles." — Cosmas Indicopleustes, (in Cathay, cixviii).

1622. — "From Gariotta to Tumbré may be about a league and a half, for in that country distances are measured by gau, and each gau is about two leagues, and from Gariotta to Tumbré they said was not so much as a gau of road." — P. della Valle, ii. 638; [Hak. Soc. ii. 230].

1678. — "They measure the distances of places in India by Gau and Coast. A Gau is about 4 of our common leagues, and a Coast is one league." — Yanes, ed. T. ii. 30; [ed. Bail, i. 47].

1860. — "A gau in Ceylon expresses a somewhat indeterminate length, according to the nature of the ground to be traversed, a gau across a mountainous country being less than one measured on level ground, and a gau for a loaded cooley is also permitted to be shorter than for one unburthened, but on the whole the average may be taken under four miles." — Tennent's Ceylon, 4th ed. i. 467.

GRAB, a. This name, now almost obsolete, was applied to a kind of vessel which is constantly mentioned in the sea- and river-fights of India, from the arrival of the Portuguese down to near the end of the 16th century. That kind of etymology which works from inner consciousness would probably say: "This term has always been a puzzle to the English in India. The fact is that it was a kind of vessel much used by corsairs, who were said to grab all that passed the sea. Hence," &c. But the real derivation is different.

The Rev. Howard Malcom, in a glossary attached to his Travels, defines it as "a square-rigged Arab vessel, having a projecting stern (stem?) and no bowsprit; it has two masts." Probably the application of the term may have deviated variously in recent days. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. pt. i. 348.] For thus again in Solynia (Les Hindous, vol. i.) a grab is drawn and described as a ship with three masts, a sharp prow, and a bowsprit. But originally the word seems beyond question, to have been an Arab name for a galley. The proper word is Arab. ghorab, 'a raven,' though adopted into Mahratti and Konkani as gurdb. Jal says, quoting Reinaud, that ghorab was the name given by the Moors to the true galley, and cites Hyde for the rationale of the name. We give Hyde's words below. Amari, in a work quoted below (p. 397), points out the analogous corvetta as perhaps a transfer of ghrudb:

1181. — "A vessel of our merchants . . . making sail for the city of Tripoli (which God protect) was driven by the winds on the shores of that country, and the crews being in want of water, landed to procure it, but the people of the place refused it unless some corn were sold to them. Meanwhile there came a ghurab from Tripoli . . . which took and plundered the crew, and seized all the goods on board the vessel."—Arabic Letter from Usbido, Archbishop and other authorities of Fiax, to the Almodoh Caliph Abu Yakub Yusuf, in Amari, Diplom. Arabi, p. 8.

The Latin contemporary version runs thus:

"Cum quidam nostri cari cives de Siciliâ cum crumo frumenti ad Tripoli venirent, temptaste maris et vi ventorum compelli, ad portum dictum Macri devenirent; iisque aquâ deficienti, et cum pro eâ suriaâirent, Barbarocni non permiserunt eös . . . nisi prius eis de frumento venderent. Cumque invitâ, eis de frumento venderent "galæa" vestra de Tripolim armata," &c.—Ibid. p. 298.

c. 1200.—Ghuráb, Cornix, Corvus, galea.

1543.—"Jalans . . . sent us off in company with his son, on board a vessel called al-'Ukairi, which is like a ghurâb, only more roomy. It has 60 oars, and when it engages is covered with a roof to protect the rowers from the darts and stone-shot."—Im Bâtuta, iv. 59.

1605.—In the Vocabulary of Pedro de Aemela, galea is interpreted in Arabic as gôrab.

1564.—In the narrative of Sidi 'Ali Kapudân, in describing an action that he fought with the Portuguese near the Persian Gulf, he says the enemy's fleet consisted of 4 barques as big as carracks (q.v.), 3 great ghurâbs, 6 Karâwâs (see CARAVEL) and 12 smaller ghurâbs, or galliots (see GALLEY) with oars.—In J. As., ser. 1. tomo. ix. 67-68.

[c. 1610.—"His royal galley called by them Ogate Gourabe (gourabe means 'galley,' and ogate 'royal')."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 312.]

1660.—"Jané Beg might attack us from the hills, the ghurâbs from the river, and the men of Sihâman from the rear, so that we should be in a critical position."—Mohammed Masum, in Elliot, i. 250. The word occurs in many pages of the same history.

[1679.—"My Selfe and Mr. Gapes Grob the stern most."—In Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cixxiv.]

1673.—"Our Factors, having concerns in the cargo of the ships in this Road, loaded two Grobs and departed."—Fryer, 153.

1727.—"The Muscat War . . . obliges them (the Portuguese) to keep an Armada of five or six ships, besides small Frigates and Grobs of War."—A. Hamilton, i. 250; [ed. 1744, ii. 283].

1750-52.—"The ships which they make use of against their enemies are called goerâbs by the Dutch, and grobs by the English, have 2 or 3 masts, and are built like our ships, with the same sort of rigging, only their prows are low and sharp as in galleys, that they may not only place some cannons in them, but likewise in case of emergency for a couple of oars, to push the gârab on in a calm."—Olof Toreen, Voyage, 206.

1810.—"Here a fine English East India-man, there a grob, or a dow from Arabia."—Maria Graham, 142.

1872.—"Moored in its centre you saw some 20 or 30 ghurâbs (grobs) from Muscat, Baghiachs from the Persian Gulf, Kotiyahas from Kach'h, and Pittimars or Bateelas from the Konkan and Bombay."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 83.

GRAM, a. This word is properly the Portuguese grão, i.e. 'grain,' but it has been specially appropriated to that kind of vetch (Cicer arietinum, L) which is the most general grain—(rather pulse)—food of horses all over India, called in H. chana. It is the Ital. ceci, Fr. pois chiché, Eng. chick-pea or Egypt. pea, much used in France and S.
Europe. This specific application of grão is also Portuguese, as appears from Bluteau. The word gram is in some parts of India applied to other kinds of pulse, and then this application of it is recognised by qualifying it as Bengal gram. (See remarks under CALAVANCE.) The plant exudes oxalate of potash, and to walk through a gram-field in a wet morning is destructive to shoe-leather. The natives collect the acid.

[1513. "And for the food of these horses (exported from the Persian Gulf) the factor supplied grão." — Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 200, Letter of Dec. 4.

[1554.—(Describing Vijayanagar.) "There the food of horses and elephants consists of grão, rice and other vegetables, cooked with jagra, which is palm-tree sugar, as there is no barley in that country." — Custanheda, Bk. ii. ch. 16.

[c. 1610.—"They give them also a certain grain like lentils."—Pyram de Lavall, Hak. Soc. ii. 79.]

1702.—"... he confessions before us that their allowance three times a week is but a quart of rice and gram together for five men a day, but promises that for the future it shall be rectified."—In Wheeler, t. 10.

1778.—"... Lentils, gram... mustard seed."—Halhed's Code, p. 8 (pt. ii.)

1789.—"... a small kind of pulse, universally used instead of cats."—Munro's Narrative, 85.

1793.—"... gram, which it is not customary to give to bullocks in the Carnatic."—D'Incro's Narrative, 97.

1804.—"The gram alone, for the four regiments with me, has in some months cost 50,000 pagodas."—Wellington, iii. 71.

1855.—"... they had come at a wrong season, gram was dear, and prices low, and the sale concluded in a dead loss."—Falgrose's Arabia, 290.

GRAM-FED, adj. Properly the distinctive description of mutton and beef fattened upon gram, which used to be the pride of Bengal. But applied figuratively to any 'pampered creature.'

C. 1849.—"By an old Indian I mean a man full of curry and of bad Hindustani, with a fat liver and no brains, but with a self-sufficient idea that no one can know India except through long experience of brands, champagne, gram-fed mutton, charolets and hookahs."—Sir C. Napier, quoted in Bos. Smith's Life of Lt. Lawrence, i. 388.

1880.—"I missed two persons at the Delhi assemblage in 1877. All the gram-fed secretaries and most of the alcoholic chiefs were there; but the famine-haunted villagers and the delirium-shattered opium-eating Chinaman, who had to pay the bill, were not present."—Ali Baba, 127.

GRANDONIC. (See GRUNTHUM and SANSKRIT).

GRASS-CLOTH. s. This name is now generally applied to a kind of cambric from China made from the Chuma of the Chinese (Boehmaria nivea, Hooker, the Rhea, so much talked of now), and called by the Chinese sia-pu, or 'summer-cloth.' We find grass-cloths often spoken of by the 16th century travellers, and even later, as an export from Orissa and Bengal. They were probably made of Rhea or some kindred species, but we have not been able to determine this. Cloth and nets are made in the south from the Neilgherry nettle (Girardinia heterophylla, D. C.).

C. 1567.—"Cloth of herbes (panni d'erba), which is a kind of silke, which groweth among the woodes without any labour of man."—Ceeser Frederici, in Hakt. ii. 358.

1585.—"Great store of the cloth which is made from Grasse, which they call yerua" (in Orissa).—R. Fitch, in Hakt. ii. 357.

[1796.—See under BAREE.

[c. 1610.—"Likewise is there plenty of silk, as well that of the silkworm as of the (silk) Aerb, which is of the brightest yellow colour, and brighter than silk itself."—Pyram de Lavall, Hak. Soc. i. 328.]

1627.—"Their manufactories (about Balasore) are of Cotton... Silk, and Silk and Cotton Romalis... and of Herbs (a Sort of tough Grass) they make Gingham, Pinacos, and several other Goods for Exportation."—A. Hamilton, i. 397; [ed. 1744].

1815.—Milburn, in his List of Bengal Piece-Goods, has Herbs Taffaties (ii. 221).

GRASS-CUTTER, s. This is probably a corruption representing the H. ghadshoddr or ghadskat, 'the digger, or cutter, of grass'; the title of a servant employed to collect grass for horses, one such being usually attached to each horse besides the syce or horse-keeper. In the north the grasscutter is a man; in the south the office is filled by the horsekeeper's wife. Ghaskat is the form commonly used by Englishmen in Upper India speaking Hindustani; but ghasiydra by those aspiring to purer language. The former term appears in Williamson's V. M. (1810) as gausat (i. 186), the latter in Jacquemont's Correspondence as GRASSHOPPER FALLS. 394  GRASS-WIDOW.

Grasswara. No grasscutters are mentioned as attached to the stables of Akbar; only a money allowance for grass. The antiquity of the Madras arrangement is shown by a passage in Castanheda (1552): "... he gave him a horse, and a boy to attend to it, and a female slave to see to its fodder."—(ii. 58.)

1789.—"... an Horsekeeper and Grass-cutter at two pagodas."—Munro’s Narr. 28.

1793.—"Every horse... has two attendants, one who cleans and takes care of him, called the horse-keeper, and the other the grass-cutter, who provides for his forage."—Dirom’s Narr. 242.

1848.—"Every horse has a man and a maid to himself—the maid cuts grass for him; and every dog has a boy. I inquired whether the cat had any servants, and he was allowed to wait upon himself."—Letters from Madras, 37.

1850.—"Then there are our servants... four Saiaes and four Grasscut..."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 253.

1875.—"I suppose if you were to pick up... a grass-cutter’s pony to replace the one you lost, you wouldn’t feel that you had done the rest of the army out of their rights."—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

GRASSHOPPER FALLS, n.p. An Anglo-Indian corruption of the name of the great waterfall on the Shervasti River in the Shimoga District of Mysore, where the river plunges down in a succession of cascades, of which the principal is 890 feet in height. The proper name of the place is Geroppa, or Gerussappe, which takes its name from the adjoining village; geru, Can., ‘the marking nut plant’ (semecarpus anacardium, L.), soppu, ‘a leaf.’ See Mr. Grey’s note on P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 218.

GRASS-WIDOW, s. This slang phrase is applied in India, with a shade of malignity, to ladies living apart from their husbands, especially as recreating at the hill stations, whilst the husbands are at their duties in the plains.

We do not know the origin of the phrase. In the Slang Dictionary it is explained: "An unmarried mother; a discarded mistress." But no such opprobrious meanings attach to the Indian use. In Notes and Queries, 6th ser. viii. 414, will be found several communications on this phrase. [Also see ibid. x. 456, 526; xi. 178; 8th ser. iv. 37, 75.] We learn from these that in Moor’s Suffolk Words and Phrases, Grace-Widow occurs with the meaning of an unmarried mother. Corresponding to this, it is stated also, is the N.S. (?) or Low German gras-wedew. The Swedish Grästinka or -enka also is used for ‘a low dissolute married woman living by herself.’ In Belgium a woman of this description is called haecke-wedew, from haecken, ‘to feel strong desire’ (to `hanker’). And so it is suggested grästinka is contracted from grädesenka, from gradig, ‘esuriens’ (greedy, in fact). In Danish Dict. grästinka is interpreted as a woman whose betrothed lover is dead. But the German Stroh-Wittwe, ‘straw-widow’ (which Flügel interprets as ‘mock widow’), seems rather inconsistent with the suggestion that gras-widow is a corruption of the kind suggested. A friend mentions that the masc. Stroh-Wittwer is used in Germany for a man whose wife is absent, and who therefore dines at the eating-house with the young fellows. [The N.E.D. gives the two meanings: 1. An unmarried woman who has cohabited with one or more men; a discarded mistress; 2. A married woman whose husband is absent from her. “The etymological notion is obscure, but the parallel forms disprove the notion that the word is a ‘corruption’ of grace-widow. It has been suggested that in sense 1. gras (and G. stroh) may have been used with opposition to bed. Sense 2. may have arisen as an etymologizing interpretation of the compound after it had ceased to be generally understood; in Eng. it seems to have first appeared as Anglo-Indian.” The French equivalent, Veuve de Malabar, was in allusion to Lemierre’s tragedy, produced in 1770.]

1873.—"In the evening my wife and I went out house-hunting; and we pitched upon one which the newly incorporated body of Municipal Commissioners and the Clergyman (who was a Grass-widower, his wife being at home) had taken between them.”—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 99-100.

1879.—The Indian newspaper’s “typical official rises to a late breakfast—probably on bennings and soda-water—and dresses tastefully for his round of morning calls, the last on a grass-widower, with whom he has a tête-à-tête tiffin, where ‘pegs’ alternate with champagne.”—Sinda Letter in Times, Aug. 18.

GRASSIA. 386 GRIFFIN, GRIFF, GRIFFISH.

1880.—"The Grass-widow in Nephelococygia."—Sir W. M. Bishop, 169.

"Pleasant times have these Indian grass-widows!"—The World, Jan. 21, 13.

GRASSIA, s. Gras (said to mean 'a mouthful') is stated by Mr. Forbes in the Râs Mâlâ (p. 186) to have been in old times usually applied to alienations for religious objects; but its prevalent sense came to be the portion of land given for subsistence to cadets of chieftains' families. Afterwards the term gras was also used for the black-mail paid by a village to a turbulent neighbour as the price of his protection and forbearance, and in other like meanings. "Thus the title of grasia, originally an honourable one, and indicating its possessor to be a cadet of the ruling tribe, became at last as frequently a term of opprobrium, conveying the idea of a professional robber." (Ibid. Bk. iv. ch. 3) [ed. 1878, p. 588].

[1884.—See under COOLY.]

c. 1665.—"Nous nous trouvâmes au Village de Bilper, dont les Habitans qu'on nomme Birratees, sont presque tous Voleurs."—Thevenot, v. 42.

1808.—"The Grasias have been shewn to be of different Sects, Casta, or families, viz., 1st, Cosees and their Colliarates; 2nd, Rajpoots; 3rd, Syed Musulmans; 4th, Mollelans or modern Mahomedans. There are besides many others who enjoy the free usufruct of lands, and permanent emolument from villages, but those only who are of the four aforesaid warlike tribes seem entitled by prescriptive custom... to be called Grasias."—Drummond, Illustrations.

1813.—"I confess I cannot now contemplate my extraordinary deliverance from the Grasias machinations without feelings more appropriate to solemn silence than expression."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 393; [conf. 2nd ed. ii. 357].

1819.—"Grassia, from Grass, a word signifying 'a mouthful.' This word is understood in some parts of Mekran, Sind, and Kutch; but I believe not further into Hindostan than Jaipore."—MacLennan, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 270. [On the use in Central India, see Tod, Annals, i. 176; Malcolm, Central India, i. 506.]

GRAVE-DIGGER. (See BEEJOO.)

GREEN-PIGEON. A variety of species belonging to the sub.-fam. Treroninae, and to genera Treron, Cricopus, Osmotheron, and Sphenocerus, bear this name. The three first following quotations show that these birds had attracted the attention of the ancients.

c. 180.—"Daimachus, in his History of India, says that pigeons of an apple-green colour are found in India."—Athenaeus, ix. 51.

c. A.D. 250.—"They bring also greenish (ψοκρε) pigeons which they say can never be tamed or domesticated."—Aelian, De Nat. Anim. xv. 14.

1673.—"Our usual diet was (besides Plenty of Fish) Water-Fowl, Peacocks, Green Fidgeons, Spotted Deer, Sabre, Wild Hogs, and sometimes Wild Cows."—Pryer, 176.

1826.—"I say a great number of peafowl, and of the beautiful greenish pigeon common in this country..."—Heber, ii. 19.

GREY PARTRIDGE. The common Anglo-Indian name of the Hind. tilie, common over a great part of India, Ortygonis Ponticera, Gmelin. "Its call is a peculiar loud shrill cry, and has, not unaptly, been compared to the word Pateela-pateela-pateela, quickly repeated but preceded by a single note, uttered two or three times, each time with a higher intonation, till it gets, as it were, the key-note of its call."—Jerdon, ii. 566.

GRIFFEE, s. A graplin or grapnel. Lascars' language (Roebuck).

GRIFFIN, GRIFF, GRIFFISH, adj. One newly arrived in India, and unaccustomed to Indian ways and peculiarities; a Johnny Newcome. The origin of the phrase is unknown to us. There was an Admiral Griffin who commanded in the Indian seas from Nov. 1748 to June 1748, and was not very fortunate. Had his name to do with the origin of the term? The word seems to have been first used at Madras (see Boyd, below). [But also see the quotation from Beaumont & Fletcher, below.] Three references below indicate the parallel terms formerly used by the Portuguese at Goa, by the Dutch in the Archipelago, and by the English in Ceylon.
Here orang barou is Malay orang-baharu, i.e. 'new man'; whilst Orang-lama, 'man of long since,' is applied to old colonials. In connection with these terms we extract the following:

1790. — "Si je n'avais pas été un oorlawn, et si un long séjour dans l'Inde ne m'avoir pas accoutumé à cette espèce de flau, j'aurais certainement souffert l'impossible durant cette nuit." — Haucquer, lii. 20-27.

On this his editor notes:

"Oorlawn est un mot Malais corrompu; il faut dire Orang-lama, ce qui signifie une personne qui a déjà été long-temps dans un endroit, ou dans un pays, et c'est par ce nom qu'on désigne les Européens qui ont habité depuis un certain temps dans l'Inde. Ceux qui ne font qu'arriver, sont appelés Baar; dénomination qui vient du mot Malais Orang-Barn... un homme nouvellement arrivé."

GROUND, s. A measure of land used in the neighbourhood of Madras. [Also called Munny, Tam.manai.] (See under CANYW.)

GRUFF, adj. Applied to bulky goods. Probably the Dutch groot, 'coarse.'

1889-3. — "... that for every Tunne of Saltpetre and all other gruff goods I am to receive nineteen pounds." — Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. vol. ii. 3-4.]

1750. — "... all which could be called Curtins, and some of the Bastions at Madras, had Warehouses under them for the Reception of Naval Stores, and other gruff Goods from Europe, as well as Salt Petre from Bengal." — Letter to a Propr. of the E. I. Co., p. 52.

1759. — "Which by causing a great export of rice enhances the price of labour, and consequently of all other gruff piece-goods and raw silk." — Long, 171.

1765. — "... also fooled sugar, lump jaggir, ginger, long pepper, and pilpy-mol... articles that usually compose the gruff cargoes of our outward-bound shipping." — Hotwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 194.

1773. — "What in India is called a gruff (bulky) cargo." — Forrest, Voyage to Persia, 42.
GRUNTH. a. Panjâbi Grunth, from Skt. grantha, lit. ‘a knot,’ leaves tied together by a string. ‘The Book,’ i.e. the Scripture of the Sikhs, containing the hymns composed or compiled by their leaders from Nânak (1469-1538) onwards. The Grunth has been translated by Dr. Trumpp, and published, at the expense of the Indian Government.

1770.—“As the young man (Nânak) was early introduced to the knowledge of the most esteemed writings of the Musulmen he made it a practice in his leisure hours to translate literally or virtually, as his mind prompted him, such of their maxims as made the deepest impression on his heart. This was in the idiom of Pendjab, his maternal language. Little by little he strung together these loose sentences, reduced them into some order, and put them in verses. . . . His collection became numerous; it took the form of a book which was entitled Grunth.”—Seer Mutawharis, i. 89.

1753.—“Cette langue correspond à la notre Latine, parceque les seules Letrres l’apprenent; il se nomment Guirdams.”—Barroto, Rel. de la Prov. de la Malabar, 257.

1727.—“. . . their four law-books, Sama Vedam, Urukk Vedam, Edirvarna Vedam, and Adir Vedam, which are all written in the Girandams, and are held in high esteem by the Brahmins.”—Valentijn, v. (Ceylon), 386.

“Girandam (by others called Kerendam and also Suanbris) is the language of the Brahmins and the learned.”—Ibid. 386.

1753.—“Les Indiens du pays se donnent le nom de Tamules, et on sait que la langue vulgaire différente du Sanskrit, et du Grenand, qui sont les langues sacrées, porte le même nom.”—D’Anville. 117.

GUANA, IGUANA. s. This is not properly an Indian term, nor the name of an Indian species, but, as in many other cases, it has been applied by transfer from superficially resembling genera in the new Indies, to the old. The great lizards, sometimes called guanas in India, are apparently monitors. It must be observed, however, that approximating Indian names of lizards have helped the confusion. Thus the large monitor to which the name guana is often applied in India, is really called in Hindi godh (Skt. godhâ), Singhalesse goya. The true iguana of America is described by Ovidio in the first quotation under the name of iuana. [The word is Span. iguana, from Carib iwana, written in early writers hiuana, iyoana, iuana or yuana. See N.E.D. and Stanf. Dict.]

1585.—“There is in this island an animal called Iuana, which is here held to be amphibus (neutral), i.e. doubtful whether fish or flesh, for it frequents the rivers and climbs the trees as well. . . . It is a Serpent, bearing to one who knows it not a horrid and frightful aspect. It has the hands and feet like those of a great lizard, the head much larger, but almost of the same fashion, with a tail 4 or 5 palms in length. . . . And the animal, formed as I have described, is much better to eat than to look at.” &c.—Ovidio, in Ramusio, iii. f. 156v, 157.

1550.—“We also used to catch some four-footed animals called iugana, resembling our lizards in shape . . . the females are most delicate food.”—Griolami Benzon, p. 140.

1654.—“De Lacertae quâdam specie, Incolis Iugana. Est . . . genus venenosisissimum.” &c.—Jac. Bonâ, Lib. v. cap. 5. p. 57. (See GECKO.)

1673.—“Giuana, a Creature like a Crocodil, which Robbers use to lay hold on by their Tails, when they clamber Houses."—Fryer, 116.

1681.—Knox, in his Ceylon, speaks of two creatures resembling the Alligator—one called kobbera gulon, 5 or 6 feet long, and not estatable; the other called tolla gulon, very like the former, but "which is eaten, and reckoned excellent meat... and I suppose it is the same with that which in the W. Indies is called the guiana." (pp. 30, 31). The names are possibly Portuguese, and Kobberagina may be Cobra-guana.

1704.—"The Iguana is a sort of Creature some of which are found on the land, some in the water... stewed with a little Spice they make good Broth."—Funnell, in Dampier, iv. 51.

1711.—"Here are Monkeys, Gaunas, Lizards, large Snakes, and Alligators."—Lockyer, 47.

1780.—"They have here an amphibious animal called the guana, a species of the crocodile or alligator, of which soup is made equal to that of turtle. This I take upon hearsay, for it is to me of all others the most lomtsome of animals, not less than the toad."—Munro's Narrative, 38.

c. 1830.—"Had I known I was dining upon a guana, or large wood-lizard, I scarcely think I would have made so hearty a meal."—Tom Cringle (ed. 1893), 173.

1879.—"Captain Shaw asked the Imamun of one of the mosques of Malacaos about alligator's eggs, a few days ago, and his reply was, that the young that went down to the sea became alligators, and those that came up the river became iguanas."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 200.

1881.—"The chief of Mudhol State belongs to the Bhonsia tribe. The name, however, has been entirely superseded by the second designation of Gharpade, which is said to have been acquired by one of the family who managed to scale a fort previously deemed impregnable, by fastening a cord around the body of a ghorpad or iguana."—Imperial Gazetteer, vi. 437.

1883.—"Who can look on that ana-chronism, an iguana (I mean the large monitor which Europeans in India generally call an iguana, sometimes a guano;) basking, four feet long, on a sunny bank..."—Thibet on My Frontier, 36.

1885.—"One of my moonshies, Jose Prethoo, a Concani of one of the numerous families descended from Xavier's convertsa, gravely informed me that in the old days iguanas were used in gaining access to besieged places; for, said he, a large iguana, sahib, is so strong that if 3 or 4 men laid hold of its tail he could drag them up a wall or tree!"—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, 56.

GUARDAFUI, CAPE, n.p. The eastern horn of Africa, pointing towards India. We have the name from the Portuguese, and it has been alleged to have been so called by them as meaning, 'Take you heed!' (Gardes-vous, in fact.) But this is etymology of the species that so confidently derives 'Bombay' from Boa Bahia. Bruce, again (see below), gives dogmatically an interpretation which is equally unfounded. We must look to history, and not to the 'moral consciousness' of anybody. The country adjoining this horn of Africa, the Regio Aromatum of the ancients, seems to have been called by the Arabs Hafun, a name which we find in the Periplus in the shape of Ophoné. This name Hafun was applied to a town, no doubt the true Ophoné, which Barbosa (1516) mentions under the name of Afuni, and it still survives in those of two remarkable promontories, viz. the Peninsula of Rd. Hafun (the Chersonesus of the Periplus, the Zingis of Ptolemé, the Cape d'Afuni and d'Orfui of old maps and nautical directories), and the cape of Bard-Hafun (or according to the Egyptian pronunciation, Gard-Hafun), i.e. Guardafui. The nearest possible meaning of bard that we can find is 'a wide or spacious tract of land without herbage.'Sir R. Burton (Commentary on Cambões, iv. 489) interprets bard as—Bay, "from a break in the dreadful granite wall, lately provided by Egypt with a lighthouse." The last statement is unfortunately an error. The intended light seems as far off as ever. [There is still no lighthouse, and shipowners differ as to its advantage; see answer by Secretary of State, in House of Commons, Times, March 14, 1902.] We cannot judge of the ground of his interpretation of bard.

An attempt has been made to connect the name Hafun with the Arabic af'a, 'pleasant odours.' It would then, be the equivalent of the ancient Reg. Aromatum. This is tempting, but very questionable. We should have mentioned that Guardafui is the site of the mart and Promontory of the Spices described by the author of the Periplus as the furthest point and abrupt termination of the continent of Barbaria (or eastern Africa), towards the Orient (το των ἀρωματών ἐμπόρων καὶ διερήτων τελευ- ταίων τῆς βαρβαρίας ἵπτερον πρὸς ἀναφορὰν ἀπεκδοτών). According to C. Müller our Guardafui is called by the natives Rds Aser; their Rds Jardafun being a point some 12

1516.—"And that the said ships from his ports (K. of Coulam's) shall not go inwards from the Strait and Cape of Guardafui, nor go to Adem, except when employed in our obedience and service... and if any vessel or Zamboue is found inward of the Cape of Guardafui it shall be taken as good prize of war."—Treaty between Lopo Soares and the K. of Coulam, in Botelho, Tombo, 33.

"After passing this place (Afunt) the next after it is Cape Guardafui, where the coast ends, and trends so as to double towards the Red Sea."—Barboza, 16.

c. 1530.—"This province, called of late Arabia, but which the ancients called Trepitrica, begins at the Red Sea and the country of the Abissines, and finishes at Magadaso... others say it extends only to the Cape of Guardafui."—Sommario de' Regni, in Ramusio, i. 325.

1558.—"Vicente Sordi, being despatched by the King, touched at the Island of Cocotora, where he took in water, and thence passed to the Cape of Guardafui, which is the most easterly land of Africa."—De Barros, i. vii. cap. 2.

1554.—"If you leave Debl from the end of the season, you direct yourselves W.S.W. till the pole is four inches and an eighth, from thence true west to Kardafun."—Sidi 'Ali Kapudan, The Mokhit, in J. As. Soc. Beng., v. 464.

1602.—"Eitor da Silveira set out, and without any mishap arrived at the Cape of Guardafui."—Condo, IV. i. 4.

1797.—"And having now travell'd along the Shore of the Continent, from the Cape of Good Hope to Cape Guardafoy, I'll survey the Islands that lie in the Ethiopian Sea."—A. Hamilton, i. 15; [ed. 1744].

1790.—"The Portuguese, or Venetians, the first Christian traders in these parts, have called it Gardafui, which has no signification in any language. But in that part of the country where it is situated, it is called Gardefun and means the Straits of Burial, the reason of which will be seen afterwards."—Bruce's Travels, i. 315.

[1825.—"... we soon obtained sight of Cape Gardafui... It is called by the natives Ras Asure, and the high mountain immediately to its south is named Gibe Jordafon... Keeping about nine miles off shore we rounded the peninsula of Hafon... Hafon appears like an island, and belongs to a native Somaull prince..."
—Owen, Narr. i. 353.

GUAVA, a. This fruit (Psidium Guayava, L., Ord. Myrtaceae; Span. guayava, Fr. goyavi, [from Brazilian guayaba, Stanf. Dict.], Guayabo pomifera Indica of Caspar Bauhin, Guayava of Joh. Bauhin, strangely appears by name in Elliot's translation from Amir Khosrú, who flourished in the 13th century: "He who has placed only guavas and quinces in his throat, and has never eaten a plantain, will say it is like so much jujube" (iii. 556). This must be due to some ambiguous word carelessly rendered. The fruit and its name are alike American. It appears to be the guaiabo of Oviedo in his History of the Indies (we use the Italian version in Ramusio, iii. f. 141v). There is no mention of the guava in either De Orta or Acosta. Amrud, which is the commonest Hindustani (Pers.) name for the guava, means properly 'a pear'; but the fruit is often called safarí dm, 'journey mango' (respecting which see under ANANAS). And this last term is sometimes vulgarly corrupted into suparti dm (areca-mango!). In the Deccan (according to Moodeen Sheriff) and all over Guzerat and the Central Provinces (as we are informed by M.-Gen. Keatinge), the fruit is called jám, Mahr. jamba, which is in Bengal the name of Syzygium jambolanum (see JAMOON), and in Guzeráti jadmird, which seems to be a factitious word in imitation of amrud.

The guava, though its claims are so inferior to those of the pine-apple (indeed except to stew, or make jelly, it is nobis judicibus, an utter impostor), [Sir Joseph Hooker annotates: "You never ate good ones!"] must have spread like that fruit with great rapidity. Both appear in Blochmann's transl. of the Ain (i. 64) as served at Akbar's table; though when the guava is named among the fruits of Tūrān, doubts again arise as to the fruit intended, for the word used, amrādat, is ambiguous. In 1688 Dampier mentions guavas at Archin, and in Cochin China. The tree, like the custard-apple, has become wild in some parts of India. See Davidson, below.

c. 1550.—“The guava is like a peach-tree, with a leaf resembling the laurel . . . the red are better than the white, and are well-flavoured.”—Girod. Benoni, p. 88.

1658.—There is a good cut of the guava, as guayaba, in Fiso, pp. 152-3.

1673. — “. . . flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Cocos, Guavas, a kind of Pear.”—Fryer, 40.

1676.—“The N.W. part is full of Guava Trees of the greatest variety, and their Fruit the largest and best tasted I have met with.”—Dampier, ii. 107.

1685.—“The Guava . . . when the Fruit is ripe, it is yellow, soft, and very pleasant. It bakes well as a Pear.”—Ibid. i. 222.

c. 1750-60.—“Our guides too made us distinguish a number of goyava, and especially plum-trees.”—Grose, i. 20.

1764. — “A wholesome fruit the ripened guava yields, Boast of the housewife.”

Grainger, Bk. i.

1843.—“On some of these extensive plains (on the Mohur R. in Oudh) we found large orchards of the wild Guava . . . strongly resembling in their rough appearance the pear-trees in the hedges of Worcestershire.”

-Col. C. J. Davidson, Diary of Travels, ii. 271.

Gubber. s. This is some kind of gold ducat or sequin; Milburn says ‘a Dutch ducat.’ It may have adopted this special meaning, but could hardly have arrived at it, the date of our first quotation. The name is probably gabr (dindar-i-gabr), implying its being of infidel origin.

c. 1590.—“Mirza Jani Beg Sultān made this agreement with his soldiers, that every one who should bring in an enemy’s head should receive 500 gabars, every one of them worth 12 mirā . . . of which 72 went to one tanka.”—Tārīkh-i-Tāhirī, in Elliot, i. 287.

1711. — “Rupees are the most current Coin; they have Venetians, Gubbers, Mugerbees, and Pagodas.”—Lockyer, 201.

1782.—“Gold and Silver Weights:

Brooks, Weights and Measures.

Gubbow, v. To bully, to dumbfound, and perturb a person. Made from ghabrā, the imperative of ghabrān. The latter, though sometimes used transitively, is more usually neuter, ‘to be dumbfounded and perturbed.’

Gudda, s. A donkey, literal and metaphorical. H. gadda: [Skt. gadd-abha, ‘the roarer’]. The coincidence of the Scotch cuddy has been attributed to a loan from H. through the gypsies, who were the chief owners of the animal in Scotland, where it is not common. On the other hand, this is ascribed to a nickname Cuddy (for Cuthbert), like the English Neddy, similarly applied. [So the N.E.D. with hesitation.] A Punjab proverbial phrase is gaddān khūrki, “Donkeys’ rubbing” their sides together, a sort of ‘claw me and I’ll claw thee.’

Guddy, Gudde, s. H. gaddi, Mahr. gaddi. ‘The Throne.’ Properly it is a cushion, a throne in the Oriental sense, i.e. the seat of royalty, “a simple sheet, or mat, or carpet on the floor, with a large cushion or pillow at the head, against which the great man reclines” (Wilson). “To be placed on the guddas” is to succeed to the kingdom. The word is also used for the pad placed on an elephant’s back.

1809.—“Seendhiya was seated nearly in the centre, on a large square cushion covered with gold brocade; his back supported by a round bolster, and his arms resting upon two flat cushions; all covered with the same costly material, and forming together a kind of throne, called a musnud, or guddees.”—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1882, p. 28]

Gudge, s. P.—H. gaz, and corr. gaj; a Persian yard measure or thereabouts; but in India applied to measures of very varying lengths, from the hād, or natural cubit, to the English yard. In the Ain [ed. Jarrett, ii. 58 seqq.] Abul Fazl details numerous gaz which had been in use under the Caliphs or in India, varying from 18 inches English (as calculated by still goes on at Pondicherry.] These are presumably the Negroes-tucher of Baldaeus (1672), p. 154.

[1675.—"Guinea-stuffs," in Birdwood, ut supra.]

1726.—We find in a list of cloths purchased by the Dutch Factory at Porto Novo, Guinea Lyvraat, and Negro-Kleederen ('Guinea linens and Negro's clothing').—See Valentijn, Chorom. 9.

1813.—"The demand for Surat piece-goods has been much decreased in Europe . . . and from the abolition of the slave trade, the demand for the African market has been much reduced . . . Guinea stuffs, 44 yards each (per ton) 1200 (pieces)."—Mills, i. 289.

1878.—"The chief trades of Pondicherry are, spinning, weaving and dyeing the cotton stuffs known by the name of Guinessas."—Garatia, Man. of S. Arcot, 426.

GUINEA-DEER, s. An old name for some species of Chevrotain, in the quotation probably the Tragulus membina or Mouse Deer (Bianford, Mammalia, 555).

[1755.—"Common deer they have here (in Ceylon) in great abundance, and also Guinea Deer."—Ives, 57.]

GUINEA-FOWL. There seems to have been, in the 16th century, some confusion between turkeys and Guinea-fowl. See however under TURKEY. The Guinea-fowl is the Melaugris of Aristotle and others, the Afro avis of Horace.

GUINEA-PIG, s. This was a nickname given to midshipmen or apprentices on board Indiamen in the 18th century, when the command of such a vessel was a sure fortune, and large fees were paid to the captain with whom the youngsters embarked. Admiral Smyth, in his Sailor's Handbook, 1867, defines: 'The younger midshipmen of an Indianman.'

[1779.—"I promise you, to me it was no slight penance to be exposed during the whole voyage to the half sneering, satirical looks of the mates and guinea-pigs."—Macintosh, Travels, quoted in Carlyle, Old Days, i. 73.]

GUINEA-WORM, s. A parasitic worm (Pilaria Medicinis) inhabiting the subcutaneous cellular tissue of man, frequently in the leg, varying from 6 inches to 12 feet in length, and common on the Pers. Gulf, in Upper Egypt, Guinea, &c. It is found in some parts of W. India. "I have known," writes M.-Gen. Keatinge, "villages where half the people were maimed by it after the rains. Maturga, the Head Quarters of the Bombay Artillery, was abandoned, in great measure, on account of this pest." [It is the disease most common in the Damoh District (O. P. Gazetteer, 176, Sleeman, Rambles, &c., ed. V. A. Smith, i. 94). It is the reptilia, reptilia of Central Asia (Schuyler, Turkistan, i. 147; Wolff, Travels, ii. 407).] The reason of the name is shown by the quotation from Purchas respecting its prevalence in Guinea. The disease is graphically described by Agatharchides in the first quotation.

B.C. c. 113.—"Those about the Red Sea who are stricken with a certain malady, as Agatharchides relates, besides being afflicted with thirst, fever, and other symptoms, of which one is that small snake-like worms (σπακρωτοι) eat through the legs and arms, and peep out, but when touched instantly shrink back again, and winding among the burns produce intolerable burning pains."—In Dubner's ed. of Plutarch, iv. 872, v. 1. Table Discussions. Bk. VIII. Quest. ix. 3.

1600.—"The worms in the legs and other parts of the body are not only one that goeth to these Countreys, but some are troubled with them and some are not."—(a full account of the disease follows).—Desc. of Guinea, in Purchas, ii. 963.

1630.—"But for their water ... I may call it Aqua Mortis ... it engenders small long worms in the legs of such as use to drink it ... by no potion, no unguent to be remedied: they have no other way to destroy them, but by rowing them about a pin or peg, not unlike the trouble of Thesibor."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 128.

1645.—"... nor obliged to drink of those naughty waters ... full of nastiness of so many people and beasts ... that do cause such fevers, which are very hard to cure, and which breed also certain very dangerous worms in the legs ... they are commonly of the bigness and length of a small Vial; string ... and they must be drawn out little by little, from day to day, gently winding them about a little twig about the bigness of a needle, for fear of breaking them."—Bernier, E.T. 114; [ed. Constable, 365].

1774.—"See an account of this pest under the name of "le per des vers" (Vena Medinæmisa)," in Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, 117. The name given by Niebuhr is, as we learn from Kaempfer's remarks, arak Medis, the Medina nerve (rather than vein).

1821.—"The doctor himself is just going off to the Cape, half-dead from the Kotah fever; and, as if that were not enough, the naroon, or guinea-worm, has blanched his cheek and made him a cripple."—Tod, Annals, ed. 1864, ii. 743.

GUM-GUM. s. We had supposed this word to be an invention of the late Charles Dickens, but it seems to be a real Indian, or Anglo-Indian, word. The nearest approximation in Shakespeare's Dict. is gamak, 'sound of the kettledrum.' But the word is perhaps a Malay plural of gong originally; see the quotation from Osbeck. [The quotations from Bowdich and Medley (from Scott, Malay Words, p. 53) perhaps indicate an African origin.]

1869.—"... the roar of great guns, the sounding of trumpets, the beating of drums, and the noise of the gomgomen of the Indians."—From the account of the Dutch attack (1659) on a village in Ceram, given in Wonder Schouten, Reislogi naer en door Oost-Indië, 4th ed. 1775, i. 56. In the Dutch version, "en het geruas van de gomgomen der Indiëkers." The French of 1707 (i. 92) has "au bruit du canon, des trompettes, des tambour et des gomgomen Indiennes."

1731.—"One of the Hottentot Instruments of Music is common to several Negro Nations, and is called both by Negroes and Hottentots—a Bow of Iron, or Olive Wood, strung with twisted Sheep-Gut or Sinews."—Medley, tr. Kolben's Cape of Good Hope, i. 271.]

GUNGE, a Hind. ganj, 'a store, store-house, market.'

1762. — See under GOMASTA.

1772. — "Gunge, a market principally for grain." — Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss. s.v.

[1858. — "The term Gunge signifies a range of buildings at a place of traffic, for the accommodation of merchants and all persons engaged in the purchase and sale of goods, and for that of their goods and of the shopkeepers who supply them." — Slemman, Journey through Oudh, i. 278.]

GUNJA, a Hind. ganjah, ganja. The flowering or fruiting shoots of the female plant of Indian hemp (Cannabis sativa, L., formerly distinguished as C. indica), used as an intoxicant. (See BANG.)

[1813. — "The natives have two proper names for the hemp (Cannabis sativa), and call it Ganja when young, and Siddhi when the flowers have fully expanded." — Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 885.]

1874. — "In odour and the absence of taste, ganja resembles bhang. It is said that after the leaves which constitute bhang have been gathered, little shoots sprout from the stem, and that these, picked off and dried, form what is called ganja." — Hanbury d. Flüchter, 498.

GUNNY, GUNNY-BAG, a. From Skt. gopi, 'a sack'; Hind. and Mahr. goz, gosi, 'a sack, sacking.' The popular and trading name of the coarse sacking and sacks made from the fibre of jute, much used in all Indian trade. Jute is a common Hind. name for the stuff. [With this word Sir G. Birdwood identifies the forms found in the old records — "Gunny Stuffs (1871)." "Ginny stuffs," "Guinea stuffs," "Gunny" (Rep. on Old Records, 26, 38, 39, 294); but see under GUINEA-CLOTHES.]

1590. — "Siroor Ghoraghat produces raw silk, gunnys, and plenty of Tanghion horses." — Gladwin's Ayen, ed. 1800, ii. 9; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 123. (But here, in the original, the term is parookh-i-fatiband.)

1863. — "Besides the aforesaid articles Gouzy-sacks are collected at Patioli." — Hazari (3), 14.

1711. — "When Sugar is pack'd in double Gunays, the outer Bag is always valued in Contract at 1 or 1½ Shacker." — Lockyer, 244.

1726. — In a list of goods procurable at Duatterom: "Gouzy-sakken (Gunny bags)." — Valentinj, Chor. 40.

1727. — "Sheldon ... put on board some rotten long Pepper, that he could dispose of in no other Way, and some damaged Gunnyes, which are much used in Persia for embaling Goods, when they are good in their kind." — A. Hamilton, ii. 15; [ed. 1744].

1764. — "Baskets, Gunny bags, and dabbers ... Rs. 24." — In Long, 384.

1785. — "We enclose two parvanes ... directing them each to despatch 1000 gunnies of grain to that person of mighty degree." — Tippoos Letters, 171.

1835. — "The land was so covered with them (gloves) that the hunters shot them with all kind of arms. We counted 80 birds in the gunny-sack that three of the soldiers brought in." — Boots and Saddles, by Mrs. Oster, p. 37. (American work.)

GUNTA, a. Hind. gane, 'a bell or gong.' This is the common term for expressing an European hour in modern Hindustani. [See PANDY.]

15 GUP, a. Idle gossip. P. — H. gap, 'prattle, tattle.' The word is perhaps an importation from Târân. Vámberi gives Orient. Turki gip, gîb, 'word, saying, talk'; which, however, Pavot de Courteille suggests to be a corruption from the Pers. guftân, 'to say'; of which, indeed, there is a form guftan. [So Platta, who also compares Skt. jālopa, which is the Bengali golpo, 'babble.'] See quotation from Schuyler showing the use in Turkistan. The word is perhaps best known in England through an unamiable account of society in S.
India, published under the name of "Gup," in 1868.

1809-10.—"They (native ladies) sit on their cushions from day to day, with no... amusement than hearing the 'gup-gup,' or gossip of the place."—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 357.

1878.—"The first day of mourning goes by the name of gup, i.e. commemorative talk."—Schuyler's Pakistan, i. 151.

GUREEBPURWAR, GUREEB-NUWAUZ, ss. Ar.—P. Ghariyapurwar, Ghariuhuwa, used in Hind. as respectful terms of address, meaning respectively 'Provider of the Poor' 'Cherisher of the Poor!'

1726.—"Those who are of equal condition bend the body somewhat towards each other, and lay hold of each other by the beard, saying Grah-amans, i.e. I wish you the prayers of the poor."—Valentijn, Chron. 109, who copies from Van Twist (1643), p. 55.

1824.—"I was appealed to by both parties, the soldiers calling on me as 'Gureeep purwar,' the Goomasha, not to be outdone, exclaiming 'Donai, Lord Sahib! Donai! Rajah!'" (Read Dooij and see DOAI).—Heber, i. 266. See also p. 279.

1867.—"'Protector of the poor!' he cried, prostrating himself at my feet, 'help thy most unworthy and wretched slave!' An unblest and evil-minded alligator has this day devoured my little daughter. She went down to the river to fill her earthen jar with water, and the evil one dragged her down, and has devoured her. Alas! she had on her old benglee. (Iwat is my Oori).—Bhadrar, pp. 137-140.

GURJAUT, n.p. The popular and official name of certain forest tracts at the back of Orissa. The word is a hybrid, being the Hind. garh, 'a fort,' Persianised into a plural garhādā, in ignorance of which we have seen, in quasi-official documents, the use of a further English plural, Gurjauts or garhādā, which is like 'fortesia.' [In the quotation below, the writer seems to think it a name of a class of people.] This manner of denominating such tracts from the isolated occupation by fortified posts seems to be very ancient in that part of India. We have in Ptolemy and the Periplus Dusares or Dassares, apparently representing Skt. Dakarṇa, quasi dakāra riṇa, 'having Ten Forts,' which the lists of the Brhat Sanhitā show us in this part of India (J.R. As. Soc., N.S., v. 83). The forest tract behind Orissa is called in the grant of an Orissa king, Nava Koti, 'the Nine Forts' (J.A.S.B. xxxiii. 84); and we have, in this region, further in the interior, the province of Chattragarh, '36 Forts.'

1820.—"At present nearly one half of this extensive region is under the immediate jurisdiction of the British Government; the other possessed by tributary zemindars called Ghurjants, or hill chiefs..."—Hamilton, Description of Hindustan, ii. 32.

GURJU.

a. A little fort; Hind. garh. Also Gurt, i.e. garh, 'a fort.'

b. See GURJU.

GUTTA PERCHA.

1698.—"... many of his Heathen Nobles, only such as were befriended by strong Gurt, or Fastnesses upon the Mountains..."—Fryer, 165.

1786.—"... The Zemindars in 4 gur-nahs are so refractory as to have forfeited (read fortified) themselves in their gurries, and to refuse all payments of revenue."—Articles against W. Hastings, in Burke, vii. 59.

1835.—"A shot was at once fired upon them from a high Ghurree."—Forbes, Ras Móda, ed. 1878, p. 521.

GUTTA PERCHA, a. This is the Malay name Gutah Perti, i.e. 'Sap of the Percha,' Dichopis Gutta, Benth: (Isomandra Gutta, Hooker; O.N. Sapotaceae). Dr. Oxley writes (J. Ind. Archiv. i. 22) that percha is properly the name of a tree which produces a spurious article; the real gutta p. is produced by the tabau. [Mr. Maxwell (Ind. Ant. xvii. 358) points out that the proper reading is taban.] The product was first brought to notice in 1843 by Dr. Montgomery. It is collected by first ringing the tree and then felling it, and no doubt by this process the article will speedily become extinct. The history of G. P. is, however, far from well known. Several trees are known to contribute to the exported article; their juices being mixed together. [Mr. Scott (Malay Words, 55 seqq.) writes the word getah percha, or getah perchah, 'gum of percha,' and remarks that it has been otherwise explained as meaning 'gum of Sumatra,' 'there being another word percha, a name of Sumatra, as well as a third word percha, 'a rag, a remnant.' Mr. Maxwell (loc. cit.) writes: 'It is still uncertain whether there is a gutta-producing tree called Percha by the Malays. My experience is that they give the name of Percha to that kind of getah taban which hardens into strips in boiling. These are stuck together and made into balls for export."

[1847.—"Gutta Percha is a remarkable example of the rapidity with which a really useful invention becomes of importance to the English public. A year or two ago it was almost unknown, but now its peculiar properties are daily being made more available in some new branch of the useful or ornamental arts."—Mundy, Journal, in Narrative of Events in Borneo and Celebes, ii. 342 seq. (quoted by Scott, loc. cit.)]

1868.—"The late Mr. d'Almeida was the first to call the attention of the public to the substance now so well known as gutta-percha. At that time the Iasandra Gutta was an abundant tree in the forests of Singapore, and was first known to the Malays, who made use of the juice which they obtained by cutting down the trees.... Mr. d'Almeida... acting under the advice of a friend, forwarded some of the substance to the Society of Arts. There it met with no immediate attention, and was put away uncered. A year or two afterwards Dr. Montgomery sent specimens to England, and bringing it under the notice of competent persons, its value was at once acknowledged.... The sudden and great demand for it soon resulted in the disappearance of all the gutta-percha trees on Singapore Island."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 298-9.

"GUZZY, s. Pers. and Hind. gazi; perhaps from its having been woven of a gas (see GUDGE) in breadth. A very poor kind of cotton cloth.

1701.—In a price list for Persia we find: "Gassies Bengalees."—Valentijn, v. 303.

1784.—"It is suggested that the following articles may be proper to compose the first adventure (to Tibet):... Gussies, or coarse Cotton Cloths, and Otterskins."—Seton-Karr, i. 4.

[1866.—"... common unbleached fabrics... used for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead.... These fabrics in Bengal pass under the names of Gurka and Gussies."—Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 83.]

GWALIOR, n.p. Hind. Guddla. A very famous rock-fortress of Upper India, rising suddenly and picturesquely out of a plain (or shallow valley rather) to a height of 300 feet, 65 m. south of Agra, in lat. 26° 13'. Gwalior may be traced back, in Gen. Cunningham's opinion, to the 3rd century of our era. It was the seat of several ancient Hindu dynasties, and from the time of the early Mahommedan sovereigns of Delhi down to the reign of Aurangzib it was used as a state-prison. Early in the 18th century it fell into the possession of the Mahatta family of Sindhis, whose residence was established to the south of the fortress, in what was originally a camp, but has long been a city known by the original title of Lashkar (camp). The older city lies below the northern foot of the rock. Gwalior has been three times taken by British arms: (1) escaladed by a force under the command of Major Popham in 1780, a very daring feat;* (2) by a regular attack under Gen. White in 1805; (3) most gallantly in June 1868, by a party of the 26th Bombay N. I. under Lieutenants Rose and Waller, in which the former officer fell. After the two first captures the fortress was restored to the Sindhis. From 1858 it was retained in our hands, but in December 1885 it was formally restored to the Maharaja Sindhis.

The name of the fortress, according to Gen. Cunningham (Archaeol. Survey, ii. 335), is derived from a small Hindū shrine within it dedicated to the hermit Gudi or Gudda-pag, after whom the fortress received the name of Guali-dwar, contracted into Guali.

[1302.—"From Kanaúj, in travelling south-east, on the western side of the Ganges, you come to Jagatpūt, at a distance of 30 parasangs, of which the capital is Kajurīha. In that country are two forts of Guddli and Kalinar...."—At-Bīrštān, in Elliot, i. 57-8.

1196.—The royal army marched "towards Gālīwār and invested that fort, which is the pearl of the necklace of the castles of Hind, the summit of which the nimble-footed wind from below cannot reach, and on the bastions of which the clouds have never cast their shade...."—Husain Nameš, in Elliot, ii. 227.

[1340.—"The castle of Gālītār, of which we have been speaking, is on the top of a high hill, and appears, so to speak, as if it were itself cut out of the rock. There is no other hill adjoining; it contains reservoirs

*"The two companies which escaladed were led by Captain Bruce, a brother of the Abyssinian traveller. "It is said that the spies were sent out to Popham by a coward, and that the whole of the attacking party were supplied with grass shoes to prevent them from slipping on the ledges of the rock. There is a story also that the cost of these grass shoes was deducted from Popham's pay, when he was about to leave India as a major-general, nearly a quarter of a century afterwards."

—Cunningham, Arch. Surv. ii. 340.
of water, and some 20 wells walled round are attached to it: on the walls are mounted mangonels and catapults. The fortress is ascended by a wide road traversed by elephants and horses. Near the castle-gate is the figure of an elephant carved in stone, and surmounted by a figure of the driver. Seeing it from a distance one has no doubt about its being a real elephant. At the foot of the fortress is a fine city, entirely built of white stone, mosques and houses after; there is no timber to be seen in it, except that of the gates."—Tom Bataua, ii. 193.

1526.—"I entered Guallar by the Hati-pul gate. They call an elephant addi, and a gate pdl. On the outside of this gate is the figure of an elephant, having two elephant drivers on it. . . ."—Baber, p. 388.

[c. 1690.—"Guallar is a famous fort, in which are many stately buildings, and there is a stone elephant over the gate. The air and water of this place are both esteemed good. It has always been celebrated for fine singers and beautiful women. . . ."—Ayes, Gladwin, ed. 1800, ii. 38; ed. Jarrett, ii. 181.]

1610.—"The 31 to Gwalieri, 6 c., a pleasant City with a Castle. . . . On the West side of the Castle, which is a steep craggy cliff of 6 c. compass at least (diver say eleven). . . . From hence to the top, leads a narrow stone caseway, walled on both sides; in the way are three gates to be passed, all exceeding strong, with Courts of guard to each. At the top of all, at the entrance of the last gate, standeth a mighty Elephant of stone very curiously wrought. . . ."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 428-7.

1616.—"23. Gwalier, the chief City so called, where the Mogul hath a very rich Treasury of Gold and Silver kept in this City, within an exceeding strong Castle, wherein the King's Prisoners are likewise kept. The Castle is continually guarded by a very strong Company of Armed Souldiers."—Terry, ed. 1655, p. 356.

[c. 1665.—"For to shut them up in Gousaleor, which is a Fortress where the Princes are ordinarily kept close, and which is held impresible, it being situated upon an inaccessible Rock, and having within itself good water, and provision enough for a Garrison; that was not an easie thing."—Bernier, E.T. 5; [ed. Constable, 14].

c. 1670.—"Since the Mahometan Kings became Masters of this Country, this Fortress of Gousaleor is the place where they secure Princes and great Noblemen. Gousaleor being to the Empire by foul-play, caused all the Princes and Lords whom he mistrusted, to be seiz'd one after another, and sent them to the Fortress of Gousaleor; but he suffer'd them all to live and enjoy their estates. Aureng-zeb his Son acts quite otherwise; for when he sends any great Lord to this place, at the end of nine or ten days he orders him to be poison'd; and this he does that the people may not exclaim against him for a bloody Prince."—Tattieurt, E.T. ii. 32; [ed. Ball, i. 63].

GYAL (properly GAYAL), [Skt. go, 'an ox'], a. A large animal (Gavisus frontalis, Jerd., Bos f. Blanford, Mammalia, 487) of the ox tribe, found wild in various forest tracts to the east of India. It is domesticated by the Mislims of the Assam valley, and other tribes as far south as Chittagong. In Assam it is called Mithan.

[c. 1590.—In Arakan, "cows and buffaloes there are none, but there is an animal which has somewhat of the characteristics of both, piebald and particoloured whose milk the people drink."—Ats, ed. Jarrett, ii. 119.]

1824.—"In the park several uncommon animals are kept. Among them the Ghylal, an animal of which I had not, to my recollection, read any account, though the name was not unknown to me. It is a very noble creature, of the ox or buffalo kind, with immensely large horns. . . ."—Heber, i. 34.

1886-87.—"I was awakened by an extraordinary noise, something between a bull's bellow and a railway whistle. What was it? We started to our feet, and Fuziah and I were looking to our arms when Adupah said, 'It is only the gyalal calling; Sahib! Look, the dawn is just breaking, and they are opening the village gates for the beasts to go out to pasture.' "

"These gyalals were beautiful creatures, with broad fronts, sharp wide-spread horns, and mild melancholy eyes. They were the indigenous cattle of the hills domesticated by these equally wild Lushais . . ."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, &c., p. 303.

GYELONG, a. A Buddhist priest in Tibet. Tib. dGyel-long, t.e. beggar of virtue, i.e. a bhikshu or mendicant friar (see under BUKE); but latterly a priest who has received the highest orders. See Jaeschke, p. 86.

1784.—"He was dressed in the festival habit of a gyelong or priest, being covered with a scarlet satin cloak, and a gilded mitre on his head."—Bogle, in Martham's Tibet, 25.

GYM-KHANA, a. This word is quite modern, and was unknown 40 years ago. The first use that we can trace is (on the authority of Major John Trotter) at Rûkî in 1861, when a gymkhana was instituted there. It is a factitious word, invented, we believe, in the Bombay Presidency, and probably based upon gend-khana (ball-house) ; the name usually given in Hind. to an English racket-court. It is applied to a place of public resort at a station, where the needful facilities for athletics and games of sorts are provided, including (when that was in fashion) a skating-rink, a lawn-tennis ground, and so forth. The gym may have been simply a corruption of gend shaped by gymnastics, [of which the English public school short form gym passed into Anglo-Indian jargon]. The word is also applied to a meeting for such sports; and in this sense it has travelled already as far as Malta, and has since become common among Englishmen abroad. [The suggestion that the word originated in the P.—H. jamda't-khana, 'a place of assemblage,' is not probable.]

1877. — "Their proposals are that the Cricket Club should include in their programme the games, &c., proposed by the promoters of a gynkhana Club, so far as not to interfere with cricket, and should join in making a rink and lawn-tennis, and badminton courts, within the cricket-ground enclosure."—Pioneer Mail, Nov. 3.

1879. — "Mr. A——F——can always be depended on for epigram, but not for accuracy. In his letters from Burma he talks of the Gynkhana at Rangoon as a sort of establishment [sic] where people have pleasant little dinners. In the 'Oriental Arcadia,' which Mr. F——tells us is flavoured with naughtiness, people may do strange things, but they do not dine at Gynkhana."—Ibid. July 2.

1881. — "R. E. Gynkhana at Malta, for Polo and other Ponies, 2oth June, 1881."—Heading in Royal Engineer Journal, Aug. 1, p. 159.

1888. — "I am not speaking of Bombay people with their clubs and gynkhanas and other devices for oiling the wheels of existence..."—Tribes on My Frontier, 9.

GYNEE, s. H. gaini. A very diminutive kind of cow bred in Bengal. It is, when well cared for, a beautiful creature, is not more than 3 feet high, and affords excellent meat. It is mentioned by Aelian:

c. 250. — "There are other bullocks in India, which to look at are no bigger than the largest goats; these also are yoked, and run very swiftly."—De Nat. Anim., xvi. 24.

c. 1690. — "There is also a species of oxen called gaini, small like gat (see GOONT) horses, but very beautiful."—Atis, i. 149.

[1829.—"... I found that the said tiger had feasted on a more delicious morsel,—a nice little Ghines, a small cow."—Mem. of John Shipp, iii. 182.]

1882.—"We have become great farmers, having sown our crop of oats, and are building outhouses to receive some 34 dwarf cows and oxen (gynees) which are to be fed up for the table."—F. Parkes, Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 251.

H

HACKERY, s. In the Bengal Presidency this word is now applied only to the common native bullock-cart used in the slow draught of goods and materials. But formerly in Bengal, as still in Western India and Ceylon, the word was applied to lighter carriages (drawn by bullocks) for personal transport. In Broughton's Letters from a Maharatta Camp (p. 156; [ed. 1892, p. 117]) the word is used for what in Upper India is commonly called an ekka (q.v.), or light native pony-carriage; but this is an exceptional application. Though the word is used by Englishmen almost universally in India, it is unknown to natives, or if known is regarded as an English term; and its origin is exceedingly obscure. The word seems to have originated on the west side of India, where we find it in our earliest quotations. It is probably one of those numerous words which were long in use, and undergoing corruption by illiterate soldiers and sailors, before they appeared in any kind of literature. Wilson suggests a probable Portuguese origin, e.g. from acarretar, 'to convey in a cart.' It is possible that the mere Portuguese article and noun a carreta might have produced the Anglo-Indian hackery. Thus in Correa, under 1513, we have a description of the Surat hackeries; "and the carriages (as carretas) in which he and the Portuguese travelled, were elaborately wrought, and furnished with silk hangings, covering them from the sun; and these carriages (as carretas) run so smoothly (the country consisting of level plains) that the people travelling in them sleep as tranquilly as on the ground" (ii. 369).

But it is almost certain that the origin of the word is the H. chakka, 'a two-wheeled cart'; and it may be noted that in old Singhalese chakka,
'a cart-wheel,' takes the forms haka and saka (see Kuhn, On Oldest Aryan Elements of Singhalese, translated by D. Ferguson in Indian Ant. xii. 64). [But this can have no connection with chikara, which represents Skt. sakata, 'a waggon.]

1673.—"The Coach wherein I was breaking, we were forced to mount the Indian Hackery, a Two-wheeled Chariot, drawn by swift little Oxen."—Fryer, 33. [For these swift oxen, see quot. from Forbes below, and from Aelian under GYNEE.]

1690.—"Their Hackeries likewise, which are a kind of Coach, with two Wheels, are all drawn by Oxen."—Osington, 264.

1711.—"The Streets (at Surat) are wide and commodious; otherwise the Hackeries, which are very common, would be an Inconvenience. These are a sort of Coaches drawn by a Pair of Oxen."—Lockyer, 259.

1742.—"The bridges are much worn, and out of repair, by the number of Hackeries and other carriages which are continually passing over them."—In Wheeler, iii. 262.

1756.—"The 11th of July the Nawab arrived in the city, and with him Bundo Sing, to whose house we were removed that afternoon in a Hackery."—Holwell, in Wheeler's Early Rings, 249.

c. 1760.—"The hackness are a conveyance drawn by oxen, which would at first give an idea of slowness that they do not deserve . . . they are open on three sides, covered a-top, and are made to hold two people sitting cross-legged."—Grose, i. 155-156.

1780.—"A hackery is a small covered carriage upon two wheels drawn by bullocks, and used generally for the female part of the family."—Hodges, Travels, 5.

c. 1790.—"Quant aux palankins et hackaries (voitures à deux roues), on les passe sur une double sangle" (see ANGEL).—Haufray, ii. 173.

1798.—"To be sold by Public Auction . . . a new Fashioned Hackery."—Bombay Courier, April 13.

1798.—"At half-past six o'clock we each got into a hackery."—Statorius, tr. by Wilcox, iii. 296.

1811.—Solvyns draws and describes the Hackery in the modern Bengali sense.

"Il y a cependant quelques endroits où l'on se sert de charrettes couvertes à deux roues, appelées hickeres, devant lesquelles on attelle des bœufs, et qui servent à voyager."—Editor of Haufray, Voyages, ii. 3.

1819.—"Travelling in a light hackeree, at the rate of five miles an hour."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 376; [2nd ed. ii. 352; in i. 150], hackeries, ii. 283, hackreas]. Forbes's engraving represents such an ox-carriage as would be called in Bengal a bâli (see BYLES).

1829.—"The genuine vehicle of the country is the hackery. This is a sort of woe tent, covered more or less with tinsel and scarlet, and bells and gilding, and placed upon a clumsy two-wheeled carriage with a pole that seems to be also a kind of boot, as it is at least a foot deep. This is drawn by a pair of white bullocks."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 94.

1830.—"Native gentlemen, driving fast trotting oxen in little hackery carts, hastened home from it."—Tennant's Ceylon, ii. 140.

[HADDY, a. A grade of troops in the Mogul service. According to Prof. Blochmann (Ains, i. 20, note) they corresponded to our "Warranted officers."]

"Most clerks of the Imperial offices, the painters of the Court, the foremen in Akbar's workshops, &c., belonged to this corps. They were called Ahadis, or single men, because they stood under Akbar's immediate orders." And Mr. Irvine writes: "Midway between the nobles or leaders (man-sabdd) with the horsemen under them (tubind) on the one hand, and the Akhmd (see EBZABM), or infantry, artillery, and artificers on the other, stood the Ahadi, or gentleman trooper. The word is literally 'single' or 'alone' (A. ahad, 'one'). It is easy to see why this name was applied to them; they offered their services singly, they did not attach themselves to any chief, thus forming a class apart from the tubind; but as they were horsemen, they stood equally apart from the specialised services included under the remaining head of Akhmd." (J. R. As. Soc., July 1896, p. 545.)

[c. 1590.—"Some soldiers are placed under the care and guidance of one commander. They are called Ahadis, because they are fit for a harmonious unity."—Ains, ed. Blochmann, i. 231.

[1618.—"The Prince's Haddy . . . betrayed me."—Sir T. Ros, Hak. Soc. ii. 388.

[1817.—"A Haddy of horse sent down to see it effected."—Ibid. ii. 450.

[c. 1625.—"The day after, one of the King's Haddys finding the same."—Coryat, in Purchas, i. 800.]

HADGEE, a. Ar. Ḥājī, a pilgrim to Mecca; from Ḥāj, the pilgrimage, or visit to a venerated spot. Hence Ḥājī and Ḥājī used colloquially in Persian and Turkish. Prof. Robertson Smith writes: "There is current confusion about the word Ḥājī. It is originally the participle of Ḥāj, 'he went on the Ḥajj.' But in modern use Ḥājī is used as part., and Ḥājī is the title given to one who has made the pilgrimage. When this is prefixed to a name, the double j cannot be pronounced without inserting a short vowel and the a is shortened; thus you say 'el-Hojji Soleimân,' or the like. The incorrect form Hajji is however used by Turks and Persians."

[1609.—"Upon your order, if Hoğhee Caresen so please, I purpose to delive him 25 pigs of lead."—Dawers, Letters, i. 26.]

[c. 1810.—"Those who have been to Arabia . . . are called Agy."—Pyrrard de Lanal, Hak. Soc. i. 186.]

[c. 1655.—"Aureng-Zebe once observed perhaps by way of joke, that Sultan Sujâk was become at last an Agy or pilgrim."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 113.]

[1673.—"Hodge, a Pilgrimage to Mecca.
(See under A MUCK.)

1685.—"Hodges acquired this title from his having in his early years made a pilgrimage to Hođde (or the tomb of Mahommâde at Mecca)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 59.]

[c. 1833.—"The very word in Hebrew Khog, which means 'festival,' originally meant 'pilgrimage,' and corresponds with what the Arabs call hatch . . ."—Travels of Dr. Wolff, i. 156.]

HÁKIM, s. H. from Ar. hâkim, 'a judge, a ruler, a master'; 'the authority.' The same Ar. root hâm, briddling, restraining, judging,' supplies a variety of words occurring in this Glossary, viz. Hâkim (as here); Hakim (see HUCKEM); Hâm (see HOOKUM); Hîmat (see HICKMAT).

[1611.—"Not standing with his greatness to answer every Hâcânnan, which is as a Governor or petty King."—Dawers, Letters, i. 158. In ibid. i. 175, Hackann is used in the same way.]

1686.—"Hackum, a Governor."—Fryer's Index Explanatory.

[c. 1861.—"Then comes a settlement Hakim, to teach me to plough and weed—
I sowed the cotton he gave me—but first I boiled the seed . . ."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.]

HALÁLOCORE, s. Lit. Ar.—P. hâllâ-khôr, 'one who eats what is lawful,' [hâllâ being the technical Mahommedan phrase for the slaying of an animal to be used for food according to the proper ritual], applied euphemistically to a person of very low caste, a sweeper or scavenger, implying 'to whom all is lawful food.'

Generally used as synonymous with bungy (q.v.). [According to Prof. Blochmann, "Hâllâkhâr, i.e. one who eats that which the ceremonial law allows, is a euphemism for hardâmkhâr, one who eats forbidden things, as pork, &c. The word hâllâkhâr is still in use among educated Muhammadans; but it is doubtful whether (as stated in the Ain) it was Akbar's invention." (Ain, i. 139 note.)]

1623.—"Schiah Selim nel principio . . . si sdegno tanto, che poco mancò che per dispetto non la desse per forza in matrimonio ad uno della raza che chiamano halâl chor, quasi dice 'mangia leoto,' cioè che ha per lecito di mangiare ogni cosa.'" (See other quotation under HAREM).—P. della Valle, i. 525; [Hak. Soc. i. 54.]

1638.—". . . are obliged to purify themselves, whatever is the case."

1656.—"These who in the forepart of the Indes, the appellative Halâlocour, c'est à dire celui qui se donne la liberté de manger de tout ce qu'il lui plaît, ou, selon quelques uns, celui qui mange ce qui est de fâcheux gagné. Et ceux qui approuvent cette dernière explication, disent qu'autrefois Halâlocours s'appellent Haramours, mangeurs de Viande défendue."—Thenenot, v. 190.

1673.—"That they should be accounted the Offscum of the People, and as base as the Hollocours (whom they account so, because they defile themselves by eating forbidden things, &c.)—Fryer, 28; [and see under BOY, b.]

1690.—"The Halâchours . . . are another Sort of Indians at Suratf the most contemptible, but extremely necessary to be there."—Ovington, 382.

1763.—"And now I must mention the Hallachores, whom I cannot call a Tribe, being rather the refuse of all the Tribes. These are a set of poor unhappy wretches, destined to misery from their birth. . . ."—Reflexions, &c., by Luke Sraffen, Esq., 7-8.

It was probably in this passage that Burns (see below) picked up the word.

1783.—"That no Hollocore, Dara, or Chandala caste, shall upon any consideration come out of their houses after 9 o'clock in the morning, lest they should taint the air, or touch the superior Hindoos in the streets."—Maharatta Proclamation at Barock, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 292.

1836.—"When all my schoolfellows and youthful companions (those misguided few excepted who joined, to use a Gentoo phrase, the Hallachores of the human race) were striking off with eager hope and earnest intent, in some one or other of the many paths of a busy life, I was 'standing idle in the market-place.'"—Letter of Robert Burns, in A. Cunningham's ed. of Works and Life, vi. 68.
1788.—The Indian Vocabulary also gives Hallacore.

1810.—"For the meaner offices we have a Hallacor or Chandela (one of the most wretched Pariahs)."—Maria Graham, 31.

HALÁLLCUR. V. used in the imperative for infinitive, when it manner prescribed to Mahommedans, when it is to be used for food.

[1855.—"Before breakfast I bought a moderately sized sheep for a dollar. Shaykh Hamid 'halale' (butchered it according to rule. ..."—Burton, Pilgrimage, ed. 1883, i. 255.]

1883.—"The diving powers of the poor duck are exhausted. ...I have only ... to seize my booty, which has just enough of life left to allow Peer Khan to make it halal, by cutting its throat in the name of Allah, and diverting the webs of its feet."—Tribe on My Frontier, 167.

HALF-CASTE, a. A person of mixt European and Indian blood. (See MUSTEEs; EURASIAN.)

1789.—"Mulatooses, or as they are called in the East Indies, half-castes."—Muaro's Narrative, 61.

1798.—"They (the Mahatta Infantry) are commanded by half-caste people of Portuguese and French extraction, who draw off the attention of the spectators from the bad clothing of their men, by the profusion of antiquated lace bestowed on their own."—Dirom, Narrative, ii.

1809.—"The Padre, who is a half-cast Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ed. Valenti., i. 329.

1823.—"An invalid sergeant ... came, attended by his wife, a very pretty young half-caste."—Heber, i. 298.

1875.—"Othello is black—the very tragedy lies there; the whole force of the contrast, the whole pathos and extenuation of his doubts and Desdemona, depend on this blackness. Fachter makes him a half-caste."—G. H. Lewes, On Actors and the Art of Acting.

HANGER, a. The word in this form is not in Anglo-Indian use, but (with the Scotch whinger; Old Eng. whinyard, Fr. cangiar, &c., other forms of the same) may be noted here as a corruption of the Arab. khanjar, 'a dagger or short falchion.' This (vulg. cinjur) is the Indian form. [According to the N.E.D. though 'hanger' has sometimes been employed to translate khanjar (probably with a notion of etymological identity) there is no connection between the words.] The khanjar in India is a large double-edged dagger with a very broad base and a slight curve. [See drawings in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, pl. X. Nos. 504, 506, &c.]

1574.—"Patrick Spreull ... being persweit be John Beil Chepman ... in invadyng of him, and stryking him with ane whinger ... through the quhill the said Johnes neis was woundit to the effusion of his blude."—Eats. from Records of the Burgh of Glasgow (1876), p. 2.

1801.—"The other day I happened to enter into some discourse of a hanger, which I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship was most peremptory beautiful and gentlemanlike. ..."—B. Jonson, Every Man in His Humour, i. 4.

[1717.—"The 23rd ultimo, John Surman received from his Majesty a horse and a Cunder. ..."—In Wheeler, Early Records, 183.]

1781.—"I fancy myself now one of the most formidable men in Europe; a blunderbuss for Joe, a pair of double barrels to stick in my belt, and a cut and thrust hanger with a little pistol in the hilt, to hang by my side."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 56.

"...Lost out of a buggie on the Road between Barnagar and Calcutta, a steel mounted Hanger with a single guard."—Ricky's Bengal Gazette, June 30.

1888.—"... by favorable, the carpet-spreaders class, a large cangiar, or curved dagger, with a heavy ivory handle, is carried; less for use than as a badge of office."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.
HANSALERI, s. Table-servant's Hind. for 'horse-radish'; "A curious corruption, and apparently influenced by saleri, 'celery'; (Mr. M. L. Dames, in Panjab N. and Q. ii. 184).

HANSIL, s. A hawser, from the English (Roebuck).

HARAKIRI, s. This, the native name of the Japanese rite of suicide committed as a point of honour or substitute for judicial execution, has long been interpreted as "happy despatch," but what the origin of this curious error is we do not know. [The N.E.D. s.v. dispatch, says that it is humorous.] The real meaning is realistic in the extreme, viz., hara, 'belly,' kiri, 'to cut.'

[1688.—"And it is often scene that they rip their own bellies open."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 153.
[1615.—"His mother cut her own belly."—Foster, Letters, iv. 45.
[1616.—"Here we had news how Galsa Same was to passe this way to morrow to goe to a church near Miaco, called Cuye; som say to cut his bellie, others say to be shaven a priest and to rememne there the rest of his daie."—Cocks's Diary, i. 164.
[1617.—"The King demanded 800 tais from Schoeque Dono, or else to cut his belly, whom, not having it to pay, did it."—Ibid. 337, see also ii. 392.
[1874.—See the elaborate account of the rite in Milford, Tales of Old Japan, 2nd ed. 329 seqq. For a similar custom among the Karens, see M'Mahon, Karens of the Golden Chersonese, 294.]

HARAMZADA, s. A scoundrel; literally 'misbegotten'; a common term of abuse. It is Ar.—P. harshm-ada, 'son of the unlawful.' Harum is from a root signifying 'sacred' (see under HAREM), and which appears as Hebrew in the sense of 'devoting to destruction,' and of 'a ban.' Thus in Numbers xxi. 3: "They utterly destroyed them and their cities; and he called the name of the place Hormah." [See Encyc. Bibl. i. 468; ii. 2110.]

[1857.—"I am no advocate for slaying Shahzadas or any such-like Haramzadas without trial."—Bosworth Smith, L. of Ed. Lawrence, ii. 261.]

HAREM, s. Ar. haram, harim, i.e. isecer, applied to the women of the family and their apartment. This word is not now commonly used in India, zenana (q.v.) being the common word for 'the women of the family,' or their apartments.

[1623.—"Non so come sciai Selim ebbe notizia di lei e s'innamorò. Vole condurla nel suo harem o gyraeco, e teneva quivi approccio di sé come una delle altre concu- bine; ma questa donna (Nurmahal) che era beena modo astuta... riavv."
[1655.—"P. della Valle, ii. 526; [Hak. Soc. i. 58.]
[1660.—"This Duke here and in other serailios (or Haraas as the Persians term them) has above 300 concubines."—Herbert, 159.
[1766.—"In the midst of the large Gallery is a Nich in the Wall, into which the King descends out of his Harem by a private pair of Stairs."—Taunton, E.T. ii. 49; [ed. Ball, i. 101.
[1772.—"On the Ganges also lies a noble fortress, with the Palace of the old Emperor of Hindostan, with his Harem or women's apartment..."—Valentijn, v. 168.
[1777.—"The King... took his Wife into his own Haraan or Seraglio..."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 171.
[1812.—"Adjoining to the Chel Sitoon is the Harem; the term in Persia is applied to the establishments of the great, zenana is confined to those of inferior people."—Morier, Journee through Persia, &c., 106.]

HARRY, s. This word is quite obsolete. Wilson gives Harì as Beng. 'A servant of the lowest class, a sweeper.' [The word means 'a collector of bones,' Skt. hadda, 'a bone'; for the caste, see Risley, Tribes of Bengal, i. 314 seqq. M. Gen. Keatinge remarks that they are the goldsmiths of Assam; they are village watchmen in Bengal. (See under FYKE.) In two of the quotations below, Harry is applied to a woman, in one case employed to carry water. A female servant of this description is not now known among English families in Bengal.

[1813.—“He was left to view a considerable time, and was then carried by the Harys to the Golgotha.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 131.]

HATTY, s. Hind. hāthī, the most common word for an elephant; from Skt. hāṭṣī, ‘the hand,’ and hasti, ‘the elephant,’ come the Hind. words hāth and hāthī, with the same meanings. The analogy of the elephant’s trunk to the hand presents itself to Pliny:

“Mandunt ore; spirant et bibunt odor-anturque haud inproprie appellata manus.”—viii. 10 and to Tennyson:

“... camels kneel
Unbidden, and the brutes of mountain buck
That carry kings in castles, bow’d black knees
Of homage, ringing with their serpent hands,
To make her smile, her golden ankle-bells.”—Merlin and Vivien.

c. 1526.—“As for the animals peculiar to Hindustān, one is the elephant, as the Hindustānīs call it Hathi, which inhabits the district of Kalpi, the more do the wild elephants increase in number. That is the tract in which the elephant is chiefly taken.”—Baber, 315. This notice of Baber’s shows how remarkably times have changed. No elephants now exist anywhere near the region indicated. [On elephants in Hindustan, see Blockman’s Anst., i. 618.]

[1838.—“You are of course aware that we habitually call elephants Hotties, a name that might be safely applied to every other animal in India, but I suppose the elephants had the first choice of names and took the most appropriate.”—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 269.]

HATTYCHOK, s. Hind. hāthī-chak, servant’s and gardener’s Hind. for the globe artichoke; [the Jerusalem artichoke is hāthīchak]. This is worth producing, because our word (artichoke) is itself the corruption of an Oriental word thus carried back to the East in a mangled form.

HAUT, s.

a. Hind. hāth, (the hand or forearm, and hence) ‘a cubit,’ from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger; a measure of 18 inches, and sometimes more.

[1614.—“A godown 10 Haut high.”—Foster, Letters, ii. 112.

[1810.—“... in the measurements made by order of the collectors, I am assured, that the only standards used were the different Kas’is’ arms, which leaves great room for fraud. ... All persons measuring cloth know how to apply their arm, so as to measure a cubit of 18 inches with wonderful exactness.”—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 576.]

b. Hind. hāt, Skt. ḫattā, ‘a market held on certain days.’

[1800.—“In this Carnatic... there are no fairs like the hants of Bengal.”—Buchanan, Mysore, i. 19.

[1818.—“The Hindoos have also market days (hāṭās), when the buyers and sellers assemble, sometimes in an open plain, but in general in market places.”—Ward, Hindoos, i. 161.]

HAVILDAR, s. Hind. havildār. A seyop non-commissioned officer, corresponding to a sergeant, and wearing the chevrons of a sergeant. This dating from about the middle of the 18th century is the only modern use of the term in that form. It is a corruption of Pers. havaldād, or havildād, ‘one holding an office of trust’; and in this form it had, in other times, a variety of applications to different charges and subordinate officers. Thus among the Maharrats the commandant of a fort was so styled; whilst in Eastern Bengal the term was, and perhaps still is, applied to the holder of a hawdla, an intermediate tenure between those of zemindar and ryot.

1763.—"Three avaldars (avaldares) or receivers."—India Office MSS. Conselho, Ultramarina, vol. i.

1775.—"One or two Hirecas, one Havildar, and a company of sepoys..."—Jeez, 67.

1824.—"Curree Mutsueh was, I believe, a Havildar in the Company's army, and his sword and sash were still hung up, with a vast unpleasing vanity, over the desk where he now presided as catechist."—Heber, i. 149.

HAVILDAE'S GUARD. a. There is a common way of cooking the fry of fresh-water fish (a little larger than whitebait) as a breakfast dish, by frying them in rows of a dozen or so, spitted on a small skewer. On the Bombay side this dish is known by the whimsical name in question.

HAZEBE. a. This word is commonly used in Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency for 'breakfast.' It is not clear how it got this meaning. [The earlier sense was religious, as below.] It is properly hazrī, 'muster,' from the Ar. ḥāzrī, 'ready or present.' (See CHOTA-HAZEBE.)

[1832.—"The Sheeaks prepare hazre (breakfast) in the name of his holiness Abblas Allee Ullum-burda, Hosein's stepbrother; i.e. they cook polaco, roce, curries, &c., and distribute them."—Herberts, Canoon-c-Islam, ed. 1868, p. 188.]

HENRY KENDRY, n.p. Two islands off the coast of the Concan, about 7 m. south of the entrance to Bombay Harbour, and now belonging to Kolaba District. The names, according to Ph. Anderson, are Haneri and Khaneri; in the Admy. chart they are Oonari, and Khundari. They are also variously written (the one) Hundry, Onder, Hunary, Henery, and (the other) Kundra, Cundra, Cunary, Cunerey, Kenery. The real names are given in the Bombay Gazetteer as Undari and Khanderi. Both islands were piratically occupied as late as the beginning of the 19th century. Khanderi passed to us in 1818 as part of the Peshwa's territory; Undari lapsed in 1840. [Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Records, 83), describing the "Consultations" of 1778, writes: "At page 69, notice of 'Sevageev' fortifying 'Hendry Kendry,' the twin islets, now called Henery (i.e. Vondari), 'Mouse-like,' Kenery (i.e. Khaneri), i.e. 'Sacred to Khandaroo.'" The former is thus derived from Skt. undarā, undura, 'a rat;' the latter from Mahr. Khanderu, 'Lord of the Sword,' a form of Siva.]

1673.—"These islands are in number seven; viz. Bombay, Cannanore, Trumby, Elephanto, the Putachoos, Muchumbay, and Keraieau, with the Rock of Henry Kenry."...—Fryer, 61.

1681.—"Although we have formerly wrote you that we will have no war for Hendry Kendry, yet all war is so contrary to our constitution, as well as our interest, that we cannot too often inculcate to you our aversion thereunto."—Court of Directors to Surat, quoted in Anderson's Western India, p. 175.

1727.—"... four Leagues south of Bombay, are two small Islands Undra, and Cundra. The first has a Fortress belonging to the Sadas, and the other is fortified by the Sevagee, and is now in the Hands of Cannasse Angria."—A. Hamilton, i. 243; [ed. 1744].

c. 1780.—"At the harbor's mouth lie two small fortified rocks, called Heenara and Canara. These were formerly in the hands of Angria, and the Sidas, or Moors, which last have long been dispossessed of them."—Grose, i. 58.

1630.—"The Herbood or ordinary Churchman."—Lord's Display, ch. viii.

HICKMAT, a. Ar. Hikmat, an ingenious device or contrivance. (See under HAKIM.)

1838.—"The house has been roofed in, and my relative has come up from Meerut, to have the slates put on after some peculiar hikmat of his own."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 240.

HIDGELEE, n.p. The tract so called was under native rule a chakla, or district, of Orissa, and under our rule formerly a zilla of Bengal; but now it is a part of the Midnapur Zilla, of which it constitutes the S.E. portion, viz. the low coast lands on the west side of the Hoogly estuary, and below the junction of the Rūnpārāyan. The name is properly Hijilt; but it has gone through many strange phases in European records.

1658.—"...The first of these rivers (from the E. side of the Ghauta) rises from two sources to the east of Chaul, about 15 leagues distant, and in an altitude of 18 to 19 degrees. The river from the most northerly of these sources is called Oguna, and the more southerly Benkora, and when they combine they are called Ganga; and this river discharges into the illustrious stream of the Ganges between the two places called Angell and Pichola in about 22 degrees."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1666.—"...An haven which is called Angell in the Country of Oriza."—Fitch, in Hasti. ii. 389.

1666.—"...Chanock, on the 15th December (1666) ... burned and destroyed all the magazines of salt, and granaries of rice, which he found in the way between Hughley and the island of Ingelee."—Owne (reprint), ii. 12.

1726.—"Hingell."—Valintijn, v. 158.

1727.—"...inhabited by Fishers, as are also Ingelee and Kedgerou (see HIDGELEE)—two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Hamilton, i. 275; [ed. 1744, ii. 2].

1758.—In apprehension of a French Fleet the Select Committee at Fort William recommend: "That the pagoda at Ingelee should be washed black, the great tree at the place cut down, and the buoys removed."—In Long, 153.

1784.—"Ships laying at Kedgeres, Ingelee, or any other parts of the great River."—In Seton-Karr, i. 37.

HILSA, s. Hind. hilat, Skt. tīśa, tīśa; a rich and savoury fish of the shad kind (Chyopa tīśa, Day), called in books the "sable-fish" (a name, from the Port. savel, quite obsolete in India) and on the Indus palla (palla). The large shad which of late has been commonly sold by London fishmongers in the beginning of summer, is very near the hīla, but not so rich. The hīla is a sea-fish, ascending the river to spawn, and is taken as high as Delhi on the Jumna, as high as Mandalay on the Irawadi (Day). It is also taken in the Guzerat rivers, though not in the short and shallow streams of the Concan, nor in the Deccan rivers, from which it seems to be excluded by the rocky obstructions. It is the special fish of Sind under the name of palla, and monopolizes the name of fish, just as salmon does on the Scotch rivers (Dr. Macdonald's Acct. of Bombay Fisheries, 1883).

1639.—"...A little Island, called Apo-fingua (Ape-Fingua) ... inhabited by poor people who live by the fishing of shad (que vive de la pescaaria dos saveds)."—Pinto (orig. cap. xviii.), Cogan, p. 22.

1613.—"...Na quella costa maritime occidental de Viontana (Ujong-Tana, Malay Peninsula) habitavio Selate pescaadores que não tinham outro trato ... savo de sua pescarya de saves, donde se aproveitavão das ovas chamado Turabo passados por salmeura."—Brita de Godinho, 22. [On this Mr. Skeat points out that "Selates pescaadores" must mean "Fisheermen of the Strait" (Mal. selat, "strait"); and when he calls them "Turabo" he is trying to reproduce the Malay name of this, telubot (pron. trubo).]

1810.—"...The hilsah (or sable-fish) seems to be midway between a mackerel and a salmon."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 154-5.

1813.—Forbes calls it the sable or salmon-fish, and says "it a little resembles the European fish (salmon) from which it is named."—Or. Mem. i. 53; [2nd ed. i. 36].

1824.—"The fishery, we were told by these people, was of the 'Hilsa' or 'Sablefish'..."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 81.

HIMALYA, n.p. This is the common pronunciation of the name of the great range

"Whose snowy ridge the roving Tartar bounds," properly Himaly, 'the Abode of Snow'; also called Himavat, 'the Snowy'; Himagiri and Himakila;

Himádl, Himakata, &c., from various forms of which the ancients made

Imaus, Emóds, &c. Pliny had got somewhere the true meaning of the name: "... a montibus Hemidis, quorum promontorium Imaus vocatur

Hemias significante..." (vi. 17).

We do not know how far back the use of the modern name is to be found. [The references in early Hindu literature are collected by Atkinson (*Hima-HINDÉE. 415  HINDOO KOOSH.

layam Gasetter, ii. 273 seqq.).] We do not find it in Baber, who gives Siwálak as the Indian name of the mountains (see SIWÁLIK). The oldest occurrence we know of is in the Aṅ, which gives in the Geographical Tables, under the Third Climate, Koh-i-Hímálaḥ (orig. ii. 36); [ed. Jarrett, iii. 69]. This is disguised in Gladwin's version by a wrong reading into Kerdemalé (ed. 1800, ii. 367).* This form (Hímálaḥ) is used by Major Rennell, but hardly as if it was yet a familiar term. In Elphinstone's Letters Himálaḥ or some other spelling of that form is always used (see below). When we get to Bishop Heber we find Himalaya, the established English form.

1822.—"What pleases me most is the contrast between your present enjoyment, and your former sickness and despondency. Depend upon it England will turn out as well as Himálaḥ."—Elphinstone, to Major Close, in Life, ii. 139; see also i. 336, where it is written Himalálah.

HINDÉE, s. This is the Pers. adjectival form from Hind, 'India,' and illustration of its use for a native of India will be found under HINDOO. By Europeans it is most commonly used for those dialects of Hindustani speech which are less modified by P. vocables than the usual Hindustani, and which are spoken by the rural population of the N.W. Provinces and its outkirts. The earliest literary work in Hindi is the great poem of Chand Bardai (c. 1200), which records the deeds of Prithirája, the last Hindu sovereign of Delhi. [On this literature see Dr. G. A. Grierson, The Modern Vernacular Literature of Hindustán, in J.A.S.B. Part I., 1886.] The term Hinduwi appears to have been formerly used, in the Madras Presidency, for the Maráthi language. (See a note in Sir A. Arbuthnot's ed. of Munro's Minutes, i. 133.)

HINDÉIK, HINDERÉK, n.p. This modification of the name is applied to people of Indian descent, but converted to Islam, on the Peshawar frontier, and scattered over other parts of Afghanistan. They do the banking business, and hold a large part of the trade in their hands.

[1842.—"The inhabitants of Peshevar are of Indian origin, but speak Pashtoo as well as Hindké."—Elphinstone, Caubul, i. 74.]

HINDOO, n.p. P. Hindá. A person of Indian religion and race. This is a term derived from the use of the Mahomedan conquerors (see under INDIA). The word in this form is Persian; Hind is that used in Arabic, e.g.

c. 940.—"An inhabitant of Mansúra in Sind, among the most illustrious and powerful of that city . . . had brought up a young Indian or Sindian slave (Hindí aw Sindí)."—Maydú, vi. 264.

In the following quotation from a writer in Persian observe the distinction made between Hindú and Hindí:

c. 1290.—"Whatever live Hindí fell into the King's hands was pounded into bits under the feet of elephants. The Musulmáns, who were Hindís (country born), had their lives spared."—Amír Khosrú, in Eddér, iii. 539.

1563.—". . . moreover if people of Arabia or Persia would ask of the men of this country whether they are Moors or Gentooes, they ask in these words: 'Art thou Musulman or Indú?'":—García, f. 1375.

1663.—"Les Indous gardent soigneusement dans leurs Pagodes les Reliques de Ram, Schita (Sita), et les autres personnes illustres de l'antiquité."—De la Boulaye-Geou, ed. 1657, 191.

Hindú is often used on the Peshawar frontier as synonymous with bunya (see under BANYAN). A soldier (of the tribes) will say: 'I am going to the Hindu,' i.e. to the bunya of the company.

HINDOO KOOSH, n.p. Hindú-Kúsh; a term applied by our geographers to the whole of the Alpine range which separates the basins of the Kabul River and the Helmand from that of the Oxus. It is, as Rennell points out, properly that part of the range immediately north of Kabul, the Caucasus of the historians of Alexander, who crossed and recrossed it somewhere not far from the longitude of that city. The real origin of the name is not known; [the most plausible explanation is perhaps that it is a corruption of Indicus Caucasus]. It is, as far as we know, first used in literature by Ibn Batuta, and the explanation of the name which he gives, however doubtful, is still popular. The name has been by some later writers modified into Hindu Koh (mountain), but this is fictitious, and throws no light on the origin of the name.

1504.—"The country of Kábul is very strong, and of difficult access. .. Between Belkh, Kunduz, and Badakhshan on the one side, and Kábul on the other, is interposed the mountain of Hindú-kush, the passes over which are seven in number."—Babar, p. 139.

1584.—"Another motive for our stoppage was the fear of snow; for there is midway on the road a mountain called Hindú-kush, i.e. 'the Hindu-Killer,' because so many of the slaves, male and female, brought from India, die in the passage of this mountain owing to the severe cold and quantity of snow."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 84.

1665.—"Le dernier parti est la plus connue: c'est celle que l'on appelle Indostan, et dont les bornes naturelles au Couchant et au Levant, sont le Gange et l'Indus."—Thévenot, v. 9.

1667.—"It has been from old time divided into two parts, viz. the Eastern, which is India beyond the Ganges, and the Western India within the Ganges, now called Indostan."—Baldaeus, 1.

1770.—"By Indostan is properly meant a country lying between two celebrated rivers, the Indus and the Ganges. .. A ridge of mountains runs across this long tract from north to south, and dividing it into two equal parts, extends as far as Cape Comorin."—Raynal (fr.), i. 84.

1783.—"In Macassar Indostan is called Neerree Telinga."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 82.

1803.—"I feared that the dawk direct through Hindostan would have been stopped."—Wellington, ed. 1837, ii. 209.

1824.—"One of my servants called out to them, 'Aha! dande folk, take care! You are now in Hindostan! The people of this country know well how to fight, and are not afraid.'—Heber, i. 124. See also pp. 268, 269.

In the following stanza of the good bishop's the application is apparently the same; but the accentuation is excruciating—'Hindostan,' as if rhyming to 'Boston.'
HINDOSTANEE. 417  HINDOSTANEE.

HINDOSTANEE. a. Hindustani, properly an adjective, but used substantively in two senses, viz. (a) a native of Hindustan, and (b) Hindustani sabáni (the language of that country); but in fact the language of the Mahomedans of Upper India, and eventually of the Mahomedans of the Deccan, developed out of the Hindi dialect of the Doab chiefly, and of the territory round Agra and Delhi, with a mixture of Persian vocables and phrases, and a readiness to adopt other foreign words. It is also called Ooroo, i.e. the language of the Urdu (Horde) or Camp. This language was for a long time a kind of Mahomedan lingua franca over all India, and still possesses that character over a large part of the country, and among certain classes. Even in Madras, where it least prevails, it is still recognised in native regiments as the language of intercourse between officers and men. Old-fashioned Anglo-Indians used to call it the Moors (q.v.).

1616.—“After this he (Tom Coryate) got a great mastery in the Indostan, or more vulgar language; there was a woman, a landress, belonging to my Lord Ambassador’s house, who had such a freedom and liberty of speech, that she would sometimes scold, brawl, and rail from the sun-rising to the sun-set; one day he undertook her in her own language. And by eight of the clock he so silenced her, that she had not one word more to speak.”—Terry, Extracts relating to T. C.

1673.—“The Language at Court is Persian, that commonly spoke in Hindostan (for which they have no proper Character, the written Language being called Basyaga, which is a mixture of Persian and Scavonian, as are all the dialects of India.”—Fryer, 201. This intelligent traveller’s reference to Scavonian is remarkable, and shows a notable perspicacity, which would have delighted the late Lord Strangford, had he noticed the passage.

1677.—In Court’s letter of 12th Dec. to Mr. St. Gen, they renew the offer of a reward of 220, for proficiency in the Gento or Indian languages, and sanction a reward of 10 each for proficiency in the Persian language, “and that fit persons to teach the said language be entertained.”—Notes and Ext., No. 1. 22.

1685.—“...so applied myself to a Portuguese mariner who spoke Indostan (ye current language of all these Islands)” [Maldives].—Hedges, Diary, March 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 191].

1745.—“Benjamin Schulshi Missionary Evangelici, Grammatica Hindostanica... Editti, et de suscipienda barbaricarium linguarum curam praestat est D. Jo. Henr. Callenborg, Halae Saxoniae.”—Title from Catalogue of M. Garcin de Tassy’s Books. 1879. This is the earliest we have heard of.

1768.—“Two of the Council of Pondicherry went to the camp, one of them was well versed in the Indostan and Persian languages, which are the only tongues used in the Courts of the Mahomedan Princes.”—Orme, i. 144 (ed. 1808).

1772.—“Manuscripts have indeed been handed about, ill spelt, with a confused mixture of Persian, Indostan, and Bengal.”—Preface to Hadley’s Grammar, xi. (See under MOORS.)

1777.—“Alphabetum Grammhamicum seu Indostannum.”—Roman. a

1778.—“Grammatica Indostana.—A mais Vulgar—Que se practica no Imperio do gran Mogul—Offerceda—Aos muitos Reverendos—Padres Missionarios—Do dito Imperio. c. 1830.—“Cet ignoble patois d’Hindostani, qui ne servira jamais à rien quand je serai retourné en Europe, est difficile.”—V. Jacquemont, Correspondance, i. 96.

1844.—“Hd. Quarters, Kurrachee, 12th February, 1844. The Governor unfortunately does not understand Hindoostanesee, nor Persian, nor Mahrrata, nor any other eastern dialect. He therefore will feel particularly obliged to Collectors, sub-Collectors, and officers writing the proceedings of Courts-Martial, and all Staff Officers, to Indite their various papers in English, larded with as small a portion of the to him unknown tongue as they conveniently can, instead of those he generally receives—namely, papers written in Hindostanee larded with occasional words in English.

"Any Indent made for English Dictionaries shall be duly attended to, if such be in the stores at Kurrachee; if not, gentlemen who have forgotten the vulgar tongue are requested to procure the requisite assistance from England."—GG. Oo., by Sir Charles Napier, 85.

HING. s. Asafoetida. Skt. hingu, Hind. hing, Dakh. hingu. A repulsively smelling gum-resin which forms a favourite Hindoo condiment, and is used also by Europeans in Western and Southern India as an ingredient in certain cakes eaten with curry. (See POPPER-CAKE.) This product affords a curious example of the uncertainty which sometimes besets the origin of drugs which are the objects even of a large traffic. Hanbury and Flückiger, whilst describing Falconer's Narthex Asafoetida (Purana Narthex, Boiss.) and Scorodosma foetidum, Bunge; (F. asafoetida, Boiss.) two umbelliferous plants, both cited as the source of this drug, say that neither has been proved to furnish the asafoetida of commerce. Yet the plant producing it has been described and drawn by Kaempfer, who saw the gum-resin collected in the Persian Province of Läristan (near the eastern shore of the P. Gulf); and in recent years (1857) Surgeon-Major Bellew has described the collection of the drug near Kandahar. Asafoetida has been identified with the σπικον or laserpitium of the ancients. The substance is probably yielded not only by the species mentioned above, but by other allied plants, e.g. Ferula Jaschki-ana, Vatke, of Kashmir and Turkistan. The hing of the Bombay market is the produce of F. alliacea, Boiss. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 328 seqq.]

c. 646.—"This kingdom of Tsao-kin-tsha (Tsåūkita?) has about 7000 ǐi of compass, the compass of the capital called Ho-si-na (Ghama) is 30 ǐi. . . . The soil is favourable to the plant Yo-Kia (Curcuma, or turmeric) and to that called Hing-kin."—Pélerins Boudd., ii. 187.

1563.—"A Portuguese in Binsagar had a horse of great value, but which exhibited a deal of fitfulness, and on that account the King would not buy it. The Portuguese cured it by giving it this ymgu mixt with flour: the King then bought it, finding it thoroughly well, and asked him how he had cured it. When the man said it was with ymgu, the King replied: 'Tis nothing then to marvel at, for you have given it to eat the food of the gods' (or, as the poets say, nectar). Whereupon the Portuguese made answer sotto voce and in Portuguese: 'Better call it the food of the devils!'"—Garcia, f. 215. The Germans do worse than this Portuguese, for they call the drug Teneles derck, i.e. diaboli non cibus sed stercus!

1856.—"I went from Agra to Satagam (see CHITTAGON) in Bengal in the company of one hundred and four score Boates, laden with Salt, Opium, Hing, Lead, Carpets, and divers other commodities down the River Jemena."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 386.

1611.—"In the Kingdom of Gujaret and Cambaya, the natives put in all their food Ingu, which is Asafoetida."—Teixeira, Relaciones, 29.

1673.—"In this Country Asa Foetida is gathered at a place called Descom; some deliver it to be the Juice of a Cane or Reed inspissated; others, of a Tree wounded: It differs much from the stinking Stucc called Hing, tincture of the Province of Curwen; but this latter is that the Indians perfume themselves with, mixing it in all their Pulse, and make it up in Wafers to correct the Windness of their Food."—Fryer, 239.

is never cultivated, but its peculiar gumresin is collected from the plants on the deserts where they grow. The produce is for the most part exported to Hindustan."

[HIRRAWEN, s. The Musulman pilgrim dress; a corruption of the Ar.
thâm. Burton writes: "Al-thâm, literally meaning 'prohibition' or 'making unlawful,' equivalent to our 'mortification,' is applied to the ceremony of the toilette, and also to the dress itself. The vulgar pronounce the word 'herâm,' or 'Pehram.' It is opposed to thîlî, 'making lawful,' or 'returning to laical life.' The further from Mecca it is assumed, provided that it be done during the three months of Hajj, the greater is the religious merit of the pilgrim; consequently some come from India and Egypt in the dangerous attire" (Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, ii. 138, note).

HOBSON-JOBSON, s. A native festival excitement; a tamasha (see TUMASHA); but especially the Moharram ceremonies. This phrase may be taken as a typical one of the most highly assimilated class of Anglo-Indian argot, and we have ventured to borrow from it a concise alternative title for this Glossary. It is peculiar to the British soldier and his surroundings, with whom it probably originated, and with whom it is by no means obsolete, as we once supposed. My friend Mr. John Troter tells me that he has repeatedly heard it used by British soldiers in the Punjab; and has heard it also from a regimental Moonshây. It is in fact an Anglo-Saxon version of the wallings of the Mahommedans as they beat their breasts in the procession of the Moharram—"Ya Hassan! Ya Hossein!"
It is to be remembered that these observations are in India by no means confined to Shi'as. Except at Lucknow and Murshidabad, the great majority of Mahommedans in that country are professèd Sunnis. Yet here is a statement of the facts from an unexceptionable authority:

"The commonalty of the Mussulmans, and especially the women, have more regard for the memory of Hasan and Husein, than for that of Muhammad and his khalîfs. The hersie of making Ta'ziyas (see TAZEEA) on the anniversary of the two latter imáms, is most common throughout India; so much so that opposition to it is ascribed by the ignorant to blasphemy. This example is followed by many of the Hindus, especially the Mahrattas. The Muharram is celebrated throughout the Dekhan and Malwa, with greater enthusiasm than in other parts of India. Grand preparations are made in every town on the occasion, as if for a festival of rejoicing, rather than of observing the rites of mourning, as they ought. The observance of this custom has so strong a hold on the mind of the commonalty of the Mussulmans that they believe Muhammad-anism to depend merely on keeping the memory of the imáms in the above manner."— Mir Sháhid 'Ali, in J.R. As. Soc. xiii.
369.

We find no literary quotation to exemplify the phrase as it stands.
[But see those from the Orient. Sporting Mag. and Nineteenth Century below.]
Those which follow show it in the process of evolution:

1618.—"... e particularmente delle donne che, battendosi il petto e facendo gesti di grandissima compassione replicano spesso con gran dolore quelli ultimi versi di certi loro cantici: Vah Hussein! soih Hussin!"—P. della Valle, i. 552.
c. 1890.—"Nine days they wander up and down (shaving all that while neither head nor beard, nor seeming joyful), incessantly calling out Hassan, Hussan! in a melancholy note, so long, so fiendish, that many can neither howl longer, nor for a month's space recover their voices."—Sir T. Herbert, 261.

1865.—"... ainsi j'eus tout le loisir dont j'eus besoin pour y voir célébrer la Fête de Hussain Fils d'Al'y. ... Les Mores de Golconde le célébrent avec encore beaucoup plus de folies qu'en Perse ... d'autres font des danses en rond, tenant des épées nées la pointe en haut, qu'ils touchent les uns contre les autres, en criant de tout leur force Hussain."—Thevenot, v. 320.

1873.—"About this time the Moors solemnize the Exequies of Hossein Gosseen, a time of ten days Mourning for two Unfortunate Champions of theirs."—Fryer, p. 108.

"... On the Days of their Feasts and Jubilees, Gladiators were approved and licensed; but feeling afterwards the Evil that attended that Liberty, which was chiefly used in their Hossy Gassy, any private Grudge being then openly revenged: it never was forbid, but it passed into an Edict by the following King, that it should be lawfull to Kill any found with Naked Swords in that Solemniety."—Ibid. 357.

1710.—"And they sing around them Sancem Sancem."—Ornate Conquizado, vol. ii.; Conquistada, i. Div. 2, sec. 58.]

1720.—"Under these promising circumstances, the time came round for the Musulman feast called Hossein Jussem ... better known as the Mohurrun."—In Wheeler, ii. 347.

1726.—"In their month Moharram they have a season of mourning for the two brothers Hassan and Hossein. ... They name this mourning-time in Arabic Askur, or the 10 days; but the Hollanders call it Jaksom Bakson."—Valentijn, Choro. 107.

1738.—"It was the 14th of November, and the festival which commemorates the murder of the brothers Hassain and Jassain happened to fall out at this time."—Orme, i. 195.

1773.—"The Moors likewise are not without their feasts and processions ... particularly of their Hassan Hassan ..."—Ives, 28.

1829.—"Them paper boxes are purty looking consens, but then the folks makes sich a noise, firing and trumpeeting and shouting Hobson Jobson, Hobson Jobson."—Oriental Sporting Mag., reprint 1878, i. 129.

1880.—"The ceremony of Husen Hasen ... here passes by almost without notice."—Raffles, Hist. Java, 2nd ed. ii. 4.

1882.—"... they kindle fires in these pits every evening during the festival; and the ignorant, old as well as young, amuse themselves in fencing across them with sticks or swords; or only in running and playing round them, calling out J'a Aliz! Ya Aliz! Ya Hassun! Shah Hassun! Shah Hassun! Doolika! Doolika! (bridegroom!) ...; Haess dost! Haess dost! (alas, friend! ...) Ruhees! Ruhees! (Stay! Stay!). Every two of these words are repeated probably a hundred times over as loud as they can bawl out."—Jaffar Shuref, Quaasoon-e-Islam, tr. by Herklots, p. 173.

1888.—"... a long procession ... followed and preceded by the volunteer mourners and breast-bearers shouting their cry of Hosoes-o-e-n Has-o-e-san Hoossen-o-e-n Ha-o-e-san, and a simultaneous blow is struck vigorously by hundreds of heavy hands on the bare breasts at the last syllable of each name."—Wills Modern Persia, 282.

[1902.—"The Hobson-Jobson." By Miss A. Goodman-Freer, in The Nineteenth Century and After, April 1902.]

HODGITT, s. This is used among the English in Turkey and Egypt for a title-deed of land. It is Arabic Hujat, 'evidence.' Hujat, perhaps a corruption of the same word, is used in Western India for an account current between landlord and tenant. [Molesworth, Mahr. Dict., gives "Hujot, Ar., a Government acknowledgment or receipt."

[1871.—"... the Kadoe attends, and writes a document (hoggiet-el-buke) to attest the fact of the river's having risen to the height sufficient for the opening of the Canal. ..."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., 5th ed. ii. 233.]

HOG-BEAR, s. Another name for the sloth-bear, Melursus ursinus (Blanford, Mammalia, 201). The word does not appear in the N.E.D.

[1896.—"Between the tree-stems he heard a hog-bear digging hard in the moist warm earth."—R. Kipling, The Jungle Book, 171.]

HOG-DEER, s. The Anglo-Indian popular name of the Axis porcinus, Jerd.; [Cervus porcinus (Blanford, Mammalia, 549)], the Pad or Hindustan. The name is nearly the same as that which Cosmas (c. 545) applies to an animal (Xoraphados) which he draws (see under Babi-Roussa), but the two have no other relation. The Hog-deer is abundant in the grassy openings of forests throughout the Gangetic valley and further east. "It runs with its head low, and in a somewhat ungainly manner; hence its popular appellation."—Jerdon, Mammals, 283.
HONG-plum. 421

[1885.—"Two hog-deer were brought forward, very curious-shaped animals that I had never seen before."—Lady Dufferin, Visegrad Life, 146.]

HOG-plum. 8. The austere fruit of the amal (Hind.), Spindias mangifera, Pers. (Ord. Terebinthaceae), is sometimes so called; also called the wild mango. It is used in curries, pickles, and tarts. It is a native of various parts of India, and is cultivated in many tropical climates.

1852.—"The Karens have a tradition that in those golden days when God dwelt with men, all nations came before him on a certain day, each with an offering from the fruits of their lands, and the Karens selected the hog's plum for this oblation; which gave such offence that God cursed the Karen nation and placed it lowest. . . ."—Mason's Burma, ed. 1860, p. 461.

HOKOCHOW, HOKSIEU, AUCHIEO, etc., n.p. These are forms which the names of the great Chinese port of Fuh-chau, the capital of Fu-kien, takes in many old works. They, in fact, imitate the pronunciation in the Fu-kien dialect, which is Hok-chau; Fu-kien similarly being called Hok-kien.

1895.—"After they had travelled more than half a league in the suburbs of the citty of Aucheo, they met with a post that came from the court."—Mendosa, ii. 78.

1616.—"Also this day arrived a small China bark or some from Hokochow, laden with silk and stuffs."—Cocks, i. 219.

HOME. In Anglo-Indian and colonial speech this means England.

1837.—"Home always means England; nobody calls India home—not even those who have been here thirty years or more, and are never likely to return to Europe."—Letters from Madras, 92.

1895.—"You may perhaps remember how often in times past we debated, with a seriousness becoming the gravity of the subject, what article of food we should each of us respectively indulge in, on our first arrival at home."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 161.

So also in the West Indies:

c. 1850.—"'Oh, your cousin Mary, I forgot—fine girl, Tom—may do for you at home yonder' [all Creoles speak of England as home, although they may never have seen it]."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 238.

HONG. s. The Chinese word is hong, meaning 'a row or rank'; a house of business; at Canton a warehouse, a factory, and particularly applied to the establishments of the European nations ("Foreign Hongs"), and to those of the so-called. "Hong Merchants." These were a body of merchants who had the monopoly of trade with foreigners, in return for which privilege they became security for the good behaviour of the foreigners, and for their payment of dues. The guild of these merchants was called 'The Hong.' The monopoly seems to have been first established about 1790-30, and it was terminated under the Treaty of Nanking, in 1842. The Hong merchants are of course not mentioned in Lockyer (1711), nor by A. Hamilton (in China previous to and after 1700, pubd. 1727). The latter uses the word, however, and the rudiments of the institution may be traced not only in this narrative, but in that of Ibn Batuta.

c. 1850.—"When a Musulman trader arrives in a Chinese city, he is allowed to choose whether he will take up his quarters with one of the merchants of his own faith settled in the country, or will go to an inn. If he prefers to go and lodge with a merchant, they count all his money and confide it to the merchant of his choice; the latter then takes charge of all expenditure on account of the stranger's wants, but acts with perfect integrity. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 265-6.

1727.—"When I arrived at Canton the Hapoa (see HOPPO) ordered me lodgings for myself, my Men, and Cargo, in (a) Haung or Inn belonging to one of his Merchants . . . and when I went abroad, I had always some Servants belonging to the Haung to follow me at a Distance."—A. Hamilton, ii. 227; [ed. 1744].

1782.—"... l'Oreou (see HOPPO) . . . s'embarque en grande cérémonie dans une gaière pavoisée, emmenant ordinairement avec lui trois ou quatre Hamistes."—Sonnerat, ii. 288.

... Les loges Européennes s'appellent hams."—Ibid. 246.

1783.—"It is stated indeed that a monopolising Company in Canton, called the Cohong, had reduced commerce there to a desperate state."—Report of Com. on Affairs of India, Burke, vi. 481.

1797.—"A Society of Hong, or united merchants, who are answerable for one another, both to the Government and the foreign nations."—Sir G. Staunton, Embassy to China, ii. 565.

1852.—"The Hong merchants (collectively the Co-hong) of a body corporate, date from 1720."—The Funkhouse at Canton, p. 34.
Cohong is, we believe, though speaking with diffidence, an exogamous union between the Latin co- and the Chinese hong. [Mr. G. T. Gardner confirms this explanation, and writes: “The term used in Canton itself is invariable: ‘The Thirteen Hong,’ or ‘The Thirteen Firms’; and as these thirteen firms formed an association that had at one time the monopoly of the foreign trade, and as they were collectively responsible to the Chinese Government for the conduct of the trade, and to the foreign merchants for goods supplied to any one of the firms, some collective expression was required to denote the co-operation of the Thirteen Firms, and the word Cohong, I presume, was found most expressive.”]

HONG-BOAT, s. A kind of sampan (q.v.) or boat, with a small wooden house in the middle, used by foreigners at Canton. “A public passenger-boat (all over China, I believe) is called Hang-chwen, where chwen is generically ‘vessel,’ and hang is perhaps used in the sense of ‘plying regularly.’ Boats built for this purpose, used as private boats by merchants and others, probably gave the English name Hongboat to those used by our countrymen at Canton.” (Note by Bp. Moule).

[1878.—“The Koong-Sce Teng, or Hong-Mei-Teng, or Hong boats are from thirty to forty feet in length, and are somewhat like the gondolas of Venice. They are in many instances carved and gilded, and the saloon is so spacious as to afford sitting room for eight or ten persons. Abaft the saloon there is a cabin for the boatmen. The boats are propelled by a large scull, which works on a pivot made fast in the stern post.”—Gray, China, ii. 275.]

HONG KONG, n.p. The name of this flourishing settlement is hiang-kiang, ‘fragrant waterway’ (Bp. Moule).

HONORE, ONORE, n.p. Honvar, a town and port of Canara, of ancient standing and long of piratical repute. The etymology is unknown to us (see what Barbosa gives as the native name below). [A place of the same name in the Bellary District is said to be Can. Honaruru, homru, ‘gold,’ mru, ‘village.’] Vincent has supposed it to be the Nāūpa of the Periplus, “the first part of the pepper-country Διμπρακ,”—for which read Διμπρακ, the Tamil country or Malabar. But this can hardly be accepted, for Honore is less than 5000 stadia from Barygaza, instead of being 7000 as it ought to be by the Periplus, nor is it in the Tamil region. The true Nāūpa must have been Cannanore, or Pudopotana, a little south of the last. [The Madras Gloss. explains Nāūpa as the country of the Nairs.] The long defence of Honore by Captain Torriano, of the Bombay Artillery, against the forces of Tipippo, in 1783-1784, is one of the most noble records of the Indian army. (See an account of it in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109 seqq.; [2nd ed. ii. 465 seqq.]).

c. 1843.—“Next day we arrived at the city of Hinaur, beside a great estuary which big ships enter. . . . The women of Hinaur are beautiful and chaste . . . they all know the Kurān al-‘Azm by heart. I saw at Hinaur 13 schools for the instruction of girls and 23 for boys,—such a thing as I have seen nowhere else. The inhabitants of Malešir pay the Sultan . . . a fixed annual sum from fear of his maritime power.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 65-67.

1516.—“. . . there is another river on which stands a good town called Honor; the inhabitants use the language of the country, and the Malabars call it Poun-arum (or Pounaram, in Ramnái); here the Malabars carry on much traffic. . . . In this town of Onor are two Gentoos or seamen patronised by the Lord of the Land, one called Timoja and the other Raogi, each of whom has 5 or 6 very big ships with large and well-armed crews.”—Barbosa, Lisbón, ed. 291.

1553.—“This port (Onor) and that of Baticalas . . . belonged to the King of Bismaga, and to this King of Onor his tributary, and these ports, less than 40 years before were the most famous of all that coast, not only for the fertility of the soil and its abundance in provisions . . . but for being the ingress and egress of all merchandize for the kingdom of Bismaga, from which the King had a great revenue; and principally of horses from Arabia.”—Barros, i. viii. cap. x. [And see P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 202; Comm. Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. i. 148.]

HOOGLY, HOOGLEY, n.p. Properly Hugli, [and said to take its name from Beng. holla, ‘the elephant grass’ (Typha angustifolia)]; a town on the right bank of the Western Delta Branch of the Ganges, that which has long been known from this place as the Hoogly River, and on which Calcutta also stands, on the other bank, and 25 miles nearer the sea. Hoogly was one of the first places occupied by Europeans in the interior of Bengal; first by the Portuguese in the first half of the 16th century. An English factory was established here in 1640; and it was for some time their chief settlement in Bengal. In 1688 a quarrel with the Nawab led to armed action, and the English abandoned Hoogly; but on the arrangement of peace they settled at Chatanati (Chuttanutty), now Calcutta.

[3.1590.—"In the Sarkar of Satgong, there are two ports at a distance of half a lacs from each other; the one is Satgong, the other Hugli: the latter the chief; both are in possession of the Europeans."—Ais. ed. Jarrett, ii. 128.]

1618.—"After the force of dom Francisco de Meneses arrived at Sundiva as we have related, there came a few days later to the same island 3 sanguirios, right well equipped with arms and soldiers, at the charges of Manuel Viegas, a householder and resident of Ougolim, or Porto Pequeno, where dwelt in Bengal many Portuguese, 80 leagues up the Ganges, in the territory of the Mogor, under his ill faith that every hour threatened their destruction."—Bocarro, Decada, 476.

c. 1632.—"Under the rule of the Beldia a party of Frank merchants... came trading to Satgong (see PORTO PEQUENO); one for above that place they occupied some ground on the bank of the estuary... In course of time, through the ignorance and negligence of the rulers of Bengal, these Europeans increased in number, and erected substantial buildings, which they fortified... In due course a considerable place grew up, which was known by the name of the Port of Hugli... These proceedings had come to the notice of the Emperor (Shah Jehan), and he resolved to put an end to them..."—Abdul Hamid Lahiri, in Elliot, vii. 31-32.

1644.—"The other important voyage which used to be made from Cochim was that to Bengal, when the port and town of Ougolim were still standing, and much more when we had the Porto Grande (q.v.) and the town of Dinaor; this used to be made by so many ships that often in one monsoon there came 50 or more from Bengalla to Cochim, all laden with rice, sugar, jaggery, long pepper, a great quantity of wax, besides wheat and many things besides, such as quilts and rich bedding; so that every ship brought a capital of more than 4,000 ducats. But since these two possessions were lost, and the two ports were closed, there go barely one or two vessels to Oriza."—Bocarro, M.S., f. 315.

1666.—"The rest they kept for their service to make Bowers of them; and such Christians as they were themselves, bringing them up to robbing and killing; or else they sold them to the Portugese of Goa, Ceilam, St. Thomas, and others, and even to those that were remaining in Bengal at Ougolim, who were come thither to settle themselves there by favour of Jehan-Gurun, the Grandfather of Aurang-Zebe..."—Bermier, E.T. 64; [ed. Constable, 176].

1727.—"Hoogly is a Town of large Extent, but ill built. It reaches about 2 Miles along the River’s Side, from the Chinhurd before mentioned to the Bandel, a Colony formerly mentioned by the Portuguese, but the Mogol’s Foudaor governs both at present."—A. Hamilton, ii. 19; [ed. 1744].

1758.—"Ugul est une forteresse des Maures... Ce lieu était le plus considérable de la contrée, des Européens qui remontent le Gange, lui ont donné le nom de rivière d’Ugul dans sa partie inférieure..."—D’Anville, p. 64.

HOOGLY RIVER. n.p. See preceding. The stream to which we give this name is formed by the combination of the delta branches of the Ganges, viz., the Baughrett, Jalinghee, and Matahanga (Bhagirathi, Jalangi, and Matlahanga), known as the Nuddea (Nadiya) Rivers.

HOOKA, a. Hind. from Arab. hukkah, properly a round casket. The Indian pipe for smoking through water, the elaborated hubble-bubble (q.v.). That which is smoked in the hooka is a curious compound of tobacco, spice, molasses, fruit, &c. [See Baden-Powell, Panjub Productions, i. 290.] In 1840 the hooka was still very common at Cuttack dinner-tables, as well as regimental mess-tables, and its hubble-bubble was heard from various quarters before the cloth was removed—as was customary in those days. Going back further some twelve or fifteen years it was not very uncommon to see the use of the hooka kept up by old Indians after their return to Europe; one such at least, in the re-collection of the elder of the present writers in his childhood, being a lady who continued its use in Scotland for several years. When the second of the present writers landed first at Madras, in 1860, there were perhaps half-a-dozen Europeans at the Presidency who still used the hooka; there is not one now (c. 1878). A few gentlemen at Hyderabad are said still to keep it up. [Mrs. Mackenzie writing in 1880...]

HOOLUCK, s. Beng. ḭaḷak? The word is not in the Dicts., [but it is possibly connected with utāk, Skt. utāka, 'an owl,' both bird and animal taking their name from their wailing note]. The black gibbon (Hylobates hoolock, Jerd.; [Blanford, Mammalia, 5]), not unfrequently tamed on our E. frontier, and from its gentle engaging ways, and plaintive cries, often becoming a great pet. In the forests of the Kasia Hills, when there was neither sound nor sign of a living creature, by calling out hoo! hoo! one sometimes could wake a clamour in response from the hoolucks, as if hundreds had suddenly started to life, each shouting hoo! hoo! hoo! at the top of his voice.

c. 1809.—"The Hoolucks live in considerable herds; and although exceedingly noisy, it is difficult to procure a view, their activity in springing from tree to tree being very great; and they are very shy."—Backman's Kunkpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 563.
1888.—"Our only captive this time was a howling monkey, a shy little beast, and very rarely seen or caught. They have black fur with white breasts, and go about usually in pairs, swinging from branch to branch with incredible agility, and making the forest resound with their strange cachinatory cry. . . ."—T. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, 374.

1884.—"He then . . . describes a gibbon he had (not a historian nor a book, but a specimen of Hool]y, a monkey) who must have been wholly delightful. This engaging anthropoid used to put his arm through Mr. Sterndale's, was extremely clean in his habits ('which,' says Mr. Sterndale thoughtfully and truthfully, 'cannot be said of all the monkey tribe'), and would not go to sleep without a pillow. Of course he died of consumption. The gibbon, however, has a pet has one weakness, that of 'bowling in a piercing and somewhat hysterical fashion for some minutes till exhausted.'—Saty. Review, May 31, on Sterndale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

HOOLY, s. Hind. holf (Skt. holkal), [perhaps from the sound made in singing]. The spring festival, held at the approach of the vernal equinox, during the 10 days preceding the full moon of the month Phalguna. It is a sort of carnival in honour of Krishna and the milkmaids. Passers-by are chaffed, and drenched with yellow liquids from squirting pots. Songs, mostly obscene, are sung in praise of Krishna, and dances performed round fires. In Bengal the feast is called dol jatra, or 'Swing-craddle festival.' [On the idea underlying the rite, see Fraser, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 306 seq.]

c. 1590.—"Here is also a place called Cheramutty, where, during the feast of the Hooly, flames issue out of the ground in a most astonishing manner."—Gluckin's Ayeen Akbery, ii. 34 ; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 173].

1871.—"In Feb. or March they have a feast the Romans call Carnival, the Indians 'Hoolie.'"—Faulk, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccxiv.

1873.—". . . their Hooly, which is at their other Seed-Time."—Fryer, 180.

1877.—"One (Feast) they kept on Sight of a New Moon in February, exceeded the rest in ridiculous Actions and Expense; and this they called the Feast of Woolly, who was . . . a fellow in a War with some Giants that infested Sind. . . ."—A. Hamilton, i. 128 ; [ed. 1744, i. 129].

1880.—"I have delivered your message to Mr. H. about April day, but he says he understands the memorial part of the Hooly, as according with May day, and he believes they have no occasion in India to set apart a particular day in the year for the manufacture . . ."—Letter from Mrs. Halket to W. H. Hamilton, in Cal. Rev., xxvi. 98.

1809.—". . . We paid the Mubra Raj (Sindia) the customary visit at the Hoolies. Everything was prepared for playing; but at Captain C.'s particular request, that part of the ceremony was dispensed with. Playing the Hoolies consists in throwing about a quantity of flour, made from a water-nut called singara, and dyed with red sanders; it is called abeer; and the principal sport is to cast it into the eyes, mouth, and nose of the players, and to splash them all over with water tinged of an orange colour with the flowers of the dak (see DHAWEK) tree."—Broughton's Letters, p. 87 ; [ed. 1892, p. 65 seq.].

HOON, a. A gold Pagoda (coin), q.v. Hind. houn, "perhaps from Canar. honnu (gold)."—Wilson. [See Rice, Mysore, i. 801.]

1847.—"A wonderfully large diamond from a mine in the territory of Golkonda had fallen into the hands of Kutch-Mulk; whereupon an order was issued, directing him to forward the same to Court; when its estimated value would be taken into account as part of the two lacs of huns which was the stipulated amount of his annual tribute."—Indurty Khus, in Elliot, vii. 84.

1879.—"In Exhibit 320 Ramji engages to pay five hons (= Rs. 20) to Vithoba, besides paying the Government assessment."—Bombay High Court Judgment, Jan. 27, p. 121.

HOONDY, s. Hind. hundi, hundav; Mahr. and Guj. hund. A bill of exchange in a native language.

1810.—"Hoonides (i.e. bankers' drafts) would be of no use whatever to them."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 580.

HOONIMAUN, s. The great ape; also called Lungoor.

1863.—"Harmand est un singe que les Indois tiennent pour Saint."—De la Boulaye-de-Gous, p. 541.

HOOWA. A peculiar call (hùwa) used by the Singalese, and thence applied to the distance over which this call can be heard. Compare the Australian coo-ee.

HOPPER, s. A colloquial term in S. India for cakes (usually of rice-flour), somewhat resembling the wheaten chupatties (q.v.) of Upper India. It is the Tamil appam, [from appu, 'to clap with the hand.' In Bombay the form used is ap.] commanded to give him certaine cakes, made of the flower of Wheate, which the Malabars do call Apes, and with the same honnie."—Custard (by N. L.), f. 38.

1606.—"Great dishes of apas."—Gouvea, f. 48c.

1672.—"These cakes are called Apens by the Malabars."—Baldens, Adjodery (Dutch ed.), 39.

c. 1690.—"Ex iis (the chestnuts of the Jack fruit) in sole sciatica farinam, ex caveat placenta, apas dictas, convicinent."—Rheede, iii.

1707.—"Those who bake oppers without permission will be subject to severe penalty."—Thesavaleme (Tamil Laws of Jaffna), 700.

[1826.—"He sat down beside me, and shared between us his coarse brown apas."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 81.]

1860.—"Appas (called hoppers by the English) . . . supply their morning repast."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 161.

HOPPO, s. The Chinese Superintendant of Customs at Canton. Giles says: "The term is said to be a corruption of Hoo po, the Board of Revenue, with which office the Hoppo, or Collector of duties, is in direct communication." Dr. Williams gives a different account (see below). Neither affords much satisfaction. [The N.E.D. accepts the account given in the quotation from Williams.]

1711.—"The Hoppos, who look on Europe Ships as a great Branch of their Profits, will give you all the fair words imaginable."—Lockyer, 101.

1727.—"I have staid about a Week, and found no Merchants come near me, which made me suspect, that there were some undesahle dealings between the Hoppos and his Chape, to my Prejudice."—A. Hamilton, ii. 228; [ed. 1744, ii. 227]. (See also under HONG.)

1743.—". . . just as he (Mr. Anson) was ready to embark, the Hoppo or Chinese Custom-house officer of Macao refused to grant a permit to the boat."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. 1756, p. 355.

1750-52.—"The hoppo, hoppa, or first inspector of customs . . . came to see us to-day."—Obeck, i. 359.

1752.—"La charge d' Opoo répondu à celle d'intendant de province."—Sonnertal, ii. 236.

1797.—". . . the Hoppo or mandarine more immediately connected with Europeans."—Sir G. Staunton, i. 239.

1842 (1).—"The term hoppo is confined to Canton, and is a corruption of the term ho-i-po-ko, the name of the officer who has control over the boats on the river, strangely applied to the Collector of Customs by foreigners."—Wills Williams, Chinese Commercial Guide, 221.

[1878.—"The second board or tribunal is named hoppo, and to it is entrusted the care and keeping of the imperial revenue."—Gray, China, i. 18.]

1882.—"It may be as well to mention here that the 'Hoppo' (as he was incorrectly styled) filled an office especially created for the foreign trade at Canton. . . . The Board of Revenue is in Chinese 'Hoo-poo,' and the office was locally misspelled to the officer in question."—The Funckue at Canton, p. 36.

HORSE-KEEPER, s. An old provincial English term, used in the Madras Presidency and in Ceylon, for 'groom.' The usual corresponding words are, in N. India, syce (q.v.), and in Bombay ghordwalla (see GORAWALLAH).

1555.—"There in the rest of the Cophine made for the nones thei bewrwe one of his diestern lemmans, a waiting manne, a Cooke, a Horse-keeper, a Lacoue, a Butler, and a Horse, whiche thei al at first strangle, and thruste in."—W. Watremans, Fardale of Ficcions, N. I.

1609.—"Watermen, Lackeyes, Horse-keepers."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 216.

1673.—"On St. George's Day I was commanded by the Honourable Gerald Awngier . . . to embarque on a Bombaime Boat . . . waited on by two of the Governour's servants . . . an Horsekeeper . . ."—Fryer, 123.

1698.—". . . followed by his boy . . . and his horsequer."—In Wheeler, i. 300.

1829.—"In my English buggy, with lamps lighted and an English sort of a nag, I might almost have fancied myself in England, but for the black horsekeeper alongside of me."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 57.

1837.—"Even my horse pretends he is too fine to switch off his own flies with his own long tail, but turns his head round to order the horsekeeper . . . to wipe them off for him."—Letters from Madras, 50.

HORSE-RADISH TREE, s. This is a common name, in both N. and S. India, for the tree called in Hind. sahjand; Moringa pterygosperma, Gaertn., Hyperanthra Moringa, Vahl. (N. O. Moringaceae), in Skt. sabhdnjana. Sir G. Birdwood says: "A marvellous tree botanically, as no one knows in what order to put it; it has links with so many; and it is evidently a 'head-centre' in the progressive development of forms." The name is given because the scraped root is used in place of horse-radish, which it closely resembles in flavour. In S. India the same plant is called the Drumstick-tree (q.v.), from the shape of the long slender fruit, which is used as a vegetable, or in curry, or made into a native pickle.
“most nauseous to Europeans” (Punjab Plants). It is a native of N.W. India, and also extensively cultivated in India and other tropical countries, and is used also for many purposes in the native pharmacopoeia. [See MYROBALAN.]

HOSBOLHOOKUM, &c. Properly (Ar. used in Hind.) hasb-ul-hukum, literally ‘according to order’; these words forming the initial formula of a document issued by officers of State on royal authority, and thence applied as the title of such a document.

[1678.—“Had it bin another King, as Shajehawn, whose phirmaund (see PIRMAUN) and hasbulhookums were of such great force and binding.”—In Yule, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xi27.]

" . . . the other given in the 10th year of Oranzeeb, for the English to pay 2 per cent. at Surat, which the Mogul interpreted by his order, and Husbul Hookum (lit est, a word of command by word of mouth) to his Devan in Bengal, that the English were to pay 2 per cent. custom at Surat, and in all other his dominions to be custom free.”—Pt. St. Geo. Cons. 17th Dec., in Notes and Esks, Pt. I. pp. 97-98.

1702.—“The Nabob told me that the great God knows that he had over a hearty respect for the English . . . saying, here is the Hosbulhookem, which the king has sent me to seize Factories and all their effects.”—In Wheeler, i. 387.

1727.—“The Phirmawnd is presented (by the Goosberdaar (Goorkbodar), or Hosbalhookum, or, in English, the King’s Messenger) and the Governor of the Province or City makes a short speech.”—A. Hamilton, i. 280; [ed. 1744, i. 233].

1757.—“This Treaty was conceived in the following Term I. Whatever Rights and Privileges the King had granted the English Company, in their Phirmaund, and the Hosbulhooreums (sic), sent from Delhi, shall not be disputed.”—Mem. of the Revolution in Bengal, pp. 21-22.

1759.—“Hosbul-hookum (under the great seal of the Nabob Visier, Ulmah Maleck, Nizam al Mulack Bakdahur. Be peace unto the high and renowned Mr. John Spencer.”—In Cambridge’s Acts of the War, &c., 229.

1761.—“A grant signed by the Mogul is called a Phirmaund (farmān). By the Mogul’s Son, a Nushawn (aishda). By the Nabob a Perwanna (parwana). By the Visier, a Housebul-hookum.”—Ibid. 228.

1799.—“Besides it is obvious, that as a great sun might have been drawn from that Company without affecting property . . . or running into his golden dream of coquets on the Ganges, or visions of Stamp duties, Perwannas, Disticks, Kisthundees and Husbulhookums.”—Burke, Obs. on a late

Publication called “The Present State of the Nation.”

HOT-WINDS, s. This may almost be termed the name of one of the seasons of the year in Upper India, when the dry hot westerly winds prevail, and such aids to coolness as the tatty and thermanidote (q.v.) are brought into use. May is the typical month of such winds.

1804.—“Holkar appears to me to wish to avoid the contest at present; and so does Gen. Lake, possibly from a desire to give his troops some repose, and not to expose the Europeans to the hot winds in Hindustan.”—Wellington, iii. 180.

1873.—“It’s no use thinking of lunch in this roaring hot wind that’s getting up, so we shall be all light and fresh for another shy at the pigs this afternoon.”—The True Reformer, i. p. 8.

HOWDAH, vulg. HOWDER, &c., s. Hind. modified from Ar. havadāj. A great chair or framed seat carried by an elephant. The original Arabic word havadāj is applied to litters carried by camels.

c. 1668.—“At other times he rideth on an Elephant in a Mik-dember or Hauze . . . the Mik-dember being a little square House or Turret of Wood, is always painted and gilded; and the Hauze, which is an Oval seat, having a Canopy with Pillars over it, is so likewise.”—Bernier, E.T. 119; [ed. Constable, 370].

c. 1785.—“Colonel Smith . . . reviewed his troops from the houdar of his elephant.”—Carraccioli’s L. of Olive, iii. 133.

A popular rhyme which was applied in India successively to Warren Hastings’ escape from Benares in 1781, and to Col. Monson’s retreat from Malwa in 1804, and which was perhaps much older than either, runs:

“Ghore par hauz, háthi par jìn Jaldi bhāg-gāyā, Warin Hastin!
Kornail Munsil!”

which may be rendered with some anachronism in expression:

“Horses with howdahs, and elephants saddled Off heiter skelter the Sahibs skodaddled.”

[1805.—“Hauze, howda.” See under AMBAREE.]

1851.—“And when they talked of Elephants, And riding in my Howder, (So it was called by all my aunts)
I pronder grew and pronder.”

H. M. Parker, in Bengal Annual, 119.
1856.—"But she, the gallant lady, holding fast
With one soft arm the jewelled howdah's side,
Still with the other circles tight the babe Sore smitten by a cruel shaft ..."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

1863.—"Elephants are also liable to be disabled ... ulcers arise from neglect or carelessness in sitting on the howdah."—
Sat. Revieue, Sept. 6, 312.

HUBBA. s. A grain; a jot or tittle.
Ar. habba.

1786.—"For two years we have not received a hubba on account of our tankaw, though the ministers have annually charged a lac of rupees, and never paid us anything."—In [1836.—"The habbeh (or grain of barley) is the 46th part of dirhem, or third of a keorat ... or in commerce fully equal to an English grain."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., ii. 326.]

HUBBLE-BUBBLE. s. An onomotopoeia applied to the hooka in its rudimentary form, as used by the masses in India. Tobacco, or a mixture containing tobacco amongst other things, is placed with embers in a terra-cotta chillum (q.v.), from which a reed carries the smoke into a coconut shell half full of water, and the smoke is drawn through a hole in the side, generally without any kind of mouth-piece, making a bubbling or gurgling sound. An elaborate description is given in Terry's Voyage (see below), and another in Govinda Sa-manta, i. 28 (1872).

1616.—"... they have little Earthen Pots ... having a narrow neck and an open round top, out of the belly of which comes a small spout, to the lower part of which spout they fill the Pot with water:
then putting their Tobacco loose in the top, and a burning coal upon it, they having first fastened a very small strait hollow Cane or Reed ... within that spout ... the Pot standing on the ground, draw that smok-into their mouths, which first falls upon the Superficies of the water, and much discoures
it. And this way of taking their Tobacco, they believe makes it much more cool and wholesome."—Terry, ed. 1695, p. 393.

c. 1650.—"Tobacco is of great account here; not strong (as our men love), but weake and leafe; suckt out of long canes call'd hubble-bubbles ..."—Mr. T.
Herbert, 28.

1673.—"Coming back I found my troublesome Comrade very merry, and packing up his Household Stuff, his Bang bowl, and Hubble-bubble, to go along with me."—
Fryer, 127.

1678.—"... bolstered up with embroidered Cushions, smoaking out of a silver Hubble-bubble."—Fryer, 151.

1997.—"... Yesterday the King's Dewan, and this day the King's Buxee ... arrived ... to each of whom sent two bottles of Rosé water, and a glass Hubble-bubble, with a compliment."—In Wheeler,
i. 318.

c. 1760.—See Grose, i. 146.

1811.—"Cette manière de fumer est extrêmement commune ... on la nomme Hubbel de Bubble."—Sotyus, tom. iii.

1888.—"His (the Dyak's) favourite pipe is a huge Hubble-bubble."—Wallace, Nat.
Archiv., ed. 1890, p. 80.

HUBSHEE. n.p. Ar. Habashi, P.
Habshi, 'an Abyssinian,' an Ethiopian, a negro. The name is often specifically applied to the chief of Jünira on the western coast, who is the descendant of an Abyssinian family.

1298.—"There are numerous cities and villages in this province of Abash, and many merchants."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 425.
[c. 1346.—"Habahia." See under COLOMBO.]

1553.—"At this time, among certain Moors, who came to sell provisions to the ships, had come three Abashis (Abarisj) of the country of the Prester John ..."— Barros, i. iv. 4.

[1612.—"Sent away the Thomas towards the Habash coast."—Dawers, Letters, i. 166;-
"The Habash shore."—Ibid. i. 131.
[c. 1661.—"... on my way to Gonder, the capital of Habesh, or Kingdom of Ethiopia."—Bernier, ed. Contable, 2.]

1673.—"Cowis Cawn, an Hobay or Ar abian Coffey (Caffer)."—Fryer, 147.

1681.—"Habessins ... nunc passim nominatur; vocabulo ab Arabibus indito, quibus Habash colonivm vel mixturam gentium denotat."—Ludolfi, Hist. Aethiop.
lib. i. c. i.

1750-60.—"The Moors are also fond of having Abyssinian slaves known in India by the name of Hobay Coffrees."—Grose,
i. 148.

1789.—"In India Negroes, Habissinians, Nobis (i.e. Nubians) &c. &c. are promiscuously called Habashes or Habissians, although the two latter are no negroes; and the Nobies and Habashes differ greatly from one another."—Note to Sir Mutaqerin,
iii. 36.

[1813.—"... the master of a family adopts a slave, frequently a Haffhee Abyssinian, of the darkest hue, for his heir.
—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 473.]

1884.—"One of my Tibetan ponies had short curly brown hair, and was called both by my servants, and by Dr. Campbell, a Hubbesh.}
"I understood that the name was specific for that description of pony amongst the traders." —Note by Sir Joseph Hooker.

Huck. Properly Ar. ḥākk. A just right; a lawful claim; a perquisite claimable by established usage.

[1868. — "The difference between the bazaar price, and the amount price of the article sold, is the δουλεια of the Dullal (Deloll)." — Confessions of an Orderly, 50.]

Huckeem. s. Ar.—H. ḥakīm; a physician. (See note under HAKIM.)

1822.—"I, who was thinking little or nothing about myself, was for a time put by them into the hands of an excellent physician, a native of Shiraz, who then happened to be at Lar, and whose name was Ḥakīm Abū'l-feṭah. The word ḥakīm signifies 'wise'; it is a title which it is the custom to give to all those learned in medical matters." — P. della Valle, ii. 318.

1873.—"My Attendance is engaged, and a Million of Promises, could I restore him to his Health, laid down from his Wives, Children, and Relations, all who (with the Citizens, as I could hear going along) pray to God that the Ḥakīm Fringe, the Frank Doctor, might kill him..."—Fryer, 312.

1837.—"I had the native works on Materia Medica collated by competent Hakemns and Moonshees." — Rogers, Hindoo Medicine, 29.

Hullia. s. Canarese Holeya; the same as Puleya (Pulayan) (q.v.), equivalent to Pariah (q.v.). ["Holeyas field-labourers and agricest serfs of S. Canara; Pulayan being the Malayalam and Paravany the Tamil form of the same word. Brahmans derive it from hole, 'pollution'; others from hola, 'land' or 'soil,' as being thought to be autochthones" (Sturrock, Man. of S. Canara, i. 173). The last derivation is accepted in the Madras Gloss. For an illustration of these people, see Richter, Man. of Coorg, 112.]

1817.—"... a Hullia or Pariar King." — Wilks, Hist. Sketches, i. 151.

1874.—"At Melkotta, the chief seat of the followers of Rāmānya [Ramānūja] Acharyya, and at the Brahman temple at Balour, the Hullias or Parayars have the right of entering the temple on three days in the year, specially set apart for them." — M. J. Waugh, in Ind. Antiq. iii. 191.

Hulwa. s. Ar. ḥalwa and ḥalaww is generic for sweetmeat, and the word is in use from Constantinople to Calcutta. In H. the word represents a particular class, of which the ingredients are milk, sugar, almond paste, and ghee flavoured with cardamom. "The best at Bombay is imported from Muskat." (Birdwood.

1672.—"Ce qui estoit plus le plaisant, c’estoit un homme qui précédloit le corps des confituriers, lequel avait une chemise qui luy descendoit aux talons, toute couverte d’alors est à dire, de confiture." — Jours d’Ant. Galland, i. 118.

1673.—"... the Widow once a Moon (to) go to the Grave with her Acquaintance to repeat the doleful Dirge, after which she bestows Holway, a kind of Sacramental Wafer; and entreats their Prayers for the Soul of the Departed."—Fryer, 94.

1836.—"A curious cry of the seller of a kind of sweetmeat ('halaww'), composed of treacle fried with some other ingredients, is 'For a nail! O sweetmeat!... children and servants often steal the items... from the house... and give them to him in exchange. ..."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., ed. 1871, ii. 15.

Hummaul. s. Ar. hammadh, a porter. The use of the word in India is confined to the west, and there now commonly indicates a palankin-bearer. The word still survives in parts of Sicily in the form camalun — It. 'facchino,' a relic of the Saracen occupation. In Andalusia ahmal now means a man who lets out a baggage horse; and the word is also used in Morocco in the same way (Dossy).

c. 1350.—"Those rusticus whom they call camallus (camallos), whose business it is to carry burdens, and also to carry men and women on their shoulders in litter, such as are mentioned in Canticles: 'Per culum facit sibi Solomon de lignis Libani,' whereby is meant a portable litter such as I used to be carried in at Zeyton, and in India." — John de Marignolli, in Claudius, &c., 366.

1654.—"To the Xabandar (see SBA BUNIDE) at Ormus for the vessels employed in discharging stores, and for the amals who serve in the custom-house." — S. Botelho, Tombo, 108.

1691.—"His honour was carried by the Amaals, i.e. the Palankyn bearers 12 in number, sitting in his Palakyn." — Valention, v. 266.

1711.—"Hamilage, or Cooley-hire, at 1 cos (see GOSEBECK) for every maund Tabreeb." — Tariff in Lockyer, 243.

1750-60.—"The Hamals or porters, who make a livelihood of carrying goods to and from the warehouses." — Grose, i. 120.

1809.—"The palanquin-bearers here are called hamals (a word signifying carrier) ... these people come chiefly from the Mahratta country, and are of the cowhide or agricultural caste." — Maria Graham, 2.
1813.—For Hamauls at Bussora, see Milburn, i. 126.

1840.—"The hamals groaned under the weight of their precious load, the Apostle of the Ganges" (Dr. Duff to wit).—Smith's Life of Dr. John Wilson, 1878, p. 282.

1877.—"The stately iron gate enclosing the front garden of the Russian Embassy was betted by a motley crowd... Hamals, or street porters, bent double under the burden of heavy trunks and boxes, would come now and then up one or other of the two semicircular avenues."—Letter from Constantinople, in Times, May 7.

HUMMING-BIRD, s. This name is popularly applied in some parts of India to the sun-birds (sub-fam. Nectarininae).

HUMP, s. 'Calcutta humps' are the salted humps of Indian oxen exported from that city. (See under BUFFALO.)

HURCARA, HIRCARA, &c., s. Hind. harkat, 'a messenger, a courier; an emissary, a spy' (Wilson). The etymology, according to the same authority, is har, 'every', khar, 'business.' The word became very familiar in the Gilchristian spelling Hurkaru, from the existence of a Calcutta newspaper bearing that title (Bengal Hurkaru, generally enunciated by non-Indians as Hurkero), for the first 60 years of last century, or thereabouts.

1747.—"Given to the Incarax for bringing news of the Engagement. (Pag.) 4 3 0."—Fort St. David, Expenses of the Paymaster, under January. MS. Records in India Office.

1748.—"The city of Daosca is in the utmost confusion on account of... advices of a large force of Mahrattas coming by way of the Sunderbunds, and that they were advanced as far as Sunbara Col, when first descried by their Hurcaras."—In Long, 4.

1757.—"I beg you to send me a good aloara who understands the Portuguese language."—Letter in Ives, 159.

"Hircara or Spies."—Ibid. 161; [and comp. 67].

1761.—"The head Hoscarr returned, and told me this as well as several other secrets very useful to me, which I got from him by dint of money and some rum."—Letter of Capt. Martin White, in Long, 290.

[1772.—"Hercara..." (See under DALOVET.)]

1780.—"One day upon the march a Hircarr came up and delivered him a letter from Colonel Baillie."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1803.—"The Hircarras reported the enemy to be at Bokerdun."—Letter of A. Wellesley, ibid. 348.

c. 1810.—"We were met at the entrance of Tipoo's dominions by four hircarras, or soldiers, whom the Sultan sent as a guard to conduct us safely."—Miss Edgeworth, Lame Jerees. Miss Edgeworth has oddly misused the word here.

1813.—"The contrivances of the native halcarra and spies to conceal a letter are extremely clever, and the measures they frequently adopt to elude the vigilance of an enemy are equally extraordinary."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 129; [compare 2nd ed. i. 64; ii. 201].

HURTAUL, s. Hind. from Skt. hartiata, hartat, hartat, yellow arsenic,orpiment.

c. 1347.—Ibn Batuta seems oddly to confound it with camphor. "The best (camphor) called in the country itself halDarla, which is what attains the highest degree of cold."—iv. 241.

c. 1759.—"... harta and Cotch, Earth-Oil and Wood-Oil..."—List of Burmese Products, in Dalrymple's Or. Reptr. i. 109.

HUZARA, n.p. This name has two quite distinct uses.

(a.) Pers. Hazdrā. It is used as a generic name for a number of tribes occupying some of the wildest parts of Afghanistan, chiefly N.W. and S.W. of Kabul. These tribes are in no respect Afghan, but are in fact most or all of them Mongol in features, and some of them also in language. The term at one time appears to have been used more generally for a variety of the wilder clans in the higher hill countries of Afghanistan and the Oxus basin, much as in Scotland of a century and a half ago they spoke of "the clans." It appears to be merely from the Pers. hāzdrā, 1000. The regiments, so to speak, of the Mongol hosts of Chinghiz and his immediate successors were called hāzdras, and if we accept the belief that the Hazdras of Afghanistan were predatory bands of those hosts who settled in that region (in favour of which there is a good deal to be said), this name is intelligible. If so, its application to the non-Mongol people of Wakhān, &c., must have been a later transfer. [See the discussion by Bellew, who points out that "amongst themselves this people never use the term Hazdrā as their national appellation, and yet they have no name for their people as a nation.
They are only known amongst themselves by the names of their principal tribes and the clans subordinate to them respectively.” (Races of Afghanistan, 114.)

c. 1480.—“The Hasara, Takdari, and all the other tribes having seen this, quietly submitted to his authority.”—Tarikh-i-Nama, in Elliot, i. 303. For Takdari we should probably read Nakudari; and see Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 18, note on Nigudaris.

c. 1505.—Kabul “on the west has the mountain districts, in which are situated Karnaot and Ghur. This mountainous tract is at present occupied and inhabited by the Hasara and Nakediri tribes.”—Baber, p. 138.

1506.—“Mirza Ababeker, the ruler and tyrant of Kasghar, had seized all the Upper Hasara of Badakhshan.”—Erakine’s Baber and Humayne, i. 287. “Hasjooyt badakht. The upper districts in Badakhshan were called Hasara.” Erakine’s note. He is using the Tarikh Rashid. But is not the word Hasara here, the clans, used elliptically for the highland districts occupied by them?

[c. 1590.—“The Hasara are the descendants of the Chaghatai army, sent by Manku Khan to the assistance of Hulak Khan. They possess horses, sheep and goats. They are divided into factions, each covetous of what they can obtain, deceptive in their common intercourse and their conventions of amity savour of the wolf.”—Ats, ed. Jarrett, ii. 402.]

(b.) A mountain district in the extreme N.W. of the Punjab, of which Abbottabad, called after its founder, General James Abbott, is the British head-quarter. The name of this region apparently has nothing to do with Hasara in the tribal sense, but is probably a survival of the ancient name of a territory in this quarter, called in Sanskrit Abhisadra, and figuring in Potlemy, Arrian and Curtius as the kingdom of King Abisar. (See M’Grindle, Invasion of India, 69.)

Huzoor, s. Ar. huzur, ‘the presence’; used by natives as a respectful way of talking of or to exalted personages, to or of their master, or occasionally of any European gentleman in presence of another European. [The allied words huzrat and huzri are used in kindred senses as in the examples.]

[1787.—“You will send to the Huzoor an account particular of the assessment payable by each ryot.”—Parsona of Tipopoo, in Logan, Malabar, ill. 125.

[1813.—“The Mahratta cavalry are divided into several classes: the Husserat, or house-

1516.—"Hydralcan." See under SABAIO.

1546.—"Treatido de controto que ho Gouvernador Dom Joao de Crasto fuez com o Idaiozr, que dantes se chamavu Idaicho."—Tombo, in Subsidios, 38.

1623.—"And as those Governors grew weary of obeying the King of Daquen (Deccan), they conspired among themselves that each should appropriate his own lands ... and the great-grandfather of this Adelham who now reigns was one of those captains who revolted; he was a Turk by nation and died in the year 1536; a very powerful man he was always, but it was from him that we twice took by force of arms this city of Goa. ..."—Garcia, f. 35n. [And comp. Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 199.]

N.B.—It was the second of the dynasty who died in 1536; the original Adil Khan (or Sabaio) died in 1510, just before the attack of Goa by the Portuguese.

1594-5.—"There are three distinct States in the Dakhin. The Nizam-ul-Mulkya, Adil Khaniya, and Kutb-ul-Mulkya. The settled rule among them was, that if a foreign army entered their country, they united their forces and fought, notwithstanding the disensions and quarrels they had among themselves. It was also the rule, that when their forces were united, Nizam-ul-Mulk commanded the centre, Adil Khan the right, and Kutb-ul-Mulk the left. This rule was now observed, and an immense force had been collected."—Akbar-Nama, in Elliot, vi. 181.

IMAUM, a. Ar. Imam, 'an exemplar, a leader' (from a root signifying 'to aim at, to follow after'), a title technically applied to the Caliph (Khalifa) or 'Vicegerent,' or Successor, who is the head of Islam. The title is also given—in its religious import only—to the heads of the four orthodox sects ... and in a more restricted sense still, to the ordinary functionary of a mosque who leads in the daily prayers of the congregation? (Dr. Badger, Omdm, App. A.). The title has been perhaps most familiar to Anglo-Indians as that of the Princes of Omen, or "Imauns of Muscat," as they were commonly termed. This title they derived from being the heads of a sect (Ibadiyya) holding peculiar doctrine as to the Imamate, and rejecting the Caliphate of Ali or his successors. It has not been assumed by the Princes themselves since Sa'id bin Ahmad who died in the early part of last century, but was always applied by the English to Saiyid Sa'id, who reigned for 52 years, dying in 1856. Since then, and since the separation of the dominions of the dynasty in Oman and in Africa, the title Imam has no longer been used.

It is a singular thing that in an article on Zanzibar in the J. R. Geo. Soc. vol. xxiith, by the late Col. Sykes, the Sultan is always called the Imauum, [of which other examples will be found below].

1673.—"At night we saw Muscat, whose vast and horrid Mountains no Shade but Heaven does hide. ... The Prince of this country is called Imaum, who is guardian at Mahomet's Tomb, and on whom is devolved the right of Caliphship according to the Ottoman belief."—Fryer, 220.

[1758.—"These people are Mahomedans of a particular sect ... they are subject to an Iman, who has absolute authority over them."—Hawsoy, iii. 67.]

[1901.—Of the Bombay Kojas, "there were only 12 Imans, the last of the number ... having disappeared without issue."—Times, April 12.]

IMAUMABBA. a. This is a hybrid word Imdm-bdrd, in which the last part is the Hindi bdrd, 'an enclosure,' &c. It is applied to a building maintained by Shi'a communities in India for the express purpose of celebrating the mahurrum ceremonies (see HOBBSON-JOBSON). The sepulchre of the Founder and his family is often combined with this object. The Imambarah of the Nawab Asaf-ud-daula at Lucknow is, or was till the siege of 1858, probably the most magnificent modern Oriental structure in India. It united with the objects already mentioned a mosque, a college, and apartments for the members of the religious establishment. The great hall is "conceived on so grand a scale," says Ferguson, "as to entitle it to rank with the buildings of an earlier age." The central part of it forms a vaulted apartment of 162 feet long by 53½ wide.

[1837.—"In the afternoon we went to see the Imaumberra."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 87.]

IMPALA. v. It is startling to find an injunction to impale criminals given by an English governor (Vansittart, apparently) little more than a century ago. [See CALUETE.]

1764.—"I request that you will give orders to the Naib of Dacca to send some of the Factory Sepoys along with some of his own people, to apprehend the said murderers and to impale them, which was be very serviceable to traders."—The Governor of Fort William to the Nawab; in Long, 389.

1768-71.—"The punishments inflicted at Batavia are excessively severe, especially such as fall upon the Indians. Impalement is the chief and most terrible."—Satorinus, i. 288. This writer proceeds to give a description of the horrible process, which he witnessed.

INAUM, ENAUM, s. Ar. in'äm, 'a gift' (from a superior), 'a favour,' but especially in India a gift of rent-free land: also land so held. In'amādār, the holder of such lands. A full detail of the different kinds of in'am, especially among the Mahattas, will be found in Wilson, s.v. The word is also used in Western India for buckhsheesh (q.v.). This use is said to have given rise to a little mistake on the part of an English political traveller some 30 or 40 years ago, when there had been some agitation regarding the in'am lands and the alleged harshness of the Government in dealing with such claims. The traveller reported that the public feeling in the west of India was so strong on this subject that his very palanquin-bearers at the end of their stage invariably joined their hands in supplication, shouting, "In'am! In'am! Sahib!"

INDIA, INDIES, n.p. A book might be written on this name. We can only notice a few points in connection with it.

It is not easy, if it be possible, to find a truly native (i.e. Hindu) name for the whole country which we call India; but the conception certainly existed from an early date. Bhadravatavarsa is used apparently in the Purāṇas with something like this conception. Jambudvīpa, a term belonging to the mythical cosmography, is used in the Buddhist books, and sometimes, by the natives of the south, even now. The accuracy of the definitions of India in some of the Greek and Roman authors shows the existence of the same conception of the country that we have now; a conception also obvious in the modes of speech of Hwen T'āang and the other Chinese pilgrims. The Aṣoka inscriptions, c. B.C. 250, had enumerated Indian kingdoms covering a considerable part of the conception, and in the great inscription at Tanjore, of the 11th century A.D., which incidentally mentions the conquest (real or imaginary) of a great part of India, by the king of Tanjore, Vira-Chola, the same system is followed. In a copperplate of the 11th century, by the Chalukya dynasty of Kalyāṇa, we find the expression "from the Himalaya to the Bridge" (Ind. Antiq. i. 81), i.e. the Bridge of Rāma, or 'Adam's Bridge,' as our maps have it. And Mahomedan definitions as old, and with the name, will be found below. Under the Hindu kings of Vijayanagara also (from the 14th century) inscriptions indicate all India by like expressions.

The origin of the name is without doubt (Skt.) Sīnda, 'the sea,' and thence the Great River on the West, and the country on its banks, which we still call Sīndh. By a change common in many parts of the world, and in various parts of India itself, this name exchanged the initial sibilant for an aspirate, and became (eventually) in Persia Hindā, and so passed on to the Greeks and Latins, viz. 'Sīndō for the people, 'Sīndus for the river, 'Sīndik and India for the country on its banks. Given this name for the western tract, and the conception of the country as a whole to which we have alluded, the name in the mouths of foreigners naturally but gradually spread to the whole. Some have imagined that the name of the land of Nōd ('wandering'), to which Cain is said to have migrated, and which has the same consonants, is but a form of this; which is worth noting, as this idea may have had to do with the curious statement in some medieval writers (e.g. John Marignolli) that certain eastern races were "the descendants of Cain." In the form Hindu [Hindus, see Encycl. Bibl. ii. 2169] India appears in the great cuneiform inscription on the tomb of Darius Hyntaspes near Persepolis, coupled with Gaddra (i.e. Gandhāra, or the Peshawar country), and no doubt still in some degree restricted in its application. In the Hebrew of Esther i. 1, and viii. 9, the form is Ḥod(ā)vā, or perhaps rather Ḥiddā (see also Perētul below). The first Greek writers to speak of India and the Indians were Hecataeus of Miletus, Herodotus, and Ctesias (B.C. c. 500, c. 224).
Malabar India Parva, and India Inferior.

There was yet another, and an Oriental, application of the term India to the country at the mouth of the Tigris and Euphrates, which the people of Basra still call Hind; and which Sir H. Rawlinson connects with the fact that the Talmudic writers confounded Obillah in that region with the Havila of Genesis. (See Cathay, &c., 55, note.)

In the work of the Chinese traveller Hwen Tsang again we find that by him and his co-religionists a plurality of Indias was recognised, i.e. five, viz. North, Central, East, South, and West.

Here we may remark how two names grew out of the original Sindhu. The aspirated and Persianised form Hind, as applied to the great country beyond the Indus, passed to the Arabs. But when they invaded the valley of the Indus and found it called Sindhu, they adopted that name in the form Sind, and thenceforward 'Hind and Sind' were habitually distinguished, though generally coupled, and conceived as two parts of a great whole.

Of the application of India to an Ethiopian region, an application of which indications extend over 1500 years, we have not space to speak here. On this and on the medieval plurality of Indias reference may be made to two notes on Marco Polo, 2nd ed. vol. ii. pp. 419 and 425.

The vague extension of the term India to which we have referred, survives in another form besides that in the use of 'Indies.' India, to each European nation which has possessions in the East, may be said, without much inaccuracy, to mean in colloquial use that part of the East in which their own possessions lie. Thus to the Portuguese, India was, and probably still is, the West Coast only. In their writers of the 16th and 17th century a distinction is made between India, the territory of the Portuguese and their immediate neighbours on the West Coast, and Mogor, the dominions of the Great Mogul. To the Dutchman India means Java and its dependencies. To the Spaniard, if we mistake not, India is Manilla. To the Gaul are not les Indes Pondicherry, Chander-nagore, and Réunion?

As regards the West Indies, this expression originates in the misconception of the great Admiral himself, who in his memorable enterprise was seeking, and thought he had found, a new route to the 'Indias' by sailing west instead of east. His discoveries were to Spain the Indies, until it gradually became manifest that they were not identical with the ancient lands of the east, and then they became the West-Indies.

INDIAN is a name which has been carried still further abroad; from being applied, as a matter of course, to the natives of the islands, supposed of India, discovered by Columbus, it naturally passed to the natives of the adjoining continent, till it came to be the familiar name of all the tribes between (and sometimes even including) the Esquimaux of the North and the Patagonians of the South.

This abuse no doubt has led to our hesitation in applying the term to a native of India itself. We use the adjective Indian, but no modern Englishman who has had to do with India ever speaks of a man of that country as 'an Indian.' Forrest, in his Voyage to Mergia, uses the inelegant word Indostaner; but in India itself a Hindustani means, as has been indicated under that word, a native of the upper Gangetic valley and adjoining districts. Among the Greeks 'an Indian' (Ἰνδιας) acquired a notable specific application. viz. to an elephant driver or mahout (q.v.).

B.C. c. 486.—"Says Darius the King: By the grace of Ormazd these (are) the countries which I have established my power over them. They have brought tribute to me. That which has been said to them by me they have done. They have obeyed my law. Medea... Arachotia (Haranuatiae), Sattagydia (Thalagysh), Gandaria (Gadra), India (Hindus)..."—On the Tomb of Darius at Nakhahi-Rustam, see Rawlinson's Herod. iv. 250.

B.C. c. 440.—"Eastward of India lies a tract which is entirely sand. Indeed, of all the inhabitants of Asia, concerning whom anything is known, the Indians dwell nearest to the east, and the rising of the Sun."—Herodotus, iii. c. 98 (Rawlinson).

B.C. c. 300.—"India then (γι' τολω' Ἰ'νδωρ) being four-sided in plan, the side which looks to the Orient and that to South, the Great Sea compasseth; that towards the Arctic is divided by the mountain chain of Himadra from Scythia, inhabited by that tribe of Scythians who are called Saka; and on the fourth side, turned towards the West, the Indus marks the boundary, the biggest or nearly so of all rivers after the Nile."—Megasthenes, in Diodorus, ii. 35. (From Müller's Fragm. Hist. Græc., ii. 402.)

c. 590.—"As for the land of the Hind it is bounded on the East by the Persian Sea (i.e. the Indian Ocean), on the W. and S. by the countries of Iskām, and on the N. by the Chinese Empire... The length of the land of the Hind from the government of Mokrān, the country of Mansūra and Bodha and the rest of Sind, till thou comest to Kannūj and thence passest on to Tobbat (see TIBET), is about 4 months, and its breadth from the Indian Ocean to the country of Kannūj about three months."—Istakhri, pp. 6 and 11.

c. 650.—"The name of Tien-chu (India) has gone through various and confused forms... Anciently they said Shin-tu; whilst some authors called it Hien-tou. Now conforming to the true pronunciation one should say Ba-tu."—Hven Tsang, in Phil. Bouddh., ii. 57.

c. 944.—"For the nonce let us confine ourselves to summary notices concerning the kings of Sind and Hind. The language of Sind is different from that of Hind..."—Mag'idi, i. 381.

c. 1020.—"India (Al-Hind) is one of those plains bounded on the south by the Sea of the Indians. Lofty mountains bound it on all the other quarters. Through this plain the waters descending from the mountains are discharged. Thou wilt examine this country with thine eyes, if thou wilt regard the rounded and worn stones which are found in the soil, however deep thou mayest dig;—stones which near the mountains, where the rivers roll down violently, are large; but small at a distance from the mountains, where the current slackens; and which become mere sand where the currents are at rest, where the waters sink into the soil, and where the sea is at hand—then thou wilt be tempted to believe that this country was at a former period only a sea which the debris washed down by the torrents hath filled up..."—Al-Birūnī, in Reinhard's Extracts, Journ. As. ser. 4, 1844.

"Hind is surrounded on the East by Chīn and Māchina, on the West by Sind and Kābul, and on the South by the Sea."—Ibid. in Elliot, i. 45.

1205.—"The whole country of Hind, from Persābaur to the shores of the Ocean, and in the other direction, from Siwāgān to the hills of Chīn..."—Hām Nizāmī, in Elliot, ii. 236. That is, from Peshawar in the north, to the Indian Ocean in the south; from Sebāwan (on the west bank of the Indian) to the mountains on the east dividing from China.

c. 1600.—"Hudu quae est India extra et intra Gangem."—Hist. Mundī (in Hebrew), by Abr. Perīsoi, in Hyde, Synagoga Dissert., Oxon, 1767, i. 75.

The distinct Indias.
c. 650.—"The circumference of the Five Indies is about 30,000 ri; on three sides it is bounded by a great sea; on the north it is backed by snowy mountains. It is wide at the north and narrow at the south; its figure is that of a half-moon."—H. T. song, in Pél. Boud., ii. 58.

1208.—"India the Greater is that which extends from Maabar to Kasmocor (i.e. from Coromandel to Mekran), and it contains 13 great kingdoms. . . . India the Lesser extends from the Province of Champe to Mufflip (i.e. from Cochín-China to the Kistna Delta), and contains 8 great Kingdoms. . . . Abash (Abysinia) is a very great province, and you must know it constitutes the Middle India."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 34, 35.

1326.—"What shall I say? The greatness of this India is beyond description. But let this much suffice concerning India the Greater and the Less. Of India Tordera I will say this, that I have not indeed seen its many marvels, not having been there. . . ."—Friedrich Jordanius, p. 41.

India Minor, in Clavijo, looks as if it were applied to Afghanistan:

1404.—"And this same Thursday that the said Ambassadors arrived at this great River (the Oxus) they crossed to the other side. And the same day . . . came in the evening to a great city which is called Term (Termo diabetic), and this used to belong to India Minor, but now belongs to the empire of Samarkand, having been conquered by Tamurbeck."—Clavijo, § 8ii. (Markham, 119).

Indies.
c. 1601.—"He does smile his face into more lines than are in the new map with the augmentation of the Indias."—Travels Night, Act iii. sc. 2.

1653.—"I was thirteen times captive and seventeen times sold in the Indies."—Trans. of Pinto, by H. Cogan, p. 1.

1626.—". . . Like a French lady of my acquaintance, who had so general a notion of the East, that upon taking leave of her, she enjoined me to get acquainted with a friend of hers, living as she said petrolzq par dans les Indes, and whom, to my astonishment, I found residing at the Cape of Good Hope."—Haji, Baba, Introd. Epistle, ed. 1838, p. ix.

India of the Portuguese.
c. 1557.—"Di qui (Colan) a Cao Comer si fanno sette guad miglia, e qui si finisce la costa dell'India."—Cele. Federici, in Rassauo, iii. 390.

1588.—"At the end of the course of Cambaia beginneth India and the lands of Damma and Cuncaum . . . from the island called Das Vagias (read Vagias) . . . which is the right coast that in all the East Countries is called India. . . . Now you must understand that this coast of India beginneth at Damaun, or the Island Das Vagias, and stretched South and by East, to the Cape of Comoris, where it endeth."—Laschotes, ch. ix. x.; [Hak. Soc. i. 92. See also under ABADA].

1610.—"Il y a grand nombre des Portugais qui demeurent à ports de cette costa de Bengale . . . ils n'osent retourner en l'Inde, pour quelques fautes qu'ils y ont commis."—Pyrd. de Laval, i. 239; [Hak. Soc. i. 384].

1615.—"Sociorum literis, qui Mogoris Regiam insolunt auditum est in India de celeberrimo Regno illo quod Saracenii Catalogum vocant."—Trigautius, De Christian Expeditione apud Sinas, p. 134. 1564.—(Speaking of the Dama district above Bombay. . . . The fruits are nearly all the same as those you get in India, and especially many Mangus and Cassaras (!), which are like chestnuts."—Bocarro, MS.

It is remarkable to find the term used, in a similar restricted sense, by the Court of the E.I.C. in writing to Fort St. George. They certainly mean some part of the west coast.

1670.—They desire that dungarees may be supplied thence if possible, as they were not procurable on the Coast of India, by reason of the disturbances of Sevaje."—Notes and Extra., Pt. i. 2.

1173.—"The Portugues . . . might have subdued India by this time, had not we fallen out with them, and given them the first Blow at Ormuz... they have added some Christians to those formerly converted by St. Thomas, but it is a loud Report to say all India."—Pryce, 137.

1831.—In a correspondence with Sir R. Morier, we observe the Portuguese Minister of Foreign Affairs calls their Goa Vicerey "The Governor General of India."

India of the Dutch.

1876.—The Dorian "is common throughout all India."—Filet, Plant-Kwading Woodendock, 196.

Indies applied to America.

1653.—"And please to tell me... which is better, this (Radix Chiniae) or the gewacto of our Indies as we call them..."—Garcia, f. 177.

INDIAN. This word in English first occurs, according to Dr. Guest, in the following passage:—

A.D. 432-440.
"Mid israelum ic was... mid strum and indum, and mid egypyanum."

In Guest's English Rhythms, ii. 86-87.

But it may be queried whether indum is not here an error for india... the converse error that to supposed to have been made in the printing of Othello's death-speech—

"of one whose hand like the base Judas threw a pearl away."

Indian used for Mahout.

B.C. 116-106.—"And upon the beasts (the elephants) there were strong towers of wood, which covered every one of them, and were girt fast unto them with devices: there were also upon every one two and thirty strong men, that fought upon them, besides the Indian that ruled them."—I. Maccabees, vi. 37.

B.C. c. 150.—"Of Beasts (i.e. elephants) taken with all their Indians there were ten; and of all the rest, which had thrown their Indians, he got possession after the battle by driving them together."—Polybius, Bk. i. ch. 40; see also iii. 46, and xi. 1. It is very curious to see the drivers of Carthaginian elephants thus called Indians, though it may be presumed that this is only a Greek application of the term, not a Carthaginian use.

B.C. c. 20.—"Tertio die... ad Thabu-son castellum immunes fluvio Indo ventum est; cui fecerat nomen Indus ab elephantabo dejectus."—Livy, Bk. xxxviii. 14. This Indus or "Indian" river, named after the Mahout thrown into it by his elephant, was somewhere on the borders of Phrygia.

A.D. c. 210.—"Along with this elephant was brought up a female one called Nikais. And the wife of their Indian being near death placed her child of 30 days old beside this one. And when the woman died a certain marvellous attachment grew up of the Beast towards the child..."—Athenaeus, xiii. ch. 8.

Indian, for Anglo-Indian.

1816.—"... our best Indians. In the idleness and obscurity of home they look back with fondness to the country where they have been useful and distinguished, like the ghosts of Homer's heroes, who prefer the exertions of a labourer on the earth to all the listless enjoyments of Elysium."—Biphistone, in Life, i. 367.

INDIGO, a. The plant Indigofera tinctoria, L. (N.O. Leguminoseae), and the dark blue dye made from it. Greek τιντως. This word appears from Hippocrates to have been applied in his time to pepper. It is also applied by Dioscorides to the mineral substance (a variety of the red oxide of iron) called Indian red (F. Adams, Appendix to Dunbar's Lexicon). [Liddell & Scott call it "a dark-blue dye, indigo." The dye was used in Egyptian mummy-cloths (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, ed. 1878, ii. 163.)]

A.D. c. 60.—"Of that which is called τιντως one kind is produced spontaneously, being as it were a scum thrown out by the Indian reeds; but that used for dyeing is a purple efflorescence which floats on the brazen cauldrons, which the craftmen skim off and dry. That is deemed best which is blue in colour, succulent, and smooth to the touch."—Dioscorides, v. cap. 107.

c. 70.—"After this... Indico (Indicum) is a colour most esteemed; out of India it commeth; whereupon it tooke the name; and it is nothing els but a slime mud clearing to the somme that gathereth about canes and reeds: whiles it is unned or ground, it looketh blakke; but being dissolved it yealdeth a woonderfull lovely mixture of purple and azur... Indico is valued at 20 denarii the pound. In physicke there is use of this Indico; for it doth amasse swellings that doe stretch the skin."—Pliny, by Ph. Holand, ii. 531.

c. 80-90.—"This river (Synthus, i.e. Indus) has 7 mouths... and it has none of them navigable except the middle one only, on which there is a coast mart called Barbaricon... The articles imported into this mart are... On the other hand there are exported Costus, Bedellium... and Indian Black (τιντως μωρα, i.e. Indigo).—Periplus, 38, 39.

1288.—(At Coilum) "They have also abundance of very fine indigo (ynde). This is made of a certain herb which is gathered and [after the roots have been removed] is put into great vessels upon which they pour water, and then leave it till the whole of the plant is decomposed..."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 22.
1684.—"Indigo from Zindi and Cambais."—Barrett, in Hakt. ii. 413.

[1605-8.]—"... for all which we shall buy Rice, Indico, Lapes Bezar which there are in abundance are to be had."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 77.

[1609.]—"... to buy such Comodities as they shall find there as Indico, of Laher (Lahore), here worth viij. the pound Serchem and the best Belondri."—Ibid. 287. Serchem is Sarkej, the Seraice of Forbes (On Memoirs) 2nd ed. ii. 284) near Ahmedabad; Sir G. Birdwood with some hesitation identifies Belondri with Valabhi, 20 m. N.W. of Bhavnagar.

1719.—". . . their business in the South Seas was to sweep those coasts clear of the French Interlopers, which they did very effectually."—Shelvocke's Voyage, 29.

"I wish you would explain yourself; I cannot imagine what reason I have to be afraid of any of the Company's ships, or Dutch ships, I am no Interloper."—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. ii.

1730.—"To Interloper [of inter. L. between, and usurp. Du. to run, q. d. to run in between, and intercept the Commerce of others], to trade without proper Authority, or interfere with a Company in Commerce."—Bailey's English Dict. s.v.

1760.—"Enterlooper. Term of Commerce de Mer, fort en usage parmi les Compagnies des Pays du Nord, comme l'Angleterre, la Hollande, Hambourg, le Danemark, &c. Il signifie un vaisseau d'un particulier qui pratique et frequente les Côtes, et les Havres ou Porte de Mer fortes, pour y faire un commerce clandestin, au prejudice des Compagnies qui sont autorisées elles seules à le faire dans ces memes lieux. . . . Ce mot se prononce comme s'il eust etoit Enterloper. Il est emprunte de l'Anglois, de inter qui signifie entreer et entreprendre, et de Looper, Courrier."—Savary des Bruslions, Dict. Univ. de Commerce, Nouv. ed., Copenhagen, a.v. c. 1812.—"The fault lies in the clause which gives the Company power to send home interlopers . . . and is just as reasonable as one which should forbid all the people of England, except a select few, to look at the moon."—Letter of Dr. Carey, in William Carey, by James Culross, D.D., 1851, p. 165.

IPECAUANHA (WILD), a. The garden name of a plant (Asclepias curassavica, L.) naturalised in all tropical countries. It has nothing to do with the true ipecacuanha, but its root is a powerful emetic, whence the name. The true ipecacuanha is cultivated in India.

IRON-WOOD. This name is applied to several trees in different parts; e.g. to Menisa ferrea, L. (N.O. Clusiaceae), Hind. nagkeur; and in the Burmese provinces to Xylos dolabriformis, Benth.

I-SAY. The Chinese mob used to call the English soldiers Asiaus or Isays, from the frequency of this apostrophe in their mouths. (The French gamins, it is said, do the same at Boulogne.) At Amoy the Chinese used to call out after foreigners Akse! Akse! a tradition from the Portuguese Aquis! 'Here!' In Java the French are called by the natives Orang deesdong, i.e. the dites-donc people. (See Fortune's Two Visits to the Tea Countries, 1853, p. 59; and Notes and Queries in China and Japan, ii. 175.)

[1883.—"The Sepos were . . . invariably called 'Achas.' Acha or good is the constantly recurring answer of a Sepoy when spoken to. . . ."—Fisher, Three Years in China, 143.]

IBEKAT, a. Ratlines. A marine term from Port. escada (Roebuck).

[ISLAM, a. Infn. of Ar. salam, 'to be or become safe'; the word generally used by Mahomedans for their religion.

[1616.—"Dated in Achen 1025 according to the rate of Islam."—Poster, Letters, iv. 125.]
ISTOOP, s. Oakum. A marine term from Port. estopa (Roebuck).

ISTUBBUL, a Thia usual Hind. word for 'stable' may naturally be im ned to be a corruption of the word. But it really Ar., though that no doubt came in old times from the Latin tabulum through some Byzantine Greek form.

ITZBOO, s. A Japanese coin, the smallest silver denomination. Isi-bu, 'one drachm.' [The N.E.D. gives its, isbe, 'one,' bū, 'division, part, quarter'.] Present value about 1s.

IZAM MALUCO, n.p. We often find this form in Correa, instead of Nizamaluco (q.v.).

JACK, s. Short for Jack-Sepoy; in former days a familiar style for the native soldier; kindly, rather than otherwise.

1853.—"... he should be leading the Jacks."—Oakfield, ii. 66.

JACK, s. The tree called by botanists Artocarpus integrifolia, L. fil., and its fruit. The name, says Drury, is "a corruption of the Skt. word Tschakka, which means the fruit of the tree" (Useful Plants, p. 55). There is, however, no such Skt. word; the Skt. names are Kantaka, Phala, Panasa, and Phalasa. [But the Malayāl. chakka is from the Skt. chakra, 'round.'] Rheede rightly gives Tkaka (chakka) as the Malayāl. name, and from this no doubt the Portuguese took jaca and handed it on to us. "They call it," says Garcia Orta, "in Malavar jm, in Canarese and Guzerati panas" (f. 111). "The Tamil form is sakkē, the meaning of which, as may be adduced from various uses to which the word is put in Tamil, is 'the fruit abounding in rind and refuse.'" (Letter from Bp. Caldwell.)

We can hardly doubt that this is the fruit of which Pliny writes: "Major alia pomo et suavitate prae-utilentior; quo sapiientiores Indorum vivunt. (Foliu alia avium imitaturn longitudine trium cubitum, latitudine duum). Fructum e corticis insitit admirabilis succi dulciscede; ut uno quaternos satiet. Arbori nomen palae, pomo arienzae; plurima est in Sydracise, expeditionum Alexandri termino. Est et alia similis huic; dulcius pomo; sed interaneorum valetudini infesta." (Hist. Nat. xii. 12.) Thus rendered, not too faithfully, by Philemon Holland: "Another tree there is in India, greater yet than the former; bearing a fruit much fairer, bigger, and sweeter than the figs asoresaid; and whereof the Indian Sages and Philosophers do ordinarily live. The leaf resembleth birds' wings, carrying three cubite in length, and two in breadth. The fruit it putth forth at the bark, having within it a wonderfull pleasant juice: insomuch as one of them is sufficient to give four men a competent and full refection. The tree's name is Pala, and the fruit is called Ariena. Great plenty of them is in the country of the Sydraci, the utmost limit of Alexander the Great his expeditions and voyages. And yet there is another tree much like to this, and beareth a fruit more delectable that this Ariena, albeit the guts in a man's belly it wringeth and breeds the bloudie flx" (i. 361). Strange to say, the fruit thus described has been generally identified with the plantain: so generally that (we presume) the Linnaean name of the plantain Musa sapientium, was founded upon the interpretation of this passage. (It was, I find, the excellent Rumphius who originated the erroneous identification of the 阿里亚 with the plantain). Lassen, at first hesitatingly (I. 283), and then more positively (ii. 678), adopts this interpretation, and seeks 阿里亚 in the Skt. ग्रीना. The shrivelled Gildemeister does the like, for he, sans phrase, uses 阿里亚 as Latin for 'plantains.' Ritter, too, accepts it, and is not staggered even by the Uno quadratius satiet. Humboldt, quoth he, often saw Indians make their meal with a very little manioc and three bananas of the big kind (Platano-arton). Still less sufficed the Indian Brahmins (sapientum), when one fruit was enough for four of them (v. 676, 677). Bless the venerable Prince of Geographers! Would one Kartoffel, even "of the big kind," make a dinner for four German Professors? Just as little would one plantain suffice four Indian Sages.

The words which we have italicised in the passage from Pliny are quite enough to show that the jack is intended; the fruit growing e cortice (i.e. piercing the bark of the stem, not pendent from twigs like other fruit), the sweetness, the monstrous size, are in combination inaffable. And as regards its being the fruit of the sages, we may observe that the jack fruit is at this day in Travancore one of the staples of life. But that Pliny, after his manner, has jumbled things, is also manifest. The first two clauses of his description (Major alia, &c.; Folium alas, &c.) are found in Theophrastus, but apply to two different trees. Hence we get rid of the puzzle about the big leaves, which led scholars astray after plantains, and originated Musa sapientium. And it is clear from Theophrastus that the fruit which caused dysentery in the Macedonian army was yet another. So Pliny has rolled three plants into one. Here are the passages of Theophrastus:—

"(1) And there is another tree which is both itself a tree of great size, and produces a fruit that is wonderfully big and sweet. This is used for food by the Indian Sages, who wear no clothes. (2) And there is yet another which has the leaf of a very long shape, and resembling the wings of birds, and this they set upon helmets; the length is about two cubits..." (3) There is another tree the fruit of which is long, and not straight but crooked, and sweet to the taste. But this gives rise to colic and dysentery ("Αλλοι τε έτιν όρ ο γαρ κατό μακρος και οίκε εθόθ άλλα σκόλως, έσθηθανος δε γυνικις. Όσοι ες τη ιαλε δημνις ήρει και δυσεπιβανα...") wherefore Alexander published a general order against eating it."—(Hist. Plant.* iv. 4-5.)*

It is plain that Pliny and Theophrastus were using the same authority, but neither copying the whole of what he found in it.

The second tree, whose leaves were like birds' wings and were used to fix upon helmets, is hard to identify. The first was, when we combine the additional characters quoted by Pliny but omitted by Theophrastus, certainly the jack; the third was, we suspect, the 芒果 (q.v.). The terms long and crooked would, perhaps, answer better to the plantain, but hardly the unwholesome effect. As regards the Uno quadratius satiet, compare Friar Jordanus below, on the jack: "Sufficit circiter pro quinque personis." Indeed the whole of the Friar's account is worth comparing with Pliny's. Pliny says that it took four men to eat a jack, Jordanus says five. But an Englishman who had a plantation in Central Java told one of the present writers that he once cut a jack on his ground which took three men—not to eat—but to carry!

As regards the names given by Pliny it is hard to say anything to the purpose, because we do not know to which of the three trees jumbled together the names really applied. If pala really applied to the jack, possibly it may be the Skt. philasa, or panasa. Or it may be merely p'ala, 'a fruit,' and the passage would then be a comical illustration of the persistence of Indian habits of mind. For a stranger in India, on asking the question, 'What on earth is that?' as he well might on his first sight of a jack-tree with its fruit, would at the present day almost certainly receive for answer: 'Phat hai khudawand!"—'It is a fruit, my lord!' 阿里亚 looks like hiranya, 'golden;' which might be an epithet of the jack, but we find no such specific application of the word.

Omitting Theophrastus and Pliny, the oldest foreign description of the JACK

Jack that we find is that by Hwen T'sang, who met with it in Bengal:

C. A.D. 650. — "Although the fruit of the Patan-vat (Patanvat, Patan or Pana), according to great quantities, is held in high esteem. These fruits are as big as a pumpkin; when ripe they are of a reddish yellow. Split in two they disclose inside a quantity of little fruits as big as crane's eggs; and when these are broken there exudes a juice of reddish-yellow colour and delicious flavour. Sometimes the fruit hangs on the branches, as with other trees; but sometimes it grows from the roots, like the fo-ting (Radix Chiniae), which is found under the ground." — Jiten, iii. 75.

C. 1528. — "There are some trees that bear a very big fruit called chaqui; and the fruit is of such size that one is enough for about five persons. There is another tree that has a fruit like that just named, and it is called Bhoqui [a corruption of Malayal. varikka, 'superior fruit'], quite as big and as sweet, but not of the same species. These fruits never grow upon the twigs, for these are not able to bear their weight, but only from the main branches, and even from the trunk of the tree itself, down to the very roots." — Friar Jordanus, 13-14.

C. 1580. — "And there be also trees which produce fruits so big that two will be a load for a strong man. And when they are eaten you must oil your hands and your mouth; they are of a fragrant odor and very savoury; the fruit is called chabassu. The name is probably corrupt (perhaps chasesi). But the passage about oiling the hands and lips is aptly elucidated by the description in Barza's Memoirs (see below), a description matchless in its way, and which falls off sadly in the new translation by M. Pavet de Courteille, which quite omits the "haggises."

C. 1385. — "The Shaki and Barki. This name is given to certain trees which live to a great age. Their leaves are like those of the walnut, and the fruit grows direct out of the stem of the tree. The fruits borne nearest to the ground are the bark; they are sweeter and better-flavoured than the Shaki . . . . . etc. (much to the same effect as before)." — Ibn Batutah, iii. 127; see also iv. 228.

C. 1530. — "There is again another wonderful tree called Chake-Barkite, as big as an oak. Its fruit is produced from the trunk, and not from the branches, and is something marvellous to see, being as big as a great lamb, or a child of three years old. It has a hard rind like that of our pine-cones, so that you have to cut it open with a hatchet; inside it has a pulp of surpassing flavour, with the sweetness of honey, and of the best Italian melon; and this also contains some 500 chestnuts of like flavour, which are capital eating when roasted." — John de' Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 383.

C. 1440. — "There is a tree commonly found, the trunk of which bears a fruit resembling a pine-cone, but so big that a man can hardly lift it; the rind is green and hard, but still yields to the pressure of the finger. Inside there are some 250 or 300 pippins, as big as figs, very sweet in taste, and contained in separate membranes. These have such a kernel within, of a highly quality, of the consistence and taste of chestnuts, and which are roasted like chestnuts. And when cast among embers (to roast), unless you make a cut in them they will explode and jump out. The outer rind of the fruit is given to cattle. Sometimes the fruit is also found growing from the roots of the tree underground, and these fruits excel the others in flavour, wherefore they are sent as presents to kings and petty princes. These (moreover) have no kernels inside them. The tree itself resembles a large fig-tree, and the leaves are cut into fingers like the hand. The wood resembles box, and so it is esteemed for many uses. The name of the tree is Cauha (i.e. Chachi or Tzacho). — Nicolò de' Conti.

The description of the leaves . . . . "folius da modum palmi intercinsis" — is the only slip in this admirable description. Conti must, in memory, have confounded the Jack with its congener the bread-fruit (Artocarpus incisa or mangifera). We have translated from Poygras's Latin, as the version by Mr. Winter Jones in India in the XVth Century is far from accurate.

1530. — "Another is the kadhil. This has a very bad look and flavour (odour !). It looks like a sheep's stomach stuffed and made into a haggis. It has a sweet sickly taste. Within it are stones like a flibert. . . . . The fruit is very adhesive, and on account of this adhesive quality many rub their mouths with oil before eating them. They grow not only from the branches and trunk, but from its root. You would say that the tree was all hung round with haggises!" — Leyden and Erskine's Baber, 325. Here kadhil represents the Hind. name ka'hal. The practice of oiling the lips on account of the "adhesive quality" (or as modern mortals would call it, "stickiness") of the jack, is still usual among natives, and is the cause of a proverb on premature precautions: Gachh mën Ka'hal, homk mën tel! "You have oiled your lips while the jack still hangs on the tree!" We may observe that the call of the Indian cuckoo is in some of the Gangetic districts rendered by the natives as *Kathal pakka! / Ka'hal pakka! i.e. *Jack's ripe," the bird appearing at that season.

[1547. — "I consider it right to make over to them in perpetuity . . . one palm grove and an area for planting certain mango trees and Jack trees (mangueiras e jaqueiras) situate in the village of Calangute. . . . ." — Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 5, No. 88.]

Buddhal; some of the first are so large as to be too heavy for one man to carry."— of the Persian text he reads bârkal, (and so in Jarrett's trans. (ii. 152), which is a Hind.
name for the Artocarpus Lakoocha of Roxb.

1562. — "R. What fruit is that which is as big as the largest (cocon) nut?

"O. You just now ate the chestnuts from inside of it, and you said that roasted they were like real chestnuts. Now you shall eat the envelopes of these .

"R. They taste like a melon; but not so good as the better melons.

"O. True. And owing to their visous nature they are ill to digest; or say rather they are not digested at all, and often issue from the body quite unchanged. I don't much use them. They are called in Malabar jâcas; in Canaran and Guzerati pânda. . . . The tree is a great and tall one; and all fruits grow from the wood of the stem, right up to it, and not on the branches like other fruits."—Garcia, f. 111.

1878.—"The monstrous jack that in its eccentric bulk contains a whole magazine of tastes and smells."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49-50.

It will be observed that the older authorities mention two varieties of the fruit by the names of shaki and bârkt, or modifications of these, different kinds according to Jordanus, only from different parts of the tree according to Ibn Batuta. P. Vincenzo Maria (1672) also distinguishes two kinds, one of which he calls Giacha Barca, the other Giacha pâpa or girasole. And Rheede, the great authority on Malabar plants, says (iii. 19):

"Of this tree, however, they reckon more than 30 varieties, distinguished by the quality of the fruit, but all may be reduced to two kinds; the fruit of one kind distinguished by plump and succulent pulp of delicious honey flavour, being the wârâka; that of the other, filled with softer and more sabby pulp of inferior flavour, being the Tujakapu."

More modern writers seem to have less perception in such matters than the old travellers, who entered more fully and sympathetically into native tastes. Drury says, however, "There are several varieties, but what is called the Honey-jack is by far the sweetest and best."

"He that desireth to see more hereof let him read Ludovicus Romanus, in his fifth Booke and fifteene Chapter of his Navigations, and Christopherus a Costa in his cap. of Iaca, and Gracia ab Horto, in the Second Booke and fourth Chapter," saith the learned Paludanes . . . And if there be anybody so unreasonable, so say we too—by all means let him do so! [A part of this article is derived from the notes to Jordanus by one of the present writers. We may also add, in aid of such further investigation, that Paludanes is the Latinised name of v.d. Broecke, the commentator on Linschoten. "Ludovicus Romanus" is our old friend Varthema, and "Gracia ab Horto" is Garcia De Orta.]

JACKAL, 8. The Canis aureus, L., seldom seen in the daytime, unless it be fighting with the vultures for carrion, but in shrieking multitudes, or rather what seem multitudes from the noise they make, entering the precincts of villages, towns, of Calcutta itself, after dark, and startling the newcomer with their hideous yells. Our word is not apparently Anglo-Indian, being taken from the Turkish châkal. But the Pers. shâghâl is close, and Skt. gîrâla, 'the howler,' is probably the first form. The common Hind. word is gîdgar, ['the greedy one,' Skt. grîdha]. The jackal takes the place of the fox as the object of hunting 'meets' in India; the indigenious fox being too small for sport.

JACK-SNIPE. Of English sportsmen is Gallinago gallinula, Linna., smaller than the common snipe, G. scolopacinus, Bonap.

JACKASS COPAL. This is a trade name, and is a capital specimen of Hobson-Jobson. It is, according to Sir R. Burton, [Zanzibar, i. 357], a corruption of chakarti. There are three qualities of copal in the Zanzibar market. 1. Sandarusi m'ti, or 'Tree Copal,' gathered directly from the tree which exudes it (Trachylobium Mossambicense). 2. Chakdzi or chakadzi, dug from the soil, but seeming of recent origin, and priced on a par with No. 1. 3. The genuine Sandarusi, or true Copal (the Anima of the English market), which is also fossil, but of ancient production, and bears more than twice the price of 1 and 2 (see Sir J. Kirk in J. Linn. Soc. [Botany] for 1871). Of the meaning of chakdzi we have no authentic information. But considering that a pitch made of copal and oil is used in Kutch, and that the cheaper copal would naturally be used for such a purpose, we may suggest as probable that the word is a corr. of jahdaz, and = 'ship-copal.'

JACQUETE, Town and Cape, n.p. The name, properly Jakad, formerly attached to a place at the extreme west horn of the Kāthiāwār Peninsula, where stands the temple of Dwarka (q.v.). Also applied by the Portuguese to the Gulf of Cutch. (See quotation from Camoens under DIUL-SIND.) The last important map which gives this name, so far as we are aware, is Aaron Arrow-smith's great Map of India, 1816, in which Dwarka appears under the name of Juggut.

JADE, s. The well-known mineral, so much prized in China, and so wonderfully wrought in that and other Asiatic countries; the yashm of the Persians; nephrite of mineralogists.

The derivation of the word has been the subject of a good deal of controversy. We were at one time inclined to connect it with the yada-tash, the yada stone used by the nomads of Central Asia in conjuring for rain. The stone so used was however, according to P. Hyakinth, quoted in a note with which we were favoured by the lamented Prof. Anton Schiefner, a bezoar (q.v.).

Major Raverty, in his translation of the Tabakat-i-Nasiri, in a passage referring to the regions of Tukharistan and Bamiyan, has the following: "That tract of country has also been famed and celebrated, to the uttermost parts of the countries of the world, for its mines of gold, silver, rubies, and crystal, bejaddah [jade], and other [precious] things" (p. 421). On bejaddah his note runs: "The name of a gem, by some said to be a species of ruby, and by others a species of sapphire; but jade is no doubt meant." This interpretation seems however chiefly, if not altogether, suggested by the name; whilst the epithets compounded of bejada, as given in dictionaries, suggest a red mineral, which jade rarely is. And Prof. Max Muller, in an interesting letter to the Times, dated Jan. 10, 1880, states that the name jade was not known in Europe till after the discovery of America, and that the jade brought from America was called by the Spaniards piedra de ijada, because it was supposed to cure pain in the groin (Sp. ijada); for like reasons to which it was called lapis nephriticus, whence nephrite (see Bailey, below). Skewt, s.v. says: "It is of unknown origin; but probably Oriental. Prof. Cowell finds yedā a material out of which ornaments are made, in the Divyavadana; but it does not seem to be Sanskrit." Prof. Muller's etymology seems incontrovertible; but the present work has afforded various examples of curious etymological coincidences of this kind. [Prof. Max Muller's etymology is now accepted by the N.E.D. and by Prof. Skewt in the new edition of his Concise Dict. The latter adds that ijada is connected with the Latin ika.]

JAFNA, JAFNAPATAM, n.p.

The very ancient Tamil settlement, and capital of the Tamil kings on the singular peninsula which forms the northermost part of Ceylon. The real name is, according to Emerson Tennent, Yalpannan, and it is on the whole probable that this name is identical with the Galiba (Prom.) of Ptolemy. [The Madras Gloss. gives the Tamil name as Yathippadam, from yash-patham, 'a lute-player'; "called after a blind minstrel of that name from the Chola country, who by permission of the Singhaless king obtained possession of Jaffa, then uninhabited, and introduced there a colony of the Tamil people." "

JADOOGUB, s. Properly Hind. jadūghar, 'conjuring-house' (see the last). The term commonly applied by natives to a Freemasons' Lodge, when there is one, at an English station. On the Bombay side it is also called Shaitan khana (see Burton's Sind Revisited), a name consonant to the ideas of an Italian priest who intimated to one of the present writers that he had heard the raising of the devil was practised at Masonic meetings, and asked his friend's opinion as to the fact. In S. India the Lodge is called Tamil-velita-Kovil, 'Cut-head Temple,' because part of the rite of initiation is supposed to consist in the candidate's head being cut off and put on again.

JAFNA, JAFNAPATAM, n.p.

"A kind of green stone, which the Spaniards call Piedras hijadas, and we use for sphenic stones."—Raleigh, Discov. Guiana, 24 (quoted in N.E.D.).]

1790. — "Jade, a greenish Stone, bordering on the colour of Olive, esteemed for its Hardness and Virtue by the Turks and Poles, who adorn their fine Sabres with it; and said to be a preservative against the nephritic Colick."—Bailey's Eng. Dict. a.v.

JADOO, s. Hind. from Pers. jada, Skt. ydvu; conjuring, magic, hocus-pocus.

1926.—"'Pray, sir,' said the barber, 'is that Sanscrit, or what language!' 'May be it is jadoo,' I replied, in a solemn and deep voice."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 127.

JAFNA, JAFNAPATAM, n.p.

The very ancient Tamil settlement, and capital of the Tamil kings on the singular peninsula which forms the northermost part of Ceylon. The real name is, according to Emerson Tennent, Yalpannan, and it is on the whole probable that this name is identical with the Galiba (Prom.) of Ptolemy. [The Madras Gloss. gives the Tamil name as Yathippadam, from yash-patham, 'a lute-player'; "called after a blind minstrel of that name from the Chola country, who by permission of the Singhaless king obtained possession of Jaffa, then uninhabited, and introduced there a colony of the Tamil people." ]
JAGGERY, s. Coarse brown (or almost black) sugar, made from the sap of various palms. The wild date tree (Phoenix sylvestris, Roxb.), Hind. kha'jir, is that which chiefly supplies palm-sugar in Guzerat and Coromandel, and almost alone in Bengal. But the palmyra, the caryota, and the coco-palm all give it; the first as the staple of Tinnevelly and northern Ceylon; the second chiefly in southern Ceylon, where it is known to Europeans as the Jaggery Palm (k'ital of natives); the third is much drawn for toddy (q.v.) in the coast districts of Western India, and this is occasionally boiled for sugar. Jaggery is usually made in the form of small round cakes. Great quantities are produced in Tinnevelly, where the cakes used to pass as a kind of currency (as cakes of salt used to pass in parts of Africa, and in Western China), and do even yet to some small extent. In Bombay all rough unrefined sugar-stuff is known by this name; and it is the title under which all kinds of half-prepared sugar is classified in the tariff of the Railways there. The word jaggery is only another form of sugar (q.v.), being like it a corr. of the Skt. sarkard, Konkani sakard, [Malayal. chakkad, whence it passed into Port. jagara, jagra].

1516.-"Sugar of palm, which they call xagara."—Babarok, 69.
1553.—Exports from the Maldives "also of fish-oil, coco-nuts, and jagara, which is made from these after the manner of sugar."—Barros, Dec. III. liv. iii. cap. 7.
1561.—"Jagro, which is sugar of palm-trees."—Corres, Lensas, t. 2, 592.
1563.—"And after they have drawn this pot of swa, if the tree gives much they draw another, of which they make sugar, prepared either by sun or fire, and this they call jagra."—Garcia, f. 67.

JAGHEER, JAGHIRE, s. Pers. jaghr, lit. 'place-holding.' A hereditary assignment of land and of its rent as annuity.

[c. 1590.—"Fart'mdn-i-zabirs are issued for ... appointments to jaghrs, without military service."—Ais, i. 261.
[1617.—"Hie quittes divers small Jaggers to the King."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 449.]

1616.—"... Not to speak of what they finger out of the Pay of every Horseman, and of the number of the Horsemen; which certainly amount to very considerable Pensions, especially if they can obtain good Jah-ghir, that is, good Lands for their Pensions."—Berney, E.T. 68; [ed. Constable, 213.]
1673.—"It [Surat] has for its Maintenance the Income of six Villages; over which the Governor sometimes presides, sometimes not, being in the Jagars, or diocese of another."—Fryer, 120.
1768.—"Jageal, an Annuity."—Ibid. Index, vi.
1807.—"The Turi or fermented juice, and the Jegory or ininsipated juice of the Palmira tree ... are in this country more esteemed than those of the wild date, which is contrary to the opinion of the Bengaleese."—F. Buchanan, Myore, &c., i. 5.
1860.—"In this state it is sold as jaggery in the bazaar, at about three farthings per pound."—Tennent's Ceylon, iii. 524.

JAGHEER, JAGHEER, s. Pers. jaghr, lit. 'place-holding.' A hereditary assignment of land and of its rent as annuity.
JAGHEERDAAR. 447 JAM.

1778.—"Should it be more agreeable to the parties, Sir Matthew will settle upon Sir John and his Lady, for their joint lives, a jaghire."

"Sir John.—A Jaghire?"

"Thomas.—The term is Indian, and means an annual Income."—Footo, The Nabob, i. 1.

We believe the traditional stage pronunciation in these passages is Jag hire (assonant in both syllables to Quag Ware); this is also the pronunciation given in some dictionaries.

1778.—"... Jaghires, which were always rents arising from lands."—Orms, ed. 1803, ii. 52.

1809.—"He was nominally in possession of a larger jaghire."—Ed. Valenti, i. 401.

A territory adjoining Fort St. George was long known as the Jaghire, or the Company's Jaghire, and is often so mentioned in histories of the 18th century. This territory, granted to the Company by the Nabob of Arcot in 1750 and 1755, nearly agrees to the former Collectorate of Chingalput and present Collectorate of Madras.

In the following reference is to the Jirghah or tribal council of the Pathan tribes on the N.W. frontier.

1813.—"... in the Mahatta empire the principal Jaghirdars, or nobles, appear in the field. ..."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 328.

1826.—"The Resident, many officers, men of rank... Jaghirdars, Brahmins, and Pundits, were present, assembled round my father."—Pandurang Hari, 399; [ed. 1878, ii. 269].

1883. —"The Siks administered the country by means of jagheerdaars, and paid them by their jagheers; the English administered it by highly paid British officers, at the same time that they endeavoured to lower the land-tax, and to introduce grand material reforms."—Bowsworth Smith, L. of Ed. Lawrence, i. 378.

JAIL-KHANA, a. A hybrid word for 'a gaol,' commonly used in the Bengal Presidency.

JAIN, a. and adj. The non-Brahmanical sect so called; believed to represent the earliest heretics of Buddhism, at present chiefly to be found in the Bombay Presidency. There are a few in Mysore, Canara, and in some parts of the Madras Presidency, but in the Middle Ages they appear to have been numerous on the coast of the Peninsula generally. They are also found in various parts of Central and Northern India and Behar. The Jains are generally merchants, and some have been men of enormous wealth (see Colebrooke's Essays, i. 378 seqq.; [Lassen, in Ind. Antig. ii. 193 seqq., 258 seqq.]). The name is Skt. jaina, meaning a follower of jina. The latter word is a title applied to certain saints worshipped by the sect in the place of gods; it is also a name of the Buddhists. An older name for the followers of the sect appears to have been Nirgrantha, 'without bond,' properly the title of Jain ascetics only (otherwise Yatis), [in particular of the Digambara or 'sky-clad,' naked branch]. (Burnell, S. Indian Palaeography, p. 47, note.)

[a. 1590.—"Jaina. The founder of this wonderful system was Jina, also called Arhat, or Arhat."—Ains, ed. Jarrett, iii. 188.]

JALEEBOTE, a. Jalobot. A marine corruption of jolly-boat (Robsuck). (See GALLEVAT.)

JAM, a. Jâm. a. A title borne by certain chiefs in Kutch, in Kathiawar, and on the lower Indua. The derivation is very obscure (see Elliot, i. 495). The title is probably Bilach originally. There are several Jâms in Lower Sind and its borders, and notably the Jâm of Las Bela State, a well-known dependency of Kelat, bordering the sea. [Mr. Longworth Dames writes: "I do not think the word is of Balochi origin, although it is certainly made use of in the Balochi language. It is rather Sindhi, in the broad sense of the word, using Sindhi as the natives do, referring to the tribes of the Indus valley without regard to the modern boundaries of the province of Sindh. As far as I know, it is used as a title, not by Baloches, but by indigenous tribes of Râjput or Jât origin, now, of course, all Musulmans. The Jâm of Las Bela belongs to a tribe of this nature known as the Jâmhât. In the Dera Ghâzi Khân District it is used by certain local notables of this class, none of them Baloches. The principal tribe there using it is the Udânâ. It is also an honorific title among the Mochis of Dera Ghâzi Khân town."

b. A nautical measure, Ar. ṣămū or ṣaṃū. It occurs in the form ṣaṃū in a quotation of 1614 under JAK. It is repeatedly used in the Mohit of Sidi ‘Ali, published in the J. As. Soc. Bengal. It would appear from J. Prinsep’s remarks there that the word is used in various ways. Thus Baron J. Hammer writes to Prinsep: “Concerning the measure of ṣaṃū the first section of the 111d. chapter explains as follows: ‘The ṣaṃū is either the practical one (ṭūrti), or the rhetorical (ṣītīlāḥ—but this the acute Prinsep suggests should be ṣaltīlāḥ, pertaining to the divisions of the astrolabe’). The practical is one of the 8 parts into which day and night are divided; the rhetorical (but read the altrablic) is the 8th part of an inch (ṣītāh) in the ascension and descent of the stars; ... an explanation which helps me not a bit to understand the true measure of a ṣaṃū, in the reckoning of a ship’s course.” Prinsep then elucidates this: The ṣaṃū in practical parlance is said to be the 8th part of day and night; it is in fact a nautical watch or Hindu pahar (see PUVUB.). Again, it is the 8th part of the ordinary inch, like the jau or barleycorn of the Hindus (the 8th part of an angul or digit), of which jau, ṣaṃū is possibly a corruption. Again, the ṣābā or inch, and the ṣaṃū or ⅛ of an inch, had been transferred to the rude angle-instruments of the Arab navigators; and Prinsep deduces from statements in Sidi ‘Ali’s book that the ṣābā ‘was very nearly equal to 96’ and the ṣaṃū to 12’. Prinsep had also found on enquiry among Arab mariners, that the term ṣaṃū was still well known to nautical people as ⅛ of a geographical degree, or 12 nautical miles, quite confirmatory of the former calculation; it was also stated to be still applied to terrestrial measurements (see J.A.S.B. v. 642-3).

1013.—“J’ai déjà parlé de Sérira (read Sarbasa) qui est située à l’extrémité de l’île de Lâmer, à cent-vingt ṣaṃū de Kala.”—Aṣhā-i-Hind, ed. Van der Lüth & Marcel Deric, 170.

“Un marin m’a rapporté qu’il avait fait la traversée de Sérira (Sarbasa) à la Chine dans un Sambouq (see SAMBOK). ‘Nous avions parcouru,’ dit-il, ‘un espace de cinquante ṣaṃū, lorsqu’une tempête fonât sur notre embarcation.... Ayant fait de nouveau les 200 ṣaṃū, nous remîmes à la voile vers le Senf, suivant ce instructions, et nous y abordâmes sans et saufs, après un voyage de quinze ṣaṃū.”—Ibid. pp. 190-91.

1554.—“26th VOYAGE from Calicut to Kardafan.” (see GUARDAFUI). “...you run from Calicut to Kolō’i (i.e. Kalpeni, one of the Laccadive Isd.) two saṃūs in the direction of W. by S., the 8 or 9 saṃūs W.S.W. (this course is in the 9 degree channel through the Laccadives), then you may rejoice as you have got clear of the islands of Pail, from thence by W. and N.N.W. till the pole is 4 inches and a quarter, and then true west to Kardafan.”

“27th VOYAGE, from Dīā to Malacca.” “Leaving Did you go first S.S.E. till the pole is 5 inches, and side then towards the land, till the distance between you and the ship is six saṃūs; from thence you steer S.S.E. ... you must not side all at once but by degrees, first till the fērkdsāf (β and γ in the Little Bear) are made by a quarter less than 8 inches, from thence to S.E. till the fērkdsāf are 7½ inches, from thence true east at a rate of 18 saṃūs, then you have passed Ceylon.”—The Mohit, in J.A.S.B. v. 465.

The meaning of this last route is: “Steer S.S.E. till you are in 8° N. Lat. (lat. of Cape Comorin); make then a little more easterly, but keep 72 miles between you and the coast of Ceylon till you find the β and γ of Urs Minor have an altitude of only 12° 94’ (i.e. till you are in N. Lat. 6° or 5°), and then steer due east. When you have gone 216 miles you will be quite clear of Ceylon.”

1825.—“We cast anchor under the island of Kharg, which is distant from Cais, which we left behind us, 24 gম. Gম is a measure used by the Arab and Persian pilots in the Persian Gulf; and every gম is equal to 3 leagues; insomuch that from Cais to Kharg we had made 72 leagues.”—P. della Valle, ii. 316.

JAMBOO, JUMBOO, a. The Rose-apple, Eugenia jambos, L. Jambosa vulgaris, Decand.; Skt. jamb, Hind. jām, jambā, jamrul, &c. This is the use in Bengal, but there is great confusion in application, both colloquially and in books. The name jambā is applied in some parts of India to the exotic guava (q.v.), as well as to other species of Eugenia; including the jāmun (see JAMOON), with which the rose-apple is often confused in books. They are very different fruits, though they have both been classed by Linnaeus under the genus Eugenia (see further remarks under JAMOON). [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is applied by the Malays both to the rose-apple and the guava, and Wilkinson (Dict. s.v.) notes a large number of fruits to which the name jambhí is applied.

Garcia de Orta mentions the rose-apple under the name Lambos, and says (1568) that it had been recently introduced into Goa from Malacca. This may have been the Eugenia Malaccensis, L., which is stated in Forbes Watson's Catalogue of nomenclature to be called in Bengal Malaka Jambris, and in Tamil Malaka maram i.e. 'Malacca tree.' The Skrt. name jambhí is, in the Malay language, applied with distinguishing adjectives to all the species.

[1568.—"The trees whereon the Lambos do grow are as great as Pluntrees."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 31.]

1672.—P. Vincenzo Maria describes the Gambro d'India with great precision, and also the Giambro di Cina—no doubt J. malaccensis—but at too great length for extract, pp. 361-362.

1673.—"In the South a Wood of Jamboes, Mangoes, Cocoos."—Fryer, 46.

1727.—"Their Jamb Malacu (at Goa) is very beautiful and pleasant."—A. Hamilton, i. 255; [ed. 1744, i. 255].

1810.—"The jambu, a species of rose-apple, with its flower like crimson tassels covering every part of the stem."—Maria Graham, 22.

JAMES AND MARY, n.p. The name of a famous sand-bank in the Hooghly R. below Calcutta, which has been fatal to many a ship. It is mentioned under 1748, in the record of a survey of the river quoted in Long, p. 10. It is a common allegation that the name is a corruption of the Hind. words jail mari, with the supposed meaning of 'dead water.' But the real origin of the name dates, as Sir G. Birdwood has shown, out of India Office records, from the wreck of a vessel called the "Royal James and Mary," in September 1894, on that sand-bank (Letter to the Court, from Chuttanuttee, Dec. 19, 1694). [Report on Old Records, 90.] This shoal appears by name in a chart belonging to the English Pilot, 1711.

JAMMA, a. P.—H. jāma, a piece of native clothing. Thus, in composition, see PYJAMMAS. Also stuff for clothing, &c., e.g. mom-jama, wax-cloth. ["The jama may have been brought by the Aryans from Central Asia, but as it is still now seen it is thoroughly Indian and of ancient date" (Rajendralal Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187 seq.)]

[1813.—"The better sort (of Hindus) wear a jama, or long gown of white calico, which is tied round the middle with a fringed or embroidered shawl."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 52].

JAMMOON, s. Hind. jamun, jāman, jāntli, &c. The name of a poor fruit common in many parts of India, and apparently in E. Africa, the Eugenia jambolana, Lamk. (Calyptranthes jambolanum of Willdenow, Syzygium jambolanum of Decand.) This seems to be confounded with the Eugenia jambos, or Rose-apple (see JAMBOO, above), by the author of a note on Leyden's Babar which Mr. Erakine justly corrects (Baber's own account is very accurate), by the translators of Ibn Batuta, and apparently, as regards the botanical name, by Sir R. Burton. The latter gives jaml as the Indian, and zam as the Arabic name. The name jambhí appears to be applied to this fruit at Bombay, which of course promotes the confusion spoken of. In native practice the stones of this fruit have been alleged to be a cure for diabetes, but European trials do not seem to have confirmed this.

b. 13.—"The inhabitants (of Mombasa) gather also a fruit which they call jamte, and which resembles an olive; it has a stone like the olive, but has a very sweet taste."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. Elsewhere the translators write chemoda (iii. 128, iv. 114, 229), a spelling indicated in the original, but surely by some error.

c. 1580.—"Another is the jaman. It is on the whole a fine looking tree. Its fruit resembles the black grape, but has a more acid taste, and is not very good."—Baber, 225. The note on this runs: "This, Dr. Hunter says, is the Eugenia Jambolana, the rose-apple (Eugenia jambolana, but not the rose-apple, which is now called Eugenia jambux—D.W.). The jama has no resemblance to the rose-apple; it is more like an oblong sloe than anything else, but grows on a tall tree."

1563.—"I will eat of those olives, — , at least they look like such; but they are very astringent (potuncas) as if binding, — , and yet they do look like ripe Cordova olives."

"O. They are called jambolones, and grow wild in a wood that looks like a myrtle grove; in its leaves the tree resembles the arbutus; but like the jack, the people of the country don't hold this fruit for very wholesome."—Garcia, f. 111y.
JANCADA. a. This name was given to certain responsible guides in the Nair country who escorted travellers from one inhabited place to another, guaranteeing their security with their own lives, like the Bhais of Guzerat. The word is Malayal. chanidadam (i.e. changhadam, [the Madras Gloss. writes channdam, and derives it from Skt. sanghata, 'union'], with the same spelling as that of the word given as the origin of jangar or jangada, 'a raft.' These jancadas or jangadas seem also to have been placed in other confidential and dangerous charges. Thus:

1543.—"This man who so resolutely died was one of the jangadas of the Pagoda. They are called jangadas because the kings and lords of those lands, according to a custom of theirs, send as guardians of the houses of the Pagodas in their territories, two men as captains, who are men of honour and good cavaliers. Such guardians are called jangadas, and have soldiers of guard under them, and as it were the Counsellors and Ministers of the affairs of the pagodas, and they receive their maintenance from the establishment and its revenues. And sometimes the king changes them and appoints others."—Correa, iv. 328.

c. 1610. —"I travelled with another Captain . . . who had with him these Jangal, who are the Nair guides, and who are stationed at the gates of towns to act as escort to those who require them . . . Every one takes them, the weak for safety and protection, those who are stronger, and travel in great companies and well armed, take them only as witnesses that they are not aggressors in case of any dispute with the Nairs."—Pyrrhus de Loulay, ch. xxv.; [Hak. Soc. i. 339, and see Mr. Gray's note in loc].

1672.—"The safest of all journeys in India are those through the Kingdom of the Nairs and the Samorin, if you travel with Jancadas, the most perilous if you go alone. These Jancadas are certain heathen men, who venture their own life and the lives of their kinfolk for small remuneration, to guarantee the safety of travellers."—F. Vincenzo Marta, 127.

See also Chunganath, in Burton's Goa, p. 198.

JANGAR. b. A raft. Port. jangada. ['A double platform canoe made by placing a floor of boards across two boats, with a bamboo railing.' (Madras Gloss.)] This word, chiefly colloquial, is the Tamil-Malayal. shanghadam, channdam (for the derivation of which see JANCADA). It is a word of particular interest as being one of the few Dravidian words, [but perhaps ultimately of Skt. origin] preserved in the remains of classical antiquity, occurring in the Periplus as our quotation shows. Bluteau does not call the word an Indian term.

c. 80-90.—"The vessels belonging to these places (Camara, Podouc, and Sopatna on the east coast) which hug the shore to Limyrios (Dimyric), and others also called Xangyidae, which consist of the largest canoes of single timbers lashed together; and again those biggest of all which sail to Chryse and Ganges, and are called Kolamboperae."—Periplus, in Müller's Geog. Gr. Min., i. "The first part of this name for boats or ships is most probably the Tam. evinda—hollowed: the last adam=boat."—Burneill, S.I. Palaeography, 612.

c. 1504.—"He held in readiness many jangadas of timber."—Correa, Lendas, i. 476.

c. 1540.—". . . and to that purpose had already commanded two great Rafts (Jagadas), covered with dry wood, barrels of pitch and other combustible stuff, to be placed at the entering into the Port."—Pinto (orig. cap. xlvii.), in Cogues, p. 56.

1563.—". . . the fleet . . . which might consist of more than 300 rowing vessels of all kinds, a great part of them combined into Jangadas in order to carry a greater mass of men, and among them two of these contrivances on which were 150 men."—Barros, II. i. 5.

1598.—"Such as stayed in the ship, some tooks bords, deals, and other pieces of wood, and bound them together (which ye Portingals cal Jangadas) every man what they could catch, all hoping to save their lives, but of all those there came but two men safe to shore."—Linschoten, p. 147; [Hak. Soc. ii. 151; and see Mr. Gray on Pyrrhus de Loulay, Hak. Soc. i. 52 seq.]

1602.—"For his object was to see if he could rescue them in Jangadas, which he ordered him immediately to put together of baulks, planks, and oars."—Couto, Dec. IV. liv. iv. cap. 10.

1756.—". . . having set fire to a jungodo of Boats, these driving down towards the Fleet, compelled them to weigh."—Capt. Jackson, in Dalrymple's Or. Rep. i. 199.

c. 1790. —"Sangarie." See quotation under HACKERY.

c. 1793.—"Nous nous remimes en chemin à six heures du matin, et passames la rivière dans un sangarie ou canot fait d'un palme croisés."—Hacqueur, ii. 77.

mai or Kiang-mai, &c., is so called in narratives of the 17th century. Serious efforts to establish trade with this place were made by the E.I. Company in the early part of the 17th century, of which notice will be found in Purchas, Pilgrimage, and Sainsbury, e.g. in vol. i. (1614), pp. 311, 325; (1615) p. 425; (1617) ii. p. 90. The place has again become the scene of commercial and political interest; an English Vice-Consulate has been established; and a railway survey undertaken. [See Hallett, A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, 74 seqq.]

c. 1544.—"Out of this Lake of Singapamor . . . do four very large and deep rivers proceeds, whereof the first . . . runneth Eastward through all the Kingdoms of Siam and Suma . . . ; the Second, Jangumaa . . . dismboaking into the Sea by the Bar of Martabano in the Kingdom of Pegu . . ."—Pinto (in Cogan, 165).

1558.—(Barros illustrates the position of the different kingdoms of India by the figure of a (left) hand, laid with the palm downwards) "And as regards the western part, following always the sinew of the forfender, it will correspond with the ranges of mountains running from north to south along which lie the kingdom of Ava, and Brefa, and Jangomá."—III. ii. 5.

c. 1587.—"I went from Pegu to Jamayhey, which is in the Country of the Langenanes, whom we call Jangomias; it is five and twenty days journey to Northeast from Pegu . . . Hither to Jamayhey come many Merchants out of China, and bring great store of Muske, Gold, Silver, and many things of China worke."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii.

c. 1606.—"But the people, or most part of them, fled to the territories of the King of Jangoma, where they were met by the Padre Friar Francisco, of the Annunciation, who was there negotiating . . ."—Bocarro, 136.

1612.—"The Siamese go out with their heads shaven, and leave long mustachios on their faces; their garb is much like that of the Peguans. The same may be said of the Jangomias and the Leojoes" (see LAN JOHN).—Couto, V. vi. 1.

c. 1615.—"The King (of Pegu) which now reigneth . . . hath in his time recovered from the King of Syam . . . the town and kingdom of Jangomia, and therein an Englishman called Thomas Samuel, who not long before had been sent from Syam by Master Lucas Anthamitz, to discover the Two of that country by the sale of certain goods sent along with him for thatpurpose."—W. Methold, in Purchas, v. 1006.

1617.—"Jangoma." See under JUDEA.

[1796.—"Zemee." See under SHAN.]

JAPAN. n.p. Mr. Giles says: "Our word is from Jeh-pun, the Dutch orthography of the Japanese Ni-pon." What the Dutch have to do with the matter is hard to see. ["Our word 'Japan' and the Japanese Nihon or Nippon, are alike corruptions of Japen, the Chinese pronunciation of the characters (meaning) literally 'sun-origin.'" (Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 221.) A form closely resembling Japán, as we pronounce it, must have prevailed, among foreigners at least, in China as early as the 13th century; for Marco Polo calls it Chipan-gu or Jap-n-ku, a name representing the Chinese Zhi-pán-Kue ('Sun-origin-Kingdom'), the Kingdom of the Sunrise or Extreme Orient, of which the word Nipon or Niphon, used in Japan, is said to be a dialectic variation. But as there was a distinct gap in Western tradition between the 14th century and the 16th, no doubt we, or rather the Portuguese, acquired the name from the traders at Malacca, in the Malay forms, which Crawfurd gives as Japang and Japang.

1505.—". . . and not far off they took a ship belonging to the King of Calichut; out of which they have brought me certain jewels of good value; as also two hundred and forty-two large pearls worth 8,000 ducats; also three astrological instruments of silver, such as are not used by our astrologers, large and well-wrought, which I hold in the highest estimation. They say that the King of Calichut had sent the said ship to an island called Napopon to obtain the said instruments. . . ."—Letter from the K. of Portugal (Dom Manuel) to the K. of Castile (Ferdinand). Reprint by A. Burnell, 1881, p. 8.

1521.—"In going by this course we passed near two very rich islands; one is in twenty degrees latitude in the antarctic pole, and is called Gipanghu."—Pigafetta, Magellan's Voyage, Hak. Soc., 67. Here the name appears to be taken from the chart or Mappe-Monde which was carried on the voyage. Gipanghu appears by that name on the globe of Martin Behaim (1492), but 20 degrees north, not south, of the equator.

1545.—"Now as for us three Portugals, having nothing to sell, we employed our time either in fishing, hunting, or seeing the Temples of those Gentiles, which were very sumptuous and rich, whereinto the Bonzes, who are their priests, received us.
very courteously, for indeed it is the custom of those of Jappam (do Japto) to be exceeding kind and courteous."—Pinto (orig. cap. oxxxiv.), in Cogan, E.T. p. 178.

1553.—"After leaving to the eastward the isles of the Lequoise (see LEW CHEW) and of the Japons (dos Japoes), and the great province of Mexico, which for its greatness we know not whether to call it Island or Continent, the coast of China still runs on, and those parts pass beyond the antipodes of the meridian of Lisbon."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

JARGON, JARCOON, ZIRCON, &c.
The name of a precious stone often mentioned by writers of the 16th century, but respecting the identity of which there seems to be but little obscurity. The English Encyclopaedia, and the Times Reviewer of Emanuel's book On Precious Stones (1866), identify it with the hyacinth or jacinth; but Lord Stanley of Alderley, in his translation of Barboza (who mentions the stone several times under the form giogorrha and jargonza), on the authority of a practical jeweller identifies it with cornelian. This is probably an error. Jargonza looks like a corruption of jacinthus. And Haly's Mineralogy identifies jargon and hyacinth under the common name of zircon. Dana's Mineralogy states that the term hyacinth is applied to these stones, consisting of a silicate of zirconia, "which present bright colours, considerable transparency, and smooth shining surfaces. . . . The variety from Ceylon, which is colourless, and has a smoky tinge, and is therefore sold for inferior diamonds, is sometimes called jargon" (Syst. of Mineral., 3rd ed., 1850, 379-380; Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. xxiv. 789 seq.).

The word probably comes into European languages through the Span. a-tints, the former passing for rubies."— Temcen’s Ogyen, i. 38.

JAROOL. a. The Lagerstroemia reginae, Roxb. H.-Beng. jatil, jatul.
A tree very extensively diffused in the forests of Eastern and Western India and Pegu. It furnishes excellent boat-timber, and is a splendid flowering tree. "An exceeding glorious tree of the Concan jungles, in the month of May robed as in imperial purple, with its terminal panicles of large showy purple flowers. I for the first time introduced it largely into Bombay gardens, and called it Flos reginae"— Sir G. Birdwood, MS.

1850.—"Their forests are frequented by timber-cutters, who fell jarool, a magnificent tree with red wood, which, though soft, is durable under water, and therefore in universal use for boat building."—Hooker, Hism. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 315.

1855.—"Much of the way from Rangoon also, by the creeks, to the great river, was through actual dense forest, in which the jarool, covered with purple blossoms, made a noble figure."—Blackwood’s Mag., May 1856, 538.

JASK, JASQUES, CAPE, n.p.
Ar. Ds Jdshak, a point on the eastern side of the Gulf of Oman, near the entrance to the Persian Gulf, and 6 miles south of a port of the same name.
The latter was frequented by the vessels of the English Company whilst the Portuguese held Ormus. After the Portuguese were driven out of Ormus (1622) the English trade was moved to Gomboon (q.v.). The peninsula of which Cape Jask is the point, is now the terminus of the submarine cable from Bushire; and a company of native infantry is quartered there. Jdshak appears in Yâkût as "a large island between the land of Omân and the Island of Kish." No island corresponds to this description, and probably the reference is an incorrect one to Jask (see Dict. de la Perse,
p. 149). By a curious misapprehension, Cape Jasques seems to have been Englished as Cape James (see Dunn’s Or. Navigator, 1780, p. 94).

Beiphinestone, in Life, i. 62.

JAUN, s. This is a term used in Calcutta, and occasionally in Madras, of which the origin is unknown to the present writers. [Mr. H. Beveridge points out that it is derived from H.-Beng. yaun, defined by Sir G.
Haughton: "a vehicle, any means of conveyance, a horse, a carriage, a palkee." It is Skt. yôna, with the same meaning. The initial ya in Bengali is usually pronounced ja. The root is ya, ‘to go.’ It is, or was, applied to a small palanquin carriage, such as is commonly used by business men in going to their offices, &c.

"Who did not know that office Jaun of pale Pomona green, With its drab and yellow lining, and picked out black between, Which down the Esplanade did go at the ninth hour of the day..."
- Bote-Ponjis, by H. M. Parker, ii. 215.

JAVA, n.p. This is a geographical name of great antiquity, and occurs, as our first quotation shows, in Ptolemy's Tables. His 'Isaacoln represents with singular correctness what was probably the Prakrit or popular form of Yava-dvipa (see under DUU and MALDIVES), and his interpretation of the Sanskrit is perfectly correct. It will still remain a question whether Yava was not applied to some cereal more congenial to the latitude than barley,* or was (as is possible) an attempt to give an Indian meaning to some aboriginal name of similar sound. But the sixth of our quotations, the transcript and translation of a Sanskrit inscription in the Museum at Batavia by Mr. Holle, which we owe to the kindness of Prof. Kern, indicates that a signification of wealth in cereals was attached to the name in the early days of its Indian civilization. This inscription is most interesting, as it is the oldest dated inscription yet discovered upon Javanese soil. Till a recent time it was not known that there was any mention of Java in Sanskrit literature, and this was so when Lassen published the 2nd vol. of his Indian Antiquities (1849). But in fact Java was mentioned in the Ramayana, though a perverted reading disguised the fact until the publication of the Bombay edition in 1863. The passage is given in our second quotation; and we also give passages from two later astronomical works whose date is approximately known. The Yava-Kosti, or Java Point of these writers is understood by Prof. Kern to be the eastern extremity of the island.

We have already (see BENJAMIN) alluded to the fact that the terms Jawa, Jăwı were applied by the Arabs to the Archipelago generally, and often with specific reference to Sumatra. Prof. Kern, in a paper to which we are largely indebted, has indicated that this larger application of the term was originally Indian. He has discussed it in connection with the terms “Golden and Silver Islands” (Swarana dvipa and Rûpça dvipa), which occur in the quotation from the Râmâyana, and elsewhere in Sanskrit literature, and which evidently were the basis of the Chrysa and Argyra, which take various forms in the writings of the Greek and Roman geographers. We cannot give the details of his discussion, but his condensed conclusions are as follows:—

1. Swarana-dvipa and Yava-dvipa were according to the prevalent representations the same; (2) Two names of islands originally distinct were confounded with one another; (3) Swarana-dvipa in its proper meaning is Sumatra, Yava-dvipa in its proper meaning is Java; (4) Sumatra, or a part of it, and Java were regarded as one whole, doubtless because they were politically united; (5) By Yava-kosti was indicated the east point of Java.

This Indian (and also insular) identification, in whole or in part, of Sumatra with Java explains a variety of puzzles, e.g. not merely the Arab application of Java, but also the ascription, in so many passages, of great wealth of gold to Java, though the island, to which that name properly belongs, produces no gold. This tradition of gold-produce we find in the passages quoted from Ptolemy, from the Ramayana, from the Holle inscription, and from Marco Polo. It becomes quite intelligible when we are taught that Java and Sumatra were at one time both embraced under the former name, for Sumatra has always been famous for its gold-production. [Mr. Skeat notes as an interesting fact that the standard Malay name Jawă and the Javanese Jawa preserve the original form of the word.]

* The Teutonic word Cora affords a handy instance of the varying application of the name of a cereal to that which is, or has been, the staple grain of each country. Cora in England familiarly means 'wheat'; in Scotland 'oats'; in Germany 'rye'; in America 'mata.'
(Ancient).—"Search carefully Yava dvipa, adorned by seven Kingdoms, the Gold and Silver island, rich in mines of gold. Beyond Yava dvipa is the Mountain called Siska, where great stones mix with the sky, and which is visited by gods and demons."—Rämâyana, IV. x. 30 (from Kern).

A.D. c. 150.—"Ibadin (I'fásdéló), which means 'Island of Barley,' most fruitful the island is said to be, and also to produce much gold; also the metropolis is said to have the name Aryrêë (Silver), and to stand at the western end of the island."—Ptolemy, VII. ii. 29.

414.—"Thus they voyaged for about ninety days, when they arrived at a country called Yêvâ-di [i.e. Yava-dvipo]. In this country heretics and Brahman find favour, but the law of Buddha hardly deserves mentioning."—Fahian, ext. in Groeneweld's Notes from Chinese Sources.

A.D. c. 500.—"When the sun rises in Ceylon it is sunset in the City of the Blessed (Siddha-pura, i.e. The Fortunate Islands), noon at Yava-koti, and midnight in the Land of the Romans."—Aryabhata, IV. v. 33 (from Kern).

A.D. c. 650.—"Eastward by a fourth part of the earth's circumference, in the world-quarter of the Bharhôvras lies the City famous under the name of Yava koti whose walls and gates are of gold."—Suryâ-Siddhâta, XII. v. 38 (from Kern).

"This Kingdom (India) borders upon that of Zâbâi, which is the empire of the Mahârâj, King of the Isles."—Ibid. 163.

992.—"Djava is situated in the Southern Ocean...In the 12th month of the year (992) their King Mârdâja sent an embassy...to go to court and bring tribute."—Groeneweld's Notes from Chinese Sources, pp. 15-17.

1298.—"When you sail from Zimba (Chamba) 1600 miles in a course between south and south-east, you come to a very great island called Java, which, according to the statement of some good mariners, is the greatest island that there is in the world, seeing that it has a compass of more than 8000 miles, and is under the dominion of a great king...Pepper, nutmegs, spice, galang, cunbe, clove, and all the other good spices are produced in this island, and it is visited by many ships with quantities of merchandises from which they make great profits and gain, for such an amount of gold is found there that no one would believe it or venture to tell it."—Marco Polo, in Ramusio, iii. 51.

c. 1380.—"In the neighbourhood of that realm is a great island, Java by name, which hath a compass of a good 3000 miles. Now this island is populous exceedingly, and is the second best of all islands that exist...The King of this island hath a palace which is truly marvellous...Now the great Khan of Cathay many a time engaged in war with this King; but this King always vanquished and got the better of him."—Friar Oderic, in Cathay, &c., 57-59.

c. 1349.—"She clandestinely gave birth to a daughter, whom she made when grown up Queen of the finest island in the world, Saba by name..."—John de Marignolli, ibid. 391.

c. 1444.—"Sunt insulae dua in interiori India, e pene extremis orbis finibus, ambæe Java nomine, quarum altera tribus, altera duobus millibus milliarum pretiitudinit orientem versus; sed Maioris, Minorisque cognomine discernuntur."—N. Conti, in Poggio, De Var. Fortunae.

1503.—The Syrian Bishop Thomas, Jaballaha, Jacob, and Denha, sent on a mission to India in 1503 by the Nestorian Patriarch Elias, were ordained to go "to the land of the Indians and the islands of the seas which are between Dabag and Sin and Masin (see MACHEEN)."—Assemani, III. Pt. i. 592. This Dabag is probably a relic of the Zabaj of the Relation, of Masudi, and of Al-biruni.

1516.—"Further on...there are many islands, small and great, amongst which is one very large which they call Java the Great...They say that this island is the most abundant country in the world...There grow pepper, cinnamon, ginger, bamboo, cubbe, and gold..."—Barboza, 197.

Referring to Sumatra, or the Archipelago in general.

Saka, 578, i.e. A.D. 656.—"The Prince Adityadharma is the Deva of the First Java Land (protopos Yava-dvipa). May he be great! Written in the year of Saka, 578, May it be great! "—From a Sanskrit Inscription from Pager-Ruyong, in Menang Karbau (Sumatra), pubd. by Friedrich, in the Batavas Transactions, vol. xxiii.

1224.—"Maabar (q.v.) is the last part of India; then comes the country of China (Sa), the first part of which is Jaws, reached by a difficult and fatal sea."—Yâbûli, i. 516.

"This is some account of remotest Sin, which I record without questioning for its truth...for in such it is far off land. I have seen no one who had gone to it and penetrated far into it; only the merchants seek its outlying parts, to wit the country known as Jaws on the sea-coast, like to India; from it are brought Aloe wood (ad), camphor, and nard (samal), and clove, and mace (bados), and China drugs, and vessels of china-wares."—Ibid. iii. 445.
JAWAUB.

Kaswini speaks in almost the same words of Jawa. He often copies Yakut, but perhaps he really means his own time (for he uses different words) when he says: "Up to this time the merchants came no further into China than to this country (Jawa) on account of the distance and difference of religion."—ib. 18.

1298.—"When you leave this Island of Pentam and sail about 100 miles, you reach the Island of Java the Less. For all its name 'tsi none so small but that it has a compass of 2000 miles or more..."—ib.

Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. 9.

c. 1300.—"... In the mountains of Jawa scented woods grow... The mountains of Jawa are very high. It is the custom of the people to puncture their hands and entire body with needles, and then rub in some black substance."—Rashid-uddin, in Elliot, i. 71.
