c. 1380.—"Parmi les isles de la Mer de l'Inde il faut citer celle de Djawah, grande ile celebre par l'abondance de ses drogues... Le sud de l'isle de Djawah on remarque la plus belle coutume, d'ou le commerce Fansoutri tire son nom."—Geog. d'Aboufeda, II. pt. ii. 127. [See CAMPHOR.]

c. 1346.—"After a passage of 25 days we arrived at the Island of Java, which gives its name to the islaha jawi (see BENJAMIN)... We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say the city of Sumatra; a fine large town with a wall of wood and towers also of wood."—Isa Bataua, iv. 228-230.

1553.—"And so these, as well as those of the interior of the Island (Sumatra), are all dark, with lank hair, of good nature and countenance, and not resembling the Javanese, although such near neighbours, indeed it is very notable that at so small a distance from each other their nature should vary so much, all the more because all the people of this Island call themselves by the common name of Jawah (Java), because they hold it for certain that the Javanese (or Joes) were formerly lords of this great Island..."—Barros, III. v. 1.

1555.—"Beyond the Island of Jawa they sailed along by another called Bali; and then came also unto other called Aujaue, Cambaba, Solor... The course of these islands is about 500 leagues. The ancient cosmographers call all these Islands by the name Javae; but late experience hath found the names to be very diuers as you see."

Antonio Galvano, old E.T. in Hatl. iv. 428.

1858.—"It is a saying in Goorazat,— 'Who goes to Java, Never returns.
If by chance he return,
Then for two generations to live upon,
Money enough he brings back.'"

Rds Mald, ii. 82; [ed. 1878, p. 418].

JAWAUB, b. From Ar. jawab, 'an answer.' In India it has besides this ordinary meaning, that of 'dismissal.' And in Anglo-Indian colloquial it is especially used for a lady's refusal of an offer; whence the verb passive 'to be jawawbd.' [The Jawaub Club consisted of men who had been at least half a dozen times 'jawaub'd."

JAWAUB, a. Hind. from Ar. jawab, 'an answer.' In India it has besides this ordinary meaning, that of 'dismissal.' And in Anglo-Indian colloquial it is especially used for a lady's refusal of an offer; whence the verb passive 'to be jawawbd.' [The Jawaub Club consisted of men who had been at least half a dozen times 'jawaub'd."

1830.—"'The Juwawbd Club,' asked Elamore, with surprise, 'what is that?'
"'Tis a fanciful association of those melancholy candidates for wedlock who have fallen in their pursuit, and are smarting under the sting of rejection."—Orient. Sport. Mag., reprint 1878, i. 424."

Jawab among the natives is often applied to anything erected or planted for a symmetrical double, where

"Grove nodes at grove, each alley has a brother, And half the platform just reflects the other."

"In the houses of many chiefs every picture on the walls has its jawab (or duplicate). The portrait of Scindiah now in my dining-room was the jawab (copy in fact) of Mr. C. Landseer's picture, and hung opposite to the..."
original in the Darbar room (M. Gen. Keatings). ["The masjid with three domes of white marble occupies the left wing and has a counterpart (jawaib) in a precisely similar building on the right hand side of the Taj. This last is sometimes called the false masjid; but it is in no sense dedicated to religious purposes."—Führer, Monumental Antiquities, N.W.P., p. 64.]

JAY, s. The name usually given by Europeans to the Coracias Indica, Linn., the Nilkanth, or 'blue-throat' of the Hindus, found all over India.

[1878.—"They are the commonality of birddom, who furnish forth the mothe which bewilder the drunken-frighted Jay when he jerks, shrieking in a series of blue hyphen-flashes through the air . . . ."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 3.]

JEEL, s. Hind. jhil. A stagnant sheet of inundation; a mere or lagoon. Especially applied to the great sheets of remnant inundation in Bengal. In Eastern Bengal they are also called bheel (q.v.).

[1757.—"Towards five the guard waked me with notice that the Nawab would presently pass by to his palace of Mootee jeel."—Hotwell's Letter of Feb. 28, in Wheeler, Early Records, 220.]

The Jhil of Silhet are vividly and most accurately described (though the word is not used) in the following passage:

c. 1778.—"I shall not therefore be disbelieved when I say that in pointing my boat towards Silhet I had recourse to my compass, the same as at sea, and steered a straight course through a lake not less than 100 miles in extent, occasionally passing through villages built on artificial mounds: but so scanty was the ground that each house had a canoe attached to it."—Hon. Robert Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 168.

1824.—"At length we . . . entered what might be called a sea of reeds. It was, in fact, a vast jeel or marsh, whose tall rushes rise above the surface of the water, having depth enough for a very large vessel. We sailed briskly on, rustling like a greyhound in a field of corn."—Hober, i. 101.

1850.—"To the geologist the Jheels and Sunderbunds are a most instructive region, as whatever may be the mean elevation of their waters, a permanent depression of 10 to 15 feet would submerge an immense tract."—Hoober's Himalayan Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 265.

1858.—"You attribute to me an act, the credit of which was due to Lieut. George Hutchinson, of the late Bengal Engineers.* That able officer, in company with the late Colonel Berkley, H.M. 32nd Regt., laid out the defences of the Alum Bagh camp, remarkable for its bold plan, which was so well devised that, with an apparently dangerous extent, it was defensible at every point by the small but ever ready force under Sir James Outram. A long interval . . . . was defended by a post of support called 'Moir's Picket' . . . . covered by a wide expanse of jheel, or lake, resulting from the rainy season. Foreseeing the probable drying up of the water, Lieut. Hutchinson, by a clever inspiration, marched all the transport elephants through and through the lake, and when the water disappeared, the dried clay-bed, pierced into a honey-combed surface of circular holes a foot in diameter and two or more feet deep, became a better protection against either cavalry or infantry than the water had been. . . . ."—Letter to Lt.-Col. F. R. Innes from F. M. Lord Napier of Magdala, dd. April 15.

JEEL and JHEEL are both applied to the artificial lakes in Central India and Bundelkhand.

JEETUL, s. Hind. jital. A very old Indian denomination of copper coin, now entirely obsolete. It long survived on the western coast, and the name was used by the Portuguese for one of their small copper coins in the forms cestil and zoitole. It is doubtful, however, if cestil is the same word. At least there is a medieval Portuguese coin called cestel and cepel (see Fernandes, in Memorias da Academia Real das Sciences de Lisbo, 2da Classe, 1856); this may have got confounded with the Indian Jital. The jital of the Delhi coinage of Alâ-ud-din (c. 1300) was, according to Mr. E. Thomas's calculations, 1/12 of the silver tanga, the coin called in later days the rupee. It was therefore just the equivalent of our modern pice. But of course, like most modern denominations of coin, it has varied greatly.

c. 1198-4.—"According to Kuth-ud-Din's command, Nizam-ud-Din Mohammad, on his return, brought them [the two slaves] along with him to the capital, Dilli; and Malik Kuth-ud-Din purchased both the Turks for the sum of 100,000 jitals."—Ravert, Tabakat-i-Nâpir, p. 638.

c. 1290.—"In the same year . . . there was dearth in Delli, and grain rose to a jital per sfr (see Sgear)."—Gaz-ud-din Barî, in Elliot, iii. 146.

Jehaud, s. Ar. jihād, ['an effort, a striving']; then a sacred war of Musulmans against the infidel; which Sir Herbert Edwardes called, not very neatly, a crescentade.

[c. 630 a.d.—"Make war upon such of those to whom the Scriptures have been given who believe not in God, or in the last day, and who forbid not that which God and his Prophet have forbidden, and who profess not the profession of the truth until they pay tribute (īswhā) out of hand, and they be humbled."—Korda, Surah ix. 29.]

1880.—"When the Athenians invaded Ephesus, towards the end of the Peloponnesian War, Tissaphernes offered a mighty sacrifice at Artemis, and raised the people in a sort of Jehad, or holy war, for her defence."—Sat. Rev. July 17, 84b.

[1901.—"The matter has now assumed the aspect of a 'Schad,' or holy war against Christianity."—Times, April 4.]

Jelaubee, s. Hind. jalebi, [which is apparently a corruption of the Ar. zalabiya, P. zalabiya]. A rich sweetmeat made of sugar and ghee, with a little flour, melted and trickled into a pan so as to form a kind of interlaced work, when baked.

[1870.—"The poison is said to have been given once in sweetmeats, Jelabees."—Chevers, Med. Jurisp. 178.]

Jelly, s. In South India this is applied to vitrified brick refuse used as metal for roads. [The Madras Gloss. gives it as a synonym for kunkur.] It would appear from a remark of C. P. Brown (MS. notes) to be Telugu zaltū, Tam. shallū, which means properly 'shivers, bits, pieces.'

Jelum, n.p. The most westerly of the "Five Rivers" that give their name to the Punjab (q.v.), (among which the Indus itself is not usually included). Properly Jisal or Jisam, now apparently written Jhilam, and taking this name from a town on the right bank. The Jhilam is the Bādshān of Alexander's historians, a name corrupted from the Skt. Vīśāla, which is more nearly represented by Ptolemy's Bādshān. A still further (Prakritic) corruption of the same is Behat (see Behut).

1037.—"Here he (Mahmūd) fell ill, and remained sick for fourteen days, and got no better. So in a fit of repentance he forswore wine, and ordered his servants to throw all his supply... into the Jilam..."—Baihaki, in Bīriot, ii. 139.

c. 1204.—"... in the height of the conflict, Shahs-ud-din, in all his panoply, rode right into the water of the river Jilam... and his warlike feats while in that water reached such a pitch that he was despatching those infidels from the height of the waters to the lowest depths of Hell..."—Tabakat, by Raverty, 604-5.

1856.—"Hyadapes! often have thy waves run tuned To battle music, since the soldier King, The Macedonian, dipped his golden casque And swam thy swollen flood, until the time When Night the peace-maker, with piou hand, Unclothing her dark mantle, smoothed it soft O'er the pale faces of the brave who slept Cold in their clay, on Chillian's bloody field."—The Banyan Tree.

Jemadar, Jemautdar, &c. Hind. from Ar.—P. jamā'dar, jamā' meaning 'an aggregate,' the word indicates generally, a leader of a body of individuals. [Some of the forms are as if from Ar.—P. jamādat, 'an assemblage.'] Technically, in the Indian army, it is the title of the second rank of native officer in a company of sepoys, the Subedar (see Soubadar) being the first. In this sense the word dates from the reorganisation of the army in 1768. It is also applied to certain officers of police (under the dāroga), of the custums, and of other civil departments. And in larger domestic establishments there is often a jemadar, who is over the servants generally, or over the stables, camp service and orderlies. It is also an honorific title often used by the other household servants in addressing the bhishis (see BHEESTY).

1752.—"The English battalion no sooner quitte Trichinopoly than the regent set about accomplishing his scheme of surprising the city, and . . . endeavoured to gain 500 of the Nabob's best peons with firelocks. The jemantdars, or captains of these troops, received his bribes and promised to join."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 257.

1817.—". . . Calliand had commenced an intrigue with some of the jemantdars, or captains of the enemy's troops, when he received intelligence that the French had arrived at Trichinopoly."—Mill, iii. 175.

1824.—"Abdullah was a Musulman convert of Mr. Corrie's, who had travelled in Persia with Sir Gore Ouseley, and accompanied him to England, from whence he was returning. . . . when the Bishop took him into his service, as a jemantdar, or head officer of the peons."—Editor's note to Heber, ed. 1844, iv. 85.

JENNYE, n.p. Hind. Janai. The name of a great river in Bengal, which is in fact a portion of the course of the Brahmaputra (see BURRAMPOOTER), and the conditions of which are explained in the following passage written by one of the authors of this Glossary many years ago: "In Rennell's time, the Burramooter, after issuing westward from the Assam valley, swept south-eastward, and forming with the Ganges a fluvial peninsula, entered the sea abreast of that river below Dacca. And so almost all English maps persist in representing it, though this eastern channel is now, unless in the rainy season, shallow and insignificant; the vast body of the Burramooter cutting across the neck of the peninsula under the name of Jenai, and uniting with the Ganges near Pubna (about 150 miles N.E. of Calcutta), from which point the two rivers under the name of Pudda (Padda) flow on in mighty union to the sea." (Blackwood's Mag., March 1852, p. 338.)

The river is indicated as an offshoot of the Burramooter in Rennell's Bengal Atlas (Map No. 6) under the name of Jenni, but it is not mentioned in his Memoir of the Map of Hindostan. The great change of the river's course was palpably imminent at the beginning of the last century; for Buchanan (c. 1809) says: "The river threatens to carry away all the vicinity of Dewangunj, and perhaps to force its way into the heart of Natori." (Eastern India, iii. 394; see also 377.) Natori or Nattore was the territory now called Rajhsahi District. The real direction of the change has been further south. The Janai is also called the Jumuna (see under JUMNA). Hooker calls it Jummal (?) noticing that the maps still led him to suppose the Burramooter flowed 70 miles further east (see Him. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 259).

JENNYRICKSHAW, s. Read Capt. Gill's description below. Giles states the word to be taken from the Japanese pronunciation of three characters, reading jin-riki-sha, signifying 'Man—Strength—Cart.' The term is therefore, observes our friend E. C. Baber, an exact equivalent of "Pullman-Car!" The article has been introduced into India, and is now in use at Simla and other hill-stations. [The invention of the vehicle is attributed to various people—to an Englishman known as "Public-spirited Smith" (8 ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 325); to native Japanese about 1868-70, or to an American named Goble, "half-cobbler and half-missionary." See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 236 seq.]

1876.—"A machine called a jinnyrickshaw is the usual public conveyance of Shanghai. This is an importation from Japan, and is admirably adapted for the flat country, where the roads are good, and coolie hire cheap. . . . In shape they are like a buggy, but very much smaller, with room inside for one person only. One coolie goes into the shafts and runs along at the rate of 6 miles an hour; if the distance is long, he is usually accompanied by a companion who runs behind, and they take it in turn to draw the vehicle."—W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 10. See also p. 162.

1880.—"The Kuruma or jin-ri-ki-sha consists of a light perambulator body, an adjustable hood of oiled paper, a velvet or cloth lining and cushion, a well for parcels under the seat, two high slim wheels, and a pair of shafts connected by a bar at the ends."—Miss Bird, Japan, i. 18.

[1885.—"We . . . got into rickshaws to make an otherwise impossible descent to JEZYA, s. Ar. jisya. The poll-tax which the Muslim law imposes on subjects who are not Moslem.

[c. 630 A.D. See under JEAUD.]

1800. — "The Kazi replied... 'No doctor but the great doctor (Hanifa) to whose school we belong, has assented to the imposition of Jisya on Hindus. Doctors of other schools allow of no alternative but 'Death or Islam.'" — Ziz-al-din Barnt, in Rilcet, iii. 184.

1888. — "Understand what custom ye English paid formerly, and compare ye difference between that and our last order for taking customes and Judges. If they pay no more than they did formerly, they complain without occasion. If more, write what it is, and there shall be an abatement." — Visier's Letter to Nabob, in Hedges, Diary, July 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 100].

1868. — "Books of accounts received from Dacca, with advice that it was reported at the Court there that the Poll-money or Judges late ordered by the Mogul would be exacted of the English and Dutch... Among the orders issued to Patna, Cosumbaran, and Dacca, instructions are given to the latter place not to pay the Judges or Poll-tax, if demanded." — Fl. St. Geo. Cons. [on Tour] Sept. 29 and Oct. 10; Notes and Extracts, No. i. p. 49.

1765. — "When the Hindoo Rajahs... submitted to Tamarlaine; it was on these capital stipulations: That... the emperors should never impose the jessera (or poll-tax) upon the Hindoos." — Howewell, Hist. Events, i. 37.

JHAUMP, s. A hurdle of matting and bamboo, used as a shutter or door. Hind. jhânp, Mahr. jhâna; in connection with which there are verbs, Hind. jhânp-nâ, jhâna, jhânp-nâ, 'to cover.' See jhopdr, a.v. âk; [but there seems to be no etymological connection].

JHOOM, s. jhâm. This is a word used on the eastern frontiers of Bengal for that kind of cultivation which is practised in the hill forests of India and Indo-China, under which a tract is cleared by fire, cultivated for a year or two, and then abandoned-for another tract, where a like process is pursued. This is the Kumari (see COOMRY) of S.W. India, the Chena of Ceylon (see Emerson Tennent, ii. 463), the tumang-yuan of Burma [Gazetteer, ii. 72, 757, the dahya of North India (Skt. dâh, 'to burn'), ponam (Tam. pun, 'inferior'), or ponacaud (Mal. punak-] katu, pun, 'inferior,' katu, 'forest') of Malabar. In the Philippine Islands it is known as gainges; it is practised in the Ardennes, under the name of sartage, and in Sweden under the name of smedjande (see Marsh, Earth as Modified by Human Action, 246).

1800. — "In this hilly tract are a number of people... who use a kind of cultivation called the Cotawau, which a good deal resembles that which in the Eastern parts of Bengal is called Jumesa." — Buchanan, Myore, ii. 177.

1888. — "It is now many years since Government, seeing the waste of forest caused by juming, endeavoured to put a stop to the practice... The people jumed as before, regardless of orders." — Indian Agriculturist, Sept. (Calcutta).

1885. — "Juming disputes often arose, one village against another, both desiring to jum the same tract of jungle, and these cases were very troublesome to deal with. The juming season commences about the middle of May, and the air is then darkened by the smoke from the numerous clearings..." — [Here follows an account of the process]. — Lt.-Col. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, 348 seq.

JIGGY-JIGGY, adv. Japanese equivalent for 'make haste!' The Chinese syllables chih-chih, given as the origin, mean 'straight, straight!' Qu. 'right ahead?' [Bp. Moule].

JILLMILL, s. Venetian shutters, or as they are called in Italy, persiane. The origin of the word is not clear. The Hind. word 'jhitmild' seems to mean 'sparkling,' and have been applied to some kind of gauze. Possibly this may have been used for blinders, and thence transferred to shutters. [So Platte in his H. Dict.] Or it may have been an onomatopoeia, from the rattle of such shutters; or it may have been corrupted from a Port. word such as janella, 'a window.' All this is conjecture.

1832. — "Besides the purdaha, the openings between the pillars have blinds neatly made of bamboo strips, woven together with coloured cords: these are called jhimmuns or cheeks." — Chick, s.a. — Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 306.

1874. — "The front (of a Bengal house) is generally long, exhibiting a pillared verandah, or a row of French casements, and jimmilled windows." — Calc. Review, No. crwll. 207.

JOOLE, s. We know not what this word is; perhaps 'toys!' [Mr.
W. Foster writes: "On looking up the I.O. copy of the Ft. St. George Consultations for Nov. 22, 1703, from which Wheeler took the passage, I found that the word is plainly not jocoles, but Jocolete, which is a not unusual form of chocolate." The N.E.D. s.v. Chocolate, gives as other forms jocolatte, jacolatte, jocolat.

1768. — "... sent from the Patriarch to the Governor with a small present of jocoles, oil, and wines." — In Wheeler, ii. 32.

JOGEI, s. Hind. jogi. A Hindu ascetic; and sometimes a 'conjuror.' From Skt. yogi, one who practises the yoga, a system of meditation combined withusterities, which is supposed to induce miraculous power over elementary matter. In fact the stuff which has of late been propagated in India by certain persons, under the names of theosophy and esoteric Buddhism, is essentially the doctrine of the Jogis.

1343. — "We cast anchor by a little island near the main, Anchediva (q.v.), where there was a temple, a grove, and a tank of water... We found a jogi leaning against the wall of a Buddhist or temple of idols" (respecting whom he tells remarkable stories).— Ibn Batuta, iv. 62-63, and see p. 275.

c. 1442. — "The Infidels are divided into a great number of classes, such as the Bramins, the Joghis and others."— Abdurrazak, in India in the X Vth Cent., 17.

1510. — "The King of the Joghis is a man of great dignity, and has about 30,000 people, and he is a pagan, he and all his subjects; and by the pagan Kings he and his people are considered to be saints, on account of their lives, which you shall hear..." Varahema, p. 111. Perhaps the chief of the Gouradhaka Jogis, who were once very numerous on the West Coast, and have still a settlement at Kadri, near Mangalore. See P. della Valle's notice below.

1518. — "And many of them noble and respectable people, not to be subject to the Moors, go out of the Kingdom, and take the habit of poverty, wandering the world... they carry very heavy chains round their necks and waists, and legs; and they smear all their bodies and faces with ashes... These people are commonly called Jogis, and in their own speech they are called Zoume (see SWAMY) which means Servant of God... These Jogues eat all meats, and do not observe any idolatry."— Barbosa, 99-100.

1553. — "Much of the general fear that affected the inhabitants of that city (Goa before its capture) proceeded from a Gentoo, of Bengal by nation, who went about in the habit of a Jogue, which is the strictest sect of their Religion... saying that the City would speedily have a new Lord, and should be inhabited by a strange people, contrary to the will of the natives."— De Barros, Dec. II. liv. v. cap. 3.

"For this reason the place (Adam's Peak) is so famous among all the Gentiles of the East yonder, that they resort thither as pilgrims from more than 1000 leagues off, and chiefly those whom they call Jogues, who are as men who have abandoned the world and dedicated themselves to God, and make great pilgrimages to visit the Temples consecrated to him."— Ibid. Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 1.

1563. — "... to make them fight, like the cobras de capello which the Jogues carry about asking alms of the people, and these Jogues are certain heathen (Gentiles) who go begging all about the country, powdered all over with ashes, and venerated by all the poor heathen, and by some of the Moors also..."— Garcia, f. 156a, 157.

1567. — "Jogues." See under CASIH.

[c. 1610. — "The Gentiles have also their Auledalis (Abd-Allah), which are like to our hermits, and are called Jogues."—Pyruad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 943.]

1624. — "Finally I went to see the King of the Jogis (Gioghi) where he dwelt at that time, under the shade of a cottage; and I found him roughly occupied in his affairs as a man of the field and husbandman... they told me his name was Baginata, and that the hermitage and the place generally was called Cadira (Kadri)."— P. della Valle, ii. 724; [Hak. Soc. ii. 350, and see i. 37, 75].

1667. — "I allude particularly to the people called Janguis, a name which signifies 'united to God.'"—Bernier, ed. Constable, 316.

1673. — "Near the Gate in a Choultry sate more than Forty naked Jongsies, or men united to God, covered with Banyas and plaited Turbans of their own Hair."—Przer, 100.

1727. — "There is another sort called Jongiisse, who... go naked except a bit of Cloth about their Loins, and some deny themselves even that, delighting in Nastiness, and an holy Obscenity, with a great

1800.—"Fate work'd its own the while. A band Of Yogeeses, as they roamed the land Seeking a spouse for Jagu Naut their God, Stray'd to this solitary glade."

Three of Kehana, xiii. 16.
c. 1812.—"Scarcely were we seated when behold, there poured into the space before us, not only all the Yogeeses, Fakerees, and rogues of that description ... but the King of the Beggars himself, wearing his peculiar badge."—Mrs. Sherwood, (describing a visit to Henry Martyn at Cawnapore), Autobiog., 415.

"Apan gātā ka jogi an gātō kā sādā." Hind. proverb: "The man who is a jogi in his own village is a deity in another."—Quoted by Elliot, ii. 207.

JOHN COMPANY, n.p. An old personification of the East India Company, by the natives often taken seriously, and so used, in former days. The term Company is still applied in Sumatra by natives to the existing (Dutch) Government (see H. O. Forbes, Naturalist's Wanderings, 1885, p. 204).

[Dhōeti Company Bahdur kē] is still a common form of native appeal for justice, and Company Bāgh is the usual phrase for the public garden of a station. It has been suggested, but apparently without real reason, that the phrase is a corruption of Company Jahān, "which has a fine sounding smack about it, recalling Shāh Jahān and Jehāngir, and the golden age of the Mogul" (G. A. Sala, quoted in Notes and Queries, 8 ser. ii. 37). And Sir G. Birdwood writes: "The earliest coins minted by the English in India were of copper, stamped with a figure of an irradiated lingam, the phallic 'Roi Soleil.' The mintage of this coin is unknown (1 Madras), but without doubt it must have served to ingratiate us with the natives of the country, and may have given origin to their personification of the Company under the potent title of Kumpani Jahān, which, in English mouths, became "John Company." (Report on Old Records, 222, note.)

[1784.—"Further, I knew that as simple Hottentots and Indians could form no idea of the Dutch Company and its government and constitution, the Dutch in India had given out that this was one mighty ruling prince who was called Jan or John, with the surname Company, which also procured for them more reverence than if they could have actually made the people understand that they were, in fact, ruled by a company of merchants."—Andreas Sparrmann, Travels to the Cape of Good Hope, the South-Polar Lands, and round the World, p. 347; see 9 ser. Notes and Queries, vii. 84.]

1808.—(The Nawab) "much amused me by the account he gave of the manner in which my arrival was announced to him. ... 'Lord Sahāb Ka bādā, Company kē nāmaa tāshīf laīdā'; literally translated, 'The Lord's sister's son, and the grandson of the Company, has arrived."—Lord Valentia, i. 137.

1808.—"However the business is pleasant now, consisting principally of orders to countermand military operations, and preparations to save Johnny Company's cash."—Lord Minto in India, 184.

1818-19.—"In England the ruling power is possessed by two parties, one the King, who is Lord of the State, and the other the Honourable Company. The former governs his own country; and the latter, though only subjects, exceed the King in power, and are the directors of mercantile affairs."—Sadārach, in Elliot, viii. 411.

1826.—"He said that according to some accounts, he had heard the Company was an old Englishwoman ... then again he told me that some of the Topes wallas say 'John Company,' and he knew that Jobs was a man's name, for his master was called John Brioe, but he could not say to a certainty whether 'Company' was a man's or a woman's name."—Fandwrg Hāri, 60; [ed. 1873, i. 83, in a note to which the phrase is said to be a corruption of Joint Company].

1836.—"The jargon that the English speak to the natives is most absurd. I call it 'John Company's English,' which rather affronts Mrs. Staunton."—Letters from Madras, 413.

1852.—"John Company, whatever may be his faults, is infinitely better than Downing Street. If India were made over to the Colonial Office, I should not think it worth three years' purchase."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 293.

1888.—"It fares with them as with the sceptics once mentioned by a South-Indian villager to a Government official. Some men had been now and then known, he said, to express doubt if there were any such person as John Company; but of such it was observed that something had soon happened to them."—Sat. Review, Feb. 14, p. 220.

JOMPON, s. Hind. jānpān, jāpān, [which are not to be found in Platt's Dict.]. A kind of sedan, or portable chair used chiefly by the ladies at the Hill Sanitarium of Upper India. It is carried by two pairs of men (who are called Jompnionics, i.e. jānpānis or jāpānis), each pair bearing on their shoulders a short bar from which the shafts of the chair are slung. There is some perplexity as to the origin of the word. For we find in Crawford's Malay Dict. "Jampana (Jav. Jampona), a kind of litter." Also the Javanese Dict. of P. Janss (1876) gives: "Djempanā—dragstool (i.e. portable chair), or sedan of a person of rank." [Klinkert has jempana, djempana, sempana as a State sedan-chair, and he connects sempana with Skt. sam-panna, 'that which has turned out well, fortunate.' Wilkinson has: "jempana, Skt. ? a kind of State carriage or sedan for ladies of the court." The word cannot, however, have been introduced into India by the officers who served in Java (1811-15), for its use is much older in the Himalaya, as may be seen from the quotation from P. Desideri.

It seems just possible that the name may indicate the thing to have been borrowed from Japan. But the fact that dyamān means 'hang' in Tibetan may indicate another origin.

Wilson, however, has the following: "Jhâmpān, Bengali. A stage on which snake-catchers and other juggling vagabonds exhibit; a kind of sedan used by travellers in the Himalaya, written Jâmpaun (?)." [Both Platts and Pallon give the word jhappan as Hind.; the former does not attempt a derivation; the latter gives Hind. jhānp, 'a cover,' and this on the whole seems to be the most probable etymology. It may have been originally in India, as it is now in the Straits, a closed litter for ladies of rank, and the word may have become appropriated to the open conveyance in which European ladies are carried.]

1716.—"The roads are nowhere practicable for a horseman, or for a Jampan, a sort of palankin."—Letter of P. Ipolitio Desideri, dated April 10, in Lettres Éd. xvi. 184.

1783.—(After a description) "... by these central poles the litter, or as it is here called, the Sampam, is supported on the shoulders of four men."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1806, ii. 2.

1822.—"The Chumpann, or as it is more frequently called, the Chumpala, is the usual vehicle in which persons of distinction, especially females, are carried. ..."—Lloyd, Gerard, Narr. i. 105.

[1849.—"A Jhappan is a kind of armchair with a canopy and curtains; the canopy, &c., can be taken off."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 103.]

1879.—"The gondola of Simla is the 'jampam' or 'jampot,' as it is sometimes called, on the same linguistic principle ... as that which converts asparagus into sparrow-grass. ... Every lady on the hills keeps her jampan and jampaneses ... just as in the plains she keeps her carriage and footmen."—Letter in Times, Aug. 17.

JOOL, JOOOL, s. Hind. jhol, supposed by Shakespeare (no doubt correctly) to be a corrupt form of the Ar. jull, having much the same meaning; [but Platts takes it from jholna, 'to dangle']. Housings, body clothing of a horse, elephant, or other domesticated animal; often a quilt, used as such. In colloquial use all over India. The modern Arabs use the plur. jilal as a singular. This Dozy defines as "couverture en laine plus ou moins ornée de dessins, très large, très chaude et enveloppant le poitrail et la croupe du cheval" (exactly the Indian jhol)—also "ornement de soie qu'on étend sur la croupe des chevaux aux jours de fête."

1850.—"Horse Joolas, &c., at shortest notice."—Adv. in Madras Mail, Feb. 18.

JOOLA, s. Hind. jhulla. The ordinary meaning of the word is 'a swing'; but in the Himalaya it is specifically applied to the rude suspension bridges used there.

[1812.—"There are several kinds of bridges constructed for the passage of strong currents and rivers, but the most common are the Sāgha and Jhula" (a description of both follows).—Aisat, Res. xi. 475.]

1830.—"Our chief object in descending to the Sutlej was to swing on a Joolah bridge. The bridge consists of 7 grass ropes, about twice the thickness of your thumb, tied to a single post on either bank. A piece of the hollowed trunk of a tree, half a yard long, slips upon these ropes, and from this 4 loops from the same grass rope depend. The passenger hangs in the loops, placing a couple of ropes under each thigh, and holds on by pegs in the block over his head; the signal is given and he is drawn over by an eighth rope."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 114.

JOSS, s. An idol. This is a corruption of the Portuguese Deus, 'God,' first taken up in the 'Pidgin' language. of the Chinese ports from the Portuguese, and then adopted from that jargon by Europeans as if they had got hold of a Chinese word. [See CHIN-CHIN.]

1659.—"But the Devil (whom the Chinese commonly called Joo[a]e) is a mighty and powerful Prince of the World."—Walter Skelz, 17.

"... In a four-cornered cabinet in their dwelling-rooms, they have, as it were, an altar, and thereon an image ... this they call Josin."—Saur, ed. 1672, p. 27.

1677.—"All the Sinese keep a limning of the Devil in their houses ... There paint him with two horns on his head, and commonly call him Josie (Joojes)."—Gerret Vermeulen, Oost Indische Voyagie, 38.

1711.—"I know but little of their Religion, more than that every Man has a small Joss or God in his own House."—Lockyer, 181.

1727.—"Their Josses or Demi-gods some of human shape, some of monstrous Figure."—A. Hamilton, ii. 296; [ed. 1744, ii. 285].

c. 1790.—
"Down with dukes, earls, and lords, those pagan Josses, False gods! away with stars and strings and crosses."

Peter Pindar, Ode to Kien Long.

1798.—"The images which the Chinese worship are called joostje by the Dutch, and joss by the English seamen. The latter is evidently a corruption of the former, which being a Dutch nickname for the devil, was probably given to these idols by the Dutch who first saw them."—Skawazzia, E.T. i. 173.

This is of course quite wrong.

JOS'S-HOUSE, a. An idol temple in China or Japan. From Joss, as explained in the last article.

1750-52.—"The seafarers, and even some books of voyages ... call the pagodas Yoss-houses, for on enquiring of a Chinese for the name of the idol, he answers Grande Yoss, instead of Grand Dieu."—Olf. Toren, 232.

1760-1810.—"On the 8th, 18th, and 28th day of the month those foreign barbarians may visit the Flower Gardens, and the Honam Joss-house, but not in drows of over ten at a time."—S Regulations at Canton, from The Fowkwe at Canton (1892), p. 29.

1840.—"Every town, every village, it is true, abounds with Joss-houses, upon which large sums of money have been spent."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 188.

1876.—"... the fantastic gables and tawdry ornaments of a large joss-house, or temple."—Fortnightly Review, No. clxxii. p. 223.

"One Tim Wang he makee-thavel, Makee stop one night in Joss-house."

Leland, Pidgin-English Sing-Song, p. 42.

Thus also in "pidgin," Joss-house-man or Joss-pidgin-man is a priest, or a missionary.

JOSTICK, JOS'S-STICK, a. "A stick of fragrant tinder (powdered costus, sandalwood, &c.) used by the Chinese as incense in their temples, and formerly exported for use as cigar-lights. The name appears to be from the temple use. (See PUTFOCK.)"

1876.—"Burnee joss-stick, talkee plitty."—Leland, Pidgin-English Sing-Song, p. 43.

1879.—"There is a recess outside each shop, and at dusk the joss-sticks burning in these fill the city with the fragrance of incense."—Miss Bird, Golden Cherussees, 49.

JOW, a. Hind. jhātā. The name is applied to various species of the shrubby tamarisk which abound on the low alluvials of Indian rivers, and are useful in many ways, for rough basket-making and the like. It is the usual material for gabions and fascines in Indian siege-operations.

[c. 1809.—"... by the natives it is called jhau; but this name is generic, and is applied not only to another species of Tamarisk, but to the Cuscuta of Bengal, and to the cone-bearing plants that have been introduced by Europeans."—Buchanan-Hamilton, Eastern India, iii. 597.]

[1840.—"... on the opposite Jhow, or bastard tamarisk jungle ... a native ... had been attacked by a tiger. ..."—Davidson, Travels, ii. 526.]

JOWAULLA MOOKHEE, n.p. Skt.—Hind. Jwāli-mukhī, 'flame-mouthed'; a generic name for quasi-volcanic phenomena, but particularly applied to a place in the Kangra district of the Punjab mountain country, near the Biās River, where jets of gas issue from the ground and are kept constantly burning. There is a shrine of Devī, and it is a place of pilgrimage famous all over the Himālaya as well as in the plains of India. The famous fire-jets at Baku are sometimes visited by more adventurous Indian pilgrims, and known as the Great Jwāli-mukhī. The author of the following passage was evidently ignorant of the phenomenon worshipped, though the name indicates its nature.

1860.—"Sultān Firos ... marched with his army towards Nagarkot (see NUGGECOTE) ... the idol Jwāli-mukhī, much worshipped by the infidels, was situated on the road to Nagarkot. ... Some of the infidels have reported that Sultán Fíroa went specially to see this idol, and held a golden umbrella over its head. But... the infidels slandered the Sultán. ... Other infidels said that Sultán Muhammad Sháh bin Tugblik Sháh held an umbrella over this same idol, but this also is a lie. ..."—Sháms-ı-Širíjí Aýf, in Elliott, iii. 318.

1616. —... a place called Jallamáke, which has on it 12 Springs and hard Rocks, there are daily to be seen incessant Eruptions of Fire, before which the Idolatrous people fall down and worship."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1417.

1789.—"At Taunála Mokoó (sic) a small volcanic fire issues from the side of a mountain, on which the Hindoos have raised a temple that has long been of celebrity, and favourite resort among the people of the Punjab."—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1793, i. 308.

1799.—"Prison Poory afterwards travelled... to the Maha or Burue (i.e. larger) Jovalí Mókhi or Juála Móchi, terms that mean a 'Flaming Mouth,' as being a spot in the neighbourhood of Bakee (Bakur) on the west side of the (Caspian) Sea... whence fire issues; a circumstance that has rendered it of great veneration with the Hindus."—Jonathan Duncan, in As. Res. v. 41.

JOVAUR, JOWABEE, s. Hind. javar, judr, [Skt. yava-prákttra or áktra, 'of the nature of barley';] Sorghum vulgare, Pers. (Holcus sorghum, L.) one of the best and most frequently grown of the tall millets of southern countries. It is grown nearly all over India in the unflooded tracts; it is sown about July and reaped in November. The reedy stems are 6 to 12 feet high. It is the cholam of the Tamil regions. The stalks arekirbee. The Ar. durá or dhura is perhaps the same word ultimately as javar; for the old Semitic name is dīkā, from the smoky aspect of the grain. It is an odd instance of the looseness which used to pervade dictionaries and glossaries that R. Drummond (Illus. of the Gram. Parts of Guzerattee, &c., Bombay, 1808) calls "Jooar, a kind of pulse, the food of the common people."

[c. 1590.—In Khandaeh "Jowári is chiefly cultivated of which, in some places, there are three crops in a year, and its stalk is so delicate and pleasant to the taste that it is regarded in the light of a fruit."—Ais, ed. Jarrett, ii. 228.]

1760.—"En suite mauvais chemin sur des levées faîtes de boue dans des quarres de

JOWARI et des champs de Neïs (see NELLY) remplis d'eau."—Auquil du Perron, i. 401xxxi.

1800.—"... My industrious followers must live either upon jowarry, of which there is an abundance everywhere, or they must be more industrious in procuring rice for themselves."—Wellington, i. 175.

1813.—Forbes calls it "juatee or cus-cus" (!). [See CUSCUS.]; Or. Mem. ii. 406; [2nd ed. ii. 36, and i. 29].

1819.—In 1797-8 Jowaree sold in the Muchoo Kaunta at six rupees per cules (see CULSEY) of 24 maunds."—Macmurdó, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 287.

[1826.—"And the sabre began to cut away upon them as if they were a field of Jowaree (standing corn)."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873 i. 86.]

JOY, s. This seems from the quotation to have been used on the west coast for jewell (Port. joia).

1810.—"The vanity of parents sometimes leads them to dress their children, even while infants, in this manner, which affords a temptation... to murder these helpless creatures for the sake of their ornaments or joys."—Maria Graham, 3.

JUBTEE, JUPTEE, &c., n. Guz. japti, &c. Corrupt forms of zábiti. ["Watán-zábiti, or japti, Mahr., Produce of lands sequestered by the State, an item of revenue; in Guzerat the lands once exempt, now subject to assessment." (Wilson).] (See ZUBBT.

1806.—"The Sindias as Sovereigns of Broach used to take the revenues of Mangooosal and Desoya (see DESSAYE) of that district every third year, amounting to Rs. 58,390, and called the periodical confiscation Juptee."—R. Drummond. [Majmúdar "in Guzerat the title given to the keepers of the pargana revenue records, who have held the office as a hereditary right since the settlement of Todor Mal, and are paid by fees charged on the villages." (Wilson)].

JUDA, ODIA, &c., n.p. These names are often given in old writers to the city of Ayuthia, or Ayodhya, or Yuthia (so called apparently after the Hindu city of Bama, Ayodhya, which we now call Oudh), which was the capital of Siam from the 14th century down to about 1767, when it was destroyed by the Burmese, and the Siamese royal residence was transferred to Bangkok [see BANGCOCK].

1522.—"All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the King of Siam, who is named Siri Zacabedera, and who inhabits India."—Fígåfta, Hak. Soc. 156.
c. 1542. — "The capital City of all this Empire is Odiss, whereof I have spoken heretofore: it is fortified with walls of brick and mortar, and contains, according to some, foure hundred thousand fires, whereof an hundred thousand are strangers of divers countries." — Piso, in Cesar's E.T. p. 295; orig. cap. lixix.

1553. — "For the Realm is great, and its Cities and Towns very populous; insomuch that the city Buda alone, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Siam (Sião), and the residence of the King, furnishes 50,000 men of its own." — Barros, III. ii. 5.

1614. — "As regards the size of the City of Odia... it may be guessed by an experiment made by a curious engineer with whom we communicated on the subject. He says that... he embarked in one of the native boats, small, and very light, with the determination to go all round the City (which is entirely compassed by water), and that he started one day from the Portuguese settlement, at dawn, and when he got back it was already far on in the night, and he affirmed that by his calculation he had gone more than 8 leagues." — Conto, VI. vii. 9.

1617. — "The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangoa (see JANGOMAY) arrived at 'the city of Judea' before Eaton's coming away from thence, and brought great store of merchandize." — Sainsbury, ii. 90.

"1 (letter) from Mr. Benjamin Fury in Judea, at Siam." — Cock's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 272.

1639. — "The chief of the Kingdom is India by some called Odia... the city of India, the ordinary Residence of the Court is seated on the Moon." — Mandelslo, Travels, E.T. ii. 122.

1663. — "As for the City of Siam, the Siamese do call it Si-yo-thai, the o of the syllable ye being closer than our (French) Diphthong au." — La Loubère, Siam, E.T. i. 7.

1727. — "... all are sent to the City of Siam or Odia for the King's Use... The City stands on an Island in the River Mennoo, which by Turnings and Windings, makes the distance from the Bar about 50 Leagues." — A. Hamilton, ii. 160; [ed. 1744].

1774. — "Ayutthaya with its districts Dvaravati, Yodaya and Kampaipak." — Inc. in Ind. Antiq. xxii. 4.

1827. — "The powerful Lord... who dwells over every head in the city of the sacred and great kingdom of Si-a-yo-thai..." — Treaty between E.I.C. and King of Siam, in Wilson, Documents of the Burmese War, App. lxxvii.

JUJGOOLAK. s. Marine Hind. for jack-block (Roebuck).

JUJGURNAUT, n.p. A corruption of the Skt. Jagannatha, 'Lord of the Universe,' a name of Krishna worshipped as Vishnu at the famous shrine of Puri in Orissa. The image so called is an amorphous idol, much like those worshipped in some of the South Sea Islands, and it has been pleasingly suggested (we believe first by Gen. Cunningham) that it was in reality a Buddhist symbol, which has been adopted as an object of Brahmanical worship, and made to serve as the image of a god. The idol was, and is, annually dragged forth in procession on a monstrous car, and as masses of excited pilgrims crowded round to drag or accompany it, accidents occurred. Occasionally also persons, sometimes sufferers from painful disease, cast themselves before the advancing wheels. The testimony of Mr. Stirling, who was for some years Collector of Orissa in the second decade of the last century, and that of Sir W. W. Hunter, who states that he had gone through the MS. archives of the province since it became British, show that the popular impression in regard to the continued frequency of immolations on these occasions—a belief that has made Juggurnaut a standing metaphor—was greatly exaggerated. The belief indeed in the custom of such immolation had existed for centuries, and the rehearsal of these or other cognate religious suicides at one or other of the great temples of the Peninsula, founded partly on fact, and partly on popular report, finds a place in almost every old narrative relating to India. The really great mortality from hardship, exhaustion, and epidemic disease which frequently ravaged the crowds of pilgrims on such occasions, doubtless aided in keeping up the popular impressions in connection with the Juggurnaut festival.

1811. — "Jagnár." See under MADURA.]

c. 1321. — "Annually on the recurrence of the day when that idol was made, the folk of the country come and take it down, and put it on a fine chariot; and then the King and Queen, and the whole body of the people, join together and draw it forth from the church with loud singing of songs, and all kinds of music... and many pilgrims who have come to this feast cast themselves under the chariot, so that its wheels may go over them, saying that they desire to die for their god. And the car passes over them, and crushes them, and cuts them in sunder, and so they perish on the spot." — Prior Odoric, in Olaus, &c. i. 83.
c. 1430. — "In Bisenagalia (see BIS-Nagar) also, at a certain time of the year, this idol is carried through the city, placed between two chariots... accompanied by a great concourse of people. Many, carried away by the fervour of their faith, cast themselves on the ground before the wheels, in order that they may be crushed to death, whence the death which they say is very acceptable to their god." — N. Comis, in India, i. 57th Cent., 28.

C. 1581. — "All for devotion attach themselves to the trace of the car, which is drawn in this manner by a vast number of people... and on the annual feast day of the Pagod this car is dragged by crowds of people through certain parts of the city (Neganpatam), some of whom from devotion, or the desire to be thought to make a devoted end, cast themselves down under the wheels of the car, and so perish, remaining all ground and crushed by the said car." — Gaspard Balbi, f. 84. The preceding passages refer to scenes in the south of the Peninsula.

C. 1690. — "In the town of Purrotam on the banks of the sea stands the temple of Jagnant, near to which are the images of Kishen, his brother, and their sister, made of Sandal-wood, which are said to be 4,000 years old... The Brahmins... at certain times carry the image in procession upon a carriage of sixteen wheels, which in the Hinduese language is called Rakh (see BUT); and they believe that whoever assists in drawing it along obtains remission of all his sins." — Gladwin's Ayens, ii. 13-15; [ed.
Jarrett, ii. 127.]

1682. — "Vto this Pagod or house of Sathan... do belong 3,000 Bramanines or Priestes, who do daily offer sacrifice unto their great God Jagannat, from which Idoll the City is so called. And when it (the chariot of Jagannat) is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves a sacrifice to this Idoll, and desperately lye down on the ground, that the chariott wheels may runne over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken armes, some broken legges, so that many of them are destroyed, and by this meanes they thynke to merite Heaven." — W. Bruton, in Hakl.
v. 57.

1867. — "In the town of Jagannat, which is seated upon the Gulf of Bengalea, and where is that famous Temple of the Idol of the same name, there is yearly celebrated a certain Feast... The first day that they shew this Idol with Ceremony in the Temple, the Crowd is usually so great to see it, that there is not a year, but some of those poor Pilgrimes, that come afar off, tired and harassed, are suffocated there;
all these people blessing them for having been so happy. And when this Hellish Triumphant Chariot marcheth, there are found (which is no Fable) persons so foolishly credulous and superstitious as to throw themselves with their bellies under those large and heavy wheels, which bruise them to death." — Bernard, a Letter to Mr. Chapelain, in Eng. ed. 1684, 97; [ed.
Constable, 304 seq.].

1669-79. — "In that great and Sumptuous Diabolical Pagod, there Stoodeth theree greatest God Jn. Gernant, whence ye Pagod received that name also." — MS. Asia, &c., T. B. t. 12. Col. Temple adds:
"Throughout the whole Ms. Jagannath is repeatedly called Jn. Gernant, which obviously stands for the common transposition Janganath."

1682. — "... We lay by last night till 10 o'clock this morning, ye Captain being deersous to see ye Jagernot Pagodas for his better satisfaction." — Hedges, Diary, July 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 30].

1727. — "His (Jagnynt's) Effigy is often carried abroad in Procession, mounted on a Coach for stories high... they fasten small Ropes to the Cable, two or three Fathoms long, so that upwards of 2,000 People have room enough to draw the Coach, and some old Zealots, as it passes through the Street, fall flat on the Ground, to have the Honour to be crushed to Pieces by the Coach Wheels." — A. Hamilton, i. 387; [ed. 1744].

1802. — "A thousand pilgrims strain Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with might and main,
To drag that sacred wain,
And scarce can draw along the enormous load.
Prone fall the frantic votaries on the road,
And calling on the gods,
Their self-devoted bodies there they lay
To pave his chariot way.
On Jag-nant they call,
The ponderous car rolls on, and crushes
all,
Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadful path.
Grunge, groan unheard; the dying cry.
And death, and agony.
Are trodden under foot by you mad throng, Who follow close and thrust the deadly wheels along."

Curse of Kehama, xiv. 5.

1814. — "The sight here beggars all description. Though Juggurnaut made some progress on the 19th, and has travelled daily ever since, he has not yet reached the place of his destination. His brother is ahead of him, and the lady in the rear.
One woman has devoted herself under the wheels, and a shocking sight it was.
Another also intended to devote herself, missed the wheels with her body, and had her arm broken. Three people lost their lives in the crowd." — Asiatic Journal, quoted in Beveridge, Hist. of India, ii. 54, without exact reference.

C. 1818. — "That excess of fanaticism which formerly prompted the pilgrims to court death by throwing themselves in crowds under the wheels of the car of JULIBDAR. has happily long ceased to actuate the worshippers of the present day. During 4 years that I have witnessed the ceremony, three cases only of this revolting species of immolation have occurred, one of which I may observe is doubtful, and should probably be ascribed to accident; in the others the victims had long been suffering from some excruciating complaints, and chose this method of ridding themselves of the burden of life in preference to other modes of suicide so prevalent with the lower orders under similar circumstances."—A. Starling, in As. Res. xv. 324.

1827.—March 28th in this year, Mr. Poynder, in the E. I. Court of Proprietors, stated that "about the year 1790 no fewer than 25 Hindus were crushed to death at Lahera on the Ganges, under the wheels of Juggernaut."—As. Journal, 1821, vol. x. iii. 702.

[1864.—"On the 7th July 1864, the editor of the Friend of India mentions that, a few days previously, he had seen, near Serampore, two persons crushed to death, and another frightfully lacerated, having thrown themselves under the wheels of a car during the Rath Jatra festival. It was afterwards stated that this occurrence was accidental."—Chetw. Ind. Med. J. 1666.]

1871.—"Poor Johnny Tetterby staggered under his Moolch of an infant, the Juggernaut crushed all his enjoyment."—Forster's Life of Dickens, ii. 415.

1876.—"Le monde en marchant n'a pas beaucoup plus de souci de ce qu'il écrase que le char du Nide de Juggernaut."—E. Renas, in Revue des Deux Mondes, 3e Série, xvii. p. 504.

JULIBDAR. s. Péa. jilnâdûr, from jiln, the string attached to the bridle by which a horse is led, the servant who leads a horse, also called jant-bakhâdâr, jantbakhâsh. In the time of Hedges the word must have been commonly used in Bengal, but it is now quite obsolete.

[c. 1590.—"For some time it was a rule that, whenever he (Akbar) rode out on a kâlik horse, a rupee should be given, viz. one lakhs to the Athbeg to the two to the Jilânâdûr..."—Âin, ed. Blockmann, i. 142. (And see under FYKE.)]

1678.—"In the heart of this Square is raised as large as a Mountebank's Stage, where the Gallabdar, or Master Muliteer, with his prime Passengers or Servants, have an opportunity to view the whole Caphala."—Fryer, 341.

1683.—"Your Jyllibdar, after he had received his letter would not stay for the Gen, but stood upon departure."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 15 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 112].

We admire what made you send peons to force our Gyllibdar back to your Factory, after he had gone 12 cases on his way, and dismiss him again without any reason for it."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 26 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 120].

1754.—"100 Giladar; those who are charged with the direction of the couriers and their horses."—Hay's Travels, i. 171 ; 252.

1812.—"I have often admired the courage and dexterity with which the Persian Jelwâdars or grooms throw themselves into the thickest engagement of angry horses."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 63 seq.

1880.—"It would make a good picture, the surroundings of camels, horses, donkeys, and men... Pascal and Remise cooking for me; the Jellazâdars, enveloped in felt coats, smoking their kallums, amid the half-light of fast fading day..."—MS. Journal in Persia of Capt. W. Gill, R.E.

JUMBEEA. s. Ar. jambîya, probably from jamb, 'the side'; a kind of dagger worn in the girdle, so as to be drawn across the body. It is usually in form slightly curved. Sir R. Burton (Câmões, Commentary, 413) identifies it with the agomis and gomio of the quotations below, and refers to a sketch in his Pilgrimage, but this we cannot find, [it is in the Memorial ed. i. 236], though the jambiyâh is several times mentioned, e.g. i. 347, iii. 72. The term occurs repeatedly in Mr. Egerton's catalogue of arms in the India Museum. Jambwâ occurs as the name of a dagger in the Âis (orig. i. 119); why Blochmann in his translation [i. 110] spells it jambwâh we do not know. See also Dozy and Eng. s.v. jambette. It seems very doubtful if the latter French word has anything to do with the Arabic word.

C. 1328.—"Taki-ud-din refused roughly and pushed him away. Then the maimed man drew a dagger (eshkgar) such as is called in that country jambiya, and gave him a mortal wound."—Im Bâtân, i. 534.

1518.—"They go to fight one another bare from the waist upwards, and from the waist downwards wrapped in cotton cloths drawn tightly round, and with many folds, and with their arms, which are swords, bucklers, and daggers (gumios)."—Barbo, p. 80.

1774.—"Autour du corps ils ont un ceinturon de cuir brodâ, ou garn d'argent.
an milieu duquel sur le devant ils passent un couteau large recourbé, et pointu (jambes), dont la pointe est tournée du côté droit."— Niebuh., Desc. de l'Arabie, 54.

JUMDUD, s. H. jamdad, jamdhar.
A kind of dagger, broad at the base and slightly curved, the hilt formed with a cross-grip like that of the Kadär (see KUTTAUR). [A drawing of what he calls a jamdhar kadăr is given in Egerton's Catalogue (Pl. IX. No. 344-5).] F. Johnson's Dictionary gives jamdar as a Persian word with the suggested etymology of yanb-dar, 'flank-render.' But in the Ain the word is spelt yanhadh, which seems to indicate Hind. origin; and its occurrence in the poem of Chand Bardái (see Ind. Antiq. i. 283) corroborates this. Mr. Beames there suggests the etymology of Yama-dánt 'Death's Tooth.' The drawings of the jamhad or jamdhar in the Ain illustrations show several specimens with double and triple toothed points, which perhaps favours this view; but Yama-dhara, 'death-wielder,' appears in the Sanskrit dictionaries as the name of a weapon. [Rather, perhaps, yama-dhara, 'death-bearer.]

c. 1526.—"Jamuhar." See quotation under KUTTAUR.

1813.—"... visited the jamdar khan, or treasury containing his jewels... curious arms..."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 469.

JUMMA, s. Hind, from Ar. jama'.
The total assessment (for land revenue) from any particular estate, or division of country. The Arab. word signifies 'total' or 'aggregate.'

c. 1781.—"An increase of more than 26 lacs of rupees (was) effected on the former jumma."—Fifth Report, p. 8.

JUMMABUNDEE, s. Hind, from P.—Ar. jama'bundy. A settlement (q.v.), i.e. the determination of the amount of land revenue due for a year, or a period of years, from a village, estate, or parcel of land. [In the N.W.P. it is specially applied to the annual village rent-roll, giving details of the holding of each cultivator.]

1814.—"Jummabundees." See under PATEL.

JUMNA, n.p. The name of a famous river in India which runs by Delhi and Agra. Skt. Yamuna, Hind. Jamund and Jamna, the Ιναύσια or Potome, the Ἰουβέφσια of Arrian, the Ιωμάνες of Pliny. The spelling of Potome almost exactly expresses the modern Hind. form Jamunda. The name Jamunda is also applied to what was in the 18th century, an unimportant branch of the Brahmaputra R., which connected it with the Ganges, but which has now for many years been the main channel of the former great river. (See JENNYE.) Jamund is the name of several other rivers of less note.

1616-17.—"I proposed for a water works, wth might give the Chief City of the Mogore content... wth is to be don vppon the Riuver Jenyme wth passeth by Agra..."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 460.

1619.—"The river Gemynisi was vnft to set a Myll vppon."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 477.

1663.—"... the Gemn, a river which may be compared to the Loire..."—Bernier, Letter to M. de la Mothe Vayer, ed. Constable, 241.

JUMNA MUSJID, n.p. A common corruption of the Ar. ja'me' masjid, 'the cathedral or congregational mosque,' Ar. jama', 'to collect.' The common form is supposed to represent some great mosque on the Jumna R.

1785.—"The Jumna-musjid is of great antiquity."—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 448.

1849.—"In passing we got out to see the Jumna Masjid, a very fine building now used as a magazine."—Mrs. MacKenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 170.

JUNGEERA, n.p., i.e. Janjira.
The name of a native State on the coast, south of Bombay, from which the Fort and chief place is 44 m. distant. This place is on a small island, rising in the entrance to the Rājpūri inlet, to which the name Janjira properly pertains, believed to be a local corruption of the Ar. jassira, 'island.' The State is also called Habeen, meaning 'Hubshee's land,' from the fact that for 3 or 4 centuries its chief has been of that race. This was not at first continuous, nor have the chiefs, even when of African blood, been always of one family; but they have apparently so for the last 200 years. 'The Sidi' (see SEEDY) and 'The Habbeh,' are titles popularly applied to this chief. This State has a port and some land in Kathiwär.

Gen. Keatinge writes: "The members of the Sidi's family whom I saw were, for natives of India, particularly fair." The old Portuguese writers call this harbour Danda (or as they write it Damda), e.g. João de Castro in Primeiro Roteiro, p. 48. His rude chart shows the island-fort.

"JUNGLE, s. Hind. and Mahr. jungal, from Skt. jangala (a word which occurs chiefly in medical treatises). The native word means in strictness only waste, uncultivated ground; then, such ground covered with shrubs, trees or long grass; and thence again the Anglo-Indian application is to forest, or other wild growth, rather than to the fact that it is not cultivated. A forest; a thicket; a tangled wilderness. The word seems to have passed at a rather early date into Persian, and also into use in Turkistan. From Anglo-Indian it has been adopted into French as well as into English. The word does not seem to occur in Fyssor, which rather indicates that its use was not so extremely common among foreigners as it is now.

1200.—"... Now the land is humid, jungle (jangalā), or of the ordinary kind."—Sasrā, i. ch. 35.

1287.—"Elephants were numerous as sheep in the jungal round the Rāj's dwelling."—Tchik-i-Firoz-Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 314.

1450.—"The Kings of India hunt the elephant. They will stay a whole month or more in the wilderness, and in the jungle (Jangal)."—Abdurrazzāk, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 51.

1474.—"... Bichenergor. The vast city is surrounded by three ravines, and intersected by a river, bordering on one side on a dreadful Jungal."—Atk. Nikītīn, in India to XVth Cent., 29.

1776.—"Land waste for five years... is called Jungle."—Hāni's Gentoo Code, 190.

1809.—"The air of Calcutta is much affected by the closeness of the jungle around it."—Lit. Valantu, i. 207.

1809.—"They built them here a bower of jointed cane, Strong for the needful use, and light and long Was the slight framework reared, with little pain; Lithie creepers then the wocker sides supply, And the tall jungle grass fit roofing gave Beneath the genial sky."

1830.—"C'est là que je rencontrerai les jungles... j'avoue que je fus très désappointé."—Jacquemont, Correspond. i. 134.

1838.—"L'Hippotame au large ventre Habite aux Jungles de Java, Oh grondement, au fond de chaque autre Plus de monstres qu'on ne rêva."

Theoph. Gautier, in Poésies Complètes, ed. 1876, i. 525.

1848.—"But he was as lonely here as in his jungle at Boggleywala."—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

1856.—"... There was ever a battle won like Salamance? Hey, Dobbins! But where was it he learnt his art? In India, my boy. The jungle is the school for a general, mark me that."—Ibid., ed. 1863, i. 312.

1868.—"Le bête formidable, habitante des jungles S'endort, le vent en l'air, et dilate ses congés."—Lecomte de Lisle.

1865.—"... Des djungles du Pendj-Abo Aux sables du Kurnate."—Ibid.

1867.—"... To an eye accustomed for years to the wild wastes of the jungle, the whole country presents the appearance of one continuous well-ordered garden."—Waring, Tropical Resident at Home, 7.

1868.—"... here are no cobwebs of plea and counterfees, no jungles of argument and creases of analysis."—Swinburne, Essays and Studies, 138.

1873.—"Jungle, derived to us, through the living language of India, from the Sanskrit, may now be regarded as good English."—Fitz-Edward Hall, Modern English, 306.

1878.—"... Cet animal est commun dans les forêts, et dans les jungles."—March, Kata-Kata-Malayow, 83.

1879.—"... The owls of metaphysics hooted from the gloom of their various jungles."—Fortnightly Rev. No. clxv., N.S., 19.

JUNGLE-FEVER, s. A dangerous remittent fever arising from the malaria of forest or jungle tracts.

1806.—"... I was one day sent to a great distance, to take charge of an officer who had been seized by jungle-fever."—Letter in Morton's L. of Leyden, 49.

JUNGLE-POWELL, s. The popular name of more than one species of these birds from which our domestic poultry are supposed to be descended; especially Gallus Sonneratii, Temminck, the Grey Jungle-fowl, and Gallus ferrugineus, Gmelin, the Red Jungle-fowl. The former belongs only to Southern India; the latter from the Himalayas, south to the N. Circars on the east, and to the Rājpīpla Hills south of the Nerbudda on the west.

1900.—"... the thickets bordered on the village, and I was aboundsounded in jungle-fowl."—Sykes, Embassy to Ava, 96.

1883.—"The common jungle-cock ... was also obtained here. It is almost exactly like a common game-cock, but the voice is different."—Wallace, Malay Archip., 108.

The word jungle is habitually used adjectively, as in this instance, to denote wild species, e.g. jungle-cat, jungle-dog, jungle-fruit, &c.

JUNGLE-MAHALS, n.p. Hind. Jangal-Mahal. This, originally a vague name of sundry tracts and chiefainships lying between the settled districts of Bengal and the hill country of Chutiā Nāgpūr, was constituted a regular district in 1805, but again broken up and redistributed among adjoining districts in 1833 (see Imperial Gazetteer, s.v.).

JUNGLE-TERRY, n.p. Hind. Jangal-tartā (see TERAJ). A name formerly applied to a border-tract between Bengal and Behar, including the inland parts of Monghyr and Bhāgalpūr, and which are now termed the Santāl Pargāns. Hodges, below, calls it to the "westward" of Bhāgalpūr; but Barkope, which he describes as near the centre of the tract, lies, according to Rennell's map, about 36 m. S.E. of Bhāgalpūr town; and the Cleveland inscription shows that the term included the tract occupied by the Rājmahāl hill-people. The Map No. 2 in Rennell's Bengal Atlas (1779) is entitled "the Jungle-Terry District, with the adjacent provinces of Bīrbhoom, Rajemal, Boglipour, &c., comprehending the countries situated between Moorshedabad and Bahar." But the map itself does not show the name Jungle Terry anywhere.

1781.—"Early in February we set out on a tour through a part of the country called the Jungle-Terry, to the westward of Banglopore ... after leaving the village of Barkope, which is nearly in the centre of the Jungle Terry, we entered the hills ... In the great famine which raged through Indostan in the year 1770 ... the Jungle Terry is said to have suffered greatly."—Hodges, pp. 85-91.

1784.—"To be sold ... that capital collection of Paintings, late the property of A. Cleveland, Esq., deceased, consisting of the most capital views in the districts of Monghyr, Rajemal, Boglipoor, and the Jungle Terry, by Mr. Hodges. ..."—In Seton-Kerr, i. 64.

c. 1788.—"To the Memory of AUGUSTUS CLEVELAND, Esq., Late Collector of the Districts of Bhagulpore and Rajamahal, Who without Bloodshed or the Terror of Authority, Employing only the Means of Conciliation, Confidence, and Benevolence, Attempted and Accomplished The entire Subjection of the Lawless and Savage Inhabitants of the Jungle Terry of Rajamahal. ..." (etc.)

Inscription on the Monument erected by Government to Cleveland, who died in 1784.

1817.—"These hills are principally covered with wood, excepting where it has been cleared away for the natives to build their villages, and cultivate jwair (jowair), plantains and yams, which together with some of the small grains mentioned in the account of the Jungle Terry, constitute almost the whole of the productions of these hills."—Sutherland's Report on the Hill People (in App. to Long, 560).

1824.—"This part, I find (he is writing at Monghyr), is not reckoned either in Bengal or Bahar, having been, under the name of the Jungle Terry district, always regarded, till its pacification and settlement, as a sort of border or debatable land."—Heber, i. 181.

JUNGOLO, a. Guz. Janglo. This term, we are told by R. Drummond, was used in his time (the beginning of the 19th century), by the less polite, to distinguish Europeans; "wild men of the woods," that is, who did not understand Guzerati!

1806.—"Joseph Maria, a well-known scribe of the order of Topeewallas ... was actually mobbed, on the first circuit of 1806, in the town of Pitlaud, by parties of curious old women and young, some of whom gazing upon him put the question, Ars Janglo, too mame pirmesh? 'O wild one, wilt thou marry me?' He knew not what they asked, and made no answer, whereasupon they declared that he was indeed a Gieuja, and it required all the address of Kripnam (the worthy Brahmin who related this anecdot to the writer, uncontradicted in the presence of the said Senhor) to draw off the dames and damsels from the astonished Joseph."—R. Drummond, *Illus. (s.v.).
JUNK, s. A large Eastern ship; especially (and in later use exclusively) a Chinese ship. This indeed is the earliest application also; any more general application belongs to an intermediate period. This is one of the oldest words in the Europe-Indian vocabulary. It occurs in the travels of Friar Odoric, written down in 1331, and a few years later in the rambling reminiscences of John de Marignolli. The great Catalan World-map of 1275 gives a sketch of one of those ships with their sails of bamboo matting and calls them Enchi, no doubt a clerical error for Fuchi. Dobner, the original editor of Marignolli, in the 18th century, says of the word (junkos): "This word I cannot find in any medieval glossary. Most probably we are to understand vessels of platted reeds (a juncis testa) which several authors relate to be used in India." It is notable that the same erroneous suggestion is made by Amerigo Vespucci in his curious letter to one of the Medici, giving an account of the voyage of Da Gama, whose squadron he had met at C. Verde on its way home.

The French translators of Ibn Batuta derive the word from the Chinese tchouen (chuen), and Littre gives the same etymology (s.v. jonque). It is possible that the word may be eventually traced to a Chinese original, but not very probable. The old Arab traders must have learned the word from Malay pilots, for it is certainly the Javanese and Malay jong and ajong, 'a ship or large vessel.' In Javanese the Great Bear is called Lintang jong, 'The Constellation Junk,' which is in Malay Bintang Junk. The various forms in Malay and cognate languages, with the Chinese words which have been suggested as the origin, are very fully given by Scott, Malayan Words in English, p. 59 seq.]

c. 1300.—"Large ships called in the language of China 'Junks' bring various sorts of choice merchandise and cloths from Chin and Mocha, and the countries of Hind and Sind."—Rashiduldin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1381.—"And when we were there in harbour at Polumbom, we embarked in another ship called a Junk (aliwm navim nomine Zonum). . . . Now on board that ship were good 700 souls, what with sailors and with merchants. . . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 73.

c. 1843.—"They make no voyages on the China Sea except with Chinese vessels . . . of these there are three kinds; the big ones which are called junk, in the plural junkā. . . . Each of these big ships carries from three up to twelve sails. The sails are made of bamboo slips, woven like mats; they are never hauled down, but are shifted round as the wind blows from one quarter or another."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 91. The French translators write the words as gonk (and gonodi). Ibn Batuta really indicates čhunk (and čhunkā); but both must have been quite wrong.

c. 1348.—"Wishing them to visit the shrine of St. Thomas the Apostle . . . we embarked on certain Junks (asendentes Junktos) from Lower India, which is called Minbar."—Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 356.

1459.—"About the year of Our Lord 1420, a Ship or Junk of India, in crossing the Indian Sea, was driven . . . in a westerly and south-westerly direction for 40 days, without seeing anything but sky and sea. . . . The ship having touched on the coast to supply its wants, the mariners beheld there the egg of a certain bird called chrooko, which egg was as big as a butt."—Rubric on Fra Mauro's Great Map at Venice.

"The Ships or junks (Zonchi) which navigate this sea, carry 4 masts, and others besides that they can set up or strike (at will); and they have 40 to 60 little chambers for the merchants, and they have only one rudder. . . ."—Ibid.

1516.—"Many Moorish merchants reside in it (Malacca), and also Gentiles, particularly Chetes (see COTTEY), who are natives of Cholmendel; and they are all very rich, and have many large ships which they call jungos."—Barboza, 191.

[1554.—". . . in the many ships and junks (Jugos) which certainly passed that way."—Caithaneda, ii. c. 20.]

1563.—"Junoos are certain long ships that have stern and prow fashioned in the same way."—Garcia, i. 586.

1591.—"By this Negro we were advertised of a small Bark of some thirtie tunnes (which the Moors call a Junco)."—Barker's Acc. of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hakl. ii. 589.

1616.—"And doubtless they had made havock of them all, had they not presently been relieved by two Arabian Junks (for so their small ill-built ships are named. . . .)"—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 342.

1625.—"An hundred Prawes and Junkes."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, i. 2, 45.

1627.—"China also, and the great Atlantis (that you call America), which have now but Junks and Canoes, abounded them in tall Ships."—Bacon, New Atlantis, p. 12.

1830.—"So repairing to Jauques (see JASE), a place in the Persia Gulph, they obtained a flet of Seven Junktos, to convey them and theirs as Merchentmen bound for the Shores of India."—Lord, Religion of the Perses, 8.
1678.—Fryer also speaks of "Portugal Junk." The word had thus come to mean any large vessel in the Indian Seas. Barker's use for a small vessel (above) is exceptional.

JUNKAMEER, s. This word occurs in Wheeler, i. 300, where it should certainly have been written Juncaneer. It was long a perplexity, and as it was the subject of one of Dr. Burnell's latest, if not the very last, of his contributions to this work, I transcribe the words of his communication:

"Working at improving the notes to v. Linschoten, I have accidentally cleared up the meaning of a word you asked me about long ago, but which I was then obliged to give up.—'Jonka-mir.' It is 'a collector of customs.'"

"(1745).—Notre Supérieur qui savait qu'à motif écrit certains Jonquiers* mettoient les passans à contribution, nous avoit donné un ou deux faisons (see PANAM) pour les payer en allant et en revenant, au cas qu' ils l'exigéz en de nous."—P. Norbert, Mémoires, pp. 158-160.

"The original word is in Malayalam chungadran, and in Tamil, though it does not occur in the Dictionaries of that language; but chungam (= 'Customs') does.

"I was much pleased to settle this curious word; but I should never have thought of the origin of it, had it not been for that rascally old Capuchin P. Norbert's note."

My friend's letter (from West Stratton) has no date, but it must have been written in July or August 1882.

—[H.Y.] (See JUNKEON.)

1860.—"The Doivon (see DEWAUN) returned with Linggas Ruccas (see BOOCKA) upon the Aisaldar (see HAVILLAR) at St. Thomé, and upon the two chief Juncaneers in this part of the country, ordering them not to stop goods or provisions coming into the town."—Fort St. Geo. Consam., Nov. 22, Notes and Exts., iii. 39.

1748.—"Given to the Governor's Servants, Juncaneers, &c., as usual at Christmas, Salampores (see SALEMPOORY) 18Ps. P. 13."—Act. of Extra Charges at Fort St. David, to Dec. 31. MS. Report, in India Office.

JUNK-CEYLON, n.p. The popular name of an island off the west coast of the Malay Peninsula. Forrest (Voyage to Mergui, pp. iii. and 29-30) calls it Jan-Sylan, and says it is properly Ujong (i.e. in Malay, 'Cape') Sylan. This appears to be nearly right. The name is, according to Crawford (Malay Dict. s.v. Salang, and Dict. Ind. Archip. s.v. Ujong) Ujong Salang, 'Salang Headland.' [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this. "There is at least one quite possible alternative, i.e. jong salang, in which jong means 'a junk,' and salang, when applied to vessels, 'heavily tossing' (see Kinkert, Dict. s.v. salang). Another meaning of salang is 'to transfixed a person with a dagger,' and is the technical term for Malay executions, in which the kris was driven down from the collar-bone to the heart. Parles in the first quotation is now known as Perlis."]

1589.—"There we crossed over to the firm Land, and passing by the Port of Junqualler (Junccalito) we sailed two days and a half with a favourable wind, by means whereof we got to the River of Parles in the Kingdom of Qudea . . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. xix.) in Cogan, p. 22.

1592.—"We departed thence to a Bais in the Kingdom of Junissalom, which is between Malaca and Pegu, 8 degrees to the Northward."—Barker, in Hakt. ii. 591.

1727.—"The North End of Junk Ceylon lies within a mile of the Continent."—A. Hamilton, 69; [ed. 1744, ii. 67].

JUNKEON, s. This word occurs as below. It is no doubt some form of the word chungam, mentioned under JUNKAMEER. Wilson gives Telugu Sunkam, which might be used in Oriesa, where Bruton was. [Shungum (Mal. chunam) appears in the sense of toll or customs duties in many of the old treaties in Logam, Malabar, vol. i.]

1638.—"Any Junkeon or Custome."—Bruton's Narrative, in Hakt. v. 53.

1676.—"These practices (claims of perquisite by the factory chiefs) hath occasioned some to apply to the Governour for relief, and chosen rather to pay Juncaon than submit to the unreasonable demands aforesaid."—Major Puckle's Proposals, in Fort St. Geo. Consam., Feb. 16. Notes and Exts., i. 39.

[1727.—" . . . at every ten or twelve Miles end, a Fellow to demand Junkam or Poll-Money for me and my Servants . . . ."
—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 592.]

JURIBASSO, s. This word, meaning 'an interpreter,' occurs constantly in the Diary of Richard Cocks, of the English Factory in Japan, admirably edited for the Hakluyt Society by Mr. Edward Maunde Thompson (1883). The word is really Malayo-Javanese jurubahasa, lit. ‘language-master,’ juru being an expert, ‘a master of a craft,’ and bahasa the Skt. bhasha, ‘speech.’ [Wilkinson, Dict., writes Jurub-bhasa; Mr. Skeat prefers juru-bhasa.]

1603.—At Patani the Hollander having arrived, and sent presents—‘ils furent pris par un officier nommé Orakas [see ORAKAY] Jurubhasa, qui en fit trois portions.’—In Rec. du Voyages, ed. 1703, ii. 667. See also pp. 675, 676.

1613.—‘(Said the Mandarin of Anco) . . . ‘Captain-major, Auditor, residents, and jurubhasa, for the space of two days you must come before me to attend to these instructions (capitulos), in order that I may write to the Affão.’ . . .’ ‘These communications being read in the Chamber of the City of Macao, before the Viceroy and the people, and the Captain-Major then commanding in the said city, João Serra da Cunha, they sought for a person who might be charged to reply, such as had knowledge and experience of the Chinese, and of their manner of speech, and finding Lourenço Carvalho . . . he made the reply in the following form of words . . . ‘To this purpose we the Captain-Major, the Auditor, the Viceroy, the Padre, and the Jurubhasa, assembling together and beating our foreheads before God . . .’”—Bocarro, pp. 726-729.

‘The fourteenth, I sent M. Cocks, and my Iurebasso to both the Kings to entreat them to provide me of a dozen Seamen.’—Capt. Saria, in Purchas, 678.

1615.—‘. . . his desire was that, for his sake, I would give over the pursuit of this matter against the sea-bones, for that ye were followed, the people the said bones must cut his bellie, and then my Iurebasso must do the lyke. Unto which his request I was content to agree. . . .’—Cocks’s Diary, i. 33.

‘This night we had a conference with our Jurubhassa.’—Foster, Letters, iii. 167.

JUTE, s. The fibre (gunny-fibre) of the bark of Corchorus capsularis, L., and Corchorus olitorius, L., which in the last 45 years has become so important an export from India, and a material for manufacture in Great Britain as well as in India. “At the last meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, Professor Skeat commented on various English words. Jute, a fibrous substance, he explained from the Sanskrit jata, a less usual form of jata, meaning, 1st, the matted hair of an ascetic; 2ndly, the fibrous roots of a tree such as the banyan; 3rdly, any fibrous substance” (Academy, Dec. 27, 1879). The secondary meanings attributed here to jata are very doubtful.* The term jute appears to have been first used by Dr. Roxburgh in a letter dated 1796, in which he drew the attention of the Court of Directors to the value of the fibre “called jute by the natives.” [It appears, however, as early as 1746 in the Log of a voyage quoted by Col. Temple in J.R.A.S., Jan. 1900, p. 158.] The name in fact appears to be taken from the vernacular name in Orissa. This is stated to be properly jhatka, but jhaut is used by the uneducated. See Report of the Jute Commission, by Babu Hemchandra Kerr, Calcutta, 1874; also a letter from Mr. J. S. Cotton in the Academy, Jan. 17, 1880.

JUTKA, a. From Dak.—Hind. jhatka, ‘quick.’ The native cab of Madras, and of Mofussil towns in that Presidency; a conveyance only to be characterised by the epithet ramsackle, though in that respect equalled by the Calcutta crancie (q.v.). It consists of a sort of box with venetian windows, on two wheels, and drawn by a miserable pony. It is entered by a door at the back. (See SHIGRAM, with like meanings.)

JUZAIL, s. This word jazail is generally applied to the heavy Afghan rifle, fired with a forked rest. If it is Ar. it must be jazid, the plural of jazil, ‘big,’ used as a substantive. Jazil is often used for a big, thick thing, so it looks probable. (See GINCALL.) Hence jazilchi, one armed with such a weapon.

1812.—“The Jezzarechi also, the men who use blunderbusses, were to wear the new Russian dress.”—Morier, Journey through Persia, 50.

1898.—“All night the cressets glimmered pale On Ulwar sabre and Tonk jazail.”—R. Kipling, Barrack-room Ballads, 84.

1900.—“Two companies of Khyber Jazail-chis.”—Worburton, Eighteen Years in the Khyber, 78.]

or temporary assignment for the payment of his troops."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 228.]

JYSHE, s. This term, Ar. jaysh, 'an army, a legion,' was applied by Tipoo to his regular infantry, the body of which was called the Jaiš Kachari (see under COUTHEERY).

c. 1782.—"About this time the Bar or regular infantry, Kutcheri, were called the JYSHE Kutcheri."—Hist. of Tipu Sultan, by Husain Ali Khan Kermadi, p. 32. 1786.—"At such times as new levies or recruits for the Jyshe and Pindaks are to be entertained, you two and Syed Peer assembling in Kucherry are to entertain none but proper and eligible men."—Tipoo's Letters, 260.

K

KAJEE, s. This is a title of Ministers of State used in Nepaul and Sikkim. It is no doubt the Arabic word (see CAZEE for quotations). Kaji is the pronunciation of this last word in various parts of India.

[KALA JUGGAH, s. Anglo-H. kala jagah for a 'dark place,' arranged near a ball-room for the purpose of flirtation.

[1885.—"At night it was rather cold, and the frequenters of the Kala Jagah (or dark places) were unable to enjoy it as much as I hoped they would."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 91.

KALINGA, n.p. (See KLING.)

KALLA-NIMMACK, s. Hind. kallam-namak, 'black salt,' a common mineral drug, used especially in horse-treatment. It is muriate of soda, having a mixture of oxide of iron, and some impurities. (Royle.)

KAPAL, s. Kapal, the Malay word for a ship, [which seems to have come from the Tam. koppal,] "applied to any square-rigged vessel, with top and top-gallant masts." (Marsden, Memoirs of a Malay Family, 67).

KARRABAEE, s. Hind. kārbāri, 'an agent, a manager.' Used chiefly in Bengal Proper.

[1867.—"The Foujdar's report stated that a police Carabassi was sleeping in his own house."—Chenery, Ind. Med., Jurisp. 467.]

1867.—"The Lushai Kārbāri (literally men of business) duly arrived and met me at Kassalong."—Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 293.

KARCANNA, s. Hind. from Pers. kār-khāna, 'business-place.' We cannot improve upon Wilson's definition: "An office, or place where business is carried on; but it is in use more especially applied to places where mechanical work is performed; a workshop, a manufactory, an arsenal; also, fig., to any great fume or bustle." The last use seems to be obsolete.

KARDAR, s. P.—H. kārdār, an agent (of the Government) in Sindh.

[1842.—"I further insist upon the offending Kardar being sent a prisoner to my head-quarters at Sukkur within the space of five days, to be dealt with as I shall determine."—Sir C. Napier, in Napier's Conquest of Sind, 149.]

KAREETA, s. Hind. from Ar. kāliṭā, and in India also khalīṭā. The silk bag (described by Mrs. Parkes, below) in which is enclosed a letter to or from a native noble; also, by transfer, the letter itself. In 2 Kings v. 23, the bag in which Naaman bound the silver is kharīṭ; also in Isaiah iii. 22, the word translated 'crisping-pins' is kharītim, rather 'purse.'

[1850.—"The Sheriff Ibrahim, surnamed the Kharītādīr, i.e. the Master of the Royal Paper and Pena, was governor of the territory of Hansīt and Sārāt."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 337.

1888.—"Her Highness the Bāiā Bā’i did me the honour to send me a Kharīṭā, that is a letter enclosed in a long bag of Kim-khatāb (see KINCOB), crimson silk brocaded with flowers in gold, contained in another of fine muslin; the mouth of the bag was tied with a gold and tasseled cord to which was appended the great seal of her Highness."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim (Mrs. Parkes), ii. 250.

In the following passage the thing is described (at Constantinople).

1673.—"... le Visir prenant un sacchet de beau brocard d’or à fleurs, long tout au moins d’une demi aune et large de cinq ou six doigts, lié et scellé par le haut avec une KAUL, s. Hind. Kāl, properly ‘Time,’ then a period, death, and popularly the visitation of famine. Under this word we read:

1808.—“Scarcity, and the scourge of civil war, embittered the Mahratta nation in A.D. 1804, of whom many emigrants were supported by the justice and generosity of neighbouring powers, and (a large number) were relieved in their own capital by the charitable contributions of the English at Bombay alone. This and opening of Hospitals for the sick and starving, within the British settlements, were gratefully told to the writer afterwards by many Maharratas in the heart, and from distant parts, of their own country.”—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

KAUNTA, GAUNTA, s. This word, Mahr. and Güz. kānṭha, ‘coast or margin,’ [Skt. kanthā, ‘immediate proximity,’ kantī, ‘the neck,’] is used in the northern part of the Bombay Presidency in composition to form several popular geographical terms, as Māhī Kānthā, for a group of small States on the banks of the Mahi River; Rewā Kānthā, south of the above; Śindu Kānthā, the Indus Delta, &c. The word is no doubt the same which we find in Ptolemy for the Gulf of Kach, Kānthi kālās. Kānthi-Kot was formerly an important place in Eastern Kachh, and Kānthi was the name of the southern coast district (see Ritter, vi. 1038).

KEBULEE. (See MYROBOLANS.)

KEDDAH, s. Hind. Kedā (khedā, ‘to chase,’ from Skt. akheta, ‘hunting’). The term used in Bengal for the enclosure constructed to entrap elephants. [The system of hunting elephants by making a trench round a space and enticing the wild animals by means of tame decoys is described by Arrian, Indika, 13.] (See CORRAL)

[c. 1590.—“There are several modes of hunting elephants. 1. Kedah” (then follows a description).—Atis, i. 284.]

1780-90.—“The party on the plain below have, during this interval, been completely occupied in forming the Kedah or enclosure.”—Lives of the Lindsay, iii. 191.

1810.—“A trap called a Kedah.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 438.

1860.—“The custom in Bengal is to construct a strong enclosure (called a Kedah) in the heart of the forest.”—Temcent’s Ceylon, ii. 942.

KEDGEREE, KITCHERY, s. Hind. khichāri, a mess of rice, cooked with butter and dāl (see DHALL), and flavoured with a little spice, shredded onion, and the like; a common dish all over India, and often served at Anglo-Indian breakfast tables, in which very old precedent is followed, as the first quotation shows. The word appears to have been applied metaphorically to mixtures of sundry kinds (see Fryer, below), and also to mix jargon or lingua franca. In England we find the word is often applied to a mess of re-cooked fish, served for breakfast; but this is inaccurate. Fish is frequently eaten with kedgeree, but is no part of it.

C. 1840.—“The munj (Moong) is boiled with rice, and then buttered and eaten. This is what they call Kishri, and on this dish they breakfast every day.”—Ibn Battuta, iii. 181.

C. 1448.—“The elephants of the palace are fed upon Kitchiri.”—Abdurrazak, in India in Xth Cent. 27.

C. 1475.—“Horses are fed on peas; also on Kichiri, boiled with sugar and oil; and early in the morning they get shakhaindo!” (I).—Athan. Nikitis, in do., p. 10.

The following recipe for Kedgerees is by Abu’re Fasli:

C. 1590.—“Kichiri, Rice, split dāl, and ghī, 5 ser of each; ½ ser salt; this gives 7 dishes.”—Atis, i. 59.

1648.—“Their daily gains are very small, . . . and with these they fill their hungry bellies with a certain food called Kityesya.”—Van Twist, 57.

1653.—“Kichiri est vne sorte de legume dont les Indiens se nourissent ordinairement.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gou, ed. 1657, p. 546.

1672.—Baldaeus has Kitesery, Tavernier Quicheri [ed. Ball., i. 282, 391].

1678.—“The Diet of this Sort of People admits not of great Variety or Cost, their delightfull Fruit being only Cutcherry a sort of Pulse and Rice mixed together, and boiled in Butter, with which they grow fat.”—Fryer, 81.

Again, speaking of pearls in the Persian Gulf, he says: “Whatever is of any Value is very dear. Here is a great Plenty of what they call Kitchery, a mixture of all together, or Refuse of Rough, Yellow, and Unequal, which they sell by Bushels to the Russians.”—Ibid. 320.
KEDGEREE. 477  KERSEYMERE.

1777.—"Some Doll and Rice, being mingled together and boiled make Kitcheree, the common Food of the Country. They eat it with Butter and Atchar (see ACHAR)."—A. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744, i. 162].

1750-60.—"Kitcheree is only rice stewed, with a certain pulse they call Dholi, and is generally eaten with salt-fish, butter, and pickles of various sorts, to which they give the general name of Atchar."—Grose, i. 150.

1813.—"He was always a welcome guest . . . and ate as much of their rice and Cutheree as he chose."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 502.

1880.—"A correspondent of the Indian Mirror, writing of the annual religious fair at Ajmere, thus describes a feature in the proceedings: "There are two tremendous copper pots, one of which is said to contain about seventy pounds of rice and the other forty maunds. To fill these pots with rice, sugar, and dried fruits requires a round sum of money, and it is only the rich who can afford to do so. This year His Highness the Nawab of Tonk paid Rs. 3,000 to fill up the pots . . . After the pots filled with khichri had been inspected by the Nawab, who was accompanied by the Commissioner of Ajmere and several Civil Officers, the distribution, or more properly the plunder, of khichri commenced, and men well wrapped up with clothes, stuffed with cotton, were seen leaping down into the boiling pot to secure their share of the booty."—Pioneer Mail, July 8. [See the reference to this custom in Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 514, and a full account in Rajputana Gazetteer, ii. 63.]

KEDGEREE, n.p. Khijiri or Kyari, a village and police station on the low lands near the mouth of the Hoogly, on the west bank, and 68 miles below Calcutta. It was formerly well known as a usual anchorage of the larger Indiamen.

1888.—"This morning early we weighed anchor with the tide of Ebb, but having little wind, got no further than the Point of Nagaria Island."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 64].

1884.—"Signor Nicolo Paroree, a Portugall Merchant, assured me their whole community had wrote ye Vice Kinc of Goa . . . to send them 2 or 3 Frigates with . . . Soldiers to possess themselves of ye Islands of Nagaria and In Belgée."—Ibid. Dec. 17; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1727.—"It is now inhabited by Fishers, as are also In Belgée and Kedgerie, two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mout of the Ganges."—A. Hamilton, ii. 2; [ed. 1744]. (See HIDGEER.)

1755.—"De l'autre côté de l'entrée, les rivières de Cajori et de l'Inglée (see HIDGE-LEE) plus que tout autre le rivière de Pipli et celle de Balasor (see BALASORE), sont avec Tombali (see TUMLOOK), rivière mentionné plus haut, et qu'on peut ajouter ici, des dérivations d'un grand fleuve, dont le nom de Ganga lui est commun avec le Gange . . . Une carte du Golfe de Bengale insérée dans Blaeu, fera même distinguer les rivières d'Ingelei et de Cajori (ai on prend la peine de l'examiner) comme des bras du Gange."—D'Anville, p. 68.

1848. As to the origin of this singular error, about a river Ganga flowing across India from W. to E., see some extracts under GODAVEY. The Rupnarain River, which joins the Hoogly from the W. just above Diamond Harbour, is the grand fleuve here spoken of. "The name Ganga or Old Ganga is applied to this in charts late in the 18th century. Ganges thus mentioned by A. Hamilton, 1727: "About five leagues farther up on the West Side of the River of Hughly, is another Branch of the Ganges, called Ganga, it is broader than that of the Hughly, but much shallower."—ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

KEDGEREE-POT, a. A vulgar expression for a round popkin such as is in common Indian use, both for holding water and for cooking purposes. (See CHATTY, GHRUBA.)

1811.—"As a memorial of such misfortunes, they plant in the earth an ear bearing a cudgeri, or earthen pot."—Solwyns, Les Hindous, iii.

1830.—"Some natives were in readiness with a small raft of Kedgeree-pots, on which the palkee was to be ferried over."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 110.

KENNEBURY, n.p. The site of a famous and very extensive group of cave-temples on the Island of Salsette, near Bombay, properly Kanyer.

1602.—"Holding some conversation with certain very aged Christians, who had been among the first converts there of Padre Fr. Antonio do Porto, . . . one of them, who alleged himself to be more than 120 years old, and who spoke Portuguese very well, and read and wrote it, and was perfectly reading the Floe Sacerb, and the Lives of the Saints, assured me that without doubt the work of the Pagoda of Canari was made under the orders of the father of Saint Josef de the Prince, whom Barisim converted to the Faith of Christ . . . "—Owto, VII. iii. cap. 10.

1673.—"Next Morn before Break of Day we directed our steps to the ancienly fam'd, but now ruin'd City of Camerein . . . all cut out of a Rook." &c.—Freyer, 71-72.

1825.—"The principal curiosities of Salsette . . . are the cave temples of Kennery. These are certainly in every way remarkable, from their number, their beautiful situation, their elaborate carving, and their marked connection with Buddha and his religion."—Heber, ii. 190.

KERSEYMERE, a. This is an English draper's term, and not Anglo-Indian. But it is through forms like cassimere (also in English use), a corruption of cashmere, though the corruption has been shaped by the previously existing English word kersey for a kind of woollen cloth, as if kersey were one kind and kerseymere another, of similar goods. Kersey is given by Minshew (2nd ed. 1627), without definition, thus: "Mersic cloth, G. (i.e. French) cartas." The only word like the last given by Littre is "Cassie, sorte de canaide." This does not apply to kersey, which appears to be represented by "Croseau—Terme de Commerce; étouf de laine croisée à deux envers; etym. croiser." Both words are probably connected with croiser or with carré. Planche indeed (whose etymologies are generally worthless) says: "made originally at Kersey, in Suffolk, whence its name." And he adds, equal to the occasion, "Kerseymere, so named from the position of the original factory on the mere, or water which runs through the village of Kersey." Mr. Skeat, however, we see, thinks that Kersey, in Suffolk, is perhaps the origin of the word Kersey; and this he repeats in the new ed. (1901) of his Concise Etym. Dict., adding, "Not from Jersey, which is also used as the name of a material." Kerseymere, he says, is "a corruption of Cashmere or Cassimere, by confusion with kersey".

1688.—"I think cloth, Kerseys and tinne have never bene here at so lowe prices as they are now."—Mr. John Newton, from Babylon (i.e. Bagdad) July 30, in Hkdt. 1783.

1683.—"I had as lief be a list of an English kersey, as be pil'd as thou art pil'd, for a French velvet.—Measure for Measure, i. 2.

1626.—"Ordoane the theesaurer to tak aff to ilk aine of the officeris and to the drummer and pyper, ilk aine of thame, fyve elne of reid Kairnie claiteithe."—Ext. from Recds. of Glasgow, 1876, p. 947.

1828.—"For sale—superfine cambrics and edgings, scarlet and blue Kasimeres."—In Scoc-Karr, i. 47.

1880.—(no date given) "Kerseymere. Cashmere. A finer description of kersey ... (then follows the absurd etymology as given by Planche)." It is principally a manufacture of the west of England, and except in being tweeded (sic) and of narrow width it in no respect differs from superfine cloth._Draper's Dict. a.v.

Khadir, a. H. khadar; the recent alluvial bordering a large river. (See under Bangub.)

Khakee, vulgarly Kharki, Kharkee, a. or adj. Hind. khak, 'dusty or dust-coloured,' from Pers. khak, 'earth,' or 'dust'; applied to a light drab or chocolate-coloured cloth. This was the colour of the uniform worn by some of the Punjab regiments at the siege of Delhi, and became very popular in the army generally during the campaigns of 1857-58, being adopted as a convenient material by many other corps. [Gubbins (Mutinies in Oudh, 296) describes how the soldiers at Lucknow dyed their uniforms a light brown or dust colour with a mixture of black and red office inks, and Cave Brown (Punjab and Delhi, ii. 211) speaks of its introduction in place of the red uniform which gave the British soldier the name of "Lal Courtys Wallahs"]

1858.—A book appeared called "Service and Adventures with the Khakee Remeah, or Meerut Volunteer Horse during the Mutinies in 1857-8," by R. H. W. Dunlop.

1859.—"It has been decided that the full dress will be of dark blue cloth, made up, not like the bache, but as the native unggask (angarka), and set off with red piping. The undress clothing will be entirely of Khakee."—Madras Govt. Order, Feb. 18, quoted in Calcutta Rev. cii. 407.

1862.—"Khakee does not catch in brambles so much as other stuffs."—Brinneman, Rifle in Cashmere, 136.

1878.—"The Amir, we may mention, wore a khaki suit, edged with gold, and the well-known Herati cap."—Sat. Review, Nov. 30, 683.

1890.—"The batteries to be painted with the Khakoo colour, which being similar to the roads of the country, will render the vehicles invisible."—Times, Nov. 12.

1890-91.—The newspapers have constant references to a khaki election, that is an KHALSA, a. and adj. Hind. from Ar. khaliqa (properly khâliqa) ‘pure, genuine.’ It has various technical meanings, but, as we introduce the word, it is applied by the Sikhs to their community and church (so to call it) collectively.

1788.—“The Sikhs salute each other by the expression Wâk Gooroo, without any inclination of the body, or motion of the hand. The Government at large, and their armies, are denominated Khalsa, and Khalsaee.”—Forster’s Journey, ed. 1808, i. 307.

"And all the Punjab knows me, for my father’s name was known in the days of the conquering Khalsa, when I was a boy half-grown."

After Singh loquitur, by Sovar, in an Indian paper; name and date lost.

KHAN, a. a. Turki through Pers. Khân. Originally this was a title, equivalent to Lord or Prince, used among the Mongol and Turk nomad hordes. Besides this sense, and an application to various other chiefs and nobles, it has still become in Persia, and still more in Afghanistan, a sort of vague title like “Esq.” whilst in India it has become a common affix to, or in fact part of, the name of Hindustânis out of every rank; properly, however, of those claiming a Pathân descent. The tendency of swelling titles is always thus to degenerate, and when the value of Khân had sunk, a new form, Khânân-Khânân (Khan of Khâns) was devised at the Court of Delhi, and applied to one of the high officers of State.

KHASS, KAUSS, &c, adj. Hind. from Ar. khas, ‘special, particular, Royal.’ It has many particular applications, one of the most common being to estates retained in the hands of Government, which are said to be held khas. The khas-mahal again, in a native house, is the women’s apartment. Many years ago a white-bearded khamasman (see CONSUMAR), in the service of one of the present writers, indulging in reminiscences of the days when he had been attached to Lord Lake’s camp, in the beginning of the last century, extolled the adhib of those times above their successors, observing (in his native Hindustani):

“In those days I think the Sahibs all came from London khas; now a great lot of Liverpoolholids come to the country!”

There were in the Palaces of the Great Mogul and other Mahommedan Princes of India always two Halls of Audience, or Durbar, the Dewan-i-‘Am, or Hall of the Public, and the Dewan-i-Khas, the Special or Royal Hall, for those who had the entrée, as we say.

In the Indian Vocabulary, 1768, the word is written Coss.

KHASYA, n.p. A name applied to the oldest existing race in the cis-Tibetan Himalaya, between Nepal and the Ganges, i.e. in the British Districts of Kumau and Garhwal. The Khāsias are Hindu in religion and customs, and probably are substantially Hindu also in blood; though in their aspect there is some slight suggestion of that of their Tibetan neighbours. There can be no ground for supposing them to be connected with the Mongoloid nation of Kasias (see COSSYA) in the mountains south of Assam.

[1526.—“About these hills are other tribes of men. With all the investigation and enquiry I could make... All that I could learn was that the men of these hills were called Kasa. It struck me that as the Hindustanis frequently confound Sias and Sias and as Kashmir is the chief city in these hills, it may have taken its name from that circumstance.”—Leyden’s Baber, 313.]

1799.—“The Vakeel of the rajah of Comar (i.e. Kumand) of Amtara, who is a learned Pandit, informs me that the greater part of the zamindars of that country are Chasas... They are certainly a very ancient tribe, for they are mentioned as such in the Institutes of Menu; and their great ancestor Chasa or Chasya is mentioned by Sanchoniation, under the name of Cassius. He is supposed to have lived before the Flood, and to have given his name to the mountains he seized upon.”—Wilford (Wilfordising!), in As. Res. vi. 485.

1824.—“The Khasya nation pretend to be all Rajpoots of the highest caste... they will not even sell one of their little mountain cows to a stranger... They are a modest, gentle, respectful people, honest in their dealings.”—Heber, i. 284.

KHELAT, n.p. The capital of the Bilūch State upon the western frontier of Sind, which gives its name to the State itself. The name is in fact the Ar. kalat, ‘a fort.’ (See under KILLEDAR.) The terminal t of the Ar. word (written kalat) has for many centuries been pronounced only when the word is the first half of a compound name meaning ‘Castle of ——.’ No doubt this was the case with the Bilūch capital, though in its case the second part has been completely dropped out of use. Kholati (Kalat)-i-Ghilij is an example where the second part remains, though sometimes dropped.

KHIRAJ, s. Ar. khārij (usually pron. in India khibrij), is properly a tribute levied by a Musulman lord upon conquered unbelievers, also land-tax; in India it is almost always used for the land-revenue paid to Government; whence a common expression (also Ar.) la khibrij, treated as one word, lakhāri, ‘rent-free.’

[c. 1590.—“In ancient times a capitation tax was imposed, called khirej.”—Isis, ed. Jarrett, ii. 55. “Some call the whole produce of the revenue khirej.”—Ibid. ii. 57.]

laye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 48.

1784.—“... 138 beegrahs, 18 of which are Lackherage land, or land paying no rent.”—In Seton-Karr, i. 49.

KHOA, s. Hind. and Beng. khod, a kind of concrete, of broken brick, lime, &c., used for floors and terrace-roofs.

KHOT, s. This is a Mahrāṭī word, khot, in use in some parts of the Bombay Presidency as the designation of persons holding or farming villages on a peculiar tenure called khoti, and coming under the class legally defined as ‘superior holders.’

The position and claims of the khots have been the subject of much debate and difficulty, especially with regard to the rights and duties of the tenants under them, whose position takes various forms; but to go into these questions would carry us much more deeply into local technicalities than would be consistent with the scope of this work, or the knowledge of the editor. Practically it would seem that the khot is, in the midst of provinces where ryotwary is the ruling system, an exceptional person, holding much the position of a petty zamindar in Bengal (apart from any question of permanent settlement); and that most of the difficult questions touching khoti have arisen from this its exceptional character in Western India.

The khot occurs especially in the Konkan, and was found in existence when, in the early part of the last century, we occupied territory that had been subject to the Mahratta power. It is apparently traceable back at least to the time of the 'Adil Shahi (see Idalcan) dynasty of the Deccan. There are, however, various denominations of khot. In the Southern Konkan the khoti has long been a hereditary zamindar, with proprietary rights, and also has in many cases replaced the ancient patel as headman of the village; a circumstance that has caused the khoti to be sometimes regarded and defined as the holder of an office, rather than of a property. In the Northern Konkan, again, the Khotis were originally mere revenue-farmers, without proprietary or hereditary rights, but had been able to usurp both.

As has been said above, administrative difficulties as to the Khotis have been chiefly connected with their rights over, or claims from, the ryots, which have been often exorbitant and oppressive. At the same time it is in evidence that in the former distracted state of the country, a Khoti was sometimes established in compliance with a petition of the cultivators. The Khoti "acted as a buffer between them and the extortionate demands of the revenue officers under the native Government. And this is easily comprehended, when it is remembered that formerly districts used to be farmed to the native officials, whose sole object was to squeeze as much revenue as possible out of each village. The Khot bore the brunt of this struggle. In many cases he prevented a new survey of his village, by consenting to the imposition of some new patti.* This no doubt he recovered from the ryots, but he gave them their own time to pay, advanced them money for their cultivation, and was a milder master than a rapacious revenue officer would have been."

Candy, pp. 20-21. See Selections from Records of Bombay Government, No. cxxxiv., N.S., viz., Selections with Notes, regarding the Khoti Tenure, compiled by E. T. Candy, Bo. C. S. 1873; also Abstract of Proceedings of the Govt. of Bombay in the Revenue Dept., April 24, 1876, No. 2474.

Khoti. s. The holder of the peculiar khot tenure in the Bombay Presidency.

Khuoth, Kudd. s. This is a term chiefly employed in the Himalaya, kadd, meaning a precipitous hill-side, also a deep valley. It is not in the dictionaries, but is probably allied to the Hind. katt, 'a pit,' Dakh.

Hind. kadda. [Platts gives Hind. kadd. This is from Skt. khaḍa, 'a gap, a chasm,' while khot comes from Skt. khatta, 'an excavation.' ] The word is in constant Anglo-Indian colloquial use at Simla and other Himalayan stations.

1837.—"The steeps about Mussoori are so very perpendicular in many places, that a person of the strongest nerve would scarcely be able to look over the edge of the narrow footpath into the Khud, without a shudder."

-Bacon, First Impressions, ii. 146.

1838.—"On my arrival I found one of the ponies at the estate had been killed by a fall over the precipice, when bringing up water from the Khud."

-Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 240.

1866.—"When the men of the 43d Regt. refused to carry the guns any longer, the Eurasian gunners, about 20 in number, accompanying them, made an attempt to bring them on, but were unequal to doing so, and under the direction of this officer (Capt. Cockburn, R.A.) threw them down a Khud, as the ravines in the Himalaya are called. . . ."

1879.—"The commander-in-chief . . . is perhaps alive now because his horse so judiciously chose the spot on which suddenly to swerve round that its hind hoofs were only half over the chud" (sic).—Times Letter, from Simla, Aug. 15.

KHUREEF, s. Ar. kharif, 'autumn'; and in India the crop, or harvest of the crop, which is sown at the beginning of the rainy season (April and May) and gathered in after it, including rice, the tall millets, maize, cotton, rape, sesamum, &c. The obverse crop is rubbee (q.v.).

[1809.—"Three weeks have not elapsed since the Kureef crop, which consists of Bajra (see BAJRA), Joar (see JOWAUB), several smaller kinds of grain, and cotton, was cleared from off the fields, and the same ground is already ploughed . . . and sown for the great Rubbee crop of wheat, barley and chick (see GRAM)."—Broughton, Letters from a Makratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 215.]

KHUTPUT, s. This is a native slang term in Western India for a prevalent system of intrigue and corruption. The general meaning of khupat in Hind. and Mahr. is rather 'wrangling' and 'worry,' but it is in the former sense that the word became famous (1850-54) in consequence of Sir James Outram's struggles with the rascality, during his tenure of the Residency of Baroda.

[1881.—"Khutput, or court intrigue, rules more or less in every native State, to an extent incredible among the more civilised nations of Europe."—Fraser, Records of Sport, 204.]

KHUTTRY, KHETTRY, OUTTREY, s. Hind. Khattri, Khatri, Skt. Kshatriya. The second, or military caste, in the theoretical or fourfold division of the Hindus. [But the word is more commonly applied to a mercantile caste, which has its origin in the Punjab, but is found in considerable numbers in other parts of India. Whether they are really of Kshatriya descent is a matter on which there is much difference of opinion. See Crooke, Tribes and Caste of N.W.P., iii. 264 seqq.] The Khaipar whom Ptolemy locates apparently towards Rajputana are probably Kshatriyas.

1630.—"And because Cuttery was of a martial temper God gave him power to sway Kingdoms with the sceptre."—Lord, Banian, 8.

1688.—"Les habitans . . . sont la plus-part Benjans et Ketteris, tisserans, teinturiers, et autres ouuriers en coton."—Mandelstá, ed. 1659, 190.]

[1671.—"There are also Cuttarees, another Sect Principally about Agra and those parts up the Country, who are as the Banian Gentoos here."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 203.]

1726.—"The second generation in rank among these heathen is that of the Settreas".—Valentinj, Chronom. 37.

1782.—"The Chittery occasionally betakes himself to traffic, and the Soorder has become the inheritor of principalities."—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, i. 64.

1836.—"The Banians are the mercantile caste of the original Hindoos. . . . They call themselves Shudderis, which signifies innocent or harmless (!)"—Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, 322.

KHYBER PASS, n.p. The famous gorge which forms the chief gate of Afghanistan from Peshawar, properly Khaibar. [The place of the same name near Al-Madinah is mentioned in the Asin (iii. 57), and Sir R. Burton writes: 'Khybar in Hebrew is supposed to mean a castle. D'Herbelot makes it to mean a pact or association of the Jews against the Moslems.' (Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, i. 346, note.).]

1519.—"Early next morning we set out on our march, and crossing the Kheiber Pass, halted at the foot of it. The Khizer-Khail had been extremely licentious in their conduct. Both on the coming and going of our army they had shot upon the stragglers, and such of our people as lagged behind, or separated from the rest, and carried off their horses. It was clearly expedient that they should meet with a suitable chastisement."—Baber, p. 277.

1693.—"On Thursday Jamrud was our encamping ground.

1783.—"On Friday we went through the Khaibar Pass, and encamped at 'Ali Musjid.'—Jahangir, in Elliot, vi. 314.

1788.—"The stage from Timrood (read Jimrood) to Diokh, usually called the Hyber-pass, being the only one in which much danger is to be apprehended from banditti, the officer of the escort gave orders to his party to . . . march early on the next morning . . . Timur Shah, who used to pass the winter at Peshour . . . never passed through the territory of the Hyber, without their attacking his advanced or rear guard."—Forster's Travels, ed. 1808, ii. 65-66.

1856.—" . . . See the booted Moguls, like a pack Of hungry wolves, burst from their desert lair, And crowding through the Khber's rocky strait, Sweep like a bloody harrow o'er the land."—The Banyan Tree, p. 6.
KIDDERPORE, n.p. This is the name of a suburb of Calcutta, on the left bank of the Hooghly, a little way south of Fort William, and is the seat of the Government Dockyard. This establishment was formed in the 18th century by Gen. Kyd, "after whom," says the Imperial Gazetteer, "the village is named." This is the general belief, and was mine [H.Y.] till recently, when I found from the chart and directions in the English Pilot of 1711 that the village of Kidderpore (called in the same chart Kitherpore) then occupied the same position, i.e. immediately below "Gobarnapore" and that immediately below "Chittanutte" (i.e. Govindpur, and Chatanati (see CHUTTANUTTY).

1711.—"... then keep Rounding Chitti Poe (Chitpore) Bite down to Chitty Nutty Point (see CHUTTANUTTY). ... The Bite below Gover Napore (Govindpur) is Shoal, and below the Shoal is an Eddy; therefore from Gover Napore, you must stand over to the Starboard-Shore, and keep it aboard till you come up almost with the Point opposite to Kidderpore, but no longer..."—The English Pilot, p. 65.

c. 1320.—"In Persia are some springs, from which flows a kind of pitch which is called kīr (read kir) (piz dico seu pegna), with which they smear the skins in which wine is carried and stored."—Friar Jordanus, p. 10.

c. 1560.—"These are pitched with a bitumen which they call quill, which is like pitch."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 240.

KILLADAR, s. P.—H. kīl'adār, from Ar. kāla, 'a fort.' The commandant of a fort, castle, or garrison. The Ar. kāla is always in India pronounced kīla. And it is possible that in the first quotation Ibn Batuta has misinterpreted an Indian title; taking it as from Pers. kīld, 'a key.' It may be noted with reference to kāla that this Ar. word is generally represented in Spanish names by Alcalá, a name borne by nine Spanish towns entered in K. Johnstone's Index Geographicus; and in Sicilian ones by Calata, e.g. Calatafimi, Catanezetta, Catagirona.

c. 1340.—"... Kādhi Khān, Sadru-al-Jihān, who became the chief of the khans, and had the title of Kált-dār, i.e. Keeper of the keys of the Palace. This officer was accustomed to pass every night at the Sultan's door, with the bodyguard."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 196.

1757.—"The fugitive garrison ... returned with 500 more, sent by the Kallidar of Vandiwash."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 217.

1817.—"The following were the terms ... that Armī should be restored to its former governor or Killedar."—Mill, iii. 340.

1829.—"Among the prisoners captured in the Fort of Hattass, search was made by us for the Keeldar."—Mem. of John Skipp, ii. 210.

KILLA-KOTE, s. pl. A combination of Ar.—P. and Hind. words for a fort (kīla for kāla, and kūt), used in Western India to imply the whole fortifications of a territory (R. Drummond).

KILLUT, KILLAUT, &c., s. Ar.—H. khīla't. A dress of honour presented by a superior on ceremonial occasions; but the meaning is often extended to the whole of a ceremonial present of that nature, of whatever it may consist. [The Ar. khīl-ā'ā properly means 'what a man strips from his person.' "There were (among the later Moguls) five degrees of khīlat', those of three, five, six, or seven pieces; or they might as a special mark of favour consist of clothes that the emperor had actually worn." (See for further details Mr. Irvine in J.R.A.S., N.S., July 1896, p. 533.)] The word has in Russian been degraded to mean the long loose gown which forms the most common dress in Turkistan, called generally by Schuyler 'a dressing-gown' (Germ. Schlafrock). See Fraenh, Wolga Bulgaren, p. 43.

1411.—"Several days passed in sumptuous feasts. Khīlats and girdles of royal magnificence were distributed."—Abdurazik, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 209.

1673.—"Sir George Oxenden held it. ... He defended himself and the Merchants so bravely, that he had a Collat or Seerpaw, (q.v.) a Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul."—Fryer, 87.

1676.—"This is the Wardrobe, where the Royal Garments are kept; and from whence the King sends for the Calat, or a whole Habit for a Man, when he would honour any Stranger."—Turchner, E.T. ii. 46; [ed. Bal, ii. 98].

1774.—"A flowered satin gown was brought me, and I was dressed in it as a khīlat."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

1786.—"And he the said Warran brought me, and dressed in it a树叶, and the meaning is often extended to the whole of a ceremonial present of that nature, of whatever it may consist. [The Ar. khīl-ā'ā properly means 'what a man strips from his person.' "There were (among the later Moguls) five degrees of khīlat', those of three, five, six, or seven pieces; or they might as a special mark of favour consist of clothes that the emperor had actually worn." tion of their services."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, vii. 25.

1809.—"On paying a visit to any Asiatic Prince, an inferior receives from him a complete dress of honour, consisting of a chelant, a robe, a turban, a shield and sword, with a string of pearls to go round the neck."—Id. Valentina, i. 99.

1813.—"On examining the chelants . . .
from the great Maharajah Madajee Sindia, the serpeych (see SIRPECH) . . . presented to Sir Charles Malet, was found to be composed of false stones."—Forbes, Or.
Mrm. iii. 50 ; [2nd ed. ii. 418].

KINCOB. s. Gold brocade. P.—H. karnkhā, kamkhāt, vulgarly kimkhād. The English is perhaps from the Gujarāti, as in that language the last syllable is short.

This word has been twice imported from the East. For it is only another form of the medieval name of an Eastern damask or brocade, cammocca. This was taken from the medieval Persian and Arabic forms kamkhd or kimkhod, damasked silk, and seems to have come to Europe in the 13th century.
F. Johnson's Dict. distinguishes between kamkhd, 'damask silk of one colour,' and kimkhād, 'damask silk of different colours.' And this again, according to Dozy, quoting Hoffmann, is originally a Chinese word kin-kha; in which doubtless kin, 'gold,' is the first element. Kim is the Fuhkien form of the word ; qu. kim-hoa, 'gold-flower.' We have seen kimkhdh derived from Pers. kam-khāt, 'less sleep,' because such cloth is rough and prevents sleep! This is a type of many etymologies. ["The ordinary derivation of the word suggests that a man could not even dream of it who had not seen it (kam, 'little,' khāt, 'dream')" (Yusuf Ali, Mono. on Silk, 86). Platts and the Madras Gloss. take it from kam, 'little,' khot, 'nap.'] Ducange appears to think the word survived in the French mocade (or moquetter); but if so the application of the term must have degenerated in England. (See in Draper's Dict.

KING-CROW, s. A glossy black bird, otherwise called Drongo shrike, about as large as a small pigeon, with a long forked tail, Dicrurus macrocercus, Vieillot, found all over India. It perches generally on some bare branch, whence it can have a good look-out, or the top of a house, or post, or telegraph-wire, frequently also on low bushes, hedges, walks, or ant-hills (Jerdon).

1883.—"... the King-crow... leaves the whole bird and beast tribe far behind in originality and force of character. He does not come into the house, the telegraph wire suits him better. Perched on it he can see what is going on... drops, beak foremost, on the back of the kite...Pack a bee-eater capturing a goodly moth, and after a hot chase, forces it to deliver up its booty."—The Tribes on My Frontier, 145.

KIOSQUE, s. From the Turki and Pers. kâsh or kâsh, 'a pavilion, a villa,' &c. The word is not Anglo-Indian, nor is it a word, we think, at all common in modern native use.

c. 1350.—"When he was returned from his expedition, and drawing near to the capital, he ordered his son to build him a palace, or as those people call it a kâsh, by the side of a river which runs at that place, which is called Afghanpûr."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 212.

1623.—"There is (in the garden) running water which issues from the entrance of a great kiosk, or covered place, where one may stay to take the air, which is built at the end of the garden over a great pond, which adjoins the outside of the garden, so that, like the one at Surat, it serves also for the public use of the city."—P. della Valle, i. 585; [Hak. Soc. i. 68].

KIRBEE, KURBEE, s. Hind. kârî, kîrî, Skt. kaâtamba, 'the stalk of a pot-herb.' The stalks of juâr (see JOWAUR), used as food for cattle.

1809.—"We also fell in with large|flocks of kurbî, the dried stalks of Bajîru and Jooer, two inferior kinds of grain; an excellent fodder for the camels."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahrrata Camp, ed. 1892, p. 41.

1823.—"Ordinary price of the straw (kîrî) at harvest-time Rs. 1/4 per hundred sheaves. ..."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bombay, iii. 248.

KISHM, n.p. The largest of the islands in the Persian Gulf, called by the Portuguese Queixome and the like, and sometimes by our old travellers, Kishmish. It is now more popularly called Jâzirat-al-tawîla, in Pers. Jaz-ardz, 'the Long Island' (like the Lewes), and the name of Kishm is confined to the chief town, at the eastern extremity, where still remains the old Portuguese fort taken in 1622, before which William Baffin the Navigator fell. But the oldest name is the still not quite extinct Brokhî, which closely preserves the Greek Oaracta.

B.C. 325.—"And setting sail (from Harmozia), in a run of 300 stadia they passed a desert and bushy island, and moored beside another island which was large and inhabited. The small desert island was named Organa (no doubt Germu, afterwards the site of N. Hormuz—see ORMUS); and the one at which they anchored 'Ôdparra, planted with vines and date-palms, and with plenty of corn.'—Arranx, Voyage de Neorchus, ch. xxxvii.

1538.—"... so I waged with him in the company of divers merchants for to go from Babylon (orig. Babylonia) to Caixem, whone he carried me to Ornus. ..."—F. M. Pinto, chap. vi. (Cogan, p. 9).

1553.—"Finally, like a timorous and despairing man... he determined to leave the city (Ornus) deserted, and to pass over to the Isle of Quixomae. That island is close to the mainland of Persia, and is within sight of Ornus at 3 leagues distance."—Barroso, III. vii. 4.

1564.—"Then we departed to the Isle of Kais or Old Hormuz, and then to the island of Brakhta, and some others of the Green Sea, i.e. in the Sea of Hormuz, without being able to get any intelligence."—Skî Ali, 67.

1600.—"Queixome." See under BÔSHIB.

1623.—"They say likewise that Ornum and Keschiome are extremely well fortified by the Moors."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 188; in i. 2, Kosom.

1652.—"Kèckmashe." See under CONGO BUNDER.
KISHMISH. s. Pers. Small stoneless raisins originally imported from Persia. Perhaps so called from the island Kishm. Its vines are mentioned by Arrian, and by T. Moore! (See under KISHM.) [For the manufacture of Kishmish in Afghanistan, see Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 284.]

[1673.—"The next morning we had brought Loft on the left hand of the Island of Kismosh, leaving a woody Island uninhabited between Kismosh and the Main."—Fryer, 329.]

1673.—"The Island Quesime, or Quesime, or Quesome, otherwise called by travellers and geographers Kishmische, and by the natives Brokt..."—Nieuhof, Zee en Lant-Reis, ii. 103.

1817.—"... Vases filled with Kishmeo's golden wine And the red weepings of the Shiraz vine.—Moore, Mokanna.

1821.—"We are to keep a small force at Kishm, to make descents and destroy boats and other means of maritime war, whenever any symptoms of piracy reappear."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 121.

KISHMISH. a. [1767.—"This method of comprising the whole estimate into so narrow a compass... will convey to you a more distinct idea... than if we transmitted a monthly account of the deficiency of each person Kistbundee."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 56.]

KITMUTGAR. a. Hind. khidmatgar, from Ar.—P. khidmat, 'service,' therefore 'one rendering service.' The Anglo-Indian use is peculiar to the Bengal Presidency, where the word is habitually applied to a Musulman servant, whose duties are connected with serving meals and waiting at table under the Consumah, if there be one. Kismutgar is a vulgarity, now perhaps obsolete. The word is spelt by Hadley in his Grammar (see under MOORS) khismutgar. In the word khidmat, as in khilfat (see KILLIFT), the terminal t in uninflected Arabic has long been dropped, though retained in the form in which these words have got into foreign tongues.

1759.—The wages of a Kedmutgar appear as 3 Rupees a month.—In Long, p. 182.

1765.—"... they were taken into the service of Soujah Deolah as immediate attendants on his person; Hodjee (see HADJEE) in capacity of his first Kismutgar (or valet)."—Holinell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 60.

1782.—"I therefore beg to caution strangers against those race of vagabonds who ply about them under the denomination of Consumaks and Kismutdars."—Letter in India Gazette, Sept. 28.

1784.—"The Bearer... perceiving a quantity of blood... called to the Hookaburdar and a Kismutgar."—In Seton-Kerr, i. 18.

very large way, of the 'Tnee Willast' or white people."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog.
283. The phrase in italics stands for tazi Wildyatt (see BLAYFT), "fresh or green Europeans"—Griffins (q.v.).

1813.—"We . . . saw nothing remarkable on the way but a Kichimutragh of Chimnagie Appa, who was rolling from Poona to Punderpooer, in performance of a vow which he made for a child. He had been a month at it, and had become so expert that he went on smoothly and without pause, and kept rolling evenly along the middle of the road, over stones and everything. He travelled at the rate of two coss a day."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 257-8.

1878.—"We had each our own . . . Kichimutragh or table servant. It is the custom in India for each person to have his own table servant, and when dining out to take him with him to wait behind his chair."—Kipling, in The God-Bys, 24.

KITTYSOL, KITSOL, s. This word survived till lately in the Indian Tariff, but it is otherwise long obsolete. It was formerly in common use for 'an umbrella,' and especially for the kind, made of bamboo and paper, imported from China, such as the English fashion of to-day has adopted to screen fire-places in summer. The word is Portuguese, quita-sol, 'bar-sun.' Also tirsale occurs in Scott's Discoveries of Java, quoted below from Purchas. See also Hulsius, Coll. of Voyages, in German, 1602, i. 27. [Mr. Skeat points out that in Howison's Malay Dict. (1801) we have, s.v. Payong: 'A Kittasal, sombrera,' which is nearer to the Port. original than any of the examples given since 1611. This may be due to the strong Portuguese influence at Malacca.]

KLING, n.p. This is the name (Kaling) applied in the Malay countries, including our Straits Settlements, to the people of Continental India who trade therewith, or are settled in those regions, and to the descendants of those... settlers. [Mr. Skeat remarks: "The standard Malay form is not Kālinga, which is the Sumatran form, but Kēling (K'ēling or Kēng). The Malay use of the word is, as a rule, restricted to Tamils, but it is very rarely used in a wider sense."]

The name is a form of Kalinga, a very ancient name for the region known as the "Northern Circars," (q.v.), i.e. the Telugu coast of the Bay of Bengal, or, to express it otherwise in general terms, for that coast which extends from the Kistna to the Mahānadi. "The Kalingas" also appear frequently, after the Pauranic fashion, as an ethnic name in the old Sanskrit lists of races. Kalinga appears in the earliest of Indian inscriptions, viz. in the edicts of Asoka, and specifically in that famous edict (XIII.) remaining in fragments at Girkār and Kapurdi-giri, and more completely at Khālāi, which preserves the link, almost unique from the Indian side, connecting the histories of India and of the Greeks, by recording the names of Antiochus, Ptolemy, Antigonus, Megas, and Alexander.

Kalinga is a kingdom constantly mentioned in the Buddhist and historical legends of Ceylon; and we find commemoration of the kingdom of Kalinga and of the capital city of Kalinganagara (e.g. in Ind. Antiq. iii. 153, x. 243). It was from a daughter of a King of Kalinga that sprang, according to the Mahawanso, the famous Wijayo, the civilizer of Ceylon and the founder of its ancient royal race.

Kalingapatam, a port of the Ganjam district, still preserves the ancient name of Kalinga, though its identity with the Kalinganagara of the inscriptions is not to be assumed. The name in later, but still ancient, inscriptions appears occasionally as Tri-Kalinga, "the Three Kalingas," and this probably, in a Telugu version Medu-Kalinga, having that meaning, is the original of the Modugalinga of Pliny in one of the passages quoted from him. (The possible connection which obviously suggests itself of this name Trikalinga with the names Telinga and Telingana, applied, at least since the Middle Ages, to the same region, will be noticed under TELINGA).

The coast of Kalinga appears to be that part of the continent whence commerce with the Archipelago at an early date, and emigration thither, was most rife; and the name appears to have been in great measure adopted in the Archipelago as the designation of India in general, or of the whole of the Peninsular part of it. Throughout the book of Malay historical legends called the Siyara Malays the word Kaling or Kēng is used for India in general, but more particularly for the southern parts (see Journ. Ind. Archip. v. 133). And the statement of Forrest (Voyage to Mercus Archip. 1793, p. 82) that Macassar "Indostan," was called "Neegree Telinga" (i.e. Nagara Telinga) illustrates the same thing and also the substantial identity of the names Telinga, Kalinga.

The name Kēng, applied to settlers of Indian origin, makes its appearance in the Portuguese narratives immediately after the conquest of Malacca (1511). At the present day most, if not all of the Klings of Singapore come, not from the "Northern Circars," but from Tanjore, a purely Tamil district. And thus it is that so good an authority as Roorda van Eijnsa translates Kaling by 'Coromandel people.' They are either Hindūs or Labbaís (see LUBBEY). The latter class in British India never take domestic service with Europeans, whilst they seem to succeed well in that capacity in Singapore. "In 1876," writes Dr. Burnell, "the headservant at Bekker's great hotel there was a very good specimen of the Nagür Labbaís; and to my surprise he recollected me as the head assistant-collector of Tanjore, which I had been some ten years before." The Hindu Klings appear to be chiefly drivers of hackney carriages and keepers of eating-houses. There is a Siva temple in Singapore, which is served by Pandārens (q.v.). The only Brahman there in 1876 were certain convicts. It may be noticed that Calingas is the name of a heathen tribe of (alleged) Malay origin in the east of N. Luzon (Philippine Islands).

1880.—"Never give a Kobang to a cat."—Jap. Proverb, in Miss Bird, i. 367.

KOEL. s. This is the common name in northern India of Eudynamys orientalis, L. (Fam. of Cuckoos), also called kokild and kokil. The name koel is taken from its cry during the breeding season, ”ku-il, ku-il, increasing in vigour and intensity as it goes on. The male bird has also another note, which Blyth syllables as Ho-choo, or Ho-o-o, or Ho-y-o. When it takes flight it has yet another somewhat melodious and rich liquid call; all thoroughly cuculine." (Jerdon.)

c. 1598.—"Another is the Koel, which in length may be equal to the crow, but is much thinner. It has a kind of song, and is the nightingale of Hindustan. It is respected by the natives of Hindustan as much as the nightingale is by us. It inhabits gardens where the trees are close planted."—Barker, p. 323.

c. 1590.—"The Koyil resembles the myna (see MYNA), but is blacker, and has red eyes and a long tail. It is fabled to be enamoured of the rose, in the same manner as the nightingale."—Ayres, ed. Gladwin, ii. 881; [ed. Jarrold, iii. 121].

c. 1790.—"Le plaisir que cause la fraîcheur dont on jouit sous cette belle verdure est augmenté encore par le gazouillement des oiseaux et les cris clairs et perçants du Koel . . ."—Haafner, ii. 9.

1810.—"The Koekela and a few other birds of song."—Maria Graham, 22.

1888.—"This same crow-phenant has a second or third cousin called the Koel, which deposits its eggs in the nest of the crow, and has its young brought up by that discreditable foster-parent. Now this bird supposes that it has a musical voice, and devotes the best part of the night to vocal exercise, after the manner of the nightingale. You may call it the Indian nightingale if you like. There is a difference however in its song . . . when it gets to the very top of its pitch, its voice cracks and there is an end of it, and rather there is not, for the persevering musician begins again. . . . Does not the Maratha novelist, dwelling on the delights of a spring morning in an Indian village, tell how the air was filled with the dulcet melody of the Koel, the green parrot, and the peacock?"—Tibes on My Frontier, 156.
KOHINOR.

KOHINOR, n.p. Pers. Koh-i-nūr, "Mountain of Light"; the name of one of the most famous diamonds in the world. It was an item in the Deccan booty of Alaudin Khilji (d. 1310), and was surrendered to Baber (or more precisely to his son Humāyūn) on the capture of Agra (1526). It remained in the possession of the Moghul dynasty till Nādir extorted it at Delhi from the conquered Mahommed Shāh (1739). After Nādir's death it came into the hands of Ahmed Shāh, the founder of the Afghān monarchy. Shāh Shuja', Ahmed's grandson, had in turn to give it up to Ranjit Singh when a fugitive in his dominions. On the annexation of the Punjab in 1849 it passed to the English, and is now among the Crown jewels of England. Before it reached that position it ran through strange risks, as may be read in a most diverting story told by Bosworth Smith in his Life of Lord Lawrence (i. 327-9). In 1850-51, before being shown at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, it went through a process of cutting which, for reasons unintelligible to ordinary mortals, reduced its weight from 186.16 carats to 106.4. [See an interesting note in Ball's Tavernier, ii. 431 seqq.]

1598. — "In the battle in which Ibrahim was defeated, Bikermājit (Raja of Gwalior) was sent to hell. Bikermājit's family ... were at this moment in Agra. When Hūmāūin arrived ... (he) did not permit them to be plundered. Of their own free will they presented to Hūmāūin a pèshāk (see PERSICUS), consisting of a quantity of jewels and precious stones. Among these was one famous diamond which had been acquired by Sultan Alauddin. It was so valuable that a judge of diamonds valued it at half the daily expense of the whole world. It is about eight mishkals..."—Baber, p. 308.

1767. — "(With an engraving of the stone.) This diamond belongs to the Great Mogul ... and it weighs 319 Ratis (see BUTTEE) and a half, which make 279 and nine 16ths of our Carats; when it was rough it weighed 907 Ratis, which make 793 carats."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 148; [ed. Ball, ii. 125].

1842. — "In one of the bracelets was the Koh-i-Noor, known to be one of the largest diamonds in the world."—Elphinston, Calcutt, i. 69.

1956. — "He (Akbar) bears no weapon, save his dagger, hid. Up to the ivory haft in muslin swathing; No ornament but that one famous gem, Mountain of Light! bound with a silken thread Upon his nervous wrist; more used, I ween, To feel the rough strap of his buckler there."—The Banyan Tree.

KOOKHY, s. Hind. kūkṛi, [which originally means 'a twisted skein of thread,' from kūkṛī, 'to wind'; and then anything curved]. The peculiar weapon of the Goorkhas, a bill, admirably designed and poised for hewing a branch or a foe. [See engravings in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, pi. ix.]

1793. — "It is in felling small trees or shrubs, and lopping the branches of others for this purpose that the dagger or knife worn by every Nepaulian, and called khookhery, is chiefly employed."—Kirkpatrick's Nepal, 118.

KOOKY, s. (See COOMKY.)

KOONBE, KUNBEE, KOOUMBEE, n.p. The name of the prevalent cultivating class in Guzerat and the Konkan, the Kurmī of N. India. Skt. kutumba. The Kūnā is the pure Sudra, [but the N. India branch are beginning to assert a more respectable origin]. In the Deccan the title distinguished the cultivator from him who wore arms and preferred to be called a Mahratta (Drummond).

[1598. — "The Canarijas and Corumbijas are the Counremen."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 260.]

KOOT, s. Hind. kūṭ, from Skt. kuṣṭha, the costum and costus of the Roman writers. (See under PUT-GHOCK.)
KOOZA, a. A goglet, or pitcher of porous clay; corr. of Pers. kūza. Commonly used at Bombay.

1690. — "Therefore they carry about with them Kousers or Jarrs of Water, when they go abroad, to quench their thirst. . . ." — Ovington, 295.

[1871. — "Many parts of India are celebrated for their Kooshahs or goglets, but the finest are brought from Bussorah, being light, thin, and porous, made from a whittish clay." — Riddell, Ind. Domest. Econ., 382.]

KOSHOON, a. This is a term which was affected by Tippoo Sahib in his military organisation, for a brigade, or a regiment in the larger Continental use of that word. His Piddah 'askar, or Regular Infantry, was formed into 5 Kachahris (see CUTCHEBBY), composed in all of 27 Koshoons. A MS. note on the copy of Kirkpatrick's Letters in the India Office Library says that Kusoon was properly Skt. kahu or ksharn, "a grand division of the force of an Empire, as used in the Mahabharata. But the word adopted by Tippoo appears to be Turki. Thus we read in Quatremère's transl. from Abdurrazzak: "He (Shāh Rukh) distributed to the emirs who commanded the tomdans (of 10,000), the koshūn (of 1000), the sadeh (of 100), the deh (of 10), and even to the private soldiers, presents and rewards" (Notes et Éxts. xiv. 91; see also p. 89). Again: "The soldiers of Isfahan having heard of the amnesty accorded them, arrived, koshūn by koshūn." (Ibid. 130.) Vambery gives koshūn as Or. Turki for an army, a troop (literally whatever is composed of several parts).

1782. — "In the time of the deceased Nawab, the exercises . . . of the regular troops were . . . performed, and the word given according to the French system . . . but now, the Sultan (Tippoo) . . . changed the military code . . . and altered the technical terms or words of command . . . to words of the Persian and Turkish languages . . . From the regular infantry 5000 men being selected, they were named Kusoon, and the officer commanding that body was called a Sipahdar. . . ." — Hist. of Tipu Sultan, p. 31.

KOTOW, KOWTOW, s. From the Chinese k'o-t'ou, lit. 'knock-head'; the salutation used in China before the Emperor, his representatives, or his symbols, made by prostrations repeated a fixed number of times, the forehead touching the ground at each prostration. It is also used as the most respectful form of salutation from children to parents, and from servants to masters on formal occasions, &c.

This mode of homage belongs to old Pan-Asiatic practice. It was not, however, according to M. Pauthier, of indigenous antiquity at the Court of China, for it is not found in the ancient Book of Rites of the Chou Dynasty, and he supposes it to have been introduced by the great destroyer and reorganiser, Ta'en Shih Hwangti, the Builder of the Wall. It had certainly become established by the 8th century of our era, for it is mentioned that the Ambassadors who came to Court from the famous Hārūn-al-Rashīd (A.D. 798) had to perform it. Its nature is mentioned by Marco Polo, and by the ambassadors of Shāh Rukh (see below). It was also the established ceremonial in the presence of the Mongol Khāns, and is described by Baber under the name of kornish. It was probably introduced into Persia in the time of the Mongol Princes of the house of Hulākū, and it continued to be in use in the time of Shāh 'Abbās. The custom indeed in Persia may possibly have come down from time immemorial, for, as the classical quotations show, it was of very ancient prevalence in that country. But the interruptions to Persian monarchy are perhaps against this. In English the term, which was made familiar by Lord Amherst's refusal to perform it at Pekin in 1816, is frequently used for servile acquiescence or adulation.

Kotow, Kowtow is often colloquially used for 'Thank you' (E. C. Bicker).

c. B.C. 484.—"And afterwards when they were come to Susa in the king's presence, and the guards ordered them to fall down and do obeisance, and went so far as to use force to compel them, they refused, and said they would never do any such thing, even were their heads thrust down to the ground, for it was not their custom to worship men, and they had not come to Persia for that purpose."—Herodotus, by Rawlinson, vii. 158.

c. B.C. 464.—"Themistocles... first meets with Artabanus the Chilarch, and tells him that he was a Greek, and wished to have an interview with the king. But quoth he; 'Stranger, the laws of men are various. You Greeks, 'tis said, most admire liberty and equality, but to us of our many and good laws the best is to honour the king, and adore him by prostration, as the Image of God, the Preserver of all things.' Themistocles, on hearing these things, says to him: 'But I, O Artabanus, will myself obey your laws.'"—Plutarch, Themistoc., xxvii.

c. B.C. 389.—"Conon, being sent by Pharnabazus to the king, on his arrival, in accordance with Persian custom, first presented himself to the Chilarch Tharthustes who held the second rank in the empire, and staid at the door, and the king desired him to have an interview with the king; for no one is admitted without this. The officer replied: 'It can be at once; but consider whether you think it best to have an interview, or to write the business on which you come. For if you come into the presence you must needs worship the king (what they call pookvew). If this is disagreeable to you, you may commit your wishes to me, without doubt of their being as well accomplished.' Then Conon says: 'Indeed it is not disagreeable to me to pay the king any honour whatever. But I fear lest I bring discredit upon my city, if belonging to a state which is wont to rule over other nations I adopt manners which are not her own, but those of foreigner. Hence he delivered his wishes in writing to the officer."—Corn. Nepos, Conon, c. iv.

B.C. 324.—"But he (Alexander) was now downhearted, and beginning to be despairing towards the divinity, and suspicious towards his friends. Especially he dreaded Antipater and his sons. Of these Iolas was the Chief Cupbearer, whilst Kaeander had come but lately. So the latter, seeing certain Barbarians prostrating themselves (pookvew), a sort of thing which he, having been brought up in Greek fashion, had never witnessed before, broke into fits of laughter. But Alexander in a rage gripped him fast by the hair with both hands, and knocked his head against the wall."—Plutarch, Alexander, lxxv.

A.D. 798.—"In the 14th year of Tchin-yuan, the Khalif Galun (Harun) sent three ambassadors to the Emperor; they performed the ceremony of kneeling and beating the forehead on the ground, to salute the Emperor. The earlier ambassadors from the Khalifs who came to China had at first made difficulties about performing this ceremony. The Chinese history relates that the Mahomedans declared that they knelt only to worship Heaven. But eventually, being better informed, they made scruple no longer."—Gautii, Abrégé de l'Histoire des Thanges, in Amyot, Mémoires conc. les Chinois, xvi. 144.

c. 1245.—"Tarlari de mandato ipesus principes suos Baiouchonoy st Bato violenter ab omnibus nuncius ad ipso venientibus faciunt adorari cum triplici genuum flexione, triplici quoque capitum suorum in terram allisione."—Vincent Bellowacensis, Spec. Historiae, l. xxix. cap. 74.

1298.—"And when they are all seated, each in his proper place, then a great prelate rises and says with a loud voice: 'Bow and adore!' And as soon as he has said this, the company bow down until their foreheads touch the earth in adoration towards the Emperor as if he were a god. And this adoration they repeat four times."—Marco Polo, Bk. ii. ch. 15.

1404.—"E fierionele vestir dos ropas de camocor (see KINCOB), é la usanza era, quando estas roupat ponian por el Señor, de facer un gran yantar, é depois de comer de les vestir de las ropas, é entonces de fiscar los finjoes tres veces en tierra por reverencia del gran Señor."—Clorya, § xxii.

"And the custom was, when these robes were presented as from the Emperor, to make a great feast, and after eating to clothe them with the robes, and then that they should touch the ground three times with the knees to show great reverence for the Lord."—See Markham, p. 104.

1421.—"His worship Hajji Yusuf the Kazi, who was... chief of one of the twelve imperial Councils, came forward accompanied by several Mussulmans acquainted with the languages. They said to the ambassadors: 'First prostrate yourself, and then touch the ground three times with your head.'"—Embassy from Sháik Rúkh, in Cathay, p. ccvi.

1502.—"My uncle the elder Khan came three or four farsangs out from Ta'bokhand, and having erected an awning, seated himself under it. The younger Khan advanced... and when he came to the distance at which the kornish is to be performed, he knelt nine times."—Baber, 106.
c. 1590.—The kornish under Akbar had been greatly modified:

"His Majesty has commanded the palm of the right hand to be placed upon the forehead, and the head to be bent downwards. This mode of salutation, in the language of the present age, is called Kornish."—Ate, ed. Blochmann, i. 158.

But for his position as the head of religion, in his new faith he permitted, or claimed prostration (ajada) before him:

"As some perverse and dark-minded men look upon prostration as blasphemous man- worship, His Majesty, from practical wisdom, has ordered it to be discontinued by the ignorant, and remitted it to all ranks. . . . However, in the private assembly, when any of those are in waiting, upon whom the star of good fortune shines, and they receive the order of seating themselves, they certainly perform the prostration of gratitude by bowing down their foreheads to the earth."

—Ibid. p. 158.

[1816.—", . . . Whereas some officers called me to rise-da (aj-dah), but the King answered no, no, in Persian."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 244; and see ii. 296.]

1816.—"The King (Shah 'Abbas) halted and looked at the Sultan, the latter on both knees, as is their fashion, near him, and advanced his right foot towards him to be kissed. The Sultan having kissed it, and touched it with his forehead . . . made a circuit round the king, passing behind him, and turning his face and those of his companions to do like. This done the Sultan came and kissed a second time, as did the other, and this they did three times."—P. della Valle, i. 646.

[c. 1866.—"Job (Charnock) made a salam Kornis, or low obeisance, every second step he advanced."—Orme, Fragments, quoted in Yule, Headges's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xvii.]

1866.—"Lord Amherst put into my hands . . . a translation . . . by Mr. Morrison of a document received at Tongchow with some others from Ching, containing an official description of the ceremonies to be observed at the public audience of the Ambassador. . . . The Ambassador was then to have been conducted by the Mandarins to the level area, where kneeling . . . he was next to have been conducted to the lower end of the hall, where facing the upper part . . . he was to have performed the ko-tou with 9 prostrations; afterwards he was to have been led out of the hall, and having prostrated himself once behind the row of Mandarins, he was to have been allowed to sit down; he was further to have prostrated himself with the attendant Princes and Mandarins when the Emperor drank. Two or three presentations were to have been made, the first when the milk-tea was presented to him, and the other when he had finished drinking."—Ellis's Journal of (Lord Amherst's) Embassy to China, 213-214.

1824.—"The first ambassador, with all his following, shall then perform the ceremonial of the three kneelings and the nine prostrations; they shall then rise and be led away in proper order."—Ceremonial observed at the Court of Pekin for the Reception of Ambassadors, ed. 1824, in Paulet, i. 192.

1855.—". . . The spectacle of one after another of the aristocracy of nature making the kow-tow to the aristocracy of the accident."—H. Martineau, Autobiog. ii. 877.

1860.—"Some Seiks, and a private in the Buffs having remained behind with the greg-carts, fell into the hands of the Chinese. On the next morning they were brought before the authorities, and commanded to perform the kow-tow. The Seiks obeyed; but Moyse, the English soldier, declaring that he would not prostrate himself before any Chinaman alive, was immediately knocked upon the head, and his body thrown upon a dunghill" (see China Correspondent of the Times). This passage prefaces some noble lines by Sir F. Doyle, ending:

"Vain mightiest fleets, of iron framed; Vain those all-shattering guns;
'Uneedly proud England keep, untamed,
The strong heart of her sons.
So let his name through Europe ring—
A man of mean estate,
Who died, as firm as Sparta's king, Because his soul was great."

1876.—"Nebsa more kowtow big people."—Leland, 46.

1879.—"We know that John Bull adores a lord, but a man of Major L'Esperance's social standing would scarcely kowtow to every shabby little title to be found in stuffy little rooms in Mayfair."—Sat. Rev., April 19, p. 505.

KOTUL, s. This appears to be a Turkic word, though adopted by the Afghans. Kotul, 'a mountain pass, a col.' Pavet de Courteille quotes several passages, in which it occurs, from Baber's original Turki.

[1809.—"We afterwards went on through the hills, and crossed two Cotuls or passes."—Elphinstone, Cawul, ed. 1842, i. 51.]

KUBBER, KHUBBER, s. Ar.—P.—H. khabar, 'news,' and especially as a sporting term, news of game, e.g. "There is pucks khabber of a tiger this morning."

[1838.—", . . . the servant informed us that there were some gongwals, or villagers, in waiting, who had some khabber (news about tigers) to give us."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 53.]

1878.—"Khabber of innumerable black partridges had been received."—Life in the Moffats, i. 169.

1879.—"He will not tell me what khabber has been received."—Vanity Fair, Nov. 29, p. 299.
KUBBERDAUR. An interje-tional exclamation, ' Take care!'
Pers. khabar-dar! 'take heed!' (see KUBBER). It is the usual cry of chokidârs to show that they are awake. [As a substantive it has the sense of a 'scout' or 'spy.]

c. 1664.—"Each ourah causeth a guard to be kept all the night long, in his particular camp, of such men that perpetually go the round, and cry Kâber-dar, have a care."—Bernier, E.T. 119; [ed. Constant, 369].

c. 1665.—"Les archers creient ensuite a pleno tête, Caberdar, c'est à dire prende garde."—Theenoot, v. 58.

[1813.—"There is a strange custom which prevails at all Indian courts, of having a servant called a khubur-dar, or newman, who is an admitted spy upon the chief, about whose person he is employed.""]—Brougham, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892,
p. 25.]

KUHAR, s. Hind. Kahar, [Skt. śranda-kâra, 'one who carries loads on, his shoulders']. The name of a Śûdra caste of cultivators, numerous in Bahâr and the N.W. Provinces, whose specialty is to carry palankins.
The name is, therefore, in many parts of India synonymous with 'palakinbearer,' and the Hindu body-servants called bearers (q.v.) in the Bengal Presidency are generally of this caste.

c. 1550.—"It is the custom for every traveller in India . . . also to hire kâhâre, who carry the kitchen furniture, whilst others carry himself in the palankin, of which we have spoken, and carry the latter when it is not in use."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 415.

c. 1550.—"So saying he began to make ready a present, and sent for bulds, roots, and fruit, birds and beasts, with the finest of fish . . . which were brought by kâhâris in baskets."—Râmdâyana of Tulsî Dâs, by Grose, 1788, ii. 101.

1787.—"Ha (the President of Bombay) goest sometimes in his Coach, drawn by large Milk-white Oxen, sometimes on Horseback, other times in Palankins, carried by Cohors, Musclemen Porters."—Fryer, 68.

1810.—"The Câhar, or palanquin-bearer, is a servant of peculiar utility in a country where, for four months, the intense heat precludes Europeans from taking much exercise."—Williamson, V.M. i. 209.

1873.—"Bhak Kâhar. A widely spread caste of rather inferior rank, whose occupation is to carry palkis, dolis, water-skins, &c. to act as Porters . . . they eat flesh and drink spirits; they are an ignorant but industrious class. Buchanan describes them as of Telengisc descent. . . ."—Dr. H. V.
Carter's Notices of Castes in Bombay Prj., quoted in Ind. Antiq. ii. 164.

KULÁ, Kâlá, n.p. Burmese name of a native of Continental India; and hence misapplied also to the English and other Westerns who have come from India to Burma; in fact used generally for a Western foreigner.

The origin of this term has been much debated. Some have supposed it to be connected with the name of the Indian race, the Kâla; another suggestion has connected it with Kainga (see KÂNG); and a third with the Skt. kula, 'caste or tribe'; whilst the Burmese popular etymology renders it from kâ, 'to cross over,' and la, 'to come,' therefore 'the people that come across (the sea). But the true history of the word has for the first time been traced by Professor Forchhammer, to Gola, the name applied in old Pegu inscriptions to the Indian Buddhist immigrants, a name which he identifies with the Skt. Gauda, the ancient name of Northern Bengal, whence the famous city of Gauî (see GOB, c).

1795.—"They were still anxious to know why a person consulting his own amusement, and master of his own time, should walk so fast; but on being informed that I was a 'Colar,' or stranger, and that it was the custom of my country, they were reconciled to this. . . ."—Symes, Embassy, p. 290.

1855.—"His private dwelling was a small place on one side of the court, from which the women peeped out at the Kâlas . . ."— Yule, Mission to the Court of Ava (Phagre's),
p. 5:

"By a curious self-delusion, the Burmans would seem to claim that in theory at least they are white people. And what is still more curious, the Bengalees appear indirectly to admit the claim; for our servants in speaking of themselves and their countrymen, as distinguished from the Burmans, constantly made use of the term kâla admi—'black man,' as the representative of the Burmese kâla, a foreigner."— Ibid. p. 37.

KUMPÁSS, s. Hind. kampa, corrupiion of English compass, and hence applied not only to a marine or a surveying compass, but also to theo-dolites, levelling instruments, and other elaborate instruments of observation, and even to the shaft of a carriage. Thus the sextant used to be called tikunta kampass, "the 3-cornered compass."

[1866.—"Many an amusing story did I hear of this wonderful kampass. It possessed the power of reversing everything observed. Hence if you looked through the doorbeen at a fort, everything inside was revealed. Thus the Feringhees so readily took forts, not by skill or by valour, but by means of the wonderful power of the doorbeen."—(Confess. of an Orderly, 175.]

KUNKUR, CONKER, &c., s. Hind. kankar, 'gravel.' As regards the definition of the word in Anglo-Indian usage it is impossible to improve on Wilson: "A coarse kind of limestone found in the soil, in large tabular strata, or interspersed throughout the superficial mould, in nodules of various sizes, though usually small." Nodular kunkur, wherever it exists, is the usual material for road metalling, and as it binds when wetted and rammed into a compact, hard, and even surface, it is an admirable material for the purpose.

c. 1721.—"Etaya is situated on a very high bank of the river Jumna, the sides of which consist of what in India is called concha, which is originally sand, but the constant action of the sun in the dry season forms it almost into a vitrification" (!)—Hodges, 110.

1747.—"Konker" appears in a Notification for tenders in Calcutta Gazette.—In Seton-Karr, ii. 135.

c. 1809.—"We came within view of Cawnpore. Our long, long voyage terminated under a high cunkur bank."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 381.

1810.—"... a weaker kind of lime is obtained by burning a substance called kunkur, which, at first, might be mistaken for small rugged flints, slightly coated with soil."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 13.

KUREEF, KUBREEF, s. Hind. adopted from Ar. kharif ('autumn'). The crop sown just before, or at the beginning of, the rainy season, in May or June, and reaped after the rains in November—December. This includes rice, maize, the tall millets, &c. (See RUBBEE).

[1824.—"The basis on which the settlements were generally founded, was a measurement of the Kureef, or first crop, when it is cut down, and of the Rubbee, or second, when it is about half a foot high..."—Malcolm, Central India, ii. 29.]

KURNOOL, n.p. The name of a city and territory in the Deccan, Kurnul of the Imp. Gazetteer; till 1838 a tributary Nawabship; then resumed on account of treason; and now since 1858 a collectorate of Madras Presidency. Properly Kandamur; Canoul of Orme. Kirkpatrick says that the name Kurnool, Kunnool, or Kundnool (all of which forms seem to be applied corruptly to the place) signifies in the language of that country 'fine spun, clear thread,' and according to Meer Husein it has its name from its beautiful cotton fabrics. But we presume the town must have existed before it made cotton fabrics? This is a specimen of the stuff that men, even so able as Kirkpatrick, sometimes repeat after those native authorities who "ought to know better," as we are often told. [The Madras Gloss. gives the name as Tam. kurnuku, from kondana, 'a mixture of lamp-oil and burnt straw used in greasing cart-wheels'and prolui, 'village,' because when the temple at Alampur was being built, the wheels of the carts were greased here, and thus a settlement was formed.]

KUTTAUR, s. Hind. kattar, Skt. kattara, 'a dagger,' especially a kind of dagger peculiar to India, having a solid blade of diamond-section, the handle of which consists of two parallel bars with a cross-piece joining them. The hand grips the cross-piece, and the bars pass along each side of the wrist. [See a drawing in Egerton, Handbook, Indian Armes, pl. ix.] Ibn Batuta's account is vivid, and perhaps in the matter of size there may be no exaggeration. Through the kindness of Col. Waterhouse I have a prototype of some Travancore weapons shown at the Calcutta Exhibition of 1883-4; among them two great kattara, with sheaths made from the snouts of two sawfishes (with the teeth remaining in). They are done to scale, and one of the blades is 20 inches long, the other 26. There is also a plate in the Ind. Antiq. (vii. 198) representing some curious weapons from the Tanjore Palace Armoury, among which are kattar-hilted daggers evidently of great length, though the entire length is not shown. The plate accompanies interesting notes by Mr. M. J. Wallhouse, who states the curious fact that many of the blades mounted kattar-fasion.
were of European manufacture, and that one of these bore the famous name of Andrea Ferrara. I add an extract. Mr. Walhouse accounts for the adoption of these blades in a country possessing the far-famed Indian steel, in that the latter was excessively brittle. The passage from Stavorinus describes the weapon, without giving a native name. We do not know what name is indicated by 'belly piercer.'

c. 1348.—'The villagers gathered round him, and one of them stabbed him with a katárá. This is the name given to an iron weapon resembling a plough-share; the hand is inserted into it so that the fore-arm is shielded; but the blade beyond is two cubits in length, and a blow with it is mortal.'—Tom Batuta, iv. 31-32.

1442.—'The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked. In one hand they hold an Indian poignard (katáná—Hindois), and in the other a buckler of ox-hide; this costume is common to the king and the beggar.'—Abdurrazáæ, in India in the 17th Cent., p. 17.

c. 1593.—'On the whole there were given one tipchák horse with the middle, two pairs of swords with the belts, 25 sets of enamelled daggers (khanjar—see HANGERS), 16 enamelled káréns, two daggers (jamaher—see KUDUD) set with precious stones.'—Baber, 338.

[c. 1650.—In the list of the Moghul arms we have: '10. Katárá, price 4 R. to 1 Muhur.'—Als, ed. Blockmann, i. 110, with an engraving, No. 9, pl. xii.]

1673.—'They go rich in Attire, with a Poisard, or Catarre, at their girdle.'—Fryer, 93.

1690.—'... which chafes and ferments him to such a pitch; that with a Catarra or Bagonet in his hands he first falls upon those that are near him ... killing and stabbing as he goes.'—Oriental, 287.

1754.—'To these were added an enamelled dagger (which the Indians call cuturari) and two swords ...'—H. of Nadr, in Hawkins's Travels, ii. 336.

1768-71.—'They (the Moghuls) on the left side ... wear a weapon which they call by a name that may be translated belly-piercer; it is about 14 inches long; broad near the hilt and tapering away to a sharp point; it is made of fine steel; the handle has, on each side of it, a catch, which, when the weapon is gripped by the hand, shuts round the wrist, and secures it from being dropped.'—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 457.

1813.—'After a short silent prayer, Lulabh, in the presence of all the company, waved his catarrá, or short dagger, over the bed of the expiring man. ... The patient continued for some time motionless; in half an hour his heart appeared to beat, circulation quickened, ... at the expiration of the third hour Lulabh had effected his cure.'—Forbes, Op. Mem. iii. 249; [2nd ed. ii. 272, and see i. 60].

1856.—'The manners of the bardic tribe are very similar to those of their Rajpoot clients; their dress is nearly the same, but the bard seldom appears without the 'Kutár,' or dagger, a representation of which is scrawled beside his signature, and often rudely engraved upon his monumental stone, in evidence of his death in the sacred duty of Trágá' (q.v.).—Forbes, Rás Múld, ed. 1878, pp. 569-560.

1878.—'The ancient Indian smiths seem to have had a difficulty in hitting on a medium between this highly refined brittle steel and a too soft metal. In ancient sculptures, as in Sirangam near Trichinapally, life-sized figures of armed men are represented, bearing Kutáras or long daggers of a peculiar shape; the handles, not so broad as in the later Kutáras, are covered with a long narrow guard, and the blades 2½ inches broad at bottom, taper very gradually to a point through a length of 18 inches, more than 2 of which is deeply channelled on both sides with 6 converging grooves. There were many of these in the Tanjor armoury, perfectly corresponding ... and all were so soft as to be easily bent.'—Ind. Antiq. vii.

KUZZANNA, s. Ar.—H. khatána, or khasan, 'a treasure.' [In Ar. khasimah, or khasn, means 'a treasure,' representing 1000 kis or pures, each worth about £5 (see Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 405).] It is the usual word for the district and general treasuries in British India; and khasandchi for the treasurer.

1863.—'Ye King's Duan (see DEWAUN) had demanded of them 8000 Rupees on account of remains of last year's Tallecas (see TALLICA) . . . ordering his Peasest (Peshadst, an assistant) to see it suddenly paid in ye King's Curranna.'—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 103.

[1757.—'A mint has been established in Calcutta; continue coining gold and silver into Siccas and Mohurs ... they shall pass current in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, and be received into the Cadganna ...'—Pervannah from Jafler Ally Khan, in Verelet, App. 145.]

KUZZILBASH, n.p. Turki kizilbash, 'red-head.' This title has been since the days of the Safavi (see SOPHY) dynasty in Persia, applied to the Persianized Turks, who form the ruling class in that country, from the red caps which they wore. The class is also settled extensively over Afghanistan. ["At Kâbul," writes Bellow (Races of Afghanistan, 107), "he (Nâdir) left as chandaal, or 'rear guard,' a detachment of 12,000 of his Kizilbâsh (so named from the red caps they wore), or Mughal Persian troops. After the death of Nâdir they remained at Kâbul as a military colony, and their descendants occupy a distinct quarter of the city, which is called Chandaal. These Kizilbâsh hold their own ground here, as a distinct Persian community of the Shia persuasion, against the native population of the Sunni profession. They constitute an important element in the general population of the city, and exercise a considerable influence in its local politics. Owing to their isolated position and antagonism to the native population, they are favourably inclined to the British authority."— Many of them used to take service with the Delhi emperors; and not a few do so now in our frontier cavalry regiments."

KYOUNG. n. One often meets with this word (Ar. kaif) in books about the Levant, to indicate the absolute enjoyment of the dolce far niente. Though it is in the Hindustâni dictionaries, we never remember to have heard it used in India; but the first quotation below shows that it is, or has been, in use in Western India, in something like the Turkish sense. The proper meaning of the Ar. word is 'how? 1 in what manner? 2 the secondary is 'partial intoxication.' This looks almost like a parallel to the English vulgar slang of 'how come you so?' But in fact a man's kaif is his 'howness,' i.e. what pleases him, his humour; and this passes into the sense of gaiety caused by ahaish, &c.

KYTHEE, a. Hind. Kaathi. A form of cursive Nagari character, used by Bunyas, &c., in Gangetic India. It is from Kayath (Skt. Kayaatha), a member of the writer-caste.

LAO, a. Hind. lak, from Skt. Jaka, for raka. The resinous incrustation produced on certain trees (of which the dhak (see DHAUK) is one, but chiefly Peepul, and khoosum [kusum, kusum], i.e. Schleichera bijuga, bijupa) by the puncture of the Lac insect (Coccus Lacca, L.). See Roxburgh, in Vol. III. As. Res., 384 seqq. [and a full list of the trees on which the insect feeds, in Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 410 seqq.]. The incrustation contains 60 to 70 per cent. of resinous lac, and 10 per cent. of dark red colouring matter from which is manufactured lac-dye. The material in its original crude form is called stick-lac; when boiled in water it loses its red colour, and is then termed seed-lac; the melted clarified substance, after the extraction of the dye, is turned out in thin irregular laminae called shell-lac. This is used to make sealing-wax, in the fabrication of varnishes, and very largely as a stiffening for men's hats.

Though lak bears the same sense in Persian, and lak or luk are used in modern Arabic for sealing-wax, it would appear from Dozy (Glos., pp. 296-6, and Oosterlingen, 57), that identical or approximate forms are used in various Arabic-speaking regions for a variety of substances giving a red dye, including the coccus ilicis or Kermes. Still, we have seen no evidence that in India the word was applied otherwise than to the lac of our heading. (Garcia says that the Arabs called it loc-numutri, 'lac of Sumatra'; probably because the Pegu lac was brought to the ports of Sumatra, and purchased there.) And this the term in the Periplus seems unquestionably to indicate; whilst it is probable that the passage quoted from Aelian is a much misconceived account of the product. It is not nearly so absurd as De Monfart's account below. The English word lake for a certain red colour is from this. So also are lacquer and lacquered ware, because lac is used in some of the varnishes with which such ware is prepared.

C. A.D. 80-90.—These articles are imported (to the ports of Barbaria, on the W. of the Red Sea) from the interior parts of Ariae.:—
"Στίχονις Ἰνδικός καὶ στγονα (Indian iron and steel).

ΑΔΚΟΣ ΧΡΩΜΑΤΟΣ (Lao-dye.),"

Periplus, § 6.

C. 250.—"There are produced in India animals of the size of a beetle, of a red colour, and if you saw them for the first time you would compare them to cinnabar. They have very long legs, are soft to the touch; they are produced on the trees that bear electrum, and they feed on the fruit of these. The Indians catch them and crush them, and with these dye their red cloaks, and the tunics under these, and everything else that they wish to turn to this colour, and to dye. And this kind of clothing is carried also to the King of Persia."—Aelian, de Nat. Animal. iv. 46.

C. 1348.—The notice of lacca in Pegolotti is in parts very difficult to translate, and we do not feel absolutely certain that it refers to the Indian product, though we believe it to be so. Thus, after explaining that there are two classes of lacca, the matura and acerba, or ripe and unripe, he goes on: "It is produced attached to stalks, i.e. to the branches of shrubs, but it ought to be clear from stalks, and earthy dust, and sand, and from costiere (!). The stalks are the twigs of the wood on which it is produced, the costiere or figs, as the Catalans call them, are composed of the dust of the thing, which when it is fresh heaps together and hardens like pitch; only that pitch is black, and those costiere or figs are red and of the colour of unripe lacca. And more of these costiere is found in the unripe than the ripe lacca," and so on.—Delta Decima, iii. 365.

1510.—"There also grows a very large quantity of lacca (or lacca) for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts."—Barthéme, 233.

1516.—"Here (in Pegu) they load much fine lacque, which grows in the country."—Barths, Lisbon Acad., 366.

1554.—"(Money of Ormus.)—A looke is equivalent to 50 pardaces of cadi, which is called 'bad money,' and this looke is not a coin but a number by which they reckon at Ormus: and each of these pardaces is equal to 2 azares, and each azar to 10 cadi, each cadi to 100 dinars, and after this fashion they calculate in the books of the Custom-house."—Nunes, Lyvro dos Pescos, &c., in Subsidios, 25.

Here the azar is the Persian hazar or 1,000 (dinars); the cadi Pers. sad or 100 (dinars); the looke or lak, 100,000 (dinars); and the tomon (see TOMAUN), which does not appear here, is 10,000 (dinars).

c. 1300.—"They went to the Kafr's tent, killed him, and came back into the town, whence they carried off money belonging to the Sultan amounting to 12 lakes. The lak is a sum of 100,000 (silver) dinars, equivalent to 10,000 Indian gold dinars."—Tom Batuta, iii. 108.

c. 1840.—"The Sultan distributes daily two lakhs in alms, never less: a sum of which the equivalent in money of Egypt and Syria would be 160,000 pieces of silver."—Nikabdins Dimikki, in Notes and Ext. ii. 192.

In these examples from Pinto the word is used apart from money, in the Malay form, but not in the Malay sense of 10,000:

c. 1540.—"The old man desiring to satisfy Antonio de Faria's demand, Sir, said he ... the chronicles of those times affirm, how in only four years and an half sixteen Lacasses (laced) of men were slain, every Lacasse containing an hundred thousand."—Pinto (orig. cap. xiv.) in Cogas, p. 58.

1572.—"... he ruined in 4 months spaces all the enemies country, with such a destruction of people as, if credit may be given to our histories ... there died fifty Lacasses of persons."—Ibid. p. 224.

1615.—"And the whole present was worth ten of their Leakes, as they call them; a Leake being 10,000 pounds sterling; the whole 100,000 pounds sterling."—Coryat's Letters from India (Credities, iii. 256).

1616.—"He received twenty leacks of roupies towards his charge (two hundred thousand pounds sterling)."—Sir T. Roe, reprint, p. 32; [Hak. Soc. i. 201, and see i. 95, 183, 208].

1651.—"Yeder Lac is hondert daysend."—Rogers', 77.

c. 1665.—"Il faut cent mille roupies pour faire un lak, cent mille lakes pour faire un corrow, cent mille courous pour faire un padan, et cent mille padans pour faire un silt."—Thevenot, v. 54.

1673.—"In these great Solemnities, it is usual for them to set it around with Lamps to the number of two or three Leakes, which is so many hundred thousand in our account."—Fryer, [p. 104, reading Leques].

1684.—"They have by information of the servants dug in several places of the house, where they have found great sumnes of money. Under his bed were found Leaks 44. In the House of Office two Leaks. They in all found Ten Leaks already, and make no dore but to find more."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 145].

1692.—"... a lack of Pagodas ...."—Wheeler, i. 262.

1747.—"The Nabob and other Principal Persons of this Country are of such an extreme liberative (sic) Disposition, and ... are so exceedingly avaritious, occasioned by the large Profits they have received from the French, that nothing less than Leaks will go near to satisfy them."—Letter from Ft. St. David to the Court, May 2 (MS. Records in India Office).

1778.—"Sir Matthew Mite will make up the money already advanced in another name, by way of future mortgage upon his estate, for the entire purchase, 5 Leaks of roupies."—Foote, The Nabob, Act i. sc. 1.

1785.—"Your servants have no Trade in this country; neither do you pay them high wages, yet in a few years they return to England with many laks of pagodas."—Nabob of Arcot, in Burke's Speech on his Debts, Works, iv. 18.

1833.—"Tout le reste (et dans le reste il y a des intendants riches de plus de vingt laks) s'asseoit par terre."—Jacqueton, Correspond. ii. 120.

1879.—"In modern times the only numbers in practical use above 'thousands' are lakse ('lak' or 'lakh') and koji ('crore'); and an Indian sum is wont to be pointed thus: 123, 45, 67, 890, to signify 123 crores, 46 lakhs, + 67 thousand, eight hundred and ninety."—Whitney, Sansk. Grammar, 161.

The older writers, it would be observed (c. 1600-1820), put the lakse at £10,000; Hamilton (c. 1700) puts it at £12,500; Williamson (c. 1810) at the same; then for many years it stood again as the equivalent of £20,000; now (1880) it is little more than £8000; [now (1901) about £6000].

LACKERAGE. (See KHIBAJ.)

LALL-SHRAUB, s. Englishman's Hind. wál-shárðh, 'red wine.' The universal name of claret in India.

[c. 1780.—"To every plate are set down two glasses; one pyramidal (like hobnob glasses in England) for Loll Shrub (scioice, claret); the other a common sized winelass for whatever beverage is most agreeable."—Diary of Mrs. Fay, in Busted, Echoes, 123.]

LALLA, s. P.—H. lála. In Persia this word seems to be used for a kind of domestic tutor; now for a male nurse, or as he would be called in India, 'child's bearer.' In N. India it is usually applied to a native clerk writing the vernacular, or to a respectable merchant. [For the Pers. usage see Blochmann, A. M., i. 426 note.]

[1841. -"Where there are no tigers, the Lalla (scribe) becomes a shikaree."—Society in India, ii. 176.]

LAMA, s. A Tibetan Buddhist monk. Tibet. bLlama (b being silent). The word is sometimes found written Llama; but this is nonsense. In fact it seems to be a popular confusion, arising from the name of the S. American quadruped which is so spelt. See quotation from Times below.

c. 1590. -"Fawning Court doctors . . . said it was mentioned in some holy books that men used to live up to the age of 1000 years . . . and in Tibet there were now even a class of Lamas or Mongolian devotees, and recluse, and hermits that live 200 years and more . . . "—Badonv., quoted by Blochmann, A. M., i. 201.

1664. —"This Ambassador had in his suit a Physician, which was said to be of the Kingdom of Lassa, and of the Tribe Lawy or Lama, which is that of the men of the Law in that country, as the Brakmans are in the Indies . . . he related of his great Lama that when he was old, and ready to die, he assembled his council, and declared to them that now he was passing into the Body of a little child lately born . . . —Bernier, E. T. 135; [ed. Constable, 424].

1774. —"ma questo primo figlio . . . rinunziò la corona al secondo e lui difatti si facse religioso o lama del paese."—Delia Tombo, 63.

o. 1818.—"The Parliament of Thibet met—
The little Lama, called before it, Did there and then his whipping get,
And, as the Nursery Gazette Assures us, like a hero bore it."—T. Moore, The Little Grand Lama.

1876. —". . . Hastings . . . touches on the analogy between Tibet and the high valley of Quives, as described by De la Condamine, an analogy which Mr. Markham brings out in interesting detail. . . . But when he enlarges on the wool which is a staple of both countries, and on the animals producing it, he risks confirming in careless readers that popular impression which might be expressed in the phraseology of Philem—'Tis all one; 'ts as alike as my fingers is to my fingers, and there is Llamas in both.'—Rev. of Markham's Tibet, in Times, May 15,

The passage last quoted is in jesting vein, but the following is serious and delightful:—

1879.—"The landlord prostrated himself reverently, if not as lowly, as a Peruvian before his Grand Llama."—Patty's Dream, a novel reviewed in the Academy, May 17.

LAMASERY, LAMASERIE, s. This is a word, introduced apparently by the French R. C. Missionaries, for a llama convent. Without being positive, I would say that it does not represent any Oriental word (e.g. compound of lami and serai), but is a fictitious French word analogous to monsieur, vacherie, laterie, &c.

[c. 1844.—"According to the Tartars, the Lamasery of the Five Towers is the best place you can be buried in."—Huc, Travels in Tartary, i. 78.]

LAMBALLIE, LOMBALLIE, LOMBARDIE, LUMBANAH, &c., s. Dakh. Hind. Lamberd, Mahr. Lamban, with other forms in the languages of the Peninsula. [Platts connects the name with Skt. lamba, 'long, tall'; the Madras Gloss. with Skt. lambata, 'greedy.'] A wandering tribe of dealers in grain, salt, &c., better known as Banjardes (see BRINJARRY). As an Anglo-Indian word this is now obsolete. It was perhaps a corruption of Lubbudna, the name of one of the great clans or divisions of the Banjaras. [Another suggestion made is that the name is derived from their business of carrying salt (Skt. lavana); see Crooke, Tribes of N.W.P. i. 158.]

1756.—"The army was constantly supplied . . . by bands of people called Lamballies, peculiar to the Deccan, who are constantly moving up and down the country, with their flocks, and contract to furnish the armies in the field."—Orme, ii. 102.

1785.—"What you say of the scarcity of grain in your army, notwithstanding your having a cutwal (see CUTWAL), and so many Lumbahm with you, has astonished us."—Letters of Tipopo, 49.

LANCHARA, s. A kind of small vessel often mentioned in the Portuguese histories of the 16th and 17th centuries. The derivation is probably Malay lanchar, 'quick, nimble.' [Mr. Skeat writes: "The real Malay form is Lanchar-an, which is regularly formed from Malay lanchar, 'swift,' and lanchara I believe to be a Port. form of lanchar-an, as lanchara could not possibly, in Malay, be formed from lanchahr, as has hitherto been implied or suggested."]

o. 1585.—"In questo passei di Cambaia (read Camboja) vi sono molti fumi, nelli quali vi sono li nauili detti Lanchares, od li quali vanno nauigando la costa di Siam..."
—Sommerio de’ Regni, &c., in Rasswan, t. f. 385.

...This King (of the Batas) understanding that I had brought him a letter and a Present from the Captain of Malacca, caused me to be entertained by the Zabandar (see SHAMBUBER).... This General, accompanied with five Lanchares and twelve Ballons, came to me to the Port where I rode at anchor."—Pinto, E.T. p. 81.

LANDWIND, a. Used in the south of India. A wind which blows seaward during the night and early morning. [The dangerous effects of it are described in Madras Gloss. s.v.] In Port. Terrenho.

1561.—"Correndo a costa com terrenhos."—Correus, Lendas, i. i. 115.

[1569.—"The East winds begin to blow from off the land into the seas, whereby they are called Terrenhos."—Linachotes, Hak. Soc. i. 234.

[1612.—"Send John Dench... that in the morning he may go out with the landturnes and return with the sea turnes."—Destraight, Letters, i. 206.]

1644.—"And as it is between monsoon and monsoon (monsseus) the wind is quite uncertain only at the beginning of summer. The N.W. prevails more than any other wind... and at the end of it begin the land winds (terrenhos) from midnight to about noon, and these are E. winds."—Bocarro, M.S.

1673.—"... we made for the Land, to gain the Land Bresces. They begin about Midnight, and hold till Noon, and are by the Portugals named Terrenhos."—Prayer, 23.

1889.—"We have had some very bad weather for the last week; furious landwind, very fatiguing and weakening. Everything was so dried up, that when I attempted to walk a few yards towards the beach, the grass crunched under my feet like snow."—Letters from Madras, 199-200.

LANGASAQUE, n.p. The most usual old form for the Japanese city which we now call Nagasaki (see Sainsbury, passion).

1611.—"After two or three days space a lesemate came unto vs from a place called Langasaque, to which place the Carake of Macao is yeerely wont to come."—W. Adams, in Purchas, i. 126.

1614.—"Gave hym counsell to take heed of one Pedro Guziano, a papist Christian, whos is his hoste at Misco; for a lyinge yrve (or Jesus) toade Mr. Peacock at Langasque that Capt. Adams was dead in the howes of the said Guziano, which now I know is a lyer by letters I received..."—Cocks, to Wickham, in Diary, &c., ii. 204.

1618.—"It has now oon to passe, which before I feared, that a company of rich ururers have gotten this sentence against us, and com doun very yeare to Langassaque and this place, and have all waies byn accustomed to buy by the panceo (as they call it), or whole sale, all the goddes which came in the carick from Amasan, the Portingales having no praveleges as we have."—The same to the E.I. Co., ii. 207-3.

Two years later Cocks changes his spelling and adopts Nagasaque (Ibid. 300 and to the end).

LAN JOHN, LANGIANNE, &c., n.p. Such names are applied in the early part of the 17th century to the Shan or Laos State of Luang Prabang on the Mekong. Lan-chan is one of its names signifying in Siamese, it is said, 'a million of elephants.' It is known to the Burmese by the same name (Len-Shen). It was near this place that the estimable French traveller Henri Mouhot died, in 1861.

1597.—"I went from Pegu to Iamahay (see JANGOMAY), which is in the country of the Langianes; it is five and twenty dayes journey North-east from Pegu."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii.

1598.—"Thus we arrived at Lanchan, the capital of the Kingdom (Lao) where the King resides. It is a Kingdom of great extent, but thinly inhabited— it has been frequently devastated by Pegu."—De Morere, 90.

1617.—"The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangoma (JANGOMAY) arrived at the city of Judea... and brought great store of merchandise."—Sainsbury, ii. 90.

1663.—"Entre tant et de sa puissans Royaumes du dernier Orient, desquels on n'a presque jamais entendu parler en Europe, il y en a un qui se nomme Lao, et plus proprement le Royaume des Langi... le Royaume n'a plus de descript qu'un grand nombre d'Ephropants qui s'y rencontrent: de vrai ce mot de Langiens signifie proprement, milliers d'Ephrophants."—Martin, H. Norvelle et Continues des Royaumes de Thauquin et de Lao (Fr. Tr., Paris, 1663), 329, 557.
1668.—Lanchang appears in the Map of Siam in De la Louvère's work, but we do not find it in the book itself.

C. 1692.—"Lao est situé sous le même climat que Tonquin; c'est un royaume grand et puissant, séparé des Etats voisins par des forêts et par des déserts. ... Les principales villes sont Landjam et Triamaja."—Kempfer, H. du Japon, i. 223.

LANTEA, s. A swift kind of boat frequently mentioned by F. M. Pinto and some early writers on China; but we are unable to identify the word.

C. 1540.—"... that ... they set sail from Liampoo for Malaco, and that being advanced as far as the Isle of Sumbor they had been set upon by a Pyrat, a Guaqarv by Nation, called Coia Aem, who had three Junkas, and four Lanteases. ..."—Pinto, E. T. p. 69.

C. 1660.—"There be other lesser shipping than Junkas, somewhat long, called Bacconies, they place three Gares on a sail, and row very well, and load a great deal of goods; there be other lesser called Lanteases, which doe row very swift, and bear a good burthen also: and these two sorts of Ships, viz., Baccones and Lanteases, because they are swift, the theues do commonly use."—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 174.

LAOS, n.p. A name applied by the Portuguese to the civilised people who occupied the inland frontier of Burma and Siam, between those countries on the one hand and China and Tongking on the other; a people called by the Burmese Shams, a name which we have in recent years adopted. They are of the same race of Thai to which the Siamese belong, and which extends with singular identity of manners and language, though broken into many separate communities, from Assam to the Malay Peninsula. The name has since been frequently used as a singular, and applied as a territorial name to the region occupied by this people immediately to the North of Siam. There have been a great number of separate principalities in this region, of which now one and now another predominated and conquered its neighbours. Before the rise of Siam the most important was that of which Sakotai was the capital, afterwards represented by Xieng-mai, the Zimmé of the Burmese and the Jangomay of some old English documents. In later times the chief States were Muang Luang Praban (see LAN JOHN) and Vien-shan, both upon the Mekong.

It would appear from Lieut. Macleod's narrative, and from Garnier, that the name of Laos is that by which the branch of these people on the Lower Mekong, i.e. of those two States, used to designate themselves. Muang Praban is still quasi independent; Vien-Shan was annexed with great cruelties by Siam, c. 1828.

1553.—"Of silver of 11 dinheiros alloy be (Alboconque) made only a kind of money called Malaguens, which silver came thither from Pegu, whilst from Siam came a very pure silver of 12 dinheiros assay, procured from certain people called Laos, lying to the north of these two kingdoms."—Barros, ii. vi. 6.

1553.—"... certain very rugged mountain ranges, like the Alps, inhabited by the people called GUIZOS who fight on horseback, and with whom the King of Siam is continually at war. They are reckoned only on the north, leaving between the two the people called Laos, who encompass this Kingdom of Siam, both on the North, and on the East along the river Mecon ... and on the south adjoin these Laos the two Kingdoms of Camboja and Champa (see CHAMPA), which are on the sea-board. These Laos, though they are less so great territories, are all subject to this King of Siam, though often in rebellion against him."—Ibid. III. ii. 5.

"Three Kingdoms at the upper part of these, are those of the Laos, who (as we have said) obey Siam through fear: the first of these is called Jangoma (see JANGOMAY), the chief city of which is called Chiamay ... the second Chamray Chevarus: the third Lanchas (see LAN JOHN) which is below the others, and adjoins the Kingdom of Cacho, or Cauichichina. ..."—Ibid.

C. 1560.—"These Laos came to Camboja, downe a River many daies Iournie, which they say to have his beginning in China as many others which runne into the Sea of India; it hath eight, fifteen, and twenty fathome water, as myselfe saw by experience in a great part of it; it passeth through manie vnknowne and desert Countries of great Woods and Forests where there are innumerable Elephants, and many Burkes ... and certayne beastes which in that Countrie they call Badas (see ABADA)."—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 169.

C. 1598.—"... I offered to go to the Laos by land, at my expense, in search of the King of Cambodia, as I knew that that was the road to go by. ..."—Blas de Herman Gonzales, in De Morga. (E.T. by Hon. H. Stanley, Hak. Soc.), p. 97.

1641.—"Concerning the Land of the Lowen, and a Journey made therunto by our Fowl in Asia," 1641 (1641).—Valentijn, III. Pt. ii. pp. 50 sqq.

1668.—"Relation Nouvelle et Curieuse de Royanne de Laos.—Traduite de l'Italien du P. de Marini, Romain. Paris, 1668."
(b) To the Delta region of the Indus, and especially to its western part. Sir H. Elliot supposes the name in this use, which survived until recently, to be identical with the preceding, and that the name had originally extended continuously over the coast, from the western part of the Delta to beyond Bombay (see his Historians, i. 378). We have no means of deciding this question (see Larby Bundeb).

c. 1820. — "Diwal . . . was reduced to ruins by a Muhammadan invasion, and another site chosen to the eastward. The new town still went by the same name . . . and was succeeded by Lāri Bandar or the port of Lār, which is the name of the country forming the modern delta, particularly the western part." — M'Murdo, in J. R. As. Soc. i. 29.

(c) To a Province on the north of the Persian Gulf, with its capital.

c. 1220. — Lār is erroneously described by Yakut as a great island between Siraf and Kish. But there is no such island. It is an extensive province of the continent. See Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, p. 501.

c. 1380. — "We marched for three days through a desert . . . and then arrived at Lār, a big town having springs, considerable streams, and gardens, and fine bazaars. We lodged in the hermitage of the pious Shāh Abu Dulaḥ Muḥammad." — Ibn Batūta, ii. 280.

c. 1487. — "Returning alongest the coast, forewarned againstOrmuz there is a towno called Lār, a great and good towns of merchantise, about ijmsi houses." — Josua Barbado, old E.T. (Hak. Soc.) 80.

c. 1590. — "Lār borders on the mountains of Great Tibet. To its north is a lofty mountain which dominates all the surrounding country, and the ascent of which is arduous." — Aris, ed. Jarrett, ii. 363.

1553. — "These benefactions the Kings of Ormuz . . . pay to this day to a mosque which that Caciz (see Cabis) had made in a district called Hongex of Sheikh Doniar, adjoining the city of Lār, distant from Ormuz over 40 leagues." — Barbier, ii. ii. 2.

LARKIN, s. Pers. drí. A peculiar kind of money formerly in use on the Persian Gulf, W. Coast of India, and in the Maldive Islands, in which last it survived to the last century. The name is there retained still, though coins of the ordinary form are used. It LARKIN, s. (obsolete). A kind of drink—apparently a sort of punch —which was popular in the Company's old factories. We know the word only on the authority of Pietro della Valle; but he is the most accurate of travellers. We are in the dark as to the origin of the name. On the one hand its form suggests an eponymus among the old servants of the Company, such as Robert Larkin, whom we find to have been engaged for the service in 1610, and to have died chief of the Factory of Patani, on the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, in 1616. But again we find in a Vocabulary of "Certaine Wordes of the Natural Language of Iaau," in Drake's Voyage (Hak. iv. 246): "Larmike=Drinke." Of this word we can trace nothing nearer than (Javan) laríh, 'to pledge, or invite to drink at an entertainment,' and (Malay) laríh-laríhan, 'mutual pledging to drink.' It will be observed that della Valle assigns the drink especially to Java.

LARRY-BUNDER, n.p. The name of an old seaport in the Delta of the Indus, which succeeded Daibul (see DIUL-SIND) as the chief haven of Sind. We are doubtful of the proper orthography. It was in later Mahommedan times called Lahori-bandar, probably from presumed connection with Lahore as the port of the Punjab (Elliot, i. 378). At first sight M'Murdo's suggestion that the original name may have been Ldri-bandar, from Ldr, the local name of the southern part of Sind, seems probable. M'Murdo, indeed, writing about 1850, says that the name Ldri-Bandar was not at all familiar to natives; but if accustomed to the form Lahori-bandar they might not recognize it in the other. The shape taken however by what is apparently the same name in our first quotation is adverse to M'Murdo's suggestion.

c. 1833. — "I travelled five days in his company with Ali-ul-Mulk, and we arrived at the seat of his Government, i.e. the town of Lhabar, a fine city situated on the shore of the great sea, and near which the River Sind enters the sea. Thus two great waters join near it; it possesses a grand haven, frequented by the people of Yemen, of Fars (etc.). The Amir Ali-ul-Mulk . . . told me that the revenue of this place is amounted to 60 lakhs a year."—Ibn Batuta, tii. 112.

1565. — "Blood had not yet been spilled, when suddenly, news came from Thatta, that the Firtharis had passed Lahori-bandar, and attacked the city."—Tahir-i-Tahir, in Elliot, i. 277.
Ar. 'askr, 'an army' is taken from this Pers. word : whence lashkar, 'one belonging to an army, a soldier.' The word lascdr or lascdr (both these pronunciations are in vogue) appears to have been corrupted, through the Portuguese use of lashkari in the forms lascarin, lascar, &c., either by the Portuguese themselves, or by the Dutch and English who took up the word from them, and from these lascdr has passed back again into native use in this corrupt shape. The early Portuguese writers have the forms we have just named in the sense of 'soldier'; but lascar is never so used now. It is in general the equivalent of khaldisi, in the various senses of that word (see CLASSY), viz. (1) an inferior class of artilleryman ('gun-lascar'); (2) a tent-pitcher, doing other work which the class are accustomed to do; (3) a sailor. The last is the most common Anglo-Indian use, and has passed into the English language. The use of lascar in the modern sense by Pyrrad de Laval shows that this use was already general on the west coast at the beginning of the 17th century, [also see quotation from Pringle below]; whilst the curious distinction which Pyrrad makes between Lascar and Lascari, and Dr. Fryer makes between Lascar and Lascar (accenting probably Luscar and Lascdr) shows that lashkari for a soldier was still in use. In Ceylon the use of the word lascareen for a local or civil soldier long survived; perhaps not yet extinct. The word lashkari does not seem to occur in the Ain.

LÄT, LÄT SÄHIB, s. This, a popular corruption of Lord Sahib, or Lord Sahib, as it is written in Hindi, is the usual form from native lips, at least in the Bengal Presidency, of the title by which the Governor-General has long been known in the vernacular languages. The term also extends nowadays to Lieutenant-Governors, who in contact with the higher authority become Chhota ('Little') Lät, whilst the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief are sometimes discriminated as the Mulk Lät Sāhib, or Bare Lät, and the Jangi Lät Sāhib ('territorial' and 'military'), the Bishop as the Lät Pādre Sāhib, and the Chief Justice as the Lät Jusly Sāhib. The title is also sometimes, but very incorrectly, applied to minor dignitaries of the supreme Government, [whilst the common form of blessing addressed to a civil officer is "Huzur Lät Govnar, Lät Sikrītar ho-jāden."

1824.—"He seemed, however, much puzzled to make out my rank, never having heard (he said) of any 'Lord Sahib,' except the Governor-General, whilst he was still more perplexed by the exposition of 'Lord Bishop Sahib,' which for some reason or other my servants always prefer to that of Lord Padre."—Heber, i. 69.

LATERITE, s. A term, first used by Dr. Francis Buchanan, to indicate a reddish brick-like argillaceous formation much impregnated with iron peroxide, and hardening on exposure to the atmosphere, which is found in places all over South India from one coast to the other, and the origin of which geologists find very obscure. It is found in two distinct types: viz. (1) High-level Laterite, capping especially the trap-rocks of the Deccan, with a bed from 30 or 40 to 200 feet in thickness, which perhaps at one time extended over the greater part of Peninsular India. This is found as far north as the Rajmahal and Monghyr hills. (2) Low-level Laterite, forming comparatively thin and sloping beds on the plains of the coast. The origin of both is regarded as being, in the most probable view, modified volcanic matter; the low-level laterite having undergone a further rearrangement and deposition; but the matter is too complex for brief statement (see Neubold, in J.B.A.S., vol. viii.; and the Manual of the Geol. of India, pp. xlv. seqq., 348 seqq.). Mr. King and others have found flint weapons in the low-level formation. Laterite is the usual material for road-metal in S. India, as krunkur (q.v.) is in the north. In Ceylon it is called cabook (q.v.).

1800.—"It is diffused in immense masses, without any appearance of stratification, and is placed over the granite that forms the basis of Malayala. . . It very soon becomes as hard as brick, and resists the air and water much better than any brick I have seen in India. As it is usually cut into the form of bricks for building, in several of the native dialects it is called the brick-stone (lituaculite) [Malayal. vetuval]. . . . The most proper English name would be Laterite, from Lateris, the appellation that may be given it in science."—Buchanan, Myore, &c., ii. 440-441.

1860.—"Natives resident in these localities (Galle and Colombo) are easily recognisable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence along the western coast of laterite, or, as the Singhalese call it, cabook, a product of disintegrated gneiss, which being subjected to detrition communicates its hue to the soil."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 17.

LATTREE, s. A stick; a bludgeon, often made of the male bamboo (Dendrocalamus strictus), and sometimes bound at short intervals with iron rings, forming a formidable weapon.

The word is Hind. lath and lath, Mahr. lattha. This is from Prakrit latthi, for Skt. yaṣṭi, 'a stick,' according to the Prakrit grammar of Vavaruuchi (ed. Cowell, ii. 39); see also Lassen, Institutiones, Ling. Prakrit, 195. Jiski lathī, ut ki bāhīza, is a Hind. proverb (ciyus baculum ejus tubalum), equivalent to the "good old rule, the simple plan."

1830.—"The natives use a very dangerous weapon, which they have been forbidden by Government to carry. I took one as a curiosity, which had been seized on a man in a fight in a village. It is a very heavy lathī, a solid male bamboo, 5 feet 5 inches long, headed with iron in a most formidable manner. There are 6 jagged semicircular irons at the top, each 2 inches in length, 1 in height, and it is shod with iron bands 16 inches deep from the top."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 138.

1878.—"After driving some 6 miles, we came upon about 100 men seated in rows on the roadside, all with latties."—Life in the Mogulist, i. 114.

LATTREAL, s. Hind. ḍāthiyāl, or, more cumbriously, ḍāthiāvala, 'a clubman,' a hired ruffian. Such gentrty were not many years ago entertained in scores by planters in some parts of Bengal, to maintain by force their claims to lands for sowing indigo on.

1878.—"Doubtless there were hired lattials . . . on both sides."—Life in the Mogulist, i. 6.

LAW-OFFICER. This was the official designation of a Mahomedan officer learned in the (Mahomedan) law, who was for many years of our Indian administration an essential functionary of the judges' Courts in the districts, as well as of the Sudder or Courts of Review at the Presidency.

It is to be remembered that the law administered in Courts under the Company's government, from the assumption of the Dewanny of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, was the Mahomedan law; at first by the hands of native Casoos and Mutties, with some superintendence from the higher European servants of the Company; a superintendence which, while undergoing sundry vicissitudes of system during the next 30 years, developed gradually into a European judiciary, which again was set on an extended and quasi-permanent footing by Lord Cornwallia's Government, in Regulation IX. of 1793.

'Act XLV. of 1860, and came merged both the

to get rid of futwa and differences of opinion."

The frequent adoption of the latter alternative rendered the appearance of the Law-officer and his futwa much less universal as time went on. The post of Law-officer was indeed not actually abolished till 1864. But it would appear from enquiry that I have made, among friends of old stand-ing in the Civil Service, that for some years before the issue of the Penal Code and the other reforms already mentioned, the Moolvee (maulavi) or Mahommedan Law-officer had, in some at least of the Bengal districts, practically ceased to sit with the judge, even in cases where no assessors were summoned.* I cannot trace any legislative authority for this, nor any Circular of the Sudder Nizamut; and it is not easy, at this time of day, to obtain much personal testimony. But Sir George Yule (who was Judge of Rungpore and Bogra about 1855-56) writes thus:

"The Moolvee-ship . . . must have been abolished before I became a judge (I think), which was 2 or 3 years before the Mutiny; for I have no recollection of ever sitting with a Moolvee, and I had a great number of heavy criminal cases to try in Rungpore and Bogra. Assessors were substituted for the Moolvee in some cases, but I have no recollection of employing these either."

Mr. Seton-Karr, again, who was Civil and Sessions Judge of Jessore (1857-1860), writes:

"I am quite certain of my own practice
. . . and I made deliberate choice of native assessors, whenever the law required me to have such functionaries. I determined never to sit with a Maulavi, as, even before the Penal Code was passed, and came into operation, I wished to get rid of futwa and differences of opinion."

The office of Law-officer was formally abolished by Act XI. of 1864.

In respect of civil litigation, it had been especially laid down (Regn. of April 11, 1780, quoted below) that in suits regarding successions, inheritance, marrige, caste, and all religious usages

* Reg. I. of 1810 had empowered the Executive Government, by an official communication from its Secretary in the Judicial Department, to disperse with the attendance and futwa of the Law officers of the districts of circuit, when it was deemed advisable. But in such cases the judge of the court passed no sentence, but referred the proceedings with an opinion to the Nizamut Adawlut.
and institutions, the Mahommedan laws with respect to Mahommedans, and the Hindü laws with respect to Hindüs, were to be considered as the general rules by which the judges were to form their decisions. In the respective cases, it was laid down, the Mahommedan and Hindü law-officers of the court were to attend and expound the law.

In this note I have dealt only with the Mahommedan law-officer, whose presence and co-operation was so long (it has been seen) essential in a criminal trial. In civil cases he did not sit with the judge (at least in memory of man now living), but the judge could and did, in case of need, refer to him on any point of Mahommedan Law. The Hindü law-officer (Pundit) is found in the legislation of 1793, and is distinctly traceable in the Regulations down to 1821. In fact he is named in the Act XI. of 1864 (we quotation).

But under circumstances exactly I have failed to discover. He had nothing to do with criminal justice, and the occasions for reference to him were presumably not frequent enough to justify his maintenance in every district. A Pundit continued to be attached to the Sudder Dewanny, and to him questions were referred by the District Courts when requisite. Neither Pundit nor Moolvée is found in the High Court, but native judges sit on its Bench. It need only be added that under Regulation III. of 1821, a magistrate was authorized to refer for trial to the law-officer of his district a variety of complaints and charges of a trivial character. The designation of the Law-officer was Maulavi. (See ADALWUT, CAZEE, FUTWA, MOOLVEE, MUTFY.)

1780.—"That in all suits regarding inheritance, marriage, and caste, and other religious usages or institutions, the laws of the Koran with respect to Mahommedans, and those of the Shaster with respect to Gentooos, shall be invariably adhered to. On all such occasions the Molavies or Brahmins shall respectively attend to expound the law; and they shall sign the report and assist in passing the decree."—Regulation passed by the G.-O. and Council, April 11, 1780.

1793.—"II. The Law Officers of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, the Nizamut Adawlut, the provincial Courts of Appeal, the courts of circuit, and the sallah and city courts . . . shall not be removed but for incapacity or misconduct."—Reg. XII. of 1793.

In §§ iv., v., vi. Cauny and Mutfy are substituted for Law-Officer, but referring to the same persons.

1799.—"IV. If the futwa of the law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut declare any person convicted of wilful murder not liable to suffer death under the Mahommedan law on the ground of . . . the Court of Nizamut Adawlut shall notwithstanding sentence the prisoner to suffer death . . . "—Reg. VIII. of 1798.

LAXIMANAN, LAQUESIMENA, &c., s. Malay Laksamana, from Skt. lakshmana, ‘having fortunate tokens’ (which was the name of a mythical hero, brother of Râma). This was the title of one of the highest dignitaries in the Malay State, commander of the forces.

1511.—"There used to be in Malaca five principal dignities . . . the third is Laksaman; this is Admiral of the Sea . . . "—Alboquerque, by Birch, iii. 87.

c. 1539.—"The King accordingly set forth a Fleet of two hundred Sails. . . . And of this Navy he made General the great Laque Xemen, his Admiral, of whose Valor the History of the Indias hath spoken in divers places."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 38.

1653.—"Laccamana was harassed by the King to engage Dom Garcia; but his reply was: Sir, against the Portuguese and their high-sided vessels it is impossible to engage with low-cut launchas like ours. Leave me (to act) for I know this people well, seeing how much blood they have cost me; good fortune is now with thee, and I am about to avenge you on them. And so he did."—Barros, III. viii. 7.

[1615.—"On the morrow I went to take my leave of Laxaman, to whom all strangers’ business are resigned."—Foster, Letters, iv. 6.]

LEAGUER, s. The following use of this word is now quite obsolete, we believe, in English; but it illustrates the now familiar German use of Lager-Bier, i.e. ‘beer for laying down, for keeping’ (primarily in cask). The word in this sense is neither in Minahew (1627), nor in Bayley (1730).

1747.—"That the Storekeeper do provide Leaguers good Colombo or Batavia arrack."—Ft. St. David Cons., May 5 (MS. Record in India Office).

1782.—"Will be sold by Public Auction by Mr. Bondfield, at his Auction Room, formerly the Court of Cutcherry . . . Square and Glove Lanthorns, a quantity of Country Rum in Leaguers, a Slave Girl, and a variety of other articles."—India Gazette, Nov. 23.
LECQUE, a. We do not know what the word used by the Abbé Raynal in the following extract is meant for. It is perhaps a mistake for last, a Dutch weight.

1770.—"They (Dutch at the Cape) receive a still smaller profit from 60 laises of red wine, and 80 or 90 of white, which they carry to Europe every year. The laquee weighs about 1,200 pounds."—Raynal, E. T. 1777, i. 231.

LEE, a. Chin. 麗. The ordinary Chinese itinerary measure. Books of the Jesuit Missionaries generally interpret the modern 麗 as 里 of a league, which gives about 3 里 to the mile; more exactly, according to Mr. Giles, 27 里 = 10 miles; but it evidently varies a good deal in different parts of China, and has also varied in the course of ages. Thus in the 8th century, data quoted by M. Vivien de St. Martin, from Père Gaubil, show that the 里 was little more than ⅓ of an English mile. And from several concurrent statements we may also conclude that the 里 is generalised so that a certain number of 里, generally 100, stand for a day's march. [Arch-deacon Gray (China, ii. 101) gives 10 里 as the equivalent of 3½ English miles; Gen. Cunningham (Arch. Rep. i. 305) asserts that Hwen Thsang converts the Indian โยก that he might use in China at the rate of 40 里 per โยก, or of 10 里 per 里.]

1858.—"By the said books it is found that the Chinese have amongst them but only three kind of measures; the which in their language are called 里, 丈, and 促, which is as much as to say, or in effect, as a forlong, league, or journey: the measure, which is called 里, hath so much space as a man's voice on a plain ground may be heard in a quiet day, halloving or whooping with all the force and strength he may; and ten of these 里s maketh a 丈, which is a great Spanish league; and ten 丈s maketh a day's journey, which is called 促, which maketh 12 (sic) long leagues."—Mendoza, i. 21.

1881.—"In this part of the country a day's march, whatever its actual distance, is called 100 里; and the 里 may therefore be taken as a measure of time rather than of distance."—Col. Sarel, in J.R. Geog. Soc. xxxii. 11.

LECHEE, LYCHEE, a. Chin. 櫻, and in S. China (its native region) 佷 laï-chi; the beautiful and delicate fruit of the Nephelium litchi, Cambessedes (N. O. Sapindaceae), a tree which has been for nearly a century introduced into Bengal with success. The dried fruit, usually ticketed as lychee, is now common in London shops.

1850.—"... otra verdura muito mais fresca, e de melhor cheiro, que esta, a que os naturaes da terra chamão lechias..."—Pinto, ch. lxxviii.

1863.—"Le philk is a species of trees which they seem to reckon equal to the sweet orange trees. ... It seems hardly credible that the country about Canton (in which place only the fruit grows) annually makes 100,000 tuns of dried leechia."—Olof Pufendorf, 920-3.

1824.—"Of the fruits which this season offers, the finest are leechias (sic) and mangos; the first is really very fine, being a sort of plum, with the flavour of a Frontignac grape."—Heber, i. 60.

1858.—"Et tandis que ton pied, sorti de la be-bouche, Pendait, rose, au bord du manchot (see MUNCHEL) À l'ombre des bois noirs touffus, et du Litchi. Aux fruits moins pourpres que ta bouche,"—Leconte de Lisle.

1878.—"... and the litchi hiding under a shell of ruddy brown its globes of translucent and delicately fragrant flesh."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49.

1879.—"... Here are a hundred and sixty litchi fruits for you..."—M. Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales (Cal. ed.) 61.

LEMON, a. Citrus medica, var. Limonum, Hooker. This is of course not an Anglo-Indian word. But it has come into European languages through the Ar. leimān, and is, according to Hahn, of Indian origin. In Hind. we have both limā and nimbē, which last, at least, seems to be an indigenous form. The Skt. dictionaries give nimbāku. In England we get the word through the Romance languages, Fr. limon, It. limone, Sp. limon, &c., perhaps both from the Crusades and from the Moors of Spain. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The Malay form is limau, 'a lime, lemon, or orange.' The Port. limão may possibly come from this Malay form. I feel sure that limau, which in some dialects is limar, is an indigenous word which was transferred to Europe." ]

(See LIME.)

c. 1200.—"Sunt praeterea aliae arbores fructus acidos, pontīci videlicet saporis, ex se procrescentes, quos appellant limones."—Jacoby de Fīrāco, Hist. Herōulyn, cap. lxxv. in Bonagre.

c. 1828.—"I will only say this much, that this India, as regards fruit and other things, is entirely different from Christendom; except, indeed, that there be lemons in some places, as sweet as sugar, whilst there be other lemons sour like ours."—Friar Jordanus, 15.

1831.—"Profunditas hujus aquis plena est lapidibus preciosis. Quae aqua multum est yrudinibus et sanguisugiis plena. Hoc lapides non accipit rex, sed pro anima sub semel vel bis in anno sub aquas ipsose pauperas ire permittit. . . . Et ubi pauperas ubi sub aquam possess accipiant limonam et quandam fructum quem bene pistant, et illo bene se ungunt. . . . Et cum sic sint uncti yrudines et sanguisugae illos offendere non valent."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., App., p. xxii.

c. 1333.—"The fruit of the mango-tree (al-ānīca) is the size of a great pear. When yet green they take the fallen fruit and powder it with salt and preserve it, as is done with the sweet citron and the lemon (al-leimān) in our country."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 126.

LEMON-GRASS, s. Andropogon citratus, D.C., a grass cultivated in Ceylon and Singapore, yielding an oil much used in perfumery, under the name of Lemon-Grass Oil, Oil of Verbena, or Indian Melissa Oil. Royle (Hind. Medicine, 89) has applied the name to another very fragrant grass, Andropogon schoenanthus, L., according to him the "species of Dioscorides. This last, which grows wild in various parts of India, yields Rūsa Oil, alias 0. of Ginger-grass or of Geranium, which is exported from Bombay to Arabia and Turkey, where it is extensively used in the adulteration of "Oto of Rosae."

LEOPARD, s. We insert this in order to remark that there has been a great deal of controversy among Indian sportsmen, and also among naturalists, as to whether there are or are not two species of this Cat, distinguished by those who maintain the affirmative, as panther (Felis pardus) and leopard (Felis leopardus), the latter being the smaller, though by some these names are reversed. Even those who support this distinction of species appear to admit that the markings, habits, and general appearance (except size) of the two animals are almost identical. Jerdon describes the two varieties, but (with Blyth) classes both as one species (Felis pardus). [Mr. Blanford takes the same view: "I cannot help suspecting that the difference is very often due to age. . . . I have for years endeavoured to distinguish the two forms, but without success." (Mammalia of India, 68 seq.)]

LEWCHEW, LIU KIU, LOOCHOO, &c., n.p. The name of a group of islands to the south of Japan, a name much more familiar than in later years during the 16th century, when their people habitually navigated the China seas, and visited the ports of the Archipelago. In the earliest notices they are perhaps mixt up with the Japanese. [Mr. Chamberlain writes the name Luchu, and says that it is pronounced Dūchū by the natives and Ryūkyū by the Japanese (Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 267). Mr. Pringle traces the name in the "Gold flowered loes" which appear in a Madras list of 1884, and which he supposes to be "a name invented for the occasion to describe some silk stuff brought from the Liu Kiu islands." (Diary R. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 174.)]

1516.—"Opposite this country of China there are many islands in the sea, and beyond them at 175 leagues to the east there is one very large, which they say is the mainland, from whence there come in each year to Malaca 3 or 4 ships like those of the Chinese, of white people whom they describe as great and wealthy merchants. . . . These islands are called Lequeus, the people of Malaca say they are better men, and greater and wealthier merchants, and better dressed and adorned, and more honourable than the Chinese.—Barros, 207.

1540.—"And they, demanding of him whence he came, and what he would have, he answered them that he was of the Kingdom of Siams [of the settlement of the Tanauariam foreigners, and that he came from Veniaga] and as a merchant was going to traffique in the Isle of Lequios."—Pinto (orig. cap. x. xil.), in Cogan, 49.

1553.—"Fernao Perez, whilst he remained at that island of Beniaga, saw there certain junks of the people called Lequios, of whom he had already got a good deal of information at Macaca, as that they inhabited certain islands adjoining that coast of China; and he observed that the most part of the merchandise that they brought was a great quantity of gold . . . and they appeared to him a better disposed people than the Chinese."—Barros, III. ii. 8. See also II. vi. 6.

1556.—(In this year) a Portuguese arrived at Macaca, named Pero Gomes d’Almeida, servant to the Grand Master of Santiago, with a rich Present, and letters from the Nauquaum, Prince of the Island of Tanxam, directed to King John the third . . . to have five hundred Portugals granted to him, to the end that with them, and his own Forces, he might conquer the Island of Lequio, for which he would remain tributary to him at 5000 Kintals of Copper and 1000 of Lattin, yearly."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 188.

1615.—"The King of Mashona (qu. Shaama ?) . . . who is King of the westernmost islands of Japan . . . has conquered the Leques Islands, which not long since were under the Government of China."—Sainbury, i. 447.

"The King of Shaama . . . a man of great power, and hath conquered the islands called the Leques, which not long since were under the Government of China. Leque Grande yeeldeth greate store of amber greesse of the best sorte, and will vent 1,000 or 15,000 (sic) ps. of coarse cloth, as duties and such like, per annum."—Letter of Raphel Coppindall, in Cocks, ii. 272.

LIAMPO, n.p. This is the name which the older writers, especially Portuguese, give to the Chinese port which we now call Ning-Po. It is a form of corruption which appears in other cases of names used by the Portuguese, or of those who learned from them. Thus Nanking is similarly called Lanchin in the publications of the same age, and Yunnan appears in Mendoza as Olam.

1540.—"Sailing in this manner we arrived six days after at the Ports of Liamo, which are two Islands one just against another, distant three Leagues from the place, where at that time the Portugals used their commerce; There they had built above a thousand houses, that were governed by Sheriffs, Auditors, Consuls, Judges, and 6 or 7 other kinds of Officers (同城governaoa de Verendas, & Ouivdor, & Alcaldes, & outras seis ou sete Varas de Justiça & Oficines de Republica), where the Notaries underwrote the publice Acts which they made, wrote thus, I, such a one, publique Notarie of this Town of Liamo, for the King our Sovereign Lord. And this they did with so much confidence and assurance as if this Place had been situated between Santarem and Lisbon; so that there were houses there which cost three or four thousand Duckats the building, but both they and all the rest were afterwards demolished for our sins by the Chinese. . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. lxvi.), in Cogan, p. 82.

What Cogan renders Ports of LIAMPO is portas, i.e. Gates. And the expression is remarkable as preserving a very old tradition of Eastern navigation; the nave and arrangement regarding Arab trade to China (the Relation, tr. by Reinaud) says that the ships after crossing the Sea of Sanji pass the Gates of China. These Gates are in fact mountains washed by the sea; between these mountains is an opening, through which the ships pass" (p. 19). This phrase was perhaps a translation of a term used by the Chinese themselves—see under BOCCA TIGRIS.

1553.—"The eighth (division of the coasts of the Indies) terminates in a notable cape, the most easterly point of the whole continent so far as we know at present, and which stands about midway in the whole coast of that great country China. This our people call Cabo de Liampo, after an illustrious city which lies in the bend of the cape. It is called by the natives Nimpo, which our countrymen have corrupted into Liampo."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1696.—"Those Junkes commonly touch at Lympo, from whence they bring Petre, Gelongs, and other Silks."—Bowyer, in Daltymple, i. 87.

1701.—"The Mandarin of Justice arrived late last night from Limpo."—Fragmentary MS. Records of China Factory (at Chusan ?), in India Office, Oct. 24.

1727.—"The Province of Cheouiam, whose chief city is Limpo, by some called Nimpo, and by others Nimpo."—A. Hamilton, ii. 283; [ed. 1744, ii. 282].

1770.—"To these articles of importation may be added those brought every year, by a dozen Chinese Junkes, from Emoy, Limpo, and Canton."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 249.

LIKIN, LEXIN, s. We borrow from Mr. Giles: "An arbitrary tax, originally of one cash per tael on all kinds of produce, imposed with a view of making up the deficiency in the land-tax of China caused by the Taiping and Nienfei troubles. It was to be set aside for military purposes only—hence its common name of 'war tax.' The Chefoo Agreement makes the area of the Foreign concessions at the various Treaty Ports exempt from the tax of Lekin (Gloss. of Reference, s.v.). The same authority explains the term as "li (i.e., a cash or treaty of a tael)-money," because of the original rate of levy. The likin is professedly not an imperial customs-duty, but a provincial tax levied by the governors of the provinces, and at their discretion as to amount; hence varying in local rate, and from time to time changeable. This has been a chief difficulty in carrying out the Chefoo Agreement, which as yet has never been authoritatively interpreted or finally ratified by England. [It was ratified in 1886. For the conditions of the Agreement see Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 629 seqq.] We quote the article of the Agreement which deals with opium, which has involved the chief difficulties, as leaving not only the amount to be paid, but the line at which this is to be paid, undefined.

1876.—"Sect. III. . . . (iii). On Opium Sir Thomas Wade will move his Government to sanction an arrangement different from that affecting other imports. British merchants, when opium is brought into port, will be obliged to have it taken cognizance of by the Customs, and deposited in Bond . . . until such time as there is a sale for it. The importer will then pay the tariff duty upon it, and the purchasers the likin: in order to the prevention of the evasion of the duty. The amount of likin to be collected will be decided by the different Provincial Governments, according to the circumstances of each."—Agreement of Chefoo.

1878.—"La Chine est parsemée d'une infinité de petits bureaux d'octroi échelonnés le long des voies commerciales; les Chinois les nomment Likim. C'est la source la plus sure, et la plus productive des revenus."—Rousset, A Travers la Chine, 221.

LILAC, s. This plant-name is eventually to be identified with anil (q.v.), and with the Skt. nila, 'of a dark colour (especially dark blue or black)'; a fact which might be urged in favour of the view that the ancients in Asia, as has been alleged of them in Europe, belonged to the body of the colour-blind (like the writer of this article). The Indian word takes, in the sense of indigo, in Persian the form iland; in Ar. this, modified into lilak and lilak, is applied to the lilac (Syringa spp.). Marcel Devic says the Ar. adj. lilak has the modified sense 'bleulâtre.' See a remark under BUCKYNE. We may note that in Scotland the 'striving after meaning' gives this familiar and beautiful tree the name among the uneducated of 'lily-oak.'

LIME, s. The fruit of the small Citrus medica, var. acida, Hooker, is that generally called lime in India, approaching as it does very nearly to the fruit of the West India Lime. It is often not much bigger than a pigeon's egg, and one well-known miniature lime of this kind is called by the natives from its thin skin kaghzi nimbu, or 'paper lime.' This seems to bear much the same relation to the lemon that the miniature thin-skinned orange, which in London shops is called Tangerine, bears to the "China orange." But lime is also used with the characterising adjective for the Citrus medica, var. Limetta, Hooker, or Sweet Lime, an insipid fruit.

The word no doubt comes from the Sp. and Port. lima, which is from the Ar. lima; Fr. lime, Pers. limā, līmān (see LEMON). But probably it came into English from the Portuguese in India. It is not in Minshew (2nd ed. 1727).

1404.—"And in this land of Guiana snow never falls, so hot is it; and it produces abundance of citrons and limes and oranges (cidras & limas & narancjas)."—Clavijo, §111xvi.

c. 1528.—"Another is the lima (limā), which is very plentiful. Its size is about that of a hen's egg, which it resembles in shape. If one who is poisoned boils and eats its fibres, the injury done by the poison is averted."—Baber, 328.

1563.—"It is a fact that there are some Portuguese so pig-headed that they would rather die than acknowledge that we have here any fruit equal to that of Portugal; but there are many fruits here that bear the bell, as for instance all the fructas de espírtu. For the lemons of those parts are so big that they look like citrons, besides being very tender and full of flavour, especially those of Baquir; whilst the citrons themselves are much better and more tender (than those of Portugal); and the limes (limas) vastly better . . . ."—Garcia, p. 133.

c. 1630.—"The Ile inricht us with many good things; Buffolls, Goats, Turtles, Hens, Lingayat, Lingayet, Linguit, Lingavant, Lingadhai, s. Mahr. Linga - it, Can. Lingayata, a member of a Sivaites sect in W. and S. India, whose members wear the linga (see Lingam) in a small gold or silver box suspended round the neck. The sect was founded in the 12th century by Durgamacharya, a great idol of something destroyed in the form of a cylinder of stone. The name or title Linga is from the S. Indian form of the word, which had been a long time established at that place... these, up to this time, the kick of the horse of Islam had not attempted to break. ... Deo Narain fell down, and the other gods who had scenes there raised their feet, and jumped so high, that at one leap they reached the foot of Lanka, and in that affliction the linga themselves would have fled, had they had any legs to stand on."—Amir Khushru, in Eliot, iv. 91.

1616.—"... above this there is elevated the figure of an idol, which in decency I abstain from naming, but which is called by the heathen Linga, and which they worship with many superstitions; and indeed they regard it to such a degree that the heathen of Canara carry well-wrought images of the kind round their necks. This abominable custom was abolished by a certain Canara King, a man of reason and righteousnes."—Coudo, Dec. VII. iii. 11.

1726.—"There are also some of them who wear a certain stone idol called Lingam... round the neck, or else in the hair of the head."—Valentinus, Charo. 74.

1781.—"These Pagodas have each a small chamber in the center of twelve feet square, with a lamp hanging over the Lingam."—Hodges, 94.

1799.—"I had often remarked near the banks of the rivulet a number of little altars, with a linga of Mahadeva upon them. It seems they are placed over the ashes of Hindus who have been burnt near the spot."—Colebrooks, in Life, p. 152.

1809.—"Without was an immense lingam of black stone."—Ed. Valentina, i. 371.

1814.—"... two respectable Brahmuns, a man and his wife, of the secular order; who, having no children, had made several religious pilgrimages, performed the accustomed ceremonies to the linga, and consulted the divines."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 384; [2nd ed. ii. 4; in ii. 184, lingam].

1838.—"In addition to the preaching, Mr. G. got hold of a man's Lingum, or badge of caste, and took it away."—Letters from Madras, 155.

1843.—"The homage was paid to Lingamism. The insult was offered to Mahometanism. Lingamism is not merely idolatry, but idolatry in its most pernicious form."—Macaulay, Speech on Gutes of Somnath.

Linguist, s. An old word for an interpreter, formerly much used in the East. It long survived in China, and is there perhaps not yet obsolete. Probably adopted from the Port. lingua, used for an interpreter.

1554.—"To a lingua of the factory (at Goa) 2 pardaos monthly..."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 63.

"To the lingua of this kingdom (Ornus) a Portuguese... To the lingua of the custom-house, a bramen."—Ibid. 104. [1612.—"Did Captain Sars' Linguist attend?"—Dawers, Letters, i. 68.]
1700.—"I carried the Linguist into a Merchant's House that was my Acquaintance to consult with that Merchant about removing that Remorse, that stop'd the Man of War from entering into the Harbour."—A. Hamilton, iii. 234; [ed. 1744].

1711.—"Linguists require not too much haste, having always five or six to make choice of, never a Barrel the better Herring."—Lockyer, 102.

1760.—"I am sorry to think your Honour should have reason to think, that I have been anyway concerned in that unlucky affair that hapned at the Negrau, in the month & to the 1769; but give me leave to aemre our Honour that I wan no further conerneB than as a after the news ok who oomm- ule PartyP1, Letter to the Gov. of Fort St. George, from An&nw Lin~iyiat, in Dalrymple, i. 396.

1790-1810.—"If the ten Bhould resume to enter villap public ph, or Lra, punishment dl be inflicted on the linguist who accompanies them."—Regulations at Canton, from The Fankwee at Canton, p. 29.

1822.—"... for long cloth brown English 72; Coveds long & 24 broad No. I...."—Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. i. 40.

1727.—"Sadorass, or Sadoras Patam, a small Factory belonging to the Dutch, to buy up long cloth."—A. Hamilton, i. 386; [ed. 1744].

1786.—"The trade of Fort St. David's consists in long cloths of different colours."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, i. 6.

1865.—"Long-cloth, as it is termed, is the material principally worn in the Tropics."—Waring, Tropical Residen, p. 111.

1880.—"A Chinaman is probably the last man in the world to be taken in twice with a fraudulent piece of long-cloth."—Pull Mall Budget, Jan. 9, p. 9.

LONG-DRAWERS, s. This is an old-fashioned equivalent for pyjamas (q.v.). Of late it is confined to the Madras Presidency, and to outfitters' lists. [Mosquito drawers were probably like these.]

[1623.—"They wear a pair of long Drawers of the same Cloth, which cover not only their Thighs, but legs also to the Feet."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 43.]

1711.—"The better sort wear long Drawers, and a piece of Silk, or wrought Callico, thrown loose over the Shoulders."—Lockyer, 57.

1774.—"... gave each private man a frock and long drawers of chints."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 100.

1789.—"... I took Mr. Key's note that the word is not in the dicta., but Klinkert gives Jav. lap-lap, 'a dish-clout.'"

1789.—"... It is true that they (the Spto) wear only a short blue jacket, and blue long draw...—Note by Translator of Seir-Mutaghiri, i. 57.

1810.—"For wear on board ship, pantaloons... together with as many pair of wove cotton long-drawers, to wear under them."—Williamson, V. M. i. 9.

1853.—"The Doctor, his gaunt figure very scantily clad in a dirty shirt and a pair of mosquito drawers."—Campbell, Old Forest Ranger, 380, ed. 108.

(See PYJAMAS, MOGUL BREECHES, SHULWAURS, BIRDEARS.)
LONG-SHORE WIND, s. A term used in Madras to designate the damp, unpleasant wind that blows in some seasons, especially July to September, from the south.

1837.—"This longshore wind is very disagreeable—a sort of damp sea-breeze blowing from the south; whereas the real sea-breeze blows from the east; it is a regular current upon the new-comers, feeling damp and fresh as if it were going to cool one."—Letters from Madras, 78.

LONTAR, s. The palm leaves used in the Archipelago (as in S. India) for writing on are called lontar-leaves. Filet (No. 5179, p. 209) gives lontar as the Malay name of two palms, viz. Borassus flabelliformis (see PALMYRA, BRAB), and Livistona tundfolia. [See CANJAH.] [Mr. Skeat notes that Klinkert calls lontar "Lontar, metathesis of ron-tal, leaf of the tal tree, a fan-palm whose leaves were once used for writing on, borassus flabelliformis." Ron is thus probably equivalent to the Malay dawn, or in some dialects don, "leaf." The tree itself is called p'hum (pohum) tar in the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, tar and tal being only variants of the same word. Scott, Malayan Words in English, p. 121, gives: "Lontar, a palm, dial. form of daun tal (tal, Hind.)." (See TODDY.)

LOOCHER, s. This is often used in Anglo-Ind. colloquial for a blackguard libertine, a lewd loafer. It is properly Hind. luchcha, having that sense. Orme seems to have confounded the word, more or less, with latiya (see under LOOTY). [A rogue in Pandurang Hari (ed. 1873, ii. 168) is Loochaja. The place at Matheran originally called "Louisa Point" has become "Loocha Point"]

LOONGHEER, s. Hind. lungi, perhaps originally Pers. lung and lungzi; [but Platte connects it with linga]. A scarf or web of cloth to wrap round the body, whether applied as what the French call pagne, i.e. a cloth simply wrapped once or twice round the hips and tucked in at the upper edge, which is the proper Mussulman mode of wearing it; or as a cloth tucked between the legs like a dhoty (q.v.), which is the Hindu mode, and often followed also by Mahomedans in India. The Qaunoon-i-Islam further distinguishes between the lungi and dhoti that the former is a coloured cloth worn as described, and the latter a cloth with only a coloured border, worn by Hindus alone. This explanation must belong to S. India. ["The lungi is really meant to be worn round the waist, and is very generally of a checked pattern, but it is often used as a paggi (see FUGGEY), more especially that known as the Kohat lungi" (Cookson, Mon. on Punjab Silk, 4). For illustrations of various modes of wearing the garment, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures and Costumes, pl. iii. iv.]

1663.—"Longui est une petite pièce de linge, dont les Indiens se servent à sacher les parties naturelles."—De la Boullaye-le-Gour, 525. But in the edition of 1657 it is given: "Longui est un morceau de linge dont l'on se sert au bain ou Turquie." (p. 547).

1673.—"The Elders sat in a Row, where the Men and Women came down together to wash, having Lungees about their Wastes only."—Fryer, 101. In the Index, Fryer explains as a "Waste-Clout." 1727.—"... For some coarse chequered Cloth, called Cambayas (see COMBOY), Lungees, made of Cotton-Yarn, the former would bring Elephant's Teeth."—A. Hamilton, i. 9; [ed. 1744].

..." (In Pegu) "Under the Flock they have a Scarf or Lungee doubled fourfold, made fast about the Middle..."—Ibid. ii. 49.

c. 1760.—"Instead of petticoats they wear what they call a loonges, which is simply a long piece of silk or cotton stuff."—Grose, i. 143.

c. 1809-10.—"Many use the Lunggi, a piece of blue cotton cloth, from 5 to 7 cubits long and 2 wide. It is wrapped simply two or three times round the waist, and hangs down to the knee."—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, iii. 102.

LOOT, s. & v. Plunder; Hind. lat, and that from Skt. lotra, for loptra, root lup, 'rob, plunder'; [rather luy, 'to rob']. The word appears in Stockdale's Vocabulary, of 1788, as "Loot—plunder, pillage." It has thus long been a familiar item in the Anglo-Indian colloquial. But between the Chinese War of 1841, the Crimean War (1854-5), and the Indian Mutiny (1857-8), it gradually found acceptance in England also, and is now a recognised constituent of the English Slang Dictionary. Admiral Smyth has it in his Nautical Glossary (1867) thus: "Loot, plunder, or pilillage, a term adopted from China."

1845.—St. Francis Xavier in a letter to a friend in Portugal admonishing him from encouraging any friend of his to go to India seems to have the thing Loot in his mind, though of course he does not use the word: "Neminem patiaris amicorum tuorum in Indiam cum Praesectura mitti, ad regias pecunias, et negotia tractanda semper, rapitur, congeritur, aufertur. Semel mirari, in tlwlitis flexionibus, innuspicatur.."

1857.—"A body of their Louchees (see LOOCHES) or plunderers, who are armed with clubs, pressed into the Company's service."

1875.—"'Loot' is a word of Hind. origin, and for a couple of centuries past . . . the looting of Delhi has been the daydream of the most patriotic among the Sikh race."—Bos. Smith's Life of Ld. Lawrence, ii. 246.

LOOTY, LOOTIEWALLA.

1878.—"The city (Hongkong) is now patrolled night and day by strong parties of marines and Sikhs, for both the disposition to loot and the facilities for lootings are very great."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 34.

1883.—"'Loot' is a word of Eastern origin, and for a couple of centuries past . . . the looting of Delhi has been the daydream of the most patriotic among the Sikh race."—E. S. Trollope's Narrative, p. 52.

b. A different word is the Ar.—Pers. lāṭīya, bearing a worse meaning, 'one of the people of Lot,' and more generally 'a blackguard.'

1884.—"They were singing, dancing, and making the Lati all the livelong day."

1858.—"The Loutis, who wandered from town to town with monkeys and other animals, taught them to cast earth upon their heads (a sign of the deepest grief among Asiatics) when they were asked whether they would be governors of Balkh or Akkheh."

1888.—"Monkeys and baboons are kept and trained by the Lattis, or professional
The people of Shiraz are noted for a fondness for jingling phrases, commonly among many Asiatics, including the people of India, where one constantly hears one's servants speak of chauki-aukti (for chairs and tables), nakur-chakar (where both are however real words), 'servants,' lakrai—lakri—'sticks and staves,' and so forth.

Regarding this Mr. Wills tells a story (Modern Persia, p. 239). The late Minister, Kawam-ud-Daulat, a Shirazi, was asked by the Shah:

"Why is it, Kawam, that you Shirazes always talk of Kabob-mabob and so on? You always add a nonsense-word; is it for euphony?"

"Oh, Asylum of the Universe, may I be your sacrifice! No respectable person in Shiraz does so, only the litte-patii says it!"

LOQUOT, LOQUAT. a. A sub-acid fruit, a native of China and Japan, which has been naturalised in India and in Southern Europe. In Italy it is called nespola giappones (Japan medlar). It is Kriobotrya japonica, Lindl. The name is that used in S. China, lu-kih, pron. at Canton lu-kunt, and meaning 'rush-orange.' Elsewhere in China it is called pi-pa.

1821. — "The Lasott is a Chinese fruit, not unlike a plum, was produced also in great plenty (at Bangalore); it is sweet when ripe, and both used for tarts, and eaten as dessert."—Boote, Missions in Madras and Mysore, 2nd ed. 159.

1878. — "... the yellow loquat, peach-skinned and pleasant, but prodigal of stones."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49.

c. 1880. — "A loquat tree in full fruit is probably a sight never seen in England before, but the phenomenon is now on view at Richmond. (This was in the garden of Lady Parker at Stawell House.) We are told that it has a fine crop of fruit, comprising about a dozen bunches, each bunch being of eight or ten beautiful berries..."—Newspaper cutting (source lost).

LORCHA. a. A small kind of vessel used in the China coasting trade. Giles explains it as having a hull of European build, but the masts and sails Chinese fashion, generally with a European skipper and a Chinese crew.

The word is said to have been introduced by the Portuguese from S. America (Giles, 81). But Pinto's passage shows how early the word was used in the China seas, a fact which throws doubt on that view. [Other suggestions are that it is Chinese lou-chien, a sort of fighting ship, or Port. luncha, our launch (2 N. & Q. iii. 217, 236).]

1540. — "Now because the Lorcha (lorcha), wherein Antonio de Para came from Patana leaked very much, he commanded all his soldiers to pass into another better vessel... and arriving at a River that about evening we found towards the East, he cast anchor a league out at Sea, by reason his Junk... drew much water, so that fearing the Sands... he sent Cristovono Borrallho with 14 Soldiers in the Lorcha up the River..."—Pinto (orig. cap. xlii.), Cogan, p. 50.

"‘C6 isto nos partemos deste lugar de Leito muyto embandeirados, como gavias toldadas de paços de seda, et os juncos e lorchas de duas odres de outrora por banda’—Pinto, ch. ivii. i.e. ‘And so we started from Leito all dressed out, the tops draped with silk, and the junks and lorchas with two tiers of banners on each side.'"

1813. — "And they use smaller vessels called lorchas and lyotylo (!), and these never use more than 2 oars on each side, which serve both for rudders and for oars in the river traffic."—Godinho de Breda, 1. 286.

1856. — "... Mr. Parkes reported to his superior, Sir John Bowring, at Hong Kong, the facts in connexion with an outrage which had been committed on a British-owned lorcha at Canton. The lorchas 'Arrow,' employed in the river trade between Canton and the mouth of the river, commanded by an English captain and flying an English flag, had been boarded by a party of Mandarins and their escort while at anchor near Dutch Folly."—Boulger, H. of China, 1854, iii. 396.

LOBY. a. A name given to various brilliantly-coloured varieties of parrot, which are found in the Moluccas and other islands of the Archipelago. The word is a corruption of the Malay nari, 'a parrot'; but the corruption seems not to be very old, as Fryer retains the correct form. Perhaps it came through the French (see Luillier below). [Mr. Skeat writes: "Larry is hardly a corruption of nari; it is rather a parallel form. The two forms appear in different dialects. Nari may have been first introduced, and Larry may be some dialectic form of it."] The first quotation shows that lories were imported into S. India as early as the 14th century. They are still imported thither, where they are called in the vernacular by a name signifying 'Five-coloured parrot.' [Can. panchavarnagini.] LOTIA, &c. a. A Chinese title of respect, used by the older writers on China for a Chinese official, much as we still use mandarin. It is now so obsolete that Giles, we see, omits it. "It would seem certain that this is the word given as follows in C. C. Baldwin's Manual of the Foochow Dialect: 'Lo-tia.' (in Mandarin Lao-tye) a general appellative used for an officer. It means 'Venerable Father' (p. 215). In the Court dialect Ta-lao-yie, 'Great Venerable Father' is the appellative used for any officer, up to the 4th rank. The ye of this expression is quite different from the tye or tia of the former" (Note by M. Terrien de la Couperie). Mr. Baber, after giving the same explanation from Carstairs Douglas's Amoy Dict., adds: "It would seem ludicrous to a Pekingese. Certain local functionaries (Prefects, Magistrates, &c.) are, however, universally known in China as Fu-mu-kuan, 'Parental Officers' (lit. 'Father-and-1650.—"Everyone that in China hath any office, command, or dignity by the King, is called Loutthia, which is to say with us Sector."—Vaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 109.

"I shall have occasion to speak of a certain Order of Gentlemen that are called Louties; I will first therefor expound what this word signifies. Loutes is as much as to say in our language as Syr. . . ."—Galeotto Perugia, by R. Willes, in Hakl. ii.; [ed. 1810, ii. 549].

1658.—"And although all the King’s officers and justices of what sort of administration they are, be generally called by the name of Loytia; yet euerie one hath a speciall and a particular name besides, according unto his office."—Mendoza, tr. by R. Parke, p. 101.

1598.—"Not any Man in China is esteemd or accounted of, for his birth, family, or riches, but onely for his learning and knowledge, such as they that serve at every tounes, and have the government of the same. They are called Lottias and Mandorijn."—Linhoten, 39; [Hakl. Soc. i. 133].

1681.—"They call . . . the lords and gentlemen Loytias. . . ."—Martines de la Fuente, Compendio, 26.

LOVE-BIRD, s. The bird to which this name is applied in Bengal is the pretty little lorieket, Loriculus vernalis, Sparrman, called in Hind. latkan or "pendant", because of its quaint habit of sleeping suspended by the claws, head downwards.

LOBBYE, LUBBE, s. [Tel. Labbi, Tam. Ilappai]; according to C. P. Brown and the Madras Gloss. a Dravidian corruption of ‘Arabi. A name given in S. India to a race, Mussulmans in creed, but speaking Tamil, supposed to be, like the Moplahs of the west coast, the descendants of Arab emigrants by inter-marriage with native women. "There are few classes of natives in S. India, who in energy, industry, and perseverance, can compete with the Lubbay"; they often, as pedlars, go about selling beads, precious stones, &c.

1810.—"Some of these (early emigrants from Kufa) landed on that part of the Western coast of India called the Conan; the others to the eastward of C. Comorin; the descendants of the former are the Neryayets; of the latter the Lubbe; a name probably given to them by the natives, from that Arabic particle (a modification of Lubbe) corresponding with the English here I am, indicating attention on being spoken to. The Lubbe pretend to one common origin with the Neryayets, and attribute their black complexion to inter-marriage with the natives; but the Neryayets affirm that the Lubbe are the descendants of their domestic slaves, and there is certainly in the physiognomy of this very numerous class, and in their stature and form, a strong resemblance to the natives of Abyssinia."—Wills, Hist. Sketches, i. 243.

1858.—"Mr. Boyd . . . describes the Moors under the name of Choitas (see CHOLIA); and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation of Lubbes. These epithets are however not admissible; for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter to the priests who officiate in their temples; and also as an honorary affix to the proper names of some of their chief men."—Simon Case Chitty on the Moors of Ceylon, in J.R. Asia. Soc. iii. 398.

1869.—"The Lubbels are a curious caste, said by some to be the descendants of Hindus forcibly converted to the Mahometan faith some centuries ago. It seems most probable, however, that they are of mixed blood. They are, comparatively, a fine strong active race, and generally contrive to keep themselves in easy circumstances. Many of them live by traffic. Many are smiths, and do excellent work as such. Others are fishermen, boatmen and the like. . . ."—Nelson, Madura Manual, Pt. ii. 86.

1869.—In a paper by Dr. Shortt it is stated that the Lubbays are found in large numbers on the East Coast of the Peninsula, between Pulica and Negapatam. Their headquarters are at Nagore, the burial place of their patron saint Nagori Mir Sahib. They excel as merchants, owing to their energy and industry. In Trans. Ethn. Soc. of London, N.S. vii. 189-190.

LUCKERBAUG, s. Hind. lakra, lagra, lakarbaghd, lagarbaghd, a hyena. The form lakarbaghd is not in the older dict. but is given by Platts. It is familiar in Upper India, and it occurs in Hickey’s Bengal Gazette, June 24, 1781. In some parts the name is applied to the leopard, as the extract from Buchanan shows. This is the case among the Hindi-speaking people of the Himalaya also (see Jerdon). It is not clear what the etymology of the name is, lakar, lakra meaning in their everyday sense, a stick or piece of timber. But both in Properly Lakhnau; the well-known capital of the Nawabs and Kings of Oudh, and the residence of the Chief Commissioner of that British Province, till the office was united to that of the Lieut.-Governor of the N.W. Provinces in 1877. [The name appears to be a corruption of the ancient Lakshmandvati, founded by Lakshmana, brother of Râmachandra of Ayodhya.]

1528. — "On Saturday the 28th of the latter Jezidi, I reached Lucknow; and having surveyed it, passed the river Gânti and encamped." — Bâder, p. 381.

1663. — "In Agra the Hollanderes have also an House. . . . LUGOW, TO, v. This is one of those imperatives transformed, in Anglo-Indian jargon, into infinitives, which are referred to under BUNOW.

PUCKEROW. H. inf. lagá-ná, imperative lagá-o. The meanings of lagána, as given by Shakespear, are:

"to apply, close, attach, join, fix, affix, acribe, impose, lay, add, place, put, plant, set, shut, spread, fasten, connect, plaster, put to work, employ, engage, use, impute, report anything in the way of scandal or malice" — in which long list he has omitted one of the most common uses of the verb, in its Anglo-Indian form lugow, which is "to lay a boat alongside the shore or wharf, to moor." The fact is that lagána is the active form of the neuter verb lag-ñ, 'to touch, lie, to be in contact with,' and used in all the neuter senses of which lagána expresses the transitive senses. Besides neuter lagána, active lagána, we have a secondary casual verb, lagwâna, 'cause to apply, &c. Lagm, lagána are presumably the same words as our lie, and lay, A.-S. liecan, and legan, mod. Germ. liegen and legen. And the meaning 'lay' underlies all the senses which Shakespeare gives of lagá-ná. [See Skeyt, Concise Etym. Dict. a.v. lie.]

LUMBERDAR, s. Hind. lumbardar, a word formed from the English word 'number' with the Pers. termination -dâr, and meaning properly 'the man who is registered by a number.' "The registered representative of a coparcenary community, who is responsible for Government revenue." (Carnegy). "The cultivator who, either on his own account or as the representative of other members of the village, pays the Government dues and is registered in the Collector's Roll according to his number; as the representative of the rest he may hold the office by descent or by election." (Wilson).

by Hindus, and identified with the monkey-god Hanumān. The genus is Presbytes, Illiger, of which several species are now discriminated, but the differences are small. [See Blanford, Mammalia, 27, who classes the Langur as Semnopithecus entellus.] The animal is well described by Aelian in the following quotation, which will recall to many what they have witnessed in the suburbs of Benares and other great Hindu cities. The Langur of the Prasii is P. Entellus.

c. 250.—"Among the Prasii of India they say that there exists a kind of ape with human intelligence. These animals seem to be about the size of Hyrcanian dogs. Their front hair looks all grown together, and any one who half the truth would say that it was dressed artificially. The beard is like that of a satyr, and the tail strong like that of a lion. All the rest of the body is white, but the head and the tail are red. These creatures are tame and gentle in character, but by race and manner of life they are wild. They go about in crowds in the suburbs of Lataç (now Latagā is a city of the Indians) and eat the boiled rice that is put out for them by the King's order. Every day their dinner is elegantly set out. Having eaten their fill it is said that they return to their parents in the woods in an orderly manner, and never hurt anybody that they meet by the way."—Aelian, De Nat. Animal. xvi. 10.

1825.—"An alarm was given by one of the sentries in consequence of a baboon drawing near his post. The character of the intruder was, however, soon detected by one of the Sepoys, who on the Sepoy's repeating his exclamation of the broken English 'Who goes ere!' said with a laugh, 'Why do you challenge the lungoor? he cannot answer you.'"—Beber, ii. 85.

1859.—"I found myself in immediate proximity to a sort of parliament or general assembly of the largest and most human-like monkeys I had ever seen. There were at least 200 of them, great lungoors, some quite four feet high, the jetty black of their faces enhanced by a fringe of snowy whisker."

—Levrin, A Fly on the Wheel, 49.

1884.—"Less interesting personally than the gibbon, but an animal of very developed social instincts, is Semnopithecus entellus, otherwise the Bengal LANGUR. (He) fights for his wives according to a custom not unheard of in other cases; but what is peculiar to him is that the vanquished males receive charge of all the young ones of their own sex, with whom they retire to some neighbouring jungle. Schoolmasters and private tutors will read this with interest, as showing the origin and early disabilities of their profession."—Saturday Rev., May 31, on Steddale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

LUNGOOTY, s. Hind. langūti. The original application of this word seems to be the scantiest modicum of covering worn for decency by some of the lower classes when at work, and tied before and behind by a string round the waist; but it is sometimes applied to the more ample dhoti (see DHOTY). According to R. Drummond, in Guzerat the "Langoth or Lungots" (as he writes) is "a pretty broad piece of cotton cloth, tied round the breech by men and boys bathing. . . . The diminutive is Langotee, a long slip of cloth, stitched to a loin band of the same stuff, and forming exactly the T bandage of English Surgeons. . . ." This distinction is probably originally correct, and the use of langūta by Abdurrazzāk would agree with it. The use of the word has spread to some of the Indo-Chinese countries. In the quotation from Mocquet it is applied in speaking of an American Indian near the R. Amazon. But the writer had been in India.

c. 1422.—"The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked; they wear only bandages round the middle called lankontah, which descend from the navel to above the knee."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in XV. Cent. 17.

1526.—"Their peasants and the lower classes all go about naked. They tie on a thing which they call a langōti, which is a piece of clout that hangs down two spans from the navel, as a cover to their nakedness. Below this a pendant modesty-clout is another slip of cloth, one end of which they fasten before to a string that ties on the langōti, and then passing the slip of cloth between the two legs, bring it up and fix it to the string of the langōti behind."—Babur, 383.

c. 1609.—"Leur capitaine aout fort bonne façon, encore qu'il fust tout nud et luy seul aout vn langoutin, qui est vn petite piece de coton peinte."—Mocquet, 77.

"They wear nothing but the langouty, which is a string round the loins, and a piece of cloth about a hand's breadth fastened to it in front."—(Ref. loc.), p. 28.
LUNKA, n.p. Skt. Laśka. The oldest name of Ceylon in the literature both of Buddhism and Brahmanism. Also 'an island' in general.

—s. A kind of strong cheroot much prized in the Madras Presidency, and so called from being made of tobacco grown in the 'islands' (the local term for which is laśka) of the Godavery Delta.

M

MĀ-BĀP, s. 'Āp mā-bēp hai khuddāvand! ' You, my Lord, are my mother and father!' This is an address from a native, seeking assistance, or begging release from a penalty, or reluctant to obey an order, which the young sāhib hears at first with astonishment, but soon as a matter of course.

MĀBAR, n.p. The name given in the Middle Ages by the Arabs to that coast of India which we call Coremandel. The word is Ar. ma'bar, 'the ferry or crossing-place.' It is not clear how the name came to be applied, whether because the Arab vessels habitually touched at its ports, or because it was the place of crossing to Ceylon, or lastly whether it was not an attempt to give meaning to some native name. [The Madras Gloss says it was so called because it was the place of crossing from Madura to Ceylon; also see Logan, Malabar, i. 280.] We know no occurrence of the term earlier than that which we give from Abdallatif.

c. 1203. — "I saw in the hands of an Indian trader very beautiful mats, finely woven and painted on both sides with most pleasing colours. . . . The merchant told me . . . that these mats were woven of the Indian plantain . . . and that they sold in Mābar for two dinars apiece."—Abdallatif, Relation de l'Égypte, p. 31.

c. 1279-86. — In M. Pauthier's notes on Marco Polo very curious notices are extracted from Chinese official annals regarding the communications, in the time of Kublai Kaan, between that Emperor and Indian States, including Ma-pa-rh. —(See pp. 600-605.)

c. 1292. — "When you leave the Island of Seilan and sail westward about 60 miles, you come to the great province of Mābar, which is styled India the Greater: it is the best of all the Indies, and is on the mainland."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 16.

c. 1300. — "The merchants export from Mābar silk-en stuffs, aromatic roots; large pearls are brought from the sea. The productions of this country are carried to Iran, Khurasan, Syria, Russia and Europe."—Rashidudin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1303. — "In the beginning of this year (703 H.), the Maliki-'Azam, Tākit-d-din . . . departed from the country of Hind to the passage (ma'bar) of corruption. The King of Mābar was anxious to obtain his property and wealth, but Malik Mu'azzam Siraj-d-din, son of the deceased, having secured his goodwill, by the payment of 200,000 dinârs, not only obtained the wealth, but rank also of his father."—Wazīfī, in Elliot, iii. 48.

1310. — "The country of Mābar, which is so distant from Delhi that a man travelling with all expedition could only reach it after a journey of 12 months, there the arrow of any holy warrior had not yet reached."—Amir Khusrau, in Elliot, iii. 85.

1330. — "The third part (of India) is Mābar, which begins some three or four days journey to the eastward of Kaulam; this territory lies to the east of Malabar. . . . It is stated that the territory Mābar begins at the Cape Kumhari, a parish on Cape Kumhari, a parish which applies both to a mountain and a city. . . . Bīyārdāwal is the residence of the Prince of Mābar, for whom horses are imported from foreign countries."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, p. 185. We regret to see that M. Guyard, in his welcome completion of Reinaud's translation of Abulfeda, absolutely, in some places, substitutes "Coromandel" for "Mābar." It is French fashion, but a bad one.

MACAO, n.p.

The name applied by the Portuguese to the small peninsula and the city built on it, near the mouth of Canton River, which they have occupied since 1557. The place is called by the Chinese Nga-o-mân (Ngao, 'bay or inlet,' Mân, 'gate'). The Portuguese name is alleged to be taken from A-mā-ngo, 'the Bay of Ama,' i.e. of the Mother, the so-called "Queen of Heaven," a patroness of seamen. And indeed Macao is an old form often met with.

c. 1557. — "Hanno i Portoghesi fatta vna piccola cittadé in vna isola vicina a' i titi della Chinesa chiamato Macao... ma i dati sono del Re della Chinesa, che vanno a pagari a Canton, bellissima cittadé, e di grande importanza, distante da Macao due giorni e mezzo." — Cesare de' Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

c. 1570. — "On the fifth day of our voyage it pleased God that we arrived at... Lammaou, where at that time the Portuguese exercised their commerce with the Chineses, which continued till the year 1557, when the Mandarin of Canton, at the request of the Merchants of that Country, gave us the port of Macao, where the trade now is; of which place (that was but a desert Island before) our countrymen made a very goodly plantation, wherein there were houses worth three or four thousand Ducks, together with a Cathedral Church...." — Pinto, in Cogn, p. 315.

1584. — "There was in Macao a religious man of the order of the barefoot friars of St. Francis, who understanding the great and good desire of this king, did send him by certaine Portuguese merchants... a cloth whereon was painted the day of judgement and hell, and that by an excellent workman." — Mendoca, ii. 394.

1585. — "They came to Macao, in July, 1585. At the same time it seasonably happened that Limnan was commanded from the court to procure of the Strangers at Macao, certaine goodly feathers for the King." — For the Jesuit Accounts, in Purchas, iii. 330.

b. MACAO, MACCAO, was also the name of a place on the Pegu River which was the port of the city so called in the day of its greatness. A village of the name still exists at the spot.

1554. — "The baer (see BAHAR) of Macao contains 120 biças, each biça 100 ticals (q.v.)..." — A. Nunes, p. 39.

1568. — "Si fa commodamente il viaggio sino a Macao distante da Pegu dodec miglia, e qui si sbarca." — Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 395.

1587. — "From Cirion we went to Macao, &c." — R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 391. (See DELING).

1599. — "The King of Arracan is now ending his business at the Town of Macao, carrying thence the Silver which the King of Tanya had left, exceeding three millions." — N. Pimenta, in Purchas, iii. 1748.

MACAREO. a. A term applied by old voyagers to the phenomenon of the bore, or great tidal wave as seen especially in the Gulf of Cambay, and in the Sitang Estuary in Pegu. The word is used by them as if it were an Oriental word. At one time we were disposed to think it might be the Skt. word makara, which is applied to a mythological sea-monster, and to the Zodiacal sign Capricorn. This might easily have had a mythological association with the furious phenomenon in question, and several of the names given to it in various parts of the world seem due to associations of a similar kind. Thus the old English word Oegir or Eagra for the bore on the Severn, which occurs in Dryton, "seems to be a reminiscence of the old Scandianvian deity Oegir, the god of the stormy sea." [This theory is rejected by N.E.D. a.v. Eagra.] One of the Hindi names for the phenomenon is Mendhot, 'The Ram'; whilst in modern Guzerat, according to R. Drummond, the natives call it ghord, "likening it to the war horse, or a squadron of them."† But nothing could illustrate the naturalness of such a figure as makara, applied to the bore, better than the following paragraph in the review-article just quoted (p. 401), which was evidently penned without any allusion to or suggestion of such an origin of the name, and which indeed makes no reference to the Indian name, but only to the French names of which we shall presently speak:

"Compared with what it used to be, if old descriptions may be trusted, the Mascaret is now stripped of its terrors. It resembles the great nature-force which used to ravage the valley of the Seine, like one of the mythical dragons which, as legends tell, laid whole districts waste, about as much as a lion confined in a cage resembles the free monarch of the African wilderness."

Take also the following:

1886.—"Here at his mouth Father Moghna is 20 miles broad, with islands on his breast as large as English counties, and a great tidal bore which made a daily and ever-varying excitement. ... In deep water, it passed merely as a large rolling bellow; but in the shallows it rushed along, roaring like a crested and devouring monster, before which no small craft could live."—Ld. Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 161-162.

But unfortunately we can find no evidence of the designation of the phenomenon in India by the name of makara or the like; whilst both mascaret (as indicated in the quotation just made) and macare are found in French as terms for the bore. Both terms appear to belong properly to the Garonne, though mascaret has of late began on the Seine to supplant the old term baffe, which is evidently the same as our bore. [The N.E.D. suggests O. N. bāra, 'wave.' Littre can suggest no etymology for mascaret; he mentions a whimsical one which connects the word with a place on the Garrone called St. Macaire, but only to reject it. There would be no impossibility in the transfer of an Indian word of this kind to France, any more than in the other alternative of the transfer of a French term to India in such a way that in the 16th century visitors to that country should have regarded it as an indigenous word, if we had but evidence of its Indian existence. The date of Littre's earliest quotation, which we borrow below, is also unfavourable to the probability of transplantation from India. There remains the possibility that the word is Basque. The Saturday Reviewer already quoted says that he could find nothing approaching to Mascaret in a Basque French Dict., but this hardly seems final.

The vast rapidity of the flood-tide in the Gulf of Cambay is mentioned by Mag'udi, who witnessed it in the year H. 303 (A.D. 916) i. 255; also less precisely by Ibn Batuta (iv. 60). There is a paper on it in the Bo. Govt. Selections, N.S. No. xxi., from which it appears that the bore wave reaches a velocity of 10 to 15 knots. [See also Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd. ed. i. 313.]

1558.—"In which time there came hither (to Diu) a concourse of many vessels from the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and all the coast of Arabia and India, so that the places within the Gulf of Cambay, which had become rich and noble by trade, were by this port undone. And this because it stood outside of the Macareos of the Gulf of Cambay, which were the cause of the loss of many ships."—Barros, ii. cap 9.

1568.—"These Sholde (G. of Cambay) are an hundred and foure-score miles about in a straight or gulfe, which they call Macareo (Macareo in orig.) which is as much as tosay a race of a Tide."—Master C. Frederick, Hakl. ii. 492; [and comp. ii. 362].

1583.—"And having sailed until the 23d of the said month, we found ourselves in the neighbourhood of the Macareo (of Martaban) which is the most marvellous thing that ever was heard in the way of tides, and high waters. ... The water in the channel rises to the height of a high tree, and then the boat is set to face it, waiting for the fury of the tide, which comes on with such violence that the noise is that of a great earthquake, insomuch that the boat is tossed from stem to stern, and carried by that impulse swiftly up the channel."—Gasparo Balbi, ff. 91v, 92.

1618.—"The Macareo of waves is a disturbance of the sea, like water boiling, in which the sea casts up its waves in foam. For the space of an Italian mile, and within that distance only, this boiling and foaming occurs, whilst all the rest of the sea is smooth and waveless as a pond. ... And the stories of the Malays assert that it is caused by souls that are passing the Ocean from one region to another, or going in canfias from the Golden Chersonesus ... to the river Ganges."—Godinho de Eredia, t. 41v. [See Sted, Malay Magic, 10 seq.]

1644.—"... thence to the Gulf of Cambay with the impetuosity of the currents which are called Macareo, of whose fiery strange things are told, insomuch that a stone thrown with force from the hand even in the first speed of its projection does not move more swiftly than those waters run."—Bocarro, M.S.

1727.—"A Body of Waters comes rolling in on the Sand, whose Front is above two Fathoms high, and whatever Body lies in its Way it overthrows, and no Ship can evade its Force, but in a Moment is overturned, this violent Boer the Natives called a Macareo."—A. Hamilton, ii. 33; [ed. 1744, ii. 32].

1811.—Salvyns use the word Macare as French for 'Bore,' and in English describes his print as "... the representation of a phenomenon of Nature, the Macée or tide, at the mouth of the river Ougly."——Les Hindous, iii.

MACASSAR, n.p. In Malay Mangkasar, properly the name of a people of Celebes (q.v.), but now the name of a Dutch seaport and seat of Government on the W. coast of the S.W. peninsula of that spider-like island. The last quotation refers to a time when we occupied the place, an episode of Anglo-Indian history almost forgotten.

[1664-5—"... and anon to Gresham College, where, among other good discourse, there was tried the great poysion of Macassau upon a dogg, but it had no effect all the time we sat there."—Pepys, Diary, March 15; ed. Wheatley, iv. 382.]

1616.—"Letters from Macassar of the 20th and 27th of June (1615), communicate the melancholy intelligence of the death of Lieut. T. C. Jackson, of the 1st Regt. of Native Bengal Infantry, and Assistant Resident of Macassar, during an attack on a fortified village, dependent on the dethroned Raja of Boni."——As. Journal, i. 297.

MACE. a.

The crimson net-like mantle, which envelopes the hard outer shell of the nutmeg, when separated and dried constitutes the mace of commerce. Hanbury and Flückiger are satisfied that the attempt to identify the Macir, Macer, &c., of Pliny and other ancients with mace is a mistake, as indeed the sagacious Garcia also pointed out, and Chr. Acosta still more precisely. The name does not seem to be mentioned by Asculapius; it is not in the list of aromaticas, 25 in number, which he details (i. 367). It is mentioned by Edrisi, who wrote c. 1150, and whose information generally was of much older date, though we do not know what word he uses. The fact that nutmeg and mace are the product of one plant seems to have led to the fiction that clove and cinnamon also came from that same plant. It is, however, true that a kind of aromatic bark was known in the Arab pharmacopoeia of the Middle Ages under the name of Ḳufat-al-ḳarafūf or 'bark of clove,' which may have been either a cause of the mistake or a part of it. The mistake in question, in one form or another, prevailed for centuries. One of the authors of this book was asked many years ago by a respectable Mahommamedan of Delhi if it were not the case that cinnamon, clove, and nutmeg were the produce of one tree. The prevalence of the mistake in Europe is shown by the fact that it is contradicted in a work of the 16th century (Bodaei, Comment. in Theophrastum, 992); and by the quotation from Funnel.

The name mace may have come from the Ar. ababūsa, possibly in some confusion with the ancient macir. [See Skeat, Concise Dict. who gives F. macis, which was confused with M. F. macer, probably Lat. macer, macir, doubtless of Eastern origin.]

[1150.—"On its shores (i.e. of the sea of Sanf or Champa), are the dominions of a King called Mihrab, who possesses a great number of populous and fertile islands, covered with fields and pastures, producing ivory, camphor, nutmeg, mace, clove, aloeswood, cardamom, cubeb, &c."——Edrisi, i. 89; see also 51.]

1347.—"The fruit of the clove is the nutmeg, which we know as the scented nut. The flower which grows upon it is the mace (babāsa). And this is what I have seen with my own eyes."——Ibn Batuta, iv. 243.

1370.—"A great Yle and great Countree, that men clepen Java. . . . There growen alle manere of Spicerie more plentifous thiche than in any other countree of China, of Gyngevera, Clowegyllofres, Canele, Zedowalles, Notemuges, and Maces. And wythe the wel, that the Notemuge bereth the Maces. For righthe as the Note of the Haselle hath an Husk withouten, that the Note is closed in, til it be ripe, and after felleth out; righthe so it is of the Notemuge and of the Maces."——Sir John Maunderstone, ed. 1666, p. 137-138. This is a remarkable passage for it is interpolated by Maunderstone, from superior information, in what he is borrowing from Odoric. The comparison to the hazel-nut husk is just that used by Hanbury & Flückiger (Pharmacographia, 1st ed. 450).]

1480.—"Has (insulæ Java) ultra xv dieorum cursu duse reperientur insulæ, orientem versus. Altera Sandal appendit, in quæ nucis muscatae et maces, altera Bandam nomine, in quæ sólæ garofali producuntur."——Conti, in Poggius, De Var Variae.
MACE.

that when the nut is ripe it swells, and the first cover bursts as do the husks of our chestnuts, and shows the mace, of a bright vermilion like fine grain (i.e. cocco); it is the most beautiful sight in the world when the trees are loaded with it, and sometimes the mace splits off, and that is why the nutmegs often come without the mace."—

Garcia, t. 129v-130.

[1602-3.—"In your Provision you shall make in Nutmegs and Mace have you a great care to receive such as be good."—

Birdwood, First Letter Book, 86; also see 67.]

1706.—"It is the commonly received opinion that Cloves, Nutmegs, Mace, and Chinnamon all grow upon one tree; but it is a great mistake."—Punnet, in Dampier, iv. 179.

MACE, a.

b. Jav. and Malay mda. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Mda is really short for omda or emda, one of those curious forms with prefixed a, as in the case of abada, which are probably native, but may have been influenced by Portuguese."] A weight used in Sumatra, being, according to Crawfurd, 1-16th of a Malay tael (q.v.), or about 40 grains (but see below). Mace is also the name of a small gold coin of Achin, weighing 9 grs. and worth about 1s. 1d. And mace was adopted in the language of European traders in China to denominate the tenth part of the Chinese liang or tael of silver; the 100th part of the same value being denominated in like manner candraeen (q.v.). The word is originally Skt. madha, 'a bean,' and then 'a particular weight of gold' (comp. CARAT, BUTTEE).

1589.—"... by intervention of this thirdsman whom the Moor employed as broker they agreed on my price with the merchant at seven mases of gold, which in our money makes a 1400 reys, at the rate of a half cruzado the mase."—Pinto, cap. xxv.

Cogan has, "the fishermen sold me to the merchant for seven mases of gold, which amounted in our money to seventeen shillings and sixpence."—p. 31.

1554.—"The weight with which they weigh (at Malacca) gold, musk, seed-pearl, coral, calabuco ... consists of cates which contain 20 taels, each tael 16 masses, each mass 20 cunydryns. Also one pawal 4 masses, one mass 4 cudes, see KOBANG), one cude 5 cunydryns (see CANDAREEN)."—

A. Nunes, 89.

1598.—"Likewise a Tael of Malacca is 16 Masses."—Linchothen, 44; [Hak. Soc. I. 149].

1599.—"Besar sive Bazar (i.e. Besoar, q.v.) per Masses venditur."—De Bry, ii. 64.

1625.—"I have also sent by Master Tomkins of their coin (Achin) ... that is of gold named a Mase, and is ninepence-halfpence nearest."—Capt. T. Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

1813.—"Milburn gives the following table of weights used at Achin, but it is quite inconsistent with the statements of Crawford and Linschoten above.

4 copangs = 1 mace
5 maces = 1 mayam
16 mayam = 1 tale
5 tales = 1 banca
20 bancas = 1 catty
200 catties = 1 behar.

Milburn, ii. 328. [Mr. Skeat notes that here "copang" is Malay kwapang; tale, tali = banca, bongkal.]

MACHEEN, MAHACHEEN, n.p.

This name, Mahā-chīna, "Great China," is one by which China was known in India in the early centuries of our era, and the term is still to be heard in India in the same sense in which Albirdini uses it, saying that all beyond the great mountains (Himalaya) is Mahā-chīn. But "in later times the majority, not knowing the meaning of the expression, seem to have used it pleonastically coupled with Chin, to denote the same thing, Chin and Macheen, a phrase having some analogy to the way Sind and Hind was used to express all India, but a stronger one to Gog and Magog, as applied to the northern nations of Asia." And eventually Chin was discovered to be the eldest son of Japhet, and Macheen his grandson; which is much the same as saying that Britain was the eldest son of Brut the Trojan, and Great Britain his grandson! (Cathay and the Way Thereto, p. cxix.).

In the days of the Mongol supremacy in China, when Chinese affairs were for a time more distinctly conceived in Western Asia, and the name of Manas as denoting Southern China, unconquered by the Mongols till 1275, was current in the West, it would appear that this name was confounded with Macheen, and the latter thus acquired a specific but erroneous application. One author of the 16th century also (quoted by Klaproth, J. As. Soc. ser. 2, tom. i. 115) distinguishes Chin and Macheen as N. and S. China, but this distinction seems never to have been entertained by the Hindus. Ibn Batuta sometimes distinguishes Sin (i.e. Chin) as South China from Khitai (see CATHAY) as North China. In times when intimacy with China had again ceased, the double name seems to have recovered its old vagueness as a rotund way of saying China, and had no more plurality of sense than in modern parlance Soder and Man. But then comes an occasional new application of Machin to Indo-China, as in Conti (followed by Fra Mauro). An exceptional application, arising from the Arab habit of applying the name of a country to the capital or the chief port frequented by them, arose in the Middle Ages, through which Canton became known in the West as the city of Machin, or in Persian translation Chinkalân, i.e. Great Chin.

Mahachina as applied to China:

636. — "In what country exists the kingdom of the Great Thang?" asked the king (Shâdiya of Kanaou), how far is it from this?

"It is situated," replied he (Hwen T'sang), to the N.E. of this kingdom, and is distant several ten-thousands of li. It is the country which the Indian people call Mahâchina." — Pli. Bouddh. ii. 254-255.

c. 641. — "Machochitan." See quotation under CHINA.

c. 1090. — "Some other mountains are called Hamarkit, in which the Ganges has its source. These are impassable from the side of the cold regions, and beyond them lies Mahâchinni." — Al-Birżûtî, in Elîjîlî, i. 46.

1501. — In the Letter of Amerigo Vespucci on the Portuguese discoveries, written from C. Verde, 4th June, we find mention among other new regions of Marchân. Published in Baldelli Boni's Il Milione, p. cii.

c. 1590. — "Adjoining to Asham is Tibet, bordering upon Khâtaï, which is properly Mâhachîn, vulgarly called Machen. The capital of Khâtaï is Khan Bâlgh, a 4 days' journey from the sea." — Ayeen, by Uladînî, ed. 1800, ii. 4; [ed. Jarret, ii. 118].

c. 1665. — "... you told me... that Persia, Uzbec, Khâchërim, Tartary, and Câtag, Pegu, Siam, China and Machchina (in origin, Tchîne et Machchine) trembled at the name of the Kings of the Indies." — Bernier, ed. Constable, 155 seq.

Applied to Southern China.

c. 1300. — "Khatâî is bounded on one side by the country of Mâchinch, which the Chinese call Mansi. In the Indian language S. China is called Mahâ-chîn, i.e. 'Great China,' and hence we derive the word Manzi." — Rashid-ud-dînî, in H. des Mongols (Quatre-âme), xci.-xcli.

c. 1845. — "It was the Kasm's orders that we should proceed through Manzi, which was formerly known as India Maxima" (by which he indicates Mahâchîn, see below; in last quotation). — John Marignoli, in Cathay, p. 364.

Applied to Indo-China:

Chin and Machin:

c. 1320. — "The curiosities of Chin and Machin, and the beautiful products of Hind and Sindi." — Wassaf, in Elîjîlî, iii. 32.

c. 1440. — "Poì si ritrovà in quella istessa provincia di Zagatai Sanmarscatt città grandissima e ben popolata, per la quali vanno e vengono tutti quelli di Çint e Macînì e del Cataio, o mercanti o viandanti che siano." — Barbaro, in Ramusio, ii. f. 106x.

c. 1442. — "The merchants of the 7 climates from Egypt... from the whole of the realm of Chin and Machin, and from the city of Khân-bâtîk, steer their course to this port." — Abûrûzzakî, in Notices et Extraits, xiv. 429.

[1508. — "Sin and Masin." See under JAVA.]

Mahâchin or Chin Kalân, for Canton.

c. 1030. — In Sprenger's extracts from Al-Biržûtî, we have "Sharbîshá, in Chinese Senfî. This is Great China (Mâhâchîn)." — Post et Reise-routen des Orientes, 90.

c. 1300. — "... this canal extends for a distance of 40 days' navigation from Khân-bâtîk to Kingsal and Zaitûn, the ports frequented by the ships that come from India, and from the city of Machin." — Rashîd-ud-dînî, in Cathay, &c., 259-260.

c. 1332. — "... after I had sailed eastward over the Ocean Sea for many days I came to that noble province Mânsi. The first city to which I came in this country was called Cans-Kalân, and 'tis a city as big as three Venices." — Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 103-105.

c. 1347. — "... in the evening we stopped at another village, and so on till we arrived at Sin-Kalân, which is the city of Sin-ul-Şîm... one of the greatest of cities, and one of those that has the finest of bazaars. One of the largest of these is the porcelain bazaar, and from it china-ware is exported to the other cities of China, to India, and to Yemen." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 272.

c. 1349. — "The first of these is called Manzi, the greatest and noblest province in the world, having no paragon in beauty, pleasantness, and extent. In it is that noble city of Campsây, besides Zayton, Cynkalân, and many other cities." — John Marignoli, in Cathay, &c., 373.

MÁCHIS, a. This is recent Hind. for 'lucifer matches.' An older and purer phrase for sulphur-matches is dasdâ-, dîydâ-sâldî.

MADAPOLLAM, n.p. This term, applying to a particular kind of cotton cloth, and which often occurs in prices current, is taken from the name of a place on the Southern Delta-branch of the Godavery, properly Madhavapalam, [Tel. Madhavayya-palemu, 'fortified village of Madhava']. This was till 1833 [according to the Madras Gloss. 1827] the seat of one of the Company's Commercial Agencies, which was the chief of three in that Delta; the other two being Bunder Malunaka and Injeram. Madapollam is now a staple export from England to India; it is a finer kind of white piece-goods, intermediate between calico and muslin.

—Duayer, Letters, i. 74.]

1673.—"The English for that cause (the unhealthiness of Masulipatam), only at the time of shipping, remove to Medopolon, where they have a wholesome Seat Forty Miles more north."—Fryer, 35.

[1684-85.—"Mr. Benja Northeay having brought up Musters of the Madapollam Cloth, It is thought convenient that the same be taken of him.

Pringle, Diary Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 49.]

a. 1840.—"Pierrette est de jolies chemises en Madapollam."—Balsac, Pierrette.

1879.—"Its liveliness seems to be the unfailing characteristic of autographs, fans, Cremona fiddles, Louis Quatorze snuff-boxes, and the like, however sluggish pig-iron and Madapolam may be."—Sat. Review, Jan. 11, p. 45.

MADRAFAXAO, a. This appears in old Portuguese works as the name of a gold coin of Guzerat; perhaps representing MuzAFFAR-shahi. There were several kings of Guzerat of this name. The one in question was probably MuzAFFAR-Shah II. (1511-1525), of whose coinage Thomas mentions a gold piece of 185 grs. (Pathán Kings, 353).

1654.—"There also come to this city Madrafasas, which are a money of Cambayas, which vary greatly in price; some are of 24 tanges of 60 reis the tange, others of 22, 21, and other prices according to time and value."—A. Nunez, 82.

MADRAS, n.p. This alternative name of the place, officially called by its founders Fort St. George, first appears about the middle of the 17th century. Its origin has been much debated, but with little result. One derivation, backed by a fictitious legend, derives the name from an imaginary Christian fisherman called Madarase; but this may be pronounced philologically impossible, as well as otherwise unworthy of serious regard. Lassen makes the name to be a corruption of Manda-raja, 'Realm of the Stupid.' No one will suspect the illustrious author of the Indische Alterthumskunde to be guilty of a joke; but it does look as if some malign Bengalee had suggested to him this gibe against the "Benighted!" It is indeed curious and true that, in Bengal, sepoys and the like always speak of the Southern Presidency as Mandari. In fact, however, all the earlier mentions of the name are in the form of Madraspatanam, 'the city of the Madras,' whatever the Madras may have been. The earliest maps show Madraspatanam as the Mahomedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah. The word is therefore probably of Mahomedan origin; and having got so far we need not hesitate to identify it with Madrasa, 'a college.' The Portuguese wrote this Madarasa (see Faria y Sousa, Africa Portuguesa, 1681, p. 6); and the European name probably came from them, close neighbours as they were to Fort St. George, at Mylapore or San Thomé. That there was such a Madras in existence is established by the quotation from Hamilton, who was there about the end of the 17th century. Fryer's Map (1698, but illustrating 1672-73) represents the Governor's House as a building of Mahomedan architecture, with a dome. This may have been the Madrasa itself. Lockyer also (1711) speaks of a "College," of which the building was "very ancient"; formerly a hospital, and then used apparently as a residence for young writers. But it is not clear whether the name "College" was not given on this last account. [The Madras Admin. Man. says: "The origin of this name has been much discussed. Madrisas, a Mahomedan school, has been suggested, which considering the date at which the name is first found seems fanciful. Manda is in Sanscrit 'slow.' Mandaraz was a king of the lunar race.

* It is given in No. II. of Selections from the Records of S. Aroot District, p. 107.
† In a letter from poor Arthur Burnell, on which this paragraph is founded, he says: "It is said that the most Philistine town (in the German sense) in all the East should have such a name."
The place was probably called after this king” (ii. 91). The Madras Gloss. again writes: “Hind. Madra, Can. Madar, from Tel. Mandaradu, name of a local Telegu Royer,” or ruler. The whole question has been discussed by Mr. Pringle (Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 106 seqq.). He points out that while the earliest quotation given below is dated 1653, the name, in the form Madraspatam, is used by the President and Council of Surat in a letter dated 29th December, 1640 (I. O. Records, O. C. No. 1764); “and the context makes it pretty certain that Francis Day or some other of the factors at the new Settlement must have previously made use of it in reference to the place, or ‘rather,’ as the Surat letter says, ‘plot of ground’ offered to him. It is no doubt just possible that in the course of the negotiations Day heard or caught up the name from the Portuguese, who were at the time in friendly relations with the English; but the probabilities are certainly in the opposite direction. The nayak from whom the plot was obtained must almost certainly have supplied the name, or what Francis Day conceived to be the name. Again, as regards Hamilton’s mention of a ‘college,’ Sir H. Yule’s remark certainly goes too far. Hamilton writes, ‘There is a very Good Hospital in the Town, and the Company’s Horse-stables are neat, but the old College where a good many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is ill-kept in repair.’ This remark taken together with that made by Lockyer ... affords proof, indeed, that there was a building known to the English as the ‘College.’ But it does not follow that this, or any, building was distinctively known to Musulmans as the ‘madrasa.’ The ‘old College’ of Hamilton may have been the successor of a Musulman ‘madrasa’ of some size and consequence, and if this was so the argument for the derivation would be strengthened. It is however equally possible that some old buildings within the plot of territory acquired by Day, which had never been a ‘madrasa,’ was turned to use as a College or place where the young writers should live and receive instruction; and in this case the argument, so far as it rests on a mention of ‘a College’ by Hamilton and Lockyer, is entirely destroyed. Next as regards the probability that the first part of ‘Madraspatanam’ is ‘of Mahomedan origin,’ Sir H. Yule does not mention that date of the maps in which Madraspatanam is shown as the Mahomedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah; but in Fryer’s map, which represents the fort as he saw it in 1672, the name ‘Madras’—to which is added the ‘Indian Town with flat houses’—is entered as the designation of the collection of houses on the north side of the English town, and the next makes it evident that in the year in question the name of Madras was applied chiefly to the crowded collection of houses styled in turn the ‘Heathen,’ the ‘Malabar,’ and the ‘Black’ town. This consideration does not necessarily disprove the supposed Musulman origin of ‘Madras,’ but it undoubtedly weakens the chain of Sir H. Yule’s argument. Mr. Pringle ends by saying: “On the whole it is not unfair to say that the chief argument in favour of the derivation adopted by Sir H. Yule is of a negative kind. There are fatal objections to whatever other derivations have been suggested, but if the mongrel character of the compound ‘Madraspatanam’ is disregarded, there is no fatal objection to the derivation from ‘madrasa.’ . . . If however that derivation is to stand, it must not rest upon such accidental coincidences as the use of the word ‘College’ by writers whose knowledge of Madras was derived from visits made from 30 to 50 years after the foundation of the colony.”] chiefly garrisoned by Teotopas and Miskites; from this place they annually send forth their ships, as also from Suratte."—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 152.

1726.—"The Town or Place, anciently called Chinapatnam, now called Madraspatnam, and Fort St. George."—Letters Patent, in Charters of H.I. Company, 368-9.

1737.—"Fort St. George or Madras, or as the Natives call it, China Patam, is a Colony and City belonging to the English East India Company, situated in one of the most commodious Places I ever saw.... There is a very good Hospital in the Town, and the Company's Horse-Stables are neat, but the Old College, where a great many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is kept in ill Repair."—A. Hamilton, i. 364, [ed. 1744, ii. 182]. (Also see CHINAPATAM.)

MADRAS. a. This name is applied to large bright-coloured handkerchiefs, of silk warp and cotton woof, which were formerly exported from Madras, and much used by the negroes in the W. Indies as head-dresses. The word is preserved in French, but is now obsolete in England.

c. 1830.—"... We found President Petion, the black Washington, sitting on a very old ragged sofa, amidst a confused mass of papers, dressed in a blue military undress frock, white trousers, and the everlasting Madras handkerchief bound round his brows."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1862, p. 425.

1846.—"Et Madame se manifeste! C'était une de ces vieilles déviées par Adrien Brauwer dans ses sociétés pour le Sabbat... coiffées d'un Madras, faisant encore papillotes avec les imprimes, que recevait gratuitement son maître."—Balzac, Le Cousin Pons, ch. xviii.

MADREMALUCO, n.p. The name given by the Portuguese to the Mahommnedan dynasty of Berar, called 'Imadshahi. The Portuguese name represents the title of the founder 'Imad-ul-Mulk, ('Pillar of the State'), otherwise Fath Ullah 'Imad Shah. The dynasty was the most obscure of those founded upon the dissolution of the Bahmani monarchy in the Deccan. (See COTAMALUCO, IDALCAN, MELIQUE VERIDO, NIZAMALUCO, SABAJO.) It began about 1484, and in 1572 was merged in the kingdom of Ahmednagar. There is another Madremaluco ('Imad-ul-Mulk) much spoken of in Portuguese histories, who was an important personage in Guzerat, and put to death with his own hand the king Sikandar Shab (1528) (Barros, IV. v. 3; Correia, ii. 272, 344, &c.; Couto, Deca v. and vi. passim).

1563.—"The Madre Maluco was married to a sister of the Hidalcan (see IDALCAN), and the latter treated this brother-in-law of his, and Melineque Verido as if they were his vassals, especially the latter."—Barros, IV. vii. 1.

1568.—"The Imadmaluco or Madremaluc, as we corruptly style him, was a Circassian (Cherques) by nation, and had originally been a Christian, and died in 1546. 'Imam is as much as to say 'prop,' and thus the other (of these princes) was called Imadmaluco, or 'Prop of the Kingdom.'..."—Garcia, f. 36v.

Neither the chronology of De Orta here, nor the statement of 'Imad-ul-Mulk's Circassian origin, agrees with those of Firishta. The latter says that Fath-Ullah 'Imad Shab was descended from the heathen of Bijanagar (iii. 485).

MADURA. n.p., properly Madurai, Tam. Mathurai. This is still the name of a district in S. India, and of a city which appears in the Tables of Ptolemy as 'Μύδουρα βασιλεως Παρθηνως.' The name is generally supposed to be the same as that of Mathura, the holy and much more ancient city of Northern India, from which the name was adopted (see MUTTRA), but modified after Tamil pronunciation.* [On the other hand, a writer in J.R. As. Soc. (xiv. 578, n. 3) derives Madura from the Dravidian Madur in the sense of 'Old Town,' and suggests that the northern Mathura may be an offshoot from it.] Madura was, from a date, at least as early as the Christian era, the seat of the Pandya sovereigns. These, according to Tamil tradition, as stated by Bp. Caldwell, had previously held their residence at Kolkee on the Tamraparni, the Kακα of Ptolemy. (See Caldwell, pp. 16, 96, 101). The name of Madura, probably as adopted from the holier northern Muttra, seems to have been a favourite among the Eastern settlements under Hindu influence. Thus we have

* This perhaps implies an earlier spread of northern influence than we are justified in assuming.

[cf. 1315.—"Mardi." See CEORE.] c. 1347.—"The Sultan stopped a month at Fattan, and then departed for his capital. I stayed 15 days after his departure, and then started for his residence, which was at Muttra, a great city with wide streets. I found there a pest raging of which people died in brief space... when I went out I saw only the dead and dying."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 200-1.

1311.—". . . and the royal canopy moved from Bhirad. . . . and 5 days afterwards they arrived at the city of Mathra . . . the dwelling-place of the brother of the Râjah abunad Madaya. They found the city empty, for the Râjah had fled with the Rânis, but had left two or three elephants in the temple of Jagnâr (Jaganâth)."—Amîr Khurân, in Elliot, iii. 91.

MADURA FOOT, s. A fungoidal disease of the foot, apparently incurable except by amputation, which occurs in the Madura district, and especially in places where the 'Black soil' prevails. Medical authorities have not yet decided on the causes or precise nature of the disease. See Nelson, Madura, Pt. i. pp. 91-94; [Gribble, Cuddapah, 183].

MAGADOXO, n.p. This is the Portuguese representation, which has passed into general European use, of Makdasan, the name of a town and State on the Somali coast in E. Africa, now subject to Zanzibar. It has been shown by one of the present writers that Marco Polo, in his chapter on Madagascar, has made some confusion between Madagadoxo and that island, mixing up particulars relating to both. It is possible that the name of Madagascar was really given from Makdasan, as Sir R. Burton supposes; but he does not give any authority for his statement that the name of Madagascar came from Makdishâ (Magadoxo) . . . . whose Sheikh invaded it." (Comment. on Camões, ii. 520). [Owen (Narrative, i. 357) writes the name Mukdeesa, and Boteler (Narrative, ii. 218) says it is pronounced by the Arabs Makdishes. The name is said to be Magad-al-Shattu, "Harbour of the Sheep," and the first syllable has been identified with that of Magdala and is said to mean "door" in some of the Gall dialects (Notes & Queries, 9 ser. ii. 193, 310. Also see Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard, Hak. Soc. i. 29, and Dr. Burnell on Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 19.]

1500. —"On departing from Zaila, we sailed on the sea for 15 days, and then arrived at Makdasan, a town of great size. The inhabitants possess a great number of camels, and of these they slaughter (for food) several hundreds every day."—Ibn Battuta, ii. 181.

1498.—"And we found ourselves before a great city with houses of several stories, and in the midst of the city certain great palaces, and about it a wall with four towers; and in the city stood close upon the sea, and the Moors call it Magadoxo. And when we were come well abreast of it, we discharged many bombardes (at it), and kept on our way along the coast with a fine wind on the poop."—Rotaieu, 102.

1505.—"And the Viceroy (Don Francisco D'Almeida) made sail, ordering the course to be made for Magadoxo, which he had instructions also to make tributary. But the pilots objected saying that they would miss the season for crossing to India, as it was already the 26th of August. . . ."—Correa, ii. 560.

1514.—". . . The most of them are Moors such as inhabit the city of Zofalla and these people continue to be found in Aussambic, Melinda, Magodecido, Marschilue (read Brava Chilve, i.e. Brava and Quilwa), and Momamba, which are all walled cities on the main land, with houses and streets like our own; except Mazambich."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital.

1516.—"Further on towards the Red Sea there is another very large and beautiful town called Magadoxo, belonging to the Moors, and it has a King over it, and is a place of great trade and merchandise."—Barbosa, 16.

1532.—". . . and after they had passed Cape Guardafui, Dom Estêvão was going along in such depression that he was like to die of grief, on arriving at Magadoxo, they stopped to water. And the King of the country, hearing that there had come a son of the Count Admiral, of whom all had ample knowledge as being the first to discover and navigate on that coast, came to the shore to see him, and made great offers of all that he could require."—Louvo, iv. viii. 2.

1727.—"Magadoxo, or as the Portuguese call it, Magdocia, is a pretty large City, about 2 or 3 Miles from the Sea, from whence it has a very fine Aspect, being adorn'd with many high Steeples and Mosques."—A. Hamilton, l. 12-13, [ed. 1744].
MAHÂJUN, s. Hind. from Skt. mahâ-jun, 'great person.' A banker and merchant. In Southern and Western India the vernacular word has various other applications which are given in Wilson.

c. 1861.—
"Down there lives a Mahajun—my father gave him a bill, I have paid the knave thrice over, and here I'm paying him still. He shows me a long stamp paper, and must have my land—must he! If I were twenty years younger, he should get six feet by three.

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

1885.—"The Mahajun hospitably entertains his victim, and spoils his homeward departure, giving no word or sign of his business till the time for appeal has gone by, and the decree is made absolute. Then the storm bursts on the head of the luckless hill-man, who finds himself loaded with an overwhelming debt, which he has never incurred, and can never hope to discharge; and so he practically becomes the Mahajun's slave for the rest of his natural life."

MAHÂNNAH, s. (See MEEANA.)

MAHI, n.p. Properly Mâyê, [According to the Madras Gloss. the Mal. name is Mayyazhi, mar, 'black,' ažhi, 'river mouth'; but the title is from the French Mahé, being one of the names of Labourdounais.] A small settlement on the Malabar coast, 4 m. S.E. of Tellicherry, where the French established a factory for the sake of the pepper trade in 1722, and which they still retain. It is not now of any importance.

MAHÂRTTA, n.p. Hind. Marhatâ, Marhattâ, Marhâta (Marhati, Marahâti, Marhati), and Mardhâti. The name of a famous Hindu race, from the old Skt. name of their country, Mahâ-râstrâ, 'Magna Regio.' [On the other hand H. A. Acworth (Ballads of the Marathas, Intro. vi.) derives the word from a tribal name of the Gulf of Cambay. ["The height of its banks, and the fierceness of its floods; the deep gullies through which the traveller has to pass on his way to the river, and perhaps, above all, the bad name of the tribes on its banks, explain the proverb: 'When the Mahi is crossed, there is comfort.'"] —Imp. Gazetter, s.v.]

c. A.D. 80-90.—"Next comes another gulf... extending also to the north, at the mouth of which is an island called Baiônes (Perim), and at the innermost extremity a great river called Mals."—Periplus, ch. 42.

MAHOUT, s. The driver and tender of an elephant. Hind. mahâwat, from Skt. mahâ-matra, 'great in measure,' a high officer, &c., so applied. The Skt. term occurs in this sense in the Mahâbhârata (e.g. iv. 1761, &c.). The Mahout is mentioned in the 1st Book of Maccabees as 'the Indian.' It is remarkable that we find what is apparently mahâ-matra, in the sense of a high officer in Hesychius:

"Μαχατρατ, αι στραγγιοι οι Ιδούς."—Hesych. s.v.

c. 1500.—"Mast elephants (see MUST). There are five and a half servants to each, viz., first a Mahâwat, who sits on the neck of the animal and directs its movements.... He gets 200 dôms per month. Secondly a Bhôi, who sits behind, upon the rump of the elephant, and assists in battle, and in quickening the speed of the animal; but he often performs the duties of the Mahâwat. Thirdly the Meâth (see MATE).... A Meâth fetches fodder, and assists in caparisoning the elephant....—Aris, ed. Blochmann, i. 125.

1648.—"... and Mahouts for the elephants....—Van Twint, 56.

1826.—"I will now pass over the term of my infancy, which was employed in learning to read and write—my preceptor being a mahoukut, or elephant-driver—and will take up my adventures."—Pandurang Hari, 21; [ed. 1878, i. 239].

1848.—"Then he described a tiger hunt, and the manner in which the Mahout of his elephant had been pulled off his seat by one of the infuriate animals."—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iv.
Rathi or Rathā, 'chariot fighters,' from rath, 'a chariot,' thus Mahārathā means 'Great Warrior.' This was transferred to the country and finally Sanskritised into Mahā-rathā. Again some authorities (Wilson, Indian Caste, ii. 48; Baden-Powell, J. R. As. Soc., 1897, p. 249, note) prefer to derive the word from the Mahr or Mahar, a once numerous and dominant race. And see the discussion in the Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. ii. 143 seq.

"The name of Morattoe, or Maratta, is, I have reason to think, a derivation in their country-language, or by corruption, from Mar-Rajaah."—Ibid. ii. 78.

1765. "These united princes and people are those which are known by the general name of Maharattas; a word compounded of Rattar and Maahah; the first being the name of a particular Rauptoot (or Rajpoot) tribe; and the latter, signifying great or mighty (as explained by Mr. Fraser). . . ."—Hollis's Hist. Events, &c., i. 105.

c. 1769. c. 1842. "Ah, for some retreat Deep in yonder shining Orient, where my life began to beat; Where in wild Mahratta battle fell my father evil star'd."—Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

The following is in the true Hobson-Jobson manner:

[1859. "This term Mahratta, or Marhutta, is derived from the mode of warfare adopted by these men. Mar means to strike, and hutta, to get out of the way; so that those who struck a blow suddenly and at once retreated out of harm's way."—H. Dundas Robertson, District Duties during the Revolt in 1857, p. 104, note.]

MAHRATTA DITCH, n.p. An excavation made in 1742, as described in the extract from Orme, on the landward sides of Calcutta, to protect the settlement from the Mahratta bands. Hence the term, or for shortness 'The Ditch' simply, as a disparaging name for Calcutta (see DITCHER). The line of the Ditch corresponded nearly with the outside of the existing Circular Road, except at the S.E. and S., where the work was never executed. [There is an excavation known by the same name at Madras excavated in 1780. (Murray, Handbook, 1859, p. 43.)]

1742. "In the year 1742 the Indian inhabitants of the Colony requested and obtained permission to dig a ditch at their own expense, and the Company's bounds, from the northern parts of Sootanatty to the southern part of Govindpore. In six months three miles were finished: when the inhabitants . . . discontinued the work, which from the occasion was called the Morattoe ditch."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 45.

1757. "That the Bounds of Calcutta are to extend the whole Circle of Ditch dug upon the Invasion of the Maratus; also 600 yards without it, for an Esplanade."—Articles of Agreement sent by Colonel Clive (previous to the Treaty with the Nabob of May 14). 1782. "To the Proprietors and Occupiers of Houses and other Tenements within the MAHSEER, MASEER, MASAL, &c. Hind. mahâsir, mahîsir, mahâsir-aula, s. The name is applied to perhaps more than one of the larger species of Barbus (N.O. Cyprinidae), but especially to B. Mosul of Buchanan, B. Tor, Day, B. megalops, McLelland, found in the larger Himalayan rivers, and also in the greater perennial rivers of Madras and Bombay. It grows at its largest, to about the size of the biggest salmon, and more. It affords also the highest sport to Indian anglers; and from these circumstances has sometimes been called, misleadingly, the 'Indian salmon.' The origin of the name Mahseer, and its proper spelling, are very doubtful. It may be Skt. mahâ-sirâs, 'big-head,' or mahâ-balâka, 'large-scaled.' The latter is most probable, for the scales are so large that Buchanan mentions that playing cards were made from them at Dacca. Mr. H. S. Thomas suggests mahâ-daya, 'great mouth.' [The word does not appear in the ordinary dictionaries; on the whole, perhaps the derivation from mahâ-sirâs is most probable.]

1809.—"The Mâsal of the Kosi is a very large fish, which many people think still better than the Rohu, and compare it to the salmon."—Buchanan, Eastern India, iii. 194.

1822.—"Mahassula and Tor, variously altered and corrupted, and with various additions may be considered as genuine appellations, amongst the natives for these fishes, all of which frequent large rivers."—F. Buchanan Hamilton, Fishes of the Ganges, 304.

1873.—"In my own opinion and that of others whom I have met, the Mahseer shows more sport for its size than a salmon."—H. S. Thomas, The Rod in India, p. 9.

MAINATO, s. Tam. Mal. Mainatita, a washerman or dhoby (q.v.).

1516.—"There is another sect of Gentiles which they call Mainatgos, whose business it is to wash the clothes of the Kings, Bramins, and Nares; and by this they get their living; and neither they nor their sons can take up any other business."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed., 354.

c. 1542.—"In this encloiscre do likewise remain all the Landresses, by them called Maynates, which wash the linnen of the City (Pequin), who, as we were told, are above an hundred thousand."—Pinto, in Coqui, p. 158. The original (cap. cv.) has todos os maiântos, whose sex Coqui has changed.

1554.—"And the farm (rende) of mainatgos, which farm prohibits any one from washing clothes, which is the work of a mainato, except by arrangement with the farmer (Rendeiro). . . ."—Tombo, &c., 53.

[1598.—"There are some among them that do nothing else but wash clothes: . . . they are called Maynatoes."—Linachoten, Hak. Soc. i. 260.]

1644.—(Expenses of Daman) "For two manyates, three water boys (boys de aqaus), one sombreyo boy, and 4 torch bearers for the said Captain, at 1 zoradi each a month, comes in the year to 36,000 rês or x. . . . 00120.0.00."—Bocarro, MS. f. 181.

MAISTRY, MISTRY, sometimes even MYSTERY, s. Hind. mistâri. This word, a corruption of the Portuguese mestre, has spread into the vernaculars all over India, and is in constant Anglo-Indian use. Properly 'a foreman,' 'a master-workman'; but used also, at least in Upper India, for any artisan, as râj-mistâri (properly Pers. râz), 'a mason or bricklayer,' lôdrâ-mistâri, 'a blacksmith,' &c. The proper use of the word, as noted above, corresponds precisely to the definition of the Portuguese word, as applied to artizans in Bluteau: "Artifice que sabe bem o seu officio. Peritus artifex . . . Opifex, alienorum operum inspecor." In W. and S. India maistry, as used in the household, generally means the cook, or the tailor. (See CALEFA.)

Mâstar (Macrept) is also the Russian term for a skilled workman, and has given rise to several derived adjectives. There is too a similar word in modern Greek, παγκός.

1404.—"And in these (chambers) there were works of gold and silver of and of many other colours, made in the most marvellous way; insomuch that even in Paris whence come the subtle maestros, it would be reckoned beautiful to see."—Clavijo, § cv. (Comp. Markham, p. 125).

1524.—"And the Viceroy (D. Vasco da Gama) sent to seize in the river of the Culymutys four newly-built caturas, and fetched them to Cochin. These were built very light for fast rowing, and were greatly admired. But he ordered them to be burned, saying that he intended to show the Moors that we knew how to build better cutters than they did; and he sent for Mestre Vyne the Genoese, whom he had brought to build galleys, and asked him if he could build boats that would row faster than the Malabar parado (see FIBOW). He answered: 'Sir, I'll build youbrigantines fast enough to catch a mosquito...'. 'Correa, ii. 830.

[1548.—'He ordered to be collected in the smithies of the dockyard as many smiths as could be had, for he had many mistresses.'—Ibid. iv. 663.]

1800.—... I have not yet been able to remedy the mischief done in my absence, as we have the advantage here of the assistance of some Madras nabobs and mastifs (lizards)—Wellington, i. 67.

1883.—... My mind goes back to my ancient Gonnese cook. He was only a master, or more vulgarly a bobbery (see BORACHEE), yet his sonorous name recalled the conquest of Mexico, or the doubling of the Cape.'—Tribes on My Frontier, 85.

MAJOON, s. Hind. from Ar. ma’a-jan, lit. 'kneaded,' and thence what old medical books call 'an electuary' (i.e. a compound of medicines kneaded with syrup into a soft mass), but especially applied to an intoxicating concoction of hemp leaves, &c., sold in the bazar. [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 159.] In the Deccan the form is ma’-jum. Mooden Sheriff, in his Suppt. to the Pharmac. of India, writes magh-jum. "The chief ingredients in making it are ganja (or hemp) leaves, milk, ghee, poppy-seeds, flowers of the thorn-apple (see DATURA), the powder of nux vomica, and sugar" (Qanon-e-Islam, Gloss. lxxxiii).

1519.—'Next morning I halted... and indulging myself with a maajum, made them throw into the water the liquor used for intoxicating fishes, and caught a few fish.'—Babar, 272.

1563.—'And this they make up into an electuary, with sugar, and with the things above-mentioned, and this they call maaju.'—Garcia, f. 27v.

1781.—'Our ill-favoured guard brought in a dose of majum each, and obliged us to eat it... a little after sunset the surgeon came, and with him 30 or 40 Castros, who seized us, and held us fast till the operation (circumcision) was performed.'—Soldier's Letter quoted in Hon. John Lindsay's Journal of Captivity in Mysore, Lives of Lindsay, iii. 288.

1874.—'... it (Bhang) is made up with flour and various additions into a sweetmeat or majum of a green colour.'—Hanbury and Fluckiger, 493.

MALABAR, n.p.

a. The name of the sea-board country which the Arabs called the 'Pepper-Coast,' the ancient Kerala of the Hindus, the Λυμβαρη, or rather Λυμβάριη, of the Greeks (see TAMUL), is not in form indigenous, but was applied, apparently, first by the Arab or Arabo-Persian mariners of the Gulf. The substantive part of the name, Malai, or the like, is doubtless indigenous; it is the Dravidian term for 'mountain' in the Sanskritized form Malaya, which is applied specifically to the southern portion of the Western Ghauts, and from which is taken the indigenous term Malayalam, distinguishing that branch of the Dravidian language in the tract which we call Malabar. This name—Male or Malai, Malisah, &c.—we find in the earlier post-classic notices of India; whilst in the great Temple-Inscription of Tanjore (11th century) we find the region in question called Malai-nadu (nadc, 'country'). The affix bdr appears attached to it first (so far as we are aware) in the Geography of Edrisi (c. 1150). This (Persian) termination, bdr, whatever be its origin, and whether or no it be connected either with the Ar. barr, 'a continent,' on the one hand, or with the Skt. sāra, 'a region, a slope,' on the other, was most assuredly applied by the navigators of the Gulf to other regions which they visited besides Western India. Thus we have Zangi-bdr (mod. Zanzibar), 'the country of the Blacks'; Kaldh-bdr, denoting apparently the coast of the Malay Peninsula; and even according to the dictionaries, Hindā-bdr for India. In the Arabic work which affords the second of these examples (Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 17) it is expressly explained: "The word bdr serves to indicate that which is both a coast and a kingdom." It will be seen from the quotations below that in the Middle Ages, even after the establishment of the use of this termination, the exact form of the name as given by foreign travellers and writers, varies considerably. But, from the time of the Portuguese discovery of the Cape route, Malavar, or Malabar, as we have it now, is the persistent form. [Mr. Logan (Manual, i. 1) remarks that the name is not in use in the district itself except among foreigners and English-speaking natives; the ordinary name is Malayalam or Malayam, 'the Hill Country.'

c. 645. — "The imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, sandalwood. . . . These again are passed on from Sielebida to the marts on this side, such as Malè, where the pepper is grown. . . . And the most notable places of trade are these, Sindu . . . and then the five marts of Malè, from which the pepper is exported, i.e., Pale, Manganath, Sêkaputana, Nou-putana, and Pudopotana."—Cosmas, Bk. xi. In Cathay, &c., p. cixviii.

645. — "To the south this kingdom is near the sea. There rise the mountains called Mola-ye (Malaya), with their precipitous sides, and their lofty summits, their dark valleys and their deep ravines. On these mountains grows the white sandalwood."—Huen Tsang, in Juiien, iii. 122.

851.—"From this place (Maskat) ships sail for India, and run for Kaulam-Malai; the distance from Maskat to Kaulam-Malai is a month's sail with a moderate wind."—Relation, &c. &c. by Reinaud, i. 15. The same work at p. 15 uses the expression "Country of Pepper" (Balad-ul-faluf).

890.—"From Sindan to Mali is five days' journey; in the latter pepper is to be found, also the bamboo."—Ibn Kardadak, in Elliot, i. 15.

c. 1050.—"You enter then on the country of Lakau, in which is Jaimdr (see under CHOU), then Malath, then Kanchi, then Dravira (see DRAVIDIAN)."—Al-Biruni, in Reinaud, Fragments, 121.

c. 1160.—"Pandaria (see PANDARANT) is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Malabir, where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor."—Idrisi, in Elliot, i. 90.

c. 1200.—"Hari sports here in the delightful spring . . . when the breeze from Malaya is fragrant, and passing over the charming lavanga" (cloves).—Gilovinda.

1270.—"Malabar is a large country of India, with many cities, in which pepper is produced."—Kasrati, in Gildemeister, 214.

1293.—"You can sail (upon that sea) between these islands and Ormes, and (from Ormes to those parts which are called Minabar), is a distance of 2,000 miles, in a direction between south and south-east; then 300 miles between east and south-east from Minabar to Maabar" (see MAVAR).—Letter of Fr. John of Monte- corrino, in Cathay, i. 215.

1298.—"Malibar is a great kingdom lying towards the west . . . There is in this kingdom a great quantity of pepper."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 25.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Kankan (see CONGAN) and Tana; beyond them the country of Malibar, which from the boundary of Karoha to Kulaum (probably from Ghirah to Qullon) is 500 parasangs in length."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1320.—"A certain traveller states that India is divided into three parts, of which the first, which is also the most westerly, is that on the confines of Kurnam and Sind, and is called Guzéra; the second Mani- bar, or the Land of Pepper, east of Guzéra."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 184.

c. 1322.—"And now that ye may know how pepper is got, let me tell you that it groweth in a certain empire, wherunto I came to land, the name whereof is Minabar."—Friar Olorio, in Cathay, &c., i. 14.

c. 1343.—"After 3 days we arrived in the country of the Malabir, which is the country of Pepper. It stretches in length a distance of two months' march along the sea-shore."—Ibn Bataa, in iv. 71.

c. 1348-49.—"We embarked on board certain junks from Lower India, which is called Minabar."—John de Marignolli, in Cathay, 356.

c. 1420-30.—". . . Departing thence he . . . arrived at a noble city called Cocolon. . . . This province is called Melibaria, and they collect in it the ginger called by the natives colombo, pepper, brazili-wood, and the cinnamon, called canella grossa."—Conti, corrected from Jones's tr. in India in Xvith Cent. 17-18.

c. 1442.—"The coast which includes Calicut with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as (Kaal), a place situated opposite to the Island of Serendib . . . bears the general name of Melibibar."—Abdurrazak, ibid. 19.

1459.—Fra Mauro's great Map has Mili- bar.

1514.—"In the region of India called Melibar, which province begins at Goa, and extends to Cape Comedias (Comorin) . . ."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, 79. It is remarkable to find this Florentine using this old form in 1514.

1516.—"And after that the Moors of Mecca discovered India, and began to navigate near it, which was 610 years ago, they used to touch at this country of Malibar on account of the pepper which is found there."—Barros, 102.

1553.—"We shall hereafter describe particularly the position of this city of Calcut, and of the country of Malabar which it stands."—Barros, Dec. I. iv. c. 6. In the following chapter he writes Malabar.

1554.—"From Dix to the Islands of Diô. Steer first S.S.E., the pole being made by five inches, side towards the land in the direction of E.S.E. and S.E. by E. till you see the mountains of Monibar."—The Mohi, in J. As. Soc. Ben. v. 461.

1877.—The form Malabar is used in a letter from Athanasius Peter III., "Patriarch of the Syrians of Antioch" to the Marquis of Salisbury, dated Cairo, July 18.

MALABAR, n.p.

b. This word, through circumstances which have been fully elucidated by Bishop Caldwell in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed. 10-12), from which we give an extract below,* was applied by the Portuguese not only to the language and people of the country thus called, but also to the Tamil language and the people speaking Tamil. In the quotations following, those under A apply, or may apply, to the proper people or language of Malabar (see Malayalam); those under B are instances of the misapplication to Tamil, a misapplication which was general (see e.g. in Orme, passim) down to the beginning of the last century, and which still holds among the more ignorant Europeans and Eurasians in S. India and Ceylon.

Camoes, ix. 14.

* "The Portuguese... sailing from Malabar on voyages of exploration... made their acquaintance with various places of the eastern or Coromandel Coast... and finding the language spoken by the fishing and sea-faring classes on the eastern coast similar to that spoken on the western, they came to the conclusion that it was identical with it, and called it in consequence by the same name—viz. Malabar. A circumstance which naturally confirmed the Portuguese in their notion of the identity of the people and language of the Coromandel Coast with those of Malabar was that when they arrived at Coa, in Timnevally, on the Coromandel Coast... they found the King of Quilon (one of the most important places on the Malabar Coast) residing there."—By. These words are adopted from Card. Tournon's decree of 1704 (see ibid. i. 175).
1760.—"Such was the ardent zeal of M. Ziegenbalg that in less than a year he attained a perfect knowledge of the Malabar tongue... He composed also a Malabaric dictionary of 20,000 words."—Grose, i. 261.
1782.—"Les habitans de la côte de Coromandel sont appelés Tamoulis; les Européens les nomment improprement Malabars."—Sonnerat, i. 47.
1801.—"From Nilisram to the Chander-gerry River no language is understood but the Malabars of the Coast."—Sir T. M'Nro, in Life, i. 322.
In the following passage the word Malabar is misapplied still further, though by a writer usually most accurate and intelligent:

1810.—"The language spoken at Madras is the Telinga, here called Malabar."—Maria Graham, 128.

1860.—"The term 'Malabar' is used throughout the following pages in the comprehensive sense in which it is applied in the Singhalese Chronicles to the continental invaders of Ceylon; but it must be observed that the adventurers in these expeditions, who are styled in the Maharanso 'damilus,' or Tamils, came not only from ... 'Malabar,' but also from all parts of the Peninsula as far north as Cuttack and Orissa."—Tennis's Ceylon, i. 553.

1773.—"'From their shape they are called Malabar-Ears, on account of the resemblance they bear to the ears of the women of the Malabar coast, which from the large slit made in them and the great weight of ornamental rings put into them, are rendered very large, and so long that sometimes they touch the very shoulders.'—Ives, 465.

MALABAR HILL, n.p. This favourite site of villas on Bombay Island is stated by Mr. Whitworth to have acquired its name from the fact that the Malabar pirates, who haunts this coast, used to lie behind it.

1674.—"On the other side of the great Inlet, to the Sea, is a great Point abutting against Old Woman's Island, and is called Malabar-Hill ... the remains of a stupendous Pagod, near a Tank of Fresh Water, which the Malabars visited it mostly for."—Fryer, 68 seq.

MALABAR OIL, s. "The ambiguous term 'Malabar Oil' is applied to a mixture of the oil obtained from the livers of several kinds of fishes frequenting the Malabar Coast of India and the neighbourhood of Karachi."—Watt, Econ. Dict. v. 113.

MALABAR RITES. This was a name given to certain heathen and superstitious practices which the Jesuits of the Madura, Carnatic, and Mysore Missions permitted to their converts, in spite of repeated prohibitions by the Popes. And though these practices were finally condemned by the Legate Cardinal de Tournon in 1704, they still subsist, more or less, among native Catholic Christians, and especially those belonging to the (so-called) Goa Churches. These practices are generally alleged to have arisen under Father de' Nobili ("Robertus de Nobilibus"), who came to Madura about 1606. There can be no doubt that the aim of this famous Jesuit was to present Christianity to the people under the form, as it were, of a Hindu translation!

The nature of the practices of which we speak may be gathered from the following particulars of their prohibition. In 1633 Pope Gregory XV., by a constitution dated 31st January, condemned the following:—1. The investiture of Brahmins and certain other castes with the sacred thread, through the agency of Hindu priests, and with Hindu ceremonies. For these Christian ceremonies were to be substituted; and the thread was to be regarded as only a civil badge. 2. The ornamental use of sandalwood paste was permitted, but not its superstitious use, e.g., in mixture with cowdung ashes, &c., for ceremonial purification. 3. Bathing as a ceremonial purification. 4. The observance of caste, and the refusal of high-caste Christians to mix with low-caste Christians in the churches was disapproved.

The quarrels between Capuchins and Jesuits later in the 17th century again brought the Malabar Rites into notice, and Cardinal de Tournon was sent on his unlucky mission to determine these matters finally. His decree (June 23, 1704) prohibited:—

1. A mutilated form of baptism, in which were omitted certain ceremonies offensive to Hindus, specifically the use of 'salvia, sal, et incrustatio.'

With regard to No. 11 it may be observed that in South India the distinction of castes still subsists, and the only Christian Mission in that quarter which has really succeeded in abolishing caste is that of the Basel Society.

MALABATHRUM, sect. There can be very little doubt that this classical export from India was the dried leaf of various species of Cinnamomum, which leaf was known in Skt. as tamāla-pattra. Some who wrote soon after the Portuguese discoveries took, perhaps not unnaturally, the pda or betel-leaf for the malabarum of the ancients; and this was maintained by Dean Vincent in his well-known work on the Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients, justifying this in part by the Ar. name of the betel, tamal, which is taken from Skt. tāmbāla, betel; tāṃbala-pattra, betel-leaf. The tamāla-pattra, however, the produce of certain wild spp. of Cinnamomum, obtained both in the hills of Eastern Bengal and in the forests of Southern India, is still valued in India as a medicine and aromatic, though in no such degree as in ancient times, and it is usually known in domestic economy as tejpat, or corruptly tezpat, i.e. "pungent leaf." The leaf was in the Arabic Materia Medica under the name of satdaj or satdaji Hindi, as was till recently in the English Pharmacopoeia as Foliwm indicum, which will still be found in Indian drug-shops. The matter is treated, with his usual lucidity and abundance of local knowledge, in the Colloquios of Garcia de Orta, of which we give a short extract. This was evidently unknown to Dean Vincent, as he repeats the very errors which Garcia dissipates. Garcia also notes that confusion of Malabarum and Foliwm indicum with spikenard, which is traceable in Pliny as well as among the Arab pharmacologists. The ancients did no doubt apply the name Malabarum to some other substance, an unguent or solid extract. Rheed, we may notice, mentions that in his time in Malabar, oils in high medical estimation were made from both leaves and root of the "wild cinnamon" of that coast, and that from the root of the same tree a camphor was extracted, having several of the properties of real camphor and more fragrance. (See a note by one of the present writers in Cathay, &c., pp. cxlv.-xlvi.) The name Cinnamon is properly confined to the tree of Ceylon (C. Zeylanicum). The other Cinnamoms are properly Cassia barks. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 317 seqq.]

C. A. D. 60. — "Malabathros ἔστιν ἐναλμ-βάρων εἶναι ἐν τῇ Ἱνδικῇ νάρδου φύλλον, πανώμενον ὑπὸ τῆς κατὰ τὴν ἀφρήν, ἐμβιασάτες, ... διὸν γαρ ἐστὶν ἔναλμον τοῦ τοῦ Ἱνδικοῦ τέμλου, φύλλον ὅτι ἐναλμό-μενον δέχεται." — Dionysiodes, Mat. Med. i. 11.

C. A. D. 70. — "We are beholden to Syria for Malabarum. This is a tree that beareth leaves rolled up round together, and seeming to the eye withered. Out of which there is drawn and pressed an Oils for perfumers to use. ... And yet there commeth a better kind thereof from India. ... The relish thereof ought to resemble Nardus at the tongue end. The perfume or smell that ... the leaf yeeldeth when it is boiled in wine, passeth all others. It is strange and monstrous which is observed in the price; for it hath risen from one denier to three hundred a pound." — Pliney, xii. 26, in Ph. Holland.

C. A. D. 90. — "... Getting rid of the fibrous parts, they take the leaves and double them up into little balls, which they stitch through with the fibres of the withes. And these they divide into three classes. ... And thus originate the three qualities of Malabarum, which the people who have prepared them carry to India for sale." — Pliney, intro. to the end. [Also see Yule, Intro. to the, river of Golden Sand, ed. 1888, p. 89.]

1583. — "R. I remember well that in speaking of betel you told me that it was not folium indicum, a piece of information of great value to me; for the physicians who put themselves forward as having learned much from these parts, assert that they are the same; and what is more, the modern writers ... call betel in their works tembul, and say that the Moors give it this name. ..."

"O. That the two things are different as I told you is clear; for Avicenna treats them in two different chapters, viz., in 259, which treats of folium indu, and in 707, which treats of tamul ... and the folium indu ... is called by the Indians Tamalapata, which the Greeks and Latins corrupted into Malabarum," &c. — Garcia, ff. 95v, 96.

c. 1690. — "Hoc Tembula seu Sirium, licet vulgatissimum in India sit folium, distinguendum est a Foliwm Indi seu Malabarum, Arabibus Cadisi hindi, in Pharmacopoeis, etiam India, Tamulapata et folia Indi dicta, ... A nostra autem natione intellexi Malabarum nihil aliud esse quam folium canellae, seu cinnamomi sylvestriam." — Rumphius, v. 387.
MALACCA, n.p. The city which gives its name to the Peninsula and the Straits of Malacca, and which was the seat of a considerable Malay monarchy till its capture by the Portuguese under D’Albuquerque in 1511. One naturally supposes some etymological connection between Malay and Malacca. And such a connection is put forward by De Barros and D’Albuquerque (see below, and also under MALAY). The latter also mentions an alternative suggestion for the origin of the name of the city, which evidently refers to the Ar. mulakat, ‘a meeting.’ This last, though it appears also in the Sijara Malay, may be totally rejected. Crawford is positive that the place was called from the word malaka, the Malay name of the Phylanthus emblica, or emblic Myrobolan (q.v.), “a tree said to be abundant in that locality”; and this, it will be seen below, is given by Godinho de Eredia as the etymology. Malaka again seems to be a corruption of the Skt. amalaka, from amla, ‘acid.’ [Mr. Skeat writes: “There can be no doubt that Crawford is right, and that the place was named from the tree. The suggested connection between Malay and Malaka appears impossible to me, and, I think, would do so to any acquaintance with the laws of the language. I have seen the Malaka tree myself and eaten its fruit. Ridley in his Botanical Lists has laka-laka and malaka which he identifies as Phylanthus emblica, L. and P. pectinatus Hooker (Euphorbiaceae). The two species are hardly distinct, but the latter is the commoner form. The fact is that the place, as is so often the case among the Malays, must have taken its name from the Sungai Malaka, or Malaka River.”]

In the year 1409, the imperial envoy Cheng Ho brought an order from the emperor and gave to the chief two silver seals, ... he erected a stone and raised the place to a city, after which the land was called the Kingdom of Malacca (Moa-la-kia). ... Tin is found in the mountains ... it is cast into small blocks weighing 1 catti 8 tsals ... ten pieces are bound together with rattan and form a small bundle, whilst 40 pieces make a large bundle. In all their trading ... they use these pieces of tin instead of money.”—Chinese Annals, in Groeneweld, p. 128.

1510.—“When we had arrived at the city of Malacca, we were immediately presented to the Sultan, who is a Moor... I believe that more ships arrive here than in any other place in the world...”—Vortramma, 224.

1511.—“This Paremiagua gave the name of Malacca to the new colony, because in the language of Java, when a man of Palim-biao flees away they call him Malacca. Others say that it was called Malacca because of the number of people who came there from one part and the other in so short a space of time, for the word Malacca also signifies to meet... Of these two opinions let each one accept that which he thinks to be the best, for this is the truth of the matter.”—Memoriamtaries of Alboquerque, E.T. by Birch, iii. 78-77.

1516.—“The said Kingdom of Ansane (see Siam) throws out a great point of land into the sea, which makes there a cape, where the sea returns again towards China to the north; in this promontory is a small kingdom in which there is a large city called Malacca.”—Barboz, 191.

1563.—“A son of Paramisora called Xaquem Darra, (i.e. Sitandar Shāh) ... to form the town of Malacca, to which he gave that name in memory of the banishment of his father, because in his vernacular tongue (Javanese) this was as much as to say ‘banished,’ and hence the people are called Malaeas.”—De Barros, II. vi. 1.

“That which he (Alboquerque) regrettcd most of all that was lost on that vessel, was two lions cast in iron, a first-rate work, and most natural, which the King of China had sent to the King of Malacca, and which King Mahamed had kept, as an honourable possession, at the gate of his Palace, whence Affonso Alboquerque carried them off, as the principal item of his triumph on the capture of the city.”—Ibid. II. vii. 1.

1612.—“The Arabs call it Malakat, from collecting all merchants.”—Sifer Malaya, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 322.

MALADOO, s. Chicken maladoo is an article in the Anglo-Indian menu. It looks like a corruption from the French cuisine, but of what? [Malado or Manado, a lady informs me, is cold meat, such as chicken or mutton, cut into slices, or pounded up and re-cooked in batter. The Port. malado, ‘beaten-up,’ has been suggested as a possible origin for the word.]

MALAY, n.p. This is in the Malay language an adjective, Malaya; thus orang Malaya, ‘a Malay’; tdna [tdnah] Malaya, ‘the Malay country’; bahasa [bhasa] Malaya, ‘the Malay language.’

In Javanese the word malaya signifies ‘to run away,’ and the proper name has traditionally been derived from this, in reference to the alleged foundation of Malaca by Javanese fugitives; but we can hardly attach importance to this. It may be worthy at least of consideration whether the name was not of foreign, i.e. of S. Indian origin, and connected with the Malaya of the Peninsula (see under MALABAR). [Mr. Skeat writes: “The tradition given me by Javanese in the Malay States was that the name was applied to Javanese refugees, who peopled the S. of Sumatra. Whatever be the original meaning of the word, it is probable that it started its life-history as a river-name in the S. of Sumatra, and thence became applied to the district through which the river ran, and so to the people who lived there; after which it spread with the Malay dialect until it included not only many allied, but also many foreign, tribes; all Malay-speaking tribes being eventually called Malays without regard to racial origin. A most important passage in this connection is to be found in Leyden's Tr. of the ‘Malay Annals’ (1821), p. 20, in which direct reference to such a river is made: ‘There is a country in the land of Andalas named Palembang, which is at present denominated Palembang, the raja of which was denominated Damang Lebar Dawn (chieftain Broad-leaf), who derived his origin from Raja Sultan (Chulan?), whose great-grandson he was. The name of its river Muartatang, into which falls another river named Sungay Malay, near the source of which is a mountain named the mountain Saggantang Maha Miru.’ Here Palembang is the name of a well-known Sumatran State, often described as the original home of the Malay race. In standard Malay ‘Damang Lebar Dawn’ would be ‘Démang Lebar Dawn.’ Raja Chulan is probably some mythical Indian king, the story being evidently derived from Indian traditions. ‘Muartatang’ may be a mistake for Muar Tenang, which is a place one heard of in the Peninsula, though I do not know for certain where it is. ‘Sungay Malay’ simply means ‘River Malay.’ ‘Saggantang Maha Miru’ is, I think, a mistake for Sa-guntang Maha Miru, which is the name used in the Peninsula for the sacred central mountain of the world on which the episode related in the Annals occurred” (see Skeat, Malay Magic, p. 2).]

It is a remarkable circumstance, which has been noted by Crawford, that a name which appears on Ptolemy's Tables as on the coast of the Golden Chersonese, and which must be located somewhere about Malmain, is Maladou Kholor, words which in Javanese (Maladyu-Kulon) would signify "Malays of the West." After this the next (possible) occurrence of the name in literature is in the Geography of Edrisi, who describes Malai as a great island in the eastern seas, or rather as occupying the position of the Lemuria of Mr. Sclater, for (in partial accommodation to the Ptolemaic theory of the Indian Sea) it stretched eastward nearly from the coast of Zinz, i.e. of Eastern Africa, to the vicinity of China. Thus it must be uncertain without further accounts whether it is an adumbration of the great Malay islands (as is on the whole probable) or of the Island of the Malagashes (Madagascar), if it is either. We then come to Marco Polo, and after him there is, we believe, no mention of the Malay name till the Portuguese entered the seas of the Archipelago.

[A.D. 690.—Mr. Skeat notes: "I Teing speaks of the 'Molo-yu country,' i.e. the district W. or N.W. of Palembang in Sumatra."]

c. 1150.—"The Isle of Malai is very great. . . . The people devote themselves to very profitable trade; and there are found here elephants, rhinoceroses, and various aromatics and spices, such as clove, cinnamon, cardamom, and nutmeg. In the mountains are mines of gold, of excellent quality . . . the people also have windmills."—Edrisi, by Jau bert, i. 945.

c. 1273.—A Chinese notice records under this year that tribute was sent from Siam to the Emperor. "The Siamese had long been at war with the Malay, or Malaya, but both nations laid aside their feud and submitted to China."—Notice by Sir T. Wade, in Bowring's Siam, i. 72.

c. 1292.—"You come to an Island which forms a kingdom, and is called Malacur. The people have a king of their own, and a peculiar language. The city is a fine and noble one, and there is a great trade carried on there. All kinds of spices are to be found there."—Marco Polo, Skt. iii. ch. 8.

c. 1399.—". . . as soon as he had delivered him the letter, it was translated into the Portuguese out of the Malayan tongue wherein it was written."—Pinto, E.T. p. 15.

1548.—". . . having made a breach in the wall twelve fathom wide, he assailed it with 10,000 strangers, Turks, Abyssins, Moors, Malavaree, Axchem, Jao, and Malayoe."—Ibid. p. 279.

1553.—"And so these Gentiles like the Moors who inhabit the sea-coasts of the Island (Sumatra), although they have each their peculiar language, almost all can speak the Malay of Malacca as being the most general language of those parts."—Barros, III. v. 1.

"Everything with them is to be a gentleman; and this has such prevalence in those parts that you will never find a native Malay, however poor he may be, who will set his hand to lift a thing of his own or anybody else's; every service must be done by slaves."—Ibid. II. v. 1.

1810.—"I cannot imagine what the Hollanders means, to suffer these Malaysians, Chinese, and Moors of these countries, and to assist them in their free trade thorough all the Indies, and forbid it their own servants, countrymen, and Brethren, upon pains of death and losse of goods."—Peter Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 321.

[Mr. Skeat writes: "The word Malaya is now often applied by English writers to the Peninsula as a whole, and from this the term Malaya as a term of wider application (i.e. to the Archipelago) has been coined (see quotation of 1610 above). The former is very frequently mistranslated by English writers as 'Malay,' a barbarism which has even found place on the title-page of a book—'Travel and Sport in Burma, Siam and Malay, by John Bradley, London, 1876.'"]

MALAYALAM. This is the name applied to one of the cultivated Dravidian languages, the closest in its relation to the Tamil. It is spoken along the Malabar coast, on the Western side of the Ghauts (or Malaya mountains), from the Chandragiri River on the North, near Mangalore (entering the sea in 12° 29'), beyond which the language is, for a limited distance, Tulu, and then Canarese, to Trevandrum on the South (lat. 6° 29'), where Tamil begins to supersede it. Tamil, however, also intertines with Malayalam all along Malabar. The term Malayalam properly applies to territory, not language, and might be rendered "Mountain region." [See under MALABAR, and Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 90.]

MALDIVES, MALDIVE ISLDS., n.p. The proper form of this name appears to be Male-diva; not, as the estimable Garcia de Orta says, Naldiva; whilst the etymology which he gives is certainly wrong, hard as it may be to say what is the right one. The people of the islands formerly designated themselves and their country by a form of the word for 'island' which we have in the Skt. deipa and the Pali dipa. We find this reflected in the Divi of Ammianus, and in the Divo and Dibo-jat (Pers. plural) of old Arab geographers, whilst it survives in letters of the 18th century addressed to the Ceylon Government (Dutch) by the Sultan of the Isles, who calls his kingdom Divi-k Râjî, and his people Divi-k mîkus. Something like the modern form first appears in Ibn Batuta. He, it will be seen, in his admirable account of these islands, calls them, as it were, Mâhâl-dives, and says they were so called from the chief group Mâhâl, which was the residence of the Sultan, indicating a connection with Mâhâl, 'a palace.' This form of the name looks like a foreign 'striving after meaning.' But Pyrard de Laval, the author of the most complete account in existence, also says that the name of the islands was taken from Mâlê, that on which the King resided. Bishop Caldwell has suggested that these islands were the dives, or islands, of Mâlê, as Mâlebâr (see MALABAR) was the coast-tract or continent, of Mâlê. It is, however, not impossible that the true etymology was from mâli, 'a garland or necklace,' of which their configuration is highly suggestive. [The Madras Gloss. gives Malayâl. mâl, 'black,' and dvîpa, 'island,' from the dark soil. For a full account of early notices of the Maldives, see Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 423 seqq.] Milburn (Or. Commerce, i. 335) says: "This island was (these islands were) discovered by the Portuguese in 1607." Let us see!

c. 545.—"And round about it (Sielediba or Taprobane, i.e. Ceylon) there are a number of small islands, in all of which you find fresh water and coco-nuts. And these are almost all set close to one another."—Cassius, in Cathay, &c., clixxvii.

851.—"Between this Sea (of Horkand) and the Sea called Lârâvî there is a great number of isles; their number, indeed, it is said, amounts to 1,900; the distance from island to island is 2, 3, or 4 parasangs. They are all inhabited, and all produce coco-growths. The last of these islands is Serendib, in the Sea of Horkand; it is the chief of all; they give the islands the name of Dibajât* (i.e. Dibas)"—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 4-5.

c. 1030.—"The special name of Divis is given to islands which are formed in the sea, and which appear above water in the form of accumulations of sand; these sands continually augment, spread, and unite, till they present a firm aspect... These islands are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their staple product. Those of one class are called Divis-Kûzâh (or the Cowry Divises), because of the cowries which are gathered from coco-branches planted in the sea. The others are called Divis-Kambor, from the word Kambor (see COIKE), which is the name of the twine made from coco-fibres, with which vessels are stitched."—Al-Birûnî, in Reinaud, Fragmens, 124.

1150.—See also Edrisi, in Jaubert's Transl. i. 68. But the translator prints a bad reading, Râbihât, for Dibajât.

c. 1343.—"Ten days after embarking at Calecut we arrived at the Islands called Dibat-al-Mâhâl... These islands are reckoned among the wonders of the World; there are some 2000 of them. Groups of a hundred, or not quite so many, of these islands are found clustered in casts, and each cluster has an entrance like a harbour-mouth, and it is only there that ships can enter... Most of the trees that grow on these islands are coco-growths... They are divided into regions or groups... among which are distinguished... St. Mâhâl, the group which gives a name to the whole, and which is the residence of the Sultans."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 110 seqq.

1442.—Abdurrazak also calls them "the isles of Diva-Mahal."—In Not. et Exs. xiv. 429.

1508.—"But Dom Vasco... said that things must go on as they were to India, and there he would inquire into the truth. And so arriving in the Gulf (gozâ) where the storm befell them, all were separated, and that vessel which steered badly, parted company with the fleet, and found itself at one of the first islands of Malabar, at which they stopped some days enjoying themselves. For the island abounded in provisions, and the men indulged to excess in eating cocos, and fish, and in drinking bad stagnant water, and in disorders with women; so that many died."—Correa, i. 347.

1563.—"It. Though it be somewhat to interrupt the business in hand,—why is that chain of islands called 'islands of Maldives'... "O. In this matter of the nomenclature of lands and seas and kingdoms, many of our people make great mistakes even in regard to our own lands; how then can you expect that one can give you the rationale of etymologies of names in foreign tongues? But, nevertheless, I will tell you what I have heard say. And that is that the right name is not Maldives, but Malabar; for sail in Malabar means 'four,' and dive is island, so that in the Malabar tongue the name is as much as to say 'Four Isles'... And in the same way we call a certain island that is 12 leagues from Goa Angadiva (see ANCHEDIVA), because there are five in the group, and so the name in Malabar.

c. 1610.—“Ce Royaume en leur langage s’appelle Malé-raguti, Royaume de Malé, et des autres peuples de l’Inde il s’appelle Malé-divar, et les peuples diues . . . L’isle principale, comme j’ay dit, s’appelle Malé, qui donne le nom à tout le reste des autres; car le mot Dives signifie un nombre de petits isles amassées.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 63, 68, ed. 1679. 1683.—“Mr. Beard sent up his Course, which he had received from ye Maudivas, to be put off and passed by Mr. Charnock at Cassamazar.”—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 122.]

MALUM, s. In a ship with English officers and native crew, the mate is called malum ethi. The word is Ar. mu‘allim, literally ‘the Instructor,’ and is properly applied to the pilot or sailing-master. The word may be compared, thus used, with our ‘master’ in the Navy. In regard to the first quotation we may observe that Nakhuda (see NACODA) is, rather than Mu‘allim, ‘the captain’; though its proper meaning is the owner of the ship; the two capacities of owner and skipper being doubtless often combined. The distinction of Mu‘allim from Nakhuda accounts for the former title being assigned to the mate.

1497.—“And he sent 20 crusados in gold, and 20 testoons in silver for the Malemos, who were the pilots, for of these coins he would give each month whatever he (the Sheikh) should direct.”—Correa, i. 38 (E.T. by Ed. of Narratives of Adventure, 88). In this passage the Translator says: “The word is perhaps the Arabic for an instructor, a word in general use all over Africa.” It is curious that his varied experience should have failed to recognise the habitual marine use of the term.

1641.—“Meanwhile he sent three caturas (q.v) to the Port of the Malemos (Porto dos Malemos) in order to get some pilot . . . In this Port of the Bandel of the Malemos the ships of the Moors take pilots when they enter the Straits, and when they return they leave them here again.”—Correa, iv. 168.

1553.—“. . . among whom (at Melinda) came a Moor, a Gujarate by nation, called Malem Cana, who, as much for the satisfaction he had in conversing with our people, as to please the King, who was inquiring for a pilot to give them, agreed to accompany them.”—Barros, i. iv. 8.

c. 1590.—“Mu‘allim or Captain. He must be acquainted with the depths and shallow places of the Ocean, and must know astronomy. It is he who guides the ship to her destination, and prevents her falling into danger.”—Ain, ed. Blochmann, i. 230.

MAMIRAN, MAMIRA, s. A medicine from old times of much repute in the East, especially for eye-diseases, and imported from Himalayan and Trans-Himalayan regions. It is a popular native drug in the Punjab-bazars, where it is still known as mamira, also as piliri. It seems probable that the name is applied to bitter roots of kindred properties but of more than one specific origin. Hanbury and Flückiger describe it as the rhizome of Coptis Teeta, Wallich, tita being the name of the drug in the Mishimi country at the head of the Assam Valley, from which it is imported into Bengal. But Stewart states explicitly that the mamira of the Punjab bazars is now “known to be” mostly, if not entirely, derived from Thalidrum folium D.C., a tall plant which is common throughout the temperate Himalaya (5000 to 8000 feet) and on the Kasia Hills, and is exported from Kumaun under the name of Momir. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 42 sq.] “The Mamira of the old Arab writers was identified with Χελίδιον μέτο, by which, however, Löw (Aram. Pflanzennamen, p. 220) says they understood curcula longa.” W.R.S.

c. A.D. 600-700. —“Μαμίρας, οὗτός μοί τι πᾶς ἔστει ἢ ἐχων διώτερον κοιμήσαντος, ὅς ὅσια τίς καὶ λευκάματα λευκάματα πετάμεισθαι, διήλθοντι διδυμάτης ὑπάρχων δυνάμεως.”—Paulus Aeginetae Medici, Libri vii, Basileae 1588, Lib. vii. cap. iii. sect. 12 (p. 246).

c. 1020.—“Memirem quid est? Est lignum sicut nodi declinaus ad nigredinem . . . off, is an islet called the Ilheu dos Robosens; because Robosoe in Arabic means a pilot; and the pilots living here go aboard the ships which come from outside, and conduct them,” &c.—Botiro de Der Maruo, &c., 85.

The island retains its name, and is mentioned as Piló Island by Capt. Haines in J. R. Geog. Soc. ix. 126. It lies about 1½ m. due east of Perim.
MAMLUTDAR, s. P.-H. mu'dnamaltdar (from Ar. mu'dmala, 'affairs, business'), and in Mahr. mdtndar. Chiefly used in Western India. Formerly it was the designation, under various native governments, of the chief civil officer of a district, and is now in the Bombay Presidency the title of a native civil officer in charge of a Talook, corresponding nearly to the Tahseeldar of a parguna in the Bengal Presidency. It is of a status somewhat more important.

[1868.—"I now proceeded to the Mamlut-dar, or farmer of the district...."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 42.]

MAMOOL, s.; MAMOOLEE, adj. Custom, Customary. Ar.—H. mā'māl. The literal meaning is 'practised,' and then 'established, customary.' Mā'māl is, in short, 'precedent,' by which all Orientals set as much store as English lawyers, e.g. "And Laban said, It must not so be done in our country (lit. It is not so done in our place) to give the younger before the firstborn."—Genesis xxix. 26.

MAMOOTY, MAMOTY, MOMATY, s. A digging tool of the form usual all over India, i.e. not in the shape of a spade, but in that of a hoe, with the helve at an acute angle with the blade. [See FOWERA.] The word is of S. Indian origin, Tamil māvēṭṭi, 'earth-cutter'; and its vernacular use is confined to the Tamil regions, but it has long been an established term in the list of ordnance stores all over India, and thus has a certain prevalence in Anglo-Indian use beyond these limits.

[1782.—"He marched... with two battalions of sepoys... who were ordered to make a show of entrenching themselves with mamuties..."—Letter of Ed. Macartney, in Forrest, Selections, iii. 855.]

[1852.—"... by means of a mometty or hatchet, which he ran and borrowed from a husbandman... this fellow dug... a reservoir..."—Nutt, Narrative of Residence in Siam, 188.]

MANCHUA, s. A large cargo-boat, with a single mast and a square sail, much used on the Malabar coast. This is the Portuguese form; the original Malayalam word is manji, [manchi, Skt. mancha, 'a cob,' so called apparently from its raised platform for cargo], and nowadays a nearer approach to this, manjes, &c., is usual.

[1852.—"... by means of a mometty or hatchet, which he ran and borrowed from a husbandman... this fellow dug... a reservoir..."—Nutt, Narrative of Residence in Siam, 188.]

MANDARIN. 550

MANDARIN, a. Port. Mandar, Mandarin. Wedgwood explains and derives the word thus: "A Chinese officer, a name first made known to us by the Portuguese, and like the Indian caste, erroneously supposed to be a native term. From Portuguese mandar, to hold authority, command, govern, &c." So also T. Hyde in the quotation below. Except as regards the word having been first made known to us by the Portuguese, this is an old and persistent mistake. What sort of form would mandar, be as a derivative from mandar? The Portuguese might have applied to Eastern officials some such word as mandador, which a preceding article (see MANDADOR) shows that they did apply in certain cases. But the parallel to the assumed origin of mandarin from mandar would be that English voyagers on visiting China, or some other country in the far East, should have invented, as a title for the officials of that country, a new and abnormal derivation from 'order,' and called them orderumbras.

The word is really a slight, corruption of Hind. (from Skt.) mantri, 'a counsellor, a Minister of State,' for which it was indeed the proper old pre-Mahomedan term in India. It has been adopted, and specially affected in various Indo-Chinese countries, and particularly by the Malays, among whom it is habitually applied to the highest class of public officers (see Crawfurd's Malay Dict. s.v. [and Klinkert, who writes manteri, colloquially mentri]). Yet Crawfurd himself, strange to say, adopts the current explanation as from the Portuguese (see J. Ind. Archiv. iv. 189). [Klinkert adopts the Skt. derivation.] It is, no doubt, probable that the instinctive "striving after meaning" may have shaped the corruption of mantri into a semblance of mandar. Marsden is still more oddly perverse, videns meliora, deteriora secutus, when he says: "The officers next in rank to the Sultan are Mantree, MADALAY, MADALAN. n.p. The capital of the King of Burmah, founded in 1860, 7 miles north of the preceding capital Amarapura, and between 2 and 3 miles from the left bank of the Irawadi. The name was taken from that of a conical isolated hill, rising high above the alluvial plain of the Irawadi, and crowned by a girt pagoda. The name of the hill (and now of the city at its base) probably represents Mandara, the sacred mountain which in Hindu mythology served the gods as a churning-staff at the churning of the sea. The hill appears as Mandiyeta-taung in Major Grant Allan's Map of the Environs of Amarapura (1855), published in the Narrative of Major Phayre's Mission, but the name does not occur in the Narrative itself.

There are here some caves in the hard rock, built up with bricks and white-washed, which are inhabited by eremites ... ." — Bastian's Travels (German), ii. 99-90. which some apprehend to be a corruption of the word Mandarin, a title of distinction among the Chinese” (H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 285). Ritter adopts the etymology from mandar, apparently after A. W. Schlegel.* The true etymology is pointed out in Notes and Queries in China and Japan, iii. 12, and by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways for Sept. 1872, p. 186. Several of the quotations below will show that the earlier applications of the title have no reference to China at all, but to officers of state, not only in the Malay countries, but in Continental India. We may add that mantri (see MUNTREE) is still much in vogue among the less barbarous Hill Races on the Eastern frontier of Bengal (e.g. among the Kastas (see COBSTA) as a denomination for their petty dignitaries under the chief. Gibbon was perhaps aware of the true origin of mandarin; see below.

Mandarin Language. a. The language spoken by the official and literary class in China, as opposed to local dialects. In Chinese it is called Kuan-Hua. Mangalore, n.p. The only place now well known by this name is (a) Mangalat, a port on the coast of Southern Canara and chief town of that district, in lat. 12° 41' N. In Mir Hussain Ali's Life of Haidar it is called "Gorial Bunder," perhaps a corr. of Kandath, which is said in the Imp. Gaz. to be the modern native name. [There is a place called Gurupura close by; see Madras Gloss. s.v. Goorponge.] The name in this form is found in an inscription of the 11th century, whatever may have been its original form and etymology. [The present name is said to be taken from the temple of Mangala Devi.] But the name in approximate forms (from maṅgala, 'gladness') is common in India. One other port (b) on the coast of Peninsular Guzerat was formerly well known, now commonly called Mungroli. And another place of the name (c) Mangalav in the valley of Swat, north of Peshawar, is mentioned by Hwen Tsang as a city of Gandhara. It is probably the same that appears in Skt. literature (see Williams, s.v. Mangala) as the capital of Udyana.

150.—"Metaxi de το τεσσαράκοντα και το τέσσερα χίλια αὔτε Μαγγάσου."—Ptolemy, VII. i. 86.

154.—"And the most notable places of trade are these... and then the five ports of Malé from which pepper is exported, to wit, Parti, Mangarah..."—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c. clixxvii.

1343.—"Quitting Fakānur (see BACANOER) we arrived after three days at the city of Manjarur, which is large and situated on an estuary... It is here that most of the merchants of Fars and Yemen, land; pepper and ginger are very abundant."— Ibn Batuta, iv. 79-80.

1442.—"After having passed the port of Bendinah (see PANDARNI) situated on the coast of Melibar, he reached the port of Mangalore, which forms the frontier of the kingdom of Bidjanagar..."—Aburrazzuz, in India in the XVth Cent., 20.

1516.—"There is another large river towards the south, along the sea-shore, where there is a very large town, peopled by Moors and Gentoils, of the kingdom of Narsinga, called Mangalor... They also ship there much rice in Moorish ships for Aden, also pepper, which thenceforward the earth begins to produce."—Barbara, 83.

1727.—"The Fields here bare two Crops of Corn yearly in the Plains; and the higher Grounds produce Pepper, Betel-nut, Sandalwood, Iron and Steel, which make Mangalore a Place of pretty good Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 265, [ed. 1744].

b. Mangalor or Mungrole in Guzerat.

c. 150.—"Συμπεραγόντω... Συμπεραγόντω... Μεγάλωσον... Μεγάλωσον..."—Ptolemy, VII. i. 3.

1516.—"... there is another town of commerce, which has a very good port, and is called Shrit Mangalor, where also many ships of Malabar touch."—Barbara, 59.

1536.—"... for there was come another cataract with letters, in which the Captain of Diu urgently called for help; telling how the King (of Cambay) had equipped large squadrons in the Ports of the Gulf... alleging... that he was sending them to Mangalor to join others in an expedition against Sinde... and that all this was false, for he was really sending them in the expectation that the Rumis would come to..."
MANGELIN, 553

MANGELIN, s. A small weight, corresponding in a general way to a carat (q.v.), used in the S. of India and in Ceylon for weighing precious stones. The word is Telegu manjadi; in Tamil manjadi, [from Skt. manju, 'beautiful']; the seed of the Adenanthera pavonina (Compare BUTTEE). On the origin of this weight see Sir W. Elliot's Coins of S. India. The manjadi seed was used as a measure of weight from very early times. A parcel of 50 taken at random gave an average weight of 4.13 grs. Three parcels of 10 each, selected by eye as large, gave average 5.02 and 5.03 (op. cit. p. 47).

1516.—Diamonds "... sell by a weight which is called a Manglar, which is equal to 2 tare and ¼, and 2 tare make a carat of good weight, and 4 tare weigh one fanam." —Barboza, in Ramosio, i. f. 321 v.

1564.—(In Ceylon) "A calamina contains 20 mangelins, each mangelin 8 grains of rice; a Portuguese of gold weighs 8 calamases and 2 mangelins."—A. Nunes, 35.

1564.—"There is another sort of weight called Mangalingo, which is 5 grains of Venice weight, and therewith they weigh diamantes and other jewels."—Barret, in Hakti, ii. 400.

1611.—"Quem não sabe a grandezza das minas de finíssimos diamantes do Reyno de Bissaga, onde cada dia, e cada hora se tiram peças de tamanho de hum ovo, e muitas de sessenta e oitenta mangelins."—Conde, Dialogo do Soldato Pratico, 154.

1655.—"Le poids principal des Diamans est le mangelin; il pèse cinq grains et trois cinqièmes."—Thenot, v. 283.

1676.—"At the mine of Raolconda they weigh by Mangelins, a Mangelin being one Carat and three quarters, that is 7 grains. ... At the Mine of Souempore in Bengal they weigh by Rat's (see BUTTEE), and the Rat is ¾ of a Carat, or 3½ grains. In the Kingdoms of Golconda and Visapour, they make use of Mangelines, but a Mangelin in those parts is not above 1 carat and ¾. The Portugals in Goa make use of the same Weights in Goa; but a Mangelin there is not above 5 grains."—Tavernier, B.T. ii. 141; [ed. Ball, ii. 87, and see ii. 433.]

MANGO, s. The royal fruit of the Mangifera indica, when of good quality is one of the richest and best fruits in the world. The original of the word is Tamil mān-kēry or mān-gēry, i.e. mān fruit (the tree being mānarmac, 'mān-tree'). The Portuguese formed from this mānaka, which we have adopted as mango. The tree is wild in the forests of various parts of India; but the fruit of the wild tree is unætable.

The word has sometimes been supposed to be Malay; but it was in fact introduced into the Archipelago, along with the fruit itself, from S. India. Rumphius (Herb. Amboyn. i. 95) traces its then recent introduction into the islands, and says that it is called (Malais) "mānaka, vel vulgo Mango et Mapelaam." This last word is only the Tamil Māpalam, i.e. 'mān fruit' again. The close approximation of the Malay mānaka to the Portuguese form might suggest that the latter name was derived from Malacca. But we see mānaka already used by Varthema, who, according to Garcia, never really went beyond Malabar. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The modern standard Malay word is mānnga, from which the Port. form was probably taken. The other Malay form quoted from Rumphius is in standard Malay mapelam, with mēpelam, hēmpelam, ampelam, and 'pelam or 'plam as variants. The Javanese is pēlēm."]

The word has been taken to Madagascar, apparently by the Malayans, whose language has left so large an impression there, in the precise shape mānaka. Had the fruit been an Arab importation it is improbable that the name would have been introduced in that form.

The N. Indian names are Ām and Āmba, and variations of these we find in several of the older European writers. Thus Fr. Jordanus, who had been in the Konkan, and appreciated the progenitors of the Goa and Bombay Mango (c. 1326), calls the fruit Aniba. Some 30 years later John de’ Marignolli calls the tree “amburan, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach” (Cathay, &c., ii. 362). Garcia de Orta shows how early the Bombay fruit was prized. He seems to have been the owner of the parent tree. The Skt. name is Amra, and this we find in Hwen T’song (c. 645) phoneticised as ’An-mo-lo.

The mango is probably the fruit alluded to by Theophrastus as having caused dyserny in the army of Alexander. (See the passage a.v. Jack).

c. 1326.—“Est etiam alia arbor quae fructus facit ad modum pruni, grossissimo, qui vocantur Aniba. Hi sunt fructus ita dulces et amables, quod ore tenues exprimi hoc minus posse.”—Fr. Jordanus, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv. 42.

c. 1334.—“The mango tree (amba) resembles an orange-tree, but is larger and more leafy; no other tree gives so much shade, but this shade is unweshome, and whoever sleeps under it gets fever.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 125. At ii. 136 he writes amba. [The same charge is made against the tamarind; see Burston, Ar. Nights, iii. 81.]

c. 1349.—“They have also another tree called Amburan, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach.”—John de’ Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 362.

1510.—“Another fruit is also found here, which is called Aba, the stem of which is called Manges.”—Furtado, 160-161.

c. 1526.—“Of the vegetable productions peculiar to Hindustan one is the mango (ambba). . . . Such mangoes as are good are excellent. . . .” —Baber, 324.

1563.—“O. Boy! go and see what two vessels those are coming in—you see them from the varanda here—and they seem but small ones.

“Servant. I will bring you word presently.

“S. Sir! it is Simon Toccano, your tenant in Bombay, and he brings this hamper of manges for you to make a present to the Governor, and says that when he has moored the boat he will come here to stop.

“O. He couldn’t have come more apropos. I have a mango-tree (mangiferia) in that island of mine which is remarkable for both its two crops, one at this time of year, the other at the end of May, and much as the other crop excels this in quality for fragrance and flavour, this is just as remarkable for coming out of season. But come, let us taste them before His Excellency.

“Boy! take out six manges.”—Garcia, ff. 154v, 158. This author also mentions that the mangas of Ormuz were the most celebrated; also certain mangas of Guzerat, not large, but of surpassing fragrance and flavour, and having a very small stone. Those of Bengal that were both excellent and big; the Doctor had seen two that weighed 4 arpent and a half (4½ lbs.); and those of Bengal, Mogu, and Malacca were also good.

[1569.—“There is much fruit that comes from Arabia and Persia, which they call mangoes (mangas), which is very good fruit.”—Oronico dos Reys Dormuz, translated from the Arabic in 1569.]

c. 1560.—“The Mangoes (Abel). . . .

This fruit is unrivalled in colour, smell, and taste; and some of the gourmets of Tiran and Iran place it above musk melons and grapes. . . . If a half-ripe mango, together with its stalk to a length of about two fingers, be taken from the tree, and the broken end of its stalk be closed with warm wax, and kept in butter or honey, the fruit will retain its taste for two or three months.”—As, ed. Blockman, i. 67-68.

1615.—“George Durois sent in a present of two pottes of Mangues.”—Jock’s Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 79.]

[They are another very loquacious fruit called Ammangue growing on trees, and it is as big as a great quince, with a very great stone in it.”—De Monfort, 20.]

1622.—P. della Valle describes the tree and fruit at Minâ (Mousa) near Hormuz, under the name of Amoba, as an exotic introduced from India. Afterwards at Goa he speaks of it as “manga or emba.”—ii. pp. 313-14, and 581; [Hak. Soc. i. 40].

1631.—“Alibi vero commenorat mangae speciem fortis admodum odoris, Terebinthinae sicilicus, et Piceae arboris lacrymam redolientes, quas propter nocri nostri mallices appallunt.”—Pico on Bentius, Hist. Nat. p. 35.

[1633.—“Ambas, or Mangues, are in season during two months in summer, and are plentiful and cheap: but those grown at Delhi are indifferent. The best come from Bengal, Golconda, and Goa, and these are indeed excellent. I do not know any sweet-meat more agreeable.”—Bernier, ed. Constable, 249.]

1673.—Of the Goa Mangue, * Fryer says justly: “When ripe, the Apples of the Esperides are but Fables to them; for Taste, the Nectarine, Peach, and Apricot fall short.”—p. 182.

1679.—“Mango and salo (see SOY), two sorts of souces brought from the East Indies.”—Locke’s Journal, in Ed. King’s Life, 1630, i. 249.

* The excellence of the Goa Mangoes is stated to be due to the care and skill of the Jesuits (Jesuas Maritimes, ii. 270). In S. India all good kinds have Portuguese or Mahavishnud names. The author of Tribes on My Frontier, 1833, p. 148, mentions the inusculous petris and the delicate afores as two fine varieties, supposed to bear the names of a certain Ferre and a certain Afames.
1727.—"The Goa mango is reckoned the largest and most delicious to the taste of any in the world, and I may add, the wholesomest and best tasted of any Fruit in the World."—A. Hamilton, i. 256, [ed. 1744, i. 258].

1883.—"... the unsophisticated ryot... conceives that cultivation could only emasculate the pronounced flavour and firm fibrous texture of that prince of fruits, the wild mango, to set a ball of tow soaked in turpentine."—Trises on My Frontier, 149.

The name has been carried with the fruit to Mauritius and the West Indies. Among many greater services to India the late Sir Proby Cautley diffused largely in Upper India the delicious fruit of the Bombay mango, previously rare there, by creating and encouraging groves of grafts on the banks of the Ganges and Jumna canals. It is especially true of this fruit (as Sultan Baber indicates) that excellence depends on the variety. The common mango is coarse and strong of turpentine. Of this only an evanescent suggestion remains to give peculiarity to the finer varieties. [A useful account of these varieties, by Mr. Maries, will be found in Watt, Econ. Dict. v. 148 seqq.]

MANGO-BIRD, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the beautiful golden oriole (Oriolus aureus, Jerdon). Its "loud mellow whistle" from the mango-groves and other gardens, which it affects, is associated in Upper India with the invasion of the hot weather.

1875.—"The mango-bird glances through the groves and in the early morning announces his beautiful and unwelcome presence with his merle melody."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 59.

MANGO-FISH, s. The familiar name of an excellent fish (Polynemus Vircus of Buchanan, P. paradiseus of Day), in favour somewhat resembling the murtle, but, according to Dr. Mason, nearly related to the murtles. It appears in the Calcutta market early in the hot season, and is much prized, especially when in roe. The Hindustani name is tapai or tapassi, 'an ascetic,' or 'penitent,' but we do not know the rationale of the name. Buchanan says that it is owing to the long fibres (or free rays), proceeding from near the head, which lead the natives to associate it with penitents who are forbidden to shave. [Dr. Grierson writes: "What the connection of the fish with a hermit was I never could ascertain, unless it was that like wandering Fakirs, they disappear directly the rains begin. Compare the upasatha of the Buddhists." But tapasya means 'produced by heat,' and is applied to the month Phâgun (Feb.-March) when the fish appears; and this may be the origin of the name.]

1781.—"The Board of Trustees Assemble on Tuesday at the New Tavern, when the Committee meet to eat Mangoes Fish for the benefit of the Subscribers and on other special affairs."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, March 3.

[1820.—"... the mango fish (so named from its appearing during the mango season)... By the natives they are named the Tapasur (penitent) fish, (abbreviated by Europeans to Tpsey) from their resembling a class of religious penitents, who ought never to shave."—Hamilton, Des. of Hindustan, i. 58.]

MANGO-SHOWERS, s. Used in Madras for showers which fall in March and April, when the mangoes begin to ripen.

MANGO-TRICK. One of the most famous tricks of Indian jugglers, in which they plant a mango-stone, and show at brief intervals the tree shooting above ground, and successively producing leaves, flowers, and fruit. It has often been described, but the description given by the Emperor Jahângîr in his Autobiography certainly surpasses all in its demand on our belief.

c. 1610.—"... Khau-n-e-Jehann, one of the nobles present, observed that if they spoke truly he should wish them to produce for his conviction a mulberry-tree. The men arose without hesitation, and having in ten separate spots set some seed in the ground, they recited among themselves... when instantly a plant was seen springing from each of the ten places, and each proved the tree required by Khau-n-e-Jehann. In the same manner they produced a mango, an apple-tree, a cypress, a pine-apple, a fig-tree, an almond, a walnut... open to the observation of all present, the trees were perceived gradually and slowly springing from the earth, to the height of one or perhaps of two cubits... Then making a sort of procession round the trees as they stood... in a moment there appeared on the respective trees a sweet mango without the rind, an almond fresh and ripe, a large fig of the most delicious kind... the fruit being pulled in my presence, and every one present was allowed to taste it. This, however, was not all; before the trees were removed there appeared among the foliage birds of such surpassing beauty, in colour and shape, and melody and song, as the world never saw before. . . . At the close of the operation, the foliage, as in autumn, was seen to put on its variegated tints, and the trees gradually disappeared into the earth. . . . —Mem. of the Emp. Jehanguir, tr. by Major D. Price, pp. 96-97.

c. 1650.—“Then they thrust a piece of stick into the ground, and ask’d the Company what Fruit they would have. One told them he would have Mongoose; then one of the Mountebanks hiding himself in the middle of a Sheet, stoop to the ground five or six times one after another. I was so curious to go upstairs, and look out of a window, to see if I could spy what the Mountebank did, and perceived that after he had cut himself under the arm pits with a Razor, he rubb’d the stick with his Blood. After the two first times that he rais’d himself, the blood was very hot, and grew. The third time there sprang out branches with young buds. The fourth time the branch was covered with leaves; and the fifth time it bore flowers. . . . The English Minister protested that he could not give his consent that any Christian should be Spectator of such delusions. So that as soon as he saw that these Mountebanks had of a dry stick, in less than half-an-hour, made a Tree four or five foot high, that bare leaves and flowers as in the Spring-time: he went about to break it, protesting that he would not give the Commination to any person that should stay any longer to see those things.”—Tavernier, Travels made English, by J.P., ii. 36; [ed. Ball, i. 67, seq.]

1667.—“When two of these Javaus (see Jogue) that are eminent, do meet, and you stir them up on the point and power of their knowledge or Javaisme, you shall see them do such tricks out of spight to one another, that I know not if Simon Magus could have outdone them. For they divine what one thinketh, make the Branch of a Tree blossoms and bear fruit in less than an hour, hatch eggs in their bosoms in less than half a quarter of an hour, and bring forth such birds as you demand: I mean, if what is said of them is true. . . . For, as for me, I am with all my curiosity none of those happy Men, that are present at these contrivances, ut inveniant se ipsos.”—Bernier, E.T. 103; [ed. Constable, 321].

1673.—“Others presented a Mock-Creation of a Mango-Tree, arising from the Stone in a short space (which they did in Hugger-Mugger, being very careful to avoid being discovered) with Fruit Green and Ripe; so that a Man must stretch his Fancy, to imagine it Witchcraft; though the common Sort think no less.”—Fryer, 192.

1690.—“Others are said to raise a Mango-Tree, with ripe Fruit upon its Branches, in the space of one or two Hours. To confirm which Relation, it was affirmed confidently to me, that a Gentleman who had plucked one of these Mangoes, fell sick upon it, and was never well as long as he kept it ‘till he consulted a Bramin for his Health, who prescribed his only Remedy would be the restoring of the Mango, by which he was restored to his Health again.”—Uxington, 258-259.

1726.—“They have some also who will show you the kernel of a mango-fruit, or may be only a twig, and ask if you will see the fruit or this stick planted, and in a short time see a tree grow from it and bear fruit: after they have got their answer the jugglers (Kooree-dansers) wrap themselves in a blanket, stick the twig into the ground, and then put a basket over them (&c. &c.).

“There are some who have prevailed on these jugglers by much money to let them see how they have accomplished this.

“These have revealed that the jugglers made a hole in their bodies under the arm pits, and rubbed the twig with the blood from it, and every time that they stuck it in the ground it revivified it, and in this way they clearly saw it to grow and to come to the perfection before described.

“This is asserted by a certain writer who has seen it. But this can’t move me to believe it!”—Valentijn, v. (Chorom.) 53.

Our own experience does not go beyond Dr. Fryer’s, and the hugger-mugger performance that he disparages. But many others have testified to more remarkable skill. We once heard a traveller of note relate with much spirit such an exhibition as witnessed in the Deccan. The narrator, then a young officer, determined with a comrade, at all hazards of fair play or foul, to solve the mystery. In the middle of the trick one suddenly seized the conjurer, whilst the other uncovered and snatched at the mango-plant. But lo! it came from the earth with a root, and the mystery was darker than ever! We tell the tale as it was told.

It would seem that the trick was not unknown in European conjuring of the 16th or 17th centuries, e.g.

1657.—“. . . trium horarum spatio arbuculam veram spatias longitudine e semen facientes, ut vis albo fructibus frondiferis et fructiferis.”—Maria Universalis, of P. Gaspar Schottius e Soc. Jes., Heriboli, 1657, i. 52.

MANGOSTEEEN, a. From Malay manggusta (Crawford), or manggustan (Favre), in Javanese Manggis. [Mr. Skeat writes: “The modern standard Malay form used in the W. coast of the Peninsula is manggis, as in Javanese, the forms manggusta and manggustan never being heard there. The Siamese form maangkhut given in M'Farland's Siamese Grammar is probably from the Malay manggusa. It was very interesting to me to find that some distinct trace of this word was still preserved in the name of this fruit at Patani-Kelantan on the E. coast, where it was called *bawak seta (or setar), i.e. the 'setar fruit,' as well as occasionally mestor or *mesat*ar, clearly a corruption of some such old form as manggatar."

This delicious fruit is known throughout the Archipelago, and in Siam, by modifications of the same name; the delicious fruit of the Garcinia Mangostana (Nat. Ord. Guttiferae). It is strictly a tropical fruit, and, in fact, near the coast does not bear fruit further north than lat. 14°. It is a native of the Malay Peninsula and the adjoining islands.

1563.—"R. They have bragged much to me of a fruit which they call mangostans; let us hear what you have to say of these.

"I. What I have heard of the mangostan is that 'tis one of the most delicious fruits that they have in these regions..."

—Garcia, f. 151v.

1568.—"There are yet other fruits, as... Mangostains [in Hak. Soc. Mangostains]... but because they are of small account I think it not requisite to write severalie of them."

—Linschoten, 98; [Hak. Soc. ii. 34].

1631.—"Codant Hesperii longe hinc, mala aurea, fructus..."

—Abnorsulus.

1645.—"Il s'y trouve de plus vne espece de fruit propre du terroir de Malaque, qu'ils nomment Mangostans."

—Cardim, Rel. de la Prov. de Japon, 162.

1662.—"The Mangosthan is a Fruit growing by the Highways in Java, upon bushes, like our Sloes..."

1727.—"The Mangostano is a delicious Fruit, almost in the Shape of an Apple, the Skin is thick and red, being dried it is a good Astringent. The Kernels (if I may so call them) are like Cloves of Garlic, of a very agreeable Taste, but very cold."

—A. Hamilton, ii. 80 [ed. 1744].

a. The sea-loving genera Rhizophora and Avicennia derive this name, which applies to both, from some happy accident, but from which of two sources may be doubtful. For while the former genus is, according to Crawford, called by the Malays mangi-mangi, a term which he supposes to be the origin of the English name, we see from Oviedo that one or other was called mangle in S. America, and in this, which is certainly the origin of the French manglier, we should be disposed also to seek the derivation of the English word. Both genera are universal in the tropical tidal estuaries of both Old World and New. Prof. Sayce, by an amusing slip, or oversight probably of somebody else's slip, quotes from Humboldt that "maize, mangle, hammock, canoe, tobacco, are all derived through the medium of the Spanish from the Haytian mahiz, mangle, hamaaca, canoa, and tabaco." It is, of course, the French and not the English mangle that is here in question. [Mr. Skeat observes: "I believe the old English as well as French form was mangle, in which case Prof. Sayce would be perfectly right. Mangrove is probably mangle-grove. The Malay mangi-mangi is given by Klinkert, and is certainly on account of the reduplication, native. But I never heard it in the Peninsula, where mangrove is always called bakau."

The mangrove abounds on nearly all the coasts of further India, and also on the sea margin of the Ganges Delta, in the backwaters of S. Malabar, and less luxuriantly on the Indus mouths.

1585.—"Of the Tree called Mangle. These trees grow in places of mud, and on the shores of the sea, and of the rivers, and streams, and torrents that run into the sea. They are trees very strange to see... they grow together in vast numbers, and many of their branches seem to turn down and change into roots... and these plant themselves in the ground like stems, so that the tree looks as if it had many legs joining one to the other."—Oviedo, in Ramusio, iii. f. 145v.

"So coming to the coast, embarked in a great Canoe with some 50 Indians, and 5 Christians, whom he took with him, and coasted along amid solitary places and islets, passing sometimes into the sea itself for 4 or 5 leagues,—among certain trees, lofty, dense and green, which grow in the very sea-water, and which they call mangle."—Ibid. f. 224.

1585.—"... by advice of a Moorish pilot, who promised to take the people by night to a place where water could be got and either because the Moor desired to land many times on the shore which he was conducting them, seeking to get away from the hands of those whom he was conducting, or because he was really perplexed by its being night, and in the middle of a great growth of mangrove (mangues) he never succeeded in finding the wells of which he spoke."—Barros, i. iv. 4.

... 1830.—" 'Smite my timbers, do the trees bear shellfish?' The tide in the Gulf of Mexico does not eb and flow above two feet except in the springs, and the ends of the drooping branches of the mangrove trees that here cover the shore, are clustered, within the wash of the water, with a small well-flavoured oyster."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1860, 119.

MANILLA-MAN, s. This term is applied to natives of the Philippines, who are often employed on shipboard, and especially furnish the quartermasters (Seacunny, q.v.) in Lascar crews on the China voyage. But Manilla-man seems also, from Wilson, to be used in S. India as a hybrid from Telug. manela vaddu, 'an itinerant dealer in coral and gems'; perhaps in this sense, as he says, from Skt. mani, 'a jewel,' but with some blending also of the Port. maniha, 'a bracelet.' (Compare COBRA-MANILLA.)

MANJEE, s. The master, or steersman, of a boat or any native river-craft; Hind. mānjā, Beng. mājī and mdajī, [all from Skt. madhya, 'one who stands in the middle']. The word is also a title borne by the head men among the Pahāris or Hill-people of Rājmahal (Wilson), [and as equivalent for Majhār, the name of an important Dravidian tribe on the borders of the N.W. Provinces and Chota Nagpur].

1682.—"We were forced to track our boat till 4 in the Afternoon, when we saw a great black cloud arise out of ye North with much lightning and thunder, which made our Manges or Steerman advise us to fasten our boat in some Creeke."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 88.

1781.—"This is to give notice that the principal Ghat Mangees of Calcutta have entered into engagements at the Police Office to supply all Persons that apply there with Boats and Boulderows, and to give security for the Dandies."—India Gazette, Feb. 17.

1784.—"Mr. Austin and his head bearer, who were both in the room of the budgerow, are the only persons known to be drowned. The mangies and dandees have not appeared."—In Seton-Karr, i. 25.

1810.—"Their manjies will not fail to take every advantage of whatever distress, or difficulty, the passenger may labour under."—Williamson, V. M., i. 148.

For the Pahari use, see Long’s Selections, p. 561.

[1844.—"The Khond chiefs of villages and Mootas are termed Mall instead of Mulliko as in Goomeur, or Khono as in Road. . . ."—Campbell, Wild Tribes of Khondistan, 120.]

MANNICKJORE, s. Hind. mānıkjor; the white-necked stork (Ciconia leucocephala, Gmelin); sometimes, according to Jerdon, called in Bengal the ‘Bee-steak bird,’ because palatable when cooked in that fashion. "The name of Manikjor means the companion of Manik, a Saint, and some Musselmans in consequence abstain from eating it" (Jerdon). [Platts derives it from mānık, ‘a ruby.’]

MANUODIATA. (See BIRD OF PARADISE.)

MARAMUT, MURRUMUT, s. Hind. from Ar. marammat(t), ‘repair.’ In this sense the use is general in Hindustani (in which the terminal t is always pronounced, though not by the Arabe), whether as applied to a stocking, a fortors, or a ship. But in Madras Presidency the word had formerly a very specialised sense as the recognised title of that branch of the Executive which included the conservation of irrigation tanks and the like, and which was worked under the District Civil Officers, there being then no separate department of the State in charge of Civil Public Works. It is a curious illustration of the wide spread at one time of Musulman power that the same Arabic word, in the form Maram, is still applied in Sicily to a standing committee charged with repairs to the Duomo or Cathedral of Palermo. An analogous instance of the wide grasp of the Saracenic power is mentioned by one of the Mussulman authors whom Amari quotes in his History of the Mahomedan rule in Sicily. It is that the Caliph Al-Mamūn, under whom conquest was advancing in India and in Sicily simultaneously, ordered that the idols taken from the infidels in India should be sent for sale to the infidels in Sicily!
MARGOSA, s. A name in the S. of India and Ceylon for the Nīm (see NEEM) tree. The word is a corruption of Port. amargosa, ‘bitter,’ indicating the character of the tree. This gives rise to an old Indian proverb, traceable as far back as the Jātaka, that you cannot sweeten the nīm tree though you water it with syrup and ghee (Naturam expellas furcid, &c.).

1727.—“The wealth of an evil man shall another evil man take from him, just as the crow comes and eat the fruit of the margouise tree as soon as it is ripe.”—Apophthegms translated in Valentinia, v. (Ceylon) 390.

1782.—“... ils lavent le malade avec de l'eau froide, ensuite ils le frottent rude- ment avec de la feuille de Margouiser.” —Sonnerat, i. 208.

1834.—“Adjoacent to the Church stand a number of tamarind and margosa trees.” —Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 183.

MARKHORE, s. Pers. mār-khūr, ‘snake-eater.’ A fine wild goat of the Western Himalaya; Caspa megaceros, Hutton.

[1851.—“Hence the people of the country call it the Markhor (eater of serpents).” —Edwards, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 474.

[1895.—“Never more would he chase the ibex and makor.” —Mrs. Croker, Village Tales, 112.]

MARTABAN, n.p. This is the conventional name, long used by all the trading nations, Asiatic and European, for a port on the east of the Irawadi Delta and of the Sitang estuary, formerly of great trade, but now in comparative decay. The original name is Talaing, Mūl-ta-man, the meaning of which we have been unable to ascertain.

1614.—“... passed then before Martabane, the people also heasthens; men expert in everything, and first-rate merchants; great masters of accounts, and in fact the greatest in the world. They keep their accounts in books like us. In the said country is great produce of lac, cloths, and provisions.” —Letter of Grim. da Espoti, p. 80.

1545.—“At the end of these two days the King ... caused the Captains that were at the Guard of the Gates to leave them and retire; whereupon the miserable City of Martaban was delivered to the mercy of the Souldiers ... and therein showed themselves so cruel-minded, that the thing they made least reckoning of was to kill 100 men for a crown.” —Pinto, in Cogax, 283.

1558.—“And the towns which stand outside this gulf of the Isles of Pegu (of which we have spoken) and are placed along the coast of that country, are Vagara, Martaban, a city notable in the great trade that it enjoys, and further on Rey, Talaga, and Tavay.” —Barros, I. ix. 1.

1568.—“Trouassimo nella città di Marta- than intorno a nouanta Portoghesi, tra mercadanti e uomini vagabondi, li quali stauano in gran differenza co' Rettori della citta.” —Oz. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 382.

1586.—“The city of Martaban hath its front to the south-east, south, and southwest, and stands on a river which there enters the sea ... it is a city of Maupar-agia, a Prince of the King of Pegu's.” —Gasparo Balbi, i. 129v., 130v.

1680.—“That the English may settle factories at Serian, Pegu, and Ava ... and also that they may settle a factory in like manner at Mortavan...” —Articles to be proposed to the King of Burma and Pegu in Notes and Jesta., No. iii. p. 8.

1695.—“Concerning Bartholomew Rodrigues... I am informed and do believe he put into Mortavan for want of wood and water, and was there seized by the King's officers, because not bound to that Place.” —Governor Higgens, in Dalrymple, O. Repert. ii. 342-3.

MARTABAN, s. This name was given to vessels of a peculiar pottery, of very large size, and glazed, which were famous all over the East for many centuries, and were exported from Martaban. They were sometimes called Pegu jars, and under that name specimens were shown at the Great Exhibition of 1851. We have not been able to obtain recent information on the subject of this manufacture. The word appears to be now obsolete in India, except as a colloquial term in Telegu. [The word is certainly not obsolete in Upper India: "The martaban’ (Plate ii. fig. 10) is a small deep jar with an elongated body, which is used by Hindus and Muhammadans to keep pickles and acid articles" (Hallifax, Mono. of Punjab Pottery, p. 9). In the endeavour to supply a Hindi derivation it has been derived from im-rītā-bān, ‘the holder of the water of immortality.’ In the Arabian Nights.
the word appears in the form bartaman, and is used for a crock in which gold is buried. (Burton, xi. 26). Mr. Bell saw some large earthenware jars at Malé, some about 2 feet high, called rumba; others larger and barrel-shaped, called mátaban. (Pyrrard, Hak. Soc. i. 259.) For the modern manufacture, see Scott, Gazetteer of Upper Burma, 1800, Pt. i. vol. ii. 399 seq.

c. 1350.—"Then the Princess made me a present consisting of dresses, of two elephant-loads of rice, of two she-buffaloes, ten sheep, four roods of coroidal syrup, and four martaban, or huge jars, filled with pepper, citron, and mango, all prepared with salt, as for a sea voyage."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 253.

(I).—"Un grand bassin de martaban."—1001 Jours, ed. Paris 1826, ii. 19. We do not know the date of these stories. The French translator has a note explaining "porcelaine verte."

1508.—"The lac (lacry) which your Highness desired me to send, it will be a piece of good luck to get, because these ships depart early, and the vessels from Pegu and martaban come late. But I hope for a good quantity of it, as I have given orders for it."—Letter from the Viceroy Dom Francisco Almeida to the King. In Corr. i. 900.

1516.—"In this town of martaban are made very large and beautiful porcelain vases, and some of glazed earthenware of a black colour, which are highly valued among the Moors, and they export them as merchandise."—Barbon, 185.

1598.—"In this town are made many of the great earthen pots, which in India are called martaban, and many of them carried throughout all India, of all sorts both small and great; some are so great that they will hold full two pipes of water. The cause why so many are brought into India is for that they use them in every house, and in their ships instead of casks."—Linschoten, p. 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 101; see also i. 28, 288.]

c. 1610.—"... des jarres les plus belles, les mieux vernis et les mieux faconnées que j'ay eu ailleurs. Il y en qui tiennent autant qu'une pipe et plus. Elles se font au Royaume de martaban, d'où on les apporte, et d'où elles prennent leur nom par tout l'Inde."—Pyyrrard de Laval, i. 179; [Hak. Soc. i. 259.]

1615.—"Vasa figurina que vulgo martaban dicuntur per Indiam nota sunt. ... Per Orientem omnen, quin et Lusitaniam, horum est usus."—Jarric, Thesaurus Rer. Indic. pt. ii. 889.

1673.—"Je vis un vase d'une certaine terre verte qui vient des Indes, dont les Turcs, ... font un grand estime, et qu'ils achetent bien cher à cause de la propriété qu'elle a de se rompre à la présence du poivre. Ce vase est comme martaban."—Journal d'Ant. Galland. ii. 110.

1673.—"... to that end offer Rice, Oyl, and Coco-Nuts in a thick Grove, where they piled an huge Heap of long Jars like Martivans."—Fryer, 180.

1688.—"They took it out of the cask, and put it into earthen Jars that hold but eight Barrels apiece. These they call Martivans Jars, from a town of that name in Pegu, whence they are brought, and carried all over India."—Dampier, ii. 98.

c. 1690.—"Sunt autem haec vastissimae ac turgidae ollae in regionibus Martavanas et Siama confectae, quae per totam trans-feruntur Indiam ad varios liquores conservandos."—Ramphius, i. ch. iii.

1711.—"... Pegu, Quedah, Javore and all their own Coasts, whence they are plentifully supply'd with several Necessaries, they otherwise must want; As Ivory, Beeswax, Martivans and small Jars, Pepper, &c."—Lockyer, 35.

1726.—"... and the Martivans containing the water to drink, when empty require two persons to carry them."—Valentijn, v. 254.

"The goods exported hitherward (from Pegu) are ... glazed pots (called Martivan after the district where they properly belong), both large and little."—Ibid. v. 128.

1797.—"Martaban was one of the most flourishing Towns for Trade in the East. They make earthen Ware there still, and glaze them with Lead-oar. I have seen some Jars made there that could contain two Hogheads of Liquor."—A. Hamilton, i. 83, [ed. 1744, ii. 62.]

1740.—"The Pay Master is likewise ordered ... to look out for all the Pegu Jars in Town, or other vessels proper for keeping water."—In Wheeler, iii. 194.

Such jars were apparently imitated in other countries, but kept the original name. Thus Beillie Fraser says that "certain jars called martaban were manufactured in Oman."—Journey into Khorasan, 18.

MARTIL, MARTOL, s. A hammer. Hind mard, from Port. martelo, but assisted by imaginary connection with Hind mdr-nč, 'to strike.'

MARTINGALE, s. This is no specially Anglo-Indian word; our excuse for introducing it is the belief that it is of Arabic origin. Popular assumption, we believe, derives the name from a mythical Colonel Martin-gale. But the word seems to come to us from the French, in which language, besides the English use, MARWAEEE. 561  MASULIPATAM.

Littre gives chaussé à la martingale as meaning “culottes dont le pont était placé par derrière,” and this he strangely declares to be the true and original meaning of the word. His etymology, after Ménage, is from Martigues in Provence, where, it is alleged, breeches of this kind were worn. Skeat seems to accept these explanations. [But see his Concise Dict., where he inclines to the view given in this article, and adds: “I find Arab. rataq given by Richardson as a verbal root, whence ratak, going with a short quick step.”] But there is a Span. word al-martaga, for a kind of bridle, which Urrea quoted by Dozy derives from verb Arab. rataq, “qui, à la IVe forme signifie ‘effect ut brevibus assibus incederet.’” This is precisely the effect of a martingale. And we venture to say that probably the word bore its English meaning originally also in French and Spanish, and came from Arabic direct into the latter tongue. Dozy himself, we should add, is inclined to derive the Span. word from al-mirta‘a, ‘a halter.’

MARWAEE, n.p. and s. This word Mārīyā, properly a man of the Mārwār [Skt. maru, ‘desert’], or Jodhpur country in Rājputāna, is used in many parts of India as synonymous with Banya (see BANYAN) or Bowcar, from the fact that many of the traders and money-lenders have come originally from Mārwār, most frequently Jains in religion. Compare the Lombard of medieval England, and the caurino of Dante’s time.

MARYACAB, n.p. According to R. Drummond and a MS. note on the India Library copy of his book R. Catholics in Malabar were so called. Marya Karar, or Mary’s People, [The word appears to be really marakkar, of which two explanations are given. Logan (Malabar, i. 332 note) says that Marakkar means ‘doer or follower of the Law’ (marggam), and is applied to a foreign religion, like that of Christians and Mohammedians. The Madras Gloss. (iii. 474) derives it from Mal. marakkalam, ‘boat,’ and kar, a termination showing possession, and defines it as a ‘titular appellation of the Moplah Mahommedans on the S.W. coast.’]

MASCARBAR, s. This is given by C. P. Brown (MS. notes) as an Indo-Portuguese word for ‘the last day of the month,’ quoting Calcutta Review, viii. 346. He suggests as its etymon Hind. mās-ke-ba‘ād, ‘after a month.’ [In N. Indian public offices the mās-kabār is well known as the monthly statement of cases decided during the month. It has been suggested that it represents the Port. mes-acabar, ‘end of the month;’ but according to Platts, it is more probably a corruption of Hind. māsik-vār or mās-ka-vār.

MASH, s. Hind. māsh, [Skt. masha, ‘a bean’]; Phascolus radicatus, Roxb. One of the common Hindu pulses. [See MOONG.]

MASKEE. This is a term in Chinese “pigeon,” meaning ‘never mind,’ ‘n’importe,’ which is constantly in the mouths of Europeans in China. It is supposed that it may be the corruption or elision of a Portuguese expression, but nothing satisfactory has been suggested. [Mr. Skeat writes: “Surely this is simply Port. mas que, probably imported direct through Macao, in the sense of ‘although, even, in spite of,’ like French malgré. And this seems to be its meaning in ‘pigeon.’”

“‘That nightey tim begin chop-chop, One young man walkes—no can stop. Maskes snow, maskes ice! He callly flag with chop so nice— Topside Galow! ‘Excelsior,’ in ‘pigeon.’”]

MASULIPATAM, n.p. This coast town of the Madras Presidency is sometimes vulgarly called Machhili-patam or Machhili-bander, or simply Bandar (see BUNDER, 2); and its name explained (Hind. machhili, ‘fish’) as Fish-town, [the Madras Gloss. says from an old tradition of a whale being stranded on the shore.] The etymology may originally have had such a connection, but there can be no doubt that the name is a trace of the Mauvilia and Maufioun kōtāboi kōboi which we find in Ptolemy’s MATE, MATY. 562 MATROSS.

Tables; and of the Musala producing muslin, in the Periplus. [In one of the old Logos the name is transformed into Mesopotamia (J.R. As. Soc., Jan. 1900, p. 158). In a letter of 1605-6 it appears as Mesopotamya (Birdwood, First Letter Book, 73).

II. 66; [ed. Ball, i. 158].

1799. — "Mispilatan, which last word, by the bye, ought to be written Machilpatan (Fish-town), because of a Whale that happened to be stranded there 150 years ago."— Note on Seir Mutqshirim, iii. 370.

MATE, MATY. a. An assistant under a head servant; in which sense or something near it, but also sometimes in the sense of a 'head-man,' the word is in use almost all over India. In the Bengal Presidency we have a mate-bearer for the assistant body-servant (see BEARER); the mate attendant on an elephant under the mahout; a mate (head) of coolies or jomponnies (q.v.) (see JOMPON), &c. And in Madras the maty is an under-servant, whose business it is to clean crockery, knives, &c, to attend to lamps, and so forth.

The origin of the word is obscure, if indeed it has not more than one origin. Some have supposed it to be taken from the English word in the sense of comrade, &c.; whilst Wilson gives metti as a distinct Malayalam word for an inferior domestic servant, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tamil mel, 'high']. The last word is of very doubtful genuineness. Neither derivation will explain the fact that the word occurs in the Ains, in which the three classes of attendants on an elephant in Akbar's establishment are styled respectively Mahaut, Bhai, and Meth; two of which terms would, under other circumstances, probably be regarded as corruptions of English words. This use of the word we find in Skt. dictionaries as meha, mentha, and mendu, 'an elephant-keeper or feeder.' But for the more general use we would query whether it may not be a genuine Prakrit form from Skt. mitra, 'associate, friend?' We have in Pali metta, 'friendship,' from Skt. mittra.

c. 1590. — "A meth fetches fodder and assists in caparisoning the elephant. Methis of all classes get on the march 4 dams daily, and at other times 3 4/16."— Ains, ed. Blockmann, i. 125.

1810. — "In some families mates or assistants are allowed, who do the drudgery."— Williamson, V. M. I. 241.

1837. — "One mates."— See Letters from Madras, 106.

1872. — "At last the morning of our departure came. A crowd of porters stood without the veranda, chattering and squabbling, and the mate distributed the boxes and bundles among them."— A True Reformer, ch. vi.

1873. — "To procure this latter supply (of green food) is the daily duty of one of the attendants, who in Indian phraseology is termed a mate, the title of Mahout being reserved for the head keeper" (of an elephant).— Sat. Rev. Sept. 6, 302.

MATRANEE, a. Properly Hind. from Pers. mîtardn; a female sweeper (see MEHTAR). [In the following extract the writer seems to mean Bhathiyaran or Bhathiyarin, the wife of a Bhathiyara or inn-keeper.

[1785. — "...a handsome serai... where a number of people, chiefly women, called metrannes, take up their abode to attend strangers on their arrival in the city."— Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 404.]

MATROSS, a. An inferior class of soldier in the Artillery. The word is quite obsolete, and is introduced here because it seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England, and occurs frequently in old Indian narratives. It is Germ.
matros, Dutch matroos, 'a sailor,' identical no doubt with Fr. matelot. The origin is so obscure that it seems hardly worth while to quote the conjectures regarding it. In the establishment of a company of Royal Artillery in 1771, as given in Duncan's Hist. of that corps, we have besides sergeants and corporals, "4 Bombardiers, 8 Gunners, 34 Matroos, and 2 Drummers." A definition of the Matros is given in our 3rd quotation. We have not ascertained when the term was disused in the R.A. It appears in the Establishment as given by Grose in 1801 (Military Antiq. i. 315). As far as Major Duncan's book informs us, it appears first in 1639, and has disappeared by 1793, when we find the men of an artillery force divided (excluding sergeants, corporals, and bombardiers) into First Gunners, Second Gunners, and Military Drivers.

1745. — "... We were told with regard to the Fortifications, that no Expense should be grudged that was necessary for the Defence of the Settlement, and in 1741, a Person was sent out in the character of an Engineer for our Place; but... he lived not to come among us; and therefore, we could only judge of his Merit and Qualifications by the Value of his Stipend, Six Pagodas a Month, or about Eighteen Pences a Day, scarce the Pay of a common Matros.

..."—Letter from Mr. Barnett to the Secret Committee, in Letter to a Proprieter of the E.I. Co., p. 45.

1757. — "I have with me one Gunner, one Matros, and two Lascars." — Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Repert. i. 203.

1779. — "Matroos are properly apprentices to the gunner, being soldiers in the royal regiment of artillery, and next to them; they assist in loading, firing, and spunning the great guns. They carry firelocks, and march along with the guns and store-waggons, both as a guard, and to give their assistance in every emergency." — Capt. G. Smith's Universal Military Dictionary.

1792. — "Wednesday evening, the 25th inst., a Matros of Artillery deserted from the Mount, and took away with him his firelock, and nine rounds of powder and ball." — Madras Courier, Feb. 2.

[1800. — "A serjeant and two matroos employed under a general committee on the captured military stores in Seringapatam." — Wellington Suppl. Desp. ii. 82 (Stanf. Dict.).]

MATT, a. Touch (of gold). Tamil māṭṟu (pron. māṭṟu), perhaps from Skt. māṭra, 'measure.' Very pure gold is said to be 9 māṭṟu, inferior gold of 5 or 6 māṭṟu.

1693. — "Gold, purified from all other metals... by us is reckoned as of four-and-Twenty Carats, but by the blacks is here divided and reckoned as of ten matt." — Hewett, 106.

1727. — At Mocha... "the Coffee Trade brings in a continual Supply of Silver and Gold... from Turkey, Equamies and Mograbis, Gold of low Matt." — A. Hamilton, i. 48, (ed. 1744).

1752. —... to find the Value of the Touch in Fanam, multiply the Matt by 10, and then by 8, which gives it in Fanam." — T. Brooks, 25.

The same word was used in Japan for a measure, sometimes called a fathom.

MAUMLET, a. Domestic Hind. māumlēt, for 'omelet'; [Māumlēt is 'marmalade'].

MAUND, a. The authorised Anglo-Indian form of the name of a weight (Hind. maṇ, Mahr. maṇ), which, with varying values, has been current over Western Asia from time immemorial. Professor Sayce traces it (maṇa) back to the Accadian language. But in any case it was the Babylonian name for _VIRTUAL_ of a talent, whence it passed, with the Babylonian weights and measures, almost all over the ancient world. Compare the men or maṇa of Egyptian hieroglyphic inscriptions, preserved in the emna or anna of the Copts, the Hebrew maṭneh, the Greek μᾶχ, and the Roman mina. The introduction of the word into India may have occurred during the extensive commerce of the Arabs with that country during the 8th and 9th centuries; possibly at an earlier date. Through the Arabs also we find an old Spanish word almenc, and in old French almenne, for a weight of about 20 lbs. (Marcel Devir.)

The quotations will show how the Portuguese converted maṇ into mão, of which the English made maun, and so (probably by the influence of the old English word maund)* our present form, which occurs as early as 1611. Some of the older travellers, like Linschoten, misled by the Portuguese māda, identified it with the word for 'hand' in that language, and so rendered it.

The values of the man as weight, even in modern times, have varied immensely, i.e. from little more than 2 lbs. to upwards of 160. The 'Indian Maund,' which is the standard of weight in British India, is of 40 servs, each serv being divided into 16 chhitakas; and this is the general scale of subdivision in the local weights of Bengal, and Upper and Central India, though the value of the serv varies. That of the standard serv is 80 tolas (q.v.) or rupee-weights, and thus the maund = 82½ lbs. avoirdupois. The Bombay maund (or man) of 48 servs = 28 lbs.; the Madras one of 40 servs = 25 lbs. The Palloda man of Ahmadnagar contained 64 servs, and was =183¾ lbs. This is the largest man we find in the "Useful Tables." The smallest Indian man again is that of Colachy in Travancore, and that =18 lbs. 12 oz. 13 dr. The Persian Tabrizi man is, however, a little less than 7 lbs.; the man shahi twice that; the smallest of all on the list named is the Jeddah man = 2 lbs. 3 oz. 9¼ dr.

[1645.—"As for the weights, the ordinary maund is 69 livres, and the livre is of 16 onces; but the maund, which is used to weigh indigo, is only 53 livres. At Surat you speak of a serv, which is 12 livres, and the livre is 16 onces."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 38.]

1665.—"Le man pesse quarante livres par toutes les Indes, mais ces livres ou servs sont differentes selon les Pais."—Thevenot, v. 54.

1673.—"A Lumbrico (Sconce) of pure Gold, weighing about one Maund and a quarter, which is Forty-two pounds."—Fryer, 78.

"The Surat Maund... is 40 Sear, of 20 Picc the Sear, which is 371.
The Pucka Maund at Agra is double as much, where is also the Eborary Maund which is 40 Sear, of 30 Picc the Sear..."—Ibid. 205.

1683.—"Agreed with Chittur Mullaw and Matttrasas, Merchants of this place (Hugly), for 1,500 Bales of ye best Tissinda Sugar, each bale to weigh 2 Maunds, 64 Servs, Factory weight."—Hedges, Diary, April 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 75].

1711.—"Sugar, Coffee, Tutangaue, all sorts of Drugs, &c., are sold by the Maund Tabrees; which in the Factory and Custom MAYLA, a. Hind. mela, ‘a fair,’ almost always connected with some religious celebration, as were so many of the medieval fairs in Europe. The word is Skt. mela, melaka, ‘meeting, concourse, assembly.’

[MAYLA, s. Hind. mela, ‘a fair,’ almost always connected with some religious celebration, as were so many of the medieval fairs in Europe. The word is Skt. mela, melaka, ‘meeting, concourse, assembly.’]

MAZAGON, MAZAGON, n.p. A suburb of Bombay, containing a large Portuguese population. [The name is said to be originally Madeғaraғna, ‘the village of the Great Lord,’ Siva.]

1548.—

"Mazagulo, por 15,000 federe, Mombaym (Bombay), por 15,000."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 149.

1644.—"Going up the stream from this town (Mombaym, i.e. Bombay) some 2 leagues, you come to the village of Mazagon."—Botelho, MS. i. 227.

1673.—"... for some miles together, till the Sea break in between them; over against which lies Massegoung, a great Fishing Town. ... The Ground between this and the Great Breach is well ploughed and bears good Battie. Here the Portugese have another Church and Religious House belonging to the Franciscans."—Fryer, p. 67.

MEERASS, s., MEERASSY, adj.; MEERASSIDAR, s. ‘Inheritance,’ ‘hereditary,’ ‘a holder of hereditary property.’ Hind. from Arab. mirzә, mirzә, mirzәdә; and these from warә, ‘to inherit.’

1806.—"Every meerassdar in Tanjore has been furnished with a separate pottah (q.v.) for the land held by him."—Fifth Report (1812), 774.

1812.—"The term meerassdee ... was introduced by the Mahomedans."—Ibid. 136.

1817.—"All miras rights were reclaimable within a forty years’ absence."—Meadows Taylor, Story of My Life, ii. 211.

"I found a great proportion of the occup ants of land to be mirasadars—that is, persons who held their portions of land in hereditary occupancy."—Ibid. 210.
MEHAUL, s. Hind. from Arab. mahdall, being properly the pl. of Arab. mahdoll. The word is used with a considerable variety of application, the explanation of which would involve a greater amount of technical detail than is consistent with the purpose of this work. On this Wilson may be consulted. But the most usual Anglo-Indian application of mahdall (used as a singular and generally written, incorrectly, mahdali) is to 'an estate,' in the Revenue sense, i.e. 'a parcel or parcels of land separately assessed for revenue.' The sing. mahdall (also written in the vernaculars mahal, and mahdali) is often used for a palace or edifice of ordinary size, e.g. (see Shish-Muhull, Taj-Mahal).

MEHTAR, s. A sweeper or scavenger. This name is usual in the Bengal Presidency, especially for the domestic servant of this class. The word is Pers. comp. mihtar (Lat. major), 'a great personage,' 'a prince,' and has been applied to the class in question in irony, or rather in consoliation, as the domestic tailor is called caleefa. But the name has so completely adhered in this application, that all sense of either irony or consolation has perished; mehtar is a sweeper and nought else. His wife is the Matrancee. It is not unusual to hear two mehtars hailing each other as Mahdarj! In Persia the menial application of the word seems to be different (see below). The same class of servant is usually called in W. India bhangi (see BUNGY), a name which in Upper India is applied to the caste generally and specially to those not in the service of Europeans. [Examples of the word used in the honorific sense will be found below.]

1500.—"Maître." See under BUNOW.
1810.—"The meter, or sweeper, is considered the lowest menial in every family."—Williamson, V. M. i. 276-7.
1828.—"... besides many mehtars or stable-boys."—Haji Baba in England, i. 60.

In the honorific sense:

1824.—"In each of the towns of Central India, there is... a mehtar, or head of every other class of the inhabitants down to the lowest."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 555.

[880.—"On the right bank is the fort in which the Mihter or Bādshah, for he is known by both titles, resides."—Biddulph, Tribes of the Hindoo Kosh, 61.]
1610.—P. Texeira tells us that among the "Moors" at Oranuz, Albuquerque was known only by the name of Malandy, and that with some difficulty he obtained the explanation that he was so called because he came thither from the direction of Malinda, which they call Maland.—Relación de los Reyes de Marrum, 45.

[1625.—Owen calls the place Maleenda and gives an account of it.—Narrative, i. 399 seqq.]

1859.—"As regards the immigration of the Wagnum (Ajemi, or Persians), from whom the ruling tribe of the Wawwahili derives its name, they relate that several Shayeeks, or elders, from Shiraz-emigrated to Shangaya, a district near the Oz River, and founded the town of Malind (Malinda)."—Burdon, in J. R. G. S. xxi. 61.

MELOQUE VERIDO. n.p. The Portuguese form of the style of the princes of the dynasty established at Bidar in the end of the 16th century, on the decay of the Bahmani kingdom. The name represents Malik Barid. It was apparently only the third of the dynasty, 'Ali, who first took the title of (Ali) Barid Shah.

1583.—"And as the following (1) of Badur was very great, as well as his presumption, he sent word to Yezam Maluco (Misamaluco) and to Verido (who were great Lords, as it were Kings, in the Deccan, that lies between the Bulagat and Cambaya) that they must pay him homage, or he would hold them for enemies, and would direct war against them, and take away their dominions."—Correa, iii. 514.

1659.—"And these regents...concerted among themselves...that they should seize the King of Daquem in Bedar, which is the chief city and capital of the Deccan; so they took him and committed him to one of their number, by name Verido; and then he and the rest, either in person or by their representatives, make him a salama (calama) at certain days of the year. The Verido who died in the year 1510 was a Hungarian by birth, and originally a Christian, as I have heard on sure authority."—Garcia, f. 35 and 35v.

c. 1601. —"About this time a letter arrived from the Prince Sultán Dániyl, reporting that (Malik) Ambar had collected his troops in Bidar, and had gained a victory over a party which had been sent to oppose him by Malik Barid."—Iyadiq Allah, in Eliot, vi. 104.

MEM-SAHIB. a. This singular example of a hybrid term is the usual respectful designation of a European married lady in the Bengal Presidency; the first portion representing mau'am. Madam Sahib is used at Bombay; Dorezani (see DOREY) in Madras. (See also BURRA BEEBE.)

MENDY. a. Hind. mendhi, [mehndi, Skt. mendhika;] the plant Lawsonia alba, Lam., of the N. O. Lythraceae, strongly resembling the English privet in appearance, and common in gardens. It is the plant whose leaves afford the henna, used so much in Mahommedan countries for dyeing the hands, &c., and also in the process of dyeing the hair. Mehndi is, according to Royle, the Cyprus of the ancients (see Pliny, xii. 24). It is also the camphire of Canticles i. 14, where the margin of A.V. has erroneously cypress for cypruss.

[1813.—"After the girls are betrothed, the ends of the fingers and nails are dyed red, with a preparation from the Mendey, or henna shrub."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 55; also see i. 22.]

c. 1817.—"...his house and garden might be known from a thousand others by their extraordinary neatness. His garden was full of trees, and was well fenced round with a ditch and mindey hedge."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. 1873, p. 71.

MERCAI, MARCÁI, s. Tam. marakkhal, a grain measure in use in the Madras Presidency, and formerly varying much in different localities, though the most usual was=12 sers of grain. [Also known as toom.] Its standard is fixed since 1846 at 800 cubic inches, and =1/4 of a garce (q.v.).

1554.—(Negapatam) "Of ghee (maamteiga) and oil, one marcar is=22 canadas" (a Portuguese measure of about 3 pints).—A. Nunes, 86.

1803.—"...take care to put on each bullock full six mercals or 72 seers."—Wellington Dep., ed. 1837, ii. 85.

MEGUI. n.p. The name by which we know the most southern district of Lower Burma with its town; annexed with the rest of what used to be called the "Tenasserim Provinces" after the war of 1824-26. The name is probably of Siamese origin; the town is called by the Burmese Beit (Sir A. Phayre).

1568.—"Tenasciri la quale è Città delle regioni del regno di Sion, posta infra terra due o tre maree sopra vn gran fiume...ed ose il fiume entra in mare e vna villa chiamata Megui, nel porto della quale ogni anno si caricano alcune navi di versaco (see BRAZIL-wood and SAPPAW-wood), di nipa (q.v.), di belzina (see BENJAMIN), e qualche poco di garofalo, macis, nodiz..."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 527v.

MILK-BUSH, MILK-HEDGE. 586

[1727.—"Merjoo." See under TENAS-SEHIM.]

MILK-BUSH, MILK-HEDGE. s. Euphorbia Tirucalla, L., often used for hedges on the Coromandel coast. It abounds in acrid milky juices.

O. 1590.—"They enclose their fields and gardens with hedges of the 1000 (salkum) tree, which is a strong defence against cattle, and makes the country almost impenetrable by an army."—Ayen, ed. Gladwin, ii. 68; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 239].

[1773.—"Milky Hedge. This is rather a shrub, which they plant for hedges on the coast of Coromandel. . . ."—Ivse, 462.]

1780.—"Thorn hedges are sometimes placed in gardens, but in the fields the milk bush is most commonly used . . . when squeezed emitting a whitish juice like milk, that is deemed a deadly poison. . . . A horse will have his head and eyes pro digiously swelled from standing for some time under the shade of a milk hedge."—Muaro's Narr. 80.

So saying, Buddha
Silently laid aside sandals and staff,
His sacred thread, turban, and cloth, and came Forth from behind the milk-bush on the sand. . . .

Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, Bk. v.

O. 1886.—"The milk-hedge forms a very distinctive feature in the landscape of many parts of Guzerat. Twigs of the plant thrown into running water kill the fish, and are extensively used for that purpose. Also charcoal from the stems is considered the best for making gunpowder."—M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.

MINCOPIE, n.p. This term is attributed in books to the Andaman islanders as their distinctive name for their own race. It originated with a vocabulary given by Lietut. Colebrooke in vol. iv. of the Asiatic Researches, and was certainly founded on some misconception. Nor has the possible origin of the mistake been ascertained. [Mr. Man (Proc. Anthorp. Institute, xii. 71) suggests that it may have been a corruption of the words min katch! 'Come here!']

MINIOOY, n.p. Minikai; [Logan (Malabar, i. 2) gives the name as Menakatiyat, which the Madras Gloss. derives from Mal. min, 'fish,' kayam, 'deep pool.' The natives call it Maliku (note by Mr. Gray on the passage from Pyrard quoted below).] An island intermediate between the Maldives and the Laccadive group. Politically it belongs to the latter, being the property of the Ali Raja of Cannanore, but the people and their language are Maldivian. The population in 1871 was 2600. One-sixth of the adults had perished in a cyclone in 1867. A lighthouse was in 1883 erected on the island. This is probably the island intended for Mutke in that ill-edited book the E.T. of Tuhfat al-Mujahidin. [Mr. Logan identifies it with the "female island" of Marco Polo. (Malabar, i. 267.)]

MISCOALL, s. Ar. milkal (mithkal, properly). An Arabian word, originally that of the Roman aureus and the gold dinar; about 73 grs.

O. 1340.—"The prince, violently enraged, caused this officer to be put in prison, and confiscated his goods, which amounted to 437,000,000 mithkals of gold. This anecdote serves to attest at once the severity of the sovereign and the extreme wealth of the country."—Shahabuddin, in Not. et Er., xiii. 192.

1502.—"Upon which the King (of Sofaha) showed himself much pleased . . . and gave them as a present for the Captain-Major a mass of strings of small golden beads which they call piygo, weighing 1000 maticals, every matical being worth 500 reis, and gave for the King another that weighed 8000 maticals . . ."—Correa, i. 274.

MISREE, s. Sugar candy. Misri, 'Egyptian,' from Misr, Egypt, the Misrain of the Hebrews, showing the original source of supply. [We find the Misri or 'sugar of Egypt' in the Arabian Nights (Burton, xi. 396).] (See under SUGAR.)

1810.—"The sugar-candy made in India, where it is known by the name of misroey, bears a price suited to its quality. . . . It is usually made in small conical pots, whence it concretes into masses, weighing from 3 to 6 lbs. each."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 194.

MISSAL, s. Hind. from Ar. misl, meaning 'similitude.' The body of documents in a particular case before a court. [The word is also used in its original sense of a 'clan.'][1861.—"The martial spirit of the Sikhs thus aroused . . . formed itself into clans or confederacies called Miscals . . ."—Carr-Brown, Punjab and Delhi, i. 388.]
MOBUD, a. P. mubid, a title of Parsee Priests. It is a corruption of the Pehlevi mago-pat, 'Lord Magus.'

MOOUDUM, a. Hind. from Ar. mukaddam, 'praepositus,' a head-man. The technical applications are many; e.g. to the headman of a village, responsible for the realisation of the revenue (see LUMBERDAR); to the local head of a caste (see CHOWDEY); to the head man of a body of peons or of a gang of labourers (see MATE), &c. &c. (See further detail in Wilson). Cobarrius (Tesor de la Lengua Castellana, 1611) gives Almocaden, "Capitán de Infantería."

C. 1347. — "... The princess invited ... the tanadé (see TINDAL) or mukaddam of the crew, and the sipakhkdr or mukaddam of the archers." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 250.*

1538. — "O Mocadá da mazmorra datap era o carereiro d'aquella prisão, tanto datap os via mortos, deu logo rebate disso ao Guiaz da justiça ..." — Pinto, cap. vi.

"... The Jailer, which in their language is called Mocadan, repairing in the morning to us, and finding our two companions dead, goes away in all haste therewith to acquaint the Guiaz, which is as the Judge with us." — Cogan's Transl., p. 8.

1554. — "E a hum naque, com seys piaes (peons) e hum mocadão, com seys tochas, hum bôy de sombreiro, dous mainatos," &c. — Botelho, Tombo, 57.

1567. — "... furthermore that no infidel shall serve as scrivener, shrow (zarruño) mocadán (mocadão), naque (see NAÍK), peon (pido) parparim (see PABUTTY), collector of dues, corregidor, interpreter, procuradur, comissary in courthou or in any other office or charge in which he can in any way hold authority over Christians." — Decree of the Sacred Council of Goa, Dec. 27. In Arch. Port. Orient. fascic. 4.

[c. 1610. — "They call these Lascars and their captain Mocadon." — Fyppard de Lasa, Hak. Soc. ii. 117.

* This passage is also referred to under NACODA. The French translation runs as follows: — "Cette princesse invite ... le tanadé ou 'général des pionnés,' et le sipakhkdr on 'général des archers.'" In answer to a query, our friend, Prof. Robertson Smith, writes: "The word is rójal, and this may be used either as the plural of rojal, 'man,' or as the pl. of rójal, 'pilion.' But foremost, or 'praepositus' of the 'men' (mukaddam is not well rendered 'général'), is just as possible. And, if possible, much more reasonable. Delaurier (J., &c. de rójal, ix.) uses rójis as 'sailors.' See the article TINDAL; and see the quotation under the present article from Bocaro MS.

[1615. — "The General dwelt with the Makadá of Swally." — Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 45; comp. Danvers, Letters, i. 234.]

1644. — "Each vessel carries forty mariners and two mookdons." — Bocarão, MS.

1830. — "For the better keeping the Boatmen in order, resolved to appoint Black Tom Muckdum or Master of the Boatmen, being Christian as he is, his wages being paid at 70 fanams per mensam." — Fort St. Geo. Conv., Dec. 28, in Notes and Jests. No. iii. p. 42.

1870. — "This headman was called the Mokkadum in the more Northern and Eastern provinces." — Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 163.

MOOUDAMA, s. Hind. from Ar. mukaddama, 'a piece of business,' but especially 'a suit at law.'

MODELLIAR, MODLIAR. s. Used in the Tamil districts of Ceylon (and formerly on the Continent) for a native head-man. It is also a caste title, assumed by certain Tamil people who styled themselves Sudras (an honourable assumption in the South). Tam. muddaliyar, muddaliyar, an honorific pl. from mudali, muthali, 'a chief.'

C. 1350. — "When I was staying at Columbium (see QUILON) with those Christian chiefs who are called Modilial, and are the owners of the pepper, one morning there came to me ..." — John de Marignoli, in Cathay, &c., ii. 381.

1522. — "And in opening this foundation they found about a cubit below a grave made of brickwork, white-washed within, as if newly made, in which they found part of the Bones of the King who was converted by the holy Apostle, who the natives said they heard was called Tani (Tami) mudo-lyar, meaning in their tongue 'Thomas Servant of God.'" — Correa, ii. 728.

1544. — "... and of Praesectum locis illis quem Modiliarem vulgo nuncuptam." — S. Fr. Xavier Epistolar, 129.

1607. — "On the part of Dom Fernando Modellar, a native of Ceylon, I have received a petition stating his services." — Letter of R. Philip III in L. das Monçoes, 135.

1616. — "These entered the Kingdom of Candy ... and had an encounter with the enemy at Matafé, where they cut off five-and-thirty heads of their people and took certain arrears and mohedilaars who are chiefs among them, and who bad ... deserted and gone over to the enemy as is the way of the Chingalas." — Bocarão, 495.

1648. — "The 5 August followed from Candy the Modellar, or Great Captain ... in order to inspect the ships."—Van Spilbergen's Voyage, 83.

1685.—"The Modellares . . . and other great men among them put on a shirt and doublet, which those of low caste may not wear."—Ribeiro, t. 46.

1708.—"Mon Réverend Père. Vous êtes tellement accoutumé à vous mêler des affaires de la Compagnie, que non obstant la prière que je vous ai réitérée plusieurs fois de nous laisser en repos, je ne suis pas étonné si vous prenez parti dans l'affaire de l'amir ci-devant courtier et Modellar de la Compagnie."—Norbert, Mémoires, i. 274.

1726.—"Modelyazar. This is the same as Captain."—Valentijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., p. 9.

1810.—"We . . . arrived at Barbarea about two o'clock, where we found that the prudent Modellar had erected a beautiful rest-house for us, and prepared an excellent collation."—Maria Graham, 98.

MOFUSSIL, a., also used adjectively, "The provinces,"—the country stations and districts, as contra-distinguished from 'the Presidency'; or, relatively, the rural localities of a district as contra-distinguished from the sudder or chief station, which is the residence of the district authorities. Thus if, in Calcutta, one talks of the Mofussil, he means anywhere in Bengal out of Calcutta; if one at Benares talks of going into the Mofussil, he means going anywhere in the Benares division or district (as the case might be) out of the city and station of Benares. And so over India. The word (Hind. from Ar.) mufussal means properly 'separate, detailed, particular,' and hence 'provincial,' as mufussal 'addalat,' a 'provincial court of justice.' This indicates the way in which the word came to have the meaning attached to it.

About 1845 a clever, free-and-easy newspaper, under the name of The Mofussilite, was started at Meerut, by Mr. John Lang, author of Too Clever by Half, &c., and endured for many years.

1781.—"... a gentleman lately arrived from the Moussele" (plainly a misprint).—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, March 31.

"A gentleman in the Mofussil, Mr. P., fell out of his chaise and broke his leg . . ."—Ibid., June 30.

1810.—"Either in the Presidency or in the Mofussil . . ."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 499.

1898.—"... the Mofussil newspapers which I have seen, though generally disposed to cavil at all the acts of the Government, have often spoken favourably of the measure."—T. B. Macaulay, in Life, &c. i. 399.

MOGUL, n.p. This name should properly mean a person of the great nomad race of Mongols, called in Persia, &c., Mughals; but in India it has come, in connection with the nominally Mongol, though essentially rather Turk, family of Baber, to be applied to all foreign Mahomedans from the countries on the W. and N.W. of India, except the Pathans. In fact these people themselves make a sharp distinction between the Mughal Irānī, of Pers. origin (who is a Shiah), and the M. Tārānī of Turk origin (who is a Sunni). Beg is the characteristic affix of the Mughal's name, as Khān is of the Pathān's. Among the Mahomedans of S. India the Moguls or Mughals constitute a strongly marked caste. [They are also clearly distinguished in the Punjab and N.W.P.] In the quotation from Baber below, the name still retains its original application. The passage illustrates the tone in which Baber always speaks of his kindred of the Steppe, much as Lord Clyde used sometimes to speak of "confounded Scotchmen."

In Port. writers Mogol or Mogor is often used for "Hindostān," or the territory of the Great Mogul.

1298.—"... Mungal, a name sometimes applied to the Tartars."—Marco Polo, i. 276 (2nd ed.).

c. 1540.—"In the first place from Tana to Gintarchan may be 25 days with an ox-waggon, and from 10 to 12 days with a horse-waggon. On the road you will find plenty of Moguls, that is to say of armed troopers."—Pepoliotti, on the Land Route to Cathay, in Cutbey, loc. ii. 257.

1496.—"And the territory of this empire of Samarkand is called the territory of Mogul, and the language thereof is called Mogul, and they don't understand this language on this side of the river (the Oroux) . . . for the character which is used by those of Samarkand beyond the river is not understood or read by those on this side the river; and they call that character Mogoll, and the Emperor keeps by him certain scribes who can read and write this Mogoll character."—Clarjo, § 3iiii. (Comp. Merknam, 119-120.)

c. 1560.—"The Mogol troops, which had come to my assistance, did not attempt to fight, but instead of fighting, betook themselves to dismounting and plundering my own people. Nor is this a solitary instance; such is the uniform practice of those who write the Moguls; if they defeat the enemy they instantly seize the booty; if they are defeated, they plunder and dismount their own allies, and betide what may, carry off the spoil."—Babar, 93.

1584.—"And whilst Badur was there in the hills engaged with his pleasures and luxury, there came to him a messenger from the King of the Mogoles of the kingdom of Dely, called Bobor Mirza."—Corres, iii. 571.

1596.—"Dicta Mogores vel à populis Persarum Mogolibus, vel quod nunc Turke à Persia Mogores appellantur."—Letter from K. João III. to Pope Paul III.

1555.—"Tartaria, otherwise called Mongol, as Vincenctius wryteth, is in that part of the earth, where the East and the north join together."—W. Watreman, Fardle of Facions.

1603.—"This Kingdom of Dely is very far inland, for the northern part of it marches with the territory of Coraconse (Khurasan). . . . The Mogoles, whom we call Tartars, Mongered it more than 30 years ago . . . ;"—Garcia, f. 34.

[c. 1590.—"In his time (Nasiruddin Mahmud) the Mughals entered the Punjab . . . ."—As. ed. Jarrett, ii. 304.

Blumden, Description and use of Plancius his Mappe, in Eight Treatises, ed. 1626, p. 547.]

c. 1650.—"Now shall I tell how the royal house arose in the land of the Mughal . . . . And the Ruler (Chingiz Khan) said, . . . 'I will that this people Bade, resembling a precious crystal, which even to the completion of my enterprise hath shown the greatest fidelity in every peril, shall take the name of Kuche (Blue) Monghel . . . ."—Sanwag Setzen, by Schmidt, pp. 57 and 71.

1741.—"Ao mesmo tempo que a paz se ajustou entre os referidos generaes Mogor e Marata."—Boezaio das Possesdes Portug. na Orient—Documentos Comprovativos, iii. 21 (Lisbon 1853).

1764.—"Whatever Moguls, whether Orames or Toomians, come to offer their services should be received on the aforesaid terms."—Paper of Articles sent to Major Munro by the Nawab, in Long, 360.

c. 1778.—"... the news-writers of Rai Droog frequently wrote to the Nawab . . . that the besieged Nalk . . . had attacked the batteries of the besiegers, and had killed a great number of the Moguls."—H. of Hyder, 317.

1781.—"Wanted an European or Mogul Coachman that can drive four Horses in hand."—India Gazette, June 30.

In these last two quotations the term is applied distinctively to Hyderabad troops.

1855.—"The Moguls and others, who at the present day settle in the country, intermarrying with these people (Burmese Mohommedans) speedily sink into the same practical heterodoxies."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 151.

Sometimes 'The Mogul' simply. The name by which the Kings of Delhi of the House of Timur were popularly styled, first by the Portuguese (o grão Mogor) and after them by Europeans generally. It was analogous to the Sophy (q.v.), as applied to the Kings of Persia, or to the 'Great Turk' applied to the Sultan of Turkey. Indeed the latter phrase was probably the model of the present one. As noticed under the preceding article, MOGOL, MOGOR, and also Mogodist are applied among old writers to the dominions of the Great Mogul. We have found no native idiom precisely suggesting the latter title; but Mughal is thus used in the Arash-i-Mahfil below, and Mogodist must have been in some native use, for it is a form that Europeans would not have invented. (See quotations from Thevenot here and under MOHWA.)

MOGUL BREECHES. a. Apparently an early name for what we call long-drawers or pyjamas (qq.v.).

1625. — "... let him have his shirt on and his Mogul breeches; here are women in the house." — Beaumont & Fletcher, The Fair Maid of the Inn, iv. 2.

In a picture by Vandyke of William 1st Earl of Denbigh, belonging to the Duke of Hamilton, and exhibited at Edinburgh in July 1883, the subject is represented as out shooting, in a red striped shirt and pyjamas, no doubt the "Mogul breeches" of the period.

MOHUR, GOLD. a. The official name of the chief gold coin of British India, Hind. from Perse. mohur, a (metallic) seal, and thence a gold coin. It seems possible that the word is taken from mohr, 'the sun,' as one of the secondary meanings of that word is 'a golden circlet on the top of an umbrella, or the like' (Villars). [Platts, on the contrary, identifies it with Skt. madra, 'a seal.']

The term mohur, as applied to a coin, appears to have been popular only and quasi-generic, not precise. But that to which it has been most usually applied, at least in recent centuries, is a coin which has always been in use since the foundation of the Mahommedan Empire in Hindustan by the Ghurí Kings of Ghazni and their freedmen, circa A.D. 1200, tending to a standard weight of 100 ratis (see RUTTEE) of pure gold, or about 175 grains, thus equaling in weight, and probably intended then to equal ten times in value, the silver coin which has for more than three centuries been called Rupee.

There is good ground for regarding this as the theory of the system.* But the gold coins, especially, have deviated from the theory considerably; a deviation which seems to have commenced with the violent innovations of Sultan Mahommed Tughlak (1325-1351), who raised the gold coin to 200 grains, and diminished the silver coin to 140 grains, a change which may have been connected with the enormous influx of gold into Upper India, from the plunder of the inmemorial accumulations of the Peninsula in the first quarter of the 14th century. After this the coin again settled down in approximation to the old weight, insomuch that, on taking the weight of 46 different mohurs from the lists given in Prinsep's Tables, the average of pure gold is 167-23 grains.†

The first gold mohur struck by the Company's Government was issued in 1766, and declared to be a legal tender for 14 sicca rupees. The full weight of this coin was 179-66 grs., containing 149-72 grs. of gold. But it was impossible to render it current at the rate fixed; it was called in, and in 1769 a new mohur was issued to pass as legal tender for 16 sicca rupees. The weight of this was 190'773 grs. (according to Regn. of 1793, 190'884), and it contained 190'086 grs. of gold. Regulation xxxv. of 1793 declared these gold mohurs to be a legal tender in all public and private transactions. Regn. xiv. of 1818 declared, among other things, that "it has been thought advisable to make a slight deduction in the intrinsic value of the gold mohur to be coined at this Presidency (Fort William), in order to raise the value of fine gold to fine silver, from the present rates of 1 to 14'961 to that of 1 to 15. The gold mohur will still continue to pass current at the rate of 16 rupees." The new gold mohur was to weigh 204'710 grs., containing fine gold 187'651 grs. Once more Act xvii. of 1836 declared that the only gold coin to be coined at Indian mints should be (with propor-

Company. There has been since then no substantive change.

A friend (W. Simpson, the accomplished artist) was told in India that gold mohur was a corruption of gol, ('round') mohr, indicating a distinction from the square mohurs of some of the Delhi Kings. But this we take to be purely fanciful.

MOHURRAM, s. Ar. Muharram ('sacred'), properly the name of the 1st month of the Mahometan lunar year. But in India the term is applied to the period of fasting and public mourning observed during that month in commemoration of the death of Hasan and of his brother Husain (A.D. 669 and 860) and which terminates in the ceremonies of the 'Ashārd-a, commonly however known in India as "the Mohurram." MOCLE-ISM.  575  MOLELLAS.

MOCLE-ISM, n.p. The title applied to a certain class of rustic Mahomedans or quasi-Mahomedans in Guzerat, said to have been forcibly converted in the time of the famous Sultan Mahomed Bigarra, Butler's "Prince of Cambay." We are ignorant of the true orthography or meaning of the term. [In the E. Panjab the descendants of Jats forcibly converted to Islam are known as Mula, or 'unfortunate' (I.Verdon, Panjab Ethnography, p. 142). The word is derived from the naksatra or lunar asterism of Mul, to be born in which is considered specially unlucky.]

[1806. — "Mole-Islands." See under GRASSIA.]

MOLEY, a. A kind of (so-called ved) curry used in the Madras Presidency, a large amount of coco-nut being one of the ingredients. The word is a corruption of 'Malay'; the dish being simply a bad imitation of one used by the Malayas.

[1885. — "Regarding the Ceylon curry. . . . It is known by some as the 'Malay curry,' and it is closely allied to the moil of the Tamils of Southern India." Then follows the recipe. — Wyren, Culinary Jottings, 5th ed., 269.]

MOLLY, or (better) MALLEE, s. Hind. mali, Skt. mali, 'a gardener,' or a member of the caste which furnishes gardeners. We sometimes have heard a lady from the Bengal Presidency speak of the daily homage of "the Molly with his dolly," viz. of the mali with his doli.

1759.—In a Calcutta wages tariff of this year we find—

"House Molly . . . . 4 Rs."

MOLELLAS, n.p. The 'Spice Islands,' strictly speaking the five Clove Islands, lying to the west of Gilolo, and by name Ternate (Tarndite), Tidore (Tidore), Mortir, Makian, and Bachian. [See Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 166.] But the application of the name has been extended to all the islands under Dutch rule, between Celebes and N. Guinea. There is a Dutch governor residing at Amboyna, and the islands are divided into 4 residencies, viz. Amboyna, Banda, Ternate and Manado. The origin of the name Molucca, or Maluco as the Portuguese called it, is not recorded; but it must have been that by which the islands were known to the native traders at the time of the Portuguese discoveries. The early accounts often dwell on the fact that each island (at least three of them) had a king of its own. Possibly they got the (Ar.) name of Jazirat-al-Muluk, 'The Isles of the Kings.'

Valentijn probably entertained the same view of the derivation. He begins his account of the islands by saying:

"There are many who have written of the Molucos and of their Kings, but we have hitherto met with no writer who has given an exact view of the subject" (Deel, i. Mol. 3).

And on the next page he says:

"For what reason they have been called Moluccos we shall not here say; for we shall do this circumstantially when we shall speak of the Molukse Kings and their customs."

But we have been unable to find the fulfilment of this intention, though probably it exists in that continent of a work somewhere. We have also-seen a paper by a writer who draws much from the quarry of Valentijn. This is an article by Dr. Van Muschenbroek in the Proceedings of the International Congress of Geog. at Venice in 1881 (ii. pp. 596, seqq.), in which he traces the name to the same origin. He appears to imply that the chiefs were known among themselves as Molokos, and that this term was substituted for the indigenous Kolano, or King. "Ce nom, ce titre restèrent, et furent même peu à peu employés, non seulement pour les chefs, mais aussi pour l'état même. A la longue les îles et les états des Molokos devinrent les îles et les états Molokos." There is a good deal that is questionable, however, in this writer's deductions and etymologies. [Mr. Skeat remarks: "The islands appear to be mentioned in the Chinese history of the Tang dynasty (618-966) as Mi-li-ku, and if this be so the name is perhaps too old to be Arab."]

c. 1490.—"Hae (Javae) ultra xv dierum cursu due rerum insulae orientem versentur. Altera Sandaliappellatur, in qua nuncus mactae et maces; altera Bandam nomine, in qua sola gariofall producuntur." —N. Conti, in Poggia.

1501.—The earliest mention of these islands by this name, that we know, is in a letter of Amerigo Vespuci (quoted under CANNABERIA), who in 1501, among the places heard of by Cabral's fleet, mentions the Malacock Islands.

1510.—"We disembarked in the island of Monoch, which is much smaller than Bandan; but the people are worse... Here the cloves grow, and in many other neighbouring islands, but they are small and uninhabited." —Varthema, 246.

1514.—"Further on is Timor, whence come sandalwood, both the white and the red; and further on still are the Maluco, whence come the clove trees. The bark of these trees I am sending you; an excellent thing it is; and so are the flowers." —Letter of Giovanni da Empoli, in Archivio Stor. Ital., p. 81.

1515.—"From Malaccas ships and junks are come with a great quantity of spice, cloves, mace, nut (meg), sandalwood, and other rich things. They five discovered the five Islands of Cloves; two Portuguese are lords of them, and rule the land with the rod. Tis a land of much meat, oranges, lemons, and clove-trees, which grow there of their own accord, just as trees in the woods with us... God be praised for such favour, and such grand things!" —Another letter, ibid., pp. 85-86.

1518.—"Beyond these islands, 25 leagues towards the north-east, there are five islands, one before the other, which are called the islands of Maluc, in which all the cloves grow... Their Kings are Moors, and the first of them is called Backas, the second Mauquen, the third is called Motil, the fourth Tidory, and the fifth Ternaty... every year the people of Malacca and Java come to these islands to ship cloves..." —Barros, 201-202.

1521.—"Wednesday the 6th of November... we discovered four other rather high islands at a distance of 14 leagues towards the east. The pilot who had remained with us told us these were the Maluco islands, for which we gave thanks to God, and to comfort ourselves we discharged all our artillery... since we had passed 27 months all but two days always in search of Maluco." —Pigafetta, Voyage of Magellan, Hak. Soc. 124.

1553.—"We know by our voyages that this part is occupied by sea and by land cut up into many thousand islands, these together, sea and islands, embracing a great part of the circuit of the Earth... and in the midst of this great multitude of islands are those called Maluco... (These) five islands called Maluco... stand all within sight of one another embracing a distance of 25 leagues... we do not call them Maluco because they have no other names; and we call them five because in that number the clove grows naturally... Moreover we call them in combination Maluco, as here among us we speak of the Canaries, the Terezias, the Cabo-Verde islands, including under these names many islands each of which has a name of its own." —Barros, III. v. 5.

1666.—"As when far off at sea a fleet described Hanges in the clouds, by equinoctial winds Close sailing from Bengal, or the Isles Of Ternate and Tidore, whence merchants bring Their spicy drugs...." —Paradise Lost, ii. 636-640.

MONKEY-BREAD TREE, s. The Baobab, Adansonia digitata, L. "a fantastic-looking tree with immense elephantine stem and small twisted branches, laden in the rains with large white flowers; found all along the coast of Western India, but whether introduced by the Mahommedans from Africa, or by ocean-currents wafting its large light fruit, full of seed, across from shore to shore, is a nice speculation. A sailor once picked up a large seedy fruit in the Indian Ocean off Bombay, and brought it to me. It was very rotten, but I planted the seeds. It turned out to be Kigelia pinnata of E. Africa, and propagated so rapidly that in a few years I introduced it all over the Bombay Presidency. The Baobab however is generally found most abundant about the old ports frequented by the early Mahommedan traders" (Sir G. Birdwood, MS.). We may add that it occurs sparsely about Allahabad, where it was introduced apparently in the Mogul time; and in the Gangetic valley as far E. as Calcutta, but always planted. There are, or were, noble specimens in the Botanic Gardens at Calcutta, and in Mr. Arthur Grote’s garden at Alipur. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 105.]

MONSOON, s. The name given to the periodical winds of the Indian seas, and of the seasons which they affect and characterize. The original word is the Ar. mausim, ‘season,’ which the Portuguese corrupted into monción, and our people into monsoon. Dictionaries (except Dr. Badger’s) do not apparently give the Arabic word mausim the technical sense of monsoon. But there can be no doubt that it had that sense among the Arab pilots from whom the Portuguese adopted the word. This is shown by the quotations from the Turkish Admiral Sidi ‘Ali. “The rationale of the term is well put in the Beirût Moḥit, which says: ‘Mausim is used of anything that comes round but once a year, like the festivals. In Lebanon the mausim is the season of working with the sick,’—which is the important season there, as the season of navigation is in Yemen.” (W. R. S.)

The Spaniards in America would seem to have a word for season in analogous use for a recurring wind, as may be gathered from Tom Oriole.* The Venetian, Leonardo Ca’ Masser (below) calls the monsoons li tempi. And the quotation from García De Orta shows that in his time the Portuguese sometimes used the word for season without any apparent reference to the wind. Though monção is general with the Portuguese writers of the 16th century, the historian Diogo de Couto always writes monção, and it is possible that the n came in, as in some other cases, by a habitual mis-reading of the written u for n. Linchoten in Dutch (1596) has monsoon and monsooen (p. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 33]). It thus appears probable that we get our monsoon from the Dutch. The latter in modern times seem to have commonly adopted the French form mousson. [Prof. Skeat traces our monsoon from It. monomone.] We see below (Ces. Feder.) that Monsoon was used as synonymous with “the half year,” and so it is still in S. India.

1564.—“The principal winds are four, according to the Arabs, but the pilots call them by names taken from the rising and setting of certain stars, and assign them certain limits within which they begin or attain their greatest strength, and cease. These winds, limited by space and time, are called Mawsim.”—The Moabit, by Sidli, Alı Kopudun, in J. As. Soc. Beng. iil. 548.

“Be it known that the ancient masters of navigation have fixed the time of the monsoon (in orig. doubtless mausim), that is to say, the time of voyages at sea, according to the year of Yazdijird, and that the pilots of recent times follow their steps . . .” (Much detail on the monsoons follows.)—Ibid.

Sir T. Roe writes Monson.

1657.—“Of Corea hee was also told that there are many boggars, for which cause they have Waggons with broad wheelies, to keepe them from sinking, and observing the Monson or season of the wind they haveayscale fitted to these waggons, and so make their Voyages on land.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 602.

1654.—“Partio, vendo que o tempo em vao gastava, E que a monção di navegar passava.”* Malaca, Conquistada,* iv. 75.

1644.—“The winds that blow at Dju from the commencement of the change of season in September are sea-breezes, blowing from time to time from the S., S.W., or N.W., with no certain Monsam wind, and at that time one can row across to Dju with great facility.”—Bocarro, MS.

C. 1665.—“. . . and it would be true to say, that the sun advancing towards one Pole, causeth on that side two great regular currents, viz., that of the Sea, and that of the Air which maketh the Monsoon-wind, as he causeth two opposite ones, when he returns towards the other Pole.”—Bernier, E.T. 139-40; [ed. Coast, 436; see also 109].

1673.—“The northern Monsoons (if I may so say, being the name imposed by the first Observers, i.e. Motiones) lasting hither.”—Fryer, 10.

“A constellation by the Portugals called Rabadel Elephanto (see Elephanta, b.) known by the breaking up of the Monsoon, which is the last Flory this Season makes.”—Ibid. 48. He has also Monsoons or Monsoons, 46.

1690.—“Two Monsoons are the Age of a Man.”—Bombar Proverbs in Owington’s Voyage, 142.

1696.—“We thought it most advisable to remain here, till the next Monsoon.”—Bocarry, in Dalrymple, i. 87.

1738.—“From the Malay word Mavosin, which signifies season.”—Forrest, V. to Mervii, 95.

“Their prey is lodged in England; and the cries of India are given to seas and winds, to be blown about, in every breaking up of the monsoon, over a remote and unhearing ocean.”—Burke’s Speech on Fox’s E. Bill, in Works, iii. 468.

1812.—“Bomboare .. which by sailors is also called Bombay Bock, is derived originally from moobaker, ‘happy, fortunate.’”—Morier, Journey through Persia, 6.]

MOOCHULKA, s. Hind. muachkat or mochulka. A written obligation or bond. For technical uses see Wilson. The word is apparently Turki or Mongol.

C. 1267.—“Five days thereafter judgment was held on Husamuddin the astrologer, who had executed a muqhilat that the death of the Khalif would be the calamity of the world.”—Hammer’s Golden Horde, 166.

C. 1280.—“When he (Kubilai Kahn) approached his 70th year, he desired to raise in his own lifetime, his son Chinkin to be his representative and declared successor . . . The chiefs . . . represented ... that though the measure ... was not in accordance with the Yam and customs of the world-conquering hero Chinghis Kaan, yet they would grant a muuchika in favour of Chinkin’s Kaanship.” —Watsy’s History, Germ. by Hammer, 46.

c. 1860.—“He shall in all divisions and districts execute muuchikas to lay no burden on the subjects by extraordinary imposts, and irregular exaction of supplies.” —Form of the Warrant of a Territorial Governor under the Mongols, in the above, App. p. 465.

1818.—“You were present at the India Board when Lord B — told me that I should have 10,000 pagodas per annum, and all my expenses paid ... I never thought of taking a muuchika from Lord B — because I certainly never suspected that my expenses would have been restricted to 500 pagodas, a sum which hardly pays my servants and equipage.” —Munro to Malcolm, in Mungo’s Life, &c., iii. 257.

Moochy, s. One who works in leather, either as shoemaker or saddler. It is the name of a low caste, Hind. moochī. The name and caste are also found in S. India, Telug. muchche. These, too, are workers in leather, but also are employed in painting, gilding, and upholsterer’s work, &c.

Mooktear, s. Proper Hind. from Ar. mukhtar, ‘choosen,’ but corruptly mukhtyar. An authorised agent; an attorney. Mukhtyar-nāma, ‘a power of attorney.’

1866.—“I wish he had been under the scaffolding when the roof of that new Cutcherry he is building fell in, and killed two mookhtars.” —The Dave Bungalow (by G. O. Trevelyan), in Fraser’s Mag. lxxiii. p. 218.

1878.—“These were the mookhtars, or Criminal Court attorneys, teaching the witnesses what to say in their respective cases, and suggesting answers to all possible questions, the whole thing having been previously rehearsed at the mookhtar’s house.” —Life in the Mofussil, i. 90.

1885.—“The wily Bengali mukhtars, or attorneys, were the bane of the Hill Tracts, and I never relaxed in my efforts to banish them from the country.” —Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 396.

Moolah, s. Hind. mulla, corr. from Ar. maulūd, a der. from wild, ‘propriety.’ This is the legal bond which still connects a former owner with his manumitted slave; and in virtue of this bond the patron and client are both called moolūd. The idea of patronage is in the other senses; and the word comes to mean eventually ‘a learned man, a teacher, a doctor of the Law.’ In India it is used in these senses, and for a man who reads the Korān in a house for 40 days after a death. When oaths were administered on the Korān, the servitor who held the book was called Moolūl Korānī. Moolāl is also in India the usual Mussulman term for ‘a schoolmaster.’

1615.—“Their Moolas employ much of their time like Scriveners to doe business for others.” —Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1476.

[1817.—“He had shewed it to his Moolas.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 417.]

1668.—“While the Body is let down into the grave, the kindred mutter certain Prayers between their Teeth, and that done all the company returns to the house of the deceased, where the Moolas continue their Prayers for his Soul, for the space of two or three days. . . .” —Mandelo, E.T. 63.

1673.—“At funerals, the Moolahs or Priests make Orations or Sermons, after a Lesson read out of the Aitchorams.” —Fryer, 94.

1680.—“The old Mulla having been discharged for misconduct, another by name Cooze (see CAZEE) Mahmud entertained on a salary of 5 Pagodas per mensem, his duties consisting of the business of writing letters, &c., in Persian, besides teaching the Persian language to such of the Company’s servants as shall desire to learn it.” —Fr. St. Geo. Cons. March 11. Notes and Eats. No. iii. p. 12; [also see Pringle, Diary, Fr. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 2, with note].

1809.—“The British Government have, with their usual liberality, continued the allowance for the Moolahs of Kabul to read the Koran.” —Ld. Valentia, i. 423.

1879.—“... struck down by a fanatical crowd impelled by a fierce Moolah.” —Sat. Rev. No. 1251, p. 484.

Moolvée, s. Popular Hind. molvī, Ar. maulūvi, from same root as moolūd (see MOOLAH). A Judge, Doctor of the Law, &c. It is a usual prefix to the names of learned men and professors of law and literature. (See LAW-OFFICER.)

1784.—“A Pundit in Bengal or Molavee
May daily see a carcasse burn;
But you can’t furnish for the soul of ye
A dirge sans ahas and an urn.”

N. B. Halked, see Calcut. Review, xxvi. 79.
MOONAUL, s. Hind. mundal or mundl (it seems to be in no dictionary); [Platts gives "Mund (dialect)"]. The Lopoporus Impeyanus, most splendid perhaps of all game-birds, rivalling the brilliancy of hue, and the metallic lustre of the humming-birds on the scale of the turkey. "This splendid pheasant is found throughout the whole extent of the Himalayas, from the hills bordering Afghanistan as far east as Sikkim, and probably also to Bootan." (Jerdon). "In the autumnal and winter months numbers are generally collected in the same quarter of the forest, though often so widely scattered that each bird appears to be alone" (Ibid.). Can this last circumstance point to the etymology of the name as connected with Skt. muni, 'an eremite'?

It was pointed out in a note on Marco Polo (1st ed. i. 246, 2nd ed. i. 272), that the extract which is given below from Aelian undoubtedly refers to the Mundl. We have recently found that this indication had been anticipated by G. Cuvier, in a note on Pliny (com. vii. p. 409 of ed. Ajasson de Grandsagne, Paris, 1830). It appears from Jerdon that Monaul is popularly applied by Europeans at Darjeeling to the Sikkim horned pheasant Ceriornis satyra, otherwise sometimes called 'Argus Pheasant' (q.v.).

C. A.D. 350. — "Cocks too are produced there of a kind bigger than any others. These have slates, but instead of being red like the crest of our cocks, this is variegated like a coronet of flowers. The tail-feathers moreover are not arched, or bent into a curve (like a cook's), but flattened out. And this tail they trail after them as a peacock does, unless when they erect it, and set it up. And the plumage of these Indian cocks is golden, and dark blue, and of the hue of the emerald." — De Nat. Animal. xvi. 2.

MOONGA, MOOGA, s. Beng. mudg. A kind of wild silk, the produce of Antheraea assama, collected and manufactured in Assam. ["Its Assamese name is said to be derived from the amber munga, 'coral' colour of the silk, and is frequently used to denote silk in general" (B. C. Allen, Mono. on the Silk Cloths of Assam, 1899, p. 10).] The quotations in elucidation of this word may claim some peculiar interest. That from Purchas is a modern illustration of the legends which reached the Roman Empire in classic times, of the growth of silk in the Seric jungles ("vellaerque ui foliiis depsectant tenuin Seres"); whilst that from Robert Lindsay may possibly throw light on the statements in the Periplus regarding an overland importation of silk from Thin into Gangetic India.
MOONSHEE. 581  MOOR, MOORMAN.

1626.—"... Moga which is made of the bark of a certaine tree."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1605.

c. 1676.—"The kingdom of Asam is one of the best countries of all Asia... There is a sort of Silk that is found under the trees, which is spun by a creature like our Silk-worms, but ronderous, and which lives all the year long under the trees. The Silks which are made of this Silk glis'n very much, but they fret presently."—Tassinier, E.T. ii. 387-8; [ed. Ball, ii. 281].

1680.—"The Floretta yarn or Muckta examined and priced... The Agent informed that 'twas called Arundee, made neither with cotton nor silke, but of a kind of Herba spun by a worme that feeds upon the leaves of a stalke or tree called Arundee which bears a round prickly berry, of which style is made; vast quantities of this cloth is made in the country about Goora Ghaut beyond Serepoire Merchia; where the worms are kept as silke worms here; twill never come white, but will take any colour" &c.—Pt. St. Geo. Agent on Tour, Consn., Nov. 19. In Notes and Rats, No. iii. p. 58. Arzadd or radd is the castor-oil plant, and this must be the Atacac richi. Jones, called in H. Arrendi, Arriddiaia (!) and in Bengali Erri, Erria, Erindy, according to Forbes Watson's Nomenclature, No. 8002, p. 371. [For full details see Allen, Mono. pp. 5, seqq.]

1763.—"No duties have yet ever been paid on Leeks, Mugga-dooties, and other goods brought from Asam."—In Van Siltart, i. 249.

c. 1778.—"... Silks of a coarse quality, called Moonga dutties, are also brought from the frontiers of China for the Malay trade."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 174.

MOONSHEE, s. Ar. munshi, but written in Hind. munshi. The verb tinsha, of which the Ar. word is the participle, means 'to educate' a youth, as well as 'to compose a written document. Hence 'a secretary, a reader, an interpreter, a writer.' It is commonly applied by Europeans specifically to a native teacher of languages, especially of Arabic, Persian and Urdu, though the application to a native amanuensis in those tongues, and to any respectable, well-educated native gentleman is also common. The word probably became tolerably familiar in Europe through a book of instruction in Persian bearing the name (viz. "The Persian Moonshee, by F. Gladiwm," 1st ed. s.a., but published in Calcutta about 1790-1800).

1777.—"Moonshee. A writer or secretary."—Halked, Code, 17.

1782.—"The young gentlemen exercise themselves in translating... they reason and dispute with their munshees (tutors) in Persian and Moors..."—Price's Tracts, i. 89.

1785.—"Your letter, requiring our authority for engaging in your service a Munshy, for the purpose of making out passports, and writing letters, has been received."—Tippoo's Letters, 67.

"A lasting friendship was formed between the pupil and his Moonshee... The Moonshees, who had become wealthy, afforded him yet more substantial evidence of his recollection, by earnestly requesting him, when on the point of leaving India, to accept a sum amounting to £1600, on the plea that the latter (i.e. Shore) had saved little."—Mem. of Lord Teignmouth, i. 32-33.

1814.—"They presented me with an address they had just composed in the Hindoo language, translated into Persian by the Durbar munshees."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 365; [2nd ed. ii. 344].

1817.—"Its authenticity was fully proved by... and a Persian Moonshee who translated."—Mill, Hist. v. 127.

1828.—"... the great Moslehi of State himself had applied the whole of his genius to selecting such flowers of language as would not fail to diffuse joy, when exhibited in those dark and dank regions of the north."—Huaji Baba in England, i. 39.

1837.—"When the Mirza grew up, he fell among English, and ended by carrying his rupees as a Moonshee, or a language-master, to that infidel people."—Select Writings of Viscount Strangford, i. 285.

MOONSIEFF, s. Hind. from Ar. munsieff, 'one who does justice' (insieff), a judge. In British India it is the title of a native civil judge of the lowest grade. This office was first established in 1793.

1812.—"... munsieff, or native justices."—Fifth Report, p. 32.

[1852.—"I wonder, Mr. Deputy, if Providence had made you a Moonsieif, instead of a Deputy Collector, whether you would have been more lenient in your strictures upon our system of civil justice."—Raitte, Notes on the N. W. Provinces, 155.]

MOOB, MOORMAN, s. (and adj. MOORISH). A Mahommedan; and so from the habitual use of the term (Mouro), by the Portuguese in India, particularly a Mahommedan inhabitant of India.

In the Middle Ages, to Europe generally, the Mahommedans were known as the Saracens. This is the word always used by Joinville, and by Marco Polo. Ibn Batutta also mentions the fact in a curious passage (ii. 425-6). At a later day, when the fear of the Ottoman had made itself felt in Europe, the word Turk was that which identified itself with the Moslem, and thus we have in the Collect for Good Friday,—"Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics." But to the Spaniards and Portuguese, whose contact was with the Musalmans of Mauritania who had passed over and conquered the Peninsula, all Mahommedans were Moors. So the Mahommedans whom the Portuguese met with on their voyages to India, on what coast soever, were alike styled Moors; and from the Portuguese the use of this term, as synonymous with Mahommedan, passed to Hollanders and Englishmen.

The word then, as used by the Portuguese discoverers, referred to religion, and implied no nationality. It is plain indeed from many passages that the Moors of Calicut and Cochin were in the beginning of the 16th century people of mixt race, just as the Moplahs (q.v.) are now. The Arab, or Arabo-African occupants of Mozambique and Melinda, the Sumâlis of Magadoxo, the Arabs and Persians of Kalhât and Ormuz, the Borsas of Guzerat, are all Moors to the Portuguese writers, though the more intelligent among these are quite conscious of the impropriety of the term. The Moors of the Malabar coast were middlemen, who had adopted a profession of Islam for their own convenience, and in order to minister for their own profit to the constant traffic of merchants from Ormuz and the Arabian ports. Similar influences still affect the boasters of the same coast, among whom it has become a sort of custom in certain families, that different members should profess respectively Mahommedanism, Hinduism, and Christianity.

The use of the word Moor for Mahommedan died out pretty well among educated Europeans in the Bengal Presidency in the beginning of the last century, or even earlier, but probably held its ground a good deal longer among the British soldiers, whilst the adjective Moorish will be found in our quotations nearly as late as 1840. In Ceylon, the Straits, and the Dutch Colonies, the term Moorman for a Musulman is still in common use. Indeed the word is still employed by the servants of Madras officers in speaking of Mahommedans, or of a certain class of these. Moor is still applied at Manilla to the Musulman Malays.

1498.—"... the Moors never came to the house when this trading went on, and we became aware that they wished us ill, and among other things we sent them, in order to annoy us they would spit on the ground, and say 'Portugul, Portugal.'"—Roteiro de V. da Gama, p. 75.

"For you must know, gentlemen, that from the moment you put into port here (Calcut) you caused disturbance of mind to the Moors of this city, who are numerous and very powerful in the country."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 166.

1499.—"We reached a very large island called Sumatra, where pepper grows in considerable quantities... The Chief is a Moor, but speaking a different language."—Santo Stefano, in India in the X VIth Cent. [7].

1513.—"Hane (Malaccam) rex Maurorum gubernabit."—Emanuelt Regis Epistola, f. 1.

1553.—"And for the hatred in which they hold them, and for their abhorrence of the name of Frangus, they call in reproach the Christians of our parts of the world Frangus (see FIRINGHEES), just as we improperly call them again Moors."—Berros, I. v. iv. 16.

c. 1560.—"When we lay at Fuquoise, we did see certain Moors, who knew so little of their sect that they could say nothing else but that Mahomet was a Moor, my father was a Moor, and I am a Moor."—Reports of the Province of China, done into English by R. Willes, in Hakl. ii. 557.

1568.—"And as to what you say of Ludovico Vartomano, I have spoken both here and in Portugal, with people who knew him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and that he came back among us doing penance for his sins; and that the man never went further than Calcut and Cochin, nor indeed did we at that time navigate those seas that we now navigate."—Garcia, t. 30.

1569.—"... always whereas I have spoken of Gentiles is to be understood Idolaters, and whereas I speak of Moors, I mean Mahomet sects."—Caesar Frederik, in Hakl. ii. 859.

1610.—"The King was fled for fear of the King of Makasar, who... would force the King to turne Moor, for he is a Gentile."—Midleton, in Purchas, i. 239.

1611.—"Les Moors du pay faisoit courir le bruit, que les notres avoient ete batuue."—Wyghts, H. des Indes, iii. 9.

1648.—"King Jangier (Jehanger) used to make use of a reproach: That one Portugues... was better than three Moors, and one Hollandor or Englishman better than two Portu-geuses."—Van Twist, 59.

C. 1665.—"Il y en a de Moors et de Gentiles Raspoutes (see RAJPOOT) parce que je savoir qu'ils servent mieux que les Moors qui sont superbes, et ne veulent pas qu'on se plaisige d'eux, quelque soisie ou quelque tromperie qu'ils fassent."—Theronot, v. 217.

1673.—"Their Crew were all Moors (by which Word hereafter must be meant those of the Mahometan faith) apparel'd all in white."—Fryer, p. 24.

"They are a Shame to our Sailors, who can hardly ever work without horrid Oaths and hideous Cursing and Impressa- tions; and these Moorman, on the contrary, never set their Hands to any Labour, but that they sing a Psalm or Prayer, and conclude at every joint Application of it. 'Allah, Allah,' invoking the Name of God."

—Ibid., pp. 55-56.

1685.—"We put out a piece of a Red Ancient to appear like a Moor's Vessel: not judging it safe to be known to be English: Our nation having lately got an ill name by abusing ye Inhabitants of these Islands: but no boat would come near us . . ." (in the Maldives).—Hedges, Diary, March 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 190].

1688.—"Lascars, who are Moors of India."—Dampier, ii. 57.

1689.—"The place where they went ashore was a Town of the Moors: Which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects; calling the Idolators, Gentous or Rasboot (see RAJPOOT)."—Dampier, i. 507.

1747.—"We had the Misfortune to be reduced to almost inevitable Danger, for as our Success largely depended on the assist- ance of the Moors, We were soon brought to the utmost Extremity by being abandoned by them."—Letter from Ft. St. Geo. to the Court, May 2 (India Office MS. Records).

1752.—"His successor Mr. Goddheue . . . even permitted him (Dupleix) to continue the exhibition of those marks of Moorish dignity, which both Murza'-jing and Salla- bad-jing had permitted him to display."—Orme, i. 367.

1757.—In Ives, writing in this year, we constantly find the terms Moorman and Moorish, applied to the forces against which Clive and Watson were acting on the Hoogly.

1763.—"From these origins, time has formed in India a mighty nation of near ten millions of Mahomedans, whom Europeans call Moors."—Orme, ed. 1808, i. 24.

1770.—"Before the Europeans doubled the Cape of Good Hope, the Moors, who were the only maritime people of India, sailed from Surat and Bengal to Malacca."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 210.

1781.—"Mr. Hicky thinks it a Duty incumbent on him to inform his friends in particular, and the Public in General, that an attempt was made to Assassinate him last Thursday Morning between the Hours of One and two o'clock, by two armed Europeans aided and assisted by a Moorman. . . ."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 7.

1784.—"Lieutenants Speediman and Rutledge . . . were bound, circumcised, and clothed in Moorish garments."—In Seton-Karr, i. 15.

1787.—"Under the head of castes entitled to a favourable term, I believe you compre- hend Brahmins, Moorman, merchants, and almost every man who does not belong to the Sudras or cultivating castes. . . ."—Minute of Sir T. Munro, in Arbuthnot, i. 17.

1807.—"The rest of the inhabitants, who are Moors, and the richer Gentoes, are dressed in various degrees and fashions."—Ld. Minto in India, p. 17.

1829.—"I told my Moorman, as they call Moormen here, just now to ask the drum-major when the mail for the Pradoons (!) was to be made up."—Mem. of Col. Moun- tain, 2nd ed. p. 80.

1839.—"As I came out of the gate I met some young Moorish dandies on horseback; one of them was evidently a 'crack-riding, and begun to show off.'"—Letters from Madras, p. 290.

MOORA, s. Sea Hind. mūra, from Port. amura, Itali. mura; a tack (Roebuck).

MOORAH, s. A measure used in the sale of paddy at Bombay and in Guzerat. The true form of this word is doubtful. From Molesworth's MAHR. Dict. it would seem that mūdā and mūdi are properly cases of rice-straw bound together to contain certain quantities of grain, the former larger and the latter smaller. Hence it would be a vague and varying measure. But there is a land measure of the same name. See Wilson, s.v. Mūdi. [The Madras Gloss. gives mooda. Mal. mūdu, from mūtu, 'to cover,' a fastening package; especially the packages in a circular form, like a Dutch cheese, fastened with wisps of straw, in which rice is made up in Malabar and Canara. The mooda is said to be 1 cubic foot and 1,116 cubic inches, and equal to 3 Kulisses (see CULSEY).]

1554.—"(At Baçaim) the Mura of bates (see BATTÁ) contains 3 candies (see CANDY), which (bates) is rice in the husk, and after it is stript it amounts to a candy and a half, and something more."—A. Nunes, p. 80.

[1611.—"I send your worship by the bearer 10 moraes of rice."—Dansere, Letters, i. 116.]
MOOPUNKY, s. Corr. of Morpankh, 'peacock-tailed,' or 'peacock-winged'; the name given to certain state pleasure-boats on the Ganges rivers, now only (if at all) surviving at Murshidabad. They are a good deal like the Burmese 'war-boats,' see cut in Mission to Ava (Major Phayre's), p. 4. [A similar boat was the Feechehra (Hind. fit-chehra, 'elephant-faced'). In a letter of 1784 Warren Hastings writes: 'I intend to finish my voyage to-morrow in the Feechehra' (Busted, Echoes, 3rd ed. 291).]

1767.—"Charges Dewanny, viz.:—

'A few moorpungkeys and beaulaes (see BOLIAR) for the service of Mahomed Reza Khan, and on the service at the city some are absolutely necessary . . . 25,000: 0: 0."

—Dacca Accounts, in Long, 524.

1780.—"Another boat . . . very curiously constructed, the Moor-punky: these are very long and narrow, sometimes extending to upwards of 100 feet in length, and not more than 8 feet in breadth; they are always paddled, sometimes by 40 men, and are steered by a large paddle from the stern, which rises in the shape of a peacock, a snake, or some other animal."—Hedges, 40.

[1785.—". . . moorpunkes, or peacock-boats, which are made as much as possible to resemble the peacock."—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 450.]

MOORS, THE, s. The Hindustani language was in the 18th century commonly thus styled. The idiom is a curious old English one for the denomination of a language, of which 'broad Scots' is perhaps a type, and which we find exemplified in 'Malabars' (see MALABAR) for Tamil, whilst we have also met with Bengals for Bengali, with Indostans for Urdu, and with Turks for Turkish. The term Moors is probably now entirely obsolete, but down to 1830, at least, some old officers of the Royal army and some old Madras civilians would occasionally use the term as synonymous with what the former would also call 'the black language.' [Moors for Urdu was certainly in use among the old European pensioners at Chunar as late as 1892.]

"Grammatical Remarks on the Practical and Vulgar Dialect Of the Hindostan Language commonly called Moors with a Vocabulary English and Moors. The Spelling according to The Persian Orthography Wherein are References between Words resembling each other in Sound and different in Significations with Literal Translations and Explanations of the Words and Circumlocutory Expressions For the more easy attaining the Idiom of the Language The whole calculated for The Common Practice in Bengal.

MDOOLXXIII."

Captain Hadley's orthography is on a detectable system. He writes chookerau, chookeras for chhokra, chhokri ('boy, girl'); dolchinney for dal-chinn ('cinnamon'), &c. His etymological ideas also are loose. Thus he gives 'shrimps=shinghra mutches, 'fish with legs and claws,' as if the word was from chang (Pers.), 'a hook or claw.' Badyor, 'a halter,' or as he writes, bang-doors, he derives from Dar, 'distance,' instead of dor, 'a rope.' He has no knowledge of the instrumental case with terminal ne, and he does not seem to be aware that ham and tum (hum and toom, as he writes) are in reality plurals ('we' and 'you'). The grammar is altogether of a very primitive and tentative character, and far behind that of the R. C. Missionaries, which is referred to s. v. Hindustane. We have not seen that of Schulz (1745) mentioned under the same.

1752.—"The Centinal was sitting at the top of the gate, singing a Moorish song."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 272.

1767.—"In order to transact business of any kind in this Country, you must at least have a smattering of the Language for few of the Inhabitants (except in great Towns) speak English. The original Language, of this Country (or at least the earliest we know of) is the Bengalis or Gentoos. . . . But the polite Language is the Moors or Musulmans and Persian. . . . The only Language that I know anything of is the

* Hadley, however, mentions in his preface that a small pamphlet had been received by Mr. George Bogle in 1770, which he found to be the mutilated embryo of his own grammatical scheme. This was circulating in Bengal "at his expense."
MOORUM, a. A word used in Western India for gravel, especially as used in road-metal. The word appears to be Mahratti. Molesworth gives "murum, a fissile kind of stone, probably decayed Trap." [Murukalli is the Tel. name for Laterite. (Also see CABOOK.)

[1875.—"There are few places where Morram, or decomposed granite, is not to be found."—Gribble, Cuddapah, 247.

MOOTSUDDY, s. A native accountant. Hind. mutasaddi from Ar. mutasaddi.

1838.—"Cosmadass ye Chief Secretary, Mutsudies, and ye Nabobs Chief Emuch will be paid all their money beforehand."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 61].

1785.—"This representation has caused us the utmost surprise. Whenever the Mutsudies belonging to your department cease to yield you proper obedience, you must give them a severe flogging."—Tipoo's Letters, p. 2.

"Old age has certainly made havoc on your understanding, otherwise you would have known that the Mutsudies here are not the proper persons to determine the market prices there."—Ibid. p. 118.

[1809.—"The regular battalions have also been riotous, and confined their Mootsuudies, the officer who keeps their accounts, and transacts the public business on the part of the commandant."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 135.]

MOPLAH, s. Malay. mappila. The usual application of this word is to the indigenous Mahommedes of Malabar; but it is also applied to the indigenous (so-called) Syrian Christians of Cochin and Travancore. In Morton's Life of Leyden the word in the latter application is curiously misspelt as madilla. The derivation of the word is very obscure. Wilson gives mala-pilla, 'mother's son,' "as sprung from the intercourse of foreign colonists, who were persons unknown, with Malabar women." Nelson, as quoted below interprets the word as 'bridegroom' (it should however rather be 'son-in-law').* Dr. Badger suggests that it is from the Arabic verb faalaha, and means 'a cultivator' (compare the fellah of Egypt), whilst Mr. C. P. Brown expresses his conviction that it was a Tamil mispronunciation of the Arabic mu'labbar, 'from over the water.' No one of these greatly commands itself. [Mr. Logan (Malabar, ii. cxxvii.) and the Madras Glossary derive it from Mal. ma, Skt. maha, 'great,' and Mal. pilla, 'a child.' Dr. Gundert's view is that Mappila was an honorary title given to colonists from

They call these Moors Mapulies; they carry on nearly all the trade of the seaports." — Barbossa, 146.

1782. — "... les Mapulies rendent les costumes et les superstitions des Gentils, sous l'empire des quels ils vivont. C'est pour se conformer aux usages des Malabars, que les enfants des Mapulies n'héritent point de leurs pères, mais des frères de leurs mères." — Sonnerat, i. 193.

1787. — "Of Mapulies fierce your hand has tam'd, And monsters that your sword has main'd." — Life and Letters of J. Ritson, 1833, i. 114.

1800. — "We are not in the most thriving condition in this country. Polegars, nairs, and mapulies in arms on all sides of us." — Wellington, i. 48.

1813. — "At one period the Mapulies created great commotion in Travancore, and towards the end of the 17th century massacred the chief of Anjengo, and all the English gentlemen belonging to the settlement, when on a public visit to the Queen of Attinga." — Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 402; 2nd ed. i. 259.

1888. — "I may add in concluding my notice that the Kailans alone of all the castes of Madura call the Mahometans 'MAPULIES' or bridegrooms (Mopulies)." — Nelson's Madura, Pt. ii. 56.

MORA, s. Hind. morkha. A stool (tabouret); a footstool. In common colloquial use.

[1795. — "The old man, whose attention had been chiefly attracted by a Ramagahr moral, of which he was desirous to know the construction . . . departed." — Capt. Blunt, in Asiatic Res., vii. 92.

1843. — "Whilst seated on a round stool, or mandali, in the thanna, . . . I entered into conversation with the thannadar. . . ." — Davidson, Travels in Upper India, i. 127.]

MORCHAL, s. A fan, or a fly-whisk, made of peacock's feathers. Hind. morchhal.

1673. — "All the heat of the Day they idle it under some shady Tree, at night they come in troops, armed with a great Pole, a Morchhal or Peacock's Tail, and a Wallet." — Fryer, 95.

1690. — "(The heat) "makes us Employ our Poons in Fanning of us with Murchals made of Peacock's Feathers, four or five Foot long, in the time of our Entertainments, and when we take our Repose." — Ovington, 335.

1826. — "They (Goosains) are cloathed in a ragged mantle, and carry a long pole, and a mirchhal, or peacock's tail." — Pandurangi Hari, ed. 1873, i. 76.]

MORT-DE-CHIEN, s. A name for cholera, in use, more or less, up to the end of the 18th century, and the former prevalence of which has tended probably to the extraordinary and baseless notion that epidemic cholera never existed in India till the governorship of the Marquis of Hastings. The word in this form is really a corruption of the Portuguese morderoxim, shaped by a fanciful French etymology. The Portuguese word again represents the Konkan and Maharati modachi, modshi, or modvash, 'cholera,' from a Mahr. verb modten, 'to break up, to sink' (as under infirmities, in fact 'to collapse'). The Guzarat appears to be morchi or morachi.

[1504. — Writing of this year Correa mentions the prevalence of the disease in the Samarini's army, but he gives it no name. "Besides other illness there was one almost sudden, which caused such a pain in the belly that a man hardly survived 8 hours of it." — Correa, i. 489.]

1543. — Correa's description is so striking that we give it almost at length: "This winter they had in Goa a mortal distemper which the natives call morry, and attacking persons of every quality, from the smallest infant at the breast to the old man of fourscore, and also domestic animals and fowls, so that it affected every living thing, male and female. And this malady attacked people without any cause that could be assigned, falling upon sick and sound alike, on the fat and the lean; and nothing in the world was a safeguard against it. And this malady attacked the stomach, caused as some experts affirmed by chill; though later it was maintained that no cause whatever could be discovered. The malady was so powerful and so evil that it immediately produced the symptoms of strong perspiration, e.g., vomiting, constant desire for water, with drying of the stomach; and cramps that contracted the hams and the soles of the feet, with such pains that the patient seemed dead, with the eyes broken and the nails of the fingers and toes black and crumpled. And for this malady our physicians never found any cure; and the patient was carried off in one day, or at the most in a day and night; insomuch that not ten in a hundred recovered, and those who did recover were such as were healed in haste with medicines of little importance known to the natives. So great was the mortality this season that the bells were tolling all day... insomuch that the governor forbade the tolling of the church bells, not to frighten the people... and when a man died in the hospital of this malady of morsexy the Governor ordered all the experts to come together and open the body. But they found nothing wrong except that the panich was shrunk up like a hen's gizzard, and wrinkled like a piece of scorched leather..."—Correa, iv. 288-289.

1563.—"Page.—Don Jeronimo sends to beg that you will go and visit his brother immediately, for though this is not the time of day for visits, delay would be dangerous, and he will be very thankful that you come at once."

"Orta.—What is the matter with the patient, and how long has he been ill?"

"Page.—He has got morri; and he has been ill two hours."

"Orta.—I will follow you."

"Ruano.—In this the disease that kills so quickly, and that few recover from! Tell me, it is called by our people, and by the natives, and the symptoms of it, and the treatment you use in it."

"Orta.—Our name for the disease is Colerica passio; and the Indians call it morri; whence again by corruption we call it mordean. It is sharper here than in our own part of the world, for usually it kills us four and twenty hours. And I have seen some cases where the patient did not live more than ten hours. The most that it lasts is four days; but as there is no rule without an exception, I once saw a man with great constancy of virtue who lived twenty days continually throwing up (carrinosa!)... bile, and died at last. Let us see this sick man, and see for the symptoms you will yourself see what a thing it is."—Garcia, í. 74, 75.

1578.—"There is another thing which is useless called by them canaris, which the Canarín Brahman physicians usually employ for the colerica passio sickness, which they call morri; which sickness is so sharp that it kills in fourteen hours or less."—Acosta, Tractado, 27.

1588.—"There reigneth a sickness called Mordean which stealth upon men, and handleth them in such sorts, that it weaketh a man and maketh him cast out as that he hath in his bodie, and many times his life withall."—Lesachot, 67; [Hak. Soc. i. 235; Morri in i. 22].

1599.—"The disease which in India is called Mordean. This is a species of Cole, which comes on in those countries with such force and vehemence that it kills in a few hours; and there is no remedy discovered. It causeth evacuations by stool or vomit, and makes onehurst with pain. But there is a herb proper for the cure, which bears the same name of mordean."—Cardetti, 227.

1602.—"In those islets off Arica they found bad and brackish water, and certain beans like ours both green and dry, of which they ate some, and in the same moment this gave them a kind of dysenteric, which in India they corruptly call mordean, which ought to be morri, and which the Arabs call makhize (Ar. hayzat), which is what Rasis calls sabida, a disease which kills in 24 hours. Its action is immediately to produce a sunken and slender pulse, with cold sweat, great inward fire, and excessive thirst, the eyes sunken, great vomitings, and in fact it leaves the natural power so collapsed (derrido) that the patient seems like a dead man."—Covto, Dec. IV. liv. iv. cap. 10.

c. 1610.—"Il regne entre eux vne autre maladie qui vient a l'improviste, ils la nomment Mordean, et vient nuec grande douleur de teste, et vomissement, et orient fort, et le plus souvent en meurent."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 19; [Hak. Soc. ii. 13].

1651.—"Pulvis ejus (Calumbac) ad scrup. unius pondus sumptus cholerae prodet, quam Mordean inoculae vacant."—Jac. Bunti, lib. iv. p. 43.

1688.—"...celles qui y regnent le plus, sont celles qu'ils appellent Mordean, qui tue subitement."—Mandetulo, 255.

1648.—See also the (questionable) Voyages Fameux du Sieur Victor le Blanc, 76.

c. 1665.—"Les Portugais appellent Mordechén les quatre sortes de Coliques qu'on souffre dans les Indes ou elles sont frequentes... ceux qui ont la quatrième souffrent les trois maux ensemble, à savoir le vomissement, le flux de ventre, les extreames douleurs, et je crois que cette dernière est le Colera-Morbus."—Thevenot, v. 324.

1678.—"They apply Cauterizes most unmercifully in a Mordisheen, called so by the Portugals, being a Vomiting with Looseness."—Pryer, 114.

[1674.—"The disease called Mordechén generally commences with a violent fever, accompanied by tremblings, horrors and vomitings; these symptoms are generally followed by delirium and death. He prescribes a hot iron applied to the soles of the feet. He attributes the disease to indigestion, and remarks bitterly that at least the prisoners of the Inquisition were safe from this disease."—Dellon, Relation de l'Inquisition de Goa, ii. ch. 71.]

c. 1690.—Rumphius, speaking of the Jack-fruit (q.v.): "Non nisi vacuo stomacho edendus est, alias enim..."—Rumph. de Pascio Cholerica, Portogallia Mordexi dicta."—Herb. Amb., i. 106.

1702.—"Cette grande indigestion qu'on appelle aux Indes Mordechén, et que quelques uns de nos Francais ont appelee Morte-de-Chien."—Lettre Ed., x. 159.

Blateau (a.v.) says Mordean is properly a failure of digestion which is very perilous in those parts, unless the native remedy be used. This is to apply a thin rod, like a spit, and heated, under the heel, till the patient screams with pain, and then to slap the same part with the sole of a shoe, &c.

1705. — "Ce mal s'appelle mort-de-chien." — Lullier, 113.

The following is an example of literal translation, as far as we know, unique:

1716. — "The extraordinary distempers of this country (I. of Bourbon) are the cholick, and what they call the Dog's Disease, which is cured by burning the heel of the patient with a hot iron." — Act. of the I. of Bourbon, in La Roque's Voyage to Arabia the Happy, &c., E.T. London, 1726, p. 156.

1717. — the Mordexin (which seizes one suddenly, with such oppression and palpitation that he thinks he is going to die on the spot)." — Valentinj, v. (Malabar) 5.

1760. — "There is likewise known, on the Malabar coast chiefly, a 'most violent disorder they call the Mordechim; which seizes the patient with such fury of purging, vomiting, and torments of the intestines, that it often carry him off in 30 hours." — Grew, i. 250.

1768. — "This (cholera morbus) in the East Indies, where it is very frequent and fatal, is called Mort-de-chien." — Lind, Essay on Diseases incidental to Hot Climates, 248.

1778. — In the Vocabulary of the Portuguese Grammatica Indostana, we find Mordechim, as a Portuguese word, rendered in Hind. by the word badzami, i.e. bad-hazam, 'dyspepsia' (p. 99). The most common modern Hind. term for cholera is Arab. hāiza. The latter word is given by Garcia de Orta in the form hachaim, and in the quotation from Coutelet, 's of hachaim (1). Jahangir speaks of one of his nobles as dying in the Deccan, of hāizah, in A.D. 1615 (see note to Eliot, vi. 316). It is, however, perhaps not to be assumed that hāizah always means cholera. Thus Macpherson mentions that a violent epidemic, which raged in the Camp of Aurangzib at Bijapur in 1689, is called so. But in the history of Khāfi Khān (Eliot, vii. 337) the general phrases ta'sins and wādli are used in reference to this disease, whilst the description is that of bubonic plague.

1781. — "Early in the morning of the 21st June (1781) we had two men seized with the mort-de-chien." — Curtis, Diseases of India, 3rd ed., Edinb., 1807.

1792. — "Les indigestions appelées dans l'Inde Mort-de-chien, sont fréquentes. Les Castes qui mangent de la viande, nourriture trop pesante pour un climat si chaud, en sont souvent attaquées. . . ." — Sonnerat, i. 205. This author writes just after having described two epidemics of cholera under the name of Flux aigu. He did not apprehend that this was in fact the real Mort-de-chien.

1788. — "A disease generally called 'Mort-de-chien' at this time (during the defence of Onore) raged with great violence among the native inhabitants." — Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 122.

1796. — "Far more dreadful are the consequences of the above-mentioned intestinal colic, called by the Indians shaksi, mordexin and also Nircombien. It is occasioned, as I have said, by the winds blowing from the mountains. . . . the consequence is, that malignant and bilious slimy matter adheres to the bowels, and occasions violent pains, vomiting, fever, and stupefaction; so that persons attacked with the disease die very often in a few hours. It sometimes happens that 30 or 40 persons die in this manner, in one place, in the course of the day. . . . In the year 1792 this disease raged with so much fury that a great many persons died of it." — Fra Paolinio, E.T. 490-410 (orig. see p. 358). As to the names used by Fra Paolinio, for his Shaksi or Gasi, we find nothing nearer than Tamil and Mal. asan, 'convulsion, paralysis.' (Winelow in his Tamil Dict. specifies 19 kinds of asan). Kombe, is explained as 'a kind of chien and smallpox ('water-k.') as a kind of cholera or bilious diarrhoea.' Paolinio adds: "La droga amara coste asan, e non si poteva amministrare a tanti miserabili che perveniva. Adunque in mancanza di questa droga amara noi distillammo in Tippera, o acqua vite di cocco, molto steso di cavalli (!), o l'amministrammo agli infermi. Tutti quelli che prendevano questa guarirono." —

1806. — "Mochoo or Mortbhee (Guz.) and Muchoo (Mah.). A morbid affectation in which the symptoms are convulsive action, followed by evacuations of the first passage up and down, with intolerable tenesmus, or twisting-like sensation in the intestines, corresponding remarkably with the cholera-morbus of European synopsists, called by the country people in England (1) morse sheen, and by others mort-du-chien and Maul des chiennes, as if it had come from France." — R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c. A curious notice; and the author was, we presume, from his title of "Dr.", a medical man. We suppose for England above should be read India.

The next quotation is the latest instance of the familiar use of the word that we have met with:

1812. — "General M. — was taken very ill three or four days ago; a kind of fit—mort de chien—the doctor said, brought on by eating too many radishes." —Original Familiar Correspondence between Residents in India, &c., Edinburgh, 1848, p. 287.

1813. — "Mort de chien is nothing more than the highest degree of Cholera Morbus." — Johnson, Inf. of Tropical Climate, 406.

The second of the following quotations evidently refers to the outbreak of cholera mentioned, after Macpherson, in the next paragraph.

1780.—"I am once or twice a year (!) subject to violent attacks of cholera morbus, here called mort-de-chien. . . ."—Impey to Dunning, quoted by Sir James Stephen, ii. 339.

1781.—"The Plague is now broke out in Bengal, and rages with great violence; it has swept away already above 4000 persons. 200 or upwards have been buried in the different Portuguese churches within a few days."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, April 21.

These quotations show that cholera, whether as an epidemic or as sporadic disease, is no new thing in India. Almost in the beginning of the Portuguese expeditions to the East we find apparent examples of the visitations of this terrible scourge, though no precise name is given in the narratives. Thus we read in the Life of Giovanni da Emboli, an adventurous young Florentine who served with the Portuguese, that, arriving in China in 1617, the ships' crews were attacked by a pessima malatia di frusso (vulvent flux) of such kind that there died thereof about 70 men, and among these Giovanni himself, and two other Florentines (Vita, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 33). Correa says that, in 1503, 20,000 men died of a like disease in the army of the Zamorin. We have given above Correa's description of the terrible Goan pest of 1543, which was most evidently cholera. Madras accounts, according to Macpherson, first mention the disease at Arcot in 1756, and there are frequent notices of it in that neighbourhood between 1763 and 1787. The Hon. R. Lindsay speaks of it as raging at Sylhet in 1781, after carrying off a number of the inhabitants of Calcutta (Macpherson, see the quotation of 1781 above). It also raged that year at Ganjam, and out of a division of 5000 Bengal troops under Col. Pearse, who were on the march through that district, 1143 were in a few days sent into hospital, whilst "death raged in the camp with a horror not to be described." The earliest account from the pen of an English physician is by Dr. Paisley, and is dated Madras, Feby. 1774. In 1783 it broke out at Hardwar Fair, and is said, in less than 8 days, to have carried off 20,000 pilgrims. The pacity of cases of cholera among European troops in the returns up to 1817, is ascribed by Dr. Macnamara to the way in which facts were disguised by the current nomenclature of disease. It need not perhaps be denied that the outbreak of 1817 marked a great recrudescence of the disease. But it is a fact that some of the more terrible features of the epidemic, which are then spoken of as quite new, had been prominently described at Goa nearly three centuries before.

See on this subject an article by Dr. J. Macpherson in Quarterly Review, for Janry. 1867, and a Treatise on Asiatic Cholera, by C. Macnamara, 1876. To these, and especially to the former, we owe several facts and references; though we had recorded quotations relating to mordexin and its identity with cholera some years before even the earlier of these publications.

MORDEXIM, MORDIXIM, s. Also the name of a sea-fish. Bluteau says 'a fish found at the Isle of Quinsembe on the Coast of Mozambique, very like boygas (f) or river-pikea.'

MOSHELAY, n.p. A site at Shiraz often mentioned by Hâfiz as a favourite spot, and near which is his tomb.

1850.—"Boy! let your liquid ruby flow, And bid thy pleasure heart be glad, Whate'er the frowning zealots say; Tell them that Eden cannot show A stream so clear as Roxbâd; A bower so sweet as Moshellay."—Hâfiz, rendered by Sir W. Jones.

1811.—"The stream of Roxnâd murmured near us; and within three or four hundred yards was the Mosella and the Tomb of Hâfiz."—W. Ouseley's Travels, i. 318.

1813.—"Not a shrub now remains of the bower of Mosella, the situation of which is now only marked by the ruins of an ancient tower."—Macdonald Kinnaird's Persia, 62.

MOSQUE, s. There is no room for doubt as to the original of this word being the Ar. magid, 'a place of worship,' literally the place of sujud, i.e. 'prostration.' And the probable course is this. Magid becomes (1) in Span. mezquita, Port. mezquita; (2) * According to Pyrrad mezquita is the word used in the Maldiv Islands. It is difficult to suppose the people would adopt such a word from the Portuguese. And probably the form both in east and west is to be accounted for by a hard pronunciation of the Arabic j, as in Begum; the older and probably the most widely diffused, [See Mr. Gray's note in Hak. Soc. ii. 417.]
Ital. moschita, moschea; French (old) mosquée, musqué; (3) Eng. mosque.

Some of the quotations might suggest a different course of modification, but they would probably mislead.

Apropos of magnific rather than of mosque we have noted a ludicrous misapplication of the word in the advertisement to a newspaper story.

1848. — "And with the stipulation that the 800 lira Spanish which in old times were granted, and are deposited for the expenses of the mosquitas of Baçaim, are to be paid from the said duties as they always have been paid, and in regard to the said mosquitas and the prayers that are made in them there shall be no innovation whatever." —Treaty at Baçaim of the Portuguese with King Buce de Cambaya (Bahadur Shah of Guzerat) in S. Bodelet, Tome, 137.

1616. — "They are very jealous to let their women or Moschees be seen." —Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 537; [Hak. Soc. ii. 21].

[1623. — "We went to see upon the same lake a meschita, or temple of the Mahometans." — P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 69.]

1634. — "Que a de abominação mosquita immoda Casa, a Deos dedicada hoje se veja." — Malaca Conquistado, l. xii. 43.

1638. — Mandalelo unreasonably applies the term to all sorts of pagan temples, e.g. — "Nor is it only in great Cities that the Benjans have their many Mosqueys. ..." —E.T. 2nd ed. 1669, p. 52.

"The King of Siam is a Pagan, nor do his Subjects know any other Religion. They have divers Mosques, Monasteries, and Chappels." —Ibid. p. 104.

a. 1865. — "...he did it only for love to their Mammon; and would have sold afterwards for as much more St. Peter's... to the Turks for a Mosquito." —Cowley, Discourse concerning the Govt. of O. Cromwell.

1680. — Cons. Ft. St. Geo. March 28: "Records the death of Cassa Verona... and a dispute arising as to whether his body should be burned by the Christians or buried by the Moors, the latter having stopped the procession on the ground that the deceased was a Muslem and built a Musseet in the Towne to be buried in, the Governor with the advice of his Council sent an order that the body should be burned as a Gentil, and not buried by the Moors, it being apprehended to be of dangerous consequence to admit the Moors such pretences in the Towne." —Notes and Exs. No. iii. p. 14.

1719. — "On condition they had a Cowle granted, exempting them from paying the Pagoda or Mosquet duty." —In Wheeler, ii. 301.

1727. — "There are no fine Buildings in the City, but many large Houses, and some Caravansarys and Moschets." —A. Hamiltow, i. 151; [see 1774, i. 149].

c. 1760. — "The Roman Catholic Churches, the Moorish Moscha, the Gentoo Pagodas, the worship of the Parsees, are all equally unmolested and tolerated." —Grose, i. 44.

[1862. —... I slept at a Musheed, or village house of prayer." —Brickman, Rifle in Cashmere, 78.]

MOSQUITO, s. A gnat is so called in the tropics. The word is Spanish and Port. (dim. of mosca, 'a fly'), and probably came into familiar English use from the East Indies, though the earlier quotations show that it was first brought from S. America. A friend annotates here: "Arctic mosquitoes are worst of all; and the Norfolk ones (in the Broads) beat Calcutta!"

It is related of a young Scotch lady of a former generation who on her voyage to India had heard formidable, but vague accounts of this terror of the night, that on seeing an elephant for the first time, she asked: "Will you be what's called a mosquetae?"

1539. — "To this misery was there adjonied the great affliction, which the Fis and Gnts (por parte dos alabos e mosquitos), that coming out of the neighbouring Woods, bit and stung us in such sort, as not one of us but was gone blood." —Pinto (orig. cap. xxiii.), in Cogges, p. 29.

1582. — "We were oftentimes greatly annoyed with a kind of fly, which in the Indian tongue is called Tiquari, and the Spanish call them Muokitres." —Miles Phillips, in Hak. iii. 564.

1584. — "The 29 Day we set Salle from Saint Johns, being many of vs stung before upon Shoare with the Muokitres; but the same night we took a Spanish Fruget." — MOTURPHA. 591

Sir Richard Grenville’s Voyage, in Hakl. iii. 308.

1616 and 1673.—See both Terry and Fryer under Chintz.

1692.—“At night there is a kind of insect that plagues one mightily; they are called Musciten,—it is a kind that by their noise and sting cause much irritation.”—Saar, 68-69.

1673.—“The greatest Pest is the Mosquito, which not only wheels, but domineers by its continual Hums.”—Fryer, 189.

1690.—(The Governor) “carries along with him a Peia or Servant to Fan him, and drive away the busie Flies, and troublesome Musketees. This is done with the Hair of a Horse’s Tail.”—Ovington, 227-8.

1740.—“... all day we were pestered with great numbers of musketoas, which are not much unlike the gnats in England, but more venomous....”—Anson’s Voyage, 9th ed., 1756, p. 46.

1764.—“Mosquitos, sandflies, seek the sheltered roof,
And with full rage the stranger guest assail,
Nor spare the sportive child.”—Grainger, bk. i.

1883.—“Among rank weeds in deserted Bombay gardens, too, there is a large, speckled, unmusical mosquito, raging and impolite and thirsty, which will give a new idea in pain to any one that visits its haunts.”—Tribes on My Frontier, 27.

MOTURPHA. s. Hind. from Ar. muhtarafa, but according to C. P. B. muttarifa; [rather Ar. muhtarifa, muttarif, ‘an artistan’]. A name technically applied to a number of miscellaneous taxes in Madras and Bombay, such as were called sayer (q.v.), in Bengal.

[1813.—“Motterasa. An artister. Taxes, personal and professional, on artificers, merchants and others; also on houses, implements of agriculture, looms, &c., a branch of the sayer.”—Otan. 5th Report, n.v.

1826.—“... for example, the tax on merchants, manufacturers, &c. (called mohurtaa).”—Grant Duff, H. of the Mahrattas, 3rd ed. 356.]

MOULMEIN, n.p. This is said to be originally a Talaing name Mut-moom-len, syllables which mean (or may be made to mean) ‘one-eye-destroyed’; and to account for which a cock-and-bull legend is given (probably invented for the purpose): “Tradition says that the city was founded... by a king with three eyes, having an extra eye in his forehead, but that by the machinations of a woman, the eye in his forehead was destroyed....” (Mason’s Burma, 2nd ed. p. 18). The Burmese corrupted the name into Mou-la-yaing, whence the foreign (probably Malay) form Moulmain. The place so called is on the opposite side of the estuary of the Salwin R. from Manna-ban (q.v.), and has entirely superseded that once famous port. Moulmein, a mere site, was chosen as the headquarters of the Tenasserim provinces, when those became British in 1826 after the first Burmese War. It has lost political importance since the annexation of Pegu, 26 years later, but is a thriving city which numbered in 1881, 53,107 inhabitants; [in 1891, 55,785].

MOUNT DELY, n.p. (See DELLY, MOUNT.)

MOUSE-DEER, s. The beautiful little creature, Meminna indica (Gray), [Tragulus meminna, the Indian Chevrotain (Blanford, Mammalia, 555).] found in various parts of India, and weighing under 6 lbs., is so called. But the name is also applied to several pigmy species of the genus Tragulus, found in the Malay regions, [where, according to Mr. Skeat, it takes in popular tradition the place of Brer Rabbit, outwitting even the tiger, elephant, and crocodile.] All belong to the family of Musk-deer.

MUCHÁN, s. Hind. machân, Dekh. manchán, Skt. mañcha. An elevated platform; such as the floor of huts among the Indo-Chinese races; or a stage or scaffolding erected to watch a tiger, to guard a field, or what not.

c. 1662.—“As the soil of the country is very damp, the people do not live on the ground-floor, but on the machán, which is the name for a raised floor.”—Shihbuddin Tahsh, by Blockmann, in J. A. S. B. xii. Pt. i. 84.

[1882.—“In a shady green mechán in some fine tree, watching at the cool of evening....”—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 3rd ed. 294.]

MUCHWA, s. Mahr. machüv, Hind. machuá, machuv. A kind of boat or barge in use about Bombay.

MUCKNA, s. Hind. makhna, [which comes from Skt. makrama, ‘a bug, a flea, a beardless man, an elephant without tusks’]. A male elephant without tusks or with only rudimentary tusks. These latter are familiar in Bengal, and still more so in Ceylon, where according to Sir S. Baker, “not more than one in 300 has tusks; they are merely provided with short grubbners, projecting generally about 3 inches from the upper jaw, and about 2 inches in diameter.”

(The Rifle and Hound in Ceylon, 11.) Sanderson (13 Years among the Wild Beasts of India, [3rd ed. 66]) says: “On the Continent of India mucknas, or elephants born without tusks, are decidedly rare... Mucknas breed in the herds, and the peculiarity is not hereditary or transmitted.” This author also states that out of 51 male elephants captured by him in Mysore and Bengal only 5 were mucknas. But the definition of a maknada in Bengal is that which we have given, including those animals which possess only feminine or rudimentary tusks, the ‘short grubbners’ of Baker; and these latter can hardly be called rare among domesticated elephants. This may be partially due to a preference in purchasers.* The same author derives the term from mukk, ‘face’; but the reason is obscure. Shakespeare and Platts give the word as also applied to ‘a cock without spurs.’

c. 1780.—“An elephant born with the left tooth only is reckoned sacred; with black spots in the mouth unlucky, and not saleable; the mukna or elephant born without teeth is thought the best.”—Hon. R. Lindsay in Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 194.

MUOCA, MUKUVA, n.p. Mal. and Tamil, mukkuvan (sing.), ‘a diver,’ and mukkwara (pl.). [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss. a.v.) derives it from Drav. mukkura, ‘to dive’; the Madras Gloss. gives Tam. mukkuga, with the same meaning.] A name applied to the fishermen of the western coast of the Peninsula near C. Comorin. (But Mr. Pringle (Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 187) points out that formerly as now, the word was of much more general application. Orme in a passage quoted below employs it of boating men at Karikal. The use of the word extended as far N. as Madras, and on the W. coast; it was not confined to the extreme S.] It was among these, and among the corresponding class of Paravars on the east coast, that F. Xavier’s most noted labours in India occurred.

1510.—‘The fourth class are called Mechues, and these are fishermen.’—Varthema, 142.

1525.—“And Dom Joao had secret speech with a married Christian whose wife and children were inside the fort, and a valiant man, with whom he arranged to give him 200 pardaoes (and that he gave him on the spot) to set fire to houses that stood round the fort. So this Christian, called Duarte Fernandes... put on a lot of old rags and tags, and powdered himself with ashes after the fashion of jogues (see JOGEE) also defiling his hair with a mixture of oil and ashes, and disguising himself like a regular jogue, whilst he tied under his rags a parcel of gunpowder and pieces of slow-match, and so commending himself to God, in which all joined, slipped out of the fort by night, and as the day broke, he came to certain huts of macuas, which are fishermen, and began to beg alms in the usual Palmer of the jogues, i.e. prayers for their long life and health, and the conquest of enemies, and easy deliveries for their womenkind, and prosperity for their children, and other grand things.”—Ceres, ii. 871.

1552.—Barros has mucuaria, ‘a fisherman’s village.’

1600.—“Those who gave the best reception to the Gospel were the Macoas; and, as they had no church in which to assemble, they did so in the fields and on the shores, and with such favour that the Father found himself at times with 5000 or 6000 souls about him.”—Lucena, Vida do P. F. Xavier, 117.

[c. 1610.—“These mariners are called Moucoo’s.”—Pyrrad de Lavall, Hak. Soc. i. 314.]

1615.—“Edict ut Macuas omnes, id est vilissima plebeusca et pecatua vivens, Christiana sacra suscipierent.”—Jarric, i. 390.

1626.—“The Muchoa or Mochoe are Fishers... the men Theesus, the women Harlots, with whom they please.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

1677.—Resolved “to raise the rates of hire of the Menilias (see MUSBOLA) boatmen called Macquars.”—Ft. St. Geo. Con., Jan 12, in Notes and Exts. No. i. 54.

1684.—“The Macqua or Boatmen ye Ordinary Astrlogers (sic) for weather did... predict great Rains...”—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. iii. 131.

1727.—“They may marry into lower Tribes... and so may the Muchwa’s, or Fishers, who I think, are a higher tribe than the Poulia (see POLEA).”—A. Hamilton, i. 310, [ed. 1744, i. 312].

* Sir George Yule notes: “I can distinctly call to mind 6 mucknas that I had (I may have had more) out of 80 or 60 elephants that passed through my hands.” This would give 15 or 20 per cent. of mucknas, but as the stud included females, the result would rather consist with Mr. Sanderson’s 5 out of 51 males.

MUDDAR, s. Hind. maddr, Skt. mandara; Calotropis procera, R. Brown, N.O. Asclepiadaceae. One of the most common and widely diffused plants in uncultivated plains throughout India. In Sind the bark fibre is used for halters, &c., and experiment has shown it to be an excellent material worth £40 a ton in England, if it could be supplied at that rate; but the cost of collection has stood in the way of its utilisation. The seeds are imbedded in a silky floss, used to stuff pillows. This also has been the subject of experiment for textile use, but as yet without practical success. The plant abounds with an acrid milky juice which the Rajputs are said to employ for infanticide. (Punjab Plants.) The plant is called Ak in Sind and throughout N. India.

MUDDLE, s. (?) This word is only known to us from the clever—perhaps too clever—little book quoted below. The word does not seem to be known, and was probably a misapprehension of budhee. [Even Mr. Brandt and Mrs. Wyatt are unable to explain this word. The former does not remember hearing it. Both doubt its connection with budhee. Mrs. Wyatt suggests with hesitation Tamil mudder, "boiled rice," mudei-palli, "the cook-house."]

1836-7. — "Besides all these acknowledged and ostensible attendants, each servant has a kind of muddle or double of his own, who does all the work that can be put off upon him without being found out by his master or mistress."—Letters from Madras, 38.

"They always come accompanied by their Vakeela, a kind of Secretaries, or interpreters, or flappers,—their muddles in short; everybody here has a muddle, high or low."—Letters from Madras, 86.

a. Ar. Mufti, an expounder of the Mahomedan Law, the utterer of the fatwa (see FUTWAA). Properly the Mufti is above the Kazi who carries out the judgment. In the 18th century, and including Regulation IX. of 1793, which gave the Company's Courts in Bengal the reorganization which substantially endured till 1862, we have frequent mention of both Caussies and Muftics as authorized expounders of the Mahomedan Law; but, though Kazi were nominally maintained in the Provincial Courts down to their abolition (1829-31), practically the duty of those known as Kazi became limited to quite different objects and the designation of the Law-officer who gave the fatwa in our District Courts was Maulavi. The title Mufti has been long obsolete within the limits of British administration, and one might safely say that it is practically unknown to any surviving member of the Indian Civil Service, and never was heard in India as a living title by any Englishman now surviving. (See CAZZEE, LAW-OFICIEE, MOOLVEE)

b. A slang phrase in the army, for 'plain clothes.' No doubt it is taken in some way from a, but the transition is a little obscure. [It was perhaps originally applied to the attire of dressing gown, smoking cap, and slippers, which was like the Oriental dress of the Mufti who was familiar in Europe from his appearance in Moliere's Bourgeois Gentilhomme. Compare the French en Pekin.]

MUGG, n.p. Beng. Magh. It is impossible to deviate without deterioration from Wilson’s definition of this obscure name: “A name commonly applied to the natives of Arakan, particularly those bordering on Bengal, or residing near the sea; the people of Chittagong.” It is beside the question of its origin or proper application, to say, as Wilson goes on to say, on the authority of Lieut. (now Sir Arthur) Phayre, that the Arakanese disclaim the title, and restrict it to a class held in contempt, viz. the descendants of Arakanese settlers on the frontier of Bengal by Bengali mothers. The proper names of foreign nations in any language do not require the sanction of the nation to whom they are applied, and are often not recognised by the latter. German is not the German name for the Germans, nor Welsh the Welsh name for the Welsh, nor Hindu (originally) a Hindu word, nor China a Chinese word. The origin of the present word is very obscure. Sir A. Phayre kindly furnishes us with this note: “There is good reason to conclude that the name is derived from Maga, the name of the ruling race for many centuries in Magadha (modern Behar). The kings of Arakan were no doubt originally of this race. For though this is not distinctly expressed in the histories of Arakan, there are several legends of Kings from Benares reigning in that country, and one regarding a Brahman who marries a native princess, and whose descendants reign for a long period. I say this, although Buchanan appears to reject the theory (see Montg. Martin, ii. 18 seqq.)” The passage is quoted below.

On the other hand the Mahommedish writers sometimes confound Buddhists with fire-worshippers, and it seems possible that the word may have been Pers. magh = magus.” [See Risley, Tribes and Castes, ii. 28 seq.] The Chittagong Muggs long furnished the best class of native cooks in Calcutta; hence the meaning of the last quotation below.

1855. — "The Mogun, which be of the kingdom of Reen (see ARAKAN) and Rame, be stronger than the King of Tipara; so that Chatigam or Porto Grande (q.v.) is often under the King of Reen." — R. Fitch, in Halki, ii. 389.

c. 1850. — (In a country adjoining Pegu) "there are mines of ruby and diamond and gold and silver and copper and petroleum and sulphur and (the lord of that country) has war with the tribe of Magh about the mines; also with the tribe of Tipara there are battles." — Atlas (orig.) i. 388; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 120].

c. 1804. — "Defeat of the Magh Rajas." — This short-sighted Rajas... became elated with the extent of his treasures and the number of his elephants... He then openly rebelled, and assembling an army at Sunagarwail seizes to a fort in that vicinity... Rajas Man Singh... despatched a force... These soon brought the Magh Rajas and all his forces to action... regardless of the number of his boats and the strength of his artillery." — Indostanuha, in Elliot, vi. 109.

1838. — "Submission of Manek Raja, the Mag Raja of Chittagong." — Abul Hamid Lahori, in do. vii. 66.

c. 1850. — "These many years there have always been in the Kingdom of Rana or Mog (read Mog) some Portuguese, and with them a great number of their Christian Slaves, and other Francuys... That was the refuge of the Runaways from Cos, Cialan, Cochis, Malagoe (see MALACCA), and all these other places which the Portuguese formerly held in the Indies." — Bernier, E.T. p. 52; [ed. Constable, 109].

1876. — "In all Bengal this King (of Arakan) is known by no other name but the King of Mogus." — Tavernier, E.T. i. 8.

1752. — "... that as the time of the Muggs draws nigh, they request us to order the pinnaic to be with them by the end of next month." — In Long, p. 87.

c. 1810. — "In a paper written by Dr. Leyden, that gentleman supposes... that Magadha is the country of the people whom we call Muggs... The term Mugg, these people assured me, is never used by either themselves or by the Hindus, except when MUGGUR. - 595

Mull, s. A contraction of Mulligatawny, and applied as a distinctive sobriquet to members of the Service belonging to the Madras Presidency, as Bengal people are called Qui-his, and Bombay people Ducks or Be-nighted.

MULLIGATAWNY, a. The name of this well-known soup is simply a corruption of the Tamil milagu-tannir, 'pepper-water'; showing the correctness of the popular belief which ascribes the origin of this excellent article to Madras, whence—and not merely from the complexion acquired there—the sobriquet of the preceding article.

MULMULL, a. Hind. malmal; Muslin.

[1852.—"... residents of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras are, in Eastern parlance, designated 'Qui Hie,' 'Ducks,' and 'Mulls.'—Notes and Queries, 1st ser. v. 165.

1860.—"It ya ane darke Londe, and then dwelven ye Oimmerians whereof speketh Homer's Poeta in his Odysseus, and to thys Days the clespen Tenobres or 'ye Benyghted folk.' Bot thei clespen benselylls Mullys from Mulligatawnee wh' ya ane of theyr goddys from wh' thei ben yaspring."—Ext. from a lately discovered MS. of Sir John Maundeville.

MUGGEBEE, n.p. Ar. maghribi, 'western.' This word, applied to western Arabs, or Moors proper, is, as might be expected, not now common in India. It is the term that appears in the Hayraddin Mokrabbi of Quentin Durward. From gharb, the root of this word, the Spaniards have the province of Algarve, and both Spanish and Portuguese have garbin, a west wind. [The magician in the tale of the Aleeeddin is a Maghrabi, and to this day in Languedoc and Gascony Maugraby is used as a term of cursing. (Burton, Ar. Nights, x. 35, 379). Muggabee is used for a coin (see GUBEE.)] MUNCHEL, MANJEEL. 596 MUNGOOSE.

Petition of Rogoesee, Weaver of Hugly, in Hedges, Diary, March 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 73].

1705.—"Malle-molles et autre diverses sortes de toiles ... stinqueuses et les belles mouselines."—Laftier, 78.

MUNCHEL, MANJEEL, a. This word is proper to the S.W. coast; Malayal. manjil, machal, from Skt. mancha. It is the name of a kind of hammock-litter used on that coast as a substitute for palanquin or dooly. It is substantially the same as the dandy of the Himalaya, but more elaborate. Correa describes but does not name it.

1561.—"... He came to the factory in a litter which men carried on their shoulders. These are made with thick canes, bent up wards and arched, and from them are suspended some clothes half a fathom in width, and a fathom and a half in length; and at the extremities pieces of wood to sustain the cloth hanging from the pole; and upon this cloth a mattress of the same size as the cloth ... the whole very splendid, and as rich as the gentlemen ... may desire."—Correa. Three Voyages, &c., p. 199.

1811.—"The Inquisition is about a quarter of a mile distant from the convent, and we proceeded thither in manjeels."—Buchanan, Christian Researches, 2nd ed., 171.

1819.—"Manchel, a kind of litter resembling a sea-cot or hammock, hung to a long pole, with a movable cover over the whole, to keep off the sun or rain. Six men will run with one from one end of the Malabar coast to the other, while twelve are necessary for the lightest palanquin."—Welsh, ii. 142.

1844.—"Mancheels, with poles complete. ... Poles, Manchel, Spade."—Jameson's Bombay Code, Ordinance Nomenclature.

1862.—"We ... started ... in Mancheels or hammocks, slung to bamboo, with a shade over them, and carried by six men, who keep up unceasingly throughout the whole time."—Markham, Persia and India, 563.

1886.—"When I landed at Diu, an officer met me with a Manchel for my use, viz. a hammock slung to a pole, and protected by an awning."—M. Gen. R. H. Keatings.

A form of this word is used at Réunion, where a kind of palanquin is called "le manchay." It gives a title to one of Leconte de Lisle's Poems:

c. 1858.—"Sous un nuage frais de claire mousseline Tous les dimanches au matin,
Tu venais à la ville en manchay de rotin, Par les rampes de la colline." Le Manchay.

The word has also been introduced by the Portuguese into Africa in the forms maxilla, and machella.

1810.—"... tangas, que elles chamaão maxlias."—Anaes Marilas, iii. 494.

1880.—"The Portuguese (in Quilliman) seldom ever think of walking the length of their own street, and ... go from house to house in a sort of palanquin, called here a machilla (pronounced mazheen). This usually consists of a pole placed upon the shoulders of the natives, from which is suspended a long plank of wood, and upon that is fixed an old-fashioned-looking chair, or sometimes two. Then there is an awning over the top, hung all round with curtains. Each machilla requires about 6 to 8 bearers, who are all dressed alike in a kind of livery."—A Journey in E. Africa, by M. A. Pringle, p. 89.

MUNGOOSE, a. This is the popular Anglo-Indian name of the Indian ichneumons, represented in the South by Manguia Mungos (Elliot), or Herpestes griseus (Geoffroy) of naturalists, and in Bengal by Herpestes malaccensis. [Blanford (Mammalia, 119 seq.) recognizes eight species, the "Common Indian Mungoose" being described as Herpestes mungo.] The word is Telugu, mangisu, or mungia. In Upper India the animal is called neval, neelat, or nyaul. Jerdon gives mungus however as a Deccani and Mahr. word; [Platts gives it as dialectic, and very doubtfully derives it from Skt. makan, 'moving quickly.' In Ar. it is bi'tariz, 'daughter of the bridegroom,' in Egypt khit or katt Farasun, 'Pharaoh's cat' (Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 369).

1673.—"... a Mongoose is akin to a Ferret. ..."—Fryer, 116.

1681.—"The knowledge of these antidotal herbs they have learned from the Munggula, a kind of Ferret."—Knox, 115.

1685.—"... They have what they call a Mangus, creatures something different from ferrets; these hold snakes in great antipathy, and if they once discover them never give up till they have killed them."—Ribeye, f. 56a.

Blateau gives the following as a quotation from a History of Ceylon, tr. from Portuguese into French, published at Paris in 1701, p. 153. It is in fact the gist of an anecdote in Ribeyro.

"There are persons who cherish this animal and have it to sleep with them, although it is ill-tempered, for they prefer to be bitten by a mangus to being killed by a snake."

1774.—"He (the Dharma Raja of Bho- tan) has got a little lap-dog and a Mungoose, which he is very fond of."—Boqul's Diary, in Markham's Tibet, 27.
1780. — "His (Mr. Glen's) experiments have also established a very curious fact, that the ichneumon, or mungoose, which is very common in this country, and kills snakes without danger to itself, does not use antidotes... but that the poison of snakes is to this animal, innocent."—Letter in Colbroke's Life, p. 40.

1829.—"Il Mongoase animale simile ad una donnola."—Papi, in de Gubernatis, St. dei Viaggi. Ital., p. 279.

MUNJEET, s. Hind. majiḥ, Skt. manjishtha; a dye-plant (Rubia cordifolia, L.), N.O. Cinchonaceae; 'Bengal Madder.'

MUNNEPORE, n.p. Properly Manipūr; a quasi-independent State lying between the British district of Cachar on the extreme east of Bengal, and the upper part of the late kingdom of Burma, and in fact including a part of the watershed between the tributaries of the Brahmaputra and those of the Irawadi. The people are of genuinely Indo-Chinese and Mongoloid aspect, and the State, small and secluded as it is, has had its turn in temporary conquest and domination, like almost all the States of Indo-China from the borders of Assam to the mouth of the Mekong. Like the other Indo-Chinese States, too, Manipūr has its royal chronicle, but little seems to have been gathered from it. The Rājas and people have, for a period which seems uncertain, professed Hindu religion. A disastrous invasion of Manipūr by Alompra, founder of the present Burmese dynasty, in 1755, led a few years afterwards to negotiations with the Bengal Government, and the conclusion of a treaty, in consequence of which a body of British sepoys was actually despatched in 1763, but eventually returned without reaching Manipūr. After this, intercourse practically ceased till the period of our first Burmese War (1824-26), when the country was overrun by the Burmese, who also entered Cachar; and British troops, joined with a Manipuri force, expelled them. Since then a British officer has always been resident at Manipūr, and at one time (c. 1838-41) a great deal of labour was expended on opening a road between Cachar and Manipūr. [The murder of Mr. Quinton, Chief-Commissioner of Assam, and other British officers at Manipūr, in the close of 1890, led to the infliction of severe punishment on the leaders of the outbreak. The Mahārāja, whose abdication led to this tragedy, died in Calcutta in the following year, and the State is now under British management during the minority of his successor.]

This State has been called by a variety of names. Thus, in Rennell's Memoir and maps of India it bears the name of Mockley. In Symes's Narrative, and in maps of that period, it is Cassay; names, both of which have long disappeared from modern maps. Mockley represents the name (Maki?) by which the country was known in Assam; Mogli (apparently a form of the same) was the name in Cachar; Ka-šé or Ka-thé (according to the Ava pronunciation) is the name by which it is known to the Shans or Burmese.

1755.—"I have carried my Arms to the confines of China... on the other quarter I have reduced to my subjection the major part of the Kingdom of Cassay; whose Heir I have taken captive, see there he sits behind you..."—Speech of Alompra to Capt. Baker at Monchabue. Dalrymple, Off. Rep. i. 152.

1759.—"Cassay, which... lies to the N. Westward of Ava, is a Country, so far as I can learn, hitherto unheard of in Europe..."—Letter, dd. 22 June 1759, in ibid. 116.

1762.—"... the President sent the Board a letter which he had received from Mr. Verelet at Chittagong, containing an invitation which had been made to him and his Council by the Rajah of Mockley to assist him in obtaining redress... from the Burmas..."—Letter, in Wheeler, Early Records, 21.

1763.—"Mockley is a Hilly Country, and is bounded on the North, South, and West by large tracts of Cookie Mountains, which prevent any intercourse with the countries beyond them; and on the East* by the Burampoota (see BURRAM-FOOTER); beyond the Hills, to the North by Assam and Poong; to the West Cachar; to the South and East the Burman Country, which lies between Mockley and China. The Burampoota is said to divide, somewhere to the north of Poong, into two large branches, one of which passes through Assam, and down by the way of Dacca, the other through Poong into the Burma Country..."—Act. of Mockley, by Neher Joss Gossen, in Dalrymple's Off. Rep., ii. 477-479.

seven days, Jungle and Hills, to the inhabited border of the Burmah country."— Ibid. 481.

1793.—"... The first ridge of mountains towards Thibet and Bootan, forms the limit of the survey to the north; to which I may now add, that the surveys extend no farther eastward, than the frontiers of Assam and Meckley. ... The space between Bengal and China, is occupied by the province of Meckley and other districts, subject to the King of Burmah, or Ava. ..."—Rennell's Memoir, 295.

1799.—(Referring to 1757). "Elated with success Alompra returned to Monchaboo, now the seat of imperial government. After some months ... he took up arms against the Cassayyars. ... Having landed his troops, he was preparing to advance to Munispensor, the capital of Cassay, when information arrived that the Peguans had revolted. ..."—Sykes, Narrative, 41-42.

"... All the troopers in the King's service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Birmans."
—Ibid. 318.

1819.—"Beyond the point of Negraglia (see NEGRAIS), as far as Azem (see ASSAM), even further, there is a small chain of mountains that divides Aracan and Cassay from the Burmese. ..."—Sangermano, p. 33.

1827.—"The extensive area of the Burman territory is inhabited by many distinct nations or tribes, of whom I have heard not less than eighteen enumerated. The most considerable of these are the proper Burmans, the Peguans or Talains, the Shans or people of Loe, the Cassay, or more correctly Kathé. ..."—Owensford's Journal, 372.

1855.—"The weaving of these silks ... gives employment to a large body of the population in the suburbs and villages round the capital, especially to the Munni-poorians, a Kethé, as they are called by the Burmese.

"These people, the descendants of unfortunates who were carried off in droves from their country by the Burmans in the time of King Mentaragyi and his predecessors, form a very great proportion ... of the metropolitan population, and they are largely diffused in nearly all the districts of Central Buruma. ... Whatever work is in hand for the King or for any of the chief men near the capital, these people supply the labouring hands; if boats have to be manned they furnish the rowers; and whilst engaged on such tasks any remuneration they may receive is very scanty and uncertain."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 153-154.

MUNSUBDAR. Hind. from Pers. mansabdar, 'the holder of office or dignity' (Ar. mansab). The term was used to indicate quasi-feudal dependents of the Mogul Government who had territory assigned to them, on condition of their supplying a certain number of horse, 500, 1000 or more. In many cases the title was but nominal, and often it was assumed without warrant.

[Mr. Irvine discusses the question at length and represents mansab by the word 'rank,' as its object was to settle precedence and fix gradation of pay; it did not necessarily imply the exercise of any particular office, and meant nothing beyond the fact that the holder was in the employ of the State, and bound in return to yield certain services when called upon.

Omraks ... they being esteemed as little the Vedas; a magical formula.'

MUNTREE. a. Skt. Mantri. A minister or high official. The word is especially affected in old Hindu States, and in the Indo-Chinese and Malay States which derive their ancient civilization from India. It is the word which the Portuguese made into mandarin (q.v.).

1610.—"When the Court was full, and Ibrahim, the son of Candu the merchant, was near the throne, the Raja entered. ... But as soon as the Raja seated himself, the muntries and high officers of state arose themselves according to their rank."—In a

MUSCAT, n.p., properly Muscat. A port and city of N.E. Arabia; for a long time the capital of Oman. (See IMAUM.)

1673.—"Muscat." See under IMAUM.

MUSK. There is no matter in which the sentiments of the people of India differ more from those of Englishmen than on that of music, and curiously enough the one kind of Western music which they appreciate, and seem to enjoy, is that of the bagpipe. This is testified by Captain Munro in the passage quoted below; but it was also shown during Lord Canning's visit to Lahore in 1860, in a manner which dwells in the memory of one of the present writers. The escort consisted of part of a Highland regiment. A venerable Sikh chief who heard the pipes exclaimed: 'That is indeed music! it is like that which we hear of in ancient story, which was so exquisite that the hearers became insensible (behosha).'

1780.—"The bagpipe appears also to be a favourite instrument among the natives. They have no taste indeed for any other kind of music, and they would much rather listen to this instrument a whole day than to an organ for ten minutes."—Munro's Narrative, 33.

MUSK-RAT. a. The popular name of the Sorex caerulescens, Jerdon, [Crocidura caerulea, Blanford], an animal having much the figure of the common shrew, but nearly as large as a small brown rat. It diffuses a strong musky odour, so penetrative that it is commonly asserted to affect bottled beer by running over the bottles in a cellar. As Jerdon judiciously observes, it is much more probable that the corks have been affected before being used in bottling; and Blanford (Mammalia, 237) writes that "the absurd story... is less credited in India than it formerly was, owing to the discovery that liquors bottled in Europe and exported to India are not liable to be tainted." When the female is in heat she is often seen to be followed by a string of males giving out the odour strongly. Can

c. 1590.—"Here (in Tooman Bekhrad, n. of Kabul R.) are also micoe that have a fine musky scent."—Ayem, by Gladwin (1800) ii. 186; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 400].

[1598.—"They are called sweet smelling Bactras, for they have a smell as if they were full of musk."—Linnetes, Hak. Soc. i. 303.]

1672.—P. Vincenzo Maria, speaking of his first acquaintance with this animal (il ratto del musco), which occurred in the Capuchin Convent at Surat, says with simplicity (or malignity?): "I was astonished to perceive an odour so fragrant in the vicinity of those most religious Fathers, with whom I was at the moment in conversation."—Viaggio, p. 385.

1831.—"This country has its vermin also. They have a sort of Rats they call Miskrats, because they smell strong of musk. These the inhabitants do not eat of, but of all other sorts of Rats they do."—Knorr, p. 31.

1789.—H. Munro in his Narrative (p. 34) absurdly enough identifies this animal with the Bandicoot, q.v.

1813.—See Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 42; [2nd ed. i. 25].

MUSLIN, a. There seems to be no doubt that this word is derived from Mosul (Mausul or Musul) on the Tigris, and it has been from an old date the name of a texture, but apparently not always that of the thin semi-transparent substance to which we now apply it. Dozy (p. 323) says that the Arabs employ musai, in the same sense as our word, quoting the Arabian Nights (Macnaghten’s ed., i. 176, and ii. 159), in both of which the word indicates the material of a fine turban. [Burton (i. 211) translates ‘Mosul stuff’, and says it may mean either of ‘Mosul fashion’, or muslin.] The quotation from Ives, as well as that from Marco Polo, seems to apply to a different texture from what we call muslin.

1685.—"I have been told by several, that muselin (so much in use here for cravates) and Culligo (!), and the most of the Indian linens, are made of nettles, and I see not the least improbability but that they may be made of the fibres of them."—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Ray, in Ray Correspondence, 1848, p. 163.

1760.—"This city (Mosul)’s manufacture is Musolin [read Musollen] (a cotton cloth) which they make very strong and pretty fine, and sell for the European and other markets."—Itea, Voyage, p. 324.

MUSNUD, a. H.—Ar. masnad, from root sanad, ‘he leaned or rested upon it.’ The large cushion, &c., used by native Princes in India, in place of a throne.

1752.—"Salabat-jing... went through the ceremony of sitting on the musnud or throne."—Orme, ed. 1808, i. 250.

Mussalla. 601

Mussalla, a. P.-H. (with change of sense from Ar. mūdal, pl. of mūshāḥa) 'materials, ingredients,' lit. 'things for the good of, or things or affairs conducive to good.' Though sometimes used for the ingredients of any mixture, e.g. to form a cement, the most usual application is to spices, curry-stuffs and the like. There is a tradition of a very gallant Governor-General that he had found it very tolerable, on a sharp but brief campaign, to 'rough it on chuprasies and mussalchees' (q.v.), meaning choupatties and mussalla.

1780. — 'A dose of mussels, or purgative spices.' — Munro, Narrative, 85.

1809. — 'At the next hut the woman was grinding mussels or curry-stuff on a flat smooth stone with another shaped like a rolling pin.' — Maria Graham, 20.

Mussaul, a. Hind. from Ar. māsh' al, 'a torch.' It is usually made of rags wrapped round a rod, and fed at intervals with oil from an earthen pot.

1407. — 'Suddenly, in the midst of the night they saw the Sultan's camp approaching, accompanied by a great number of mashaal.' — Abdurrazak, in N. & Ex. xiv. Pt. i. 153.

1673. — 'The Duties * march like Furies with their lighted mussals in their hands, they are Pots filled with Oyl in an Iron Hoop like our Beacoons, and set on fire by stinking rags.' — Fryer, 53.

1706. — 'flambeaux qu'ils appellent Mussalres.' — Lutillier, 89.

1809. — 'These Mussal or link-boys.' — Ed. Valenta, i. 17.

1810. — 'The Mosaali, or flambeau, consists of old rags wrapped very closely round a small stick.' — Williamson, V. M. i. 219.

[1812. — 'These nocturnal processions illuminated by many hundred massauls or torches, illustrate the parable of the ten virgins.' — Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 274.]

1857. — 'Near him was another Hindoo . . . he is called a Mussal ; and the lamps and lights are his special department.' — Lady Falkland, Choo-Choo, 2nd ed. i. 38.]

Mussaulchee, a. Hind. masha'alchi from masha'al (see Mussaul), with the Turkish termination chi, generally implying an agent. [In the Arabian Nights (Burton, i. 239) al-masha'it is the executioner.] The word properly means a link-boy, and was formerly familiar in that sense as the epithet of the person who ran alongside of a palankin on a night journey, bearing a mussaul. 'In Central India it is the special duty of the barber (nādī) to carry the torch; hence nādī commonly = 'torch-bearer.' (M.-Gen. Keatinge). The word [or sometimes in the corrupt form mussaul] is however still more frequent as applied to a humble domestic, whose duty was formerly of a like kind, as may be seen in the quotation from Ld. Valenta, but who now looks after lamps and washes dishes, &c., in old English phrase 'a scullion.'

1610. — 'He always had in service 500 Massalgeoes.' — Finch, in Purchas, i. 432.

1862. — (In Assam) 'they fix the head of the corpse rigidly with poles, and put a lamp with plenty of oil, and a masha'alchi [torch-bearer] alive into the vault, to look after the lamp.' — Shibsdewdin Taid, tr. by Blockmann, in J.A.S.B. xli. Pt. i. 82.

[1865. — 'They (flambeaux) merely consist of a piece of iron hafted in a stick, and surrounded at the extremity with linen rags steeped in oil, which are renewed . . . by the Massalchis, or link boys, who carry the oil in long narrow-necked vessels of iron or brass.' — Berney, ed. Constable, 361.]

1873. — 'Trois Massalges du Grand Seigneur vinrent faire honneur à M. l'Ambsisseur avec leurs feux allumés.' — Journal d'Ant Galland, i. 103.

1886. — 'After strict examination he chose out 2 persons, the Chouj (Chous), an Armenian, who had charge of watching my tent that night, and my Massalges, a person who carries the light before me in the night.' — Hedges, Diary, July 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 293].

MUSSENDOM, CAPE. 602 MUSSOOLA, MUSSOOLAH.

1791.—"... un masolchi, ou porte- flambeau, pour la nuit."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chaine Indienne, ii. 16.

1809.—"It is universally the custom to drive out between sunset and dinner. The Massalchees, when it grows dark, go out to meet their masters on their return, and run before them, at the full rate of eight miles an hour, and the numerous lights moving along the seaplane produce a singular and pleasing effect."—Ed. Valetina, i. 240.

1813.—"The occupation of massalchees, or torch-bearers, although generally allotted to the village barber, in the purgarnas under my charge, may vary in other districts."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 417; [2nd ed. ii. 43].

1826.—"After a short conversation, they went away, and quickly returned at the head of 500 men, accompanied by Massalchees or torch-bearers."—Pandurang Hari, 537; [ed. 1878, ii. 69].

1831.—"... a mosolei, or man to light up the place."—Asiatic Journal, N.S. v. 187.

MUSSENDOM, CAPE, n.p. The extreme eastern point of Arabia, at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. Properly speaking, it is the extremity of a small precipitous island of the name, which protrudes beyond the N.E. horn of 'Omān. The name is written Masandum in the map which Dr. Badger gives with his H. of 'Oman. But it is Ras Masadam (or possibly Masandum) in the Mohit of Sidi 'Ali Kapudān (J. As. Soc. Bent., v. 459). Sprenger writes Moosandam (Alt. Geog. Arabiens, p. 107). [Morier gives another explanation (see the quotation below.).]

1616.—"... it (the coast) trends to the N.E. by N. 30 leagues until Cape Moomdum, which is at the mouth of the Sea of Persia."—Barbosa, 32.

1653.—"... before you come to Cape Moqandam, which Ptolemy calls Assabro ('Ασσάβρων ἄκρα) and which he puts in 23°, but which we put in 28°, and here terminates our first division..." (of the Eastern Coasts).—Barros, i. x. 1.

"Olha o cabo Asabóro que chamado

Camões, x. 102.

By Burton:

"Behold of Asabón the Head, now high Moçandam, by the men who plough the Main:
Here lies the Gulf whose long and lake-like Bight, parts Araby from fertile Persia's plain."

The fact that the post copies the misprint or mistake of Barros in Assabro, shows how he made use of that historian.

1673.—"On the one side St. Jaques (see JASB), his Headland, on the other that of Musseedmond appeared, and soon Sunset we entered the Straight Mouth."—Fryer, 221.

1727.—"The same Chain of rocky Mountains continue as high as Zear, above Cape Musenden, which Cape and Cape Jaques begin the Gulf of Persia."—A. Hamilton, i. 71; [ed. 1744, i. 78].

1777.—"At the mouth of the Strait of Mocandam, which leads into the Persian gulf, lies the island of Gombroon."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 86.

1808.—"Musseedom is a still stronger instance of the perversion of words. The genuine name of this head-land is Mama Selemech, who was a female saint of Arabia, and lived on the spot or in its neighbourhood."—Morier, Journey through Persia, p. 6.

MUSSOOLA, MUSSOOLAH, BOAT, s. The surf boat used on the Coromandel Coast; of capacious size, and formed of planks sewn together with coir-twine; the open joints being made good with a caulking or wadding of twisted coir. The origin of the word is very obscure. Leyden thought it was derived from "masoula... the Mahratta term for fish" (Morton's Life of Leyden, 64). As a matter of fact the Mahr. word for fish is masoli, Konk. mãsêli. This etymology is substantially adopted by Bp. Heber (see below); [and by the compiler of the Madras Gloss., who gives Tel. mãsêla, Hind. makhîli]. But it may be that the word is some Arabic sea-term not in the dictionaries. Indeed, if the term used by C. Federici (below) be not a clerical error, it suggests a possible etymology from the Ar. masad, 'the fibrous bark of the palm-tree, a rope made of it.' Another suggestion is from the Ar. mawṣul, 'joined,' as opposed to 'duq-out,' or canoes; or possibly it may be from mãshul, 'tax;' if these boats were subject to a tax. Lastly it is possible that the name may be connected with Masulipatam (q.v.), where similar boats would seem to have been in use (see Fryer, 26). But these are conjectures. The quotation from Gasparo Balbi gives a good account of the handling of these boats, but applies no name to them.

c. 1560.—"Spaventosa cosa è chi non ha più visto, l'imbarchare e sbarcar le mercantie e le persone a San Tomè... adoperano

c. 1580.—"... where (Negapatam) they cannot land anything but the MUSCOOL of the same country."—Primer o Honra, &c., f. 93.

c. 1582.—"... There is always a heavy sea there (San Thome), from swell or storm; so the merchandise and passengers are transported from shipboard to the town by certain boats which are sewn with fine cords, and when they approach the beach, where the sea breaks with great violence, they wait till the perilous wave has past, and then, in the interval between one wave and the next, those boatsmen pull with great force, and so run ashore; and being there overtaken by the waves they are carried still further up the beach. And the boats do not break, because they give to the wave, and because the beach is covered with sand, and the boats stand upright on their bottoms."—G. Baihi, f. 69.

1783.—"I went ashore in a Mussoola, a Boat wherein ten men paddle, the two aftermost of whom are Steersmen, using their Paddles instead of a Rudder. The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers, as ours are; the bended Planks are sowed together with Rope-Yarn of the Cocoe, and calked with Dammar (see DAMMER) (a sort of Resin taken out of the Sea), so artificially that it yields to every ambitious Surf."—Fryer, 37.

1783.—"The want of Mussoola boats (built expressly for crossing the surf) will be severely felt."—In Life of Colebrooke, 9.

1826.—"The massuli-boats (which first word is merely a corruption of 'muchili,' fish) have been often described, and except that they are sewed together with coco-nut twine, instead of being fastened with nails, they very much resemble the high, deep, charcoal boats ... on the Ganges."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 174.

1879.—"Madras has no harbour; nothing but a long open beach, on which the surf dashes with tremendous violence. Unlucky passengers were not landed there in the ordinary sense of the term, but were thrown violently on the shore, from springy and elastic Masuliah boats, and were occasionally carried off by sharks, if the said boats chanced to be upset in the rollers."—Saty. Reviwe, Sept. 20.

MUSSEUCK, s. The leathern water-bag, consisting of the entire skin of a large goat, strip of the hair and dressed, which is carried by a bhikshi (see BHESTTY). Hind. moshak, Skt. mokaka.

MUSULMAN, adj. and n. Mahomedan. Muslim, 'resigning' or 'submitting' (sc. oneself to God), is the name given by Mahomed to the Faithful. The Persian plural of this is Muslum, which appears to have been adopted as a singular, and the word Muslim or Musulman thus formed. [Others explain it as either from Ar. pl. Muslimin, or from Muslim, 'like a Muslim,' the former of which is adopted by Platt as most probable.]

1248.—"Intravimus terram Bisserimoenum. Isti homines linguis Comonicam loquebantur; et adhuc loquuntur; sed legem Saracenorum tenent."—Plano Carpinis, in Rec. de Voyages, &c. iv. 750.

1540.—... disse por tres vezes, Lah, hilah, hilah, lah Muhammad roypal halah, o Massoleymoens e htem justos da santa ley de Mafamee."—Pinto, oh. lix.

1559.—"Although each horde (of Tartars) has its proper name, e.g. particularly the horde of the Savolhemians ... and many others, which are in truth Mahometan; yet do they hold it for a grievous insult and reproach to be called and styled Turks; they wish to be styled Besermani, and by this name the Turks also desire to be styled."—Herberstein, in Ramusio, ii. f. 171.

[1558.—"I have noted here before that if any Christian will become a Besermani, ... and be a Mahometan of their religion, they give him any gifts ..."—A. Edward, in Hakluyt, i. f. 1504.

1586.—"Tutti sopradetti Tartari seguirono la fede de Turchi et alla Turchese credono, ma si tògono a gran vergogna, e molti si coricano l'esser detti Turchi, secondo che all’incontro godono d’esser Besermani, cioè gaste eolto, chiamati."—Descrizione della Sarmatica Èuropeo del magn. caval. Alex. Gragnino, in Ramusio, ii. Pt. ii. f. 72.

1619.—"... i Musulmani, cioè i salvati: che cosa pazzamente si chiamano fra di loro i maomettani."—P. della Valle, i. 794.

1653.—"... son infanterie d’Indiannissi Mansulman, ou indiens de la seete des Sonnas."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, 223.

1673.—"Yet here are a sort of bold, lusty, and most an end, drunken Beggars of the Muslimeen Cast, that if they see a Christian in good clothes, mounted on a stately horse ... are preceptly upon their Fundltilo’s with God Almighty, and interrogate him, why he suffers him to go a Foot, and in Rags, and this Coffery (see CAFFER) (Un-believer) to vaunt it thus!"—Fryer, 91.

1788.—"We escape an ambiguous termination by adopting Modern instead of Musulman in the plural number."—Gibbon, pref. to vol. iv.

MUST, adj. Pers. mast, ‘drunk.’ It is applied in Persia also, and in India specially, to male animals, such as elephants and camels, in a state of periodical excitement.

[Must differ in duration in different animals (elephants); in some they last for a few weeks, in others for even four or five months."—Anderson, Thirteen Years, 3rd ed., 59.]

MUSTEE, MESTIZ, &c., s. A half-caste. A corruption of the Port. mestizo, having the same meaning; "a mixing; applied to human beings and animals born of a father and mother of different species, like a mule" (Bluteau); French, métis and métif.

1546.—"The Governor in honour of this great action (the victory at Diu) ordered that all the mestizos who were in Dho should be inscribed in the Book, and that pay and subsistence should be assigned to them, subject to the King’s confirmation. For a regulation had been sent to India that no mestizo of India should be given pay or subsistence: for, as it was laid down, it was their duty to serve for nothing, seeing that they had their houses and heritages in the country, and being on their native soil were bound to defend it."—Correa, iv. 590.

1552.—"... the sight of whom as soon as they came, caused immediately to gather about them a number of the natives, Moors in belief, and Negroes with curly hair in appearance, and some of them only swarthy, as being misticos."—Barroso, 1. i. 1.

1586.—"... che se sono nati qua di donne indiane, gli domandano mestizal."—Sassetti, in De Gubernatis, 188.

1588.—"... an Interpreter which was a Mestizo, that is half an Indian, and half a Portuguese."—Cardinal, in Haky. iv. 337.

1610.—"Le Capitaine et les Marchands estoient Mestifs, les autres Indiens Christianizes."—Pyrrard de Laval, i. 165; [Hak. Soc. i. 75; also see i. 240]. This author has also Mestifs (ii. 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 373]), and again: "... qu'ils appellet de l'inde c'est a dire Mestifs, mesties" (ii. 23; [Hak. Soc. ii. 38]).

"Je vy vne moustre generelle de tous les Habitans portans armes, tant Portugais que Mestissos et Indiens, se trouueroient environ 4000."—Moquet, 352.

1615.—"A Mestizo came to demand passage in our junk."—Cock’s Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 216.

tes de fortresses ou de vaisseaux, s’ils font profession de surreir les armes, et s’ils se lissent du costé de l’Eglise ils peuluent etre Lecteurs, mais non Pronoucens."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 293.

1665.—"And, in a word, Bengal is a country abounding in all things; and is for this very reason that so many Portuguese, Mesticks, and other Christians are fled thither."—Bennet, E.T. 140; [ed. Consostale, 438].

1673.—"Beyond the Outworks live a few Portugalls Mesteros or Misterados."—Fryer, 57.

1768.—"Noe Roman Catholic or Papist, whether English or of any other nation shall bear office in this Garrison, and shall have no more pay than 80 fannas per mensem, as private centinels, and the pay of those of the Portuguese nation, as Europeans, Mesteeses, and Topasses, is from 80 to 40 fannas per mensem."—Articles and Orders ... of Ft. MUSTER. 605  MUXADABAD.

1781.—"Eloped from the service of his Mistress a Slave Boy aged 20 years, or thereabouts, pretty white or colour of Mussy, tall and slender."—Hicky’s Bengal Gazette, Feb. 24.

1799.—"August 18th. . . Visited by appointment . . . Mrs. Carey, the last survivor of those unfortunate persons who were imprisoned in the Black Hole of Calcutta. . . . This lady, now fifty-eight years of age, as she herself told me, is . . . of a fair Mestiza colour. . . . She confirmed all which Mr. Holwell has said. . . ."—Note by Thomas Bolleau (an attorney in Calcutta, the father of Major-Generals John Theophilus and A. H. E. Bolleau, R.E. (Bengal)), quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 84.

1834.—"You don’t know these Baboos. . . . Most of them now-a-days have their Mistees, Beebes, and their Mosolemaunees, and not a few their Goru Beebes likewise."—The Baboo, &c., 187-188.

1868.—"These Mestizas, as they are termed, are the native Indians of the Philippines, whose blood has to a great extent perished, and been mingled with that of their Spanish rulers. They are a very exclusive people . . . and have their own places of amusement . . . and Mestisa balls, to which no one is admitted who does not don the costume of the country."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, p. 296.

MUSTER, s. A pattern, or a sample. From Port. mostra (Span. muestra, Ital. mostra). The word is current in China, as well as India. See Wells Williams’s Guide, 237.

1444.—"Vierão as nossas Galés por comissão sua com alguns amostras de açúcar da Madeira, de Sangue de Dragao, e de outras cousas."—Gama, Navegação primeira, 8.

1563.—"And they gave me a mostra of cassowaries, which I brought to Goa, and showed to the apothecaries here; and I compared it with the drawings of the simples of Dioscorides."—Garcia, f. 15.

c. 1760.—"He (the tailor) never measures you; he only asks muster for muster, as he terms it, that is for a pattern."—Ives, 52.

1772.—"The Governor and Council of Bombay must be written to, to send round Musters of such kinds of silk, and silk piece-goods, of the manufacture of Bengal, as will serve the market of Surat and Bombay."—Price’s Travels, i. 39.

1846.—"The above muster was referred to a party who has lately arrived from England. . . ."—J. A. Hort. Soc., in Watt, Econ. Diet. vi. pt. ii. 601.]

MUTLUB, s. Hind. from Ar. matlab. The Ar. from talab, ‘he asked,’ properly means a question, hence intention, wish, object, &c. In Anglo-Indian it use it always means ‘purpose, gist,’ and the like. Illiterate natives by a common form of corruption turn the word into matbal. In the Punjab this occurs in printed books; and an adjective is formed, matball, ‘opinionated,’ and the like.

MUTT, MUTH, s. Skt. matha; a sort of convenet where a celibate priest (or one making such profession) lives with disciples making the same profession, one of whom becomes his successor. Buildings of this kind are very common all over India, and some are endowed with large estates.

1874.—"The monastic Order is celibate, and in a great degree eratic and mendicant, but has anchorages places and head-quarters in the maths."—Calc. Review, cviii. 212.

MUTTONGOSHT, s. (i.e. ‘Mutton-flesh’) Anglo-Indian domestic Hind. for ‘Mutton.’

MUTTONGYEB, s. Sea-Hind. matangai, a (nautical) martingale; a corruption of the Eng. word.

MUTTRA, n.p. A very ancient and holy Hindu city on the Jumna, 30 miles above Agra. The name is Mathura, and it appears in Ptolemy as Mòbòura ῾τὸς Θεός. The sanctity of the name has caused it to be applied in numerous new localities; see under MADURA. [Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 240) calls it Matura, and Bernier (ed. Constable, 66), Maturas.]

MUXADABAD, n.p. Ar.—P. Maṣṣadābād, a name that often occurs in books of the 18th century. It pertains to the same city that has latterly been called Murshidabad, the capital of the Nawabs of Bengal since the beginning of the 18th century. The town Muzudabad is stated to be founded by Akbar. The Governor of Bengal, Murshid Kuli Khan (also called in English histories Jafer Khan), moved the seat of Government hither in 1704, and gave the place his own name. It is written Muzudabad in the early English records down to 1760 (Sir W. W. Hunter).

1684.—"Dec. 26. In ye morning I went to give Bulchund a visit according to his invitation, who rose up and embraced me when I came near him, enquired of my health and bid me welcome to Muzudabad...."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 59.

1708-4. —"The first act of the Nawab, on his return to Bengal, was to change the name of the city of Muzudabad to Murshidabad; and by establishing in it the mint, and by erecting a palace... to render it the capital of the Province."—Stewart, H. of Bengal, 309.

1726.—"Muzudabath."—Valentijn, Chor. Rom., &c., 147.

1728.—"Muzudaband is but 12 miles from it (Cossimbazar), a Place of much Greater Antiquity, and the Mogul has a Mint there; but the ancient name of Muzudabad has been changed for Rajmahal, for above a Century."—A. Hamilton, ii. 20; [ed. 1744]. (There is great confusion in 20.)

1761.—"I have heard that Ram Kissen Sest, who lives in Calcutta, has carried goods to that place without paying the Muzudavad Syre (see BAYER) Chowkey duties. I am greatly surprised, and send a Chubdar to bring him, and desire you will be speedy in delivering him over."—Letter from Nawab Allyverdi Cawn to the Pres. of Council, dated Muzudabad, May 50.

1783.—"En omettant quelques lieux de moindre considération, je m'arrête d'abord à Mucudabab. Ce nom signifie ville de la monnoie. Et en effet c'est là où se frappe celle du pays; et un grand fœu de cette ville, appelé Atingoge, est la résidence du Nabab, qui gouverne le Bengale presque souverainement."—D'Aubigny, 65.

1785.—"The Nabob, irritated by the disappointment of his expectations of immense wealth, ordered Mr. Holwell and the two other prisoners to be sent to Muzudavad."—Orme, iii. 79.

1782.—"You demand an account of the East Indies, the Mogul's dominions and Muzudabad.... I imagine when you made the above requisition that you did it with a view rather to try my knowledge than to increase your own, for your great skill in geography would point out to you that Muzudabad is as far from Madras, as Constantinople is from Glasgow."—T. Munro to his brother William, in Life, &c. iii. 41.

1884.—It is alleged in a passage introduced in Mrs. C. Mackenzie's interesting memoir of her husband, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, that "Admiral Watson used to sail up in his ships to Muzudabad...." But there is no ground for this statement. So far as I can trace, it does not appear that the Admiral's flag-ship ever went above Chandernagore, and the largest of the vessels sent to Hooghly even was the Bridgeguarder of 20 guns. No vessel of the fleet appears to have gone higher.

MUZEEB, s. The name of a class of Sikhs originally of low caste, vulg. mazi, apparently mashabi from Ar. mashab, 'religious belief.' Cunningham indeed says that the name was applied to Sikh converts from Mahommmedanism (History, p. 379). But this is not the usual application now. ["When the sweepers have adopted the Sikh faith they are known as Mazoohabi."

... When the Chuhra is circumcised and becomes a Muslim, he is known as Muzzali or a Kutama." (Maclagan, Panjab Census Rep., 1891, p. 202.) The original corps of Muzees, now represented by the 32nd Bengal N.I. (Pioneers) was raised among the men labouring on the Baree Doab Canal.

1888.—"On the 19th June (1857) I advocated, in the search for new Military classes, the raising of a corps of Muzeees. Their idea was ultimately carried out, and improved by making them pioneers."—Letter from Col. H. B. Edwards to R. Montgomery, Esq., March 23.

... To the same destination (Delhi) was sent a strong corps of Muzheebes (low-caste) Sikhs, numbering 1200 men, to serve as pioneers."—Letter from R. Temple, Secretary to Punjub Govt., dd. Lahore, May 25, 1868.

MYDAN, MEIDAUN, s. Hind. from Pers. maidan. An open space, an esplanade, parade-ground or green, in or adjoining a town; a piazza (in the Italian sense); any open plain with grass on it; a chaugan (see CHICANE) ground; a battle-field. In Ar., usually, a hippodrome or racecourse.

c. 1800.—"But the brethren were meanwhile brought out to the Medan, i.e., the piazza of the City, where an exceeding great fire had been kindled. And Friar Thomas went forward to cast himself into the fire, but as he did so a certain Saracen caught him by the hood...—Priar Odoric, in Cathay, 83.

1618.—"When it is the hour of complines, or a little later to speak exactly, it is the time for the promenade, and every one goes on horseback to the meidan, which is always kept clean, watered by a number of men whose business this is, who water it carrying the water in skins slung over the shoulder, and usually well shaded and very cool."—P. della Valle, i. 707.

c. 1685.—"Celui (Quervansera) des Étrangers est bien plus spacieux que l'autre et est quarré, et tous deux font face au Meidan."—Themoc, v. 214.

1760.—"Before this house is a great square meidan or promenade, planted on all sides with great trees, standing in rows."—A. d'Ormess, 35.

1769.—"The Midan, or open Space before the Caun Palace, is an Olong and Stately Piazza, with real not belled Cloisters."—Pryer, 249.

1828.—"All this was done with as much coolness and precision, as if he had been at exercise upon the maidan."

[1835. — A 24-pound howitzer, hoisted on to the mantop of the Shannon, looked menacingly over the Maidan (at Calcutta) . . .]—Oliphant, Narrative of Ld. Elgin's Mission, i. 60.

Myna, Mina, &c. s. Hind. maind. A name applied to several birds of the family of starlings. The common myna is the Acridotheres tristis of Linn.; the southern Hill-Myna is the Gracula, also Eulabes religiosa of Linn.; the Northern Hill-Myna, Eulabes intermedia of Hay (see Jerdon's Birds, ii. Pt. i. 395, 337, 339). Of both the first and last it may be said that they are among the most teachable of imitative birds, articulating words with great distinctness, and without Polly's nasal tone. We have heard a wild one (probably the first), on a tree in a field, spontaneously echoing the very peculiar call of the black partridge from an adjoining jungle, with unmistakable truth. There is a curious description in Aelian (De Nat. An. xvi. 2) of an Indian talking bird which we thought at one time to be the Myna; but it seems to be nearer the Shama, and under that head the quotation will be found. [Mr. M'Crindle (Invasion of India, 186) is in favour of the Myna.]

It imitates the human voice and speaks with great distinctness.—Ains, ed. Jarrett, iii. 121.]

1831.—Jas. Bentius describes a kind of Myna in Java, which he calls Pica, seu pustus Suraeus Indicus. "The owner, an old Musulman woman, only lent it to the author to be drawn, after great persuasion, and on a stipulation that the beloved bird should get no swine's flesh to eat. And when he had promised accordingly, the avis pennisima immediately began to chant: Orang Naaranu cajor macan babi? i.e. 'Dog of a Christian, eater of swine!'"—Lib. v. cap. 14, p. 67.

1864.—"In the Duke's chamber there is a bird, given him by Mr. Pierce, the surgeon, comes from the East Indies, black the greatest part, with the finest collar of white about the neck; but talks many things and neysay like the horse, and other things, the best almost that ever I heard bird in my life."—Pepys, Diary, April 25. Prof. Newton in Mr. Wheatley's ed. (iv. 118) is inclined to identify this with the Myna, and notes that one of the earliest figures of the bird is by Elazar Albin (Nat. Hist. of Birds, ii. pl. 38) in 1738.

1708.—"Among singing birds that which in Bengall is called the Minow is the only one that comes within my knowledge."—In Yale, Hedg's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 333xii.v.

1803.—"During the whole of our stay two minas were talking incessantly, to the great delight of the old lady, who often laughed at what they said, and praised their talents. Her hookah filled up the interval."—Id. Valentia, i. 227-8.

1813.—"The myna is a very entertaining bird, hopping about the house, and articulating several words in the manner of the starling."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47; [2nd ed. i. 32.]

1817.—"Of all birds the chiong (minor) is the most highly prized."—Raffles, Java, i. 280.

1875.—"A talking mina in a cage, and a rat-trap, completed the adornments of the veranda."—The Dilemma, ch. xii.

1782.—"The myna has no wit. His only way of catching a worm is to lay hold of its tail and pull it out of its hole,—generally breaking it in the middle and losing the bigger half."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 28.

1879.—"So the dog went to a maina, and said: 'What shall I do to hurt this cat!"'—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 18.

MYROBALAN. a. A name applied to certain dried fruits and kernels of
The kinds recognised in the Medieval pharmacopoeia were five, viz.:

1. The Emblica myrobalan; which is the dried astringent fruit of the Anwul, anwul of Hind., the Emblica officinalis of Gaertner (Phyllanthus Emblica, L., N. O. Euphorbiaceae). The Persian name of this is damlah, but, as the Arabic amlaï suggests, probably in older Persian amlag, and hence no doubt Emblica. Garcia says it was called by the Arab physicians embelgi (which we should write ambalj).

2. The Belleric Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Bellerica, Roxb. (N.O. Combretaceae), consisting of a small nut enclosed in a thin exterior rind.

The Arabic name given in Ibn Baithar is balitij; in the old Latin version of Avicenna belitätij; and in Persian it is called balit and balita. Garcia says the Arab physicians called it belerég (balitrij) and in old Persian probably balirig which accounts for Bellerica.

3. The Chebulic Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Chebula, Roxb. The derivation of this name which we have given under CHEBULL is confirmed by the Persian name, which is Hálila-i-Kábuli. It can hardly have been a product of Kabul, but may have been imported into Persia by that route, whence the name, as calicoes got their name from Calicut. Garcia says these myrobalans were called by his Arabs quebulji. Ibn Baithar calls them hántaj, and many of the authorities whom he quotes specify them as Kábui.

4. and 5. The Black Myrobalan, otherwise called ‘Indian,’ and the Yellow or Citrine. These, according to Royle (Essay on Antiq. of Hindoo Medicine, pp. 36-37), were both products of T. Chebula in different states; but this does not seem quite certain. Further varieties were sometimes recognised, and nine are said to be specified in a paper in an early vol. of the Philos. Transactions.* One kind astringent flavour, but of several species, and not even all belonging to the same Natural Order, which were from an early date exported from India, and had a high reputation in the medieval pharmacopoeia. This they appear (some of them) to retain in native Indian medicine; though, they seem to have disappeared from English use and have no place in the Pharmacographia. They are still, to some extent, imported into England, but for use in tanning and dyeing, not in pharmacy.

* This article we have been unable to find. Dr. Hunter in As. Bev. (vol. 182) quotes from a Persian work of Mohammed Husain Shirzi, communicated to him by Mr. Colebrooke, the names of 6 varieties of Hálila (or Myrobalan) as afforded in different stages of maturity by the Terminalia Chebula—i.e., Zirva, when just set from Zir, cummin-seed; 2. H. Jowt (from Jesu, barley); 3. Zunf or Hindi (The Black M.); 4. H. Chital, or Yellow; 5. *H. Kait", the mature fruit. (See Dr. Murray’s article in Enc. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 33 seg.)

It is not quite clear how the term myrobalan, in this sense, came into use. For the people of India do not seem to have any single name denoting these fruits or drugs as a group; nor do the Arabic dictionaries afford one either (but see further on). Myrobolanes is spoken of by some ancient authors, e.g. Aristotle, Dioscorides and Pliny, but it was applied by them to one or more fruits entirely unconnected with the subjects of this article. This name had probably been preserved in the laboratories, and was applied by some early translator of the Arabic writers on Materia Medica to these Indian products. Though we have said that (so far as we can discover) the dictionaries afford no word with the comprehensive sense of Myrobalan, it is probable that the physicians had such a word, and Garcia de Orta, who is trustworthy, says explicitly that the Arab practitioners whom he had consulted applied to the whole class the name delegi, a word which we cannot identify, unless it originated in a clerical error for alelegi, i.e. thálaj. The last word may perhaps be taken as covering all myrobalans; for according to the Glossary to Rhazes at Leyden (quoted by Dozy, Suppl. i. 43) it applies to the Kabuli, the yellow, and the black (or Indian), whilst the Emblic is also called íthulaj amlag.

In the Kashmir Customs Tariff (in Punjab Trade Report, ccxxvi.) we have entries of "Hulda (Myrobalan).

Buída (Bellerick ditto).
Amla (Emblica Phyllanthus)."

* One of them is generally identified with the seeds of Mortagua nigra—see HORSE RADISH TREE—the Bot-nuts of old writers, and affording Oil of Buí, used as a basis in perfumery. called Sind or Chinese, is mentioned by one of the authorities of Ibn Baithar, quoted below, and is referred to by Garcia.

The virtues of Myrobolans are said to be extolled by Charaka, the oldest of the Sanskrit writers on Medicine. Some of the Arabian and Mediæval Greek authors, referred to by Royle, also speak of a combination of different kinds of Myrobolan called Tryphera or Tryphala; a fact of great interest. For this is the triphala ("Three-fruits") of Hindu medicine, which appears in Amarakosha (c. A.D. 500), as well as in a prescription of Susruta, the disciple of Charaka, and which is still, it would seem, familiar to the native Indian practitioners. It is, according to Royle, a combination of the black, yellow and Chebulic; but Garcia, who calls it tine-gala (tin-philin Hind. = "Three-fruits"), seems to imply that it consisted of the three kinds known in Goa, viz. citrino (or yellow), the Indian (black) and the belleric. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 35 seqq.]

The emblic, he says, were not used in medicine there, only in tanning, like sumac. The Myrobolans imported in the Middle Ages seem often to have been preserved (in syrup).”

C. B. C. 340.—"νυτηείς γεννηεις του καρπου εν τη ρακτή εστι χαραλ γλυκετατος. Των μυραβαλανων δε θελουσα εν τη ρακτη, οιαν φαστον, οι καρποι εισι γλυκειν κοινων δε εισι εντραφω και εν τη ρακτε αιτων τικρο..."—Aristoteles, De Plantis, i. 10.

C. A. D. 60.—"φωνις εν καφτι γνηεατα τρηγυεται μετεπωξεία της κατα την ωδεων ακμής, παρεμέφρων την Αρακιδιθ μυροβαλανων, τόμα δε λέγεται."—Dioscorides, de Mat. Medica, i. calvill.

C. A. D. 70.—"Myrobalanum Trogloedytis et Thebaidi et Arabiae quibus Iudaean ab Aegypio determinatam commune est, nascentes unguentae, ut ipso nomine appareat, quo item indicatur et glandem esse. Arbor est heliotropio... simili folio, fructus magnitudine abellanae nucis," &c.—Pliny, xii. 21 (46).

C. 540.—A precription of Aëtius of Amida, which will be found transcribed under ZEDOARY, includes myrobalan among a large number of ingredients, chiefly of Oriental origin; and one doubts whether the word may not here be used in the later sense.

C. 1343.—"Preserved Mirabolanis (mirabolani conditi) should be big and black, and the envelope over the nut tender to the tooth; and the bigger and blacker and tenderer to the tooth (like candied walnuts), the better they are. ... Some people say that in India they are candied when unripe (acerbe), just as we candy the unripe tender walnuts, and that when they are candied in this way they have no nut within, but are all through tender like our walnut-comfits. But if this is really done, anyhow none reach us except those with a nut inside, and often very hard nuts too. They should be kept in brown earthen pots glazed, in a syrup made of casia fistula † and honey or sugar; and they should remain always in the syrup, for they form a moist preserve and are not fit to use dry."—Pegolotti, p. 377.

† This is surely not what we now call Cassia Fistula, the long cylindrical pod of a leguminous tree, affording a mild laxative? But Hambury and Flütkiger (pp. 195, 475) show that some Cassia bark (of the cinnamon kind) was known in the early centuries of our era as cassia ejectys and cassia fistula, whilst the drug now called Cassia Fistula, L., is first noticed by a medical writer of Constantineople towards A.D. 1800. Pegolotti, at p. 366, gives a few lines of instruction for judging of cassia fistula: "It ought to be black, thick, and thick, and unbroken (salda), and heavy, and the thicker it is, and the blacker the outside rind is, the riper and better it is; and it retains its virtue well for 3 years:" This is not very decisive, but on the whole we should suppose Pegolotti’s cassia fistula to be either a spice-bark, or solid twigs of a like plant (H. & F. 476).

MYSORE, n.p. Tam. Maiśur, Can. Maiśuṟu. The city which was the capital of the Hindu kingdom, taking its name, and which last was founded in 1610 by a local chief on the decay of the Vijayanagar (see BENGALAE, MARSINGA) dynasty. C. P. Brown gives the etym. as Maiśi-ṝr, Maiśi being the name of a local goddess like Pomona or Flora; ṭṝ, 'town, village.' It is however usually said to be a corruption of Mahīšṭha, the buffalo demon slain by the goddess Durga or Kali. [Rice (Mysore, i. 1) gives Can. Maiśa, from Skt. Mahīśa, and ṭṝu, 'town.]

N

NABÔB. a. Port. Nabóbo, and Fr. Nabah, from Hind. Nāwāb, which is the Ar. pl. of sing. Nāyab (see NAĪB), a deputy; and was applied in a singular sense* to a delegate of the supreme chief, viz. to a Viceroy or chief Governor under the Great Mogul, e.g. the Nāwāb of Surat, the Nāwāb of Oudh, the Nāwāb of Arcot, the Nāwāb Nīẓām of Bengal. From this use it became a title of rank without necessarily having any office attached. It is now a title occasionally conferred, like a peerage, on Mahommiedan gentlemen of distinction and good service, as Rāṣ and Rājā are upon Hindus.

Nabob is used in two ways: (a) simply as a corruption and representative of Nāwāb. We get it direct from the Port. nabóbo, see quotation from Bluteau below. (b) It began to be applied in the 18th century, when the transactions of Clive made the epithet familiar in England, to Anglo-Indians who returned with fortunes from the East; and Foote's play of 'The Nabob' (Nābōb) (1798) aided in giving general currency to the word in this sense.

* Doxy says (2nd ed. 522) that the plural form has been adopted by mistake. Wilson says 'homo-ifically.' Possibly in this and other like cases it came from popular misunderstanding of the Arabic plurals. So we have omra, i.e. ussr, pl. of emr used singularly and forming a plural word. (See also OMLAH and MEHAUL.)

NABOB.

According to the custom of the Country, barefoot, like one of our Tailors, with a great number of Papers sticking between his Toes, and others between the Fingers of his left hand, which Papers he drew sometimes from between his Toes, sometimes from between his Fingers, and order'd what answers should be given to every one." — Taveraier, E. T. ii. 99; [ed. Ball, i. 291].

1653. — "... il prend la qualité de Nabab qui vaut autant à dire que monseigneur." — De la Boullaye-le-Gouz (ed. 1667), 142.

1666. — "The ill-dealing of the Nabab proceeded from a scurvy trick that was play'd me by three Canary-birds at the Great Mogul's Court. The story whereof was thus in short ..." — Taveraier, E.T. ii. 57; [ed. Ball, i. 134].

1673. — "Gaining by these steps a nearer intimacy with the Nabab, he cut the new Business out every day." — Fryer, 183.

1675. — "But when we were preparing next day to depart, there came letters out of the Moorish Camp from the Nabab, the field-marshall of the Great Mogul. ..." — Heiden Vervarrijitsch Schip-Breuk, 52.

1682. — "... Ray Nundelall ye Nabab Dua, who gave me a most courteons reception, rising up and taking of me by ye hands, and ye like at my departure, which I am informed is a greater favour than he has ever shown to any Franks ..." — Hoodes, Diary, Oct. 27; [Hak. Soc. i. 42].

Hodges writes Nabob, Nabob, Nabob, Nabob, Nabob.

1777. — "A few years ago, the Nabob or Vice-Roy of Chorrondel, who resides at Chiekkulal, and who superintends that Country for the Mogul, for some Disregard he has received from the Inhabitants of Diu Islands, would have made a Present of them to the Colony of Fort St. George." — A. Hamilton, i. 874; [ed. 1744].

1742. — "We have had a great man called the Nabob (who is the next person in dignity to the Great Mogul) to visit the Governor. ... His lady, with all her women attendance, came the night before him. All the guns fired round the fort upon her arrival, as well as upon his; she and she are Moors, whose women are never seen by any man upon earth except their husbands." — Letter from Madras in Mrs. Delany's Life, ii. 169.

1748. — "Every governor of a fort, and every commander of a district had assumed the title of Nabob ... one day after having received the homage of several of these little lords, Nizam ul muluck said that he had that day seen no less than eighteen Nabobs in the Carnatic." — Orme, Reprint, Bk. i. 51.

1752. — "Agreed ... that a present should be made the Nabab that might prove satisfactory." — In Long, 33.

1778. — "And though my years have passed in this hard duty, No Benefit acquired — no Nabab's booty." — Epilogue at Fort Marlborough, by W. Marden, in Mem. 9.

1787. — "Of armaments by land and sea; Of Nabobs you have made to yield." — Risdon, in Life and Letters, i. 124.

1807. — "Some say that he is a Tailor who brought in a long bill against some of Lord Welleley's staff, and was in consequence provided for; others say he was an adventurer, and sold knicknacks to the Nabob of Oude." — Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 871.

1809. — "I was surprised that I had heard nothing from the Nawab of the Carnatic." — Ed. Valentinia, i. 381.

1773. — "I regretted the decay of respect for men of family, and that a Nabob would not carry an election from them.

"Johnson: Why, sir, the Nabab will carry it by means of his wealth, in a country where money is highly valued, as it must be where nothing can be had without money; but if it comes to personal preference, the man of family will always carry it." — Boswell, Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides, under Aug. 25.

1777. — "In such a revolution ... it was impossible but that a number of individuals should have acquired large property. They did acquire it; and with it they seem to have obtained the detestation of their countrymen, and the appellation of nabobs as a term of reproach." — Price's Tracts, i. 18.

1783. — "The office given to a young man going to India is of trifling consequence. But he that goes out an insignificant boy, in a few years returns a great Nabob. Mr. Hastings says he has two hundred and fifty of that kind of raw material, who expect to be speedily manufactured into the merchantlike quality I mention." — Burke, Speech on Pitt's E. I. Bill, in Works and Corrs., ed. 1862, iii. 504.

1787. — "The speakers for him (Hastings) were Burgess, who has completely done for himself in one day; Nichols, a lawyer; Mr. Vansittart, a nabob; Alderman Le Mesurier, a smuggler from Jersey; ... and Dempster, who is one of the good-natured candid men who connect themselves with every bad man they can find."—Ld. Minte, in Life, &c., i. 126.

1848. — "Isn't he very rich!" said Rebecca.

"They say all Indian Nabobs are enormously rich."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, i. 17.

1872. — "Ce train de vie facile... suffit à faire décerner... le surnom de Nabob par les bourgeois et les visiteurs de la petite ville."—Rev. des Deux Mondes, xviii. 938.

1874. — "At that time (c. 1830) the Royal Society was very differently composed from what it is now. Any wealthy or well-known person, any M.P. ... or East Indian Nabob, who wished to have F.R.S. added to his name, was sure to obtain admittance."—Geikie, Life of Murchison, i. 197.

1879. — "... A Tunis!—interrompit le due... Alors pourquoi ce nom de Nabab! —Bah! les Parisiens n'y regardent pas de si près. Pour eux tout riche étranger est un Nabab, n'importe d'où il vienne."—Le Nabab, par Alph. Daudet, ch. i.

It is purism quite erroneously applied when we find Nabob in this sense miswritten Naawob; thus:

1878. — "These were days when India, little known still in the land that rules it, was less known than it had been in the previous generation, which had seen Warren Hastings impeached, and burghs* bought and sold by Anglo-Indian Nawabs."—Smith's Life of Dr John Wilson, 30.

But there is no question of purism in the following delicious passage:

1878.—"If... the spirited proprietor of the Daily Telegraph had been informed that our aid of their friends the Turks would have taken the form of a tax upon paper, and a concession of the Levits to act as Commanders of Regiments of Bashi-Bouzouks, with a request to the Generalissimo to place them in as forward a position as Nabob was given in the host of King David, the harp in Peterborough Court would not have twanged long to the tune of a crusade in behalf of the Sultan of Turkey."—Truth, April 11, p. 470. In this passage in which the wit is equalled only by the scriptural knowledge, observe that Nabob=Naboth, and Naboth=Uriah.

NACODA, NACODER, &c., s. Pers. na-khuda (navis dominus) 'a skipper'; the master of a native vessel. (Perhaps the original sense is rather the owner of the ship, going with it as his own supercargo.) It is hard to understand why Reinaud (Relation, ii. 42) calls this a "Malay word... derived from the Persian, especially considering that he is dealing with a book of the 9th and 10th centuries. [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is sometimes, after the manner of Hobson-Jobson, corrupted by the Malays into Anak kuda, 'son of a horse."

c. 916. — "Bienôt l'on ne garda pas même de ménagements pour les patrons de navires (navānkhudā, pl. of nakhudā) Arabes, et les maîtres de bateaux marchands furent en butte à des prétentions injustes."—Relation, &c., i. 68.

c. 1348. — "The second day after our arrival at the port of Kalkut, this princess invited the nabūdha, or owner of the ship (sāhib-al-markab), the kānta (see CRANNY) or clerk, the merchants, the chief people, the tānsī (see TINDEL) or commander of the crew, the sipāsīdar (see SIPAHSELAR) or commander of the fighting men."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 250.

1502. — "But having been seen by our fleet, the caravels made for them, and the Moors being laden could no longer escape. So they brought them to the Captain General, and all struck sail, and from six of the Zanzubos (see SAMBUS) the naodos came to the Captain General."—Correa, i. 302.

1540. — "Whereupon he desired us that the three neocadas of the Junka, so are the commanders of them called in that country..."—Pinto, (orig. cap. xxxv.) in Cosas, p. 42.

[c. 1590. — "In large ships there are twelve classes. 1. The Nahuda, or owner of the ship. This word is evidently a short form of Naakhuba. He fixes the course of the ship, sails its mast. Blockman, i. 280."

1610. — "The sixth Nahoda, Buclesch Amscher, Captain of a great ship of Dabul (see DABUL), came ashore with a great many of Merchants with him, he with the rest were carried about the Towne in pompe."—Sir H. Middleton, in Purchas, i. 260.

we are rogues; but our Knockety or pilot told us he knew them."—Ives, 248. This word looks like confusion, in the manner of the post of the "Snark," between nakhuda and (Hind.) arbab, "a pilot," [so called because many came from Arojt.]

1850.—"That a pamphlet should be printed, illustrated by diagrams, and widely circulated, commends itself to the Government of India... copies being supplied at small cost."—Rem. of Govt. of India as to Lights for Shipping, 28 Jan.

NAGA, n.p. The name applied to an extensive group of uncivilized clans of warlike and vindictive character in the eastern part of the hill country which divides Assam Proper (or the valley of the Brahmaputra) from Kachar and the basin of the Surna.
A part of these hills was formed into a British district, now under Assam, in 1867, but a great body of the Naga clans is still independent. The etymology of the name is disputed; some identifying it with the Naga or Snake Aborigines, who are so prominent in the legends and sculptures of the Buddhists. But it is, perhaps, more probable that the word is used in the sense of 'naked' (Skt. naga, Hind. nαγαδ, Beng. nangta, &c.), which, curiously enough, is that which Ptolemy attributes to the name, and which the spelling of Shihabuddin also indicates. [The word is also used for a class of ascetics of the Dādapanthi sect, whose head-quarters are at Jaypur.]

c. A.D. 50.—"Kal μέτρα τού Μαίανδρου,
... Ναγγα λόγα δ' ονειανε γρημνην

c. 1682.—"The Rajah had first intended to fly to the Naga Hills, but from fear of our army the Nágás* would not afford him an asylum. 'The Nágás live in the southern mountains of Assam, have a light brown complexion, are well built, but treacherous.
In number they equal the helpers of Yagog and Magog, and resemble, in hardiness and physical strength the 'Adish (an ancient Arabian tribe). They go about naked like beasts... Some of their chiefs came to see the Nawáb. They wore dark hip-clothes (lung), ornamented with cowries, and round about their heads they wore a belt of bear's wools, allowing their black hair to hang down their neck.'"—Shihabuddin Tákh, tr.
by Prof. Blockmann, in J. As. Soc. Beng.,

Anthrop. Inst. xxvi. 161 seqq.]

mology of a name several thousand years old.

NAIK, NAIQUE, &c. a. Hind. ndyaq. A term which occurs in nearly all the vernacular languages; from Skt. ndyaqa, 'a leader, chief, general.'
The word is used in several applications among older writers (Portuguese) referring to the south and west of India, as meaning a native captain or headman of some sort (a). It is also a title of honour among Hindus in the Deccan (b). It is again the name of a Telugu caste, whence the general name of the Kings of Vijayanagara (A.D. 1325-1674), and of the Lords of Madura (1559-1741) and other places (c). But its common Anglo-Indian application is to the non-commissioned officer of Sepoys who corresponds to a corporal, and wears the double chevron of that rank (d).

NAIR.

We may add as a special sense that in West India Nātik is applied to the head-man of a hamlet (Kāri) or camp (Tānda) of Britjariies (q.v.). [Bhangi and Jhangi Naiks, the famous Banjaras, are said to have had 180,000 bullock in their camp. See Berar Gazetteer, 196.]

NAIR. _s._ Malayāl. nāyar; from the same Skt. origin as Naik. Name of the ruling caste in Malabar. [The Greek nāyos as a tract stood for the country of the Nairs. For their customs, see Logan, Malabar, i. 131.]

1510. — "The first class of Panags in Calicut are called Brahmins. The second are Nāserī, who are the same as the gentlefolk amongst us; and these are obliged to bear sword and shield or bows and lances." — Varthema, pp. 141-142.

1516. — "These kings do not marry ... only each has a mistress, a lady of great lineage and family, which is called nāyra." — Barboes, 185.

1558. — "And as ... the Gentiles of the place are very superstitious in dealing with people foreign to their blood, and chiefly those called Brahmans and Nairs." — Barros, Dec. I. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1663. — "... The Nairs who are the Knights." — Garcia.

1582. — "The Men of Warre which the King of Calicut and the other Kings have, are Nayres, which be all Gentlemen." — Castelveda (by N. L.), f. 365.

1644. — "We have much Christian people throughout his territory, not only the Christians of St. Thomas, who are the best soldiers that he (the King of Cochin) has, but also many other vessels who are conversed to our Holy Catholic Faith, through the preaching of the Gospel, but none of these are Nayres, who are his fighting men, and his nobles or gentlemen." — Bocarro, MS., f. 315.

1755. — "The King has disciplined a body of 10,000 Nairs; the people of this denomination are by birth the Military tribe of the Malabar coast." — Orme, i. 400.

1781. — "The soldiers preceded the Nairs or nobles of Malabar." — Gibbon, ch. xviii.

It may be added that Nāyar was also the term used in Malabar for the mahout of an elephant; and the fact that Nāyar and Nāyaka are of the same origin may be considered with the etymology which we have given of Cornac (see Garcia, 565).

NALKEE. _s._ Hind. nalkī. A kind of litter formerly used by natives of rank; the word and thing are now obsolete. [It is still the name of the bride's litter in Behar (Grierson, Bihar Peasant Life, 45).] The name was perhaps a fictitious imitation of palki? [Platts suggests Skt. naliṇa, 'a tube.]

1789. — "A nālēki is a palki, either opened or covered, but it bears upon two bamboos, like a sedan in Europe, with this difference only, that the poles are carried by four or eight men, and upon the shoulders." — Note by Tr. of Seir Mulaqathin, iii. 269.

1844. — "This litter is called a 'nalki.' It is one of the three great insignia which the Mogul emperors of Delhi conferred upon independent princes of the first class, and could never be used by any person upon whom, or upon whose ancestors, they had not been so conferred. These were the nalki, the order of the Fish, and the fan of peacock's feathers." — Sleeman, Ramble, ed. V. A. Smith, i. 165.

1508. — "Afterwards we were presented to the King called Nambidara; who received us with no small kindness and kindness." — Giov. da Empoli, in Ramusio, i. f. 146.

1552. — "This advice of the Nambradrīm was disapproved by the kings and lords." — Castanheira; see also Transl. by N. L., 1582, f. 147.

1557. — "The Nambradrīm who is the principal governor." — D'Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. i. 9. The word is, by the translator, erroneously identified with Nambūdiri (see Namboorie), a Malabar Brahman.

1634. — "Entra em Cochim no thalamo secreto Aonde Nambeodera dorme quieto." — Malaca Conquist. i. 50.

NAMBOOOREE. Malayāl. nambūdari, Tam. nambūri; [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss. cxxi.)] gives nambūdīrī, nambru, from Drav. nambuka, 'to trust,' tirī, Skt. tīrī, 'blessed.' The Madras Gloss. has Mal. nambu, 'the Veda,' othu, 'to teach,' tirī, 'holy.' A Brahman of Malabar. [See Logan, i. 118 seqq.]

1644. — "No more than any of his Nambures (among Christian converts) who are his padres, for you would hardly see any one of them become converted and baptized because of the punishment that the king has attached to that." — Bocarro, MS., f. 313.

1727. — "The Nambouries are the first in both Capacities of Church and State, and some of them are Popes, being sovereign Princes in both." — A. Hamilton, i. 312; [ed. 1744].

1800. — "The Nambures eat no kind of animal food, and drink no spirituous liquors." — Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 428.
NANKEEN, a. A cotton stuff of a brownish yellow tinge, which was originally imported from China, and derived its name from the city of Nanking. It was not dyed, but made from a cotton of that colour, the Gossypium religiosum of Roxb., a variety of G. herbaceum. It was, however, imitated with dyed cotton in England, and before long exports of this imitation were made to China. Nankeen appears to be known in the Central Asia markets under the modified name of Nanka (see below).

1793-4.—"The land in this neighbourhhood produces the cloth usually called Nankeens in Europe . . . in that growing in the province of Kiangnan, of which the city of Nan-kin is the capital, the down is of the same yellow tinge which it possesses when spun and woven into cloth."—Stevenson’s Narr. of Ed. Macarney’s Embassy, ii. 425.

1794-5.—"The colour of Nam-King is thus natural, and not subject to fade . . . The opinion (that it was dyed) that I combat was the cause of an order being sent from Europe a few years ago to dye the pieces of Nam-King of a deeper colour, because of late they had grown paler."—Van Braam’s Embassy, E.T. ii. 141.

1797.—"China Investment per Upton Castle. . . Company’s broad and narrow Nankeen, brown Nankeen."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 805.

1809.—"Cotton in this district (Puraniya or Purnee) is but a trifling article. There are several kinds mentioned. . . The Kuki is the most remarkable, its wool having the colour of nankeen cloth, and it seems in fact to be the same material with that usually in use in that manufacture."—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, iii. 244. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iv. 16, 29.]

1888.—"Nanka is imported in the greatest quantity (to Kabul) from Russia, and is used for making the outer garments for the people, who have a great liking to it. It is similar to nankeen cloth that comes to India from China, and is of a strong durable texture."—Report by Baines, in Punjab Trade Report, App. p. ix. See also p. clxvii.

1848.—"Don’t be trying to depreciate the value of the lot, Mr. Moss," Mr. Hammerdown said; ‘let the company examine it as a work of art—the attitude of the gallant animal quite according to natur, the gentleman in a nankeen-jacket, his gun in hand, is going to the chase; in the distance a banyhann tree (see BANYAN-TREE) and a parody."—Vanity Fair, i. 178.

NANKING, n.p. The great Chinese city on the lower course of the Yangtse-kiang, which was adopted as capital of the Empire for a brief space (1368-1410) by the (native) Ming dynasty on the expulsion of the Mongol family of Chinghiz. The city, previously known as Kin-ling-fu, then got the style of Nan-king, or ‘South Court.’ Peking (‘North Court’) was however re-occupied as imperial residence by the Emperor Ching-su in 1410, and has remained such ever since. Nanking is mentioned as a great city called Chilenfu (Kin-ling), whose walls had a circuit of 40 miles, by Friar Odoric (c. 1323). And the province bears the same name (Chelim) in the old notices of China translated by R. Willes in Hakluyt (ii. 546).

It appears to be the city mentioned by Conti (c. 1430), as founded by the emperor: "Hinc prope XV. die rimente (i.e. from Cambalec or Peking), alia civitas Nempeats nomine, ab imperatore condita, cujus ambitus triginta miliiariaeius, aequo est popularissima omnium." This is evidently the same name that is coupled with Cambalec, in Petis de la Croix’s translation of the Life of Timour (iii. 218) under the form Nemnai. The form Lankin, &c., is common in old Portuguese narratives, probably, like Liampo (q.v.), a Fuhkien form.

c. 1520.—"After that follows Great China, the king of which is the greatest sovereign in the world . . . The port of this kingdom is called Guanten, and among the many cities of this empire two are the most important, namely Nankin and Comlaka (read Combalak), where the king usually resides."—Pigafetta’s Magellan (Hak. Soc.), p. 156.

1540.—"Thereunto we answered that we were strangers, natives of the Kingdom of Siam, and that coming from the port of Liampo to go to the fishing of Nanquin, we were cast away at sea . . . that we purposed to go to the city of Nanquin there to imbarque ourselves as rovers in the first Lanteas (see LANTEAS) that should put to sea, for to pass unto Canton . . ."—Pinto, E.T. p. 99 (orig. cap. xxxi)."

1553.—"Further, according to the Cosmography of China . . . the maritime provinces of this kingdom, which run therefrom in a N.W. direction almost, are these three: Nanquij, Xanton (Shantung), and Quincij." (Kingue or capital, i.e. Pechil.)—Barros, i. ix: 1.

1556.—"Ogni anno va di Persia alla China una grossa Caravana, che camina sei mesi prima ch’arrivi alla Città de Lanchin, Città nella quale risiede il Re con la sua Corte."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 891v.

The name of a strange weird-looking volcanic cone, which rises, covered with forest, to a height of some 2,330 feet straight out of the deep sea, to the eastward of the Andamans. One of the present writers has observed (Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 13, note) that in the name of Narcondam one cannot but recognise Narak, 'Hell'; perhaps Naraka-kundam, 'a pit of hell'; adding: "Can it be that in old times, but still contemporary with Hindu navigation, this volcano was active, and that some Brahmin St. Brandon recognised in it the mouth of Hell, congenial to the Rakshasas of the adjacent group" of the Andamans? We have recently received an interesting letter from Mr. F. R. Mallet of the Geological Survey of India, who has lately been on a survey of Narcondam and Barren Island. Mr. Mallet states that Narcondam is "without any crater, and has certainly been extinct for many thousand years. Barren Island, on the other hand, forms a complete amphitheatre, with high precipitous encircling walls, and the volcano has been in violent eruption within the last century. The term 'pit of hell,' therefore, while quite inapplicable to Narcondam, applies most aptly to Barren Island." Mr. Mallet suggests that there may have been some confusion between the two islands, and that the name Narcondam may have been really applicable to Barren Island. [See the account of both islands in Ball, Jungle Life, 397 seqq.] The name Barren Island is quite modern. We are told in Purdy's Or. Navigator (350) that Barren Island was called by the Portuguese Ilha alta, a name which again would be much more apt for Narcondam, Barren Island being only some 800 feet high. Mr. Mallet mentions that in one of the charts of the E.I. Pilot (1781) he finds "Narcondam according to the Portuguese" in 13° 45' N. lat. and 110° 35' E. long. (from Ferro) and "Narcondam or High Island, according to the French," in 12° 50' N. lat. and 110° 55' E. long. This is valuable as showing both that there may have been some confusion between the islands, and that Ilha alta or High Island has been connected with the name of Narcondam. The real positions by our charts are of Narcondam, N. lat. 13° 24', E. long. 94° 12'. Barren Island, N. lat. 12° 18', E. long. 93° 54'.

The difference of lat. (52 miles) agrees well with that between the Portuguese and French Narcondam, but the difference in long., though approximate in amount (18 or 20 miles), is in one case plus and in the other minus; so that the discrepancies may be due merely to error in the French reckoning. In a chart in the E.I. Pilot (1778) "Monday or Barren Island, called also High Island" and "Ayconda or Narcondam," are marked approximately in the positions of the present Barren Island and Narcondam. Still, we believe that Mr. Mallet's suggestion is likely to be well founded. The form Ayconda is nearer that found in the following:

1598.—"... as you put off from the Ilandes of Andman towards the Coast... there lysth only in the middle way an Ilande which the inhabitantes call Viacundam, which is a small Iland having faire ground round about it, but very little fresh water."—Linschoten, p. 328.

The discrepancy in the position of the islands is noticed in D'Anville:

1753.—"Je n'oublierai pas Narcondam, et d'autant moins que ce que j'en trouve dans les Portugais ne repond point à la position que nos cartes lui donnent. Le routier de Gaspar Pereira de los Raya indique lîle Narcadão ou Narcondam à 6 lieues des îles Cocos, 12 de la tête de l'Andaman; et le rhumb de vent à l'égard de ce point il le determine, teste quarta du nordeste, meya quarta mais para los nordestes, c'est à dire a peu-près 17 degrés de l'est au nord. Selon les cartes Francois, Narcondam s'écrit environ 25 lieues marines de la tête d'Andaman; et au lieu de prendre plus du nord, cette île baisse vers le sud d'une fraction de degré plus ou moins considérable selon différentes cartes."—D'Anville, Belairc, 141-142.

I may add that I find in a French map of 1701 (Carte Marine depuis Surat jusqu'au Detroit de Malaca, par le Père P. P. Tachard) we have, in the (approximately) true position of Narcondam, Isle Haute, whilst an islet without name appears in the approximate position of Barren Island.

NARD, s. The rhizome of the plant Nardostachys Jatamansi, D.C., a native of the loftier Himâlaya (allied to Valerian). This is apparently an Indian word originally, but, as we have it, it has come from the Skt. nalâda through Semitic media, whence... the change of i into r; and in this form it is found both in Hebrew and Greek. [Prof. Skeat gives: "F. nard, L. nardus. Greek ναρδός, Pers. nár, (whence Skt. nalada), spikenard. (nádà, a reed")] The plant was first identified in modern times by Sir W. Jones. See in Canticles, i. 12, and iv. 13, 14.

From the River of Rogues, the Starboard Shore, with a great Ship, ought to be kept close aboard down to the Channel Trees, for in the Offing lies the Grand middle Ground...” — English Pilot, p. 57.

NARSINGA, n.p. This is the name most frequently applied in the 16th and 17th centuries to the kingdom in Southern India, otherwise termed Vijayanagara or Bissarag (q.v.), the latest powerful Hindu kingdom in the Peninsula. This kingdom was founded on the ruins of the Belâla dynasty reigning at Dwâra Samudra, about A.D. 1341 [see Rice, Mysore, i. 344 seqq.]. The original dynasty of Vijayanagara became extinct about 1487, and was replaced by Narasipha, a prince of Telugu origin, who reigned till 1508. He was therefore reigning at the time of the first arrival of the Portuguese, and the name of Narsinga, which they learned to apply to the kingdom from his name, continued to be applied to it for nearly two centuries.

1605. — "Hasse notizia dei maggiori Re che hanno nell’India, che è il Re de Marsin, indiano senti; confina in Estrema- mudura con il regno de Comg (qu. regno Decumaj), l’al qual Re si è Moro. Èl qual Re de Marsin tiene grando regno; sarà (hara!) ad ogni suo comando 10 mila elefanti, 50 mila cavalli, e infinito numero di genti." — Leonardo Ca’ Maser, 56.

1610. — "The Governor . . . learning of the embassy which the King of Birnega was sending to Cananore to the Viceroy, to offer firm friendship, he was most desirous to make alliance and secure peace . . . principally because the kingdom of Narsinga extends in the interior from above Calecut and from the Balagata as far as Cambaya, and thus if we had any wars in those countries by sea, we might by land have the most easy aid from the King of Bisinga." — Corre, ii. 30.

1516. — "45 leagues from these mountains inland, there is a very large city which is called Bijansguer, very populous. . . . The King of Narsinga always resides there." — Barbosa, 86.

C. 1538. — "And she (the Queen of Onor) swore to him by the golden sandals of her pagod that she would rejoice as much should God give him the victory over them (the Turks) as if the King of Narsinga, whose slave she was, should place her at table with his wife." — F. Mendes Pinto, ch. ix.; see also Cogan, p. 11.

1558. — "And they had learned besides from a Friar who had come from Narsinga to stay at Cananor, how that the King of Narsinga, who was as it were an Emperor of the Gentiles of India in state and riches, was appointing ambassadors to send him . . ." — Barros, i. viii. 9.

By Burton:

"Narsinga's Kingdom, with her rich display Of gold and gems, but poor in martial vein . . ."

1580. — "In the Kingdom of Narsinga to this day, the wives of their priests are buried alive with the bodies of their husbands; all other wives are burnt at their husbands' funerals." — Montaigne, by Coton, ch. xiv. (What is here said about priests applies to Lingaira, q.v.).

1611. — . . . the Dutch President on the coast of Coromandel, shewed us a Cruise (see GOWLE) from the King of Narsinga, Wenceslat, Raia, wherein was granted that it should not be lawful for any one that came out of Europe to trade there, but such as brought Prince Maurices his Patent, and therefore desired our departure." — P. W. Floris, in Purchas, i. 320.

1681. — "Coromandel. Ciudad muy grande, sujeta al Rey de Narsinga, el qual Reyno e llamado por otre nombre Dinaga." — Martínez de la Fuente, Compendio, 16.

NASSICK, n.p. Nasik; Narsis of Ptolemy (vii. 63); an ancient city of Hindu sanctity on the upper course of the Godavury R., and the headquarter of a district of the same name in the Bombay Presidency. A curious discussion took place at the R. Geog. Society in 1867, arising out of a paper by Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Campbell, in which the selection of a capital for British India was determined on logical principles in favour of Nassick. But logic does not decide the site of capitals, though government by logic is quite likely to lose India. Certain highly elaborated magic squares and magic cubes, investigated by the Rev. A. H. Frost (Cambridge Math. Jour., 1887) have been called by him Nasik squares, and Nasik cubes, from his residence in that ancient place (see Encyc. Britan. 9th ed. xvi. 215).

NAT, s. Burmese ndt, [apparently from Skt. ndtha, 'lord']; a term applied to all spiritual beings, angels, elf, demons, or what not, including the gods of the Hindus.

1870. — "Indeed, with the country population of Pegu the worship, or it should rather be said the propitiating of the 'Nāt' or spirits, enters into every act of their ordinary life, and Buddha's doctrine seems kept for sacred days and their visits to the kyoung (monastery) or to the pagoda." — Forbes, British Burma, 222.

NAUND, s. Hind. ndnd. A coarse earthen vessel of large size, resembling in shape an inverted bee-hive, and useful for many economic and domestic purposes. The dictionary definition in Fallon, 'an earthen trough,' conveys an erroneous idea.

1832. — "The ghuri (see GHRIBBY), or copper cup, floats usually in a vessel of coarse red pottery filled with water, called a Nān." — Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 260.

1899. — "To prevent the crickets from wandering away when left, I had a large earthen pan placed over them upside down. These pans are termed ndnds. They are made of the coarsest earthenware, and are very capacious. Those I used were nearly a yard in diameter and about eighteen inches deep."—Thornhill, Haunts and Hobbies of an Indian Official, 79.]

NAUTCH. s. A kind of ballet-dance performed by women; also any kind of stage entertainment; an European ballet. Hind. and Mahr. nātch, from Skt. nṛtā, dancing and stage-playing, through Prakrit nātchā. The word is in European use all over India. [A pugly nauch (see POGGLE) is a fancy-dress ball. Also see FOOTLY NAUTCH.] Browning seems fond of using this word, and persists in using it wrongly. In the first of the quotations below he calls Fifie the 'European nauch,' which is like calling some Hindu dancing-girl 'the Indian ballet.' He repeats the mistake in the second quotation.

[1809.—"You Europeans are apt to picture to yourselves a Nāch as most a attractive spectacle, but once witnessed it generally dissolves the illusion."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 142.]

1825.—"I joined Lady Macnaghten and a large party this evening to go to a Nāch given by a rich native, Boulail Mullah, on the opening of his new house."—Mrs. Heber, in Heber, ed. 1844, i. 37.

[1829.—"... a dance by black people which they call a Notch. ..."—Oriental Sport. Mag. ed. 1873, i. 129.]

... c. 1831.—"Elle (Begum Sumrou) fit enterrer vivante une jeune esclav, dont elle était jalouse, et donna à son mari un nautch (bal) sur cette horrible tombe."—Jacquemont, Correspondance, ii. 221.

1875.—
"... let there be no worst
Of degradation spared Fifie; ordained from first To last, in body and soul, for one lifelong debauch,
The Pariah of the North, the European Nautch!"
Fifie at the Fair, 31.

1876.—
"... I looked in the swarthy little lady—I swear, From the head to the foot of her,—well quite as bare!
'No Nautch shall cheat me,' said I, taking my stand At this bolt which I draw..."
Natural Magic, in Faccihotto, &c.

NAUTCH-GIRL. s. (See BATADEE, DANCING-GIRL.) The last quotation is a glorious jumble, after the manner of the compiler.

[1809.—"Nāch Girls are exempted from all taxes, though they pay a kind of voluntary one monthly to a Fugeer. ..."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp., ed. 1892, p. 113-4.]

1825.—"The Nāch women were, as usual, ugly, huddled up in huge bundles of red petticoats; and their exhibition as dull and insipid to an European taste, as could well be conceived."—Heber, ii. 102.

1836.—"In India and the East dancing-girls are trained called Aīmā, and they give a fascinating entertainment called a nāch, for which they are well paid."—In R. Phillips, A Million of Facts, 322.

NAVAIT, NAITEA, NEVOYAT, &c., n.p. A name given to Mahomedans of mixed race in the Konkan and S. Canara, corresponding more or less to Moplahs (q.v.) and Lubbyes of Malabar and the Coromandel coast. [The head-quarters of the Navayats are in N. Canara, and their traditions state that their ancestors fled from the Persian Gulf about the close of the 7th century, to escape the cruelty of a Governor of Iran. See Sturrock, Man. of S. Canara, i. 181.] It is apparently a Konkani word connected with Skt. nāch, 'new,' and implying 'new convert.' [The Madras Gloss. derives the word from Pers. nāth, from Nāth, the name of an Arab clan.]

1552.—"Sons of Moors and of Gentile women, who are called Naiteas. ..."—Custantedha, iii. 24.

1553.—"Naiteas que são mesticos: quanto-as padres de geração dos Arabios ... e perparte das madres das Gentias."—Barros, i. ix. 3.

... And because of this fertility of soil, and of the trade of these ports, there was here a great number of Moors, natives of the country, whom they call Naiteas, who were accustomed to buy the horses and sell them to the Moors of the Decan. ..."
—Ibid. i. viii. 9.

... c. 1612.—"From this period the Mahomedans extended their religion and their influence in Malabar, and many of the princes and inhabitants, becoming converts to the true faith, gave over the management of some of the seaports to the strangers, whom they called Nowaytas (literally the New Race). ..."—Pirista, by Briggs, iv. 588.

1615.—"... et passim infiniti Mahometani periebantur, tum indigenae quos naiteas vocabant, tum externi. ..."—Jarric, i. 57.

1626.—"... There are two sorts of Moors, one Mesticos of mixed seed of Moor-fathers and Ethiene-mothers, called Naiteanis, Mungrels also in their religion, the other Forreneras ..."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 554.
NAZIR, a. Hind, from Ar. ndżir, "inspector" (nazir, "sight"). The title of a native official in the Anglo-Indian Courts, sometimes improperly rendered "sheriff," because he serves processes, &c.

1670.—"The Khan . . . ordered his Nazir, or Master of the Court, to assign something to the servants. . . ."—Andries, 41.

[1708.—"He especially, who is called Nader, that is the chief of the Mahal . . ."—Catrow, H. of the Mogul Dynasty, E.T. 295.]

[1826.—"The Nazir is a perpetual sheriff, and executes writs and summonses to all the parties required to attend in civil and criminal cases."—Pandwrang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 118.]

1873.—"The Nazir had charge of the treasury, stamps, &c., and also the issue of summonses and processes."—Life in the Mogul, i. 294.

1783.—"His Excellency (Navab Meer Cossim) had not eaten for three days, nor allowed his Nazir to be beaten."—Diary of a Prisoner at Paine, in Wheeler, Early Records, 323.]

NEELAM, LEELAM, s. Hind. nélém, from Port. leião. An auction or public outcry, as it used to be called in India (corresponding to Scotch roup; comp. Germ. rufen, and outroof of Linschoten's translator below). The word is, however, Oriental in origin, for Mr. C. P. Brown (MS. notes) points out that the Portuguese word is from Ar. 'idám (al-ídâm), 'proclamation, advertisement.' It is omitted by Dozy and Engelmann. How old the custom in India of prompt disposal by auction of the effects of a deceased European is, may be seen in the quotation from Linschoten.

1615.—"Pero d'Alpoem came full of sorrow to Cochín with all the apparel and servants of Afonso d'Albuquerque, all of which Dom Gracía took charge of; but the Governor (Lopo Soares) gave orders that there should be a leilão (auction) of all the wardrobe, which indeed made a very poor show. Dom Gracía said to D. Aleixo in the church, where they met: The Governor your uncle orders a leilão of all the old wardrobe of Afonso d'Albuquerque. I can't praise his intention, but what he has done only adds to my uncle's honour; for all the people will see that he gathered no rich Indian stuff, and that he deepened everything but to be foremost in honour."—Correa, ii. 469.

Letrer of Fernando Nunes to the King, Sept. 7.

1598.—"In Goa there is holden a daylie assemble . . . which is like the meeting upo the burse in Andwarpe . . . and there are all kinds of Indian commodities to sell, so that in a manner it is like a Faire . . . it beginneth in ye morning at 7 of the clocke, and continueth till 9 . . . in the principal strete of the citie and is called the Leylon, which is as much as to say, as an outroof . . . and when any man dieth, all his goods are brought thether and sold to the last penniworth, in the same outroo, who-wherever they be, yea although they were the Viceroyes goodes . . ."—Linschoten, ch. xxix. [Hak. Soc. i. 184; and compare Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 52, who spells the word Leylon].

c. 1610.—". . . le mary vient frapper à la porte, dont la femme faisant fort l'estonné, prie le Portugais de se cacher dans une petite cuve à pourcelaine, et l'ayant fait monter là-dessus, et ferme la porte bien à clef, ouvit la porte a son mary, qui . . . le laissa tremper là jusqu'à lendemain matin, qu'il fit porter ceste cuve au marché, ou il laissait ainsi qu'ils appellent . . ."—Moquet, 344.

Linschoten gives an engraving of the Rua Direita in Goa, with many of these auctions going on, and the superscription: "O Leilão que se faz cada dia pola menha na Rua direita de Goa." The Portuguese word has taken root at Canton Chinese in the form yelang; but more distinctly betrays its origin in the Amoy form le-lang and Swatow loy-lang (see Giles; also Denys's Notes and Queries, vol. i.).

NEELGY, NILGHAU, &c., a. Hind. nilgā, nilghtī, nilghtā, i.e. 'blue cow'; the popular name of the great antelope, called by Pallas Antilope tragocamelus (Portez picture, of Jerdon, Bœnelphus tragocamelus of Blanford, Mammalia, 517), given from the slaty blue which is its predominant colour. The proper Hind. name of the animal is rojh (Skt. rīṣya, or rīśya).

1663.—"After these Elephants are brought divers named Gaselles, which are made to fight with one another; as also some Mil- gaux, or grey oxen, which in my opinion are a kind of Elians, and Rhinoceros, and those great Buffalos of Bengal . . . to combat with a Lion or Tiger."—Bernier, E.T. p. 84; [ed. Constable, 262; in 218 nilgau; in 304, 377, nil-gau].

1773.—"Captain Hamilton has been so obliging as to take charge of two deer, a male and a female, of a species which is NEEM, a. The tree (N.O. Meliaceae)
Axadirachta indica, Jussieu; Hind. nimb (and nih, according to Playfair, Taleef Shereef, 170), Mahr. nimb, from Skt. nimba. It grows in almost all parts of India, and has a repute for various remedial uses. Thus poultices of the leaves are applied to boils, and their fresh juice given in various diseases; the bitter bark is given in fevers; the fruit is described as purgative and emollient, and as useful in worms, &c., whilst a medicinal oil is extracted from the seeds; and the gum also is reckoned medicinal. It is akin to the bakain (see BUCKNE), on which it grafts readily.

1563.—"R. I beg you to recall the tree by help of which you cured that valuable horse of yours, of which you told me, for I wish to remember it.

"O. You are quite right, for in sooth it is a tree that has a great repute as valuable and medicinal among nations that I am acquainted with, and the name among them all is nimb. I came to know its virtues in the Balaghat, because with it there succeeded in curing sore backs of horses that were most difficult to clean and heal; and these sores were cleaned very quickly, and the horses very quickly cured. And this was done entirely with the leaves of this tree pounded and put over the sores, mixt with lemon-juice...."—Garcia, t. 158.

1578.—"There is another tree highly medicinal... which is called nimb; and the Malabars call it Bepole [Malayil. வேப்பு]."—Acosta, 284.

[1856.—".. Once on a time Guj Singh... said to those around him, 'Is there any one who would leap down from that limb tree into the court?'

[1877.—"The elders of the Clans sat every day on their platform, under the great neem tree in the town, and attended to all complaints."—Meadows Taylor, Story, &c., ii. 85.

NEGAPATAM, n.p. A seaport of Tanjore district in S. India, written Nadai-ppattanam, which may mean 'Snake Town.' It is perhaps the Nigama Maghrdolus of Ptolemy; and see under COROMANDEL.

1554.—"From this he [Cunhall Marce, a Mahommedan corsair] went plundering the coast as far as Negapatam, where there were always a number of Portuguese trading, and Moorish merchants. These latter, dreading that this pirate would come to the place and plunder them, to curry favour with him, sent him word that if he came he would make a famous haul, because the Portuguese had there a quantity of goods on the river bank, where he could come up..."—Corry, iii. 554.

NEGOMBO, n.p. A pleasant town and old Dutch fort nearly 20 miles north of Colombo in Ceylon; formerly famous for the growth of the best cinnamon. The etymology is given in very different ways. We read recently that the name is properly (Tamil) Nār-Kolambu, i.e. 'Colombo in the water.' But, according to Emerson Tennent, the ordinary derivation is Mi-ganam, the 'Village of bees'; whilst Burnouf says it is properly Nāgā-bhu, 'Land of Naga,' or serpent worshippers (see Tennent, ii. 630).

NEGOMBAIS, CAPE, n.p. The name of the island and cape at the extreme south end of Arakan. In the charts the extreme south point of the mainland is called Pagoda Point, and the seaward promontory, N.W. of this, Cape Negrais. The name is a Portuguese corruption probably of the Arab or Malay form of the native name which the Burmese express as Naga-rir, 'Dragon's whirlpool.' The set of the tide here is very apt to carry vessels ashore, and thus the locality is famous for wrecks. It is possible, however, that the Burmese name is only an effort at interpretation, and that the locality was called in old times by some name like Ngardiridho. Ibn Batuta touched at a continental coast occupied by uncivilised people having elephants, between Bengal and Sumatra, which he calls Barasanagar. From the intervals given, the place must have been near Negrerais, and it is just possible that the term Barra de Negrerais, which frequently occurs in the old writers (e.g. see Balbi, Fitch, and Bocarro below) is a misinterpretation of the old name used by Ibn Batuta (iv. 224-228).

1558.—"Up to the Cape of Negrerais, which stands in 16 degrees, and where the Kingdom of Pegu commences, the distance may be 100 leagues."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1583.—"Then the wind came from the S.W., and we made sail with our stern to the great Island of Negrais, as in their language they call the port which runs up into Pegu."—Gasparr Balbi, f. 92.

1586.—"We entered the barre of Negrerais, which is a brave barre," &c. (see Cosmin).

—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 390.

1613.—"Philip de Brito having sure intelligence of this great armament... ordered the arming of seven ships and some sanquicels, and appointing as their commodore Paulo de Rego Pinheiro, gave him precise orders to engage the prince of Arracan at sea, before he should enter the Bar and rivers of Negrerais, which form the mouth of all those of the kingdom of Pegb."—Bocarro, 137.

1727.—"The Sea Coast of Arracan reaches from Xatigam (see CHITTAGONG) to Cape Negrerais, about 400 Miles in length, but few places inhabited..." (after speaking of "the great Island of Negrerais")... he goes on..." the other Island of Negrerais, which makes the Point called the Cape is often called the Diamond island, because its Shape is a Rhombus... Three Leagues to the Southward of Diamond Island lies a Reef of Rocks a League long... conspicuous at all Times by the Sea breaking over them... the Rocks are called the Leqarti, or in English, the Lisard."—A. Hamilton, ii. 29.

1759.—"The Dutch by an Inscription in Tenunatic Characters, lately found at Negrerais, on the Tomb of a Dutch Colonel, who died in 1607 (qu. if not 1627?), appear then to have had Possession of that Island."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 98.

1765.—"It gives us pleasure to observe that the King of the Burmahs, who caused our people at Negrerais to be so cruelly massacred, is since dead, and succeeded by his son, who seems to be of a more friendly and humane disposition."—Port William Conans, Feb. 19. In Long, 288.

[1819.—"Negragilia." See under Mun-Neefore.]

NELLY, NELE. s. Malayal. nel, 'rice in the husk'; [Tel. and Tam. nelli, 'rice-like']. This is the Dravidian equivalent of paddy (q.v.), and is often used by the French and Portuguese in South India, where Englishmen use the latter word.

1606.—"... when they sell nelli, after they have measured it out to the purchaser, for the seller to return and take out two grains for himself for luck (com superstizione), things that are all heathen vanities, which the synod entirely prohibits, and orders that those who practise them shall be severely punished by the Bishop."—Gowen, Synodo, i. 98.

1651.—"Nili, that is unpounded rice, which is still in the husk."—Rogerius, p. 95.

[1796.—"75 para of Nelly."—List of Export Duties, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 285.]

NELLORE, n.p. A town and district north of Madras. The name may be Tamil. Nall-år, 'Good Town.' But the local interpretation is from nel (see NELLY); and in the local records it is given in Skt. as Dhanya-puram, meaning 'rice-town' (Seshagiri Sastri). [The Madras Man. (ii. 214) gives Nall-år, 'Good-town'; but the Gloss. (s.v.) has nelli, 'paddy,' år, 'village.' Mr. Boswell (Nellore, 687) suggests that it is derived from a nelli cheli tree under which a famous lingam was placed.]

C 1310.—"Ma'bar extends in length from Kulam to Nilawar, nearly 300 parasaage along the sea coast."—Walsey, in Hillot, iii. 32.

NERBUDDA, E., n.p. Skt. Nar-madda, 'causing delight'; Ptol. Nâpuados; Persp. Aquamnus (amended by Fabricius to Nâmâdos). Dean Vincent's conjectured etymology of Nahr-Budda, 'River of Buddha,' is a caution against such guesses.

1020. - "From Dhahr southwards to the R. Nerbedda nine (parasang) thence to Mahrod-des . . . eighteen . . ." - Al-Biruni, in Elliot, i. 60. The reading of Nerbedda is however doubtful.

c. 1310. - "There were means of crossing all the rivers, but the Nerbedda was such that you might say it was a remnant of the universal deluge." - Amir Khwair, in Elliot, i. 79.

[1616.] - "The King rode to the river of Darbadath." - Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 413. In his list (ii. 539) he has Narbadah.

1727. - "The next Town of Note for Commerce is Barouch . . . on the Banks of the River Nerdaa." - A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 145.

NERCHA, s. Malay. nercha, 'a vow,' from verb neruya, 'to agree or promise.'

1668. - "They all assemble on certain days in the porches of the churches and dine together . . . and this they call nercha." - Gouws, Sytho, f. 63. See also f. 11. This term also includes offerings to saints, or to temples, or particular forms of devotion. Among Hindus a common form is to feed a lamp before an idol with ghee instead of oil.

NERBICK, NERBUCK, NIRE, &c., s. Hind. from Pers. nirh, vulgarly nirakh, nirih. A tariff, rate, or price-current, especially one established by authority. The system of publishing such rates of prices and wages by local authority prevailed generally in India a generation or two back, and is probably not quite extinct even in our own territories. [The provincial Gazettes still publish periodical lists of current prices, but no attempt is made to fix such by authority.] It is still in force in the French settlements, and with no apparent ill effects.

1790. - "I have written to Campbell a long letter about the nerrich of exchange, in which I have endeavoured to explain the principles of the whole system of skrofisig (see SHEOFF) . . ." - Wellington, i. 56.

1800. - "While I was absent with the army, Col. Sherbrooke had altered the nerrich of artificers, and of all kinds of materials for building, at the instigation of Capt. Norris . . . and on the examination of the subject a system of engineering came out, well worthy of the example set at Madras." - Ibid. i. 67.

[. . .] Here is established a niroo, or regulation, by which all coins have a certain value affixed to them; and at this rate they are received in the payment of the revenue; but in dealings between private persons attention is not paid to this rule." - Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 279.

1878. - "On expressing his surprise at this, the man assured him that it was really the case that the bazar 'nerik' or market-rate, had so risen." - Life in the Mofussil, i. p. 33.

NGAPEE, s. The Burmese name, ngapi, 'pressed fish,' of the odorous delicacy described under Balacong. [See Forbes, British Burma, 53.]

1856. - "Makertich, the Armenian, assured us that the jars of ngapé at Amara-pooro exhibited a flux and reflux of tide with the changes of the moon. I see this is an old belief. De la Loubere mentions it in 1688 as held by the Siamese." - Pute, Mission to Avo, p. 160.

NICOBAR ISLANDS, n.p. The name for centuries applied to a group of islands north of Sumatra. They appear to be the bapowera of Ptolemy, and the Lankha Balus of the oldest Arab Relation. [Sir G. Birdwood identifies them with the Island of the Bell (Nakta) to which Sindbad, the Seaman, is carried in his fifth voyage. (Report on Old Records, 108 ; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 368.)] The Danes attempted to colonize the islands in the middle of the 18th century, and since, unsuccessfully. An account of the various attempts will be found in the Voyage of the Novara. Since 1869 they have been partially occupied by the British Government, as an appendage of the Andaman settlement. Comparing the old forms Lankha and Nakkavaram, and the nakedness constantly attributed to the people, it seems possible that the name may have had reference to this (nañta). [Mr. Man (Journ. Anthrop. Institute, xvii. 359) writes: 'A possible derivation may be suggested by the following extract from a paper by A. de Candolle (1888) on 'The Origin of Cultivated Plants': 'The presence of the coconut in Asia three or four thousand years ago is proved by several Sanskrit names . . . The Malays have a name widely diffused in the Archipelago, kalapa, klapa, klopa. At Sumatra and Nicobar we find the name njor, nieor, in the Philippines nio, at Bali, nia, njo . . .' While the Nicobars have long been famed for the excellence of their coconuts, the only words which bear any resemblance to the forms above given are ngōdī, 'a ripe nut,' and ni-nū, 'a half-ripe nut.'"

c. 1050.—The name appears as Nakkavaram in the great Tanjore Inscription of the 11th century.

c. 1292.—"When you leave the island of Java (the Lee) and the Kingdom of Lampri, you sail north about 150 miles, and then you come to two Islands, one of which is called Noonveran. In this island they have no king nor chief, but live like beasts..."—Marco Polo, bk. III. ch. 12.

c. 1300.—"Opposite Lāmtri is the island of Lakwaram (probably to read Nālkwaram), which produces plenty of red amber. Men and women go naked, except that the latter cover their depdun with coconut leaves. They are all subject to the Kām."—Rashiduddīn, in Elliot, i. 71.

c. 1322.—"Departing from that country, and sailing towards the south over the Ocean, I found many lands and countries, where among others was one called Noonveran... both the men and women there have faces like dogs, etc..."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 97.

1510.—"In front of the before named island of Sumatra, across the Gulf of the Ganges, are 3 or 6 small islands, which have very good water and ports for ships. They are inhabited by Gentiles, poor people, and are called Noonvar (Nacabir in Lisbon ed.), and they find in them very good amber, which they carry thence to Malacca and other parts."—Barbosa, 195.

1514.—"Seeing the land, the pilot said it was the land of Minbar... The pilot was at the top to look out, and coming down he said that this land was all cut up (i.e. in islands), and that it was possible to pass through the middle; and that now there was no help for it but to chance it or turn back to Cochin... The natives of the country had sight of us and suddenly came forth in great boats full of people... They were all Cafrres, with fish-bones inserted in their lips and chin; big men and frightful to look on; having their boats full of bows and arrows poisoned with herbs."—Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. pp. 71-72.

NIGGER, s. It is an old brutality of the Englishman in India to apply this title to the natives, as we may see from Ives quoted below. The use originated, however, doubtless in following the old Portuguese use of negro for "the blacks" (q.v.), with no malice prense, without any intended confusion between Africans and Asiatics.

1539.—See quot. from Pinto under COBRA DE CAPELLIO, where negroes is used for natives of Sumatra.

1548.—"Moreover three blacks (negros) in this territory occupy lands worth 8000 or 4000 pards of rent; [they are related to one another, and are placed as guards in the outlying parts]."—S. Botelho, Cartas, 111.

1582.—"A negro of John Cabrames, Pilot to Paulo de la Gama, was that day run away to the Moors."—Castanea, by N. L., f. 19.

[1608.—"The King and people niggers."—Dancers, Letters, i. 10.]

1622.—Ed. Grant, purser of the Diamond, reports capture of vessels, including a junk "with some stoor of negers, which was devided bytwick the Duch and the English."—Sainsbury, iii. p. 78.

1755.—"You cannot afford them (the natives) more than to call them by the name of negroes, as they conceive it implies an idea of slavery."—Ives, Voyage, p. 23.

1757.—"Gli Gesuiti sono missionari e paroche de' neri detti Maialar."—Della Torre, 3.

1760.—"The Dress of this Country is entirely linen, save Hats and Shoes; the latter are made of tanned Hides as in England... only that they are no thicker than coarse paper. These shoes are neatly made by Negroes, and sold for about 10d. a Pr. each of which will last two months with care."—M.S. Letter of James Rennell, Sept. 30.

1886.—"Now the political creed of the frequenters of a dawk bungalow is too uniform... it consists in the following tenets... that Sir Mordaunt Wells is the greatest judge that ever sat on the English bench; and that when you hit a nigger he dies on purpose to spite you."—The Dawk Bungalow, p. 225.

NILGERRY, NEILGERRY, &c., n.p. The name of the Mountain Peninsula at the end of the Mysore table land (originally known as Malainada, 'Hill country'), which is the chief site of hill sanataria in the Madras Presidency. Skt. Nilagiri, 'Blue Mountain.' The name Nila or Niladri (synonymous with Nilagiri) belongs to one of the mythical or semi-mythical ranges of the Puranic Cosmography (see Vishnu Purdana, in Wilson's Works, by Hall, ii. 102, 111, &c.), and has been applied to several ranges of more assured locality, e.g. in Orissa as well as in S. India. The name seems to have been fancifully applied to the Ootacamund range about 1830, by some European. [The name was undoubtedly applied by natives to the range before the appearance of Europeans, as in the Kongu-Desa Rajakal, quoted by Grigg (Nilagiri Man. 363), and the name appears in a letter of Col. Mackenzie of about 1816 (Ibid. 278).] Mr. T. M. Horsfall writes:
“The name is in common use among all classes of natives in S. India, but when it may have become specific I cannot say. Possibly the solution may be that the Nilgris being the first large mountain range to become familiar to the English, that name was by them caught hold of, but not coined, and stuck to them by mere priority. It is on the face of it improbable that the Englishmen who early in the last century discovered these Hills, that is, explored and shot over them, would call them by a long Skt. name.”

Probably the following quotation from Dampier refers to Orissa, as does that from Hedges:

“One of the English ships was called the Nellegree, the name taken from the Nellegree Hills in Bengal, as I have heard.”—Dampier, ii. 145.

1833.—“In the morning early I went up the Nilgeree Hill, where I had a view of a most pleasant fruitfull valley.”—Hedges, Diary, March 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 67].

The following also refers to the Orissa Hills:

1752.—“Weavers of Balasore complain of the great scarcity of rice and provisions of all kinds occasioned by the devastations of the Maharttas, who, 600 in number, after plundering Balasore, had gone to the Nelligree Hills.”—Long, 42.

NIPA, s. Malay nipah.

a. The name of a stemless palm (Nipa fruticans, Thunb.), which abounds in estuaries from the Ganges delta eastwards, through Tenasserim and the Malay countries, to N. Australia, and the leaves of which afford the chief material used for thatch in the Archipelago. “In the Philippines,” says Crawford, “but not that I am aware of anywhere else, the sap of the Nipa . . . is used as a beverage, and for the manufacture of vinegar, and the distillation of spirits. On this account it yields a considerable part of the revenue of the Spanish Government.” (Desc. Dict. p. 301). But this fact is almost enough to show that the word is the same which is used in sense b; and the identity is placed beyond question by the quotations from Teixeira and Mason.

b. Arrack made from the sap of a palm tree, a manufacture by no means confined to the Philippines. The Portuguese, appropriating the word Nipa to this spirit, called the tree itself nipeira.

1611.—“Other wine is of another kind of palm which is called Nipa, (growing in watery places), and this is also extracted by distillation. It is very mild and sweet, and clear as pure water; and they say it is very wholesome. It is made in great quantities, with which ships are laden in Pegu and Tenasserim, Malacca, and the Philippines or Manila; but that of Tenasserim exceeds all in goodness.”—Teixeira, Relaciones, i. 17.

1817.—“In the maritime districts, atap, or thatch, is made almost exclusively from the leaves of the nipas or baya.”—Raffles, H. of Java, 2nd ed. i. 185.]

1848.—“Steaming amongst the low swampy islands of the Sunderbunda, . . . the paddles of the steamer tossed up the large fruits of the Nipa fruticans, a low stemless palm that grows in the tidal waters of the Indian ocean, and bears a large head of nuts. It is a plant of no interest to the common observer, but of much to the geologist, from the nuts of a similar plant abounding in the tertiary formations at the mouth of the Thames, having floated about there in as great profusion as here, till buried deep in the silt and mud that now form the island of Sheppey.”—Hooker, Himalayan Journals, i. 1-2.

1860.—“The Nipa is very extensively cultivated in the Province of Tavoy. From incisions in the stem of the fruit, toddy is extracted, which has very much the flavour of mead, and this extract, when boiled down, becomes sugar.”—Mason’s Burma, p. 506.

1874.—“It (sugar) is also got from Nipa fruticans, Thunb., a tree of the low coast-regions, extensively cultivated in Tavoy.”—Hambur and Flüchter, 655.

These last quotations confirm the old travellers who represent Tenasserim as the great source of the Nipa spirit.

c. 1567.—“Every yerex is there lade (at Tenasserim) some ships with Verzino, Nips, and Benjamin.”—Ces. Federici (B.T. in Hakt.), ii. 859.

1668.—“Nipa, qual à vn Vino eccellenzissimo che nasce nel fior d’vn arbore chiamato Niper, il cui liquor si distilla, et se ne fa vn benuanda eccellenzissima.”—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 392v.

1583.—“I Portoghesi e noi altri di queste bande di quà non mangiamo nel Regno di Pegh pane di grano . . . ne si beve vino; which those who attain it are not only free from troubles and miseries of life, from death, illness and old age, but are abstracted from all sensation; they have no longer either a thought or a desire."—Sangermano, Burme Empire, p. 6.

1858. — "... Transience, Pain, and Unreality ... these are the characters of all existence, and the only true good is removal from these in the attainment of nirvāna, whether that be, as in the view of the Brahmin or the theistic Buddhist, absorption into the supreme essence; or whether it be, as many have thought, absolute nothingness; or whether it be,
Mr. Hodgson quaintly phrases it, the abi or the medas in which the infinitely attenuated elements of all things exist, in this last and highest state of abstraction from all particular modifications such as our senses and understandings are cognisant of."

—Yule, Mission to Ava, 236.

1869. — "What Bishop Bigandet and others represent as the popular view of the Nirvāna, in contradistinction to that of the Buddhist divines, was, in my opinion, the conception of Buddha and his disciples. It represented the entrance of the soul into rest, a subduing of all wishes and desires, difference to joy and pain, to good and evil, an absorption of the soul into itself, and a freedom from the circle of existences from birth to death, and from death to a new birth. This is still the popular educated people attach to it, whilst Nirvāna suggests rather a kind of Mohammedan Paradise or of blissful Elysian fields to the minds of the larger masses."—Prof. Max Müller, Lecture on Buddhistic Nikhism, in Trübner's Or. Record, Oct. 16.

1875. — "Nībbāna. Extinction; destruction; annihilation; annihilation of being, Nirvāna; annihilation of human passion, Arhatship or final sanctification.
... In Trübner's Record for July, 1870, I first propounded a theory which meets all the difficulties of the question, namely, that the word Nirvāna is used to designate two different things, the state of blissful sanctification called Arhatship, and the annihilation of existence in which Arhat-

"And how—in fulness of the times—it fell
That Buddha died . . .
And how a thousand thousand crores since then Have trod the Path which leads whither he went Unto Nirvāṇa where the Silence lives."
Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, 287.

NIZAM, THE, n.p. The hereditary style of the reigning prince of the Hyderabad Territories; 'His Highness the Nizám,' in English official phraseology. This in its full form, Nizām-ul-Mulk, was the title of Aṣaf Jāh, the founder of the dynasty, a very able soldier and minister of the Court of Aurangzib, who became Sūbadar (see SOUBADAR) of the Deccan in 1713. The title is therefore the same that had pertained to the founder of the Ahmednagar dynasty more than two centuries earlier, which the Portuguese called that of Nizamulco. And this occurs in the early Portuguese writings on India. It represents Nizām-ul-Mulk (see NIZAM). This was the title of one of the chiefs at the court of the Bāhmani king of the Deccan, who had been originally a Brahman and a slave. His son Ahmed set up a dynasty at Ahmednagar (A.D. 1490), which lasted for more than a century. The sovereigns of this dynasty were originally called by the Portuguese Nizamulco. Their own title was Nizām Shāh, and this also occurs as Nizamnāz. [Linschoten's etymology given below is an incorrect guess.]

1621.—"Meanwhile (the Governor Diego Lopes de Sequeira) . . . sent Fernão Camello as ambassador to the Nizamulco, Lord of the lands of Choul, with the object of making a fort at that place, and arranging for an expedition against the King of Cambaya, which the Governor thought the Nizamulco would gladly join in, because he was in a quarrel with that King. To this he made the reply that I shall relate hereafter."—Correa, ii. 623.

c. 1539.—"Trelado do Contrato que o Vio Rey Dom. Garcia de Noronha fez com Hu Niza Muxa, que d'antes se chamava His Niza Maluco."—Tombo, in Subsidios, 115.

1543.—"Isam maluco." See under COTAMALUCO.

1553.—"This city of Chaul . . . is in population and greatness of trade one of the chief ports of that coast; it was subject to the Nizamulco, one of the twelve Captains of the Kingdom of Deccan (which we corruptly call Dguace). . . . The Nizamulco being a man of great estate, although he possessed this maritime city, and other ports of great revenue, generally in order to be closer to the Kingdom of the Deccan, held his residence in the interior in other cities of his dominion; instructing his governors in the coast districts to aid our fleets in all ways and content their captains, and this was not merely out of dread of them, but with a view to the great revenue that he had from the ships of Malabar . . ."—Barros, II. ii. 7.

1563.—". . . This King of Dely conquered the Deccan (see DECCAN) and the Cuncam (see CONCAM); and retained the dominion a while; but he could not rule territory at so great a distance, and so placed in it a nephew crowned as king. This king was a great favourer of foreign people, such as Turks, Rumi, Coraçonis, and Arabs, and he divided his kingdom into captaincies, bestowing upon Adelkām (whom we call Idalcan—see IDALCAN) the coast from Angediva to Cifardam . . . and to Nizamulco the coast from Cifardam to Nogotana. . . ."—Garcia, f. 34v.

"R. Let us mount and ride in the country; and by the way you shall tell me who is meant by Nizamnāz, as you often use that term to me.

"O. At once I tell you who is a king in the Balaghāt (see BALAGHĀT) (Bagagāte for Bagadate), whose father I have often attended, and sometimes also the son. . . ."

—Ibid. f. 33v.

1586.—"Maluco is a Kingdom, and Nisa a Lance or Speare, so that Niz Maluco is as much as to say as the Lance or Speare of the Kingdom."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 172. As if Nizām-ul-mulk, 'spear of the kingdom.]

NOKAR, s. A servant, either domestic, military, or civil, also pl. Nokar-logue, 'the servants.' Hind. naukar, from Pers. and naukar-log. Also naukar-chakar, 'the servants,' one of those jingling double-barreled phrases in which Orientals delight even more than Englishmen (see LOOTY). As regards Englishmen, compare hugger-mugger, hurdy-gurdy, tip-top, high-tighty, higgledy-piggledy, hocus-pocus, tit for tat, topsy-turvy, harum-scarum, roly-poly, fiddle-faddle, rump and stump, slip-slop. In this case \textit{chakar} (see \textit{Chackur}) is also Persian. \textit{Naukar} would seem to be a Mongol word introduced into Persia by the hosts of Chinghiz. According to I. J. Schmidt, \textit{Forschungen im Gebiete der Volker Mittel Asiens}, p. 96, \textit{nukur} is in Mongol, ‘a comrade, dependent, or friend.’

c. 1660.—‘Mahmud Sultan . . . understood accounts, and could reckon very well by memory the sums which he had to receive from his subjects, and those which he had to pay to his \textit{naukars} (apparently armed followers).’—\textit{Abulhaedi}, by \textit{Descriptions}, 271.

[1834.—‘Its (Balkh) present population does not amount to 2000 souls; who are chiefly . . . the remnant of the \textit{kara nukur}, a description of the militia established here by the Aghans.’—\textit{Burnes, Travels into Bothkara}, i. 238.]

1840.—‘\textit{Noker}, the servant; this title was borne by Tuli the fourth son of Chenghiz Khan, because he was charged with the details of the army and the administration.’—\textit{Hammer, Golden Horde}, 460.

\textbf{NOL-KOLE}, s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian name of a vegetable, which is a good deal grown in India, perhaps less valued in England than it deserves, and known here (though rarely seen) as \textit{Kol-rabi}, \textit{kohl-rabi}, ‘cabbage-turnip.’ It is the \textit{Brassica oleracea}, var. \textit{caulorapa}. The stalk at one point expands into a globular mass resembling a turnip, and this is the edible part. I see my friend Sir G. Birdwood in his \textit{Bombay Products} spells it \textit{Knolkhol}. It is apparently Dutch, ‘\textit{Knolkool}’ ‘Turnip-cabbage; Choucrave of the French.’

\textbf{NON-REGULATION}. adj. The style of certain Provinces of British India (administered for the most part under the more direct authority of the Central Government in its Foreign Department), in which the ordinary Laws (or \textit{Regulations}, as they were formerly called) are not in force, or are in force only so far as they are specially declared by the Government of India to be applicable. The original theory of administration in such Provinces was the union of authority in all departments under one district chief, and a kind of paternal despotism in the hands of that chief. But by the gradual restriction of personal rule, and the multiplication of positive laws and rules of administration, and the division of duties, much the same might now be said of the difference between \textit{Regulation} and \textit{Non-regulation} Provinces that a witty Frenchman said of Intervention and Non-intervention:

‘\textit{Le Non-intervention} est une phrase politique et technique qui veut dire enfin a peu-pris la meme chose que \textit{l’Intervention}.’

Our friend Gen. F. C. Cotton, R.E., tells us that on Lord Dalhousie’s visit to the Neilgherry Hills, near the close of his government, he was riding with the Governor-General to visit some new building. Lord Dalhousie said to him: ‘It is not a thing that one must say in public, but I would give a great deal that the whole of India should be \textit{Non-regulation}.’

The Punjab was for many years the greatest example of a \textit{Non-regulation} Province. The chief survival of that state of things is that there, as in Burma and a few other provinces, military men are still eligible to hold office in the civil administration.

1867.—‘. . . We believe we should indicate the sort of government that Sicily wants, tolerably well to Englishmen who know anything of India, by saying that it should be treated in great measure as a ‘\textit{non-regulation}’ province.’—\textit{Quarterly Review}, Jan. 1867, p. 135.

1883.—‘The Delhi district, happily for all, was a \textit{non-regulation} province.’—\textit{Life of Lt. Lawrence}, i. 44.

[1615.—‘He kept himself close in a norimon.’—\textit{Cock’s Diary}, i. 164.]

1618.—‘As we were going out of the town, the street being full of hackneymen and horses, they would not make me way to passe, but fell a quarreling with my neremonears, and offred me great abuse.

"Cocks's Diary, ii. 99 ; [neremonears in ii. 28]."

1788-71. — "Sedan-chairs are not in use here (in Batavia). The ladies, however, sometimes employ a conveyance that is somewhat like them, and is called a nor-mon." — Skanorius, E.T. i. 334.

NOR'-WESTER, s. A sudden and violent storm, such as often occurs in the hot weather, bringing probably a 'dust-storm' at first, and culminating in hail or torrents of rain. (See TYPHOON.)

1810. — "... those violent squalls called 'north-westers' in consequence of their usually either commencing in, or veering round to that quarter ... . The force of these north-westers is next to incredible."
— Williamson, V. M. ii. 35.

[1827. — "A most frightful nor' wester had come on in the night, every door had burst open, the peaks of thunder and torrents of rain were so awful. ... ." — Mrs. Fenton, _Diary, 98.]

NOWBEHAR, n.p. This is a name which occurs in various places far apart, a monument of the former extension of Buddhism. Thus, in the early history of the Mahommadesians in Sind, we find repeated mention of a temple called Nawuhdr (Navihdra, 'New Monastery'). And the same name occurs at Balkh, near the Oxus.
(See VIHARA).

NOWROZE, s. Pers. nayu-ro's, 'New (Year's) Day'; i.e. the first day of the Solar Year. In W. India this is observed by the Parsees. [For instances of such celebrations at the vernal equinox, see Fraser, Pausiantis,
iv. 75.]

c. 1590. — "This was also the cause why the Nauruz : Jateli was observed, on which day, since his Majesty's accession, a great feast was given. ... The New Year's Day feast ... commences on the day when the Sun in his splendid moves to Aries, and lasts till the 19th day of the month (Farwardin)." — Ali, ed. Blockmann, i. 183, 276.

[1814. — "Their Noroze, which is an annual feast of 20 days continuance kept by the Moors with great solemnity." —
Foster, Letters, iii. 65.]

[1815. — "The King and Prince went a hunting ... that his house might be fitted against the Noroze, which began the first Nuew Moon in March." — Sir T. Roe, Hak.
Soc. i. 188 ; also see 142.]

1668. — "There are two Festivals which are celebrated in this place with extraordinary ceremonies; one whereof is that of the first day of the year, which, with the Persians, they call Nauruz, Nauroz, or Norroz, which signifies nine days, though now it lasts eighteen at least, and it falls at the moment that the Sun enters Aries." — Mandelslo, 41.

1673. — "On the day of the Vernal Equinoz, we returned to Gombroon, when the Moors introduced their New-Year 8ede (see EED) or Nau Ros, with Banqueting and great Solennity." — Fryer, 306.

1712. — "Restat Nauruz, i.e. vertentis anni initium, incidentis in dieum aquinoctii vern. Non legalis est, sed ab antiquis Persis haereditate accepta festivitas, comium caeterarum maxima et sollemnissima."
— Kaempfer, Am. Eztot. 162.

1815. — "Jemahed also introduced the solar year; and ordered the first day of it, when the sun entered Aries, to be celebrated by a splendid festival. It is called Naurroz, or new year's day, and is still the great festival in Persia." — Malcolm, H. of Persia,
i. 17.

1892. — "Nou-roz (new year's day) is a festival or seed of no mean importance in the estimation of Musulman society. ... .
The trays of presents prepared by the ladies for their friends are tastefully set out, and the work of many days' previous arrangement. Eggs are boiled hard, some of these are stained in colours resembling our mottled papers; others are neatly painted in figures and devices; many are ornamented with gilding; every lady owning hers & peculiar taste in the prepared eggs for nou-roz." — Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, _Obs. on the Musulmons of India, 283-4.

NOWSHADDER, s. Pers. naushadar (Skt. naravndra, but recent), Sal-ammoniac, i.e. chloride of ammonium.

C. 1300. — We find this word in a mediival list of articles of trade contained in Campion's Memorias de Barcelona (ii. App.
74) under the form naxadr.

1345. — "Sal ammoniac, cioè liacdrro, e non si dà macro ne cas becomes en oem." — Pegolotti, p. 17 ; also see 57, &c.

[1834. — "Sal ammoniac (nowshadar) is found in its native state among the hills near Juzzak." — Burnes, Travels into Bokhara,
i. 168.]

NUDEEBA RIVERS, n.p. See under HOOGLY RIVER, of which these are branches, intersecting the Noside District. In order to keep open navigation by the directest course from the Ganges to Calcutta, much labour is, or was, annually expended, under a special officer, in endeavouring during the dry season to maintain sufficient depth in these channels.
This is the form used in olden times, and even now not obsolete, for the name of the ancient fortress in the Punjab Himalayas which we now usually know by the name of Kot-kāngra, both being substantially the same name, Nagarkot, 'the fortress town,' or Kot-kā-nagara, 'the town of the fortress.' [If it be implied that Kāngra is a corruption of Kot-kā-nagara, the idea may be dismissed as a piece of folk-etymology. What the real derivation of Kāngra is is unknown. One explanation is that it represents the Hind. khankhara, 'dried up, shrivelled.'] In yet older times, and in the history of Mahmud of Ghazni, it is styled Bhim-nagar. The name Nagarkot is sometimes used by older European writers to designate the Himalayan mountains.

1008.—"The Sultan himself (Mahmūd) joined in the pursuit, and went after them as far as the fort called Bhim-nagār, which is very strong, situated on the promontory of a lofty hill, in the midst of impassable waters."—Al-'Ubi, in Elliot, i. 34.

1837.—"When the sun was in Cancer, the King of the time (Mohammed Tughlaq) took the stone fort of Nagarkot in the year 738. . . . It is placed between rivers like the pupil of an eye . . . and is so impregnable that neither Sikandar nor Dara were able to take it."—Boudri-i-chāch, ibid. iii. 570.

c. 1370.—"Sultan Firoz . . . marched with his army towards Nagarkot, and passing by the valleys of Nathakh-nuhgarhi, he arrived with his army at Nagarkot, which he found to be very strong and secure. The idol Jwālnukhi (see JOWAILLA MOOHREE), much worshiped by the infidels, was situated in the road to Nagarkot. . . ."—Shams-i-Sirāj, ibid. iii. 317-318.

1398.—"When I entered the valley on that side of the Siwalik, information was brought to me about the town of Nagarkot, which is a large and important town of Hindustan, and situated in these mountains. The distance was 30 kos, but the road lay through jungles, and over lofty and rugged hills."—Autobiog. of Timur, ed. 405.

1553.—"But the sources of these rivers (Indus and Janghe) though they burst forth separately in the mountains which Ptolemy calls Imaus, and which the natives call Delanger and Nagrooet, yet are these mountains so closely joined that it seems as if they sought to hide these springs."—Barro, i. iv. 7.

c. 1590.—"Nagarkote is a city situated upon a mountain, with a fort called Kangar. In the vicinity of this city, upon a lofty mountain, is a place called Mahamesh (Mahāmaya) which is considered as one of the works of the Divinity, and come in pil-grimage to it from great distances, thereby obtaining the accomplishment of their wishes. It is most wonderful that in order to effect this, they cut out their tongues, which grow again in the course of two or three days."—Ayesa, ed. Gladwin, ii. 119; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 312].

1609.—"Bordering to him is another great Raiauw called Tuluck Chand, whose chief City is Nagrooet, 80 c. from Lahor, and as much from Syrinas, in which City is a famous Pagod, called Ita or Duryga, unto which worldes of People resort out of all parts of India . . . Divers Moreas also return to this Peer. . . ."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 438.

1816.—"27. Nagra Cutt, the chiefie Cite so called. . . ."—Terry, in Purchas, ii.; [ed. 1777, p. 82].

[c. 1617.—"Nakarkutt."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 534.]

1676.—"The caravans being arriv'd at the foot of the Mountains which are call'd at this day by the name of Nagrooet, abundance of people come from all parts of the Mountain, the greatest part whereof are women and maid's, who agree with the Merchants to carry them, their Goods and provision cross the Mountains. . . ."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 183; [ed. Ball, ii. 293].

1788.—"Kote Kangrah, the fortress belonging to the famous temple of Nagrooet, is given at 49 royal cosses, equal to 99 G. miles, from Sirhind (northward)."—Renouell, Memoir, ed. 1793, p. 107.

1809.—"At Patancoote, where the Padshah (so the Sikhs call Runjeet) is at present engaged in preparations and negotiations for the purpose of obtaining possession of Cote Caungrah (or Nagar Cote), which place is besieged by the Raja of Nepal. . . ."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 217.

NUJEEB, s. Hind. from Ar. najib, 'noble.' A kind of half-disciplined infantry soldiers under some of the native Governments; also at one time a kind of militia under the British; receiving this honorary title as being gentlemen volunteers.

[c. 1790.—"There were 1000 men, nudjeaves, sword men. . . ." Evidence of Sheikh Mohammed, quoted by Mr. Plumer, in Trial of W. Hastings, in Bond, iii. 393.]

1796.—"The Nudjees are Matchlock men. . . ."—W. A. Tom, A Letter on the Maharatta People, Bombay, 1798, p. 60.]

1813.—"There are some corps (Maharatta) styled Nujeeb or men of good family. . . . These are foot soldiers invariably armed with a sabre and matchlock, and having adopted some semblance of European discipline are much respected."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 46; [2nd ed. i. 343].

NULLAH, s. Hind. māla. A watercourse; not necessarily a dry watercourse, though this is perhaps more frequently indicated in the Anglo-Indian bridge over Shinga nullah.”-Carracciole, the bank of the nullah with advantage.”

—Wellingtton, Despatches, i. 26.
1817.—“On the same evening, as soon as dark, the party which was destined to open the trenches marched to the chosen spot, and before daylight formed a nullah . . .
to a large parallel.”—Mill's Hist. v. 377.
1843.—“Our march tardy because of the nullahs. Watercourses is the right name, but we get here a slip-slop war of writing the depth of the rains.”—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 574.
NUMDA, NUMNA, s. Hind.
namā, namā, from Pers. namad, [Skt. namata]. Felt; sometimes a woollen saddle-cloth, properly made of felt. The word is perhaps the same as Ar. namat, 'a coverlet,' spread on the seat of a sovereign, &c.
[1774.—“The apartment was full of people seated on Namats (sulks of camel hair) spread round the sides of the room . . .”— Hawsoy, Hist. Account of British Trade,
i. 226.] 1815.—“That chief (Temugin or Chingiz), we are informed, after addressing the Khans in an eloquent harangue, was seated upon a black felt or nummad, and reminded of the importance of the duties to which he was called.”—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 410.
[1819.—“A Kattie throws a numda on his mare.”—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 279.] 1828.—“In a two-poled tent of a great size, and lined with yellow woollen stuff of Europe, sat Nader Kooloe Khan, upon a course numud . . .”—The Kuzzibaksh, l. 264.
[1850.—“The natives use (for their tents) a sort of woollen stuff, about half an inch thick, called 'numda.' . . . By the bye, this word 'numda' is said to be the origin of the word nomade, because the nomade tribes used the same material for their tents”

NUMERICAL AFFIXES, COefficients, or determin-atives.* What is meant by these expressions can perhaps be best elucidated by an extract from the Malay Grammar of the late venerable John Crawford:
“In the enumeration of certain objects, the Malay has a peculiar idiom which, as far as I know, does not exist in any other language of the Archipelago. It is of the same nature as the word 'head,' as we use it in the tale of cattle, or 'sail' in the enumeration of ships; but in Malay it extends to many familiar objects. Alat, of which the original meaning has not been ascertained, is applied to such tenuous objects as leaves, grasses, &c.; Batang, meaning 'stem,' or 'trunk,' to trees, logs, spears, and javelins; Rantak, of which the meaning has not been ascertained, to such objects as rings; Bidang, which means 'spreading' or 'spacious,' to mats, carpets, thatch, sails, skins, and hides; Biji, 'seeds,' to corn, seeds, stones, pebbles, gems, eggs, the eyes of animals, lamps, and candlesticks,” and so on. Crawford names 8 or 9 other terms, one or other of which is always used in company with the numeral, in enumerating different classes of objects, as if, in English, idiom should compel us to say 'two stems of spears,' 'four spreads of carpets,' 'six corns of diamonds.' As a matter of fact we do speak of 20 head of cattle, 10 file of soldiers, 100 sail of ships, 20 pieces of cannon, a dozen stand of rifles. But still the practice is in none of these cases obligatory, it is technical and exceptional; inasmuch that I remember, when a boy, in old Reform-Bill days, and when disturbances were expected in a provincial town, hearing it stated by a well-informed lady that a great proprietress in the neighbourhood was so alarmed that she had ordered from town a whole stand of muskets!
To some small extent the idiom occurs also in other European languages.

* Other terms applied have been Numeral, Quantitative Auxiliaries, Numeral Auxiliaries.
Segregatives, &c.
NUMERICAL AFFIXES. 633

including French and German. Of French I don't remember any example now except tles (de betail), nor of German except Stück, which is, however, almost as universal as the Chinese *piec*ey. A quaint example dwells in my memory of a German courier, who, when asked whether he had any employer at the moment, replied: 'Ja freilich! dreizehn Stück Amerikaner!'

The same peculiar idiom that has been described in the extract from Crawfurd as existing in Malay, is found also in Burmese. The Burmese affixes seem to be more numerous, and their classification to be somewhat more arbitrary and sophisticated. Thus oot, a root implying 'chief' or 'first,' is applied to kings, divinities, priests, &c.; Yauk (a male) to rational beings not divine; Gaung (a brute beast) to irrational beings; Pyā (the) implying superficial extent, to dollars, countries, dishes, blankets, &c.; Lun, implying rotundity, to eggs, loaves, bottles, cups, toes, fingers, candles, bamboo, hands, feet, &c.; Tsong and Gyaung, 'extension in a straight line,' to rods, lines, spears, roads, &c.

The same idiom exists in Siamese, and traces of it appear in some of the vocabularies that have been collected of tribes on the frontier of China and Tibet, indicated by the fact that the numerals in such vocabularies in various instances show identity of origin in the essential part of the numeral, whilst a different aspect is given to the whole word by a variation in what appears to be the numerical affix* (or what Mr. Brian Hodgson calls the 'servile affix'). The idiom exists in the principal vernaculars of China itself, and it is a transfer of this idiom from Chinese dialects to Pigeon-English which has produced the *piec*ey, which in that quaint jargon seems to be used as the universal numerical affix ('Two *piec*ey cooly,' "three *piec*ey dollar," &c.).

This one pigeon phrase represents scores that are used in the vernaculars. For in some languages the system has taken what seems an extravagant development, which must form a great difficulty in the acquisition of colloquial use by foreigners. Some approximate statistics on this subject will be given below.

The idiom is found in Japanese and Corean, but it is in these cases possibly not indigenous, but an adoption from the Chinese.

It is found in several languages of Central America, i.e. the Quiché of Guatemala, the Nahault of Mexico Proper; and in at least two other languages (Tep and Pirinda) of the same region. The following are given as the coefficients or determinatives chiefly used in the (Nahault or) Mexican. Compare them with the examples of Malay and Burmese usage already given:

Tell (a stone) used for roundish or cylindrical objects; e.g. eggs, beans, cacao beans, cherries, prickly-pears, Spanish loaves, &c., also for books, and fowls:

Pantli (?) for long rows of persons and things; also for walls and furrows:

Tlamantli (from mama, to spread on the ground), for shoes, dishes, basins, paper, &c., also for speeches and sermons:

Oloti (maize-grains) for ears of maize, cacao-pods, bananas: also for flint arrow-heads (see W. v. Humboldt, Kawi-Sprache, ii. 265).

I have, by the kind aid of my friend Professor Terrien de la Couperie, compiled a list of nearly fifty languages in which this curious idiom exists. But it takes up too much space to be inserted here. I may, however, give his statistics of the number of such determinatives, as assigned in the grammars of some of these languages in Chinese vernaculars, from 33 in the Shanghai vernacular to 110 in that of Fuchau. In Corean, 12; in Japanese, 16; in Annamite, 106; in Siamese, 24; in Shan, 42; in Burmese, 40; in Malay and Javanese, 19.

If I am not mistaken, the propensity to give certain technical and appropriated titles to couples of certain beasts and birds, which had such an extensive development in old English sporting phraseology, and still partly survives, had its root in the same state of mind, viz. difficulty in grasping the idea of abstract numbers, and a dislike to their use. Some light to me was, many years ago, thrown upon this feeling, and on the origin of the idiom of which we have been speaking, by a passage in a modern book, which is the more noteworthy as the author does not make any reference to the existence of this idiom in any language, and possibly was not aware of it:

NUMERICAL AFFIXES.

"On entering into conversation with the (Red) Indian, it becomes specially apparent that he was unable to comprehend the idea of abstract numbers. They exist in his mind only as associated ideas. He has a distinct conception of five dogs or five deer, but he is so unaccustomed to the idea of number as a thing apart from specific objects, that I have tried in vain to get an Indian to admit that the idea of the number five, as associated in his mind with five dogs, is identical, as far as number is concerned, with that of five fingers."—(Wilson's Prehistoric Men, 1st ed. ii. 470.) [Also see Tylor, Primitive Culture, 2nd ed. i. 252 seqq.]

Thus it seems probable that the use of the numeral co-efficient, whether in the Malay idiom or in our old sporting phraseology, is a kind of survival of the effort to bridge the difficulty felt, in identifying abstract numbers as applied to different objects, by the introduction of a common concrete term.

Traces of a like tendency, though probably grown into a mere fashion and artificially developed, are common in Hindustani and Persian, especially in the official written style of munshi, who delight in what seems to me, before my attention was called to the Indo-Chinese idiom, the wilful surplusage (e.g.) of two 'sheets' (fard) of letters, also used with quilts, carpets, &c.; three 'persons' (nafar) of kar-kandazes; five 'rope' (rde) of buffaloes; ten 'chains' (zanjir) of elephants; twenty 'grips' (kabsa) of swords, &c. But I was not aware of the extent of the idiom in the munshi's repertory till I found it displayed in Mr. Carnegie's Kachabri Technicalities, under the head of Muñçvara (Idioms or Phrases). Besides those just quoted, we there find 'adhād ('number') used with coins, utensils, and sleeveless garments; adna ('grain') with pearls and coral beads; das ('hand') with falcons, &c., shields, and robes of honour; jild (volume, lit. 'skin') with books; muhār ('nose-bit') with camels; kīta ('portion,' piecey) with precious stones, gardens, tanks, fields, letters; manzil ('a stage on a journey, an alighting place') with tents, boats, houses, carriages, beds, howdas, &c.; adhā ('an instrument') with guitars, &c.; silk ('thread') with necklaces of all sorts, &c. Several of these, with others purely Turkish, are used also in Osmanli Turkish.*

NUNCATIES. s. Rich cakes made by the Mahomedans in W. India chiefly imported into Bombay from Surat. [There is a Pers. word, nānhkāttī, 'bread of Cathay or China,' with which this word has been connected. But Mr. Weir, Collector of Surat, writes that it is really nangkāttī, Pers. nān, 'bread,' and Mahr. kāat, shāfr, 'six'; meaning a special kind of cake composed of six ingredients—wheat-flour, eggs, sugar, butter or ghee, leaven produced from toddy or grain, and almonds.]

[1818. — "An old fashioned nath or nose-ring, stuck full of precious or false stones." — Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 284.

[1832. — "The nut (nose-ring) of gold wires, on which is strung a ruby between two pearls, worn only by married women." — Mrs. Meer Hussian Ali, Obvs. i. 45.]

NUT PROMOTION, s. From its supposed indegestible character, the kernel of the cashew-nut is so called in S. India, where, roasted and hot, it is a favourite dessert dish. [See Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 28.]

NUZER. s. Hind. from Ar. naṣr or nasr (prop. nadhr), primarily 'a vow or votive offering'; but, in ordinary use, a ceremonial present, properly an offering from an inferior to a superior, the converse of in'ām. The root is the same as that of Navrīte (Numbers, vi. 2).

[1765. — "The congratulatory nāzīra, &c., shall be set opposite my ordinary expenses; and if ought remains, it shall go to Poplar, or some other hospital." — Letter of Ld. Clive, Sept. 50, in Verelst, View of Bengal, 127.]

* Some details on the subject of these determinatives, in reference to languages on the eastern border of India, will be found in Prof. Max Müller's letter to Bunsen in the latter's Outline of the Phil. of Universal History, i. 996 seqq.; as well as in W. von Humboldt, quoted above. Prof. Max Müller refers to Humboldt's Complete Works, vi. 402; but this I have not been able to find, nor, in either writer, any suggested rationale of the idiom.
OLD STRAIT.

OART, s. A coco-nut garden. The word is peculiar to Western India, and is a corruption of Port. orta (now more usually horta). "Any man’s particular allotment of coco-nut trees in the groves at Mahini or Girgaum is spoken of as his orta." (Sir G. Birdwood.)

1564.—"... e me praz de fazer merce a dita cidade enfatiota para sempre que a orta das ortas dos moradores Portugueses o christãos que nesta cidade de Goa... e lha... possam vender..."—Proclamation of Dom Sebastian, in Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 2, 157.

c. 1610.—"Il y a un grand nombre de Palmiero ou orta, comme vous dieriez ici de mes vergers, pleins d’arbres de Cocos, plantes bien près à pres; mais ils ne viennent qu’oiseaux aquatiques et bas. ..."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 17-18; [Hakluyt Soc. ii. 28].

1618.—"Eos naturae habitió ao longo do río de Malaca, em seus pomares e orthas."—Godinho de Eretzéia, 11.

1673.—"Old Goa... her Soil is luxurious and Campaign, and abounds with Rich Inhabitants, whose Rural Palaces are imured with Groves and Hortus."—Fryer, 154.

[1749. — "... as well Vargem (Port. vargem, ‘a field’) lands as Hortas."—Letter in Logan, Malabar, iii. 48.]

c. 1760.—"As to the Oarts, or Coco-nut groves, they make the most considerable part of the landed property."—Grose, i. 47.

1793.—"For sale... That neat and commodious Dwelling House built by Mr. William Seal; it is situated in a most lovely Oart..."—Bombay Courier, Jan. 12.

OBANG, s. Jap. Oh’o-ban, lit. ‘greater division.’ The name of a large oblong Japanese gold piece, similar to the kobang (q.v.), but of 10 times the value; 5 to 6 inches in length and 3 to 4 inches in width, with an average weight of 2564 grs. troy. First issued in 1580, and last in 1860. Tavernier has a representation of one.

[1662. — "A thousand Oehams of gold, which amount to forty seven thousand Thail, or Crowns."—Mandevile, E.T. Bk. ii. 147 (Staff. Dict.).]

[1859.—"The largest gold coin known is the Obang, a most inconvenient circulating medium, as it is nearly six inches in length, and three inches and a half in breadth."—Olfphant, Narrative of Mission, ii. 232.]

OLD STRAIT, n.p. This is an old name of the narrow strait between the island of Singapore and the mainland, which was the old passage followed by ships passing towards China, but has long been abandoned for the wider strait south of Singapore and north of Bintang. It is called by the Malays Salit Tambrau, from an edible fish called by the last name. It is the Strait of Singapura of some of the old navigators; whilst the wider southern strait was known as New Strait or Governor’s Straits (q.v.).

1727.—"... Johore Lami, which is sometimes the Place of that King’s Residence, and has the benefit of a fine deep large River, which admits of two Entrances into it. The smallest is from the Westward, called by Europeans the Straights of Singapure, but by the Natives Salleta de Bresu" (i.e. Salit Tambrau, as above).—A. Hamilton, ii. 92; [ed. 1744].
1860.—The Old Straits, through which formerly our Indians passed on their way to China, are from 1 to 2 miles in width, and except where a few clearings have been made at... with the shore on both sides covered with dense jungle... doubtless, in old times, an isolated vessel... must have kept a good look out against attack from piratical praehus darting out from one of the numerous creeks.—Cavenagh, Rem. of an Indian Official, 285-6.

A palm-leaf; but especially the leaf of the Palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis) as prepared for writing on, often, but incorrectly, termed cadjan (q.v.). In older books the term ola generally means a native letter; often, as in some cases below, a written order. A very good account of the royal scribes at Calicut, and their mode of writing, is given by Barboza as follows:—

1516.—"The King of Calicut keeps many clerks constantly in his palace; they are all in one room, separate and far from the king, sitting on benches, and there they write all the affairs of the king's revenue, and his arms, and the pay which is given to all, and the complaints which are presented to the king, and, at the same times, the accounts of the collectors of taxes. All this is on broad stiff leaves of the palm-tree, without ink, with pens ofiron; they write their letters in lines drawn like ours, and write in the same direction as we do. Each of these clerks has great bundles of these written leaves, and wherever they go they carry them under their arms, and the iron pen in their hands... and amongst these are 7 or 8 who are great confidants of the king, and men held in great honour, who always stand before him with their pens in their hand and a bundle of paper under their arm; and each of them has always several of these leaves in blank but signed at the top by the king, and when he commands them to despatch any business they write it on these leaves."—Ibid. p. 110-111, Hak. Soc., but translation modified.

1563.—"All the Gentiles of India... when they wish to commit anything to written record, do it on certain palm-leaves which they call ola... of the breadth of two fingers."—Barros, i. ix. 3.

1561.—"All the rest of the town was of wood, thatched with a kind of palm-leaf, which they call ola."—Ibid. i. iv. vii.

1561.—"All this was written by the king's writer, whose business it is to prepare his ola, which are palm-leaves, which they use for writing-paper, scratching it with an iron point."—Correa, i. 212-213.

Correa uses the word in three applications: (a) for a palm-leaf as just quoted; (b) for a palm-leaf letter; and (c) for (Coco) palm-leaf at theh. 1563.—"... in the Maldive Islands they make a kind of vessel with its nails, its sails, and its oardage is all made of palm; with the fronds (which we call olla in Malavar) they cover houses and vessels."—G. Balbi, f. 104.

1566.—"I answered that I was from Venice, that my name was Gasparo Balbi... and that I brought the emeralds from Venice expressly to present to his majesty, whose fame for goodness, courtesy, and greatness flew through all the world... and all this was written down on a olla, and read by the aforesaid 'Master of the Word' to his Majesty."—G. Balbi, f. 104.

"But to show that he did this as a matter of justice, he sent a further order that nothing should be done till they received an olla, or letter of his sign manual written in letters of gold; and so he (the King of Pegu) ordered all the families of those nobles to be kept prisoners, even to the women big with child, and the infants in bands, and so caused the whole of them to be led upon the said scaffolding; and then the king sent the olla, ordering them to be burnt; and the Decagini executed the order, and burned the whole of them."—Ibid. f. 112-113.

[1611.—"Two Ollas, one to Gimpaya Raya... "—Dunzar, Letters, i. 154.]

1626.—"The writing was on leaves of Palme, which they call Olla."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 554.

1673.—"The houses are low, and thatched with ollas of the Coco-Trees."—Fryer, 66.

c. 1690.—"... Ola peculiariter Malabaris dicta, et inter alia Pappyi loco adhibetur."—Rumpain, 2.

1780.—"He (King Alompra) said he would give orders for Olias to be made out for delivering of what Englishmen were in his Kingdom to enable them to make the voyage to the East Indies."—Capt. Ales, in D duty, Or. Rep. i. 377.

1806.—"Many persons had their Ollas in their hands, writing the sermon in Tamil shorthand."—*Buchanan, Christian Res. 2nd ed. 70.

1860.—"The books of the Singhalases are formed to-day, as they have been for ages past, of olas, or strips taken from the young leaves of the Talipot or the Palmyra palm."—Tennent, Ceylon, p. 512.

1870.—"... Un manuscrit sur ollas... "—Revue Critique, June 11, 374.

OMEDWAUR. a. Hind. from Pers. ummedwaar (*ummed, umed, ‘hope’); literally, therefore, ‘a hopeful one’; i.e. "an expectant, a candidate for employment, one who awaits a favourable answer to some representation or request." (Wilson.) 1816.—"The thoughts of being three or four years an oosmedwar, and of staying out here till fifty deterred me."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 344.

OMLAH, s. This is properly the Ar. pl. 'omalat, 'amalāt, of 'amil (see AMIL). It is applied on the Bengal side of India to the native officers, clerks, and other staff of a civil court or cutcherry (q.v.) collectively.

c. 1778.—"I was at this place met by the Omlah or officers belonging to the establishment, who hailed my arrival in a variety of boats dressed out for the occasion."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 167.

1866.—"At the worst we will hint to the Omlahs to discover a fact which it is necessary they shall keep with great solemnity."—Trenchard, The Dutch Bungalow, in Fraser, lxiii. 390.

The use of an English plural, omlahs, here is incorrect and unusual; though omlahs is used (see next word).

1878.—"... the subordinate managers, young, inexperienced, and altogether in the hands of the Omlah."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 6.

OMRAH, s. This is properly, like the last word, an Ar. pl. (Umard, pl. of Amir—see AMEEH), and should be applied collectively to the higher officials at a Mahommedan Court, especially that of the Great Mogul. But in old European narratives it is used as a singular for a lord or grandee of that Court; and indeed in Hindustani the word was similarly used, for we have a Hind. plural umarāyd, 'omrah.' From the remarks and quotations of Blochmann, it would seem that Manasādārā (see MUNUSUB-DAR), from the commandant of 1000 upwards, were styled umard-i-kabdr, or umara-i-taxdn, 'Great Amirs'; and these would be the Omrah properly. Certain very high officials were styled Amir-ul-Umard (Āin, i. 239-240), a title used first at the Court of the Caliphs.

1653.—"Il y a quantité d'elephants dans les Indes... les Omras s'en servent par grandeur."—De la Boullaye-le-Grand, ed. 1657, p. 250.

c. 1664.—"It is not to be thought that the Omrahs, or Lords of the Mogul's Court, are sons of great Families, as in France... these Omrahs then are commonly but Adventurers and Strangers of all sorts of Nations, some of them slaves; most of them without instruction, which the Mogul thus raiseth to Dignities as he thinks good, and degrades them again, as he pleaseeth."—Bernier, E.T. 66; [ed. Constable, 211].

c. 1666.—"Les Omras sont les grand seigneurs du Rioaume, qui sont pour la plupart Persans ou fils de Persans."—Thevenot, v. 307.

1673.—"The President... has a Noise of Trumpets... an Horse of State led before him, a Mirchāl (see MORCHAL) (a Fan of Ostrich Feathers) to keep off the Sun, as the Omrahs or Great Men have."—Fryer, 86.

1675.—"Their standard, planted on the battlefield, Despair and death among the soldiers sent;
You the bold Omrah tumbled from the wall,
And shouts of victory pursued the fall."—Dryden, Aurengzebe, ii. 1.

1710.—"Donna Juliana... let the Heer Ambassador know... that the Emperor had ordered the Ammaraus Eayn Ullah Chan (k.c.) to take care of our interests."—Valentijn, iv. Suratte, 294.

1727.—"You made several complaints against former Governors, all of which I have here from several of my Umbras."—Firman of Aurungzib, in A. Hamilton, ii. 227; [ed. 1744, i. 281].

1791.—"... les Omrahs ou grands seigneurs Indiens..."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chaumière Indienne, 32.

OMUM WATER, s. A common domestic medicine in S. India, made from the strong-smelling carminative seeds of an umbelliferous plant, Carum copitcum, Benth. (Psychotis copitica, and Psych. Ajovan of Decand.), called in Tamil omam, [which comes from the Skt. yamānī, yamānī, in Hind. ajvān.] See Hanbury and Flückiger, 269.

OOJUNE, n.p. Ujjayani, or, in the modern vernacular, Ujjain, one of the most ancient of Indian cities, and one of their seven sacred cities. It was the capital of King Vikramaditya, and was the first meridian of Hindu astronomers, from which they calculated their longitudes.
The name of Ujjain long led to a curious imbroglio in the interpretation of the Arabian geographers. Its meridian, as we have just mentioned, was the zero of longitude among the Hindus. The Arab writers borrowing from the Hindus wrote the name apparently Asin, but this by the mere omission of a diacritical point became Arin, and from the Arabs passed to medieval Christian geographers as the name of an imaginary point on the equator, the intersection of the central meridian with that circle. Further, this point, or transposed city, had probably been represented on maps, as we often see cities on medieval maps, by a cupola or the like. And hence the "Cupola of Arin or Arym," or the "Cupola of the Earth" (Al-kubba al-archb) became an established commonplace for centuries in geographical tables or statements. The idea was that just 180° of the earth's circumference was habitable, or at any rate cognizable as such, and this meridian of Arin bisected this habitable hemisphere. But as the western limit extended to the Fortunate Isles, it became manifest to the Arabs that the central meridian could not be so far east as the Hindu meridian of Arin (or of Lanka, i.e. Ceylon). (See quotation from the Aryabhatta, under Java.) They therefore shifted it westward, but shifted the mystic Arin along the equator westward also. We find also among medieval European students (as with Roger Bacon, below) a confusion between Arin and Syene. This Reinaud supposes to have arisen from the 'Eisvra elattcros of Ptolemy, a place which he locates on the Zanzibar coast, and approximating to the shifted position of Arin. But it is perhaps more likely that the confusion arose from some survival of the real name Asin. Many conjectures were mainly made as to the origin of Arym, and M. Sedillot was very positive that nothing more could be learned of it than he had been able to learn. But the late M. Reinaud completely solved the mystery by pointing out that Arin was simply a corruption of Ujjain. Even in Arabic the mistake had been thoroughly ingrained, insomuch that the word Arin had been adopted as a generic name for a place of medium temperature or qualities (see Jorjani, quoted below).

c. A.D. 150.—"Ουτυρια Σωκελεως Τραντατα.—Ptol. VII. i. 63.

c. 930.—"The Equator passes between east and west through an island situated between Hind and Habash ( Abyssinia), and a little south of these two countries. This point, half way between north and south is cut by the point (meridian !) half way between the Eternal Islands and the extremity of China; it is what is called The Cupola of the Earth."—Mag'udi, i. 180-181.

c. 1020.—"Les Astronomes... ont fait correspondre la ville d'Odjein avec le lieu qui dans le tableau des villes inscrites dans les tables astronomiques a reçu le nom d'Arin, et qui est supposé situé sur les bords de la mer. Mais entre Odjein et la mer, il y a près de cent yojana."—Al-Birili, quoted by Reinaud, Intro. to Abukfeda, p. coxxiv.

c. 1287.—"Meridianum vero latus Indiae descendit a tropico Capricorni, et secat sequentem circulum aequatorem Montium Maleum et regiones ei conterminas et transit per Syenem, quae nunc Arym vocatur. Nam in libro cursuum planetarum dicitur quod duplex est Syen; una sub solstitio... alia sub aequinocitiali circulo, de quâ nunc est sermo, distans per xæ gradus ab occidente, sed magis ab oriente elongatur proprie hoco, quod longitudo habitabilis major est quam medistas coeli vel terrae, et hoc versus orientem."—Roger Bacon, Opus Majus, ed. London, 1683, p. 196.

c. 1300.—"Sous la ligne équinoxiale, au milieu du monde, là où il n'y a pas de latitude, se trouve le point de la corrélation servant de centre aux parties que se coupent entre elles... Dans cet endroit et sur ce point se trouve le lieu nommé Cupola de Arin ou Cupole de Arin. Là est un château grand, élevé et d'un accès difficile. Suivant Ibn-Alaraby, c'est le séjour des démons et la trône d'Éblis... Les Indiens parlent également de ce lieu, et débifient des fables à son sujet."—Arabic Cosmography, quoted by Reinaud, p. coxiii.

c. 1400.—"Arin (al-arin). Le lieu d'une proportion moyenne dans les choses... un point sur la terre à une hauteur égale des deux pôles, en sorte que la nuit n'y empêche point sur la durée du jour, ni le jour sur la durée de la nuit. Ce mot a passé dans l'usage ordinaire, pour signifier d'une manière générale un lieu d'une température moyenne."—Livre de Definitions du Setd Scherif Zeinaldin... fils de Mohammed Djerdjani, trad. de Silv. de Sacy, Not. et Extr. x. 39.

1493.—"Ptolemy and the other philosophers, who have written upon the globe, thought that it was spherical, believing that this hemisphere was round as well as that in which they themselves dwell, the centre of which was in the island of Arin, which is under the equinoctial line, between the Arabian Gulf and the Gulf of Persia."—Letter of Columbus, on his Third Voyage, to the King and Queen. 1785.—"The City of Ugenn is very ancient, and said to have been the Residence of the Prince Bicker Majit, whose Aim is now Current among the Hindus."—Sir C. Mait, in Daily Epistle, Or. Rep. i. 283.

OOLOOBALLONG, s. Malay, Ulubalang, a chosen warrior, a champion. [Mr. Skert notes: "hulu or ulub certainly means 'head,' especially the head of a Raja, and balang probably means 'people'; hence ulubalang, 'men of the head,' or 'bodyguard.']

c. 1546.—"Four of twelve gates that were in the Town were opened, thorough each of the which suffired forth one of the four Captaines with his company, having first sent out for Spies into the Camp six Orobalangs of the most valiant that were about the King. . . ."—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 260.

1688.—"The 500 gentlemen Orobalangs were either slain or drowned, with all the Janizaries."—Dryden, Life of Xavier, 211.

1784.—(At Acheen) "there are five great officers of state who are named Maha Rajah, Laxamana (see Laximana), Raja Oolah, Oooloo Ballang, and Parkah Rajah."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 41.

1811.—"The ulubalang are military officers, forming the body-guard of the Sultan, and prepared on all occasions to execute his orders."—Marsden, H. of S. W. India, 3rd ed. 351.

OOPLAH, s. Cow dung patted into cakes, and dried and stacked for fuel. Hind. upla. It is in S. India called bratty (q.v.).

1672.—"The allowance of cowdung and wood was—for every basket of cowdung, 2 cakes for the Genta Pagoda; for Peddiggay the watchman, of every basket of cowdung, 5 cakes."—Orders at Ft. St. Geo., Notes and Eats. i. 56.

[1809. — " . . . small flat cakes of cow-dung, mixed with a little chopped straw and water, and dried in the sun, are used for fuel; they are called kundahs . . . ."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 158.]

This fuel which is also common in Egypt and Western Asia, appears to have been not unknown even in England a century ago, thus:—

1789.—"We rode about 20 miles that day (near Woburn), the country . . . is very open, with little or no wood. They have even less fuel than we (i.e. in Scotland), and the poor burn cow-dung, which they scrape off the ground, and set up to burn as we do devots (i.e. turf)."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 301.

1833.—A passage in Mr. Marsh's Man and Nature, p. 242, contains a similar fact in reference to the practice, in consequence of the absence of wood, in France between Grenoble and Briançon.

[For the use of this fuel, in Tartary under the name of argols, see Huc, Travels, 2nd ed. i. 23. Numerous examples of its use are collected in 8 vol. Notes and Queries, iv. 226, 277, 377, 417.]

(c. 1590.—"The plates (in refining gold) having been washed in clean water, are . . . covered with cowdung, which in Hind. is called uplah."—Asis, ed. Blockman, i. 21.

1828.—"We next proceeded to the Ooploo Wallee's Bastion . . . as it is most erroneously termed by the Mussulmans, being literally in English a 'Brattle,' or 'dried cowdung—Woman's Tower.' . . ." (This is the 'pri Burj', or 'Lofty Tower' of Bijapur, for which see Bombay Gazetteer, xxiii. 583).—Welsh, Military Reminiscences, ii. 318 seq.)

OOBD, OOBUD, s. Hind. urd. A variety of dal (see DHALL) or pulse, the produce of Phaseolus radiatus.

"Urd is the most highly prized of all the pulses of the genus Phaseolus, and is largely cultivated in all parts of India" (Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. 102, seqq.).

OORDOO, s. The Hindustani language. The (Turki) word urdā means properly the camp of a Tartar Khan, and is, in another direction, the original of our word horde (Russian orda), [which, according to Schuyler (Turkistan, i. 30, note), "is now commonly used by the Russian soldiers and Cossacks in a very amusing manner as a contemptuous term for an Asiatic"]). "The 'Golden Horde' upon the Volga was not properly (pace Littré) the name of a tribe of Tartars, as is often supposed, but was the style of the Royal Camp, eventually Palace, of the Khāns of the House of Batu at Sarai. Horde is said by Pihan, quoted by Dozy (Oosterl. 43) to have been introduced into French by Voltaire in his Orpheiin de la Chine. But Littre quotes it as used in the 16th century. Urda is now used in Turkesthan, e.g. at Tashkend, Khokhand, &c.; for a "citadel" (Schuyler, loc. cit. i. 30). The word urda, in the sense of a royal camp, came into India probably with Baber, and the royal residence at Delhi was styled urda-i-mu'alla, "the Sublime Camp." The mixt language which grew up in the court and camp was called zabdn-i-urda, 'the Camp Language,' and hence we have elliptically Urda. On the Peshawar frontier the word urda is still in frequent use as applied to the camp of a field-force.

OORIYA, n.p. The adjective 'pertaining to Orissa' (native, language, what not); Hind. Urya. The proper name of the country is Odra-deka, and Or-deka, whence Or-iya and Ur-iya. "The Ooryah bearers were an old institution in Calcutta, as in former days palankeens were chiefly used. From a computation made in 1776, it is stated that they were in the habit of carrying to their homes every year sums of money sometimes as much as three lakhs made by their business" (Carey, Good Old Days of Hombre. John Company, ii. 148.)

OOTACAMUND, n.p. The chief station in the Neilgherry Hills, and the summer residence of the Governor of Madras. The word is a corruption of the Badaga name of the site of 'Stone-house,' the first European house erected in those hills, properly Hottaga-mand (see Metz, Tribes of the Neilgherries, 6). [Mr. Grigg (Man. of the Nilagiris, 8, 189), followed by the Madras Gloss., gives Tam. Oottagaimdu, from Can. ottai, 'dwarf bamboo,' Tam. kay, 'fruit,' mandu, 'a Toda village."

OPAL, s. This word is certainly of Indian origin: Lat. opalus, Greek opállos, Skt. *upa khá, 'a stone.' The European word seems first to occur in Pliny. We do not know how the Skt. word received this specific meaning, but there are many analogous cases.

OPIUM, s. This word is in origin Greek, not Oriental. [The etymology accepted by Platts, Skt. āhphena, 'make venom' is not probable.] But from the Greek δρόμος the Arabs took afjīn which has sometimes reacted on old spellings of the word. The
The Opium-poppy was introduced into China, from Arabia, at the beginning of the 9th century, and its earliest Chinese name is 阿斧杨 (A-fu-yung), a representation of the Arabic name. The Arab. afyun is sometimes corruptly called afitm, of which afitm, 'imbicile,' is a popular etymology. Similarly the Bengalees derive it from afi-heno, 'serpent-home.' [A number of early references to opium smoking have been collected by Burnell, Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 113.]

ORANGE, s. A good example of plausible but entirely incorrect etymology is that of orange from Lat. aurantium. The latter word is a plausible but entirely incorrect etymology. The former word doubtless came from the Arab. nārānī, which is again a form of Pers. nārang, or nārangī, the latter being still a common term for the orange in Hindustan. The Persian indeed may be traced to Skt. ndgaraṇa, and nāranīga, but of these words no satisfactory etymological explanation has been given, and they have perhaps been Sanscritized from some southern term. Sir W. Jones, in his article on the Spokenard of the Ancients, quotes from Dr. Anderson of Madras, "a very curious philological remark, that in the Tamil dictionary, most words beginning with nar have some relation to fragrance; as narukeraṇu, to yield an odour; nārum pilēi, lemon-grass; nārtēi, citron; nārtā manum (read nārum), the wild orange-tree; nārum pani, the Indian jasmine; nārum aileri, a strong smellng flower; and nārē, which is put for nard in the Tamil version of our scriptures." (See As. Res. vol. ii. 414). We have not been able to verify many of these Tamil terms. But it is true that in both Tamil and Malayalam naru is 'fragrant.' See, also, on the subject of this article, A. E. Pott, in Lassen's Zeitschrift f. d. Kunde des Morgenlandes, viii. 114 seq.

The native country of the orange is believed to be somewhere on the northern border of India. A wild orange, the supposed parent of the cultivated species, both sweet and bitter, occurs in Garhwal and Sikkim, as well as in the Kāśī (see COSSEYA) country, the valleys of which last are still abundantly productive of excellent oranges. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 336 seq.] It is believed that the orange first known and cultivated in Europe was the bitter or Seville orange (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 111-112). From the Arabic, Byzantine Greek got nπαδσινιον, the Spaniards naranja, old Italian naranca, the Portuguese laranja, from which last, or some similar form, by the easy detachment of the l (taken probably, as in many other instances, for an article), we have the Ital. arancio, L. Latin aurantium, French orange, the modification of these two being shaped by aurum and or. Indeed, the quotation from Jacques de Vitry possibly indicates that some form like al-arangi may have been current in Syria. Perhaps, however, his phrase ab indigenis nuncupantur may refer only to the Frank or quasi-Frank settlers, in which case we should have among them the birthplace of our word in its present form. The reference to this passage we derived in the first place from Hehn, who gives a most interesting history of the introduction of the various species of citrus into Europe. But we can hardly think he is right in supposing that the Portuguese first brought the sweet orange (Citrus aurantium dulcis) into Europe from China, c. 1548. No doubt there may have been a reintroduction of some fine varieties at that time.* But as early as the beginning of the 14th century we find Abulfeda extolling the fruit of Cintra. His words, as rendered by M. Reinaud, run: "Au nombre des dependances de Lisbonne est la ville de Schintara; à Schintara on recueille des pommes admirables pour la grosseur et le gout." (244 4). That these pommes were the famous Cintra oranges can hardly be doubted. For Baber (Autobiog. 328) describes an orange under the name of Sangtarah, which is, indeed, a recognized Persian and Hind. word for a species of the fruit. And this early propagation of the sweet orange in Portugal would account not only for such wide diffusion of the name of Cintra, but for the persistence with which the alternative name of Portugals has adhered to the fruit in question. The familiar name of the large sweet orange in Sicily and Italy is portogallo, and nothing else; in Greece πορτογαλικα, in Albanian protokale, among the Kurds portoghal; whilst even colloquial Arabic has burtaban. The testimony of Massudi as to the introduction of the orange into Syria before his time (c. A.D. 930), even if that were (as it would seem) the Seville orange, renders it quite possible that better qualities should have reached Lisbon or developed there during the occupation. It was indeed suggested in our hearing by the late Sir Henry M. Elliot that sangtarah might be interpreted as sang-tar, 'green stones' (or in fact 'moist pips'); but we hardly think he would have started this had the passage in Abulfeda been brought to his notice. [In the Ain (ed. Gladwin, 1800, ii. 20) we read: 'Sircar Silhet. . . . Here grows a delicious fruit called Soontara, in colour like an orange, but of an oblong form.' This passage reads in Col. Jarrett's translation (ii. 124): 'There is a fruit called Stentarah in colour like an orange but large and very sweet.' Col. Jarrett disputes the derivation of Sangtarah from Cintra, and he is followed by Mr. H. Beveridge, who remarks that Humayun calls the fruit Sanatra. Mr. Beveridge is inclined to think that Santra is the Indian hill name of the fruit, of which Sangtarah is a corruption, and refers to a village at the foot of the Bhutan Hills called Santraburi, because it had orange groves.]

* There seems to have been great oscillation of traffic in this matter. About 1675, one of the present writers, then resident at Palermo, sent, in compliance with a request from Lahore, a collection of plants of many (about forty) varieties of citrus cultivated in Sicily, for introduction into the Punjab. This despatch was much aided by the kindness of Prof. Todaro, in charge of the Royal Botanic Garden at Palermo.

A.D. c. 930.—"The same may be said of the orange-tree (Shanjul-naranj) and of the round citron, which were brought from India after the year (A.H.) 300, and first sown in 'Oman. c. 1290.—"In the 18th of Edward the first a large Spanish ship came to Portugal; out of the cargo of which the master bought one frawl (see PRAZALE) of Seville figs, one frawl of raisins or grapes, one bale of dates, two hundred and thirty pomegranates, fifteen citrons, and seven oranges (Poma de orange)."—Manners and Household Expenses of England in the 13th and 15th Centuries, Roxb. Club, 1841, p. xlvii. The Editor designates only to say that 'the MS. is in the Tower.' [Prof. Skeat writes (9 ser. Notes and Queries, v. 321): 'The only known allusion to oranges, previously to 1400, in any piece of English literature (I omit household documents) is in the 'Alliterative Poems,' edited by Dr. Morris, ii. 1044. The next reference, soon after 1400, is in Lydgate's 'Minor Poems,' ed. Halliwell, p. 10. In 1440 we find orange in the 'Promptorium Parvulorum,' and in 1470 we find oranges in the 'Paston Letters,' ed. Gairdner, ii. 394.]

c. 1526.—"They have besides in India the naranj (or Seville orange, Tr.) and the various fruits of the orange species. . . . It always struck me that the word naranj was accepted in the Arab fashion; and I found that it really was so; the men of Bajour and Siwas call naranj ndranj" (or perhaps rather naran).—Baber, 326. In this passage Baber means apparently to say that the right name was ndranj, which had been changed by the usual influence of Arabic pronunciation into ndranj.

ORANG-OTANG, ORANG-OUTAN, &c. a. The great man-like ape of Sumatra and Borneo; Simia Satyrus, L. This name was first used by Bontius (see below). It is Malay, orang-utan, 'homo sylvaticus.' The proper name of the animal in Borneo is mias. Crawfurd says that it is never called orang-utan by 'the natives.' But that excellent writer is often too positive—especially in his negatives! Even if it be not (as is probable) anywhere a recognised specific name, it is hardly possible that the name should not be sometimes applied popularly. We remember a man in E. Bengd, dm& was seem reason to believe that Crawfurd this phcuhr of dsang (-1.1 and a Man.

1811.—I believe Crawfurd is absolutely right in saying that it is never called orang-utan by the natives. ORMUS, ORMUZ, n.p. Properly Hurmus or Hurmitz, a famous maritime city and minor kingdom near the mouth of the Persian Gulf. The original place of the city was on the northern shore of the Gulf, some 30 miles east of the site of Bandar Abbas or Gombroon (q.v.); but about A.D. 1300, apparently to escape from Tartar raids, it was transferred to the small island of Gerun or Jerin, which may be identified with the Organa of Nearchus, about 12 m. westward, and five miles from the shore, and this was the seat of the kingdom when first visited and attacked by the Portuguese under Albuquerque in 1506. It was taken by them about 1615, and occupied permanently (though the nominal reign of the native kings was maintained), until wrested from them by Shah 'Abbas, with the assistance of an English squadron from Surat, in 1628. The place was destroyed by the Persians; and the island has since remained desolate, and all but uninhabited, though the Portuguese citadel and water-tanks remain. The islands of Hormuz, Kishm, &c., as well as Bandar 'Abbás and other ports on the coast of Kerman, had been held by the Sultans of Oman as fiefs of Persia, for upwards of a century, when in 1854 the latter State asserted its dominion, and occupied those places in force (see Badger's Travels in Oman, &c., p. xxiv.).

By Burton:

"But see yon Gerum's isle the tale unfold of mighty things which Time can make or mar; for of Armuz-town yon shore upon the name and glory this her rival won." —1575.

"Touchant le mot Hormus, il est moderne, et luy a esté imposé par les Portugais, le nom venant de l'accident de ce qu'ils cherchont que c'estoit que l'Or; tellement qu'estant arrive là, et voyans le traite de tous biens, auquel le pais abonde, ils dirent Vesu esta Or mucho, c'est à dire, Il y a force d'Or; et pourso ils donneront le nom d'Ormuno à la dite ile." —A. Thou, Cosmographie Univ., liv. x. i. 329.

1588.—"Non voli lasciar di andare con gli Inglesi in Hormus a veder la fortessa, la città, e ciò che vi era in fine di notabile in quell' isola." —P. della Valle, ii. 483. Also see ii. 91.

1677.—"High on a throne of royal state, which far Outshone the wealth of Ormus and of Ind, Or where the gorgeous East with richest hand Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold." —Paradise Lost, ii. 14.

OROMBARROS, a. This odd word seems to have been used as griffin (q.v.) now is. It is evidently the Malay orang-baharu, or orang bharu, 'a new man, a novice.' This is interesting as showing an unquestionable instance of an expression imported from the Malay factories to Continental India. [Mr. Skeat remarks that the form of the word shows that it came from the Malay under Portuguese influence.]
1711.—At Madras . . . “refreshments for the Men, which are presently supplied with from Country Boats and Cattamarans, who make a good Peey at the first coming of Orombarros, as they call those who have not been there before.”—Lockyer, 28.

ORTOLAN, s. This name is applied by Europeans in India to a small lark, Calandra brachyactyla, Temm., in Hind. bargal and boger; [Skt. varga, a troop]. Also sometimes in S. India to the finch-lark, Pycrhalauda grisea, Scopoli.

OTTA, OTTER, s. Corruption of atta, ‘flour,’ a Hindi word having no Skt. original; [but Platts gives Skt. drdra, ‘soft’]. Popular rhyme:

“Attar Shekhdwati Adhā i bādhi mafi!”

“Confound this Shekhawati land,
My bread’s half wheat-meal and half sand.”

Boileau, Tour through Rajpura, 1837, p. 274.

[1853.—“After travelling three days, one of the prisoners bought some ottah. They prepared bread, some of which was given him. It gave it he became insensible.”—Law Repert., in Chev., Ind. Med. Jurispr. 166.]

OTTO, OTTER, s. Or usually ‘Otto of Roses,’ or by imperfect purists ‘Attar of Roses,’ an essential oil obtained in India from the petals of the flower, a manufacture of which the chief seat is at Gházipur on the Ganges. The word is the Arab. ‘itr, ‘perfume.’ From this word are derived ‘attar, a ‘perfumer or druggist,’ ‘attari, adj., ‘pertaining to a perfumer.’ And a relic of Saracen rule in Palermo is the Via Latterini, the street of the perfumers’ shops. We find the same in an old Spanish account of Fez:

1573.—“Issuing thence to the Cayserie by a gate which faces the north there is a handsome street which is called the Atarin, which is the Spicery.”—Marmol, Africa, ii. p. 88.

[‘itr of roses is said to have been discovered by the Empress Nūr-jahān on her marriage with Jahāngīr. A canal in the palace garden was filled with rose-water in honour of the event, and the princess, observing a scum on the surface, caused it to be collected, and found it to be of admirable fragrance, whence it was called ‘itr-i-Jahāngīri.

1759.—“To presents given, &c.

c. 1790.—“Elles ont encore une prédilection particulière pour les huiles odoriférantes, surtout pour celle de rose, appelée otta.”—Haezner, ii. 123.

1824.—“The attar is obtained after the rose-water is made, by setting it out during the night and till sunrise in the morning in large open vessels exposed to the air, and then skimming off the essential oil which floats at the top.”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 154.

OUDE, OUDE, n.p. Awadh; properly the ancient and holy city of Ayodhya (Skt. ‘not to be warred against’), the capital of Rāma, on the right bank of the river Sarayu, now commonly called the Gogra. Also the province in which Ayodhya was situated, but of which Lucknow for about 170 years (from c. 1739) has been the capital, as that of the dynasty of the Nawabs, and from 1814 kings of Oudh. Oudh was annexed to the British Empire in 1856 as a Chief Commissionership. This was re-established after the Mutiny was subdued and the country reconquered, in 1858. In 1877 the Chief Commissionership was united to the Lieut.-Governorship of the N.W. Provinces. (See JUDEA.

b. c. z.—“The noble city of Ayodhya crowned with a royal highway had already cleaned and beepsprinkled all its streets, and spread its broad banners. Women, children, and all the dwellers in the city eagerly looking for the consecration of Rāma, waited with impatience the rising of the morrow’s sun.”—Rāmdāyana, Bk. iii. 1783.—"We have received Overland the news of the taking of Havannah and the Spanish Fleet, as well as the defeat of the Spaniards in Portugal. We must surely make an advantageous Peace, however I am no Politician."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, June 1, fr. Madras.

1774. Les Marchands à Bengale envoyérent un Vaisseau à Suez en 1772, mais il fut endommagé dans le Golfe de Bengale, et obligé de retourner; en 1773 le Sr. Holford entré encore ce voit une fois, et fut ainsi le premier Anglais qui eut conduit un vaisseau à Suez. . . . On s'est déjà servi plusieurs fois de cette route comme d'un chemin de poste; car le Gouvernement des Indes envoie actuellement dans des cas d'importance ses Courriers par Suez en Angleterre, et peut presqu'avoir plutôt reponse de Londres que leurs lettres ne peuvent venir en Europe par le Chemin ordinaire du tour du Cap de bonne esperance."—Nieulhur, Voyage, ii. 10.

1776. "We had advice long ago from England, as late as the end of May, by way of Suez. This is a new Route opened by Govr. Hastings, and the Letters which left Marseilles the 3rd June arrived here the 20th August. This, you'll allow, is a ready communication with Europe, and may be kept open at all times, if we choose to take a little pains."—MS. Letter from James Rennell, Oct. 16, from Islamabad, capital of Chittigong.

1781. "On Monday last was Married Mr. George Greenley to Mrs. Anne Barrington, relict of the late Capt. William B——, who unfortunately perished on the Desart, in the attack that was made on the Caravan of Bengal Goods under his and the other Gentlemen's care between Suez and Grand Cairo."—India Gazette, March 7.

1782. "When you left England with an intention to pass overland and by the route of the Red Sea into India, did you not know that no subject of these kingdoms can lawfully reside in India . . . without the permission of the United Company of Merchants? . . ."—Price, Tracts, i. 130.

1783. "Mr. Paul Benfield, a gentleman whose means of intelligence were known to be both extensive and expeditious, publicly declared, from motives the most benevolent, that he had just received overland from England certain information that Great Britain had finally concluded a peace with all the belligerent powers in Europe."—Munro's Narrative, 317.

'The dispatch by way of Suez has put us all in a commotion.'—Bombay Courier, June 29.

OVIDORE, a Port. Ovidor, i.e. 'auditor,' an official constantly mentioned in the histories of Portuguese India. But the term is also applied in an English quotation below to certain Burmese officials, an application which must have been adopted from the Portuguese. It is in this case probably the translation of a Burmese designation, perhaps of Nekehan-dau, 'Royal Ear,' which is the title of certain Court officers.

1500. "The Captain-Major (at Melinde) sent on board all the ships to beg that no one when ashore would in any way misbehave or produce a scandal; any such offence would be severely punished. And he ordered the mariners of the ships to land, and his own Provoet of the force, with an Ovidor that he had on board, that they might keep an eye on our people to prevent mischief."—Correa, i. 165.

1607. "And the Viceroy ordered the Ovidor General to hold an inquiry on this matter, on which the truth came out clearly that the Holy Apostle (Sanctiago) showed himself to the Moors when they were fighting with our people, and of this he sent word to the King, telling him that such martyrs were the men who were serving in these parts that our Lord took thought of them and sent them a Helper from Heaven."—Ibid. i. 717.

1698. (At Syriam) "Ovidores (Persons appointed to take notice of all passages in the Runway (office of administration) and advise them to Ava. . . Three Ovidores that always attend the Runway, and are sent to the King, upon errands, as occasion obliges."—Fleetwood's Diary, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 355, 360.

[OWL, s. Hind. aul, 'any great calamity, as a plague, cholera,' &c.

1787. "At the foot of the hills the country is called Teriani (see TERRAI) . . . that and people in their passage catch disorder, called in the language of that country ul, which is a putrid fever, and of which the generality of persons who are attacked with it die in a few days. . . ."—Asiat. Res. ii. 307.

1816. ". . . rain brings alone with it the local malady called the Owl, so much dreaded in the woods and valleys of Nepal."—Asiat. Journal, ii. 405.
PADDY, s. Rice in the husk; but the word is also, at least in composition, applied to growing rice. The word appears to have in some measure, a double origin.

There is a word batty (see BATTA) used by some writers on the west coast of India, which has probably helped to propagate our uses of paddy. This seems to be the Canaree batta or bhatta, 'rice in the husk,' which is also found in Mahr. as bhatt with the same sense, a word again which in Hind. is applied to 'cooked rice.' The last meaning is that of Skt. bhaktita, which is perhaps the original of all these forms.

But in Malay padi [according to Mr. Skeat, usually pronounced pâdi] Javan. pâri, is 'rice in the straw. And the direct parentage of the word in India is thus apparently due to the Archipelago; arising probably out of the old importance of the export trade of rice from Java (see Raffles, Java. i. 239-240, and Crawfurd's Hist. iii. 345, and Descript. Dict., 388). Crawfurd, (Journ. Ind. Arch., iv. 187) seems to think that the Malay-Javanese word may have come from India with the Portuguese. But this is impossible, for as he himself has shown (Desc. Dict., u.s.), the word pâri, more or less modified, exists in all the chief tongues of the Archipelago, and even in Madagascar, the connection of which last with the Malay regions certainly was long prior to the arrival of the Portuguese.

1580.—"Certaine Wordes of the naturall language of Java ... Parse, ryce in the huske."—Sir F. Drake's Voyage, in Hakl. iv. 246.

1598.—"There are also divers other kinds of Rices, of a lese price, and lighter than the other Ryce, and is called Battie ... "—Linnaeosen, 70; [Hak. Soc. i. 246].

1600.—"In the fields is such a quantity of rice, which they call bate, that it gives its name to the kingdom of Calou, which is called on that account Batealon."—Lucena, Viada do Padre F. Xavier, 121.

1615.—"... oryzae quoque argi feraces quam Rizum incolae dicunt."—Juric, Thesaurus, i. 481.

1673.—"The Ground between this and the great Breach is well ploughed, and bears good Battie."—Fryer, 67, see also 125. But in the Index he has Paddy.

1798.—"The paddy which is the name given to the rice, whilst in the husk, does not grow ... in compact ears, but like oca, in loose spikes."—Stavorius, tr. i. 231.

1857.—"Parrots brought 900,000 loads of hill-paddy daily, from the marshes of Chaudata,—mice husking the hill-paddy: without breaking it, converted it into rice."—Turnour's Makawane, 22.

1871.—"In Ireland Paddy makes riots, in Bengal majuts make paddy; and in this lies the difference between the paddy of green Bengal, and the Paddy of the Emerald Isle."—Govinda Samanta, ii. 25.

1878.—"Il est etabli un droit sur les riz et les paddy exportés de la Colonie, excepté pour le Cambodge par la voie du fleuve."—Courrier de Saigon, Sept. 20.

PADDY-BIRD, s. The name commonly given by Europeans to certain baser species of the family Ardeidae or Herons, which are common in the rice-fields, close in the wake of grazing cattle. Jerdon gives it as the European's name for the Ardea leucoperta, Boddart, andha bagla ('blind heron') of the Hindus, a bird which is more or less coloured. But in Bengal, if we are not mistaken, it is more commonly applied to the pure white bird—Herodias alba, L., or Ardea Torra, Buch. Ham., and Herodias egregioides, Temminck, or Ardea putea, Buch. Ham.

1727.—"They have also Store of wild Fowl; but who have a Mind to eat them must shoot them. Flamingoes are large and good Meat. The Paddy-bird is also good in their season."—A. Hamilton, i. 161 : [ed. 1744, i. 162-3].

1838.—"The most common bird (in Formosia) was undoubtedly the Padi bird, a species of heron (Ardea prasinaeura), which was constantly flying across the padi, or rice-fields."—Collettwood, Ramble of a Naturalist, 44.

PADDY-FIELD, s. A rice-field, generally in its flooded state.

1738.—"They marched onward in the plain towards Preston's force, who, seeing them coming, halted on the other side of a long morass formed by paddy-fields."—Orme, ed. 1803, iii. 430.

1800.—"There is not a single paddy-field in the whole county, but plenty of cotton
PADRE. a. A priest, clergyman, or minister, of the Christian Religion; when applied by natives to their own priests, as it sometimes is when they speak to Europeans, this is only by way of accommodation, as 'church' is also sometimes so used by them.

The word has been taken up from the Portuguese, and was of course applied originally to Roman Catholic priests only. But even in that respect there was a peculiarity in its Indian use among the Portuguese. For P. della Valle (see below) notices it as a singularity of their practice at Goa that they gave the title of Padres to secular priests, whereas in Italy this was reserved to the religiosi or regulars.

In Portugal itself, as Bluteau's explanation shows, the use is, or was formerly, the same as in Italy; but, as the first ecclesiastics who went to India were monks, the name apparently became general among the Portuguese there for all priests.

It is a curious example of the vitality of words that this one which had thus already in the 16th century in India a kind of abnormally wide application, has now in that country a still wider, embracing all Christian ministers. It is applied to the Protestant clergy at Madras early in the 18th century. A bishop is known as Lord (see LAT) padre. See LAT Sahib.

According to Leland the word is used in China in the form pa-ti-li.

1541.—"Chegando a Porta da Igreja, o sahirao a receber oto Padres."—Pinto, ch. ixx. (see Ogata, p. 35).

1564.—"It was the will of God that we found there two Padres, the one an Englishman, and the other a Flemmng."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 381.

"... had it not pleased God to put it into the minds of the archbishop and other two Padres of Jesuits of S. Paul's Collidge to stand our friends, we might have rotted in prison."—Newberry, Ind. ii. 380.

c. 1590.—"Learned monks also come from Europe, who go by the name of Padre. They have an infallible head called Padre. He can change any religious ordinances as he may think advisable, and kings have to submit to his authority."—Baddon, in Blockmann's Ann. i. 162.

c. 1606.—"Et ut adeo Patres comperiant, minor exsclamat Padrigit, Padrigit, id est Domine Pater, Christianus sum."—Jarré, iii. 155.

1614.—"The Padres make a church of one of their Chambers, where they say Mass twice a day."—W. Whittington, in Purchas, i. 486.

1616.—"So seeing Master Terry whom I brought with me, he (the King) called to him, Padre you are very welcome, and this house is yours."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 564; [Hak. Soc. ii. 885].

1623.—"I Portoghesi chiamano anche i preti secolari padri, come noi i religiosi."—P. della Valle, ii. 586; [Hak. Soc. i. 142].

1665.—"(Hindu Jogi) are impertinent enough to compare themselves with our Religious Men they meet with in the Indies. I have often taken pleasure to catch them, using much ceremony with them, and giving them great respect; but I soon heard them say to one another, This Francius knows who we are, he hath been a great while in the Indies, he knows that we are the Padrys of the Indians. A fine comparison, said I, within myself, made by an impertinent and idolatrous rabble of Men!"—Berrie, E.T. 104; [ed. Constable, 323].

1675.—"The Padre (or Minister) complains to me that he hath not that respect and place of preference at Table and elsewhere that is due unto him. At his request I promised to move it at ye next meeting of ye Counsell. What this little Sparks may enkindle, especially should it break out in ye Pulpit, I cannot foresee further than the inflaming of ye dying Roome wealth sometimes is made almost intolerable hot upon other Aces."—Mr. Puckle's Diary at Methapalum, MS. in India Office.

1676.—"And whiles the French have no settlement near hand, the keeping French Padrys here instead of Portuguese, destroys the encroaching growth of the Portugall interest, who used to entail Portugalism as well as Christianity on all their converts."—Madras Comma., Feb. 29, in Notes and Incs. i. p. 46.

1680.—"... where at as at the Dedication of a New Churc'h by the French Padrys and Portugues in 1675 guns had been fired from the Fort in honour thereof, neither Padry nor Portugues appeared at the Dedication of our Church, nor as much as gave the Governor a visit afterwards to give him joy of it."—Ibid. Oct. 28. No. III. p. 37.

c. 1692.—"But their greatest act of tyranny (at Goa) is this. If a subject of these misbelievers dies, leaving young children, and no grown-up son, the children are considered wargs of the State. They take them to their places of worship, their churches... and the padres, that is to say the priests, instruct the children in the Christian religion, and bring them up in their own faith, whether the child be a Musliman sated or a Hindu brdismian."—Kham Khadas, in Elliot, viii. 345.

1711.—"The Danish Padre Bartholomew Ziesgenbalgh, requests leave to go to Europe in the first ship, and in consideration that he is head of a Protestant Mission, espoused by the Right Reverend the Lord Archishop of Canterbury . . . we have presumed to grant him his passage."—In Wheeler, ii. 177.

1726.—"May 14. Mr. Leokee went with me to St. Thomas's Mount. . . . We conversed with an old Padre from Slessea, who had been 27 years in India. . . .—Diary of the Missionary Schultze (in Notices of Madras, &c., 1858), p. 14.

1727.—"May 17. The minister of the King of Pegu called on me. From him I learned, through an interpreter, that Christians of all nations and professions have perfect freedom at Pegu; that even in the Capital two French, two Armenian, and two Portuguese Padres, have their churches. . . .”—Diary, ii. 15.

1803.—"Lord Lake was not a little pleased at the Begum's loyalty, and being a little elevated by the wine . . . he gallantly advanced, and to the utter dismay of her attendants, took her in his kiss. . . . Receiving courteously the proffered attention, she turned calmly round to her astonished attendants—'It is,' said she, 'the salut of a padre (or priest) to his daughter.'”—Skinner's J. M. M., i. 299.

1809.—"The Padre, who is a half cast Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ibid., i. 329.

1830.—"Two fat naked Brahmins, bedaubed with paint, had been importing me for money . . . upon the ground that they were padres."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, iii.

1876.—"'There is Padre Blunt for example, we always call them Padres in India, you know, makes a point of never going beyond ten minutes, at any rate during the hot weather."—The Dilemma, ch. xlix.

PADSHAWS, PODSHAWS, a. Pers. —Hind. padshah (Pers. pad, 'throne,' shah, 'prince'), an emperor; the Great Mogul (q.v.); a king.

[1563.—"Patriah." See under POORUB.
[1612.—"He acknowledges no Padishaw or King in Christendom but the Portugual's King."—Davies, Letters, i. 175.]

B. 1830.—". . . round all the room were placed tacite Mirzoes, Chaunas, Sultans, and Beglerbegs, above threecore; who like so many inanimate Statues sat cross-legged . . . their backs to the wall, their eyes to a constant object; not daring to speak to one another, sneese, cough, spit, or the like, it being held in the Potashaw's presence a sinne of too great presumption."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1688, p. 169. At p. 171 of the same we have Potashaw; and in the edition of 1677, in a vocabulary of the language spoken in Hindustan, we have "King, Potashaw." And again: "Is the King at Agra? . . . Potshawa Agramecha." (Padishak Agrat mein hai?) 99-100.

1873.—"They took upon them without controul the Regal Dignity and Title of Pedeshaw."—Fryer, 168.

1727.—"Aureng-zeb, who is now saluted Puntahaw, or Emperor, by the Army, notwithstanding his father was then alive."—A. Hamilton, i. 175, [ed. 1744].

In some degree analogous to this use is the application, common among Hindustani-speaking natives, of the Hind.-Arab. word ḍhata, 'a fence, enclosure,' occurs in the sense of 'factory' in the following passage:

1702.—"Some other out-pagars or Factories, depending upon the Factory of Bencoolen."—Charts of the E. I. Co. p. 324.

This word, the Malay for a 'fence, enclosure,' occurs in the sense of Presidency. Bombay ki ḍhata, Bangal ki ḍhata, a sense not given in Shakespear or Forbes; [it is given in Fallon and Platta. Mr. Skeat points out that the Malay word is pagar, 'a fence,' but that it is not used in the sense of a 'factory' in the Malay Peninsula. In the following passage it seems to mean 'factory stock':

[1615.—"The King says that at her arrival he will send them their house and pagars upon rafts to them."—Foster, Letters, iii. 151.]

b. (pagār). This word is in general use in the Bombay domestic dialect for wages, Mahr. pagar. It is obviously the Port. verb pagar, 'to pay,' used as a substantive.

[1875.—". . . the heavy-browed sultana of some Gangetic station, whose stern look palpably interrogates the amount of your monthly paggar."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 46.]

PAGODA, s. This obscure and remarkable word is used in three different senses.

a. An idol temple; and also specifically, in China, a particular form of religious edifice, of which the famous "Porcelain tower" of Nanking, now destroyed, may be recalled as typical. In the 17th century we find the word sometimes misapplied to places of Mahommnedan worship, as by Faria-y-Sousa, who speaks of the "Pagoda of Mecca."
b. An idol.

c. A coin long current in S. India. The coins so called were both gold and silver, but generally gold. The gold pagoda was the wardha or htin of the natives (see Hoon); the former name (fr. Skt. for ‘boar’) being taken from the Boar avatār of Vishnu, which was figured on a variety of ancient coins of the South; and the latter signifying ‘gold,’ no doubt identical with sond, and an instance of the exchange of h and s. (See also Pardao.)

Accounts at Madras down to 1818 were kept in pagodas, fanams, and kus (see Cash); 8 kus = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 pagoda. In the year named the rupee was made the standard coin.* The pagoda was then reckoned as equivalent to 3½ rupees.

In the suggestions of etymologies for this word, the first and most prominent meaning alone has almost always been regarded, and doubtless justly; for the other uses are deducible from it. Such suggestions have been many.

Thus Chinese origins have been propounded in more than one form; e.g. Pao-lah, ‘precious pile,’ and Poh-kuh-lah (‘white-bones-pile’).† Anything can be made out of Chinese mono-syllables in the way of etymology; though no doubt it is curious that the first at least of these phrases is actually applied by the Chinese to the polygonal towers which in China foreigners specially call pagodas. Whether it be possible that this phrase may have been in any measure formed in imitation of pagoda, so constantly in the mouth of foreigners, we cannot say (though it would not be a solitary example of such borrowing—see Neelam); but we can say with confidence that it is impossible pagoda should have been taken from the Chinese. The quotations from Corsali and Barboas set that suggestion at rest.

Another derivation is given (and adopted by so learned an etymologist as H. Wedgwood) from the Portuguese paga, ‘a pagan.’ It is possible that this word may have helped to facilitate the Portuguese adoption of pagoda; it is not possible that it should have given rise to the word. A third theory makes pagoda a transposition of *da-" graph that bhagavat may have had to do with the origin of the word in one of its meanings.

Now it is not possible that the word in all its applications may have had its origin from bhagavat, or some current modification of that word? We see from Marco Polo that such a term was currently known to foreign visitors of S. India in his day—a term almost identical in sound with pagoda, and bearing in his statement a religious application, though not to a temple.*

We thus have four separate applications of the word pacawat, or pagoda, picked up by foreigners on the shores of India from the 13th century downwards, viz. to a Hindu ejaculatory formula, to a place of Hindu worship, to a Hindu idol, to a Hindu coin with idols represented on it. Is it not possible that all are to be traced to bhagavat, 'sacred,' or to Bhagavat and Bhagavat, used as names of divinities—of Buddha in Buddhist times or places, of Krishna and Durgā in Brahminical times and places? (uses which are fact). How common was the use of Bhagavati as the name of an object of worship in Malabar, may be seen from an example. Turning to Wilson's work on the MacKenzie MSS., we find in the list of local MS. tracts belonging to Malabar, the repeated occurrence of Bhagavati in this way. Thus in this section of the book we have at p. xcvi. (vol. i.) note of an account "of a temple of Bhagavati"; at p. cii. "Temple of Mannadit Bhagavati goddess . . ."; at p. civ. "Temple of Mangombu Bhagavati . . ."; "Temple of Padleparkave Bhagavati . . ."; "Temple of the goddess Pannâyennar Kave Bhagavati . . ."; "Temple of the goddess Patāli Bhagavati . . ."; "Temple of Bhagavati . . ."; p. cvii., "Account of the goddess Bhagavati at, &c. . . ."; p. cviii., "Acc. of the goddess Yalanga Bhagavati," "Acc. of the goddess Vallur Bhagavati." The term Bhagavati seems thus to have been very commonly attached to objects of worship in Malabar temples (see also Fra Paolin, p. 79 and p. 57, quoted under c. below). And it is very interesting to observe that, in a paper on "Coorg Superstitions," Mr. Kittel notices parenthetically that Bhadrā Kāli (i.e. Durgā) is also-called Pogōdi, Pavoda, a tadkhāva of Bagavati" (Ind. Antiq. ii. 170)—an incident remark that seems to bring us very near the possible origin of pagode. It is most probable that some form like pogodi or pagode was current in the mouths of foreign visitors before the arrival of the Portuguese; but if the word was of Portuguese origin there may easily have been some confusion in their ears between Bagavati and but-kadah which shaped the new word. It is no sufficient objection to say that bhagavati is not a term applied by the natives to a temple; the question is rather what misunderstanding and mispronunciation by foreigners of a native term may probably have given rise to the term?—(H. Y.)

Since the above was written, Sir Walter Elliot has kindly furnished a note, of which the following is an extract:—

"I took some pains to get at the origin of the word when at Madras, and the conclusion I came to was that it arose from the term used generally for the object of their worship, viz., Bhagavat, 'god'; bhagavati, 'goddess.'

"Thus, the Hindu temple with its lofty gopuram or propylon at once attracts attention, and a stranger enquiring what it was, would be told, 'the house or place of Bhagavat.' The village divinity throughout the south is always a form of Durgā, or, as she is commonly called, simply 'Dervi' (or Bhagavat, 'the goddess'). . . . In like manner a figure of Durgā is found on most of the gold Huns (i.e. pagode coins) current in the Dakhan, and a foreigner inquiring what such a coin was, or rather what was the form stamped upon it, would be told it was 'the goddess,' i.e. it was 'Bhagavat.'"

As my friend, Dr. Burnell, can no longer represent his own view, it seems right here to print the latest remarks of his on the subject that I can find. They are in a letter from Tanjore, dated March 10, 1880:

"I think I overlooked a remark of yours regarding my observation that the e in Pagoda was pronounced, and that this was a difficulty in deriving it from Bhagavati. In modern Portuguese e is not sounded, but verses show that it was in the 16th century. Now, if there is a final vowel in Bhagavati, it must come from Pagoda! Malayalam and Tamil are full of such adopted words. Bhagavati is little used, and the goddess is too insignificant to give rise to pagoda as a general name for a temple.

"Bhagavati can only appear in the S. Indian languages in its (Skt.) nominative form bhagvati (Tamil pagn Getting). As such, in Tamil and Malayalam it equals Vishnu or Siva, which would suit. But pagoda can't be got out of bhagvati; and if we look to the N. Indian forms, bhagvam, &c., there is the difficulty about the e, to say nothing about the nt."

The use of the word by Barbosa at so early a date as 1516, and its application to a particular class of temples must not be overlooked.

1516.—"There is another sect of people among the Indians of Malabar, which is called Cuiavens [Kshavan, Logan, Malabar, i. 115]... Their business is to work at baked clay, and tiles for covering houses, with which the temples and Royal buildings are roofed... Their idolatry and their idols are different from those of the others; and in their houses of prayer they perform a thousand acts of witchcraft and necromancy; they call their temples pagodes, and they are separate from the others."—Barbosa, 135. This is from Lord Stanley of Alderley's translation from a Spanish MS. The Italian of Ramusio reads: "nelle loro elaborazioni fanno molte striglierie e necromatie, le quali chiamano Pagodes, differenti assai dall' altre" (Ramusio, i. f. 306v.). In the Portuguese MS. published by the Lisbon Academy in 1812, the words are altogether absent; and in interpolating them from Ramusio the editor has given the same sense as in Lord Stanley's English.

PADEA-TRÉE. A slang phrase once current, rather in England than in India, to express the openings to rapid fortune which at one time existed in India. [For the original meaning, see the quotation from Ryklof Van Goens under BO TREE. Mr. Skew writes: "It seems possible that the idea of a coin tree may have arisen from the practice, among some Oriental nations at least, of making cash in moulds, the design of which is based on the plan of a tree. On the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula the name cash-tree (pokho' pitis) is applied to cash cast in this form. Gold and silver tributary trees are sent to Siam by the tributary States; in these the leaves are in the shape of ordinary tree leaves."

PAHLAVI, PEHLVI. The name applied to the ancient Persian language in that phase which prevailed from the beginning of the Sassanian monarchy to the time when it became corrupted by the influence of Arabic, and the adoption of numerous Arabic words and phrases. The name Pahlavi was adopted by Europeans from the Parsi use. The language of Western Persia in the time of the Achaemenian kings, as preserved in the cuneiform inscriptions of Persepolis, Behistun, and elsewhere, is nearly akin to the dialects of the Zend-Avesta, and is characterised by a number of inflections agreeing with those of the Avesta and of Sanskrit. The dissolution of inflectional terminations is already indicated as beginning in the later Achaemenian inscriptions, and in many parts of the Zend-Avesta but its course cannot be traced, as there are no inscriptions in Persian.
language during the time of the Arsacidae; and it is in the inscriptions on rocks and coins of Ardashir-i-Papakan (A.D. 226-240)—the Ardashir Babagan of later Persian—that the language emerges in a form of that which is known as Pahlavi. "But, strictly speaking, the medieval Persian language is called Pahlavi when it is written in one of the characters used before the invention of the modern Persian alphabet, and in the peculiarly enigmatical mode adopted in Pahlavi writings. . . . Like the Assyrians of old, the Persians of Parthian times appear to have borrowed their writing from a foreign race. But, whereas the Semitic Assyrians adopted a Turanian syllabary, these later Aryan Persians accepted a Semitic alphabet. Besides the alphabet, however, which they could use for spelling their own words, they transferred a certain number of complete Semitic words to their writings as representatives of the corresponding words in their own language. . . . The use of such Semitic words, scattered about in Persian sentences, gives Pahlavi the motley appearance of a compound language. . . . But there are good reasons for supposing that the language was never spoken as it was written. The spoken language appears to have been pure Persian; the Semitic words being merely used as written representatives, or logograms, of the Persian words which were spoken. Thus, the Persians would write malkān malkā, 'King of Kings,' but they would read shahdān shah. . . . As the Semitic words were merely a Pahlavi mode of writing their Persian equivalents (just as 'viz. is a mode of writing 'namely' in English*), they disappeared with the Pahlavi writing, and the Persians began at once to write all their words with their new alphabet, just as they pronounced them." (E. W. West, Intro. to Pahlavi Texts, p. xiii; Sacred Books of the East, vol. v.).

Extant Pahlavi writings are confined to those of the Parsis, translations from the Avesta, and others almost entirely of a religious character. Where the language is transcribed, either in the Avesta characters, or in those of the modern Persian alphabet, and freed from the singular system indicated above, it is called Pazand (see PAZEND); a term supposed to be derived from the language of the Avesta, paitizanti, with the meaning 're-explanation.'

Various explanations of the term Pahlavi have been suggested. It seems now generally accepted as a changed form of the Parthian of the cuneiform inscriptions, the Parthia of Greek and Roman writers. The Parthians, though not a Persian race, were rulers of Persia for five centuries, and it is probable that everything ancient, and connected with the period of their rule, came to be called by this name. It is apparently the same word that in the form pahlaev and pahlavān, &c., has become the appellative of a warrior or champion in both Persian and Armenian, originally derived from that most warlike people the Parthians. (See PULWADN.) Whether there was any identity between the name thus used, and that of Pahlava, which is applied to a people mentioned often in Sanskrit books, is a point still unsettled.

The meaning attached to the term Pahlavi by Orientals themselves, writing in Arabic or Persian (exclusive of Parsis), appears to have been 'Old Persian' in general, without restriction to any particular period or dialect. It is thus found applied to the cuneiform inscriptions at Persepolis. (Derived from West as quoted above, and from Haug's Essays, ed. London, 1878.)

* Or our symbol (&), now modified into (&), which is in fact Latin c, but is read 'and,'"† "The peculiar mode of writing Pahlavi here alluded to long made the character of the language a standing puzzle for European scholars, and was first satisfactorily explained by Professor Haug, of Munich, in his admirable Essay on the Pahlavi Language, already cited" (West, p. xii.)
has shown the construction to have been derived from India with Buddhism (see Indian and Eastern Architecture, pp. 700-702). [So the Torii of Japan seem to represent Skt. torana, 'an archway' (see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 407 seq.).]

PÁLAGILÁSS, s. This is domestic Hind. for 'Asparagus' (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 189).

PÁLANKEEEN, PÁLANQUIEEN, s. A box-litter for travelling in, with a pole projecting before and behind, which is borne on the shoulders of 4 or 6 men—always in Bengal, sometimes in the Telugu country.

The origin of the word is not doubtful, though it is by no means clear how the Portuguese got the exact form which they have handed over to us. The nasal termination may be dismissed as a usual Portuguese addition, such as occurs in mandarin, Baqaim (Wasad), and many other words and names as used by them. The basis of all the forms is Skt. paryanka, or palyanka, 'a bed,' from which we have Hind. and Mahr. palang, 'a bed,' Hind. pálki, 'a palankin,' [Telugu pallaki, which is perhaps the origin of the Port. word]. Pali pallonko, a couch, bed, litter, or palankin,' [Childers], and in Javanese and Malay palaṅkī, 'a litter or sedan' (Owramurd).*

It is curious that there is a Spanish word palanca (L. Lat. phalangα) for a pole used to carry loads on the shoulders of two bearers (called in Sp. palanquinos); a method of transport more common in the south than in England, though even in old English the thing has a name, viz., 'a cowlestaff' (see N.E.D.). It is just possible that this word (though we do not find it in the Portuguese dictionaries) may have influenced the form in which the early Portuguese visitors to India took up the word.

The thing appears already in the Rātmāyāna. It is spoken of by Ibn Batuta and John Marignolli (both c. 1350), but neither uses this Indian name; and we have not found evidence of pálki older than Akbar (see Elliot, iv. 516, and Ain. i. 254).

As drawn by Linschoten (1597), and as described by Grose at Bombay (c. 1780), the palankin was hung from a bamboo which bent in an arch over the vehicle; a form perhaps not yet entirely obsolete in native use. Williamson (V. M., i. 316 seq.), gives an account of the different changes in the fashion of palankins, from which it would appear that the present form must have come into use about the end of the 18th century. Up to 1840-50 most people in Calcutta kept a palankin and a set of bearers (usually natives of Orissa—see ORIYA), but the practice and the vehicle are now almost, if not entirely, obsolete among the better class of Europeans. Till the same period the palankin, carried by relays of bearers, laid out by the post-office, or by private chowdries (q.v.), formed the chief means of accomplishing extensive journeys in India, and the elder of the present writers has undergone hardly less than 8000 or 9000 miles of travelling in going considerable distances (excluding minor journeys) after this fashion. But in the decade named, the palankin began, on certain great roads, to be superseded by the donkey-garry (a Palkee-garry or palankin-carryage, horsed by ponies posted along the road, under the post-office), and in the next decade to a large extent by railway, supplemented by other wheel-carriage, so that the palankin is now used rarely, and only in out-of-the-way localities.

The following is the remonstrance of the city of Goa against the ecclesiastical action in this matter, addressed to the King:

1608.—"Last year this City gave your Majesty an account of how the Archbishop Primate proposed the issue of orders that the women should go with their palanquins uncovered, or at least half uncovered, and how on this matter were made to him all the needful representations and remonstrances on the part of the whole community, giving the reasons against such a proceeding, which were also sent to Your Majesty. Nevertheless in a Council that was held this last summer, they dealt with this subject, and they agreed to petition Your Majesty to order that the said palanquins should travel in such a fashion that it could be seen who was in them.

"The matter is of so odious a nature, and of such a description that Your Majesty should grant their desire in no shape whatever, nor give any order of the kind, seeing this place is a frontier fortress. The reasons for this have been written to Your Majesty; let us beg Your Majesty graciously to make no new rule; and this is the petition of the whole community to Your Majesty."—Carta, que a Cidade de Goa escreveu a Sua Majestade, o anno de 1606. This was quite true up to our own time. In 1840 the present writer was carried on that road, a stage of 26 miles in little more than 5 hours, by 12 bearers, relieving each other by saxes.

1672. The word occurs several times in Baldaeus as Pallinkin. Tavernier writes Pallaki and sometimes Pallanquin (Ball, i. 45, 175, 390, 392); Bernier has Palasky [ed. Constable, 214, 283, 372].

1673.—"... ambling after these a great pace, the Palankeen-Boys support them four of them, at two each end of a Banke, which is a long hollow Cane...arched in the middle...where hang the Palan-keen, as big as an ordinary Couch, broad enough to tumble in. . ."—Fryer, 34.

1678.—"The permission you are pleased to give us to buy a Pallakee on the Company's Account. Shall make use of as Soone as can be possible meet with one y' may be fitt for y' purpose. . ."—MS. Letter from Factory at Balesore to the Council of Fort St. George, March 9, in India Office.

1682.—Joan Niehofs has Palakijn. Ze en Lant-Reize, ii. 78.

[", "The Agent and Council . . . allowed him [Mr. Clarke] 2 pag. 2. men, more towards the defraying his palanquin charges, he being very crazy and much weakened by his sickness."—Frye, Diary Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. i. 34.]

1720.—"I desire that all the free Merchants of my acquaintance do attend me in their palankeens to the place of burial."—Will of Charles Davies, Merchant, in Wheeler, ii. 340.

1726.—". . . Palangkyn dragers" (palankin-bearers).—Valentijn, Ceylon, 45.

1736.—"Pallauquin, a kind of chaise or chair, borne by men on their shoulders, much used by the Chinese and other Eastern peoples for travelling from place to place."—Bailey's Dict. 2nd ed.

1750-52. — "The greater nobility are carried in a palakee, which looks very like a hammock fastened to a pole."—Toren's Voyage to Surat, China, &c., ii. 201.

1754-58.—In the former year the Court of Directors ordered that Writers in their Service should "lay aside the expense of either horse, chaise, or Palankee, during their Writership." The Writers of Fort William (4th Nov. 1756) remonstrated, begging "to be indulged in keeping a Palankee for such months of the year as the excessive heats and violent rains make it impossible to go on foot without the utmost hazard of their health." The Court, however, replied (11 Feb. 1756): "We very well know that the indulging Writers with Palankeens has not a little contributed to the neglect of business we complain of, by affording them opportunities of rambling"; and again, with an obduracy and fervour too great for grammar (March 3, 1758): "We do most positively order and direct (and will admit of no representation for postponing the execution of) that no Writer whatsoever be permitted to keep either palankee, horse, or chaise, during his Writership, on pain of being immediately dismissed from our service."—In Long, pp. 54, 71, 130.

1784.—"The Sun in gaudy palanqueen. "Curtain'd with purple, fring'd with gold, Firing no more heav'n's vault serene, Retir'd to sup with Ganges old."—Pliny Plain, a ballad by Sir W. Jones; in Life and Works, ed. 1807, ii. 508.

1804.—"Give orders that a palanquin may be made for me; let it be very light, with the pannels made of canvas instead of wood, and the poles fixed as for a dooley. Your Bengally palanquins are so heavy, that they cannot be used out of Calcutta."—Wellington (to Major Shaw), June 20.

The following measures a change in ideas. A palankin is now hardly ever used by a European, even of humble position, much less by the opulent:

1808.—"Pallakee. A litter well known in India, called by the English Palankee. A Guzerat punster (aware of no other) hazards the Etymology Palakkee [pota-lakai] a thing requiring an annual income of a quarter Lack to support it and corresponding luxuries."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

""The conveyances of the island (Madeira) are of three kinds, viz.: horses, mules, and a litter, ycleped a palanquin, being a chair in the shape of a bathing-tub, with a pole across, carried by two men, as doolees are in the east."—Welsh, Reminiscences, i. 282.

1809.—"Woo! Woo! around their palanqueen,
As on a bridal day
With symphony and dance and song,
Their kindred and their friends come on,
The dance of sacrifices! The funeral song!"

Kohama, i. 6.

c. 1830.—"Un curieux indiscrèt reçut un galet dans la tête; on l'emporta baigné de sang, couché dans un palanquin."—V. Jacquesmont, Corr. i. 67.

1880.—"It will amaze readers in these days to learn that the Governor-General sometimes condescended to be carried in a Palanquin—a mode of conveyance which, except for long journeys away from railroads, has long been abandoned to portly Baboes, and Eurasian clergers."—Nat. Rev., Feb. 14.

1881.—"In the great procession on Corpus Christi Day, when the Pope is carried in a palanquin round the Piazza of St. Peter, it is generally believed that the cushions and furniture of the palanquin are so arranged as to enable him to bear the fatigue of the ceremony by sitting whilst to the spectator he appears to be kneeling."—Dean Stanley, Christian Institutions, 251.

PALLAVARAM, n.p. A town and cantonment 11 miles S.W. from Madras. The name is Palli-varam, probably Palla-puru, Pallavapura PALE ALE. The name formerly given to the beer brewed for Indian use. (See BEER.)

1784.—“London Porter and Pale Ale, light and excellent, Sicas Rupees 150 per hhd.”—Advt. in Seton-Karr, i. 39.

1798.—“For sale . . . Pale Ale (per hbd.) . . . Rs. 80.”—Bombay Courier, Jan. 19.

(1801.—“1. Pale Ale; 2. strong ale; 3. small beer; 4. brilliant beer; 5. strong porter; 6. light porter; 7. brown stout.”—Advt. in Carev, Good Old Days, i. 147.)

1848.—“Constant dinners, tiffins, pale ale, and claret, the prodigious labour of the latter a fragment of his palampore, His back to earth, his face to heaven employed as a substitute for the Indian palempore.”—Raffles, Java, 171; [2nd ed. i. 191].

PALEMPORE, a. A kind of chintz bed-cover, sometimes made of beautiful patterns, formerly made at various places in India, especially at Sadras and Masulipatam, the importation of which into Europe has become quite obsolete, but under the greater appreciation of Indian manufactures has recently shown some tendency to revive. The etymology is not quite certain.—we know no place of the name likely to have been the eponym, and possibly it is a corruption of a hybrid (Hind. and Pers.) palang-posh, ‘a bed-cover,’ which occurs below, and which may have been perverted through the existence of salesmanites as a kind of stuff. The probability that the word originated in a perversion of palang-posh, is strengthened by the following entry in Bluteau’s Dict. (Suppt. 1727.)

"Chaudus or Chaudus siao huns panes grandes, que servem para cobrir camas e outras coussas. São pintados de cores muy vistosas, e alguns mais fortes, a que chamamo pallempures. Fabricio-se de algodão e Benga e Choromandel, "i.e. "Chaudus ou Chaudus" (this I cannot identify, perhaps the same as Chouthar among Piece-goods) are a kind of large cloths serving to cover beds and other things. They are painted with gay colours, and there are some of a finer description which are called palang-poshes.”

[For the mode of manufacture at Masulipatam, see Journ. Ind. Art. iii. 14. Mr. Pringle (Madras Selections, 4th ser. p. 71, and Diary Ft. St. Geo. first ser. iii. 173) has questioned this derivation. The word may have been taken from the State and town of Palanpur in Guzerat, which seems to have been an emporium for the manufactures of N. India, which was long noted for chintz of this kind.]

1648.—“Int Governe van Raja mandragas . . . waren veel . . . Palamporij . . . gemaeckt.”—Van den Broecke, 87.

1673.—“Staple commodities (at Masulipatam) are callicuts white and painted, Palampores, Carpets.”—Fryer, 34.

1813.—“A stain on every bush that bore His breast with wounds unnumber’d riven His back to earth, his face to heaven . . .” Byron, The Giaour.

1814.—“A variety of tortures were inflicted to extort a confession; one was a sofa, with a platform of tight cordage in network, covered with a palampore, which concealed a bed of thorns placed under it: the collector, a corpulent Banian, was then stripped of his jama (see JAMMA), or muslin robe, and ordered to lie down.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 429; [2nd ed. ii. 54].

PALE ALE.

PALL, a. The name of the sacred language of the Southern Buddhists, in fact, according to their apparently well-founded tradition Magadhi, the dialect of what we now call South Bhar, in which Saky Muni dis-coursed. It is one of the Prakrits (see PACRIT) or Aryan vernaculars of India, and has probably been a dead language for nearlv 2000 years. Pali in Skt. means ‘a line, row, series’; and by the Buddhists is used for the series of their Sacred Texts. Pāli-bhadha is then ‘the language of the Sacred Texts,’ i.e. Magadhi; and this is called effectively by the Singhalan Pāli, which we have adopted in like use.
It has been carried, as the sacred language, to all the Indo-Chinese countries which have derived their religion from India through Ceylon.
Pāli is a sort of Tuscan among the Prakrits” from its inherent grace and strength (Childere). But the analogy to Tuscan is closer still in the parallel-ism of the modification of Sanskrit words, used in Pali, to that of Latin words used in Italian.

Robert Knox does not apparently know by that name the Pali language in Ceylon. He only speaks of the Books of Religion as “being in an eloquent style which the Vulgar people do not understand” (p. 76); and in another passage says: “They have a language something differing from the vulgar tongue (like Latin to us) which their books are writ in” (p. 109).

1889.—“Les uns font valoir le style de deur Alcoran, les autres de leur Bâli.”— Letters Edif. xxv. 61.

1890.—“... this Doubt proceeds from the Siamenes understanding two Languages, viz., the Vulgar, which is a simple Tongue, consisting almost wholly of Monosyllables, without Conjugation or Declension; and another Language, which I have already spoken of, which to them is a dead Tongue, known only by the Learned, which is called the Bâle Tongue, and which is enriched with the inflexions of words, like the Languages we have in Europe. The terms of Religion and Justice, the names of Offices, and all the Ornaments of the Vulgar Tongue are borrow’d from the Bâle.”—De la Lodière’s Siam, E.T. 1890, p. 9.

1785.—“Of the ancient Pâlîs, whose language constitutes at the present day the sacred text of Ava, Pegue, and Siam, as well as of several other countries eastward of the Ganges: and of their migration from India to the banks of the Cali, the Nile of Ethiopia, we have but very imperfect information.”... It has been the opinion of some of the most enlightened writers on the languages of the East, that the Pâlî, the sacred language of the priests of Boodh, is nearly allied to the Sanskrit of the Brahmas; and there certainly is much of that holy idiom engrafted on the vulgar language of Avâ, by the introduction of the Hindoo religion.”—Stokes, 337-8.

1818.—“The Talapoinis... do apply themselves in some degree to study, since according to their rules they are obliged to learn the Sādha, which is the grammar of the Pâlî language or Magâtha, to read the Vini, the Padimot... and the sermons of Godama... All these books are written in the Pâlî tongue, but the text is accompanied by a Burmese translation. They were all brought into the kingdom by a certain Brahmin from the island of Ceylon.”

—Sangermano’s Burmese Empire, p. 141.

1822.—“... the sacred books of the Buddhists are composed in the Bâli tongue.”—Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 187.

1837.—“Buddhists are impressed with the conviction that their sacred and classical language, the Mâgadhi or Pâli, is of greater antiquity than the Sanscrit; and that it had attained also a higher state of refinement than its rival tongue had acquired. In support of this belief they adduce various arguments, which, in their judgment, are quite conclusive. They observe that the very word Pâli signifies original, text, regularity; and there is scarcely a Buddhist scholar in Ceylon, who, in the discussion of this question, will not quote, with an air of triumph, their favourite verse,—

Sâ Mâgadhi; mîlā bhadha (ko). ‘There is a language which is the root; men and brahmins at the commencement of the creation, who never before heard nor uttered a human accent, and even the Supreme Buddhos, spoke it: it is Mâgadhi.’

“... at once avow, that, exclusive of all philological considerations, I am inclined, on prime facie evidence—external as well as internal—to entertain an opinion adverse to the claims of the Buddhists on this particular point.”—George Turnour, Introd. to Mahâkâvya, p. xii.

1874.—“The spoken language of Italy was to be found in a number of provincial dialects, each with its own characteristics, the Piedmontese harsh, the Neapolitan nasal, the Tuscan soft and flowing. These dialects had been rising in importance as Latin declined; the birth-time of a new literary language was imminent. Then came Dante, and choosing for his immortal Commedia the finest and most cultivated of the vernaculars, raised it at once to the position of dignity which it still retains.
Read Sanskrit for Latin, Magadhese for Tuscan, and the Three Baskets for the Divina Commedia, and the parallel is complete... Like Italian Pâli is at once flowing and sonorous; it is a characteristic of both languages that nearly every word ends in a vowel, and that all harsh conjunctions are softened down by assimilation, elision, or crisis, while on the other hand both lend themselves easily to the expression of sublime and vigorous thought."—Childe, Preface to Pali Dict. pp. xiii-xiv.

PALKEE-GARRY, s. A ‘palankin-coach,’ as it is termed in India; i.e. a carriage shaped somewhat like a palankin on wheels; Hind. palki-gari. The word is however one formed under European influences. ["The system of conveying passengers by palkee carriages and trucks was first established between Cawnpore and Allahabad in May 1843, and extended to Allyghur in November of the same year; Delhi was included in June 1845, Agra and Meerut about the same year; the now-going line not being, however, ready till January 1846" (Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 91.)]

1878.—"The Governor-General's carriage . . . may be jostled by the hired ‘palki-garry,’ with its two wretched ponies, rope harness, nearly naked driver, and wheels whose sinuous motions impress one with the idea that they must come off at the next revolution."—Life in the Mogul, i. 38.

This description applies rather to the carnehoo (q.v.) than to the palkee-garry, which is (or used to be) seldom so sordidly equipped. [Mr. Kipling's account of the Calcutta palki gari (Beast and Man, 192) is equally uncomplimentary.]

PALMYRA, s. The fan-palm (Borassus flabelliformis), which is very commonly cultivated in S. India and Ceylon (as it is also indeed in the Ganges valley from Farrukhabad down to the head of the Delta), and hence was called by the Portuguese par excellence, palmeira or 'the palm-tree.' Sir J. Hooker writes: "I believe this palm is nowhere wild in India; and have always suspected that it, like the tamarind, was introduced from Africa." [So Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 504.] It is an important tree in the economy of S. India, Ceylon, and parts of the Archipelago as producing jaggery (q.v.) or 'palm-sugar'; whilst the wood affords rafters and laths, and the leaf gives a material for thatch, mats, umbrellas, fans, and a substitute for paper. Its minor uses are many: indeed it is supposed to supply nearly all the wants of man, and a Tamil proverb ascribes to it 801 uses (see Ferguson's Palmyra-Palm of Ceylon, and Tennent's Ceylon, i. 111, ii. 519 seqq.; also see BRAB).

1563.—". . . A ilha de Ceilão . . . ha muitas palmeiras."—Garça, ff. 65a-66.

1673.—"Their Buildings suit with the Country and State of the inhabitants, being mostly contrived for Convenience; the Poorer are made of Boughs and oliez of the Palmeares."—Fryer, 198.

1718.—". . . Leaves of a Tree called Palmeire."—Prop. of the Gospel in the East, iii. 85.

1756.—"The interval was planted with rows of palmeira, and coco-nut trees."—Orme, ii. 90, ed. 1803.

1880.—"Here, too, the beautiful palmyra palm, which abounds over the north of the Island, begins to appear."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 54.

PALMYRA POINT, n.p. Otherwise called Pt. Pedro, [a corruption of the Port. Punta das Pedras, 'the rocky cape,' a name descriptive of the natural features of the coast (Tennent, ii. 530)]. This is the N.E. point of Ceylon, the high palmyra trees on which are conspicuous.

PALMYRAS, POINT, n.p. This is a headland on the Orissa coast, quite low, but from its prominence at the most projecting part of the combined Mahanadi and Brâmana delta an important landmark, especially in former days, for ships bound from the south for the mouth of the Hoogly, all the more for the dangerous shoal off it. A point of the Mahânâdi delta, 24 miles to the south-west, is called False Point, from its liability to be mistaken for P. Palmyras.

1553.—". . . o Cabo Segógora, a que os nossos chamam das palmeiras por humas que ali estão, as quas os navigantes notam por lhes dar conhecimento da terra. E deste cabo . . . fazemos fim do Reyno Orixa."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1598.—". . . 2 miles (Dutch) before you come to the point of Palmeiras, you shall see certaine blacke howells standing vpon a land that is higher than all the land thereabouts, and from thence to the Point it beginneth againe to be low ground and . . . you shall see some small (but not ouer white) sandie Downs . . . you shall finde being right against the point de Palmeiras . . . that vpon the point there is neyther tree nor bush, and although it hath the name of the Point of Palm-trees, it hath notwithstanding right forth, but one Palm tree."—Losschoten, 3d Book, ch. 12.

[c. 1665.—"Even the Portuguez of Opgui (see HOOGLY), in Bengal, purchased] without scruple these wretched captives, and the horrid traffic was transacted in the vicinity of the island of Gallea, near Cape das Palmas."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 176.

1828.—"It is a large delta, formed by the mouths of the Maha-Nuddee and other rivers, the northernmost of which insulates Cape Palmiras."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 88.

[PAMBRE, s. An article of dress which seems to have been used for various purposes, as a scarf, and perhaps as a turban. Mr. Yusuf Ali (Monograph on Silk Fabrics, 81) classes it among 'fabrics which are simply wrapped over the head and shoulders by men and women'; and he adds: "The Pamri is used by women and children, generally Hindus." His specimens are some 3 yards long by 1 broad, and are made of pure silk or silk and cotton, with an ornamental border. The word does not appear in the Hind. dictionaries, but Molesworth has Mahr. pelmari, 'a sort of silk cloth.'

1616.—"He covered my head with his Pambre."—Foster, Letters, iv. 344.

For some of the following quotations and notes I am indebted to Mr. W. Foster.

[1617.—"Antelopes and ramshelles, which bear the finest wool in the world, with which they make very delicate mantles, called Pavmmergi."—Joseph Salbank to the E. India Co., Agra, Nov. 22, 1617; India Office Records, O. C., No. 568.

1627.—"L'on y [Kashmir] travaille aussi plusieurs Vomeris [misprint for Pomeria, which he elsewhere mentions as a stuff from Kashmir and Lahore], qui sont des pieces d'estoffes longues de trois, aulnes, et largers de deux, faite de laine de moutons, qui croit au derriere de ces bestes, et qui est aussi fine que de la soye : on tient ces estoffes exposees au froid pendant l'hyver : elles ont un beau lustre, semblables aux tabis de nos cartiers."—Francois Pelaut, in Thermaut's Relations de divers Voyages, vol. i. pt. 2.

1634.—A letter in the India Office of Dec. 29 mentions that the Governor of Surat presented to the two chief Factors a horse and "a coat and pamborne" a piece.

[O. C., No. 1543a (I. O. Records) mentions the presentation to the President of Surat of a "coat and pamborne."" 1673.—"A couple of pamerins, which are fine mantles."—Prayer's New Account, p. 79; also see 177; in 112 ramerins.

1768.—". . . a lunghee (see LOONGHEE) or clot, barely to cover their nakedness, and a pambree or loose mantle to throw over their shoulders, or to lie on upon the ground."—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 81.]

PANCHÂNGAM, s. Skt. = 'quinque-partite.' A native almanac in S. India is called so, because it contains information on five subjects, viz. Solar Days, Lunar Days, Asterisms, Yogas, and karanas (certain astrological divisions of the days of a month). Panchanya is used also, at least by Buchanan below, for the Brahman who keeps and interprets the almanac for the villagers. [This should be Skt. 'panchangi.]

1612.—"Every year they make new almanacs for the eclipses of the Sun and of the Moon, and they have a perpetual one which serves to pronounce their auguries, and this they call Panchagiao."—Couto, V. vi. 4.

1651.—"The Brahmins, in order to know the good and bad days, have made certain writings after the fashion of our Almanacks, and these they call Panjangam."—Rogierius, 55. This author gives a specimen (pp. 63-69).

1800.—"No one without consulting the Panchanga, or almanac-keeper, knows when he is to perform the ceremonies of religion."—Buchanans Mysore, &c., i. 234.

3 PANDAL, PENDAUL, s. A shed. Tamil. pandal, [Skt. bandh, 'to bind'].

1651.—". . . it is the custom in this country when there is a Bride in the house to set up before the door certain stakes somewhat taller than a man, and these are covered with lighter sticks on which foliage is put to make a shade. . . . This arrangement is called a Pandal in the country speech."—Rogierius, 12.

1717.—"Water-Bandels, which are little sheds for the Convenience of drinking Water."—Phillips's Account, 19.

1745.—"Je suis la procession d'un peu loin, et arrive aux sepultures, j'y vis un pandel ou tente dressée, sur la fosse du defunt; elle était ornée de branches de figuier, de toiles peintes, &c. L'intérieur était garni de petites lampes allumées."—Norbert, Memoires, iii. 32.

1781.—"Les gens riches font construire devant leur porte un autre pendal."—Sommier, ed. 1782, i. 134.

1800.—"I told the farmer that, as I meant to make him pay his full rent, I could not take his fowl and milk without paying for them; and that I would not enter his pandall, because he had not paid the labourers who made it."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 283.

1814.—"There I beheld, assembled in the same pandaul, or reposing under the friendly banyan-tree, the Gowanee (see..."
PANDARAM. a. A Hindu ascetic mendicant of the (so-called) Sudra, or even of a lower caste. A priest of the lower Hindu castes of S. India and Ceylon. Tamil, pandaram. C. P. Brown says the Pandaram is properly a Vaishnava, but, other authors apply the name to Saiva priests. The Madras Gloss. derives the word from Skt. pandu-ranga, 'white-coloured.' Messrs. Cox and Stuart (Man of N. Arcot, i. 199) derive it from Skt. bhagavatagāra, 'a temple-treasury,' wherein they were employed those who had renounced the world. "The Pandarams seem to receive numerous recruits from the Saivite Sūdra castes, who choose to make a profession of piety and wander about begging. They are, in reality, very lax in their mode of life, often drinking liquor and eating animal food furnished by any respectable Sūdra. They often serve in Siva temples, where they make up garlands of flowers to decorate the lingam, and blow brass trumpets when offerings are made or processions take place" (ibid.).

1711. "... But the destruction of 50 or 60,000 pagodas worth of grain... and killing the Pandaram; these are things which make his demands really carry too much justice with them."—Letter in Wheelar, ii. 163.

1717. "... Bramans, Pantarongal, and other holy men."—Phillip's Account, 18. The word is here in the Tamil plural.

1745. "... On voit ici quelquefois les Pandarams ou Penitens qui ont été en pèlerinage à Bengale; quand ils retournent ils apportent ici avec grand soin de l'eau du Gange dans des pots ou vases bien formés."—Norbert, Mém. iii. 25.

c. 1780. "... The Pandarams, the Mahometan priests, and the Bramins themselves yield to the force of truth."—Grose, i. 232.

1781. "... Les Pandarams ne sont pas moins révérés que les Saïnais. Ils sont de la secte de Chiven, se barbouillent toute la figure, la poitrine, et les bras avec des cendres de boue de vache," &c.—Sonnerat, 8vo. ed., ii. 113-114.

1798. "... The other figure is of a Pandaram or Senasey, of the class of pilgrims to the various pagodas."—Pennaunt's View of Hindostan, prefixed.

1800. "... In Chena the Pâjâris (see POOJARIE) or priests in these temples are all Pandarums, who are the Sudras dedicated to the service of Siva's temples. ..."—Buchanan's Mysore, &c., ii. 338.

1809. "... The chief of the pagoda (Ramswaram), or Pandaram, waiting on the beach."—Ld. Valentia, i. 338.

1860. "... In the island of Nainativoe, to the south-west of Jafna, there was till recently a little temple, dedicated to the goddess Naga Tambiran, in which consecrated serpents were tenderly reared by the Pandarams, and daily fed at the expense of the worshippers."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 373.

PANDARANI, n. p. The name of a port of Malabar of great reputation in the Middle Ages, a name which has gone through many curious corruptions. Its position is clear enough from Varthema's statement that an uninhabited island stood opposite at three leagues distance, which must be the "Sacrifice Rock" of our charts. [The Madras Gloss. identifies it with Collam.] The name appears upon no modern map, but it still attaches to a miserable fishing village on the site, in the form Pantalani (approx. lat. 11° 26'), a little way North of Koolandi. It is seen below in Ibn Batuta's notice that Pandarani afforded an exceptional shelter to shipping during the S.W. monsoon. This is referred to in an interesting letter to one of the present writers from his friend Col. (now Lt.-Gen.) R. H. Sankey, C.B., R.E., dated Madras, 13th Feb., 1881: "One very extraordinary feature on the coast is the occurrence of mud-banks in from 1 to 6 fathoms of water, which have the effect of breaking both surf and swell to such an extent that ships can run into the patches of water so sheltered at the very height of the monsoon, when the elements are raging, and not only find a perfectly still sea, but are able to land their cargoes..." Possibly the snugness of some of the harbours frequented by the Chinese junks, such as Pandarani, may have been mostly due to banks of this kind? By the way, I suspect your 'Pandarani' was nothing but the roadstead of Coulote (Coulandi or Quelande of our Atlas. The Master Attendant who accompanied me, appears to have a good opinion of it as an anchorage, and as well sheltered. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 72.]

c. 1150.—"Fandarina is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Mundâr (see MALABAR), where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor. The inhabitants are rich, the markets well supplied, and trade flourishing." —Edrisi, in Elliot, i. 90.

c. 1296.—"In the year (1296) it was prohibited to merchants who traded in fine or costly products with Maparâ (Ma'bar or Coromandel), Pol-nam (!) and Pantalaina, three foreign kingdoms, to export any one of them more than the value of 50,000 ting in paper money."—Chinese Annals of the Mongol Dynasty, quoted by Pauthier, Marc Pol, 582.

c. 1300.—"Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindâbr, then Bakndr, then the country of Manjârânâ, then the country of Hifl, then the country of (Fandaraina)."—Rashiduddîn, in Elliot, i. 88.

c. 1321.—"And the forest in which the pepper growth extendeth for a good 18 days' journey, and in that forest there be two cities, the one whereof is called Flandrina, and the other Cyngilin" (see Shinkali).—Firâr Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 75.

c. 1343.—"From Bodfattan we proceeded to Pandaraina, a great and fine town with gardens and bazaars. The Musulmans there occupy three quarters, each having its mosque. . . . It is at this town that the ships of China pass the winter" (i.e. the S. W. monsoon).—Ibn Battuta, iv. 88. (Compare Roteiro below.)

c. 1442.—"The humble author of this narrative having received his order of dismission departed from Calicut by sea, after having passed the port of Bendinâneh (read Bendaranâ, and see MANGALORE, a) situated on the coast of Malabar, (he) reached the port of Mangalor . . . Ahsârâzadî, in India in XVth Cent., 20.

1503.—"Da poi feceno vela et in vn porto de dicto Re chiamato Fundarane, amazornado molta gente co artelaria et deliberorno andare verso il regno de Cuchin . . ."—Letter of King Emanuel, p. 5.

c. 1506.—"Questo capitano si trovò nave 17 de mercadanti Mori in uno porto se chima Pandarami, e combatte con queste le quali se messeno in terra; per modo che questo capitano mandò tuttì li soi copani ben armati con un bardi de polvere per cadan copano, e mise fuoco dentro dette navi de Mori; e tutte quelle brascol, con tutte quelle specierie che erano cariche per la Mecha, e s'intende ch' erano molto ricche. . . ."—Leonardo Ca' Masser, 20-21.

1510.—"Here we remained two days, and then departed, and went to a place which is called Pandarani, distant from this one day's journey, and which is subject to the King of Calicut. This place is a wretched affair, and has no port."—Varthema, 158.

1516.—"Further on, south-south-east, is another Moorish place which is called Pandarani, in which also there are many ships."—Barbossa, 182.

In Rowlandson's Translation of the Tohfat-ul-Majâhidin (Or. Transl. Fund, 1833), the name is habitually misread Fundread for Pandaraina.

1536.—"Martim Afonso . . . ran along the coast in search of the parosas, the galseys and caravels keeping the sea, and the foists hugging the shore. And one morning they came suddenly on Cunahalmarcar with 25 parosas, which the others had sent to collect rice; and on catching sight of them as they came along the coast towards the Isles of Pandaran, Diogo de Reynoso, who was in advance of our foists, he and his brother . . . and Diogo Corvo . . . set off to engage the Moors, who were numerous and well armed. And Cunahale, when he knew it was Martim Afonso, laid all pressure on his ears to double the Point of Tiracole. . . ."—Correa, iii. 775.

PANDY, s. The most current colloquial name for the Sepoy mutineer during 1857-58. The surname Pandy [Skt. Pañḍita] was a very common one among the high-caste Sepoys of the Bengal army, being the title of a Jot [got, gotra] or subdivisinal branch of the Brahmins of the Upper Provinces, which furnished many men to the ranks. "The first two men hung" (for mutiny) "at Barrackpore were Pandies by caste, hence all sepoys were Pandies, and ever will be so called" (Bourchier, as below).

"In the Bengal army before the Mutiny, there was a person employed in the quarter-guard to strike the gong, who was known as the gunta Pandy" (M.-G. Keatinge). Ghantâ, 'a gong or bell.'

1857. — "As long as I feel the entire confidence I do, that we shall triumph over this iniquitous combination, I cannot feel gloom. I leave this feeling to the Pandies, who have sacrificed honour and existence to the ghost of a delusion."—H. Greatheath, Letters during the Siege of Delhi, 89.

"We had not long to wait before the line of guns, howitzers, and mortar carts, chiefly drawn by elephants, soon hove in sight. . . Poor Panty, what a pounding was in store for you! . . ."—Bourchier, Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoy Army, 47.

PANGARA, PANGAIA, s. From the quotations, a kind of boat used on the E. coast of Africa. [Pyrrard de Laval (i. 53, Hak. Soc.) speaks of a "kind of raft called a panguayye," on which Mr. Gray comments: "As Rivara points out, Pyrrard mistakes the use of the word panguayye, or, as the Portuguese write it, pangiao, which was a small sailing canoe. . . . Rivara says the word is still used in Portuguese India and Africa for a two-masted barge with lateen sails. It is mentioned in Lancaster's Voyages (Hak. Soc. pp. 5, 6, and 26), where it is described as being like a barge with one mast sail of cocoanut leaves. 'The barge is sowed together with the rindes of trees and pinned with wooden pinnes.' See also Alb. Comm. Hak. Soc. iii. p. 60, note; and Dr. Burnell's note to Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. p. 32, where it appears that the word is used as early as 1605, in Don Manoel's letter.

1598.—"In this fortesse of Sofala the Captaine of Mosambiquy hath a Factor, and twice or thrice every yere he sendeth certain boats called Pangaisos, which sail along the shore to fetch gold, and bring it to Mosambiquy. These Pangaisos are made of light planks, and sowed together with cords, without any nailes."—Linschoten, ch. 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 32.]

1616.—"Each of these bars, of Quillimane, Cumama, and Luabo, allows of the entrance of vessels of 100 tons, viz., galleots and pangaisos, loaded with cloth and provisions; and when they enter the river they discharge cargo into other light and very long boats called almadies. . . ."—Bocarro, Decada, 534.

[1766.—"Their larger boats, called panguayye, are raised some feet from the sides with reeds and branches of trees, well bound together with small cord, and afterwards made water-proof, with a kind of bitumen or resinous substance."—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 13.]

PANGOLIN, a. This book-name for the Manis is Malay Pangalang, 'the creature that rolls itself up.' [Scott says: "The Malay word is peng-goling, transcribed also peng-guling; Katingan penguling. It means 'roller,' or, more literally, 'roll up.' The word is formed from goling, 'roll, wrap,' with the denominative prefix pe-, which takes before g the form peng."

Mr. Skeet remarks that the modern Malay form is teng-goling or sengguling, but the latter seems to be used, not for the Manis, but for a kind of centipede which rolls itself up. "The word pangolin, to judge by its form, should be derived from guling, which means to 'roll over and over.' The word pangguling or pengguling in the required sense of Manis, does not exist in standard Malay. The word was either derived from some out-of-the-way dialect, or was due to some misunderstanding on the part of the Europeans who first adopted it." Its use in English begins with Pennant (Synopsis of Quadrupeds, 1771, p. 259). Adam Burt gives a dissection of the animal in Asiat. Res. ii. 353 seqq.] It is the Manis pentezactyla of Linn.; called in Hind. bajikrit (i.e. Skt. vajrakita 'adamant reptile'). We have sometimes thought that the Manis might have been the creature which was shown as a gold-digging ant (see Busbeack below); was not this also the creature that Bertrandon de la Brocquire met with in the desert of Gaza? When pursued, "it began to cry like a cat at the approach of a dog. Pierre de la Vaudrei struck it on the back with the point of his sword, but it did no harm, from being covered with scales like a sturgeon." A.D. 1432. (T. Wright's Early Travels in Palestine, p. 390) (Bohn). It is remarkable to find the statement that these ants were found in the possession of the King of Persia recurring in Herodotus and in Busbeek, with an interval of nearly 2000 years! We see that the suggestion of the Manis being the gold-digging ant has been anticipated by Mr. Blakesley in his Herodotus. ["It is now understood that the gold-digging ants were neither, as ancients supposed, an extraordinary kind of real ants, nor, as many learned men have since supposed, large animals mistaken for ants, but Tibetan miners, who, like their descendants of the..."
present day, preferred working their mines in winter when the frozen soil stands well and is not likely to trouble them by falling in. The Sanskrit word pipilika denotes both an ant and a particular kind of gold” (McCrindle, Ancient India, its Invasion by Alexander the Great, p. 341 seq.)

c. B.C. 445.—"Here in this desert, there live amid the sand great ants, in size somewhat less than dogs, but bigger than foxes. The Persian King has a number of them, which have been caught by the hunters in the land whereof we are speaking. . . ."—Herod. iii. 102 (Rawlinson's tr.).

1562.—Among presents to the G. Turk from the King of Persia: "in his insitus genera animantae, quorum memini dictum fuisse allatam formicam indicam mediocris canis magnumdum, mordaces admodum et saevam."—Busbequius Opera, Eliz., 1633, p. 343.

PANCARE, s. This is mentioned by Bluteau (vi. 223) as an Indian disease, a swelling of the feet. Öde is here probably the Tamil kal., ‘leg’ [Anatukal is the Tamil name for what is commonly called Cochin Leg.]

PANIKAR, PANYCA, &c., s. Malayâl. pan运河, ‘a fencing-master, a teacher’ [Mal. pani, ‘work;’ karan, ‘doer’]; but at present it more usually means ‘an astrologer.’

1518.—"And there are very skilful men who teach this art (fencing), and they are called Pancars."—Barroto, 128.

1558.—"And when (the Nair) comes to the age of 7 years he is obliged to go to the fencing-school, the master of which (whom they call Pancal) they regard as a father, on account of the instruction he gives them."

—Barros, i. ix. 3.

1554.—"To the Pancal (in the Factory at Cochín) 300 reis a month, which are for the year 3600 reis."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 24.

1556.—"... abo Rea arma caalleiro ho Pancas ã ho ensinou."—D. de Goez, Chron. 51.

1583.—"The maistors which teach them, be graduats in the weapons which they teach, and they bee called in their language Pancyass."—Castañeda (by N. L.), f. 39v.

1604.—"The deceased Pancal had engaged in his pay many Nayres, with obligation to die for him."—Guerrero, Relacion, 90.

1606.—"Paniquais is the name by which the same Malausares call their masters of fence."—Gouvea, f. 28.

1644.—"To the cost of a Pancal and 4 Nayres who serve the factory in the conveyance of the pepper on rafts for the year 12,960 reis."—Bocarro, Ms. 316.

PANTHAY, PANTÉH. s. This is the name applied of late years in Burma, and in intelligence coming from the side of Burma, to the Mahommedans of Yunnan, who established a brief independence at Talifu, between 1867 and 1873. The origin of the name is exceedingly obscure. It is not, as Mr. Baber assures us, used or known in Yunnan itself (i.e. by the Chinese). It must be remarked that the usual Burmese name for a Mahommedan is Pathi, and one would have been inclined to suppose Panthé to be a form of the same; as indeed we see that Gen. Fytche has stated it to be (Burma, Past and Present, ii. 297-8). But Sir Arthur Phayre, a high authority, in a note with which he has favoured us, observes: "Panthé, I believe, comes from a Chinese word signifying 'native or indigenous.' It is quite a modern name in Burma, and is applied exclusively to the Chinese Mahommedans who come with caravans from Yunnan. I am not aware that they can be distinguished from other Chinese caravan traders, except that they do not bring hams for sale as the others do. In dress and appearance, as well as in drinking samshoo (see SAMSBOO) and gambling, they are like the others. The word Pa-thi again is the old Burmese word for 'Mahommedan.' It is applied to all Mahommedans other than the Chinese Panthé. It is in no way connected with the latter word, but I believe, a corruption of Persi or Farsi, i.e. Persian." He adds:—"The Burmese call their own indigenous Mahommedans Pathi-Kul, and Hindus Hindu-Kul, when they wish to distinguish between the two" (see KULA). The last suggestion is highly probable, and greatly to be preferred to that of M. Jacquet, who supposed that the word might be taken from Paezi in Sumatra, which was during part of the later Middle Ages a kind of metropolis of Islam, in the Eastern Seas.*

We may mention two possible origins for Panthé, as indicating lines for enquiry:—

* See Journ. As., Ser. II., tom. viii. 332.
The title Pathé (or Passi, for the former is only the Burmese lisping utterance) is very old. In the remarkable Chinese Account of Cambodia, dating from the year 1296, which has been translated by Abel-Remusat, there is a notice of a sect in Cambodia called Pa-see. The author identifies them in a passing way, with the Tao-see, but that is a term which Fah-hian also in India uses in a vague way, apparently quite inapplicable to the Chinese sect properly so called. These Pa-see, the Chinese writer says, "wear a red or white cloth on their heads, like the head-dress of Tartar women, but not so high. They have edifices or towers, monasteries, and temples, but not to be compared for magnitude with those of the Buddhists. . . . In their temples there are no images . . . they are allowed to cover their towers and their buildings with tiles. The Pa-see never eat with a stranger to their sect, and do not allow themselves to be seen eating; they drink no wine," &c. (Remusat, Nouv. Mel. As., i. 112). We cannot be quite sure that this applies to Mahomedans, but it is on the whole probable that the name is the same as the Pathi of the Burmese, and has the same application. Now the people from whom the Burmese were likely to adopt a name for the Yunnan Mahomedans are the Shans, belonging to the great Siamese race, who occupy the intermediate country. The question occurs:—Is Pathé a Shan term for Mahomedan? If so, is it not probably only a dialectical variation of the Passe of Cambodia, the Pathi of Burma, but entering Burma from a new quarter, and with its identity thus disguised? (Cushing, in his Shan Dict. gives Passi for Mahomedan. We do not find Pathé). There would be many analogies to such a course of things.

The name Pathay is a purely Burmese word, and has been adopted by us from them. The Shan word Pang-hse is identical, and gives us no help to the origin of the term. Among themselves and to the Chinese they are known as Hui-hui or Hu-long (Mahomedans).—J. G. Scott, Gazetteer Upper Burma, i. i. 606.

We find it stated in Lieut. Garnier's narrative of his great expedition to Yunnan that there is a hybrid Chinese race occupying part of the plain of Tali-fu, who are called Pen-ti (see Garnier, Voy. d'Expl. i. 518). This name again, it has been suggested, may possibly have to do with Pathé. But we find that Pen-ti ("root-soil") is a generic expression used in various parts of S. China for 'aborigines'; it could hardly then have been applied to the Mahomedans.

PANWELL, n.p. This town on the mainland opposite Bombay was in pre-railway times a usual landing-place on the way to Poona, and the English form of the name must have struck many besides ourselves. [Hamilton (Descr. ii. 151) says it stands on the river Pan, whence perhaps the name]. We do not know the correct form; but this one has substantially come down to us from the Portuguese: e.g.

1644.—"This Island of Carnia is quite near, almost frontier-place, to six cities of the Moors of the Kingdom of the Malique, viz. Carnallt, Druga, Pen, Sabaya, Abteua, and Panaol."—Bocarro, MS. i. 227.

1804.—"P.S. Tell Mrs. Waring that notwithstanding the debate at dinner, and her recommendation, we propose to go to Bombay, by Panwell, and in the balloon!"—Wellington, from "Candolla," March 8.

PAPAYA, PAPAW, s. This word seems to be from America like the insipid, not to say nasty, fruit which it denotes (Carica papaya, L.). A quotation below indicates that it came by way of the Philippines and Malacca. [The Malay name, according to Mr. Skeat, is betik, which comes from the same Ar. form as patea, though papaya and kapaya have been introduced by Europeans.] Though of little esteem, and though the tree's peculiar quality of rendering fresh meat tender which is familiar in the W. Indies, is little known or taken advantage of, the tree is found in gardens and compounds all over India, as far north as Delhi. In the N.W. Provinces it is called by the native gardeners aran-kharbava, 'castor-oil-tree-melon,' no doubt from the superficial resemblance of its foliage to that of the Palma Christi. According to Moodeen Sheriff it has a Perso-Arabic name 'anbah-i-Hindi; in Canarese it is called Parangi-hanu or -mara ("Frank or Portuguese fruit, tree"). The name papaya according to Oviedo-as quoted by Littré ("Oviedo, t. l. p. 333, Madrid, 1851,"—we cannot find it in Ramusio) was that used in Cuba, whilst the Carib name was ababai. [Mr. J. Platt, referring to his article in 9th Ser. Notes & Queries, iv. 515, writes: "Malay papaya, like the Accra term kpakpa, is a European loan word. The evidence for Carib origin is, firstly, Oviedo's Historia, 1535 (in the ed. of 1851, vol. i. 323): 'Del arbol que en esta isla Española llaman papaya, y en la tierra firme los llaman los Españoles los higos del mastuerco, y en la provincia de Nicaragua llaman a tal arbol olocoton.' Secondly, Breton, Dictionnaire Caraïbe, has: 'Ababa', papayer.' Gilij, Saggio, 1782, iii. 146 (quoted in N. & Q. u.s.), says the Otamic word is pappat.] Strange liberties are taken with the spelling. Mr. Robinson (below) calls it popeya; Sir L. Pelly (J.R.G.S. xxxv. 232), pope'pia (d pêxon). Papaya is applied in the Philippines to Europeans who, by long residence, have fallen into native ways and ideas.

c. 1550.—"There is also a sort of fruit resembling figs, called by the natives Papalai . . . peculiar to this kingdom" (Peru).—Girol. Benzoni, 242.

1598.—"There is also a fruit that came out of the Spanish Indies, brought from beyond ye Philipinas or Luzona to Malacca, and fro thence to India, it is called Papaloes, and is very like a Mellon. . . and will not grow, but alwayes two together, that is male and female. . . and when they are diuided and set apart one from the other, then they yield no fruit at all. . . This fruit at the first for the strangenes thereof was much esteemed, but now they account not of it."—Linschoten, 97; [Hak. Soc. ii. 35].

c. 1635.—"The Palma Christi and the fair Papaw Now but a seed (preventing Nature's Law) In half the circle of the hasty year, Project a shade, and lovely fruits do wear."—Wallis, Battle of the Summer Islands.

1658.—"Utrouque Pinoguan (mas. et feminina), Mamoeira Lusitania dicta, vulgarly Papaw, cujus fructum Mamam vocant a figura, quia mammae instar pendet in arbore . . . carne lutea instar melonum, sed sapore ignobiliori."—Gul. Pisonis de Indiis urinquirus Re Naturali et Medic. Libri iv. 159-160.

1673.—"Here the flourishing Papaw (in Taste like our Melons, and as big, but growing on a Tree leaf'd like our Fig-tree. . ."—Pryer, 19.

1705.—"Il y a aussi des ananas, des Papées . . ."—Luillier, 33.

1784.—"Thy temples shaded by the tremulous palm, Or quick papaw, whose top is necklaced round With numerous rows of particoloured fruit."—Grainger, Sugar Cane, iv.

[1773.—"Paw Paw. This tree rises to 20 feet, sometimes single, at other times it is divided into several bodies."—Ives, 460.]

1878.—". . . the rank poyeaas clustering beneath their coronal of stately leaves."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 50.

PAPUA, n.p. This name, which is now applied generically to the chief race of the island of New Guinea and resembling tribes, and sometimes (improperly) to the great island itself, is a Malay word papuwaah, or sometimes pauwah-pauwah, meaning 'frizzle-haired,' and was applied by the Malays to the people in question.

1528.—"And as the wind fell at night the vessel was carried in among the islands, where there are strong currents, and got into the Sea of the Strait of Magalhães," where he encountered a great storm, so that but for God's mercy they had all been lost, and so they were driven on till they made the land of the Papos, and then the east winds began to blow so that they could not sail to the Moluccas till May 1527. And with their stay in these lands much people got ill and many died, so that they came to Molucca much shattered."—Correa, iii. 173-174.

1553.—(Referring to the same history.) "Thence he went off to make the islands of a certain people called Papos, whom many on account of this visit of Don Jorge (de Menezes) call the Islands of Don Jorge, which lie east of the Moluccas some 200 leagues."—Barros, IV. 1. 6.

PARABYKE, s. Burmese ptra-beik; the name given to a species of writing book which is commonly used in Burma. It consists of paper made from the bark of a spec. of daphne, which is agglutinated into a kind of pasteboard and blackened with a paste of charcoal. It is then folded, screen-fashion, into a note-book and written on with a steatite pencil. The same mode of writing has long been used in Canara; and from La Louise we see that it is or was used also in Siam. The Canara books are called kadatam, and are described by Col. Wilks under the name of cuddutum, carrutum, or currut (Hist. Sketches, Pref. 1. xii.). They appear exactly to resemble the Burmese para-beik, except that the substance blackened is cotton cloth instead of paper. "The writing is similar to that on a slate, and may be in like manner rubbed out and renewed. It is performed by a pencil of the balapum [Can. balapa] or lapis ollari, and this mode of writing was not only in ancient use for records and public documents, but is still universally employed in Mysoor by merchants and shopkeepers, I have even seen a bond, regularly witnessed, entered in the cuddutum of a merchant, produced and received in evidence."

"This is the word kirret, translated 'palm-leaf' (of course conjecturally) in Mr. Crisp's translation of Tippeo's regulations. The Sultan prohibited its use in recording the public accounts; but altho' liable to be expunged, and affording facility to permanent entries, it is a much more durable material and record than the best writing on the best paper. . . . It is probable that this is the linen or cotton cloth described by Arrian, from Nearcchus, on which the Indians wrote." (Strabo, XV. i. 67.)

1888. — "The Siamese make Paper of old Cotton rags, and likewise of the bark of a Tree named Tav coi . . . but these Papers have a great deal less Equality, Body and Whiteness than ours. The Siameses cease not to write thereon with China Ink. Yet most frequently they black them, which renders them smoother, and gives them a greater body; and then they write thereon with a kind of Crayon, which is made only of a clayish earth dry'd in the Sun. Their Books are not bound, and consist only in a very long Leaf . . . which they fold in and out like a Fan, and the way which the Lines are wrote, is according to the length of the folds." — De la Loubere, Siam, E.T. p. 12.

PARANGHEE. s. An obstinate chronic disease endemic in Ceylon. It has a superficial resemblance to syphilis; the whole body being covered with ulcers, while the sufferer rapidly declines in strength. It seems to arise from insufficient diet, and to be analogous to the pellagra which causes havoc among the peasants of S. Europe. The word is apparently fringhe, 'European,' or (in S. India) 'Portuguese'; and this would point perhaps to association with syphilis.

PARBUTTY, s. This is a name in parts of the Madras Presidency for a subordinate village officer, a writer under the pate1, sometimes the village-crier, &c., also in some places a superintendent or manager. It is a corruption of Telug. and Canarese parapatti, parupatti, Mahr. and Konkani, purputiya, from Skt. pravratti, 'employment.' The term frequently occurs in old Port. documents in such forms as perpotin, &c. We presume that the Great Duke (audax omnia perpeti) has used it in the Anglicised form at the head of this article; for though we cannot find it in his Despatches, Gurwood's Explanation of Indian Terms gives "Parbutty, writer to the Pate1." [See below.]

1587. — " . . . That no unbeliever shall serve as scrivener, ashrof (zarrufo), moquadum, naque (see NAIK), peon, parpatram, collector (accador), constable (p. corrator), interpreter, procurator, or solicitor in court, nor in any other office or charge by which they may in any way whatever exercise authority over Christians . . . " — Decree 27 of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Arch. Port. Orient. fasc. 4.

1800. — "In case of failure in the payment of these instalments, the crops are seized, and sold by the Parputty or accompitant of the division." — Buchanan's Mysoor, ii. 151-2. The word is elsewhere explained by Buchanan, as "the head person of a Hobly in Mysoor." A Hobly [Canarese and Malayal. hobati] is a sub-division of a talook (i. 270).

1803. — "Neither has any one a right to compel any of the inhabitants, much less the particular servants of the government, to attend him about the country, as the soubhadar (see SOUBADAR) obliged the parputty and pateel (see PATEEL) to do, running before his horse." — Wellington, Desp. i. 323. (Stanf. Dict.)

1878. — "The staff of the village officials . . . in most places comprises the following members . . . the crier (parpoti). . . . " — Fonseca, Sketch of Goa, 21-22.

PAEDAO. s. This was the popular name among the Portuguese of a gold coin from the native mints of Western India, which entered largely into the early currency of Goa, and the name of which afterwards attached to a silver money of their own coinage, of constantly degenerating value.

There could hardly be a better word with which to associate some connected account of the coinage of Portuguese India, as the pardao runs through its whole history, and I give some space to the subject, not with any idea of weaving such a history, but in order to furnish a few connected notes on the subject, and to correct some flagrant errors of writers to whose works I naturally turned for help in such a special matter, with little result except that of being puzzled and misled, and having time occupied in satisfying myself regarding the errors alluded to. "The subject is itself a very difficult one, perplexed as it is by the rarity or inaccessibility of books dealing with it, by the excessive rarity (it would seem) of specimens, by the large use in the Portuguese settlements of a variety of native coins in addition to those from the Goa mint,* by the frequent shifting of nomenclature in the higher coins and constant degeneration of value in the coins that retained old names. I welcomed as a hopeful aid the appearance of Dr. Gerson D'Acunha's Contributions to the Study of Indo-Chinese Numismatics. But though these contributions afford some useful facts and references, on the whole, from the rarity with which they give data for the intrinsic value of the gold and silver coins, and from other defects, they seem to me to leave the subject in utter chaos. Nor are the notes which Mr. W. de G. Birch appendes, in regard to monetary values, to his translation of Alboquerque, more to be commended. Indeed Dr. D'Acunha, when he goes astray, seems sometimes to have followed Mr. Birch.

The word pardao is a Portuguese (or perhaps an indigenous) corruption of Skt. pratāpa, 'splendour, majesty,' &c., and was no doubt taken, as Dr.

D'Acunha says, from the legend on some of the coins to which the name was applied, e.g. that of the Raja of Ikkeri in Canara: Sri Pratāpa kṛishṇa-rāya.

A little doubt arises at first in determining to what coin the name pardao was originally attached. For in the two earliest occurrences of the word that we can quote—on the one hand Abdurrazzāk, the Envoy of Shāh Rukh, makes the partab (or pardao) half of the Varāha ('boar,' so called from the Boar of Vishnu figured on some issues), hūn, or what we call pagoda;—whilst on the other hand, Ludovico Varthema's account seems to identify the pardao with the pagoda itself. And there can be no doubt that it was to the pagoda that the Portuguese, from the beginning of the 16th century, applied the name of pardao d'ouro. The money-tables which can be directly formed from the statements of Abdurazzāk and Varthema respectively are as follows: *

ABDURRAZZĀK (A.D. 1448).

<thead>
<tr>
<th>3 Jitals (copper)</th>
<th>= 1 Tar (silver).</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>6 Tars</td>
<td>= 1 Fanam (gold).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10 Fanams</td>
<td>= 1 Partab.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2 Partābs</td>
<td>= 1 Varāha.</td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>

And the Varāha weighed about 1 Mithkāl (see MISCALL), equivalent to 2 dinārs Kopekt.

VARTHEMA (A.D. 1504-5).

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>16 Cas (see CASH)</th>
<th>= 1 Tare (silver).</th>

</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>16 Tare</td>
<td>= 1 Fanam (gold).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20 Fanams</td>
<td>= 1 Pardao.</td>
</tr> </tbody>

And the Pardao was a gold ducat, smaller than the seraphim (see XERAPINE) of Cairo (gold dinār), but thicker.

The question arises whether the varāha of Abdurrazzāk was the double pagoda, of which there are some examples in the S. Indian coinage, and his partab therefore the same as Varthema's, i.e. the pagoda itself; or whether his varāha was the pagoda, and his partab a half-pagoda. The weight which he assigns to the varāha, "about one mithkāl," a weight which may be taken at 73 grs., does not well suit either one or the other. I find the mean weight of 27 different issues of the (single) hūn or pagoda, given in Princep's Tables, to be 43 grs., the

* Antonio Nunez, "Contador da Casa del Rey novo Benhur," who in 1554 compiled the Livro dos Pesos da Indias e as Medidas e Moedas, says of Diu in particular: "The moneys here exhibit such variations and such differences, that it is impossible to write any thing certain about them; for every month, every 8 days indeed, they rise and fall in value, according to the money that enters the place" (p. 28).

* I invert the similar table given by Dr. Badger in his notes to Varthema.

maximum being 45 grs. And the fact that both the Envoy's varáha and the Italian traveller's pàrdão contain 20 fanams is a strong argument for their identity.*

In further illustration that the pàrdão was recognised as a half hân or pagoda, we quote in a foot-note "the old arithmetical tables in which accounts are still kept" in the south, which Sir Walter Elliot contributed to Mr. E. Thomas's excellent Chronicles of the Pathan Kings of Delhi, illustrated, &c.†

Moreover, Dr. D'Acunha states that in the "New Conquests," or provinces annexed to Goa only about 100 years ago, "the accounts were kept until lately in sanvoy and nizams pagodas, each of them being divided into 2 pratás... "&c. (p. 46, note).

As regards the value of the pàrdão d'ouro, when adopted into the Goa currency by Alboquerque, Dr. D'Acunha tells us that it "was equivalent to 370 reis, or 1s. 6 ½ d. English." Yet he accepts the identity of this pàrdão d'ouro with the hân current in Western India, of which the Madras pagoda was till 1818 a living and unchanged representative, a coin which was, at the time of its abolition, the recognised equivalent of 3½ rupees, or 7 shillings. And doubtless this, or a few pence more, was the intrinsic value of the pàrdão. Dr. D'Acunha in fact has made his calculation from the present value of the rei (the imaginary rei). Seeing that a milrei is now reckoned equal to a dollar, or 50d., we have a single rei = ½ d., and 370 reis = 1s. 6 ½ d. It seems not to have occurred to the author that the rei might have degenerated in value as well as every other denomination of money with which he has to do, every other in fact of which we can at this moment remember anything, except the pagoda, the Venetian sequin, and the dollar.* Yet the fact of this degeneration everywhere staves him in the face. Correia tells us that the cruzado which Alboquerque struck in 1510 was the just equivalent of 420 reis. It was in-dubitably the same as the cruzado of the mother country, and indeed A. Nunez (1554) gives the same 420 reis as the equivalent of the cruzado d'ouro de Portugal, and that amount also for the Venetian sequin, and for the sultans or Egyptian gold dinár. Nunez adds that a gold coin of Cambaya, which he calls Madrasfamá (q.v.), was worth 1260 to 1440 reis, according to variations in weight and exchange. We have seen that this must have been the gold-inohr of Muzaffar-Sháh II. of Guzerat (1511-1526), the weight of which we learn from E. Thomas's book.

From the Venetian sequin (content of pure gold 52 27 grs. value 111d.†) the value of the rei at ² ³ ⅔ will be... 264d.

From the Muzaffar Shahi moor (weight 185 grs. value, if pure gold, 392-52d.) value of rei at 1440... 0-274d.

Mean value of rei in 1513... 0-256d. t.e. more than five times its present value.

Dr. D'Acunha himself informs us (p. 56) that at the beginning of the 17th century the Venetian was worth 690 to 720 reis (mean 705 reis), whilst

* Even the pound sterling, since it represented a pound of silver sterlings, has come down to one-third of that value; but if the value of silver gone on dwindling as it has done lately, our pound might yet justify its name again!

† I have remarked elsewhere: "Everybody seems to be tickled at the notion that the Scotch Pound or Livre was only 20 pence. Nobody finds it funny that the French or Italian Livre or Pound is only 20 halfpence or less!" I have not been able to trace how high the rei began, but the mercantile entered life as a gold piece, equivalent to the Saracen sikkid, and ended—!

‡ I calculate all gold values in this paper at those of the present English coinage.

Besides the gradual depreciation of the Portuguese rei, so prominently noticed in this paper, there was introduced in Goa a reduction of the rei locally below the rei of Portugal in the ratio of 15 to 8. I do not know the history or understand the object of such a change, nor do I see that it affects the calculations in this article. In a table of values of coins current in Portuguese India, given in the Annals Marítimos of 1844, each coin is valued both in Reis of Goa and in Reis of Portugal, bearing the above ratio. My kind correspondent, F. Fonseca, author of the capital History of Goa, tells me that this was introduced in the beginning of the 17th century, but that he has yet found no document throwing light upon it. It is a matter quite apart from the secular depreciation of the rei.

* The issues of fanams, q.v., have been infinite; but they have not varied much in weight, though very greatly in alloy, and therefore in the number reckoned to a pagoda.
† 2 gunjaks = 1 dagala
2 dagalas = 1 chavula (= the panam or fanam).
2 chavalas = 1 hona (= the pratâpas, madâ, or half pagoda).
2 hoonas = 1 hân (the hân or pagoda)."—Op. cit. p. 224, note. See also Sir W. Elliot's Coins of S. India, p. 54.
‡ 860 reis is the equivalent in the authorities, so far as I know.
the pagoda was worth 570 to 600 reis (mean 585 reis).

These statements, as we know the intrinsic value of the sequin, and the approximate value of the pagodas, enable us to calculate the value of the reis of about 1800 at . . . 0·16d. Values of the mitreis given in Milburn's Oriental Commerce, and in Kelly's Cambist, enable us to estimate it for the early years of the last century. We have then the progressive deterioration as follows:

Yet Dr. D'Acunha has valued the coins of 1510, estimated in reis, at the rate of 1880. And Mr. Birch has done the same.*

The Portuguese themselves do not seem ever to have struck gold pardaos or pagodas. The gold coin of Alboquerque's coinage (1510) was, we have seen, a cruzado (or manuel), and the next coinage in gold was by Garcia de Sa in 1548-9, who issued coins called San Thome, worth 1000 reis, say about £1, 2s. 4d.; with halves and quarters of the same. Neither, according to D'Acunha, was there silver money of any importance coined at Goa from 1510 to 1550, and the coins then issued were silver San Thomes, called also patacós (see Pataca). Nunez in his Tables (1554) does not mention these by either name, but mentions repeatedly pardaos, which represented 5 silver tangas, or 800 reis, and these D'Acunha speaks of as silver coins. Nunez, as far as I can make out, does not speak of them as coins, but rather implies that in account so many tangas of silver were reckoned as a pardao. Later in the century, however, we learn from Balbi (1580), Barrett* (1584), and Linschoten (1583-89), the principal currency of Goa consisted of a silver coin called zeratifin (see Xeratifine) and pardao-zeratifin, which was worth 5 tangas, each of 60 reis. (So these had been from the beginning, and so they continued, as is usual in such cases. The scale of sub-multiples remains the same, whilst the value of the divisible coin diminishes. Eventually the lower denominations become infinitesimal, like the maravedis and the reis, and either vanish from memory, or survive only as denominations of account). The data, such as they are, allow us to calculate the pardao or zeratifin at this time as worth 4s. 2d. to 4s. 6d.

A century later, Fryer's statement of equivalents (1676) enables us to use the stability of the Venetian sequin as a gauge; we then find the tanga gone down to 6d. and the pardao or zeratifin to 2s. 6d. Thirty years later Lockyer (1711) tells us that one rupee was reckoned equal to 1½ perdo.

* Thus Alboquerque, returning to Europe in 1504, gives a "Moorsil, pilot, who carried him by a new course straight from Cannanore to Mozambique, a buckskin of 50 cruzaos; this is explained as £5—a mild munificence for such a feat. In truth it was nearly £24, the cruzaol being about the same as the sequin (see l. p. 17).

The mint at Goa was flamed out by the same great man, after the conquest, for 600,000 reis, amounting, we are told, to £125. It was really £270 (iii. 41).

Alboquerque demands as ransom to spare Muscat 10,000 cruzaos of gold. And we are told by the translator that this ransom of a wealthy trading city like Muscat amounted to £625. The coin in question is the akrafi, or gold dinar, as much as, or more than the sequin in value, and the sum more than £4000 (l. p. 82).

In the note to the first of these cases it is said that the cruzaol is "a silver coin (formerly gold), now equivalent to 480 reis, or about 2s. English money, but probably worth much more relatively in the time of Alboquerque." "Much more relatively" means of course that the 2s. had much more purchasing power.

This is a very common way of speaking, but it is often very fallaciously applied. The change in purchasing power in India generally till the British occupation of India was probably not very great. There is a curious note by Gen. Briggs in his translation of Firishta, comparing the amount stated by Firishta to have been paid by the Bakhání King, about A.D. 1470, as the annual cost of a body of 500 horse, with the cost of a British corps of Irregular horse of the same strength in Brigg's own time (say about 1815). The Bakhání charge was 500,000 Rs.; the British charge 219,000 Rs. A corps of the same strength would now cost the British Government, as near as I can calculate, 257,300 Rs.

The price of an Arab horse imported into India (then a great traffic) was in Marco Polo's time about three times what it was in our own, up to 1850.

The salary of the Governor at Goa, c. 1640, was 8000 cruzaos, or nearly £4000 a year; and the salaries of the commandants of the fortresses of Goa, of Malacca, of Dío, and of Bassán, 600,000 reis, or about £270.

The salary of Ibn Batuta, when Judge of Delhi, about 1340, was 1000 silver tankaos or dínars as he calls them (practically 1000 rupees) a month, which was in addition to an assignment of villages bringing in 5000 tankoas a year. And yet he got into debt in a very few years to the tune of 56,000 tankoas—say £5,500!*

* Dr. D'Acunha has set this English traveller down to 1814, and introduces a quotation from him in illustration of the coinage of the latter period, in his quasi-chronological notes, a new element in the confusion of his readers.
ing the Surat Rupee, which may have been probably his standard, still by help of the Venetian (p. 262) at about 2s. 3d., the pardao would at this time be worth 1s. 6d. It must have depreciated still further by 1728, when the Goa mint began to strike rupees, with the effigy of Dom João V., and the half-rupee appropriated the denomination of pardao. And the half-rupee, till our own time, has continued to be so styled. I have found no later valuation of the Goa Rupee than that in Princeps's Tables (Thomas's ed. p. 55), the indications of which, taking the Company's Rupee at 2s., would make it 2½d. The pardao therefore would represent a value of 10½d., and there we leave it.

[On this Mr. Whiteway writes: "Should it be intended to add a note to this, I would suggest that the remarks on coinage commencing at page 67 of my Rise of the Portuguese Power in India be examined, as although I have gone to Sir H. Yule for much, some papers are now accessible which he does not appear to have seen. There were two pardaos, the pardao d'ouro and the pardao de tanga, the former of 360 dinars, some papers are now accessible to another island, which is called Goa (Goa) and which pays annually to the King of Decan 19,000 gold ducats, called by them pardal. These pardais are smaller than the seraphim of Cairo, but thicker, and have two devils stamped on one side, and certain letters on the other."—Varthema, pp. 115-116."

"... his money consists of a pardao, as I have said. He also coins a silver money called tare (see TABA), and others of gold, twenty of which go to a pardao, and are called fanams. And of these small ones of silver, there go sixteen to a fanam... "—Ibid. p. 130.

1510.—"Meanwhile the Governor (Alboquerque) talked with certain of our people who were goldsmiths, and understood the alloying of gold and silver, and also with goldsmiths and money-changers of the country who were well acquainted with that business. There were in the country pardaos of gold, worth in gold 300 reis, and also a money of good silver which they call bargany (see BARGANY) of the value of 2 vinntas, and a money of copper which they call bazarungos (see BUDGROOK), of the value of 2 reis. Now all these the Governor sent to have weighed and assessed. And he caused to be made cruzados of their proper weight of 420 reis, on which he caused to be figured on one side the cross of Christ, and on the other a sphere, which was the device of the King Dom Manuel; and he ordered that this cruzado should pass in the place (Goa) for 480 reis, to prevent their being exported and he ordered silver money to be struck which was of the value of a bargany; on this money he caused to be figured on one side a Greek A, and on the other side a sphere, and gave the coin the name of Espera; it was worth 2 vinntas: also there were half esperas worth one vinnta; and he made bazarucos of copper of the weight belonging to that coin, with the A and the sphere; and each bazaruc was divided into 4 coins which they called cepeynos (see SAPECAS), and gave the bazarucos the name of leacs. And in changing the cruzado into these smaller coins it was reckoned at 480 reis."—Correa, ii. 76-77.

1516.—"There are current here (in Batical—see BATCUL) the pardaos, which are a gold coin of the kingdom, and it is worth here 360 reis, and there is another coin of silver, called damas, which is worth 20 reis."

"There is used in this city (Bis-nagar) and throughout the rest of the Kingdom much pepper, which is carried hither from Malabar on oxen and asses; and it is all bought and sold for pardoos, which are made in some places of this Kingdom, and especially in a city called Hora (f), whence they are called hortos."—Barboes, Lisbon ed.
p. 297.

1552.—"Hic Sinam mercatorem indies exspecto, quo cum, propter auroe poenae propositas in qui advenam sine fide publica introduxerint, Pardais ducentis transagger, ut ime in Cantonem tradieant."—Sci. Franc.
Xanverri Epist., Praga, 1587, IV. xiv.

1553.

"R. Let us mount our horses and take a ride in the country, and as we ride you shall tell me what is the meaning of Nizamora (see NIXAMALUCO), as you have frequently mentioned such a person.

"O. I can tell you that at once; it is the name of a King in the Bagelat (read Balagat, Balaghaut), whose father I often attended, and the son also not so often.
I received from him from time to time more than 12,000 pardoos; and he offered me an income of 12,000 pardoos if I would pay him a visit of several months every year, but this I did not accept."—Garcia, f. 33c.

1554.—"For the money of Goa there is a kind of money made of lead and tin melted together, being the thick and round, and stamped on the one side with the monop or globe of the world, and on the other side two arrows and five rounds; and this kind of money is called Basarucki, and 15 of them make a vintone of naughty money, and 5 vintons make a tanga, and 4 vintons make a tanga of base money ... and 5 tangoes make a scrapone of gold" (read 'of silver'), which in merchandize is worth 5 tangoes good money: but if one would change them into basaruckies, he may have 5 tangoes, and 16 basaruckies, which matter they call ceraffaggio, and when the bargain of the pardaw is gold, each pardaw is meant to be 6 tangoes good money, but in merchandize, the vee is not to demand pardoos of gold in Goa, except it be for jewels and horses, for all the rest they take of scrapones of silver, per aduiso.

The ducat of gold is worth 9 tangoes and a half good money, and yet not stable in price, for that when the ships depart from Goa to Cochin, they pay them at 9 tangoes and 3 fourth parts, and 10 tangoes, and that is the most that they are worth. . . ."—W. Barret, in Hakl. ii. 410. I retain this for the old English, but I am sorry to say that I find it is a mere translation of the notes of Gasparo Balbi, who was at Goa in 1580. We learn from Balbi that there were in Goa not only of good money worth 75 basarucki, and of bad money worth 18 basarucki, but also of another kind of bad money used in buying wood, worth only 50 basarucki /

1598.—"The principall and commonest money is called Pardawes Xeraphines, and is silver, but very brasse (read ' base '), and is coyened in Goa. They have Saint Sebastian on the one side, and three or four arrows in a bundle on the other side, worth as three Testones, or three hundred Reja Portingall money, and riseth or falleth little less or more, according to the exchange.
There is also another kind of money which is called Tangas, not that there is any such coined, but are so named only in telling, five Tangas is one Pardaw or Xeraphine, paidde money, or you must understand that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde . . . Wherefore when they buy and sell, they bargain for good or badde money," etc.—Linschoten, ch. 35; [Hak.
Soc. i. 241, and for another version see XERAPHINE].

They have a kind of money called Pagodes which is of Gold, of two or two or three sortes, and are above 8 tangas in value. They are Indian and Spanish money, with the feature of a Devil upon them, and therefore they are called Pagodes.
There is another kind of gold money, which is called Venetanderi; some of Venice, and some of Turkish coins, and are commonly (worth) 2 Pardawes Xeraphines. There is yet another kind of gold called S. Thomas, because Saint Thomas is figured thereon and is worth about 7 and 8 Tangas: There are likewise Rialles of 8 which are brought from Portingall, and are Pardaves de Reales.
. . . They are worth at their first coming out 436 Reyes of Portingall; and after are raised by exchague, as they are sought for when men travel for China . . . They use in Goa in money buying in a certaine manner of reckoning or telling.
There are Pardaves Xeraphines, and these are silver. They name likewise Pardaves of Gold, and those are not in kinder or in coyno, but onely so named in telling and reckoning:
for when they buy and sell Pearles, stones, goles, silver and horses, the name but so many Pardaves, and then you must under stand that one Pardaw is sixe Tangas: but in other wise, when you make not your bargaine before hand, but plainly name Pardaves, they are Pardaves Xeraphines of 5 Tangas the pcece. They use also to say a Pardaw of Lariins (see LABIN), and are five Lariins for every Pardaw. . . ."—Ibid.; [Hak. Soc. i. 187].

This extract is long, but it is the com-pleteest picture we know of the Goa currency.
We gather from the passage (including a part that we have omitted) that in the latter part of the 18th century there were reallly no national coins there used intermediate between the basarucki, worth at this time 0'13duk., and the pardaw xerain worth 50d. The vintens and tanguis that were nominally interposed were mere names for certain quantities of basarucos, or rather of rei represented by basarucos. And our interpretation of the statement about pardas of gold in a note above is here expressly confirmed.

PARELL, n.p. The name of a northern suburb of Bombay where stands the residence of the Governor. The statement in the Imperial Gazetteer that Mr. W. Hornby (1776) was the first Governor who took up his residence at Parell requires examination, as it appears to have been so occupied in Grose's time. The 2nd edition of Grose, which we use, is dated 1772, but he appears to have left India about 1760. It seems probable that in the following passage Niebuhr speaks of 1763-4, the date of his stay at Bombay, but as the book was not published till 1774, this is not absolutely certain. Evidently Parell was occupied by the Governor long before 1776.

"Les Jesuites avoient autrefois un beau couvent aupres du Village de Parell au milieu de l'Inde, mais il y a deja plusieurs annees, qu'elle est devenue la maison de campagne du Gouverneur, et l'Eglise est actuellement une magnifique salle a manger et de danse, qu'on n'en trouve point de pareille en toutes les Indes." — Niebuhr, Voyage, ii. 12.

[Mr. Douglas (Bombay and W. India, ii. 7, note) writes: "High up and outside the dining-room, and which was the chapel when Parell belonged to the Jesuits, is a plaque on which is printed: — 'Built by Honourable Hornby, 1771.']"

1554.—Parell is mentioned as one of 4aldoes, "Parell, Varella, Vrell, and Siva, attached to the Kasbah (Çasbe—see CUSBARH) of Maim." — Botelho, Tombo, 157, in Subdivision.

c. 1750-60. — "A place called Parell, where the Governor has a very agreeable country-house, which was originally a Romish chapel belonging to the Jesuits, but confiscated about the year 1719, for some foul practices against the English interest." — Grose, i. 48; [1st ed. 1757, p. 72].

PARIKH, PARRIAR, &c., a.

The name of a low caste of Hindus in Southern India, constituting one of the most numerous castes, if not the most numerous, in the Tamil country. The word in its present shape means properly 'a drummer.' Tamil pari is the large drum, beaten at certain festivals, and the hereditary beaters of it are called (sing.) pariyan, (pl.) parian. [Dr. Oppert's theory (Orig. Inhabitants, 32 seq.) that the word is a form of Pahariya, 'a mountaineer' is not probable.] In the city of Madras this caste forms one fifth of the whole population, and from it come (unfortunately) most of the domestics in European service in that part of India. As with other castes low in caste-rank they are also low in habits, frequently eating carrion and other objectionable food, and addicted to drink. From their coming into contact with and under observation of Europeans, more habitually than any similar caste, the name Pariy has come to be regarded as applicable to the whole body of the lowest castes, or even to denote outcastes or people without any caste. But this is hardly a correct use. There are several castes in the Tamil country considered to be lower than the Pariy, e.g. the caste of shoemakers, and the lowest caste of washermen. And the Pariy deals out the same disparaging treatment to those that he himself receives from higher castes. The Pariy constitute a well-defined, distinct, ancient caste, which has 'subdivisions' of its own, its own peculiar usages, its own traditions, and its own jealousy of the encroachments of the castes which are above it and below it. They constitute, perhaps, the most numerous caste in the Tamil country. In the city of Madras they number 21 per cent. of the Hindu people." — Bp. Coldwell, u. t., p. 545. Sir Walter Elliot, however, in the paper referred to further on includes under the term Pariy all the servile class not recognised by Hindus of caste as belonging to their community.

A very interesting, though not con-inclusive, discussion of the ethnological position of this class will be found in Bp. Caldwell’s Dravidian Grammar (pp. 540-554). That scholar’s deduction is, on the whole, that they are probably Dravidians, but he states, and recognizes force in, arguments for believing that they may have descended from a race older in the country than the proper Dravidian, and reduced to slavery by the first Dravidians. This last is the view of Sir Walter Elliot, who adduces a variety of interesting facts in its favour, in his paper on the Characteristics of the Population of South India.*

Thus, in the celebration of the Festival of the Village Goddess, prevalent all over Southern India, and of which a remarkable account is given in that paper, there occurs a sort of Saturnalia in which the Pariahs are the officiating priests, and there are several other customs which are most easily intelligible on the supposition that the Pariahs are the representatives of the earliest inhabitants and original masters of the soil. In a recent communication from this venerable man he writes: ‘My brother (Col. C. Elliot, C.B.) found them at Raipur, to be an important and respectable class of cultivators. The Pariahs have a sacerdotal order amongst themselves.’ [The view taken in the Madras Gloss, is that ‘they are distinctly Dravidian without fusion, as the Hinduised castes are Dravidian with fusion.’]

The mistaken use of pariah, as synonymous with out-caste, has spread in English parlance over all India. Thus the lamented Prof. Blochmann, in his School Geography of India: ‘Outcasts are called pariahs.’ The name first became generally known in Europe through Somner’s Travels (pub. in 1782, and soon after translated into English). In this work the Pariahs figure as the lowest of castes.

The common use of the term is however probably due, in both France and England, to the appearance in the Abbé Raynal’s famous Hist. Philosophique des Etablissements dans les Indes, formerly read very widely in both countries, and yet more perhaps to its use in Bernardin de St. Pierre’s posthumous work, once popular tale, La Chauve-Souris Indienne, whence too the misplaced halo of sentiment which reached its acme in the drama of Casimir Delavigne, and which still in some degree adheres to the name. It should be added that Mr. C. P. Brown says expressly: ‘The word Paria is unknown’ (in our sense) ‘to all natives, unless as learned from us.”

b. See PARIAH-DOG.

1516.—‘There is another low sort of Gentiles, who live in desert places, called Pareas. These likewise have no dealings with anybody, and are reckoned worse than the low caste, and avoided by everybody; a man becomes contaminated by only looking at them, and is excommunicated.... They live on the imane (inane, i.e. yama), which are like the root of inca or betale found in the West Indies, and on other roots and wild fruits.”—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. f. 310. The word in the Spanish version transl. by Lord Stanley of Alderley is Parent, in the Portuguese of the Lisbon Academy, Parérras. So we are not quite sure that Pareas is the proper reading, though this is probable.

1626.—‘... The Pareas are of worse esteeeme.”—(W. Method, in Purchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

... the worst whereof are the abhorred Piriares... they are in publike Justice the hateful executioners, and are the basest, most stinking, ill-favored people that I have seen.”—Ibid. 998-9.

1648.—... the servants of the factory even will not touch it (beef) when they put it on the table, nevertheless there is a caste called Pareyes (they are the most contemned of all, so that if another Gentoo touches them, he is compelled to be dipp’d in the water) who eat it freely.”—Van de Broecke, 82.

1672.—‘The Parées are the basest and vilest race (accustomed to remove dung and all uncleanness, and to eat mice and rats), in a word a contemned and stinking vile people.”—Baldaeus (Germ. ed.), 410.

1711.—‘The Company allow two or three Feons to attend the Gate, and a Pareer Fellow to keep all clean.”—Lockyer, 20.

... And there... is such a resort of basket-makers, Scavengers, people that look after the buffaloes, and other Paréras, to drink Toddy, that all the Punch-houses in Madras have not half the noise in them."

"Wheeler, ii. 125.

1717.—"Barrier, or a sort of poor people that eat at all sort of Flesh and other things which others deem unclean."—Phillips, Account, &c., 127.

1726.—"As for the separate generations and sorts of people who embrace this religion, there are, according to what some folks say, only 4; but in our opinion they are 6 in number, viz.:

a. The Brahmins.
b. The Settress.
c. The Perras, whom the High-Dutch and Danes call Barriara."—Valentijn, Chorom, 73.

1735.—"Les Parrias . . . [are regarded as geni spirits by] all the hourene and prérogatives. Jusques là qu'on ne saurait les souffrir, ni dans les Pagodes des Gentils, ni dans les Eglises des Jesuites."—Berbert, i. 71.

1750.—"The idol is placed in the centre of the building, so that the Paria who are not admitted into the temple may have a sight of it through the gates."—Raynal, Hist. &c., see ed. 1783, i. 63.

1780.—"If you should ask a common cooly, or porter, what cast he is of, he will answer, 'the same as master, parair-cast.'"—Muurra's Narratives, 29-9.

1787.—"I cannot persuade myself that it is judicious to admit Parias into battalions with men of respectable castes.

Col. Fullarton’s View of English Interests in India, 222.

1791.—"Le masochi y courut pour allumer un flambeau; mais il revient un peu après,parse haine, criant: 'N’approchez pas d’ici; il y a un Paria!' Aussitôt le bois se fuit, criant: 'Un Paria! Un Paria!' Le docteur, croyant que c’était quelque animal féroce, mit la main sur ses pistolets. 'Qu’est ce qu’un Paria? demanda-t-il à son porte-flambeau.'"—B. de St. Pierre, La Chauvêtre Indienne, 48.

1800.—"The Pariar, and other impure tribes, comprising what are called the Punchum Bundum, would be beaten, were they to attempt joining in a Procession of any of the gods of the Brahmins, or entering any of their temples."—Buchanan’s Mysoor, i. 20.

c. 1805—6.—"The Dubashes, then all powerful at Madras, threatened loss of cast and absolute destruction to any Brahmin who should dare to unveil the mysteries of their language to a Pariar Frenzi. This reproach of Pariar is what we have tamely and strangely submitted to for a long time, when we might with a great facility have assumed the respectable character of Chatriya."—Letter of Legden, in Morton’s Memoir, ed. 1819, p. lvi.

1809.—"Another great obstacle to the reception of Christianity by the Hindoos, is the admission of the Parias in our Churches. . . ."—Ibid. Valeria, i. 246.

1821.—"Il est sur ce rivage une race fâchée, une race étrangère au sein de sa patrie. Sans abri protecteur, sans temple hospitalier, Abominable, impie, horrible au peuple entier. Les Parias: le jour à regret les éclaire, la terre sur son sein les porte avec colère. . . . Eh bien! mais je frémis; tu vas me faire peut-être; Je suis un Paria. . . ."

1843.—"The Christian Pariah, whom both sects curse, Does all the good he can and loves his brother."—Forster’s Life of Dickens, ii. 31.

1873.—"The Tamias hire a Pariya (i.e. drummer) to perform the decapitation at their Badra Kali sacrifices."—Nitled, in Ind. Ant. ii. 170.

1878.—"L’hypothèse la plus vraisemblable, en tout cas la plus heureuse, est celle qui suppose que le nom propre et spécial de cette race [i.e. of the original race inhabiting the Deccan before contact with northern invaders] était le mot ‘paria’; ce mot dont l’orthographe correcte est pariyah, dérivé de parai, ‘bruit, tambour,’ et à très-bien, pu avoir le sens de ‘parleur, doux de la parole’?"—Hovelacque and Vinson, Études de Linguistique, &c., Paris, 67.

1872.—"Fifine, ordained from first to last, In body and in soul For one life-long debauch, The Pariah of the north, The European nautch."—Browning, Fifine at the Fair.

Very good rhyme, but no reason. See under NAUTCH.

The word seems also to have been adopted in Java, e.g.:

1860.—"We Europeans . . . often. . stand far behind compared with the poor parıahas."—Max Havelaar, ch. vii.
PARIAH-ARRACK. s. In the 17th and 18th centuries this was a name commonly given to the poisonous native spirit commonly sold to European soldiers and sailors. [See FOOL'S RACK.]

1671-72.—"The unwholesome liquor called Parriair-arrack..."—Sir W. Langhorne, in Wheeler, iii. 422.

1711.—"The Tobacco, Beetle, and Pariah Arrack, on which such great profit arises, are all expended by the Inhabitants."—Locyler, 13.

1754.—"I should be very glad to have your order to bring the ship up to Calcutta which though generally to he seen about the shore."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 79.

1824.—"The other beggar was a Pariah dog, who sneaked down in much bodily fear to our bivouac."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 78.

1875.—"Le Musulman qui va prier à la mosquée, maudit les parias bonnes."—Rec. des Deux Mondes, April, 539.

1883.—"Paraya Dogs are found in every street."—T. V. Row, Man. of Tanjore Dist. 104.]

PARIAH-DOG. s. The common ownerless yellow dog, that frequents all inhabited places in the East, is universally so called by Europeans, no doubt from being a low-bred casteless animal; often elliptically 'pariah' only.

1789.—"... A species of the common cur, called a pariar-dog."—Munro, Narr. p. 36.

1810.—"The nuisance may be kept circling for days, until forcibly removed, or until the pariah dogs swim in, and draw the carcass to the shore."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 281.

1824.—"The other beggar was a Pariah dog, who sneaked down in much bodily fear to our bivouac."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 78.

1875.—"Le Musulman qui va prier à la mosquée, maudit les parias bonnes."—Rec. des Deux Mondes, April, 539.

1883.—"Paraya Dogs are found in every street."—T. V. Row, Man. of Tanjore Dist. 104.

PARIAH-KITE. s. The commonest Indian kite, Milvus Govinda, Sykes, notable for its great numbers, and its impudence. "They are excessively bold and fearless, often snatching morsels off a dish en route from kitchen to hall, and even, according to Adams, seizing a fragment from a man's very mouth" (Jerdon). Compare quotation under BRAHMINY KITE.

1880.—"I had often supposed that the scavenger or Pariah Kites (Milvus govinda), which though generally to been seen about the tents, are not common in the jungles, must follow the camp for long distances, and today I had evidence that such was the case. ..."—Ball, Jungle Life, 655.

PARSEE. n.p. This name, which distinguishes the descendants of those emigrants of the old Persian stock, who left their native country, and, retaining their Zoroastrian religion, settled in India to avoid Mahommedan persecution, is only the old form of the word for a Persian, viz., Parsi, which Arabic influences have in more modern times converted into Parsi. The Portuguese have used both Parsee and Parsi. From the latter some of our old travellers have taken the form Peroe; from the former doubtless we got Parsee. It is a curious example of the way in which different accidental mouldings of the same word come to denote entirely different ideas, that Persian, in this form, in Western India, means a Zoroastrian fire-worshipper, whilst Pathi (see PANTHAY), a Burmese corruption of the same word, in Burma means a Mahommedan.

c. 1528.—"There be also other pagan-folk in this India who worship fire; they bury not their dead, neither do they burn them, but cast them into the midst of a certain roofless tower, and there expose them totally uncovered to the fowls of heaven. These believe in two First Principles, to wit, of Evil and of Good, of Darkness and of Light."—Friar Jordana, 21.

1552.—"In any case he dismissed them with favour and hospitality, showing himself glad of the coming of such personages, and granting them protection for their ships as being (Parsees) Persians of the Kingdom of Ormuz."—Barros, i. viii. 2.

1863.—"There are other barb-sellers (mercadores de boticas) called Coaris, and in the Kingdom of Cambay they call them Esparcis, and we Portuguese call them Jews, but they are not, only Hindus who came from Persia and have their own writing."—Oreira, p. 213.

1618.—"There is one sect among the Gentiles, which neither burns nor interre their dead (they are called Parsees) who incircle pieces of ground with high stone walls, remote from houses or Road-wayses, and therein lay their Carcasses, wrapped in Sheets, thus having no other Tombs, but the gorges of raenous Fowlers."—Terr, in Purchas, ii. 1479.

1830.—"Whilst my observation was bestowed on such inquiry, I observed in the town of Surat, the place where I resided, another Sect called the Peroeas. ..."—Lord, Two Forraigne Sects.
1838.—"Outre les Benjans il y a encore vne autre sorte de Payens dans le royaume de Guzuratte, qu'ils apppellent Parsees. Ce sont des Perses de Fars, et de Chorasan."—Mandelale (Paris, 1659), 213.

1648.—"They (the Persians of India, i.e. Persées) are in general a fast-gripping and avaricious nation (not unlike the Benjans and the Chinese), and very peepul in buying and selling."—Van Twest, 48.

1658.—"Les Ottomans apppellent guerre vne sorte de Payens, que nous connaissons sous le nom d'adorateurs du feu, les Persans sous celuy d'Atchperds, et les Indous sous celuy de Parsi, termes dont ils se nomment eux-mêmes."—De la Boullaye-le-Geu, ed 1657, p. 200.

1672.—"Non tutti ancora de' Gentili sono d'una medesima fede. Alcuni descendono dalli Persiani, li quali si conoscono dal colore, ed adorano il fuoco. . . In Suratt ne trovai molti."—P. F. Vincenzo Maria, Viaggio, 254.

1727.—"On this side of the Water are people of another Offspring than those we have yet mentioned, these be called Parseys . . . these are somewhat white, and I think nastier than the Gentues."—Fryer, 117.

"The Parsees, as they are called, are of the old Stock of the Persians, worship the Sun and Adore the Elements; are known only about Surat."—Ibid. p. 197.

1729.—". . . the Persées are a Sect very considerable in India. . . ."—Ovington, 370.

1726.—". . . to say a word of a certain other sort of Heathen who have spread in the City of Suratte and in its whole territory, and who also maintain themselves in Agra, and in various places of Persia, especially in the Province of Kerman, at Yezd, and in Isphahan. They are commonly called by the Indians Parsees or Parsees, but by the Persians Gava or Gehenra, and also Atech Pera or adorers of Fire."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte) 153.

1727.—"The Parsees are numerous about Surat and the adjacent Countries. They are a remnant of the ancient Persians."—A. Hamilton, ch. xiv; [ed. 1744, i. 159].

1877.—"En se levant, le Parsi, après s'être lavé les mains et la figure avec l'urine du taureau, mit sa ceinture en disant: Souverain soit Ormuzd, abattu soit Ahrimân."—Darmesteter, Ormuzd et Ahriman, p. 2.

PARVOE, PURVO, s. The popular name of the writer-caste in Western India, Prabhā or Parbhā, 'lord or chief' (Skt. prabhā), being an honorific title assumed by the caste of Kāthā or Kīyasthā, one of the mixt castes which commonly furnished writers. A Bombay term only.

1548.—"And to the Purvo of the Tenadar Mor 1800 reis a year, being 3 pardoos a month . . ."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 211.

1567.—See Paibua under CASSIS.

[1773.—"Conoscopola (see CONICOPOLY). . . At Bombay he is stiled Purvo, and is of the Gentoo religion."—Ibid. 49 sq.]

1809.—"The Bramins of this village speak and write English; the young men are mostly parvoes, or writers."—Maria Graham, 11.

1813.—"These writers at Bombay are generally called Purvoes; a faithful diligent class."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 150-157; [2nd ed. i. 100].

1833.—"Every native of India on the Bombay Establishment, who can write English, and is employed in any office, whether he be a Brahman, Goldsmith, Parwary, Portuguese, or of English descent, is styled a Purvoe, from several persons of a caste of Hindoos termed Prabhā having been among the first employed as English writers at Bombay."—Mackintosh on the Trile of Ramooosia, p. 77.

PASADOB, s. A marlin-spike. Sea-Hind., from Port. passador.—Roebuck.

PASEI, PACEM, n.p. The name of a Malay State near the N.E. point of Sumatra, at one time predominant in those regions, and reckoned, with Malacca and Majapahit (the capital of the Empire of Java), the three greatest cities of the Archipelago. It is apparently the Batam of Marco Polo, who visited the coast before Islam had gained a footing.

c. 1292.—"When you quit the kingdom of Ferlec you enter upon that of Batam. This also is an independent kingdom, and the people have a language of their own; but they are just like beasts, without laws or religion."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 9.

1511.—"Next day we departed with the plunder of the captured vessel, which also we had with us; we took our course forward until we reached another port in the same island Trapobana (Sumatra), which was called Passe; and anchoring in the said port we found at anchor there several junks and ships from divers parts."—Em- poli, p. 65.

1553.—"In the same manner he (Diogo Lopes) was received in the kingdom of Pacem . . . and as the King of Pedir had given him a cargo of pepper . . . he did not think well to go further . . . in case . . . they should give news of his coming at Malaca, those two ports of Pedir and Pacem being much frequented by a multitude of ships that go there for cargoes."—Burias, II. iv. 31.
PÁT, s. A can or pot. Sea-Hind. from English.—Roebuck.

PÁTACA, PÁTACOON, s. Ital. patacco; Provenc. patuc; Port. pataca and patação; also used in Malayalam. A term, formerly much diffused, for a dollar or piece of eight. Littre connects it with an old French word patard, a kind of coin, "du reste, origine incounee." But he appears to have overlooked the explanation indicated by Volney (Voyage en Egypte, &c., ch. ix. note) that the name abūtāka (or corruptly būtaka, see also Dozy & Eng. s.v.) was given by the Arabs to certain coins of this kind with a scutcheon on the reverse, the term meaning 'father of the window, or niche'; the scutcheon being taken for such an object. Similarly, the pillar-dollars are called in modern Egypt abū medīja, 'father of a cannon'; and the Maria Theresa dollar abū tēra, 'father of the bird.' But on the Red Sea, where only the coinage of one particular year (or the modern imitation thereof, still struck at Trieste from the old die), is accepted, it is abū nuĝat, 'father of dots,' from certain little points which mark the right issue.

PATCH, s. "Thin pieces of cloth at Madras" (Indian Vocabulary, 1788). Wilson gives patch as a vulgar abbreviation for Telug. pach'chadamu, "a particular kind of cotton cloth, generally 24 cubits long and 2 broad; two cloths joined together.'

PATCHOULI, PATCH-LEAF, s. In Beng. pachapāt; Deccani Hind.
pacholi. The latter are trade names of the dried leaves of a labiate plant allied to mint (Pogostemon patchouly, Pelletier). It is supposed to be a cultivated variety of Pogostemon Heyneanus, Bentham, a native of the Deccan. It is grown in native gardens throughout India, Ceylon, and the Malay Islands, and the dried flowering spikes and leaves of the plant, which are used, are sold in every bazar in Hindustan. The pacha-pit is used as an ingredient in tobacco for smoking, as hair-scent by women, and especially for stuffing mattresses and laying among clothes as we use lavender. In a fluid form patchouli was introduced into England in 1844, and soon became very fashionable as a perfume.

The origin of the word is a difficulty. The name is alleged in Drury, and in Forbes Watson's Nomenclature to be Bengali. Littre says the word patchouli is patchey-elley, 'feuille de patchey'; in what language we know not; perhaps it is from Tamil pachcha, 'green,' and tâlatam, an aromatic perfume for the hair. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tamil pâccili, pâccai, 'green,' ilai, 'leaf.]

1678.—"Note, that if the following Goods from Achen hold out the following Rates, the Factor employed is no further responsible.

Patch Leaf, 1 Bahar Maunds 7 20 seas.—Fryer, 209.

PATECA, s. This word is used by the Portuguese in India for a water-melon (Citrullus vulgaris, Schrader; Cucurbita Citrullus, L.). It is from the Ar. al-battikh or al-biitikh. F. Johnson gives this 'a melon, musk-melon. A pumpkin; a cucurbitaceous plant.' We presume that this is not merely the too common dictionary looseness, for the chaos of cucurbitaceous nomenclature, both vulgar and scientific, is universal (see A. De Candolle, Origine des Plantes cultivées). In Lane's Modern Egyptians (ed. 1837, i. 200) the word butteeh is rendered explicitly 'water-melon.' We have also in Spanish albadeca, which is given by Dozy and Eng. as 'espèce de melon'; and we have French pastique, which we believe always means a water-melon. De Candolle seems to have no doubt that the water-melon was cultivated in ancient Egypt, and believes it to have been introduced into the Graeco-Roman world at the beginning of our era; whilst Hehn carries it to Persia from India, 'whether at the time of the Arabian or of the Mongol domination, (and then) to Greece, through the medium of the Turks, and to Russia, through that of the Tartar States of Astrakan and Kazan.'

The name pateca, looking to the existence of the same word in Spanish, we should have supposed to have been Portuguese long before the Portuguese establishment in India; yet the whole of what is said by Garcia de Orta is inconsistent with this. In his Colloquio XXXVI. the gist of the dialogue is that his visitor from Europe, Ruano, tells how he had seen what seemed a most beautiful melon, and how Garcia's housekeeper recommended it, but on trying it, it tasted only of mud instead of melon! Garcia then tells him that at Diu, and in the Bâlaghat, &c., he would find excellent melons with the flavour of the melons of Portugal but "those others which the Portuguese here in India call patecas are quite another thing—huge round or oval fruits, with black seeds—not sweet (doce) like the Portuguese melons, but bland (suave), most juicy and cooling, excellent in bilious fevers, and congestions of the liver and kidneys, &c." Both name and thing are represented as novelties to Ruano. Garcia tells him also that the Arabs and Persians call it batee ìndî, i.e. melon of India (F. Johnson gives 'bîtîch-i-hindi, the citrul'; whilst in Persian hindwana is also a word for water-melon) but that the real Indian country name was (calangari Mahr. kailingar, [perhaps that known in the N.W.P. as kalinda, 'a water-melon']). Ruano then refers to the budicecas of Castille of which he had heard, and queries if these were not the same as these Indian patecas, but Garcia says they are quite different. All this is curious as implying that the water-melon was strange to the Portuguese at that time (1563; see Colloquis, f. 141v. seqq.).

[A friend who has Burnell's copy of Garcia De Orta tells me that he finds a note in the writing of the former on bateca: "i.e. the Arabic term. As this is used all over India, water-melons must have been imported by the Mahommedans." I believe it to be a mistake that the word is in use all over India. I do not think the word is ever used in Upper India, nor is it (in that sense) in either Shakespeare or Fallon. [Platte gives: A. bititkh, a.m. The melon (khar buza); the water-melon, Cucurbita citrullus.] The most common word in the N.W.P. for a water-melon is Pers. tarbuz, whilst the musk-melon is Pers. khar biza. And these words are so rendered from the Ain respectively by Blochmann (see his E.T. i. 66, “melons... water-melons,” and the original i. 67, “khar buza... tarbus”). But with the usual chaos already alluded to, we find both these words interpreted in F. Johnson as “water-melon.” And according to Hehn the latter is called in the Slav tongues arbus and in Mod. Greek karpovoua, the first as well as the last probably from the Turkish karpuz, which has the same meaning, for this hard k is constantly dropt in modern pronunciation.—H. Y.] We append a valuable note on this from Prof. Robertson-Smith:

“(1) The classical form of the Ar. word is bititkh. Battitkh is a widely-spread vulgarism, indeed now, I fancy, universal, for I don’t think I ever heard the first syllable pronounced with an i.

“(2) The term, according to the law-books, includes all kinds of melons (Lane); but practically it is applied (certainly at least in Syria and Egypt) almost exclusively to the water-melon, unless it has a limiting adjective. Thus “the wild bititkh” is the coloynth, and with other words it may be used of very various cucurbitaceous fruits (see examples in Dozy’s Suppt.)

“(6) The biblical form is dabattikh (e.g. Numbers xi. 5, where the E.V. has ‘melons’). But this is only the water-melon; for in the Mishna it is distinguished from the sweet melon, the latter being named by a mere transcription in Hebrew letters of the Greek μπαττήκων. Low justly concludes that the Palestinians (and the Syrians, for their name only differs slightly) got the sweet melon from the Greeks, whilst for the water-melon they have an old and probably true Semitic word. For battitkh Syriac has qaattitkh, indicating that in literary Arabic the a has been changed to i, only to agree with rules of grammar. Thus popular pronunciation seems always to have kept the old form, as popular usage seems always to have used the word mainly in its old specific meaning. The Bible and the Mishna suffice to refute Hehn’s view (of the introduction of the water-melon from India). Old Kimhi, in his Miksol, illustrates the Hebrew word by the Spanish budiecas.”

1598.—“... ther is an other sort like Meloens, called Patecaes or Angurius, or Melons of India, which are out wardly of a darke greene colour; in the inside white with blacke kernels; they are verie waterish and hard to byte, and so moyst, that as a man eatest them his mouth is full of water, but yet verie sweet and verie cold and fresh meat, wherefore manie of them are eaten after dinner to coole men.”—Linschoten, 97; [Hak. Soc. ii. 35].

c. 1610.—“Toute la campagne est couverte d’arbres fruitiers... et d’arbres de coton, de quantité de melons et de pastèques, qui sont espèce de citrouilles de prodigieuse grosseur.”—Pyrard de Lamal, ed. 1679, i. 286; [Hak. Soc. i. 399, and see i. 33].

... A few pages later the word is written Pastèques.—Ibid. 301; [Hak. Soc. i. 417].

[1663.—“Pastèques, or water-melons, are in great abundance nearly the whole year round: but those of Delhi are soft, without colour or sweetness. If this fruit be ever found good, it is among the wealthy people, who import the seed and cultivate it with much care and expense.”—Berinier, ed. Constable, 250.]

1673.—“From hence (Elephants) we sailed to the Patachoes, a Garden of Melons (Puncho being a Melon) were there not wild Rates that hinder their growth, and so to Bombaim.”—Fryer, 78.

PATEL, POTAIL, s. The headman of a village, having general control of village affairs, and forming the medium of communication with the officers of Government. In Mahr. patil, Hind. patel. The most probable etym. seems to be from pat, Mahr. ‘a roll or. register,’ Skt.—Hind. patta. The title is more particularly current in territories that are or have been subject to the Mahrattas, “and appears to be an essentially Marathi word, being used as a respectful title in addressing one of that nation, or a Sūdra in general” (Wilson). The office is hereditary, and is often held under a Government grant. The title is not used in the Gangetic Provinces, but besides its use in Central and W. India it has been commonly employed in S. India, probably as a Hindustani word, though Monigar (see MONEGAR)
PATNA. n.p. The chief city of Bihar; and the representative of the Palibothra (Pataliputra) of the Greeks. Hind. Pattana, “the city.” [See quotation from D'Anville under ALLAHABAD.]

1586. — "From Banaras I went to Patanaw downe the riever of Ganges. . . . Patanaw is a very long and a great towne. In times past it was a kingdom, but now it is vnder Zelabdim Eshobar, the great Mogor. . . . In this towne there is a trade of cotton, and cloth of cotton, much sugar, which they carry from hence to Bengal and India, very much Opium, and other commodities." — R. Fick, in Hist. ii. 388.

1516. — "Bengala, a most spacious and fruitful Province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large Provinces within it, Perb (see POORUB) and Patan, the one lying on the east, and the other on the west side of the River Ganges." — Terry, ed. 1665, p. 357.

1650. — "Patna is one of the largest towns in India, on the margin of the Ganges, on its western side, and it is not less than two cass in length." — Tavemier, ed. Ball. i. 121 seq.

1673. — "Sir William Langham . . . is Superintendent over all the Factories on the coast of Coromandel, as far as the Bay of Bengal, and up Huggly River . . . viz. Fort St. George, alias Maderas, Petipotro, Mecklapatan, Qundore, Medalphon, Balasor, Bengalga, Huggly, Castle Bazzar, Patanaw." — Fryer, 38.

1727. — "Patana is the next Town frequented by Europeans . . . for Saltpetre and raw Silk. It produces also so much Opium, that it serves all the Countries in India with that commodity." — A. Hamilton, ii. 21; [ed. 1744].

PATOLA. s. Canarese and Malayal. pattuda, ‘a silk-cloth.’ In the fourth quotation it is rather misapplied to the Ceylon dress (see COMBOY).

1516. — "Coloured cottons and silks which the Indians call patola." — Barboes, 184.

1522. — " . . . Patolos of silk, which are cloths made atCambay that are highly prized at Malaca." — Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, 714.

1545. — " . . . homema . . . enchachados com patolos de seda." — Pinto, ch. cix. (Cogan, p. 219).

1552. — "They go naked from the waist upwards, and below it they are clothed with silk and cotton which they call patolos." — Castaneda, ii. 78.

This word has two senses:

a. A foot-runner, a courier. In this use the word occurs only in the older writers, especially Portuguese.

b. A kind of lateen-rigged ship, with one, two, or three masts, common on the west coast. This sense first occurs in Portugal, where it is very accurate, in the 16th century. In both senses the word is perhaps the Konkani path-mar, 'a courier.'

C. P. Brown, however, says that pathma, applied to a vessel, is Malayal, signifying "goose-wing." Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. gives both patemari and pathma for "a sort of swift-sailing vessel, a patimmar," with the etymology "tidings-bringer." Patta is 'tidings,' but the second part of the word so derived is not clear. Sir. J. M. Campbell, who is very accurate, in the Bo. Gazetteer writes of the vessel as patimmar, though a foot-runner, a courier. The Moorem, he says, writes patemari quasi path-mar, 'snake of victory.'

The Madras Gloss gives mal patamari, Tam. patimdar, from patar, Hind. 'tidings' (not in Platte), madri, Mahr. 'carrier.' According to a note in Notes and Extracts, No. 1 (Madras, 1871), p. 27, under a. Ft. St. Geo. Consultation of July 4, 1673, Patta mar is therein used "for a native vessel on the Coromandel Coast, though now confined to the Western Coast." We suspect a misapprehension. For in the following entry we have no doubt that the parenthetical gloss is wrong, and that couriers are meant:

1652.—"... But Lorenzo de Brito, seeing things come to such a pass that certain Captains of the King (of Cannanor) with troops chased him to the gates, he wrote to the Viceroy of the position in which he was by Pattamars, who are men that make great journeys by land."—De Barros, ii. i. 5.

The word occurs repeatedly in Correa, Lendas, e.g. III. i. 108, 149, &c.

1598.—"... There are others that are called Pattamars, which serve only for Messengers or Posts, to carry letters from place to place in land in winter-time when men cannot traverse by sea."—Linschoten, 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 260, and see ii. 165].

1606.—"The eight and twentieth, a Pattamar told that the Governor was a friend to us only in show, wishing the Portugals in our rooms; for we did no good in the Country, but brought Wares which they were forced to buy. ..."—Roger Haines, in Purchas, i. 605.

[1618.—"The Pattamar (for so in this country they call poor footmen that are letter-bearers). ..."]—Foster, Letters, iv. 227.

1666.—"Tranquebar, qui est eloigné de Saint Thomé de cinq journées d'un Courrier à pied, qu'on appelle Pattamar."—Thevenot, v. 275.

1673.—"After a month's Stay here a Pattamar (a Foot Post) from Fort St. George made us sensible of the Dutch being gone from thence to Ceylon."—Fryer, 36.

[1684.—"The Pattamar that went to Cuddalore by reason of the deepness of the Rivers were forced to Return."—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo. Ist ser. iii. 138.]

1689.—"A Pattamar, i.e. a Foot Messengers, is generally employ'd to carry them (letters) to the remotest Bounds of the Empire."—Ovington, 251.

1705.—"Un Pattamar qui est un homme du Pais; c'est ce que nous appelons un expresse..."—Luiller, 43.

1752.—"Yesterday returned a Pattamar or express to our Jew merchant from Aleppo, by the way of the Desert. ..."—Ives, 297.

1760.—"Between Bombay and Surat there is a constant intercourse preserved, not only by sea... but by Pattamars, or foot-messengers overland."—Grose, i. 119. This is the last instance we have met of the word in this sense, which is now quite unknown to Englishmen.

b:—

1800.—"... Escrevias que hum barco pequeno, dos que chamam petamares, so metroia. ..."—Luzena, Vida do P. F. Xavier, 185.

[1822.—"About 12 o'clock on the same night they embarked in Paddimars for Cochin."—Wallace, Fifteen Years, 206.]

1834.—A description of the Pattamars, with a plate, is given in Mr. John Edye's paper on Indian coasting vessels, in vol. i. of the R. As. Soc. Journal.

1860.—"Among the vessels at anchor lie the dows (see Dhow) of the Arabs, the petamares of Malabar, and the dhonays (see Doney) of Coromandel."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 103.

PATTELLO, PATELLEE.

a. A large flat-bottomed boat on the Ganges; Hind. patelif. [Mr. Grierson gives among the Behar boats "the patel or pattii, also called in Sāran kārī, on which the boards forming the sides overlap and are not joined edge to edge," with an illustration (Bihar Peasant Life, 42).]
PAULIST, n.p. The Jesuits were commonly so called in India because their houses in that country were formerly always dedicated to St. Paul, the great Missionary to the Heathen. They have given up this practice since their modern re-establishment in India. They are still called Paolotti in Italy, especially by those who don't like them.

c. 1567. — "I then went to the College of the Jesuit Fathers, the Church of which, like that at Damam, at Basaim, and at almost all the other cities of the Portuguese in India, is called San Paolo; whence it happens that in India the said Fathers are known more commonly by the name of Paulisti than by that of Jesuits." — F. della Valle, April 27; [iii. 135].

c. 1660. — "The Jesuits at Goa are known by the name of Paulists; by reason that their great Church is dedicated to St. Paul. Nor do they wear Hats, or Corner-Caps, as in Europe, but only a certain Bonnet, resembling the Skull of a Hat without the Brima." — Tassinier, E.T. 77; [ed. Ball, i. 197].

1672. — "There was found in the fortress of Cranganor a handsome convent, and Church of the Paulists, or disciples and followers of Ignatius Loyola." — Baldaeus, Germ., p. 110. In another passage this author says they were called Paulists because they were first sent to India by Pope Paul III. But this is not the correct reason.

1673. — "St. Paul's was the first Monastery of the Jesuits in Goa, from whence they receive the name Paulistins." — Fryer, 150.

[1710. — See quotation under COBRA DE CAPELLO.]

1760. — "The Jesuits, who are better known in India by the appellation of Paulists, from their head church and convent of St. Paul's in Goa." — Green, i. 50.

PAUNCHWAY, s. A light kind of boat used on the rivers of Bengal; like a large dingy (q.v.), with a tilted roof of matting or thatch, a mast and four oars. Beng. pañśī, and pannāī. [Mr. Grierson (Pondiac Life, 43) describes the pannāśī as a boat with a round bottom, but which goes in shallow water, and gives an illustration.]

[1757. — "He was then beckoning to his servant that stood in a Ponsy above the Gout." — A. Grant, Account of the Loss of Calcutta, ed. by Col. Temple, p. 7.]

c. 1760. — "Ponaways, Guard-boats." — Grosse (Glossary).

1780. — "The Paunchways are nearly of the same general construction (as budge-rows), with this difference, that the greatest breadth is somewhat further aft, and the stern lower." — Hodges, 39-40.

1790. — "Mr. Bridgwater was driven out to sea in a common paunchway, and when every hope forsook him the boat floated into the harbour of Masulipatam." — Calcutta Monthly Register, i. 40.

1823. — "... A paunchway, or passage-boat... was a very characteristic and interesting vessel, large and broad, shaped like a snuffer-dish; a dock fore-and-aft, and the middle covered with a roof of palm-branches..." — Heber, ed. 1844, i. 21.

1860. — "... You may suppose that I engage neither pinnace nor bujra (see BUDGEROW), but that comfort and economy are sufficiently obtained by hiring a small bhonila (see BOLIAH) ... what is more likely at a fine weather season like this, a small native punsee, which, with a double set of hands, or four oars, is a lighter and much quicker boat." — C. Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 10 [with an illustration].

PAWL, s. Hind. pañī, [Skt. patala, 'a roof']. A small tent with two light poles, and steep sloping sides; no walls, or ridge-pole. I believe the statement 'no ridge-pole,' is erroneous. It is difficult to derive from memory an exact definition of tents, and especially of the difference between pawl and shooldarry. A reference to India failed in getting a reply. The shooldarry is not essentially different from the pawl, but is trimmer, tauter, better closed, and sometimes has two flies. [The names of tents are used in various senses in different parts. The Madras Gloss defines a pawl as "a small tent with two light poles, a ridge-bar, and steep sloping sides; the walls, if any, are very short, often not more than 6 inches high. Sometimes a second ridge above carries a second roof over the first; this makes a common shooting tent.” Mr. G. R. Dampier writes: “These terms are, I think, used rather loosely in the N.W.P. Sholdāri generally means a servant’s tent, a sort of tent d’abri, with very low sides: the sides are generally not more than a foot high; there are no doors only flaps at one end. Pāl is generally used to denote a sleeping tent for Europeans; the roof slopes on both sides from a longitudinal ridge-pole; the sides are much higher than in the sholdāri, and there is a door at one end; the fly is almost invariably single. The Raoti (see BOWTEE) is incorrectly used in some places to denote a sleeping pāl; it is, properly speaking, I believe, a larger tent, of the same kind, but with doors in the side, not at the end. In some parts I have found they use the word pāl as equivalent to sholdāri and bilatan (? bell-tent).”

1785.—“Where is thge great quantity of baggage belonging to you, seeing that you have nothing besides tents, pawns, and other such necessary articles!”—Tippoo’s Letters, p. 49.

1783.—“There were not, I believe, more than two small Pauls, or tents, among the whole of the deputation that escorted us from Patna.”—Kirkpatrick’s Nepal, p. 118.

[1800.—“The shops which compose the Bazaars, are mostly formed of blankets or coarse cloth stretched over a bamboo, or some other stick for a ridge-pole, supported at either end by a forked stick fixed in the ground. These habitations are called paws.”—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 20.]

1827.—“It would perhaps be worth while to record . . . the material and personnel of my camp equipment; an humble captain and single man travelling on the most economical tent. One double-poled tent, one routee (see BOWTEE), or small tent, a pāl or servants’ tent, 2 elephants, 6 camels, 4 horses, a pony, a buggy, and 24 servants, besides mahouts, servants or camel-drivers, and tent pitchers.”—Mundy, Journal of a Tour in India, [3rd ed. p. 8]. We may note that this is an absurd exaggeration of any equipment that, even seventy-five years since, would have characterised the march of a humble captain travelling on economical principles, or any one under the position of a high-placed civilian. Captain Mundy must have been enormously extravagant.

[1849.—“. . . we breakfasted merrily under a Paul (a tent without walls, just like two cards leaning against each other).”—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 141.]

PAWN, s. The betel-leaf (q.v.) Hind. pān, from Skt. parṣa, ‘a leaf.’ 2 x

It is a North Indian term, and is generally used for the combination of betel, areca-nut, lime, &c., which is politely offered (along with otto of roses) to visitors, and which intimates the termination of the visit. This is more fully termed pawn-soopari (supari, [Skt. supariya, ‘pleasant,’] is Hind. for areca). “These leaves are not used to bee eaten alone, but because of their bitternesse they are eaten with a certain kind of fruit, which the Malabars and Portugalls call Arecca, the Gusurats and Decaniers Suparijs. . . .” (In Purchas, ii. 1781).

1616.—“The King giving mee many good words, and two pieces of his Pawne out of his Dish, to eate of the same he was eating. . . .”—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 576; [Hak. Soc. ii. 453].

1622.—“. . . a plant, whose leaves resemble a Heart, call’d here pān, but in other parts of India, Betlis.”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 36.]

1673.—“. . . it is only the Indian entertainment, commonly called Pawn.”—Fryer, p. 140.

1809.—“On our departure pawn and roses were presented, but we were spared the attar, which is every way detestable.”—Id. Valencia, i. 101.

PAWNEE, s. Hind. pāni, ‘water.’ The word is used extensively in Anglo-Indian compound names, such as bilayutee pawnee, ‘soda-water,’ brandy-pawnee, Khush-bo pawnee (for European scents), &c., &c. An old friend, Gen. J. T. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal), contributes from memory the following Hindi ode to Water, on the Pindaric theme āravata mēn ṇēdāp, or the Thaletic one ḍṛṣṭi de ṇānt ṇānt ṇēdāp !

Pāni āṭā, pāni dāl;
Pāni bāgh, pāni rammā;
Pāni Gāṅgā, pāni Jumān;
Pāni haṅkātā, pāni rotā;
Pāni jagātā, pāni sotā;
Pāni bāp, pāni mā;
Barā nām Pāni kā !”

Thus rudely done into English:

“Thou, Water, stor’st our Wells and Tanks, Thou fillest Gunga’s, Jumna’s banks;
Thou Water, sendest daily food,
And fruit and flowers and needful wood;
Thou, Water, laugh’st, thou, Water, weepest;
Thou, Water, wak’st, thou, Water, sleepest;
—Father, Mother, in thee blent,— Hail, 0 glorious element!”
PAWNEE, KALLA.  690  PEDIР.

PAWNEE, KALLA, s. Hind.  kalā pānī, i.e. 'Black Water'; the name of dread by which natives of the interior of India designate the Sea, with special reference to a voyage across it, and to transportation to penal settlements beyond it. "Hindu servants and sepoys used to object to cross the Indus, and called that the kalā pānī. I think they used to assert that they lost caste by crossing it, which might have induced them to call it by the same name as the ocean,—or possibly they believed it to be part of the river that flows round the world, or the country beyond it to be outside the limits of Aryavarta." (Note by Lt.-Col. J. M. Trotter)

1828. — "An agent of mine, who was for some days with Chetoo" (a famous Fendari leader), "told me he resided continually about Kala Panyee, and that one of his followers assured him when the Pindarri chief slept, he used in his dreams to repeat these dreaded words aloud."—Sir J. Malcolm, Central India (2nd ed.), i. 448.

1833. — "Kala Pany, dark water, in allusion to the Ocean, is the term used by the Natives to express transportation. Those in the interior picture the place to be an island of a very dreadful description, and full of malevolent beings, and covered with snakes and other vile and dangerous nondescript animals."—Macintosh, Acc. of the Tribe of Rambostes, 44.

PAYEN-GHAUT, n.p. The country on the coast below the Ghauts or passes leading up to the table-land of the Deccan. It was applied usually on the west coast, but the expression Carnatic Payen-ghaut is also pretty frequent, as applied to the low country of Madras on the east side of the Peninsula, from Hind. and Mahr. ghat, combined with Pers. pānī, 'below.' [It is generally used as equivalent to Talagāh, "but some Musalmans seem to draw the distinction that the Payingghāt is nearer to the foot of the Ghāts than the Talagāh." (Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 336.)]

1629-30. — "But (Aram Khān) found that the enemy having placed their elephants and baggage in the fort of Dhrādr, had the design of descending the Paying-ghāt."—Abdu'l Hamid Lahori, in Elliot, vii. 17.

1784. — "Peace and friendship... between the said Company and the Nabob Tippo Sultan Bahauder, and their friends and allies, particularly including therein the Rajahs of Tanjore and Travancore, who are friends and allies to the English and the Carnatic Payen Ghaunt."—Treaty of Mangalore, in Munro's Narr., 252.

1785. — "You write that the European taken prisoner in the Payen-ghaut... being skilled in the mortar practice, you propose converting him to the faith. It is known (or understood)."—Letters of Tippoo, p. 12.

PAZEND, s. See for meaning of this term s.v. Pahlavi, in connection with Zend. (See also quotation from Ma禹ši under latter.)

PECUL, PIKOL, s. Malay and Javanese pikul, 'a man's load.' It is applied as the Malay name of the Chinese weight of 100 katis (see CATTY), called by the Chinese themselves shih, and =133 lb. avoird. Another authority states that the shih is =120 kin or katis, whilst the 100 kin weight is called in Chinese tan.

1554. — "In China 1 tael weighs 7½ tanga larins of silver, and 16 taels =1 caté (see CATTY); 100 catés =1 piclo =45 tangas of silver weigh 1 mark, and therefore 1 piclo =133½ arrattes (see BOTTLE)."—A. Neeve, 41.

"And in China anything is sold and bought by catés and piclos and taels, provisions as well as all other things."—Ibid. 42.

[1616. — "The wood we have sold at divers prices from 24 to 28 mas per Picoll."—Foster, Letters, iv. 259.]

PEDIR, n.p. The name of a port and State of the north coast of Sumatra. Barros says that, before the establishment of Malacca, Pedir was the greatest and most famous of the States on that island. It is now a place of no consequence.

1498. — It is named as Pater in the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, but with very incorrect information. See p. 113.

1510. — "We took a junk and went towards Sumatra, to a city called Fider... In this country there grows a great quantity of pepper, and of long pepper which is called Malagac... in this port there are laden with it every year 18 or 20 ships, all of which go to Cathal."—Verdeixa, 233.

1511. — "And having anchored before the said Pedir, the Captain General (Albouque) sent for me, and told me that I should go ashore to learn the disposition of the people... and so I went ashore in the evening, the General thus sending me into a country of enemies,—people too whose vessels and goods we had seized, whose fathers, sons, and brothers we had killed;—into a country where even among themselves there is little justice, and treachery in plenty, still more as regards strangers; truly he acted as caring little what became of me. The answer given me was this: that I should tell the Captain Major General that the city of Pedir had been for a long time noble and great in trade...that its port was always free for every man to come and go in security...that they were men and not women, and that they could hold for no friend one who seized the ships visiting their harbours; and that if the General desired the King's friendship, let him give back what he had seized, and then his people might come ashore to buy and sell."—Letter of Gio. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 54.

1586.—"The Moors live in the seaports, and the Gentiles in the interior (of Sumatra). The principal kingdom of the Moors is called Pedir. Much very good pepper grows in it, which is not so strong or so fine as that of Malabar. Much silk is also grown there, but not so good as the silk of China."—Barros, 195.

1538.—"Furthermore I told him what course was usually held for the fishing of seed-pearl between Pullo Veracos and Pullo Queins, which in time past were carried by the Balas to Persia (see PASEI) and Pedir, and exchanged with the Turks of the Strait of Mecca, and the Ships of Judae (see JUDEA) for such Merchandise as they brought from Grand Cairo."—Pinto (in Coega), 25.

1553.—"After the foundation of Malaca, and especially after our entrance to the Indies, the Kingdom of Persia began to increase, and that of Pedir to wane. And its neighbour of Acham, which was then insignificant, is now the greatest of all, so vast are the vicissitudes in States of which men make so great account."—Barros, iii. v. 1.

1615.—"Articles exhibited against John Oxwicke. That since his being in Peedere 'he did not entreat' anything for Priam and Tecto, but only an answer to King James's letter..."—Sainsbury, 411.

"Peedere."—Ibid. p. 415.

PEEADEA. See under PEON.

PEENUS, s. Hind. pinas; a corruption of Eng. pinnace. A name applied to a class of budgerow rigged like a brig or brigantine, on the rivers of Bengal, for European use. Roebuck gives as the marine Hind. for pinnace, p'hanee. [The word has been adopted by natives in N. India as the name for a sort of palankin, such as that used by a bride.]
learned scholar. The tree is peculiarly destructive to buildings, as birds drop the seeds in the joints of the masonry, which becomes thus penetrated by the spreading roots of the tree. This is alluded to in a quotation below. "I remember noticing among many Hindus, and especially among Hinduized Sikhs, that they often say Hindiem, and especially among Hindus, to express 'I am going to say my prayers'.” (Lt.-Col. John Trotter.) (See BO-TREE.)

c. 1650.—"His soul quivered like a pipal leaf."—Ramayana of Tulsi Dta, by Grose (1878), ii. 25.

[c. 1690.—"In this place an arrow struck Sri Kishn and buried itself in a pipal tree on the banks of the Saraswati."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 246.]

1806.—"Au sortir du village un pipal élevé, une tente majestueuse... Se nombreux pèlerins l'entourent à loisir sur la plaine, telle qu'une armée de géants qui entrelacent fraternellement leurs bras informes."—Haafner, i. 149. This writer seems to mean a banyan. The pipal does not drop roots in that fashion.

1817.—"In the second ordeal, an excavation in the ground... is filled with a fire of pipal wood, into which the party must walk barefoot, proving his guilt if he is burned; his innocence, if he escapes unhurt."—Mill (quoting from Halbed), ed. 1830, i. 280.

1828.—"A little while after this he arose, and went to a Peepal-tree, a short way off, where he appeared busy about something, that I could not well make out what."—Pandurang Hari, 28; [ed. 1873, i. 36, reading Peepal].

1838.—"It is not proper to allow the English, after they have made war, and peace has been settled, to remain in the city. They are accustomed to act like the Peepal tree. Let not Younger Brother therefore allow the English to remain in his country."—Letter from Court of China to Court of Ava. See Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 265.

1894.—"Je ne puis passer sous silence deux beaux arbres... ce sont le peuplier d'Inde à larges feuilles, arbre reçu sacré..."—Falligov, Stram, i. 140.

1891.—"... Yonder crown of umbrage hoar Shall shield her well; the Peepul whisper a dirge And Caryota drop her tearlike store Of beads; whilst over all slim Casuarine Points upwards, with her branches ever green, To that remaining Rest where Night and Tears are o'er."—Barrackpore Park, 18th Nov. 1891.

PEEB. s. Pers. pit, a Mahomedan Saint or Beatus. But the word is used elliptically for the tombs of such personages, the circumstance pertaining to them which chiefly creates notoriety or fame of sanctity; and it may be remarked that wall (or Wely as it is often written), Immmadda, Shiskh, and Marabout (see ADJUTANT), are often used in the same elliptical way in Syria, Persia, Egypt, and Barbary respectively. We may add that Nabï (Prophet) is used in the same fashion.

[1609.—See under NUGUGUCOTE.

[1829.—"Within the Mosquita (see MOSQUE) is a kind of little Pyramid of Marble, and this they call Pir, that is Old, which they say is equivalent to Holy; I imagine it the Sepulchre of some one of their Sect accounted such."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 69.]

1665.—"On the other side was the Garden and the chambers of the Mussulins, who with great convenience and delight spend their lives there under the shadow of the miraculous Sanctity of this Pir, which they are not wanting to celebrate: But as I am always very unhappy on such occasions, he did no Miracle that day upon any of the sick."—Bernier, 133; [ed. Constable, 415].

1669.—"Hard by this is a Pir, or Burying place of one of the Prophets, being a goodly monument."—Frery, 240.

1689.—"Certaines piras sont tellement renommées, qu'ainsi qu'on le verra plus loin, le peuple a donné leurs noms aux mois lunaires où se trouvent placées les fêtes qu'on célèbre en leur honneur."—Garcia de Tassy, Rel. Musulns. p. 18.

The following are examples of the parallel use of the words named:

WALL:

1841.—"The highest part (of Hermon) crowned by the Wely, is towards the western end."—Robinson, Biblical Researches, iii. 173.

1883.—"In many of the villages of Syria the Traveller will observe small dome-covered buildings, with grated windows and surmounted by the crescent. These are the so-called Walls, mausoleums of saints, or tombs of sheikhs."—Baedeker's Egypt, Eng. ed. Pt. i. 150.

IMAMZADA:

1864.—"We rode on for three farsaks, or fourteen miles, more to another Imamzadah, called Kajsh-Girit..."—Baedeker, Three Years' Residence in Persia, ii. 46.

1883.—"The few villages... have numerous walled gardens, with rows of poplar and willow-trees and stunted mulberries, and the inevitable Imamzadahs."—Col. Berkeley Lovett's Itinerary Notes of Route Surveys in N. Persia in 1851 and 1852, Proc. R.G.S. (N.S.) v. 78.
PEGU, p.p. The name which we give to the Kingdom which formerly existed in the Delta of the Irrawady, to the city which was its capital, and to the British province which occupies its place. The Burmese name is Bagó. This name belongs to the Taing language, and is popularly alleged to mean 'conquered by stratagem,' to explain which a legend is given; but no doubt this is mere fancy. The form Pegu, as in many other cases of our geographical nomenclature, appears to come through the Malays, who call it Paígá. The first European mention that we know of is in Conti's narrative (c. 1440) where Poggio has Latinized it as Paucó-nia; but Fra Mauro, who probably derived this name, with much other new knowledge, from Conti, has in his great map (c. 1459) the exact Malay form Paíg. Nikitin (c. 1475) has, if we may depend on his translator into English, Pegu, as has Hieronymo di S. Stefano (1490). The Roteiro of Vasco da Gama (1498) has Peguo, and describes the land as Christian, a mistake arising no doubt from the use of the ambiguous term Kafir by his Mahomedan informants (see under Caffer). Varthema (1510) has Pego, and Giov. da Empoli (1514) Pect; Barbosa (1516) again Paíga; but Pegu is the usual Portuguese form, as in Barros, and so passed to us.

1514.—"Then there is Pech, which is a populous and noble city, abounding in men and in horses, where are the true mines of liones (l' 'di lionesi e perfetti rubini,' perhaps should be 'di buoni e perfetti') and perfect rubies, and these in great plenty; and they are fine men, tall and well limbed and stout; as of a race of giants..."—Empoli, 80.

[1616.—"Pegu." (See under BURMA.)] 1541.—"Bagou." (See under PEGING.) 1542.—"... and for all the goods which came from any other ports and places, viz. from Pegu to the said Port of Malava, from the Island of Gamatra and from within the Straits. —Title of the Fortress and City of Malava, in Tombo, p. 105 in Subsidios.

1568.—"Concluso che non à in terra Re di possaža maggiore del Re di Pégh, per ciò che ha sotto di se venti Re di corona."—Cas. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 394.

1572.—
"Olha o reino Arracão, olha o assento De Peguí, que já monstros povoaram, Monstros filhos do feo ajuntamento D'humai mulher e hum cão, que sos se acharam."—Camões, x. 122.

By Burton:
"Arracan-realm behold, behold the seat of Pegu peopled by a monster-brood; monsters that gendered meeting most unmeet of whelp and woman in the lonely wood..."

1597.—"... I recommend you to be very watchful not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegui nor yet from that of Achin (do Dachem); and with this view you should give orders that this be the subject of treatment with the King of Dachem since he shows so great a desire for our friendship, and is treating in that sense."—Despatch from the King to Gou, 5th Feb. In Archiv. Port. Oriental. Fasc. iii.

PEGU PONIES. These are in Madras sometimes termed elliptically Pegus, as Arab horses are universally termed Arabs. The ponies were much valued, and before the annexation of Pegu commonly imported into India; less commonly since, for the local demand absorbs them.
1890.—"'For sale ... also Bubble and Squeak, bay Pegues.'”—Madras Mail, Feb. 19.

1890.—"Ponies, sometimes very good ones, were reared in a few districts in Upper Burmas, but, even in Burmese times, the supply was from the Shan States. The so-called Pegu Pony, of which a good deal is heard, is, in fact, not a Pegu pony at all, for the justly celebrated animals called by that name were imported from the Shan States.'”—Report of Capt. Evans, in Times, Oct. 17.

PEKING, n.p. This name means 'North-Court,' and in its present application dates from the early reigns of the Ming Dynasty in China. When they deposed the Mongol descendants of Chinghiz and Kubla (1368) they removed the capital from Taitu or Khanbaligh (Cambalu of Polo) to the great city on the Yangtsze which has since been known as Nan-King or 'South-Court.' But before many years the Mongol capital was rehabilitated as the imperial residence, and became Pe-King accordingly. Its preparation for reoccupation began in 1409. The first English mention that we have met with is that quoted by Sainsbury, in which we have the subjects of more than one allusion in Milton.

1629.—"Thomé Fires, quitting this pass, arrived at the Province of Nanquij, at its chief city called by the same name, where the King dwelt, and spent in coming thither always travelling north, four months; by which you may take note how vast a matter is the empire of this gentle prince. He sent word to Thomé Fires that he was to wait for him at Pequij, where he would despatch his affair. This city is in another province so called, much further north, in which the King used to dwell for the most part, because it was on the frontier of the Tartars ..."—Burros, III. vi. 1.

1541.—"This City of Pequin ... is so prodigious, and the things therein so remarkable, as I do almost repent me for undertaking to discourse of it. ... For one must not imagine it to be, either as the City of Rome, or Constantinople, or Venice, or Paris, or London, or Scelt, or Lisbon. ... Nay I will say further, that one must not think it to be like to Grand Cairo in Egypt, Tauris in Persia, Amadaba (Ama-dabad, Ayavavat) in Cambay, Binaquri) in Narings, Goura (Gouro) in Bengala, Anu or Chales, Timplan (Talumiskam), Martaban (Martvao) and Bagou in Pegu, Guimpel and Tinlay in Stampen, Oidea in the Kingdom of Sornam, Pasewan and Dema in the Island of Java, Pasgor in the Country of the Lequens (no Lequio) Usangaa (Usasno) in the Grand Cauoch, Lancaama (Laçame) in Tartary, and Mexico (Mioco) in Jappon ... for I dare well affirm that all those same are not to be compared to the least part of the wonderful City of Pequin. ..."—Piso (in Cogan), p. 198 (orig. cap. evil.).

1614.—"Richard Cocks writing from Ferando understands there are great cities in the country of Corea, and between that and the sea mighty bogs, so that no man can travel there; but great waggons have been invented to go upon broad flat wheels, under sail as ships do, in which they transport their goods ... the deceased Emperor of Japan did pretend to have conveyed a great army in these sailing waggons, to assail the Emperor of China in his City of Pequin."

PELICAN, s. This word, in its proper application to the Pelicanus onocrotalus, L., is in no respect peculiar to Anglo-India, though we may here observe that the bird is called in Hindi by the poetical name gagan-bher, i.e. 'Sheep of the Sky,' which we have heard natives with their strong propensity to metathesis convert into the equally appropriate Gangd-bheri or 'Sheep of the Ganges.' The name may be illustrated by the old term Cape-sheep applied to the albatross. * But Pelican is habitually misapplied by the British soldier in India to the bird usually called Adjutant (q.v.). We may remember how Prof. Max Muller, in his Lectures on Language, tells us that the Tahitians show respect to their sovereign by ceasing to employ in common language those words which form part or the whole of his name, and invent new terms to supply their place. "The object was clearly to guard against the name of the sovereign being ever used, even by accident, in ordinary conversation." 2nd ser. 1864, p. 35. [Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. i. 421 seqq.]. Now, by an analogous process, it is possible that some martinet, holding the office of adjutant, at an early date in the Anglo-Indian history, may have resented the ludicrously appropriate employment of the usual name of the bird, and so may have introduced the entirely inappropriate name of pelican in its place. It is in the recollection of one of the present writers that a worthy northern matron, who with her husband had risen from the ranks in the —th Light Dragoons, on being challenged for speaking of "the pelicans in the barrack-yard," maintained her correctness, conceding only that "some ca'd them paylians, some ca'd them adjutants."

* "... great diversion is found ... in firing tails at birds, particularly the albatross, a large species of the swan, commonly seen within two or three hundred miles round the Cape of Good Hope, and which the French call Moutons (Moutons) du Cap."—Munro's Narrative, 18. The confusion of genera here equals that mentioned in our article above.

1829.—"This officer ... on going round the yard (of the military prison) ... discovered a large beef-bone recently dropped. The sergeant was called to account for this ominous appearance. This sergeant was a shrewd fellow, and he immediately said,—'Oh Sir, the pelicans have dropped it.' This was very plausible, for these birds will carry enormous bones; and frequently when fighting for them they drop them, so that this might very probably have been the case. The moment the dinner-trumpet sounded, whole flocks of these birds are in attendance at the barrack-doors, waiting for bones, or anything that the soldiers may be pleased to throw to them."—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 25.

PENANG, n.p. This is the proper name of the island adjoining the Peninsula of Malacca (Pulo, properly Pulau, Pinang), which on its cession to the English (1786) was named 'Prince of Wales's Island.' But this official style has again given way to the old name. Pinang in Malay signifies an areca-nut or areca-tree, and, according to Crawford, the name was given on account of the island's resemblance in form to the fruit of the tree (vulgo, 'the betel-nut').

1592.—"Now the winter coming upon us with much contagious weather, we directed our course from hence with the Island of Pulo Pinanou (where by the way is to be noted that Pulo in the Malaian tongue signifies an Island) where we came to an anker in a very good harbour between three Islands. ... This place is in 6 degrees and a halfe to the Northward, and some five leagues from the maine betweene Malacca and Pegu."—Barker, in Hak. ii. 598-599.

PENANG LAWYER, s. The popular name of a handsome and hard (but sometimes brittle) walking-stick, exported from Penang and Singapore. It is the stem of a miniature palm (Licuala acutifida, Griffith). The sticks are prepared by scraping the young stem with glass, so as to remove the epidermis and no more. The sticks are then straightened by fire and polished (BalFOur). The name is popularly thought to have originated in a jocular supposition that law-suits in Penang were decided by the lex boculina. But there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of some native term, and pinang layar, 'wild areca' [or pinang layar, "fire-dried areca," which is suggested in N.E.D.], may almost be assumed to be the real name. [Dennys (Descr. Dict. s.v.) says from "Layar, a species of cane furnishing the sticks so named." But this is almost certainly wrong.]

1883.—(But the book—an excellent one—is without date—more shame to the Religious Tract Society which publishes it). "Next morning, taking my 'Penang lawyer' to defend myself from dogs. ..." The following note is added: "A Penang lawyer is a heavy walking-stick, supposed to be so called from its usefulness in settling disputes in Penang."—Gilmour, Among the Mongols, 14.

PENGUIN, s. Popular name of several species of birds belonging to the genera Aptenodytes and Spheniscus. We have not been able to ascertain the etymology of this name. It may be from the Port. pingue, 'fat.' See Littré. He quotes Clausius as picturing it, who says they were called a pinguedine. It is surely not that given by Sir Thomas Herbert in proof of the truth of the legend of Madoc's settlement in America; and which is indeed implied 60 years before by the narrator of Drake's voyage; though probably borrowed by Herbert direct from Selden.

1578.—"In these Islands we found great relief and plenty of good victuals; for infinite were the number of fowles which the Welsh men named Penguin, and Magillans named geese. ..."—Drake's Voyage, by F. Fletcher, Hak. Soc. p. 72.

1606.—"The Pengwins bee as bigge as our greatest Capons we have in England, they have no winges nor cannot flye ... they bee exceeding fatte, but their flesh is very ranke. ..."—Middleton, f. B. 4.

1609.—"Nous trouvames beaucoup de Chiés de Mer, et Oysseux qu'on appelle Pengwyns, dont l'Esceuil en estait quasi ouvert."—Houtman, p. 4.
1610.—"... le reste est tout couvert... d'une quantité d'Oyezseaux nommés pinguy, qui font là leurs œufs et leurs petits, et il y en a une quantité si prodigieuse qu'on ne saurait mettre... le pied en une quantité sans l'endroit."—Pyarrard de Laval, i. 73; [Hak. Soc. i. 97, also see i. 15].

1612.—"About the year C.10. C.L.XX. Madoc brother to David ap Owen, prince of Wales, made this sea voyage (to Florida); and by probability these names of Capo de Brijon in Norumbeg, and Pengwin in part of the Northern America, for a white rock, and a white-headed bird, according to the British, were relicks of this discovery."—Selden, Notes on Dryton's Polyoilbion, in Works (ed. 1728), iii. col. 1802.

1616.—"The Island called Pen-guin Island, probably so named by some Welshman, in whose Language Penguin signifies a white head; and there are many great lazy fowls upon, and about, this Island, with great cole-black bodies, and very white heads, called Penguins."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 384.

1638.—"... that this people (of the Mexican traditions) were Welsh rather than Spaniards or others, the Records of this Voyage writ by many Bards and Genealogists confirm it... made more ortho-doxall by Welsh names given there to birds, rivers, rocks, beasts, &c., as... Pengwyn, refer'd by them to a bird that has a white head. ..."—Herbert, Some Yeares Travelles, &c., p. 360.

Unfortunately for this etymology the head is precisely that part which seems in all species of the bird to be black! But M. Koulin, quoted by Littre, maintains the Welsh (or Breton) etymology, thinking the name was first given to some short-winged sea-bird with a white head, and then transferred to the penguin. And Terry, if to be depended on, supports this view. [So Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict., s.v.): "In that case, it must have first been given to another bird, such as the auk (the puffin is common in Anglesey), since the penguin's head is black."

1674.—
"So Horses they affirm to be Mere Engines made by Geometry, And were invented first from Engins, As Indian Britons were from Penguins."—Hudibras, Pt. I. Canto ii. 57.

[1869.—In Lombock ducks "are very cheap and are largely consumed by the crews of the rice ships, by whom they are called Baly-soldiers, but are more generally known elsewhere as penguin-ducks."—Wallace, Malay Archip. ed. 1869, p. 135.]

PEON, s. This is a Portuguese word peão (Span. peon); from pé, 'foot,' and meaning a 'footman' (also a pawn at chess), and is not therefore a corruption, as has been alleged, of Hind. priyada, meaning the same; though the words are, of course ultimately akin in root. It was originally used in the sense of 'a foot-soldier'; thence as 'orderly' or messenger. The word Sepoy was used within our recollection, and perhaps is still, in the same sense in the city of Bombay. The transition of meaning comes out plainly in the quotation from Ives. In the sense of 'orderly, peon is the word usual in S. India, whilst chupressay (q.v.) is more common in N. India, though peon is also used there. The word is likewise very generally employed for men of police service (see BURKUNDAUZ). [Mr. Skeat notes that Piyan is used in the Malay States, and Tambi or Tamba at Singapore]. The word had probably become unusual in Portugal by 1600; for Manoel Correa, an early commentator on the Lusiads (d. 1613), thinks it necessary to explain piões by 'gente de pé.'

1603.—"The Camorym ordered the soldier (pião) to take the letter away, and strictly forbade him to say anything about his having seen it."—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 421.

1610.—"So the Sabayo, putting much trust in this (Rumi), made him captain within the city (Goa), and outside of it put under him a captain (of) with two thousand soldiers (piões) from the Balagata. ..."—Ibid. ii. i. 51.

1663.—"The pawn (pião) they call Piada, which is as much as to say a man who travels on foot."—Garcia, f. 37.

1575.—
"O Rey de Badajos era alto Mouro Con quatro mil cavalos furiosos; Innumeros piões, darams e de ouro, Guarmecidos, guerreiros, e lustrosos."—Camões, iii. 66.

By Burton:
"The King of Badajos was a Moeslem bold, With horse four thousand, fierce and furious knights, and countless Peons, armed and dight With gold, whose polisht surface glanceth lustrous light."—Burton, First of February, the Capitaine departed with fifty Peons...—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 421.

1746.—"As the Nabob's behaviour when Madras was attacked by De la Bourdonnais, had caused the English to suspect his assurances of assistance, they had 2,000 Peons in the defence of Cuddalore..."—Orme, i. 81.

c. 1760.—"Peon. One who waits about the house to run on messages; and he commonly carries under his arm a sword, or in his sash a krisse, and in his hand a rataan, to keep the rest of the servants in subjection. He also walks before your palanquin, carries chiks (q.v.) or notes, and is your bodyguard."—Ives, 50.

1763.—"Europeans distinguish these undisciplined troops by the general name of Peons."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 80.

1772.—Hadley, writing in Bengal, spells the word pune; but this is evidently phonetic.

c. 1785.—"... Peons, a name for the infantry of the Deekan."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, iv. 563.

1780-90. — "I sent off annually from Sylhet from 150 to 200 (elephants) divided into 4 distinct flocks. They were put under charge of the common Peon. These people were often absent 18 months. On one occasion my servant Manoo... after a twelve-months' absence returned... in appearance most miserable; he unfolded his girdle, and produced a scrap of paper of small dimensions, which proved to be a banker's bill amounting to 3 or 4,000 pounds,—his own pay was 30 shillings a month. When I left India Manoo was still absent on one of these excursions, but he delivered to my agents as faithful an account of the produce as he would have done to myself..."—Bon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindays, iii. 77.

1842.—"... he was put under arrest for striking, and throwing into the Indus, an inoffensive Peon, who gave him no provocation, but who was obeying the orders he received from Captain ——. The Major General has heard it said that the supremacy of the British over the native must be maintained in India, and he entirely concurs in that opinion, but it must be maintained by justice."—Gen. Orders, &c., of Sir Ch. Napier, p. 72.

1873.—"Pandurang is by turns a servant to a shopkeeper, a peon, or orderly, a groom to an English officer... and eventually a pleader before an English Judge in a populous city."—Saturday Review, May 31, p. 728.

PEPPER, a. The original of this word, Skt. pippali, means not the ordinary pepper of commerce ('black pepper') but long pepper, and the Sanskrit name is still so applied in Bengal, where one of the long-pepper plants, which have been classed sometimes in a different genus (Chavica) from the black pepper, was at one time much cultivated. There is still indeed a considerable export of long pepper from Calcutta; and a kindred species grows in the Archipelago. Long pepper is mentioned by Pliny, as well as white and black pepper; the three varieties still known in trade, though with the kind of error that has persisted on such subjects till quite recently, he misapprehends their relation. The proportion of their ancient prices will be found in a quotation below.

The name must have been transferred by foreign traders to black pepper, the staple of export, at an early date, as will be seen from the quotations. Pippalimula, the root of long pepper, still a stimulant medicine in the native pharmacopoeia, is probably the wewpean pita of the ancients (Royce, p. 86).

We may say here that Black pepper is the fruit of a perennial climbing shrub, Piper nigrum, L., indigenous in the forests of Malabar and Travancore, and thence introduced into the Malay countries, particularly Sumatra.

White pepper is prepared from the black by removing the dark outer layer of pericarp, thereby depriving it of a part of its pungency. It comes chiefly vid Singapore from the Dutch settlement of Rho, but a small quantity of fine quality comes from Telli-cherry in Malabar.

Long pepper is derived from two shrubby plants, Piper officinarum, C.D.C., a native of the Archipelago, and Piper longum, L., indigenous in Malabar, Ceylon, E. Bengal, Timor, and the Philippines. Long pepper is the fruit-spike gathered and dried when not quite ripe (Hanbury and Flückiger, Pharmacographia). All these kinds of pepper were, as has been said, known to the ancients.

c. 70 A.D.—"The cornes or graines . . . lie in certaine little huskes or seeds. . . . If that be plucked from the tree before they gape and open of themselves, they make that spice which is called Long pepper; but if as they do ripen, they cleave and chawne by little and little, they shew within the white pepper: which afterwards being parched in the Sunne, chaungeth colour and waxeth blacke, and therewith riveled too. Long pepper is some soene sophisticated, with the serius or musit seed of Alexandria: and a pound of it is worth fifteen Roman deniers. The white costeth seven deniers a pound, and the black is sold after four deniers by the pound."—Pliny, tr. by Phil. Holland, Bk. xii. ch. 7.

c. 80-90.—"And there come to these marts great ships, on account of the bulk and quantity of pepper and malabathrum . . .
The pepper is brought (to market) here, being produced largely only in one district near those marts, that which is called Koto-nerik."—Periplus, § 56.

c. A.D. 100.—"The Pepper-tree (πηρη δενδρον) is related to grow in India; it is short, and the fruit as it first puts it forth is long, resembling pods; and this long pepper has within it (grains) like small millet, which are what grow to be the perfect (black) pepper. At the proper season it comes and fruiteth, with slender bearing the berries such as we know them. But those that are like unripe grapes, which constitute the white pepper, serve the best for eye-remedies, and for antidotes, and for theriacal potencies."—Diocorides, Mat. Med. ii. 188.

c. 545.—"This is the pepper-tree" (here is a drawing). "Every plant of it is twined round some lofty forest trees, for it is weak and slim like the slender stems of the vine.
And every bunch of fruit has a double leaf as a shield; and it is very green, like the green of rue."—Cosmas, Book xi.

c. 870.—"The mariners say every bunch of pepper has over it a leaf that shelters it from the rain. When the rain ceases the leaf turns aside; if rain recommences the leaf again covers the fruit."—Ibn Khurdåba, in Journ. As. 6th ser. tom. v. 284.

1168.—"The trees which bear this fruit are planted in the fields which surround the town, and every one knows its plantation. The trees are small, and the pepper is originally white, but when they collect it they put it into basons and pour hot water upon it; it is then exposed to the heat of the sun, and dried . . . in the course of which process it becomes of a black colour."
—Rabbi Benjamin, in Wright, p. 114.

c. 1330.—"L'albore che fa il pepe è fatto come l'elera che nasce su per gli muri.
Queste pepe sale su per gli arbori che l'umini plantano a modo de l'elera, e sale sopra tutti li arbori piu alti. Questo pepe fa rami a modo dell' uve; . . . e maturo si lo vende-mamo a modo de l' uve e poi pongono il pepe al sole a secare come uve piane, e nulla altra cosa si fa del pepe."—Odioric, in *Cutbey, App. xlvii.

PERGUNNAHS, THE TWENTY-FOUR, n.p. The official name of the District immediately adjoining and inclosing, though not administratively including, Calcutta. The name is one of a character very ancient in India and the East. It was the original 'Zemindary of Calcutta' granted to the English Company by a 'Subedar's Ferwana' in 1757-58. This grant was subsequently confirmed by the Great Mogul as an unconditional and rent-free jageer (q.v.). The quotation from Sir Richard Phillips' Million of Facts, illustrates the development of 'facts' out of the moral consciousness. The book contains many of equal value. An approximate parallel to this statement would be that London is divided into Seven Dials.

1765.—"The lands of the twenty-four Pergunnahs, ceded to the Company by the treaty of 1757, which subsequently became Colonel Clive's jagghier, were rated on the King's books at 2 lac and 22,000 rupees."—Hollwell, Hist. Events, 2nd ed., p. 217.

1812.—"The number of convicts confined at the six stations of this division (independent of Zillah Twenty-four Pergunsahs, is about 4,000. Of them probably ninetieths are dacoits."—Fifth Report, 559.

[1852. — "Bengal is divided in 26 Portgunsahs, each with its judge and magistrate, registrar, &c."—Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, stereot. ed. 1843, 927.]

PERI, s. This Persian word for a class of imaginary sprites, rendered familiar in the verses of Moore and Southey, has no blood-relationship with the English Fairy, notwithstanding the exact compliance with Grimm's Law in the change of initial consonant. The Persian word is peri, from 'par, a feather, or wing'; therefore 'the winged one'; [so F. Johnson, Pers. Dict.; but the derivation is very doubtful] whilst the genealogy of fairy is apparently Ital. fata, French fée, whence féérie ('fay-dom') and thence fairy.

[c. 1600!—"I am the only daughter of a Jinn chief of noblest strain and my name is Peri-Bann."—Arab. Nights, Burton, x. 264.]

1800.—
4 From cluster'd henna, and from orange groves,
That with such perfumes fill the breeze
As Peri to their Sister bear,
When from the summit of some loftv tree
She hangs encag'd, the captive of the Dives."—Thalaba, xi. 24.

1817.—
4 But nought can charm the luckless Peri;
Her soul is sad—her wings are weary."—Moore, Paradise and the Peri.

PERPETUANO, s. The name of a cloth often mentioned in England to the East. It appears to have been a light and glossy twilled stuff of wool, [which like another stuff of the same kind called 'Lasting', took its name from its durability. (See Draper's Dict. s.v.)] In France it was called perpetuanne or sempiternne, in Ital. perpetuana.

[1809.—"Kersies, Perpetuanos and other woollen Comodities."—Birdwood, Letter Book, 288.

1817.—"Perpetuano, 1 bale."—Cocks's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 293.

1830.—". . . Devonshire kersies or perpetuities . . ."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 4.]

[1680.—"Perpetuanos."—Ibid. ii. 401.]

1711.—"Goods usually imported (to China) from Europe are Bullion Cloths, Clothash Perpetuano's, and Cambrics of Scarlet, black, blew, sad and violet Colours, which are of late so lightly set by; that to bear the Dutys, and bring the prime Cost, is as much as can reasonably be hoped for."—Lockyer, 147.

[1717.—"... a Pavilion lined with Imboes'd Perpetes."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. octlax.]

1754.—"Being requested by the Trustees of the Charity Stock of this place to make an humble application to you for an order that the children upon the Foundation to the number of 12 or 14 may be supplied at the expense of the Honorable Company with a coat of blue Perpetes or some ordinary cloth. . . ."—Petition of Revd. R. Mapletons, in Long, p. 29.

1757.—Among the presents sent to the King of Ava with the mission of Ensign Robert Lester, we find:

"2 Pieces of ordinary Red Broad Cloth, 3 Do. of Perpetuanos Popinjay."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 208.

PERSAIM, n.p. This is an old form of the name of Bassain (g.v.) in Pegu. It occurs (e.g.) in Milburn, ii. 281.

1759.—"The Country for 20 miles round Persaim is represented as capable of producing Rice, sufficient to supply the Coast of CHROMANDARIL from Pondicherry to Muniipatam."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 110. Also in a Chart by Capt. G. Baker, 1754.

1795.—"Having ordered presents of a trivial nature to be presented, in return for those brought from Negrais, he referred the deputy . . . to the Birman Governor of Persaim for a ratification and final adjustment of the treaty."—Symes, p. 40. But this author also uses Bassien (e.g. 32), and "Persaim or Bassien" (39), which alternatives are also in the chart by Ensign Wood.

PERSIMMON, s. This American name is applied to a fruit common in China and Japan, which in a dried state is imported largely from China into Tibet. The tree is the Diospyros kaki, L. fil., a species of the same genus which produces ebony. The word is properly the name of an American fruit and tree of the same genus (D. virginiana), also called date-plum, and, according to the Dictionary of Worcester, belonged to the Indian language of Virginia. [The word became familiar in 1896 as the name of the winner of the Derby.]

1878.—"The finest fruit of Japan is the Kaki or persimmon (Diospyros Kaki), a large golden fruit on a beautiful tree.” — Miss Bird’s Japan, i. 284.

PERUMBAUCUM, n.p. A town 14 m. N.W. of Conjevaram, in the district of Madras [Chingleput]. The name is perhaps perum-pakkam, Tam., ‘big village.’

PESCARIA, n.p. The coast of Tinnevelly was so called by the Portuguese, from the great pearl ‘fishery’ there.

[c. 1566. — See under BAZAAR.]

1600.—“There are in the Seas of the East three principal mines where they fish pearls. . . . The third is between the Isle of Ceylon and Cape Comory, and on this account the Coast which runs from the said Cape to the shoals of Ramananoor and Manar is called, in part, Pescaria. . . .” —Lucena, 80.

[1616.—“Pescaria.” See under CHI-LAW.]

1615.—“Iam nonnihil de orâ Pescarâ dicamus quae iam inde a promontorio Commorino in Orientem ad usque breviam Ramananoridis circulam, quod haud procul inde celebrissimum, maximum, et copiosissimum cursus, quae hinc ad orientem, et ad orientem ad urbem, telluremque orientalem quaelibet, sicque etiam orientem urbem, passum est . . .” —Jarric, Thee. i. 445.

1710.—“The Coast of the Pescaria of the mother of pearl which runs from the Cape of Camorrin to the Isle of Manar, for the space of seventy leagues, with a breadth of six inland, was the first debarkation of this second conquest.” —Sousa, Orient. Conq. i. 122.

PESHWAR, n.p. Peshâwar. This name of what is now the frontier city and garrison of India towards Kâbul, is sometimes alleged to have been given by Akbar. But in substance the name is of great antiquity, and all that can be alleged as to Akbar is that he is said to have modified the old name, and that since his time the present form has been in use. A notice of the change is quoted below from Gen. Cunningham ; we cannot give the authority on which the statement rests. Peshâwar could hardly be called a frontier town in the time of Akbar, standing as it did according to the administrative division of the Âin, about the middle of the Sûba of Kâbul, which included Kashmir and all west of it. We do not find that the modern form occurs in the text of the Âin as published by Prof. Blochmann. In the translation of the Tabakât-i-Akbâri of Nizâm-d-din Ahmad (died 1594-195), in Elliot, we find the name transliter-1783.—"The heat of Peshour seemed to me more intense, than that of any country I have visited in the upper parts of India. Other places may be warm; hot winds blowing over tracts of sand may drive us under the shelter of a wetted screen; but at Peshour, the atmosphere, in the summer solstice, becomes almost inammable."—G. Forster, ed. 1808, ii. 57.
PESHCUBZ. 701

1863.—"Its present name we owe to Akbar, whose fondness for innovation led him to change the ancient Parashāwara, of which he did not know the meaning, to Peshawar, or the 'frontier town.'"—Abul Fazl gives both names. — Cunningham, Arch. Reports, ii. 87. Gladwin does in his translation give both names; but see above.

PESHCUBZ, s. A form of dagger, the blade of which has a straight thick back, while the edge curves inward from a broad base to a very sharp point. Pers. pesh-kabz, 'foe-grip.' The handle is usually made of shirmāhī, 'the white bone (tooth) of a large cetacean'; probably morsel-tooth, which is repeatedly mentioned in the early English trade with Persia as an article much in demand (e.g. see Sainsbury, ii. 65, 159, 204, 306; iii. 89, 162, 266, 287, &c.). [The peshkubs appears several times in Mr. Egerton's Catalogue of Indian Arms, and one is illustrated, Pl. xv. No. 760.]

1877.—"Received for sundry jewels, &c. . . . (Rs.) 7326 0 0 Ditto for knife, or peshkubs (misprinted peshool). . . . 3500 0 0." Lord Olivier's Accounts, in Long, 497.

PESHCUSSH, s. Pers. pesh-kabz. Wilson interprets this as literally 'first-fruits.' It is used as an offering or tribute, but with many specific and technical senses which will be found in Wilson, e.g. a fine on appointment, renewal, or investiture; a quit-rent, a payment exacted on lands formerly rent-free, or in substitution for service no longer exacted; sometimes a present to a great man, or (loosely) for the ordinary Government demand on land. Peshcush, in the old English records, is most generally used in the sense of a present to a great man.

1665.—"Peshcush or Presents expected by the Nabobs and Omrahs retarded our enlargement for some time notwithstanding."—Ovington, 415.

1865.—"When the King is in the field, he hath usually two Camps, . . . to the end that when he breaketh up and leaveth one, the other may have passed before by a day and be found ready when he arriveth at the place design'd to encamp at; and 'tis therefore that they are called Peshkhanes, as if you should say, Houses going before. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 115; [ed. Constable, 359].

1783.—"Pesh-khana is the term given to the royal tents and their appendages in India."—Hannay, iv. 153.
PESHWÁ, s. from Pers. 'a leader, a guide.' The chief minister of the Maharatta power, who afterwards, supplanting his master, the descendant of Sivaji, became practically the prince of an independent State and chief of the Maharratas. The Peshwa's power expired with the surrender to Sir John Malcolm of the last Peshwa, Bājī Rāo, in 1817. He lived in wealthy exile, and with a jdgir under his own jurisdiction, at Bhūtār, near Cawnpur, till January 1851. His adopted son, and the claimant of his honours and allowances, was the infamous Nānā Sāhīb.

Mr C. P. Brown gives a feminine peshevīn: "The princess Gangā Bāl was Peshvin of Purandhar." (MS. notes).

1862.—"The result of all this uproarious bustle has been the erection of the Sardār's peshkhaima, or advanced tent."—Belloo, Journal of Mission, 409.

PETTAH, s. Tam. peṭtaichi. The extramural suburb of a fortress, or the town attached and adjacent to a fortress. The pettah is itself often separately fortified; the fortress is then its citadel. The Maharrati petta is used in like manner; it is Skt. petaka, and the word possibly came to the Tamil through the Mahr.]. The word constantly occurs in the histories of war in Southern India.

1862.—"Asam Khán, having ascended the Pass of Anjan-dīdhā, encamped 3 hrs from Dhādrā. He then directed Multāšt Khán . . . to make an attack upon . . . Dhādrā and its petta, where once a week people from all parts, far and near, were accustomed to meet for buying and selling."—Abdu l Hamíd, in Ethios, vii. 20.

1809.—"I passed through a country little cultivated . . . to Kingeri, which has a small mud-fort in good repair, and a pettah apparently well filled with inhabitants."—Ld. Valentia, i. 412.

1839.—"The English ladies told me this Pettah was 'a horrid place—quite native'! and advised me never to go into it; so I went next day, of course, and found it most curious—really quite native."—Letters from Madras, 289.

PHANSEEGAR, s. See under THUG.

[PHOOLKARRÉ, s. Hind. phool-kārī, 'flowered embroidery.' The term applied in N. India to the cotton sheets embroidered in silk by village women, particularly Jats. Each girl is supposed to embroider one of these for her marriage. In recent years a considerable demand has arisen for specimens of this kind of needlework among English ladies, who use them for screens and other decorative purposes. Hence a considerable manufacture has sprung up of which an account will be found in a note by Mrs. F. A. Steel, appended to Mr.

PETTERSELLY, s. This is the name by which ‘parsley’ is generally called in N. India. We have heard it quoted there as an instance of the absurd corruption of English words in the mouths of natives. But this case at least might more justly be quoted as an example of accurate transfer. The word is simply the Dutch term for ‘parsley,’ viz. peterselie, from the Lat. petro- selinum, of which parsley is itself a double corruption through the French persil. In the Arabic of Avicenna the name is given as fātrastilīn.
7 [PHOORZA, s. A custom-house; Gujarāti phurzā, from Ar. furzāt 'a notch,' then 'a bright,' 'river-mouth,' 'harbour'; hence 'a tax' or 'custom-duty.'

1791.—The East India Calendar (p. 131) has "John Church, Phoorza-Master, Surat."

1772.—"And the Mogul's Furrza or custom-house is at this place (Hughly)."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 19.

1772.—"But as they still insisted on their people sitting at the gates of the Phoorzor Cooksy . . . Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 388, and see 392, "Phoorza Master." Cooksy=P.—Mahr. Khāzāt, "inland transit-duities."

1813.—". . . idols . . . were annually imported to a considerable number at the Baroche Phoora, when I was custom-master at that settlement."—Fortes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 334.*

PIAL, s. A raised platform on which people sit, usually under the verandah, or on either side of the door of the house. It is a purely S. Indian word, and partially corresponds to the Telugu chabūtra (see CHABOTA). Wilson conjectures the word to be derived from the Portuguese poço and poyal (Span. poyo), 'a seat or bench.' This is again according to Diez (i. 326), from the Lat. podium, 'a projecting base, a balcony.' Bluteau explains poyal as 'steps for mounting on horseback' (Scoticcè, 'a lounging-on stone') [see Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 68]. The quotation from Mr. Gover describes the S. Indian thing in full.

1558.—". . . paying him his courtesy in Moorish fashion, which was seating himself along with him on a poyal."—Castanheda, vi. 3.

1678.—"In the public square at Goa, as it was running furiously along, an informer man came in its way, and could not escape; but the elephant took him up in his trunk, and without doing him any hurt deposited him on a poyo."—Acosta, Traducto, 432.

1602.—"The natives of this region who are called Iaol, are men so arrogant that they think no others their superiors . . . insomuch that if a Iao in passing along the street becomes aware that any one of another nation is on a poyal, or any place above him, if the person does not immediately come down, . . . until he is gone by, he will kill him."—Conto, IV. iii. 1. [For numerous instances of this superstition, see Frater, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. i. 360 seqq.]

1873.—"Built against the front wall of every Hindu house in southern India . . . is a bench 3 feet high and as many broad. It extends along the whole frontage, except where the house-door stands . . . The posts or veranda or pandal are fixed in the ground a few feet in front of the bench, enclosing a sort of platform; for the base-ment of the house is generally 2 or 3 feet above the street level. The raised bench is called the Phyal, and is the lounging-place by day. It also serves in the hot months as a couch for the night. . . . There the visitor is received; there the bargaining is done; there the beggar plies his trade, and the Yoqi (see JōGÉ) sounds his bow and flute; there also the members of the household clean their teeth, amusing themselves the while with belches and other frightful noises. . . ."—Phyal Schools in Madras, by E. C. Gover, in Ind. Antiq. ii. 52.

6 PICAR, s. Hind. paikār, [which again is a corruption of Pers. pde-kār, pde, 'a foot'], a retail-dealer, an intermediate dealer or broker.

1680.—"Picar." See under DUSTOOR.

1683.—"Ye said Naylor has always corresponded with Mr. Charnock, having been always his intimate friend; and without question either provides him goods out of the Hon. Comp.'s Warehouse, or connives at the Weavers and Picars doing it."—Hedg., Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 138.

[1772.—"Pykars (Delols see DEOLL) and Gomastahs) are a chain of agents through whose hands the articles of merchandise pass from the loom of the manufacturer, or the store-house of the cultivator, to the public merchant, or exporter."—Vereis, View of Bengal, Gloss. a.v.]

PIOE, s. Hind. païsad, a small copper coin, which under the Anglo-Indian system of currency is 1 of an anna, 1 of a rupee, and somewhat less than 1 of a farthing. Pice is used slangishly for money in general. By Act XXIII. of 1870 (cl. 8) the following copper coins are current:—1. Double Pice or Half-anna, 2. Pice or 1 anana. 3. Half-pice or 1 anana. 4. Pice or ½ anana. No. 2 is the only one in very common use. As with most other coins, weights, and measures, there used to be pucks pice, and cutcha pice. The distinction was sometimes between the regularly minted copper of the Government and certain amorphous pieces of copper.

which did duty for small change (e.g. in the N.W. Provinces within memory), or between single and double pice, i.e. \frac{1}{2} anna-pieces and \frac{1}{4} anna-pieces. [Also see PIE.]

c. 1590.—"The dām ... is the fortieth part of the rupee. At first this coin was called Paisah."—Ats, ed. Blockmann, i. 31.

[1614.—"Another coin there is of copper, called a Pice, whereof you have commonly 34 in the mamudo."—Foster, Letters, iii. 11.]

1615.—"Pice, which is a Copper Coyn; twelve Drammes make one Kce. The English Shilling, if weight, will yield thirtie three Pice and a haffe."—W. Peyton, in Purchas, i. 550.

1616.—"Brasse money, which they call Pices, whereof three or thereabouts counter-vail a Penny."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

1648.—"... de Peyson zijn kooper gelt. ..."—Van Twist, 62.

1653.—"Peca est una monnaie du Mogol de valleur de 6 deniers."—De la Bouluyaye-Gauck, ed. 1657, p. 553.

1673.—"Pice, a sort of Copper Money current among the Poorer sort of People ... the Company's Accounts are kept in Book-rate Pices, viz. 32 to the Mam. [i.e. Mamoodles, see GOBEECK], and 80 Pice to the Rupee."—Fryer, 206.

1676.—"The Indians have also a sort of small Copper-money; which is called Pecha. ... In my last Travels, a Round went at Surat for nine and forty Pecha's."—Toursnier, E.T. ii. 22; [ed. Ball, i. 27].

1689.—"Lower than these (pice), bitter-Almonds here (at Surat) pass for Money, about Sixty of which make a Pice."—Oswinoton, 219.

1728.—"1 Anna makes 14 styveres or 2 peys."—Valentinij, v. 179. [Also see under MOHUR GOLD.]

1768.—"Shall I risk my cavalry, which cost 1000 rupees each, against your cannon balls that cost two pice?—No. ... I will march your troops until their legs become the size of their bodies."—Hyder Ali, Letter to Col. Wood, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 287; [2nd ed. ii. 300].

c. 1816.—"Here, said he, 'is four pucker-pice for Mary to spend in the bazar; but I will thank you, Mrs. Browne, not to let her have any fruit.'"—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 16, ed. 1863.

PICOTA, s. An additional allowance or percentage, added as a handicap to the weight of goods, which varied with every description—and which the editor of the Subsidios supposed to have lead to the varieties of bahar (q.v.). Thus at Ormuz the bahar was of 20 farazolas (see FRAZALA), to which was added, as picota, for cloves and mace 3 maunds (of Ormuz), or about \frac{1}{2} additional; for cinnamon \frac{1}{2} additional; &c. See the Peos, &c. of A. Nunez (1554) passim. We have not been able to trace the origin of this term, nor any modern use.

[1554.—"Picota." (See under BRAZIL-WOOD, DOOCAUIN.)]

PICOTTAH, a. This is the term applied in S. India to that ancient machine for raising water, which consists of a long lever or yard, pivotted on an upright post, weighted on the short arm and bearing a line and bucket on the long arm. It is the dhenkili of Upper India, the shahed of the Nile, and the old English stowe, suspe, or sway-pole. The machine is we believe still used in the Terra Incognita of market-gardens S.E. of London. The name is Portuguese, picota, a marine term now applied to the handle of a ship's pump and post in which it works—a 'pump-brake.' The picota at sea was also used as a pillory, whence the employment of the word as quoted from Correa. The word is given in the Glossary attached to the "Fifth Report" (1812), but with no indication of its source. Fryer (1673, pub. 1696) describes the thing without giving it a name. In the following the word is used in the marine sense:

1524.—"He (V. da Gama) ordered notice to be given that no seaman should wear a cloak, except on Sunday ... and if he did, that he should be taken from him by the constables (the serva tomada polos meirishes), and the man put in the picota in disgrace, for one day. He found great fault with men of military service wearing cloaks, for in that guise they did not look like soldiers."—Correa, Lendas, ii. i. 822.

1782.—"Pour cet effet (aroser les terres) on emploie une machine appellee Picote, C'est une bascule dressée sur le bord d'un puits ou d'un réservoir d'eau pluviales, pour en tirer l'eau, et la conduire ensuite où l'on veut."—Somnart, Voyage, i. 188.

c. 1790.—"Partout les paktotis, ou puits à bascule, étoient en mouvement pour fournir l'eau nécessaire aux plantes, et partout on entendait les jardiniers égayer leurs travaux par des chansons."—Haafner, ii. 217.

1807.—"In one place I saw people employed in watering a rice-field with the Yatam, or Pacota, as it is called by the English."—Buchanan, Journey through Mysore, &c., i. 15. [Here Yatam is Can. yada. Tel. ēturnu, Mal. ēlamu.]

[1871.—"Aye, e'en picotta-work would gain By using such bamboos."—Cover, Folk Songs of S. India, 184.]
PIE, s. Hind. pdi, the smallest copper coin of the Anglo-Indian currency, being 1/2 of an anna, 1/2 of a rupee, = about 1/4 of a farthing. This is now the authorised meaning of pie. But pdi was originally, it would seem, the fourth part of an anna, and in fact identical with pice (q.v.). It is the H.-Mahr. pdi, 'a quarter,' from Skt. pad, pdiked in that sense.

[1866.—"... his father has a one pie share in a small village which may yield him perhaps 24 rupees per annum."—Confessions of an Orderly, 201.]

PIE-GOODS. This, which is now the technical term for Manchester cottons imported into India, was originally applied in trade to the Indian cottons exported to England, a trade which appears to have been deliberately killed by the heavy duties which Lancashire procured to be imposed in its own interest, as in its own interest it has recently procured the abolition of the small import duty on English piece-goods in India.* [In 1898 a duty at the rate of 3 per cent. on cotton goods was reimposed.]

* It is an easy assumption that this export trade from India was killed by the development of machinery in England. We can hardly doubt that this cause would have killed it in time. But it was not left to any such lingering and natural death. Much time would be required to trace the whole of this episode of "ancient history." But it is certain that this Indian trade was not killed by natural causes; it was killed by prohibited duties. These duties were so high in 1793 that they were declared to operate as a premium on smuggling, and they were reduced to 15 per cent. of the original duties. Since that time the value of piece-goods from India imported into England was £27,776,682, or one-third of the whole value of all imports from India, which was £85,928,905. And in the sixteen years between 1798 and 1800-10 (inclusive) the imports of Indian piece-goods amounted in value to £256,171,125.

In 1799 the duties were raised. I need not give details, but will come down to 1814, just before the close of the war, when they were, I believe, at a maximum. The duties then, on "plain white calicoes," were:—

There was an Excise duty upon British manufactured and printed goods of 3½d. per square yard, and of twice that amount on foreign (Indian) calicoes, put to prevent Indian and British goods from being sold as drawback recoverable; and the whole of both duty and excise upon such goods was recoverable as drawback upon re-exportation. But on the exportation of Indian white goods there was no drawback recoverable; and the stuffs printed in India were at this time, so far as we can discern, not admitted through the English Custom-house at all until 1826, when they were admitted on a duty of 3d. per square yard.

Lists of the various kinds of Indian piece-goods will be found in Milburn (i. 44, 45, 46, and ii. 90, 221), and we assemble them below. It is not in our power to explain their peculiarities, except in very few cases, found under their proper heading. [In the present edition these lists have been arranged in alphabetical order. The figures before each indicate that they fall into the following classes: 1. Piece-goods formerly exported from Bombay and Surat; 2. Piece-goods exported from Madras and the Coast; 3. Piece-goods: the kinds imported into Great Britain from Bengal. Some notes and quotations have been added. But it must be understood that the classes of goods now known under these names may or may not exactly represent those made at the time when these lists were prepared. The names printed in capitals in separate articles are discussed in separate articles.]

1665.—"I have sometimes stood amazed at the vast quantity of Cotton-Cloth of all sorts, fine and others, tinged and white, and in which a pears to have been delivered in a small village which may yield him perhaps 24 rupees per annum."—Confessions of an Orderly, 201.]

(See in the Statutes, 48 Geo. III. cxxiv. pp. 68, 69, 70; 54 Geo. III. cxxv. 26; 6 Geo. IV. cxxvi. 3; also Macpherson's Annuals of Commerce, iv. 144.)

In Sir A. Arbuthnot's publication of Sir T. Munro's Minutes (Memoir, p. cxxix.) he quotes a letter of Munro's to a friend in Scotland, written about 1825, which shows him surprisingly before his age in the matter of Free Trade, speaking with reference to certain measures of Mr. Huskisson's. The passage ends thus:—"India is the country that has been worst used in the new arrangements. All her products ought undoubtedly to be imported freely into England, upon paying the same duties, and no more, which English duties (manufactures) may pay in India. When we have removed our opposition against India, I think that I am reading aloud an argument for Edward III. and the Flemings."

Sir A. Arbuthnot adds very appropriately a passage from a note by the late Prof. H. H. Wilson in his continuation of James Mill's History of India (1846, vol. i. pp. 598-599), a passage which we also gladly insert here:—"It was stated in evidence (in 1813) that the cotton and silk goods of India, up to this period, could be sold for a profit in the British market at a price from 50 to 60 per cent. less than those fabricated in England. It consequently became necessary to protect the latter by duties of 70 or 80 per cent. on their value, or by positive prohibition. Had this not been the case the prohibitory duties and decrees existed, the mills of Paisley and of Manchester would have been stopped in their outset, and could hardly have been again set in motion, even by the powers of steam. They were created by the sacrifice of the Indian manufactures. Had India been independent, she would have retaliated; would have imposed preventives, and then the whole of both duty and excise upon such goods was recoverable as drawback upon re-exportation. But on the exportation of Indian white goods there was no drawback recoverable; and the stuffs printed in India were at this time, so far as we can discern, not admitted through the English Custom-house at all until 1826, when they were admitted on a duty of 3d. per square yard."

3. CAMBAYs.

2. Cambrics.

3. Carpets.

3. Carridaries.

2. Castakechies.

1. Challas. (See under SHALEES.)

3. Charonnees. — H. char-khanda, ‘chequered.’ ‘The charkana, or chequered muslin, is, as regards manufacture, very similar to the Doorea (see DOREES below). They differ in the breadth of the stripes, their closeness to each other, and the size of the stripes.” (Forbes Watson, Textile M&n. 78). The same name is now applied to a silk cloth. “The word charkhana simply means ‘a check,’ but the term is applied to certain silk or mixed fabrics containing small checks, usually about 8 or 10 checks in a line to an inch.” (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 93. Also see Journ. Ind. Art. iii. 6.)

1683.—“20 yards of charonnees.”—In Yule, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.

2. Chemonies. (See under SHALEES.)

3. Chinsehuras.—Probably cloth from Chinsura.

1. CHINTZ, of sorts.

3. Chittabullies.

2. Chowars. — This is almost certainly not identical with Chuddar. In a list of cotton cloths in the Agra list (Foster, iv. 94) we have chudar, which may mean ‘made with four threads or wires. Chautudi, ‘four-fold,’ is a kind of cloth used in the Punjab for counterpanes (Francis, Man. Cotton, 7). This cloth is frequently mentioned in the early letters.

1610.—“Chautares are white and well requested.”—Dunners, Letters, i. 75.

1614.—“The Chautares of Agra and fine bafatas nyil doth not here vend.”—Foster, Letters, ii. 45.

1615.—“Four pieces fine white Cowter.”—Ibid. iv. 51.

3. Chucalas.—This may be H. chakati, chakri, which Platta defines as ‘a kind of cloth made of silk and cotton.’

3. Chunderbannies.—This is perhaps H. chandra, ‘the moon,’ badd, ‘woof.’

3. Chunderonas.—Forbes Watson has: “Chunderkana, second quality muslin for handkerchiefs”: “Plain white bleached muslin called Chunderbora. The word is probably chandra-khanda, ‘moon cloth.’

Clouts, common coarse cloth, for which see N.E.D.

3. Coopes.—This is perhaps H. koppin, kopin, ‘the small lungooty worn by Fakirs.’

3. Corahs.—H. kord, ‘plain, unbleached, undyed.' What is now known as Kora silk is woven in pieces for waist-clothes (see Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 78).

3. Coosaas.—This perhaps represents Ar. khāda, 'special.' In the Ás in we have khāda in the list of cotton cloths (i. 94). Mr. Taylor describes it as a muslin of a close fine texture, and identifies it with the fine muslin which, according to the Ás (i. 124), was produced at Sonārgon. The finest kind he says is "jungle-khaw." (Taylor, op. cit. 45.)

3. Cushtasses—These perhaps take their name from Kushtia, a place of considerable trade in the Nadiya District.

3. Cuttaneees. (See COTTON.)
1. Dhooties. (See DHOTY.)
3. Dimities.
1. Dhurrās.—H. doriyâ, 'striped cloth,' dor, 'thread.' In the list in the Ás (i. 95), Doriyâ appears among cotton stuffs. It is now also made in silk: "The simplest pattern is the stripe, when the stripes are longitudinal the fabric is a doriyâ. . . . The doriya of a cotton fabric, but it is now manufactured in silk, silk-and-cotton, tassar, and other combinations." (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 57, 94.)

1833. — "3 pieces Dooreas." — Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.

3. Elatchees.—Platts gives H. Ilâchâ, a kind of cloth woven of silk and thread so as to present the appearance of cardamoms (ilâchas)." But it is almost certainly identical with alleya. It was probably introduced to Agra, where now alone it is made, by the Moghuls. It differs from doriya (see DOOREAS above) in having a substantial texture, whereas the doriya is generally flimsy. (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 95.)
3. Emmetries.—This is H. amrât, imrât, 'sweet as nectar.'
3. GINGHAMS.
2. Gudeloor (dimities).—There is a place of the name in the Neelgherry District, but it does not seem to have any cloth manufacture.

1. GUINEA STUFFS.
3. Garrahs.—This is probably the H. gâdh: "unbleached fabrics which under names varying in different localities, constitute a large proportion of the clothing of the poor. They are used also for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead, for which last purpose a large quantity is employed both by Hindoos and Mahomedans. These fabrics in Bengal pass under the name of garrahs and guises." (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 83.)

2. Habasses.—Probably P. 'abbâs, used of cloths dyed in a sort of magenta colour. The recipe is given by Hadi, Mon. on Dying in the N. W. F. p. 16.
3. Herba Taffeties.—These are cloths made of Grass-cloth.
3. Humbhnis, from Ar. hâmâm, 'a Turkish bath,' "(apparently so named from its having been originally used at the bath), is a cloth of a thick stout texture, and generally worn as a wrapper in the cold season." (Taylor, op. cit. 63.)

3. Israees.—P. târ, 'drawers, trousers.' Watson (op. cit. 57, note) says that in some places it is peculiar to men, the women's drawers being Tawar. Herklotz (Qanoon-é-Islam, App. xiv.) gives easeer as equivalent to shawlwar, like the pyjamaa, but not so wide.

3. Jamdanni.—P. H. jamdâni, which is said to be properly jammahâni, 'a box for holding a suit.' The jamdâni is a loom-figured muslin, which Taylor (op. cit. 48) calls "the most expensive productions of the Dacca looms.

3. Jamwars. H. jamawr, 'sufficient for a dress.' It is not easy to say what stuff is intended by this name. In the Ás (ii. 240) we have jamałówdr, mentioned among Guzerat stuffs worked in gold thread, and again (i. 95) jamawâr Parmnarm among woollen stuffs. Forbes Watson gives among Kashmir shawls: "Jumecows, or striped shawl pieces"; in the Punjab they are of a striped pattern made both in palm and wool (Johnstone, Mon. on Wool, 9), and Mr. Kipling says, "the stripes are broad, of alternate colours, red and blue, &c." (Mukharji, Art Manufactures of India, 374.)

3. Lacowries.
1. Lemmannes.
3. LONG CLOTHS.
3. LOOEHEES, HERBA. (See GRASS-CLOTH.

1. LOOEHEE, MAGHRUB. Ar. maghrib, maghrub, 'the west.'
3. Mammooodies. Platts gives Mahmûdi, 'praised, fine muslin.' The Ás (i. 94) classes the Mahmûdi among cotton cloths, and at a low price. A cloth under this name is made at Shahabbâs in the Hardoi District. (Oudh Gazetteer, ii. 25.)

2. Moponore cloths. (See MUUNE-PORE.)
3. Moorees.—"Moories are blue cloths, principally manufactured in the districts of Nellore and at Canatur in the Chingleput collectorate of Madras. . . . They are largely exported to the Straits of Malacca." (Bal- four, Cyc. ii. 1982.)

3. Muggadoeties. (See MOONGA.)
3. MULMULS.
3. Mushrooms.—P. mushra, 'lawful.' It is usually applied to a kind of silk or satin with a cotton back. "Pure silk is not allowed to men, but women may wear the most sumptuous silk fabrics" (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 90, seq.). "All Mushrooms wash well, especially the finer kinds, used for bodices, petticoats, and trousers of both sexes." (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 97.)

1882.—". . . Mushresho (striped washing silk manufactured at Benares) . . ."—Mrs. Meer Hassoon Ali, Observations, i. 106.
1. MUSTERS.
3. Naibabies.
3. Nainsooks.—H. nainsook, ‘pleasure of the eye.’ A sort of fine white calico. Forbes Watson (op. cit. 76) says it is used for neckerchiefs, and Taylor (op. cit. 48) defines it as “a thick muslin, apparently identical with the tunsook (tanaskh, Blochmann, i. 94) of the Ayen.” A cloth is made of the same name in silk, imitated from the cotton fabric. (’Unf’ Ali, op. cit. 95.)

1. Nanganpauts. 2. Niccannees.—Quoting from a paper of 1683, Orme (Fragments, 287) has “6000 Niccannees, 13 yards long.”

3. Nilaza.—Some kind of blue cloth, H. niza, ‘blue.’

1. Nunsareks.—There is a place called Nansari in the Bhandara District (Central Provinces Gazetteer, 346).

2. Origal (cloths). Probably take their name from the once famous city of Warangal in Hyderabad.

3. PALAMPORES.

3. Penanpauts.—In a paper quoted by Birdwood in his Report on Old Records, 40 we have Pinasocs, which he says are stuffs made of pine-apple fibre.

2, 3. Penculalas.—H. parkalat, ‘a spark, a piece of glass.’ These were possibly some kind of spangled robe, set with pieces of glass, as some of the modern Phoolkaris are. In the Madras Diaries of 1684-5 we have “Percollassa,” and “percolles, fine” (Pringle, i. 53, iii. 119, iv. 41.)

3. Photaes.—In a letter of 1615 we have “Lunges (see LOONGHEE) and Footaes of all sorts.” (Foster, Letters, iv. 306), where the editor suggests H. phadia, ‘variegated.’ But in the Ais we find “Foutales (loinbands)” (i. 93), which is the P. foita, and this is from the connection the word probably meant.

3. Pulscat handkerchiefs. (See MADRAS handkerchiefs and BANDANNA.)

2. Punjam.—The Madras Gloss. gives Tel. punjamu, Tam. pujiang, lit. ‘a collection.’ “In Tel, a collection of 60 threads and in Tam. of 120 threads skeined, ready for the formation of the warp for weaving. A cloth is denominated 10, 12, 14, up to 40 poonjam, according to the number of times 60 or else 120, is contained in the total number of threads in the warp. Poonjam thus also came to mean a cloth of the length of one poonjam as usually skeined; this usual length is 36 cubits, or 18 yards, and is divided in 38, 44 inches, 14 lbs. being the common weight; pieces of half length were formerly exported as Salempoory.” Writing in 1814, Heyne (Tracts, 347) says: “Here (in Salem) two punjams are designated by ‘first call,’ so that twelve punjams of cloth is called ‘six call,’ and so on.”

1. Puteahs. (See PUTAH.)

2. Putton Ketochies. Cloths which ossibly took their name from the city of Anhiliwara Patan in Cutch.

1727.—“That country (Tegnapatam) produces Pepper, and coarse Cloth called catchas.”—A. Hamilton, i. 335.

3. Raings.—“Raing is a muslin which resembles jhuna in its transparent gauze or net-like texture. It is made by passing a single thread of the warp through each division of the reed” (Taylor, op. cit. 44.).

1. Salloopats. (See SHALEE.)

3. Santees. 2. Sasseergates.—Some kind of cloth called ‘that of the 1000 knots,’ H. sahara granthi. “Saserguntes” (Birdwood, Rep. on Old Records, 63).

2. Satraundees.—These cloths seem to take their name from a place called Sesta-kunda, ‘Pool of the Law.’ This is probably the place named in the Ais (ed. Jarrett, ii. 124): “In the township of Kyakra Sundar is a large reservoir which gives a peculiar whiteness to the cloths washed in it.” Gladwin reads the name Cataraskoonda, or Catarasoonder (see Taylor, op. cit. 91.).

3. Seerbands, Searbettes.—These are names for turbans, H. sirbad, sirbiit. Taylor (op. cit. 47) names them Dace muslins under the names of sirbad and surbute.

3. Seerbhanda. — This is perhaps P. sirbad, ‘head-delighting,’ some kind of turban or veil.

3. Shalbaft. — P. shalbaf, ‘shawl-weaving.’ (See SHAWL.)

3. Sinktersays. 3. SOOIES.

3. Subnomas, Sublomas.—“Subnam is a thin pellucid muslin to which the Persian figurative name of ‘evening dew’ (shabnam) is given, the fabric being, when spread over the bleeding-field, scarcely distinguishable from the dew on the grass.” (Taylor, op. cit. 45.)

3. Succtulos. (See SUCLAT.)

3. Taffeties of sorts. “A name applied to plain woven silks, in more recent times signifying a light thin silk stuff with a considerable lustre or gloss” (Drapers’ Dict. n. v.). The word comes from P. tafiia, ‘to twist, spin.’ The Ais (i. 94) has tafzkh in the list of silks.

3. Tainsooks.—H. tainsook, ‘taking care.’ (See above under NAINSBOOKS.)

—“A tolerably fine muslin” (Taylor, op. cit. 48; Forbes Watson, op. cit. 76). “The silk tanzee seems to have gone out of fashion, but that in cotton is very commonly used for the chicken work in Lucknow.” (’Unf’ Ali, op. cit. 96.)

1. Tapsools. (See under ALLEJA.) In the Ais (i. 94) we have: “Tafoolu (a stuff from Moecs).” 1670.—“So that in your house are only left some Tapsoolls and cotton yarn.”—In Yale, Helotes Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cxvii.

Birdwood in Report on Old Records, 38, has Topsaills.

2. Tarnatannes.—“There are various kinds of muslins brought from the East Indies, chiefly from Bengal, betelles (see BETTELEEA) tarnatus . . .” (Chamberi’s Cyc. of 1788, quoted in 3rd ser. N. & Q.
PIGDAUN.

PIG-STICKING.

IV. 135). It is suggested (ibid. 3rd ser. iv. 135) that this is the origin of English tarletan, Fr. tarletane, which is defined in the Drapers' Dict. as "a fine open muslin, first imported from India and afterwards imitated here."

3. Tartorees.
4. Tepoys.
5. Terindams.—"Turundam (said by the weavers to mean 'a kind of cloth for the body,' the name being derived from the Arabic word turuk (tärūk, tārah) 'a kind,' and the Persian one undam (uṇdām) 'the body,' is a muslin which was formerly imported, under the name of terendams, into this country." (Taylor, op. cit. 46.)

2. Ventepollams.

PIGDAUN, s. A spittoon; Hind. pīkān. Pik is properly the expectorated juice of chewed betel.

[c. 1665.—"... servants... to carry the Pi¢quadent or spittoon... ."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 214. In 283 Piquedana.]

PIGEON ENGLISH. The vile jargon which forms the means of communication at the Chinese ports between Englishmen who do not speak Chinese, and those Chinese with whom they are in the habit of communicating. The word "business" appears in this kind of talk to be corrupted into "pigeon," and hence the name of the jargon is supposed to be taken. [For examples see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. pp. 321 seqq.; Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 430 seqq. (See BUTLER ENGLISH.)]

1880.—"... the English traders of the early days... instead of inducing the Chinese to make use of correct words rather than the misshapen syllables they had adopted, encouraged them by approbation and example, to establish Pigeon English—a grotesque gibberish which would be laughable if it were not almost melancholy."—Capt. W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, 1, 156.

1883.—"The 'Pijdun English' is revolting, and the most dignified persons demean themselves by speaking it... How the whole English-speaking community, without distinction of rank, has come to communicate with the Chinese in this baby talk is extraordinary."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 37.

PIG-STICKING. This is Anglo-Indian hog-hunting, or what would be called among a people delighting more in lofty expression, 'the chase of the Wild Boar.' When, very many years since, one of the present writers, destined for the Bengal Presidency, first made acquaintance with an Indian mess-table, it was that of a Bombay regiment at Aden—in fact of that gallant corps which is now known as the 103rd Foot, or Royal Bombay Fusiliers. Hospitable as they were, the opportunity of enlightening an aspirant Bengalee on the short-comings of his Presidency could not be foregone. The chief counts of indictment were three: 1st. The inferiority of the Bengal Horse Artillery system; 2nd. That the Bengalees were guilty of the base effeminacy of drinking beer out of champagne glasses; 3rd. That in pig-sticking they threw the spear at the boar. The last two charges were evidently ancient traditions, maintaining their ground as facts down to 1840 therefore; and showed how little communication practically existed between the Presidencies as late as that year. Both the allegations had long ceased to be true, but probably the second had been true in the 18th century, as the third certainly had been. This may be seen from the quotation from R. Lindsay, and by the text and illustrations of Williamson's Oriental Field Sports (1807), [and much later (see below)]. There is, or perhaps we should say more differently there was, still a difference between the Bengal practice in pig-sticking, and that of Bombay. The Bengal spear is about 64 feet long, loaded with lead at the butt so that it can be grasped almost quite at the end and carried with the point down, inclining only slightly to the front; the boar's charge is received on the right flank, when the point, raised to 45° or 50° of inclination, if rightly guided, pierces him in the shoulder. The Bombay spear is a longer weapon, and is carried under the armpit like a dragoon's lance. Judging from Elphinstone's statement below we should suppose that the Bombay as well as the Bengal practice originally was to throw the spear, but that both independently discarded this, the Qui-his adopting the short overhand spear, the Ducks the long lance.

The party consisted of Streynsham Master "Lord of the Coast and Bay;" with Mr. Timothy Willes and Mr. Richard Mohun of the Council, the Minister, the Chyrurgeon, the Schoolmaster, the Secretary, and two Writers, an Ensign, 6 mounted soldiers and a Trumpeter," in all 17 Persons in the Company's Service, and "Four Freemens, who went with the Agent's Company for their own pleasure, and at their own charges." It was a Tour of Visitation of the Factories.

1773.—The Hon. R. Lindsay does speak of the "Wild-boar chase"; but he wrote after 35 years in England, and rather eschews Anglo-Indianisms:

"Our weapon consisted only of a short heavy spear, three feet in length, and well poised. The spear being found and un-kennelled by the spaniels, runs with great speed across the plain, is pursued on horse-back, and the first rider who approaches him throws the javelin..."—Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 161.

1807.—"When (the hog) begins to slacken, the attack should be commenced by the horseman who may be nearest pushing on to his left side; into which the spaniel runs with great speed across the plain, is pursued on horse-back, and the first rider who approaches him throws the javelin...

1816.—"We hog-hunt till two, then tiff, and hawk or course till dusk... we do not throw our spears in the old way, but poise with the arrow being found and un-kennelled by the spaniels, runs with great speed across the plain, is pursued on horse-back, and the first rider who approaches him throws the javelin..."—Elphinstone's Life, i. 311.

1866.—"I may be a young pig-sticker, but I am too old a sportsman to make such a mistake as that."—Traveston, The Duck Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 387.

1873.—"Pigsticking may be very good fun..."—A True Reformer, ch. i.

1876.—"You would perhaps like tiger-hunting or pig-sticking; I saw some of that for a season or two in the East. Everything here is poor stuff after that."—Daniel Dronda, ii. ch. xi.

1878.—"In the meantime there was a 'pig-sticking' meet in the neighbouring district."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 140.

PIG-TAIL. a. This term is often applied to the Chiuaman's long plait of hair, by transfer from the queue of our grandfathers, to which the name was much more appropriate. Though now universal among the Chinese, this fashion was only introduced by their Manchu conquerors in the 17th century, and was "long resisted by the natives of the Amoy and Swatow districts, who, when finally compelled to adopt the distasteful fashion, concealed the badge of slavery beneath cotton turbans, the use of which has survived to the present day" (Giles, Glossary of Reference, 32). Previously the Chinese wore their unshaven back hair gathered in a net, or knotted in a chignon. De Rhodes (Rome, 1615, p. 5) says of the people of Tongking, that "like the Chinese they have the custom of gathering the hair in fine nets under the hat."

1879.—"One sees a single Sikh driving four or five Chinamen in front of him, having knotted their pigstails together for reins."—Miss Bird, Golden Chronicles, 263.

PILAU, PILOW, PILÁF, &c., a. Pers. puldo, or pilav, Skt. pulaka, 'a ball of boiled rice.' A dish, in origin purely Mahommedan, consisting of meat, or fowl, boiled along with rice and spices. Recipes are given by Herklotz, ed. 1863, App. xxix.; and in the Ain-i-Akbari (ed. Blochmann, i. 60), we have one for kima puldo ('kima = 'hash ') with several others to which the name is not given. The name is almost as familiar in England as curry, but not the thing. It was an odd circumstance, some 45 years ago, that the two surgeons of a dragoon regiment in India were called Currie and Pileau.

1616.—"Sometimes they boil pieces of flesh or hens, or other fowl, cut in pieces in their rice, which dish they call pillaw. As they order it, they make it a very excellent and a very well tasted food."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

c. 1630.—"The feast begins: it was compounded of a hundred sorts of polo and candied dried meats."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1833, p. 138, [and for varieties, p. 310].

PINDARRY, s. Hind. pindāra, pindādrā, but of which the more original form appears to be Mahr. pindhārī, a member of a band of plunderers called in that language pindhār and pindhārā. The etymology of the word is very obscure. We may discard as a curious coincidence only, the circumstance observed by Mr. H. T. Prinsep, in the work quoted below (i. 37, note), that "Pindara seems to have the same reference to Pandour that Kudak has to Cossack." Sir John Malcolm observes that the most popular etymology among the natives ascribes the name to the dissolute habits of the class, leading them to frequent the shops dealing in an intoxicating drink called pinda.

(One of the senses of pindhā, according to Molesworth's Mahr. Dict., is 'a drink for cattle and men, prepared from Holcus sorgorum' (see JOWAIR) 'by steeping it and causing it to ferment.') Sir John adds: 'Kureen Khan (a famous Pindarri leader) told me he had never heard of any other reason for the name; and Major Henley had the etymology confirmed by the most intelligent of the Pindarries of whom he enquired' (Central India, 2nd ed. i. 433). Wilson again considers the most probable derivation to be from the Mahr. pindhā, but in the sense of a 'bundle of rice-straw,' and hara, 'who takes,' because the name was originally applied to horsemen who hung on to an army, and were employed in collecting forage. We cannot think either of the etymologies very satisfactory. We venture another, as a plausible suggestion merely. Both pind-parnā in Hindi, and pindās-basne in Mahr. signify 'to follow'; the latter being defined 'to stick closely to; to follow to the death; used of the adherence of a disagreeable fellow.' Such phrases would aptly apply to these hangers-on of an army in the field, looking out for prey. [The question has been discussed by Mr. W. Irvine in an elaborate note published in the Indian Antiq. of 1900. To the above three suggestions he adds two made by other that the term was taken from the Bedar race; 5. from Pandhār, pind, 'a lump of food,' ār, 'bringer,' a plunderer. As to the fourth suggestion, he remarks that there was a Bedar race dwelling in Mysore, Belar and the Nizam's territories. But the objection to this etymology is that as far back as 1748 both words, Bedar and Pindārī, are used by the native historian, Rām Singh Munshī, side by side, but applied to different bodies of men. Mr. Irvine's suggestion is that the word Pindārī, or more strictly Pandhār, comes from a place or region called Pāndhār or Pandhār. This place is referred to by native historians, and seems to have been situated between Burhānpur and Handiya on the Nerbudda. There is good evidence to prove that large numbers of Pindārīs were settled in this part of the country. Mr. Irvine sums up by saying: "If it were not for a passage in Grant Duff (H. of the Mahrattas, Bombay reprint, 157), I should have been ready to maintain that I had proved my case. My argument requires two things to make it irrefutable: (1) a very early connection between Pandhār and the Pindhāris; (2) that the Pindhāris had no early home or settlement outside Pandhār. As to the first point, the recorded evidence seems to go no further back than 1794, when Sendhia granted them lands in Nimār; whereas before that time the name had become fixed, and had even crept into Anglo-Indian vocabularies. As to the second point, Grant Duff says, and he if anybody must have known, that 'there were a number of Pindhāris about the borders of Mahārāṣṭra and the Carnatic . . . .' Unless these men emigrated from Khandesh about 1726 (that is a hundred years before 1826, the date of Grant Duff's book), their presence in the South with the same name tends to disprove any special connection between their name, Pindhārī, and a place, Pindhār, several hundred miles from their country. On the other hand, it is a very singular coincidence that men known as Pindhāris should have been newly settled about 1794 in a country which had been known as Pandhār at least ninety years before they thus occupied it. Such a mere fortuitous connection between Pandhār and the Pindhāris is so extraordinary that we may call it an impossibility. A fair inference is that the region Pandhār was the original home of the Pindhāris, that they took their name from it, and that grants of land between Burhānpur and Handiya were made to them in what had always been their home-country, namely Pandhār."

The Pindhāris seem to have grown up in the wars of the late Mahommedan dynasties in the Deccan, and in the latter part of the 17th century attached themselves to the Mahrattas in their revolt against Aurangzīb; the first mention which we have seen of the name occurs at this time. For some particulars regarding them we refer to the extract from Prinsep below. During and after the Mahratta wars of Lord Wellesley's time many of the Pindhāri leaders obtained grants of land in Central India from Sindia and Holkar, and in the chaos which reigned at that time outside the British territory their raids in all directions, attended by the most savage atrocities, became more and more intolerable; these outrages extended from Bundelkhand on the N.E., Kadaḵa on the S., and Orissa on the S.E., to Guzerat on the W., and at last repeatedly violated British territory. In a raid made upon the coast extending from Masulipatam northward, the Pindhāris in ten days plundered 339 villages, burning many, killing and wounding 682 persons, torturing 3600, and carrying off or destroying property to the amount of £350,000. It was not, however, till 1817 that the Governor-General, the Marquis of Hastings, found himself armed with permission from home, and in a position to strike at them effectually, and with the most extensive strategic combinations ever brought into action in India. The Pindhāris were completely crushed, and those of the native princes who supported them compelled to submit, whilst the British power for the first time was rendered truly paramount throughout India.

1706-7. — "Zoolfazar Khan, after the rains pursued Dhunnaḥ, who fled to the Bejapore country, and the Khan followed him to the banks of the Kistnah. The Pinderrehs took Vellore, which however was soon retaken. . . . A great caravan, coming from Aurungabad, was totally plundered and everything carried off, by a body of Mahrattas, at only 12 cos distance from the imperial camp."—Narrative of a Bondeela Officer, app. to Scott's Tr. of Firiha's H. of Deccan, ii. 122. [On this see Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 426. Mr. Irvine in the paper quoted above shows that it is doubtful if the author really used the word.]

"By a strange coincidence the very copy used by J. Scott is now in the British Museum. On turning to the passage I find 'Pedâ Badar,' a well-known man of the period, and not Pindâra or Pindareh at all.']"

1762.—"Siwase Madhoo Rao . . . began to collect troops, stores, and heavy artillery, so that he at length assembled near 100,000 horse, 60,000 Pindarehs, and 50,000 matchlock foot. . . . In reference to the Pindarehs, it is not unknown that they are a low tribe of robbers entertained by some of the princes of the Dakhan, to plunder and lay waste the territories of their enemies, and to serve for guides."—H. of Hyder Nâït, by Meer Hasnat Ali Khan, 149. [Mr. Irvine suspects that this may be based on a misreading as in the former quotation. The same undoubted mention of the name in native historians is by Râm Singh (1748). There is a doubtful reference in the Târikh-i-Muhammedi (1722-23).]

1784.—"Bindarees, who receive no pay, but give a certain monthly sum to the commander-in-chief for permission to maraud, or plunder, under sanction of his banners."—Indian Vocabulary, s.v.

1808.—"Depend upon it that no Pindarees or struggling horse will venture to your rear, so long as you can keep the enemy in check and your detachment well in advance."—Wellington, ii. 219.

1823.—"On asking an intelligent old Pindarry, who came to me on the part of Kurrum Khan, the reason of this absence of high character, he gave me a short and shrewd answer: 'Our occupation' (said he) 'was incompatible with the fine virtues and qualities you state; and I suppose if any of our people ever had them, the first effect of such good feeling would be to make him leave our community.'"—Sir John Malcolm, Central India, i. 436.

["He had ascended on horseback . . . being mounted on a Pindaree pony, an animal accustomed to climbing."—Hoole, Personal Narrative, 282.]

1825.—"The name of Pindaree is coeval with the earliest invasion of Hindostan by the Maharratts . . . The designation was applied to a sort of sorry cavalry that accompanied the Peshâwa's armies in their expeditions, rendering them much the same service as the Cossacks perform for the armies of Russia . . . The several leaders went over with their bands from one chief to another, as best suited their private interests, or those of their followers . . . The cavalry generally became formidable by the close of the Duserra. The horses then were shod, and a leader of tried courage and conduct having been chosen as Lakhureea, all that were inclined set forth on a foray or Lukbur, as it was called in the Pindaree nomenclature; all were mounted, though not equally well. Out of a thousand, the proportion of good cavalry might be 400: the favourite weapon was a bamboo spear . . . but . . . it was a rule that every 15th or 20th man of the fighting Pindarees should be armed with a matchlock. Of the remaining 600, 400 were usually common lootase (see LOOTY), indifferently mounted, and armed with every variety of weapon, and the rest, slaves, attendants, and camp-followers, mounted on tattoos, or wild ponies, and keeping up with the lukbur in the best manner they could."—Prinsep, Hist. of Pol. and Mil. Transactions (1813-1822), iii. 37, note.

1829.—"The person of whom she asked this question said 'Brinjaree' (see BRINJARRY) . . . but the lady understood him Pindaree, and the name was quite sufficient. She jumped out of the palanquin and ran towards home, screaming, 'Pindarees, Pindarees.'"—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 281.

PINE-APPLE. (See ANANAS.)

[The word has been corrupted by native weavers into pinaphal or minaphal, as the name of a silk fabric, so called because of the pine-apple pattern on it. (See Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 98.)]

PINJRAPOLE, s. A hospital for animals, existing perhaps only in Gujarat, is so called. Guz. pinjiropor or pinjrapol, [properly a cage (panjra) for the sacred bull (pola) released in the name of Siva]. See Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 120, and Orvington, 300-301; [P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 67, 70. Forbes (Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 156) describes "the Banian hospital" at Surat; but they do not use this word, which Molesworth says is quite modern in Mahr.]

1808.—"Every marriage and mercantile transaction among them is taxed with a contribution for the Pinjrapole ostensibly."—R. Drummond.

PINTADO. From the Port.

A. A 'painted' (or 'spotted') cloth, i.e. chintz (q.v.). Though the word was applied, we believe, to all printed goods, some of the finer Indian chintzes were, at least in part, finished by hand-painting.

1579.—"With cloth of diverse colours, not much unlike our usual pentadoes."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 143.

1602-5.—"... about their loynes a fine Pintadoes."—Scott's Discourse ofJava, in Purchas, i. 164.

1608.—"Heare the Generall delievered a Letter to the KINGS MAIESTIE of ENGLAND, with a fare standing Cuppe, and a cover double gilt, with divers of the choicest Pintadoes, which hee kindly accepted of."—Middleton's Voyage, E. 8.

[1810.—"Pintadoes of divers sorts will sell... The names are Scaramuzza, Berum party, large Chaudes, Selematt Cambias, Selematt white and black, Cheat Betime and divers others."—Danvers, Letters, i. 75.

1630.—"Also they stain Linnen cloth, which we call pantadas."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 304.]

1665.—"To Woodcott... where was a roome hung with Pintado, full of figures greate and small, prettily representing sundry trades and occupations of the Indians."—Evelyn's Diary, Dec. 90.

c. 1759.—"The chintz and other fine painted goods will, if the market is not overstocked, find immediate vent, and sell for 100 p. cent."—Letter from Pegu, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 120.

A name (not Anglo-Indian) for the Guinea-fowl. This may have been given from the resemblance of the speckled feathers to a chintz. But in fact pinta in Portuguese is 'a spot,' or fleck, so that probably it only means speckled. This is the explanation of Bluteau. [The word is more commonly applied to the cape Pigeon. See Mr. Gray's note on 'Pyrrh de Lavall, Hak. Soc. i. 21, who quotes from Fryer, p. 12.]

PISACHEE. Skt. piśācī, a she-demon, m. piśāca. In S. India some of the demons worshipped by the ancient tribes are so called. The spirits of the dead, and particularly of those who have met with violent deaths, are especially so entitled. They are called in Tamil pey. Sir Walter Elliot considers that the Piśāčās were (as in the case of Rakṣasas) a branch of the aboriginal inhabitants. In a note he says: 'The Piśāčī dialect appears to have been a distinct Dravidian dialect, still to be recognised in the speech of the Paraiya, who cannot pronounce distinctly some of the pure Tamil letters.' There is, however, in the Hindu drama a Piśāčī bhādha, a gibberish or corruption of Sanskrit, introduced. [This at the present day has been applied to English.] The term piśācī is also applied to the small circular storms commonly by Europeans called devils (q.v.). We do not know where Archdeacon Hare (see below) found the Piśāčī to be a white demon.

1610.—"The fifth (mode of Hindu marriage) is the Piśācā-vidāka, when the lover, without obtaining the sanction of the girl's parents, takes her home by means of talismans, incantations, and such like magical practices, and then marries her. Piśācā, in Sanskrit, is the name of a demon, which takes whatever person it fixes on, and as the above marriage takes place after the same manner, it has been called by this name."—The Dabistan, ii. 72; [See Many, iii. 54].

c. 1780.—"Que demandez-vous? leur criai-je d'un ton de voix rude. 'Pourquoi restez-vous là à m'attendre! et d'où vient que ces autres femmes se sont enfiées, comme moi, de temps en temps un Piśācā (esprit malin), ou une bête sauvage qui volut vous devorer!'"—HAUFTNER, ii. 287.

1801.—"They believe that such men as die accidental deaths become Pysāčā, or evil spirits, and are exceedingly troublesome by making extraordinary noises, in families, and occasioning fits and other diseases, especially in women."—F. Buchanan's Mysore, iii. 17.

1816.—"Whirlwinds... at the end of March, and beginning of April, carry dust and light things along with them, and are called by the natives pešāshes or devils."—Asiatic Journal, i. 307.

1819.—"These demons or pešāshes are the usual attendants of Shiva."—Erskine on Kirpithi, in Be. Lit. Soc. Trans. i. 219.

1827.—"As a little girl was playing round me one day with her white frock over her head, I laughingly called her a Piśācā, the name which the Indians give to their white devil. The child was delighted with so fine a name, and ran about the house crying out to every one she met. I am the Pisāshes, I am the Pisāshes. Would she have done so, had she been wrapt in black, and called trick or devil instead! No: for, as usual, the reality was nothing, the sound and colour everything."—J. C. Hare, in 'Letters at Truth, by Two Brothers, 1st Series, ed. 1838, p. 7.

PISANG, s. This is the Malay word for plantain or banana (q.v.). It is never used by English people, but is the usual word among the Dutch, and common also among the Germans, [Norwegians and Swedes, who probably got it through the Dutch.]

1651.—"Les Cotonniers vendent ces fruits, come du Pisang, &c."—A. Roger, La Porte Ouvrée, p. 11.

c. 1785.—"Nous arrivâmes au grand village de Colta, où nous toutes de belles allées de bananiers ou pisang..."—Hauftsner, ii. 35.
1875.—"Of the pisang or plantain... there are over thirty kinds, of which, the Pisang-mas, or golden plantain, so named from its colour, though one of the smallest, is nevertheless most deservedly prized."—Thomson, The Straits of Malacca, 8.

PISPASH. s. Apparently a factitious Anglo-Indian word, applied to a slop of rice-soup with small pieces of meat in it, much used in the Anglo-Indian nursery. [It is apparently P. pish-pash, 'shivered or broken in pieces'; from Pers. pashidan.]

1834.—"They found the Secretary disappointed, that is to say, if surrounded with huge volumes of Financial Reports on one side, and a small silver tray holding a mess of pispash on the other, can be called disengaged."—The Baboo, &c. i. 85.

PITARBAH. s. A coffer or box used in travelling by palankin, to carry the traveller's clothes, two such being slung to a bangly (q.v.). Hind. pürdār, petārd, Skt. pītaka, 'a basket.' The thing was properly a basket made of cane; but in later practice of tin sheet, with a light wooden frame.

1883.—"... he sat in the palanquin, which was filled with water up to his neck, whilst everything he had in his batara (or 'trunk') was soaked with wet..."—Travels of Dr. Wolff, ii. 196.

1849.—"The attention of the staff was called to the necessity of putting the pitarbas and property in the Bungalow, as thieves abounded. 'My dear Sir,' was the reply, 'we are quite safe; we have nothing.'"—Delhi Gazette, Nov. 7.

1853.—"It was very soon settled that Oakfield was to send to the dark bungalow for his petarbas, and stay with Staunton for about three weeks."—W. D. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 223.

PLANTAIN. s. This is the name by which the Musa sapientum is universally known to Anglo-India. Books distinguish between the Musa sapientum or plantain, and the Musa paradisiaca or banana; but it is hard to understand where the line is supposed to be drawn. Variation is gradual and infinite.

The botanical name Musa represents the Ar. mas, and that again is from the Skt. mochā. The specific name sapientum arises out of a misunderstanding of a passage in Pliny, which we have explained under the head Jack. The specific paradisiaca is derived from the old belief of Oriental Christians (entertained also, if not originated by the Mahomedans) that this was the tree from whose leaves Adam and Eve made themselves aprons. A further mystical interest attached also to the fruit, which some believed to be the forbidden apple of Eden. For in the pattern formed by the core or seeds, when the fruit was cut across, our forefathers discerned an image of the Cross, or even of the Crucifix. Medieval travellers generally call the fruit either Musa or 'Fig of Paradise,' or sometimes 'Fig of India,' and to this day in the W. Indies the common small plantains are called 'figs.' The Portuguese also habitually called it 'Indian Fig.' And this perhaps originated some confusion in Milton's mind, leading him to make the Banyan (Ficus Indica of Pliny, as of modern botanists) the Tree of the aprons, and greatly to exaggerate the size of the leaves of that ficus.

The name banana is never employed by the English in India, though it is the name universal in the London fruit-shops, where this fruit is now to be had at almost all seasons, and often of excellent quality, imported chiefly, we believe, from Madeira, [and more recently from Jamaica. Mr. Skeat adds that in the Strait Settlements the name plantain seems to be reserved for those varieties which are only eatable when cooked, but the word banana is used indifferently with plantain, the latter being on the whole perhaps the rarer word].

The name plantain is no more originally Indian than is banana. It, or rather platana, appears to have been the name under which the fruit was first carried to the W. Indies, according to Oviedo, in 1516; the first edition of his book was published in 1526. That author is careful to explain that the plant was improperly so called, as it was quite another thing from the platanus described by Pliny. Bluteau says the word is Spanish. We do not know how it came to be applied to the Musa. [Mr. Guppy (8 ser. Notes & Queries, viii. 87) suggests that the Spaniards have obtained platano from the Carib and Galibi words for banana, viz., balatana and yalatana, by the process followed by the Australian colonists when they converted a native name for the casuarina trees into 'she-oak'; and that we can thus explain how platano came in Spanish.

to signify both the plane-tree and the banana.” Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. a.v.) derives plantain from Lat. planta, ‘a plant’; properly ’a spreading sucker or shoot’; and says that the plantain took its name from its spreading leaf.] The rapid spread of the plantain or banana in the West, whence both names were carried back to India, is a counterpart to the rapid diffusion of the bananas in the Old World of Asia. It would seem from the translation of Mendoza that in his time (1585) the Spaniards had come to use the form plantano, which our Englishmen took up as plantam and plantain. But even in the 1736 edition of Bailey’s Dict. the only explanation of plantain given is as the equivalent of the Latin plantago, the field-weed known by the former name. Platano and Plantano are used in the Philippine Islands by the Spanish population.

1386.—“Sunt in Syrià et Aegypto poma oblonga quae Paradisi nuncupantur optimi saporis, mollia, in ore cito dissolubilia; per transversum quotiescumque ipes incideris Crucifex ... dixi non durant, unde per mare ad nostum duci non possunt incorrupta.”—Oul. de Boldensee.

c. 1580.—“Sunt enim in orlo illo Adae de Seyllano primo nusser, quas incolae fusc vocant ... et istud vidimus oculis nostris quod ubicunque inciderit per transversum, in utrâque parte incisas venetur ymago hominis crucifex ... et de istic foliis fictis Adam et Eva fecerunt sibi perzonam.”—John de’ Marignoli, in Cathay, &c. p. 352.

1384.—And there is again a fruit which many people assert to be that regarding which our first father Adam sinned, and this fruit they call Muse ... in this fruit you see a very great miracle, for when you divide it anyway, whether lengthways or across, or cut it as you will, you shall see inside, as it were, the image of the Crucifix; and of this we comrades many times made proof.”—Vaggio di Simone Sigoli (Firenze, 1862, p. 160).

1526 (tr. 1557).—“There are also certaine plantes whiche the Christians call Platani. In the myddlest of the plant, in the highest part thereof, there groweth a cluster with fourtie or fiftie platans about it. ... This cluster ought to be taken from the plant, when any one of the platans begins to appeare yelowe, at which time they take it, and hang it in their houses, where all the cluster waxeth rype, with all his platans.”—Oriedo, transal. in Eden’s Hist. of Travyles, f. 208.

1552 (tr. 1582).—“Moreover the Ilande (of Mombas) is verye pleasant, having many orchards, wherein are planted and are groweing ... Figgges of the Indias. ...”—Cassiodor, by N. L., f. 22.

1579.—“... a fruit which they call Figo (Magellanse calls it a figg of a span long, but it is no other than that which the Spaniards and Portingalls have named Plantanes).”—Drake’s Voyage, Hak. Soc. p. 142.

1585 (tr. 1588).—“There are mountaines very thickes of orange trees,_siders [i.e. cadras, ‘citrons’], limes, plantanos, and palmes.”—Mendoza, by R. Parke, Hak. Soc. ii. 330.

1588.—“Our Generall made their wines to fetch vs Plantanas, Lymonns, and Oranges, Pine-apples, and other fruits.”—Voyage of Master Thomas Cantish, in P PURCHAS, i. 64.

1588 (tr. 1604).—“... the first that shall be needefull to treat of is the Plantain (Platano), or Plantano, as the vulgar call it. ... The reason why the Spaniards call it platano (for the Indians had no such name), was, as in other trees for that they have found some resemblence of the one with the other, even as they called some fruietes prunes, pines, and cucumbers, being far different from those which are called by those names in Castille. The thing wherein was most resemblance, in my opinion, between the plantas at the Indies and those which the ancients did celebrate, is the greatness of the leaves. ... But, in truth, there is no more comparison nor resemblance of the one with the other than there is, as the Proverbs saith, betwixt an egg and a chestnut.”—Joseph de Acosta, transl. by E. G., Hak. Soc. i. 241.

1593.—“The plantanes is a tree found in most parts of Africa and America, of which two leaves are sufficient to cover a man from top to toe.”—Hawkins, Voyage into the South Sea, Hak. Soc. 49.

1610.—“... and every day failed not to send each man, being one and fiftie in number, two cakes of white bread, and a quantitie of Dates and Plantanas ...”—Sir H. Middleton, in PURCHAS, i. 234.

c. 1610.—“Ces Gentils ayant pitié de moy, il y eut vne femme qui me mit ... vne serviente de feuilles de plantanes accommodees ensemble avec des espinres, puis me letta desmus du ryu qui auec vne cerne sauce qu’ils appellent caril (see CURRY). ...”—Moquez, Voyages, 289.

[... “They (elephants) require ... besides leaves of trees, chiefly of the Indian fig, which we call Bananes and the Turks plantenes.”—Pyrard de LaVal, Hak. Soc. ii. 345.]

1616.—“They have to these another fruit we English there call a Plantes, of which many of them grow in clusters together ... very yelowe when they are Ripe, and then they taste like unto a Nerwick Pear, but much better.”—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 360.

c. 1625.—“... with candy PLANTAINs and the juicy Pine,
On choicest Melons and sweet Grapes they dine,
And with Potatoes fat their wanton Swine.”—Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands.

PLASSEY, n.p. The village Palæsi, which gives its name to Lord Clive's famous battle (June 23, 1757). It is said to take its name from the palus (or dhawke) tree.

1748.—"... that they have great reason to complain of Ensign English's conduct in not waiting at Placy... and that if he had staid another day at Placy, as Tullerooy Caun was marching with a large force towards Cutway, they presume the Mahattas would have retreated inland on their approach and left him an open passage."

1757.—Clive's original report of the battle is dated on the "plain of Plasie."—Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 57.

1768-71.—"General Clive, who should have been the leader of the English troops in this battle (Plassey), left the command to Colonel Coote, and remained hid in his palankeen during the combat, out of the reach of the shot, and did not make his appearance before the enemy were put to flight."—Starovius, E.T. i. 480. This stupid and inaccurate writer says that several English officers who were present at the battle related this "anecdote" to him. This, it may be hoped, is as untrue as the rest of the story. Even to such a writer one would have supposed that Clive's mettle would be familiar.

PODÁR, s. Hind. poddár, corrn. of Pers. pândár, from pata, 'a bag of money.' A cash-keeper, or especially an officer attached to a treasury, whose business it is to weigh money and bullion and appraise the value of coins.

[1772.—"Podàr, a money-changer or teller, under a shroff."—Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss. s. v.]

POGGLE, PUGGLY, &c., s. Properly Hind. págál; 'a madman, an idiot'; often used colloquially by Anglo-Indians. A friend belonging to that body used to adduce a macaronic adage which we fear the non-Indian will fail to appreciate: "Págál et pecunia jaldè separantur!" [See NAUCH.]

1829.—"It's true the people call me, I know not why, the pugley."—Mem. John Shipp, ii. 256.

1836.—"I was foolish enough to pay these budmashees beforehand, and they have thrown me over. I must have been a paungul to do it."—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, 385.

POISON-NUT, s. Strychnos nux vomica, L.

POLEA, n.p. Mal. pulayan, [from Tam. pulam, 'a field,' because in Malabar they are occupied in rice cultivation]. A person of a low or impure tribe, who causes pollution (pula) to those of higher caste, if he approaches within a certain distance. [The rules which regulate their meeting with other people are given by Mr. Logan (Malabar, i. 118)]. From pula the Portuguese formed also the verbs empolear-se, 'to become polluted by the touch of a low-caste person,' and desempolear-se, 'to purify oneself after such pollution' (Gowea, f. 97, and Synod. f. 52e), superstitions which Menezes found prevailing among the Christians of Malabar. (See HIRAVA.)

1510.—"The fifth class are called Poliar, who collect pepper, wine, and nuts. . . . the Poliar may not approach either the Naeri (see NAIRE) or the Brahmins within 50 paces, unless they have been called by them. . . ."—Varthema, 142.

1516.—"There is another lower sort of gentiles called pular. . . . They do not speak to the naers except for a long way off, as far as they can be heard speaking with a loud voice. . . . And whatever man or woman should touch them, their relations immediately kill them like a contaminated thing. . . ."—Barbosa, 143.

1572.—"A ley, da gente toda, ricca e pobre, De fabulas composita se imagina: Andão nus, e somente hum pano cobre As partes que a cubrir natura ansa. Dous modos ha de gente; porquê a nobre Nayres chamados são, e a minos dina Polias tem por nome, a quem obriga A ley não misturar a casta antigia."—Camões, vii. 37.

By Burton:

"The Law that holds the people high and low, is fraught with false phantastick tales long past; they go unclothèd, but a wrap they throw for decent purpose round the loins and waist: Two modes of men are known: the nobles know the name of Nayres, who call the lower caste Polêas, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain. . . ."

1598.—"When the Portingales came first into India, and made league and composition with the King of Cochin, the Nayres desired that men should give them place, and turne out of the Way, when they mette in the Streets, as the Polayas . . ." (used to do).—Linschoten, 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 281; also see i. 279].

1606.—". . . he said by way of insult that he would order him to touch a Polena, which is one of the lowest castes of Malauar."—Gowea, f. 76.

1626.—"These Pular be Thieves and Robbers."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

1727.—"Poulias." (See under MUCAO.)

1754.—"Niaode and Pullie are two low castes on the Malabar coast. . . ."—Inez, 26.

1766.—". . . Poulighessa, a cast hardly suffered to breathe the common air, being driven into the forrests and mountains out of the commerce of mankind. . . ."—Gowea, 2nd ed. ii. 161 seq.

1770.—"Their degradation is still more complete on the Malabar coast, which has not been subdued by the Mogul, and where they (the pariahs) are called Pouliaus."—Raynal, E.T. 1796, i. 6.

1805.—"Further south in India we find polyandry among . . . Poleres of Malabar."—McLennan, Primitive Marriage, 179.

POLIGAR, s. This term is peculiar to the Madras Presidency. The persons so called were properly subordinate feudal chiefs, occupying tracts more or less wild, and generally of predatory habits in former days; they are now much the same as Zemindars in the highest use of that term (q.v.). The word is Tam. paliyakalratan, 'the holder of a paliyam,' or feudal estate; Tel. palegadu; and thence Mahr. palegar; the English form being no doubt taken from one of the two latter. The southern Poligars gave much trouble about 100 years ago, and the "Poligar wars" were somewhat serious affairs. In various assaults on Pânjâlamkurichi, one of their forts in Tînnevelly, between 1799 and 1801 there fell 15 British officers. Much regarding the Poligars of the south will be found in Nelson's Madura, and in Bishop Caldwell's very interesting History of Tînnevelly. Most of the quotations apply to those southern districts. But the term was used north to the Mahratta boundary.

1831.—"They pulled down the Pologar's houses, who being conscious of his guilt, had fled and hid himself."—Wheeler, i. 118.

1701.—"Le lendemain je me rendis à Tailur, c'est une petite ville qui appartient à un autre Polagaran."—Let. Edy. x. 269.

1745.—"J'espére que Votre Eminence agréera l'établissement d'une nouvelle Mission près des Montagnes appelées vul-Poligar, s. A large breed of dogs found in S. India. "The Poligar dog is large and powerful, and is peculiar in being without hair" (Balfour, Cyclo. i. 508).

[1853.] "It was evident that the original breed had been crossed with the bull-dog, or the large Poligar dog of India."—Campbell, Old Forest Ranger, 3rd ed. p. 12.

Pollam, s. Tam. palaiyam; Tel. palamu; (see under Poligar).

1873.—"The principal reason which they assigned against the extirpation of the poligars (see Poligar) was that the weavers were protected in their fortresses. They might have added, that the Company itself which stung them to death, had been warmed in the bosom of these unfortunate princes; for on the taking of Madras by the French, it was in their hospitable pollams that most of the inhabitants found refuge and protection."—Burke’s Speech on Fox’s E. I. Bill, in Works, iii. 488.

1795.—"Having submitted the general remarks on the Pollams I shall proceed to observe that in general the conduct of the Poligars is much better than could be expected from a race of men, who have hitherto been excluded from those advantages, which almost always attend conquered countries, an intercourse with their conquerors. With the exception of a very few, when I arrived they had never seen a European. . . ."—Report on Madigal, by Mr. Wynch, quoted in Nelson’s Madura, Pt. iv. p. 15.

Polo, s. The game of hockey on horseback, introduced of late years into England, under this name, which comes from Balti; polo being properly in the language of that region the ball used in the game. The game thus lately revived was once known and practised (though in various forms) from Provence to the borders of China (see CHICANE). It had continued to exist down to our own day, it would seem, only near the extreme East and the extreme West of the Himalayas, viz. at Manipur in the East (between Cachar and Burma), and on the West in the high valley of the Indus (in Ladak, Balti, Astor and Gilgit, and extending into Chitrál). From the former it was first adopted by our countrymen at Calcutta, and a little later (about 1864) it was introduced into the Punjab, almost simultaneously from the Lower Provinces and from Kashmir, where the summer visitors had taken it up. It was first played in England, it would seem at Aldershot, in July 1871, and in August of the same year at Dublin in the Phoenix Park. The next year it was played in many places.* But the first mention we can find in the Times is a notice of a match at Lillie-Bridge, July 11, 1874, in the next day’s paper. There is mention of the game in the Illustrated London News of July 20, 1873, where it is treated as a new invention by British officers in India. [According to the author of the Badminton Library treatise on the game, it was adopted by Lieut. Sherer in 1854, and a club was formed in 1859. The same writer fixes its introduction into the Punjab and N.W.P. in 1861-62. See also an article in Baily’s Magazine on “The Early History of Polo” (June 1890). The Central Asian form is described, under the name of Baija or Kok-bürä, ‘grey wolf,’ by Schuyler (Turkistan, i. 268 seqq.) and that in Daristan by Biddulph (Tribes of the Hindoo Koosh, 84 seqq.).] In Ladak it is not indigenous, but an introduction from Baltistan. See a careful and interesting account of the game of those parts in Mr. F. Drew’s excellent book, The Jummoor and Kashmir Territories, 1875, pp. 380-392.

We learn from Professor Tylor that the game exists still in Japan, and a very curious circumstance is that the polo racket, just as that described by Jo. Cinnamus in the extract under CHICANE has survived there. [See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 333 seqq.]

1835.—“The ponies of Munseepoor hold a very conspicuous rank in the estimation of the inhabitants... The national game of Hockey, which is played by every man of the country capable of sitting a horse, renders them all expert equestrians; and it was by men and horses so trained, that the princes of Munseepoor were able for many years not only to repel the aggressions of the Burmah, but to save the whole country... and plant their banners on the banks of the Irrawaddie.”—Pemberton’s Report on the E. Frontier of Br. India, 31-32.

1838.—“At Shigurh I first saw the game of the Chaugan, which was played the day after our arrival on the Mydan or plain laid out expressly for the purpose. It is in fact hockey on horseback. The ball, which is larger than a cricket ball, is only a globe made of a kind of willow-wood, and is called in Tibet ‘Pula’. I can conceive that the Chaugan requires only to be seen to be played. It is the fit sport of an equestrian nation. The game is played at almost every valley in Little Tibet and the adjoining countries... Ladak, Yessen, Chitrál, &c.; and I should recommend it to be tried on the Hippodrome at Baywater. . . .”—Figuir, Travels in Kashmir, Ladak, Iiskarlo, &c. (1842), ii. 289-292.

1848.—“An assembly of all the principal inhabitants took place at Iiskarlo, on some occasion of ceremony or festivity. It was thus fortunate enough to be a witness of the chaung, which is derived from Persia, and has been described by Mr. Vigue as hockey on horseback. . . . Large quadrangular enclosed meadows for this game may be seen in all the larger villages of Baltī, often surrounded by rows of beautiful willow and poplar trees.”—Dr. T. Thomson, Himalaya and Tibet, 260-261.

“Polo, Tent-pegging, Hurinham, the Rink,
I leave all these delights.”

Browning, Inn Album, 23.

POLLOCK-SAUG, s. Hind. palak, palak-ság; a poor vegetable, called also ‘country spinach’ (Beta vulgaris, or B. Bengalesensis, Roxb.). [Riddell (Domest. Econ. 579) calls it ‘Bengal Beet’.

POLONGA, TIC-POLONGA, s. A very poisonous snake, so called in Ceylon (Bungarzs? or Daboia elegans?); Singh. polonígard. [The Madras Gloss. identifies it with the Daboia elegans, and calls it ‘Chain viper,’ ‘Necklace snake,’ ‘Russell’s viper,’ or cobra manilla. The Singh. name is said to be titpolanga, tit, 'spotted,' polanga, 'viper.'

1681.—"There is another venomous snake called Polongo, the most venomous of all, that kills cattel. Two sorts of them I have seen, the one green, the other of reddish gray, full of white rings along the sides, and about five or six feet long."—Knack, 29.

1825.—"There are only four snakes ascertained to be poisonous; the cobra de capello is the most common, but its bite is not so certainly fatal as that of the tio polonga, which destroys life in a few minutes."—Mrs. Heber, in H.'s Journal, ed. 1844, ii. 107.

POMFRET, POMPHRET. A genus of sea-fish of broad compressed form, embracing several species, of good repute for the table on all the Indian coasts. According to Day they are all reducible to Stromateus senensis, 'the white Pomfret,' Str. cincereus, which is, when immature, 'the silver Pomfret,' and when mature, 'the gray Pomfret,' and Str. niger, 'the black P.' The French of Pondicherry call the fish pample. We cannot connect it with the απόκεισθαι of Athenian (xv. 23) and Athenaeus (Lib. VII. cap. xviii. seqq.) which is identified with a very different fish, the 'pilot-fish' (Naukrates ductor of Day). The name is probably from the Portuguese, and a corruption of pampano, 'a vine-leaf,' from supposed resemblance; this is the Portuguese name of a fish which occurs just where the pomfret should be mentioned. Thus:

1596.—"The best fish is called Mordexin, Pampano, and Tattingo."—Linsechen, Hak. Soc. ii. 11.

1613.—"The fishes of this Mediterranean (the Malayan sea) are very savoury sables, and seer fish (serres) and pampanos, and rays."—Godinho de Erédia, f. 33v.

1703.—"... Albacores, Dauphins, Pamphletes."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxxiv.

1727.—"Between Cumana and Ballasore Rivers ... a very delicious Fish called the Pampilce, come in Sholes, and are sold for two Pence per Hundred. Two of them are sufficient to dine a moderate Man."—J. Hamilton, i. 396; [ed. 1744].

1810.—"Another face look'd broad and bland Like pamplit floundering on the sand; Where'er she turned her piercing stare, She seemed alert to spring in air."—Malay verses, rendered by Dr. Leyden, in Maria Graham, 201.

1813.—"The pomfret is not unlike a small turbot, but of a more delicate flavour; and epicures esteem the black pomfret a great dainty."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 52-53; [2nd ed. i. 38].

1822.—"... the lad was brought up to catch pamphlets and bombaloes."—Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 106.

1874.—"The greatest pleasure in Bombay was eating a fish called 'pomfret.'"—Sat. Rec., 30th May, 690.

1896.—"Another account of this sort of seine fishing, for catching pomfret fish, is given by Mr. Gueritz."—Lang Roth, Nature of Sarawak, i. 455.

POMMELO, PAMPILMOOSE, &c., s. Citrus decumana, L., the largest of the orange-tribe. It is the same fruit as the shaddock of the West Indies; but to the larger varieties some form of the name Pommele seems also to be applied in the West. A small variety, with a fine skin, is sold in London shops as "the Forbidden fruit." The fruit, though grown in gardens over a great part of India, really comes to perfection only near the Equator, and especially in Java, whence it was probably brought to the continent. For it is called in Bengal Batavi nimbu (i.e. Citrus Bataviana). It probably did not come to India till the 17th century; it is not mentioned in the Ain. According to Bretschneider the Pommele is mentioned in the ancient Chinese Book of the Shu-King. Its Chinese name is Yu.

The form of the name which we have put first is that now general in Anglo-Indian use. But it is probably only a modern result of 'striving after meaning' (quasi Pomo-melone). Among older authors the name goes through many strange shapes. Tavernier calls it pompone (Voy. des Indes, liv. iii. ch. 24; [ed. Ball, ii. 360]), but the usual French name is pample-mousse. Dampier has Pumplenose (ii. 125); Lockyer, Pumplenuse (61); Forrest, Pummel-nose (32); Ives, 'pimple-noses, called in the West Indies Chadocks' [19]. Maria Graham uses the French spelling (22). Pompoleon is a form unknown to us, but given in the Eng. Cyclopaedia. Molesworth's Marathi Dict. gives "papannas, papana, or papanis (a word of S. America)." We are unable to give the true etymology, though Littré says boldly "Tamoul, bambolimas." Ainslie (Mat. Medica, 1813) gives Poomimas as the Tamil, whilst Balfour (Cycl. of India) gives Pumpalimas and Bambulimas as Tamil.
Bombarimasa and Pampara-panasa as Telugu, Bambali narangi as Malayalam. But if these are real words they appear to be corruptions of some foreign term. [Mr. F. Brandt points out that the above forms are merely various attempts to transliterate a word which is in Tamil pambalimasa, while the Malayalam is bambali-ndrekkam ‘bambali’ tree.] According to the Madras Gloss, all these, as well as the English forms, are ultimately derived from the Malay pumphulmas. Mr. Skeat writes: “In an obsolete Malay dict., by Howison (1801) I find ‘poomplemooos, a fruit brought from India by Captain Shaddock,” and afterwards obtained his name: the affix moo appears to be the Dutch moos, ‘vegetable.’ If this be so, the Malay is not the original form.

1680.—“The fruit called by the Netherlanders Pampelmoos, by the Portuguese Jambos, grows in superfluity outside the city of Batavia. . . . This fruit is larger than any of the lemon-kind, for it grows as large as the head of a child of 10 years old. The core or inside is for the most part reddish, and has a kind of sourish sweetness, tasting like unripe grapes.” — Walter Schulten, 268

PONDICHERY, n.p. This name of what is now the chief French settlement in India, is Pudu-chêchêri, or Puthuppuри, ‘New Town,’ more correctly Pudu-vai, Puthuvai, meaning ‘New Place.’ C. P. Brown, however, says it is Pudi-chêchêri, ‘New Tank.’ The natives sometimes write it Phulcheri. [Mr. Garstin (Man. S. Arcot, 422) says that Hindus call it Puthuvai or Puthuppuari, while Musalmans call it Pulcheri, or as the Madras Gloss, writes the word, Pulchari.]

[1683.—“. . . Interlopers intend to settle attt. Verampatnam, a place near Pullicherry. . . .”—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 41. In iv. 113 (1835) we have Pondicherry.]

1711.—“The French and Danes likewise hire them (Portuguese) at Pont de Cherere and Trincomabar.”—Lockyer, 286.

1726. — “Poesdechery,” in Valentijn, Chor. 11.

1727.—“Pundicherry is the next Place of Note on this Coast, a colony settled by the French.”—A. Hamilton, i. 356; [ed. 1741].

1738.—“L’établissement des François à Pondichéry remonte jusqu’en l’année 1674 : mais par de si lointains commencements, qu’on n’aurait pu de la peine à imaginer, que les suites en fussent aussi considérables.” — D’Anville, p. 121.

1780.—“An English officer of rank, General Coota, who was unequaled among his compars in ability and experience in war, and who had frequently fought with the French of Phoolcherry in the Karmatic and . . . had as often gained the victory over them.”—H. of Hyder Nâzî, 413.

PONGOL, s. A festival of S. India, observed early in January. Tam. pongol, ‘boiling,’ i.e. of the rice, because the first act in the feast is the boiling of the new rice. It is a kind of harvest-home. There is an interesting account of it by the late Mr. C. E. Gover (J. R. As. Soc. N.S. v. 91), but the connection which he traces with the old Vedic religion is hardly to be admitted. [See the meaning of the rite discussed by Dr. Fraser, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 305 seq.]

1871.—“Nor does the gentle and kindly influence of the time cease here. The fœle of the Munsif’s Court will have been examined with cases from litigious enemies or greedy money lenders. But as Pongol comes round many of them disappear. . . . The creditor thinks of his debtor, the debtor of the creditor. The one relents, the other is ashamed, and both parties are saved by a compromise. Often it happens that a process is postponed ‘till after Pongol!’”—Gover, as above, p. 96.

POOJA, s. Properly applied to the Hindu ceremonies in idol-worship; Skt. pujà; and colloquially to any kind of rite. Thus jhanda ki pujà, or ‘Pooja of the flag,’ is the seyp term for what in St. James’s Park is called ‘Trooping of the colours.’ [Used in the plural, as in the quotation of 1900, it means the holidays of the Durga Pújâ or Dusséra.]

1776.—“. . . the occupation of the Dravin should be . . . to cause the performance of the poojen, i.e. the worship to Devak . . ."—Bahad, Code, ed. 1781, Pref. xix.

[1813.—" . . the Pundits in attendance commenced the pooja, or sacrifice, by pouring milk and curds upon the branches, and smearing over the leaves with wetted rice."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 214.]

[1826.—"The person whose steps I had been watching now approached the sacred tree, and having performed puja to a stone deity at its foot, proceeded to unmuffle himself from his shawls . . ."—Pandurang Hari, 26; [ed. 1873, i. 34].

1874.—"The mass of the ryots who perform the population of the village are too poor to have a family deity. They are forced to be content with . . the annual puja being performed . . on behalf of the village community."—Col. Rev. No. cxvii. 195.

1879.—"Among the curiosities of these lower galleries are little models of costumes and country scenes, among them a grand pooja under a tree."—Sat. Rev. No. 1251, p. 477.

[1900.—"Calcutta has been in the throes of the Pujars since yesterday."—Pioneer Mail, 5 Oct.].

POOJAREE. s. Hind. puṣṭrī. An officiating priest in an idol temple.

1702.—"L'office de poujarī ou de Pré-tresse de la Reine mère était incompatible avec le titre de servante du Seigneur."—Lett. Éd. xi. 111.

1891.—"Then the Pujarī, or priest, takes the Bhuta sword and bell in his hands . . ."—Morier-Williams, Brahmanism and Hinduism, 4th ed. 249.

POOL. s. P.—H. pul, a bridge. Used in two of the quotations under the next article for 'embankment.'

[1812.—"The bridge is thrown over the river . . . it is called the Pool Khan . . ."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 124.]

POOLBUNDY, a P.—H. pulbandi, Securing of bridges or embankments. A name formerly given in Bengal to a civil department in charge of the embankments. Also sometimes used improperly for the embankment itself.

[1765.—"Deduct Poolbundy advanced for repairs of dykes, roads, &c."—Verel, View of Bengal, App. 213.

[c. 1791.—"Pay your constant devours to Maria Allypore, or sell your soul and body to Poolbundy."—Ext. from Hick's Gazetteer, in Busted, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 3rd ed. 178. This refers to Impey, who was called by this name in allusion to a lucrative contract given to his relative, a Mr. Fraser.]

1786.—"That the Superintendent of Poolbundy Repairs, after an accurate and diligent survey of the bunds and pools, and the provincial Council of Burdwan . . had delivered it as their opinion . . ."—Articles of Change against Warren Hastings, in Burke, vii. 98.

1802.—"The Collector of Midnapore has directed his attention to the subject of poolbundy, and in a very ample report to the Board of Revenue, has described certain abuses and oppressions, consisting chiefly of pressing ryots to work on the pools, which call aloud for a remedy."—Fifth Report, App. p. 588.

1810.—" . . the whole is obliged to be preserved from inundation by an embankment called the pool bandy, maintained at a very great and regular expense."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 365.

POON, PEON, &c., s. Can. ponne, [Mal. punna, Skt. punnaga]. A timber tree (Calophyllum inophyllum, L.) which grows in the forests of Canara, &c., and which was formerly used for masts, whence also called mast-wood. [Linn. shotten refers to this tree, but not by name (Hak. Soc. i. 67).]

[1727.—" . . good Poorn-masts, stronger but heavier than Firr."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 287.

1773.—"Poon tree . . . the wood light but tolerably strong; it is frequently used for masts, but unless great care be taken to keep the wet from the ends of it, it soon rots."—Ives, 460.]

1835.—"Poon, or Puna . . . the largest sort is of a light, bright colour, and may be had at Mangalore, from the forests of Coromuel in Canara, where it grows to a length of 150 feet. At Mangalore I procured a tree of this sort that would have made a foresail for the Leander's gun ship, in one piece, for 1300 Rupees."—Edy's, in J. R. As. Soc. ii. 354.

POONAMALEE, n.p. A town, and formerly a military station, in the Chingleput Dist. of Madras Presidency, 13 miles west of Madras. The name is given in the Imp. Gazetteer as Pənəmaḷḷi (T), and Ponda malī, whilst Col. Branfill gives it as "Pāntha mali for Pāvirunthamali," without further explanation. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tam. Pundamalli, 'town of the jasmine- creeper,' which is largely grown there for the supply of the Madras markets.]

[1876.—"The dog, a small piebald cur, with a short tail, not unlike the Poonamalle terrier," which the British soldier is wont to manufacture from Pariah dogs for 'Griffins' with sporting proclivities, POONGEE, PHOONY, 724

POONGEE, PHOONY, s. The name most commonly given to the Buddhist religieux in British Burma. The word (p’hun-gya) signifies 'great glory.'

1782.—"... leurs Prêtres... sont moins instruits que les Brahmes, et portent le nom de Ponguis."—Sonneter, ii. 301.

1795.—"From the many convents in the neighbourhood of Rangoon, the number of Rhanans and Phongis must be very considerable; I was told it exceeded 1500."—Nymes, Embassy to Ava, 210.

1834.—"The Tapaloins are called by the Burmesse Phonghis, which term means great glory, or Rahans, which means perfect."—Bp. Bigandet, in J. Ind. Archip. iv. 222-3.

[1886.—"Every Burman has for some time during his life to be a Pongee, or monk."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 177.]

POOBANA, s. Skt. purana, 'old,' hence 'legendary,' and thus applied as a common name to 18 books which contain the legendary mythology of the Brahmans.

1612.—"... These books are divided into bodies, members, and joints (cordos, membros, e articulos)... six which they call Xastra (see SHASTER), which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Puranas, which are the members; twenty-eight called Agamas, which are the joints."—Gusto, Dec. V. liv. vi. cap. 3.

1651.—"As their Puranas, i.e. old histories, relate."—Rogerius, 153.

[1667.—"When they have acquired a knowledge of Sanscrit... they generally study the Purana, which is an abridgment and interpretation of the Bets" (see VEDAS).—Bernier, ed. Constable, p. 335.]

1806.—"Ceux-ci, calculoient tout haut de mémoire tandis que d'autres, plus avancés, lisoaient, d'un ton chantant, leurs Puranas."—Hafner, 1. 130.

POORUB, and POORBEAA, ss. Hind. pūrab, pārb, 'the East,' from Skt. pūrva or pārva, 'in front of,' as paścha (Hind. paścham) means 'behind' or 'westerly' and dakhina, 'right-hand' or southerly. In Upper India the term means usually Uudh, the Benares division, and Behar. Hence Poorbeaa (pārbiya), a man of those countries, was, in the days of the old Bengal army, often used for a sepoys, the majority being recruited in those provinces.

1553.—"Omaum (Humayûn) Patrich... resolved to follow Xerchan (Sher Khân) and try his fortunes against him... and they met close to the river Ganges before it unites with the river Jamona, where on the West bank of the river there is a city called Canose (Canaù), one of the chief of the kingdom of Dely. Xerchan was beyond the river in the tract which natives call Purba..."—Barros, IV. ix. 9.

[1611.—"Pirb is 400 yoke long."—Jourdain, quoted in Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 538.]

1616.—"Bengala, a most spacious and fruitful province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large provinces within it, Purba and Patan, the one lying on the east, the other on the west side of the river."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 357.

POOTLY NAUTCH, a. Properly Hind. kath-pulli-nêch, 'wooden-puppet-dance.' A puppet show.

POPPE-CAKE, in Bombay, and in Madras popadam, ss. These are apparently the same word and thing, though the former is attributed to a Hind. and Mrhr. origin pdpar, Skt. pârpata, and to the latter a Tamil one, paddam, as an abbreviation of paruppu-adam, 'lentil cake.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Tel. appadam, Tam. appalam (see HOPER), and Mal. pappatam, from parippu, 'dhall,' ata, 'cake.' It is a kind of thin scone or wafer, made of any kind of pulse or lentil flour, seasoned with asafoetida, &c., fried in oil, and in W. India baked crisp, and often eaten at European tables as an accompaniment to curry. It is not bad, even to a novice.

POBCA, n.p. In Imp. Gazetteer Porakad, also called Piracada; properly Purakkadu, [or according to the Madrass Gloss. Purakkatu, Mal. pura, 'outside,' katu, 'jungle']. A town on the coast of Travancore, formerly a separate State. The Portuguese had a fort here, and the Dutch, in the 17th century, a factory.

Fra Paolina (1796) speaks of it as a very populous city full of merchants, Mahomedan, Christian, and Hindu. It is now insignificant. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 338.]

[1663-4.—"Your factories of Carwarr and Forquatt are continued but to very little purpose to you."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 16.]

PORCELAIN, s. The history of this word for China-ware appears to be as follows. The family of univalve mollusks called Cypraeidae, or Cowries, (q.v.) were in medieval Italy called porcellana and porcelletta, almost certainly from their strong resemblance to the body and back of a pig, and not from a grosser analogy suggested by Mahn (see in Littré sub voce). That this is so is strongly corroborated by the circumstance noted by Dr. J. E. Gray (see Eng. Cyc. Nat. Hist. s.v. Cypraeidae) that Pig is the common name of shells of this family on the English coast; whilst Sow also seems to be a name of one or more kinds. The enamel of this shell seems to have been used in the Middle Ages to form a coating for ornamental pottery, &c., whence the early application of the term porcellana to the fine ware brought from the far East. Both applications of the term, viz. to cowries and to China-ware, occur in Marco Polo (see below). The quasi-analogous application of pig in Scotland to earthen-ware, noticed in an imaginary quotation below, is probably quite an accident, for there appears to be a Gaelic pigg, 'an earthen jar,' &c. (see Skeat, s.v. piggan). We should not fail to recall Dr. Johnson's etymology of porcelaine from "pour cent annes," because it was believed by Europeans that the materials were matured under ground 100 years! (see quotations below from Barbosa, and from Sir Thomas Brown).

c. 1250.—Capmany has the following passage in the work cited. Though the same writer published the Laws of the Consulado del Mar in 1791, he has deranged the whole of the chapters, and this, which he has quoted, is omitted altogether: 'In the XIIth chap. of the maritime laws of Barcelonas, which are undoubtedly not later than the middle of the 13th century, there are regulations for the return cargoes of the ships trading with Alexandria.

... In this are enumerated among articles brought from Egypt... cotton in bales and spun wool de capes (for hats!), porcelanas, alum, elephants' teeth..."

—Memorias, Hist. de Barcelona, i. Pt. ii. p. 44.

1298.—"It ont monnoie en tel maniere con je voz dirai, car il espendent porcelaine blance, celle se trovent en la mer et que se metent au cuel des chienz, et vailent les quatre-vingt porcelaines un saic d'argent qu se sont deus venesians gros..."—Marco Polo, oldest French text, p. 132.

—Jordani Mirabilia, p. 59.

In the next passage it seems probable that the shells, and not China dishes, are intended.

In the next the shells are clearly intended:

1516. — "They make in this country a great quantity of porcelains of different sorts as fine, hard, and grey, which form for them a great article of trade for all parts, and they make them in this way. They take the shells of sea-snails (! caracoli), and eggshells, and pound them, and with other ingredients make a paste, which they put underground to refine for the space of 80 or 100 years, and this mass of paste they leave to come to their children..." — Barbot, in Rarumio, i. 320.

1558. — (In China) "The service of their meals is the most elegant that can be, everything being of very fine procelana (although they also make use of silver and gold plate), and they eat everything with a fork made after their fashion, never putting a hand into their food, much or little." — Barrot, Illi. ii. 7.

1554. — (After a suggestion of the identity of the vase muraria of the ancients): "Ce nom de Porcellana est donné à plusiours coquilles de mor. Et pourco qu'on beau Vaisseau d'une coquelle de mor ne se pourrait rendre mieux à propos suynait le nom antique, que de l'appeller de Porce-laine l'ay pensé que les coquilles polies et luysantes, ressemblans à Nacre de perles, ont quelque affinité avec la matière des vases de Porcellana antique: il est aussi que le peuple François nomme les paten-nez facies de gros vignola, paten-nez de Porcellana. Les suxidcts vases de Porcelaine sont transparents, et constent bien cher au Caire, et disent messemment qu'ils les apporment des Indes. Mais cela ne me semble vraisemblable: car on n'en voirroit pas si grande quantité, no de si gràdes pieces, s'il fallloit apporter de si loing. 1560. — "And because there are many opinions among the Portugals which have not beene in China, about where this Porcelane is made, and touching the substance whereof it is made, some saying, that it is of oysters shells, others of dung rotten of a long time, because they were not enformed of the truth, I thought it convenient to tell here the substance..." — Gaspar de Cruz, in Pachas, III. 177.

1612. — "Balanced one part with sandal wood, Porcelain and pepper." — Daures, Letters, i. 197.

1615. — "If we had in England beds of porcelain such as they have in China,—which porcelain is a kind of plaster buried in the earth, and by length of time concealed and glazed into that substance; this were an artificial mine, and part of that substance..." — Bacon, Argument on Impreachmen t of Waste, Works, by Speaking, &c., 1859, vii. 528.

1630. — "The Baxayus all along the sea-shore pitch their Booths... for there they sell Callicoes, China-satten, Porcellineware, scutoreus or Cabbinistes..." — Sir F. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 45.

1650. — "We are not thoroughly resolved concerning Porcelane or China dishes, that according to common belief they are made of earth, which lieth in preparation about an hundred years underground; for the relations thereof are not only divers but contrary; and Authors agree not herein..." — Sir Thomas Browne, Vulgar Errors, ii. 5.

1652. — "Invited by Lady Gerrard I went to London, where we had a great supper; all the vessels, which were innumerable, were of Porcelain, she having the most ample and richest collection of that curiositie in England." — Evelyn, Diary, March 19.

M. van der Voorde, Etymol. Universale, s.v. 'Blue China.'" — Motto to An Ode in Brown Pig, St. James's Gazette, July 17.

Porgo, a. We know this word only from its occurrence in the passage... quoted; and most probably the explanation suggested by the editor of the Notes is correct, viz. that it represents Port. peragua. This word is perhaps the same as pirogue, used by the French for a canoe or ‘dug-out'; a term said by Littré to be (piroga) Carib. (On the passage from T. B. quoted below Sir H. Yule has the following note: "J. (i.e. T.) B., the author, gives a rough drawing. It represents the Pirgoe as a somewhat high-stemmed lighter, not very large, with five carpins a side. I cannot identify it exactly with any kind of modern boat of which I have found a representation. It is perhaps most like the palvddr. I think it must be an Oriissa word, but I have not been able to trace it in any dictionary, Uriya or Bengali." On this Col. Temple says: "The modern Indian palvdr (Malay palvdo) is a skiff, and would not answer the description." Anderson (loc. cit.) mentions that in 1885 several "well-laden Purgoes" and boats had put in for shelter at Rameswaram to the northward of Madapollam, i.e. on the Coromandel Coast. There seems to be no such word known there now. I identify, however, that the term Purgo is probably an obsolete Anglo-Indian corruption of an Indian corruption of the Port. term barco, barca, a term used for any kind of sailing boat by the early Portuguese visitors to the East (e.g. D’Alboquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 230; Vasco da Gama, Hak. Soc. 77, 240.)

[1669-70.—"A Purgoe: These Vse for the most part between Hugly and Pyplo and Ballaros: with these boats they carry goods into ye Roads on board English and Dutch, &c. Ships, they will liue a longe time in ye Sea, beinge brought to anchor by ye Sterne, as their Vseal way is."—MS. by T. B. [ateman], quoted by Anderson, English Intercourse with Siam, p. 206.]

1680.—St. Geo. Cosn., Jany. 30, "records arrival from the Bay of the Success, the Captain of which reports that a Purgoe [peragua], a fast-sailing vessel, Clapper] drove ashore in the Bay about Puply. . . .—Notes and Exta. No. iii. p. 2.

1683.—"The Thomas arrived with ye 26 pieces of SIlk taken out of the Purgoe."—Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 65.

1685.—In Hoogly letter to Fort St. George, dated February 8 Purgo occurs coupled with 'bora' (Hind. bhar, ‘a lighter').—Fringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 165.

PORTIA, s. In S. India the common name of the Theopseia populus, Lam. (N.O. Malvaceae), a favourite ornamental tree, thriving best near the sea. The word is a corruption of Tamil Puraasaru, ‘Flower-king; [pu- varsaq, from pu, ‘flower,' arasu, 'pee-pul tree']. In Ceylon it is called Suria gansuri, and also the Tulip-tree.

1742.—"Le bois sur lequel on les met (les toiles), et celu qu’on employe pour les batter, sont ordinairement de tamairier, ou d’un autre arbre nommé porchi."—Let. Edif. xiv. 122.

1860.—"Another useful tree, very common in Ceylon, is the Suria, with flowers so like those of a tulip that Europeans know it as the tulip tree. It loves the sea air and saline soils. It is planted all along the avenues and streets in the towns near the coast, where it is equally valued for its shade and the beauty of its yellow flowers, whilst its aromatic wood is used for carriage- shafts and gun-stocks."—Tennent’s Ceylon, i. 117.

1861.—"It is usual to plant large branches of the portia and banyan trees in such a slovenly manner that there is little probability of the trees thriving or being ornamental."—Oglehorn, Forests and Gardens of S. India, 197.

PORTO NOVO, n.p. A town on the coast of South Arcot, 32 m. S. of Pondicherry. The first mention of it that we have found is in Bocarro, Decada, p. 42 (c. 1613). The name was perhaps intended to mean ‘New Oporto,' rather than ‘New Haven,' but we have not found any history of the name. [The Tamil name is Paramig- pattai, ‘European town,' and it is called by Mahommedans Mahmud-bandar.]

1718.—"At Night we came to a Town called Porto Nova, and in Malabarish Piraqi Potei (Parangipettai).—Propagation of the Gospel, &c., Pt. ii. 41.

1726.—"The name of this city (Porto Novo) signifies in Portuguese New Haven, but the Moors call it Mohammed Bendar. . . . and the Gentooos Perrigpeemante."—Valentijn, Choromandel, 8.

PORTO PIQUENO, PORTO GRANDE, nn. pp. ‘The Little Haven and the Great Haven'; names by which the Bengal ports of Satigam (q.v.) and Chaitiam (see CHITTAGONG) respectively were commonly known to the Portuguese in the 16th century.

1554.—"Porto Pequeno de Bengala . . . Cowries are current in the country; 80 cowries make 1 pouse [see FUN]; of these pouses 48 are equal to 1 larin more or less."—A. Nunes, 37.
POTTAH, s. Hind. and other vernaculars, patta, &c. A document specifying the conditions on which lands are held; a lease or other document securing rights in land or house property.

1778.—"I am therefore hopeful you will be kindly pleased to excuse me the five lacs now demanded, and that nothing may be demanded of me beyond the amount expressed in the pottah."—The Rajah of Benares to Hastings, in Articles of Chagreement.

[1860.—"By the Zumeendar, then, or his under tenant, as the case may be, the land is farmed out to the Ryute by pottah, or agreements..."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 67.]

PEA, PHRA, PRAW, s. This is a term constantly used in Burma, familiar to all who have been in that country, in its constant application as a style of respect, addressed or applied to persons and things of especial sanctity or dignity. Thus it is addressed at Court to the King; it is the habitual designation of the Buddha and his images and dagobas; of superior ecclesiastics and sacred books; corresponding on the whole in use, pretty closely to the Skt. Śrī. In Burmese the word is written bhūra, but pronounced (in Arakan) p'hrā, and in modern Burma Proper, with the usual slurring of the r, Phyā or Pyd. The use of the term is not confined to Burma; it is used in quite a similar way in Siam, as may be seen in the quotation below from Alabaster; the word is used in the same form Phra among the Shans; and in the form Prea, it would seem, in Camboja. Thus Garnier speaks of Indra and Vishnu under their Cambojan epithets as Prea En and Prea Noreai (Nārāyana); of the figure of Buddha entering * nirvana*, as Prea Nippan; of the King who built the great temple of Angkor Wat as Prea Kot Melea, of the King reigning at the time of the expedition as Prea Ang Reachaes Vodye, of various sites of temples as Preakon, Preachan, Prea Pithu, &c. (Voyage d'Exploration, i. 26, 49, 388, 77, 85, 72).

The word p'hrā appears in composition in various names of Burmese kings, as of the famous Alomphra (1753-60), founder of the late dynasty, and of his son Bodoah-p'hrā (1781-1819). In the former instance the name is, according to Sir A. Phayre, Alaung-phrá, i.e. the embryo Buddha, or Bodisatva. A familiar Siamese example of use is in the Phrá Bát, or sacred foot-mark of Buddha, a term which represents the Śrī Pada of Ceylon.

The late Prof. H. H. Wilson, as will be seen, supposed the word to be a corruption of Skt. prabhú (see PARVOE). But Mr. Alabaster points, under the guidance of the Siamese spelling, rather to Skt. vara, ‘pre-eminent, excellent.’ This is in Pali vara, “excellent, best, precious, noble” (Childers). A curious point is that, from the prevalence of the term phrá in all the Indo-Chinese kingdoms, we must conclude that it was, at the time of the introduction of Buddhism into those countries, in predominant use among the Indian or Ceylonese propagators of the new religion. Yet we do not find any evidence of such a use of either prabhú or vara. The former would in Pali be pabbho. In a short paper in the Bijdragen of the Royal Institute of the Hague (Di. X. 4de Stuk, 1885), Prof. Kern indicates that this term was also in use in Java, in the forms Bra and pra, with the sense of ‘splendid’ and the like; and he cites as an example Bra-Wijaya (the style of several of the medieval kings of Java), where Bra is exactly the representative of Skt. Śrī.

1688.—“I know that in the country of Laos the Dignities of Pa-ya and Mewang, and the honourable Epithets of Pra are in use; it may be also that the other terms of Dignity are common to both Nations, as well as the Laws.”—De la Loubère, Siam, E.T. 79.

“The Pra-Clang, or by a corruption of the Portuguese, the Baradon, is the officer, who has the appointment of the Commerce, as well within as without the Kingdom. . . . His name is composed of the Balie word Pra, which I have so often discoursed of, and of the word Clang, which signifies Magazine.”—Ibid. 93.

“Then Sommona-Codom (see GAUTAMA) they call Pra-Boote-Tehon, which verbatim signifies the Great and Excellent Lord.”—Ibid. 124.

1795.—“At noon we reached Meesaday, the personal estate of the Magwoon of Pogus, who is oftenter called, from this place, Meesday Praw, or Lord of Meesday.”—Smyrs, Embassy to Ava, 242.

1855.—“The epithet Phra, which occupies so prominent a place in the ceremonial and religious vocabulary of the Siamese and Burmese, has been the subject of a good deal of nonsense. It is unfortunate that our Burmese scholars have never (I believe) been Sanskrit scholars, nor wise reed, so that the Pali terms used in Burma have had little elucidation. On the word in question, Professor H. H. Wilson has kindly favoured me with a note: ‘Phra is no doubt a corruption of the Sanskrit Prabhú, a Lord or Master; the h of the aspirate bh is often retained alone, leaving Prabhó which becomes Phrá or Phra.’”—Sir H. Yule, Mission to Ava, 61.

1855.—“All these readings (of documents at the Court) were intoned in a high recitative, strongly resembling that used in the English cathedral service. And the long-drawn Phya-4-4-4! (My Lord), which terminated each reading, added to the resemblance, as it came in exactly like the Amen of the Liturgy.”—Ibid. 88.

1869.—“The word Phra, which so frequently occurs in this work, here appears for the first time; I have to remark that it is probably derived from, or of common origin with, the Pharaoh of antiquity. It is given in the Siamese dictionaries as synonymous with God, ruler, priest, and teacher. It is in fact the word by which sovereignty and sanctity are associated in the popular mind.”—Borrowing, Kingdom and People of Siam, [1. 35].

1863.—“The title of the First King (of Siam) is Phra-Chom-Kiao-Yu-Hua and spoken as Phra-Phu-Thi-Chao-Yu-Hua. . . His Majesty’s nose is styled in the Pali form Phra-Naza. . . . The Siamese term the (Catholic) missionaries, the Preachers of the Phra-Chao Phu-Sang, i.e. of God the Creator, or the Divine Lord Builder. . . The Catholic missionaries express ‘God’ by Phra-Phu-Thi-Chao, and they explain the Eucharist as Phra-Phu-Thi-Kaya (Kaya—‘Body’).”—Bastian, Reise, iii. 109, and 114-115.

1870.—“The most excellent Pará, brilliant in his glory, free from all ignorance, beholding Nibbána the end of the migration of the soul, lighted the lamp of the law of the Word.”—Rogers, Buddhagosha’s Parables, tr. from the Burmese, p. 1.

1871.—“Phra is a Siamese word applied to all that is worthy of the highest respect, that is, everything connected with religion and royalty. It may be translated as ‘holy.’ The Siamese letters p-h-r commonly represent the Sanskrit v-r. I therefore presume the word to be derived from the Sanskrit ‘ṛṛ’—‘to choose, or to be chosen,’ and ‘vara—better, best, excellent,’ the root of aporos.”—Alabaster, The Wheel of the Law, 164.

PRAKRIT, s. A term applied to the older vernacular dialects of India, such as were derived from, or kindred to, Sanskrit. Dialects of this nature are used by ladies, and by inferior characters, in the Sanskrit dramas. These dialects, and the modern vernaculars springing from them, bear the same relation to Sanskrit that the "Romance" languages of Europe bear to Latin, an analogy which is found in many particulars to hold with most surprising exactness. The most completely preserved of old Prakrits is that which was used in Magadh, and which has come down in the Buddhist books of Ceylon under the name of Pali (q.v.). The first European analysis of this language bears the title
"Institutiones Linguæ Pracriticæ, Scriptis Christianis Lassen, Bonnæ ad Rhenum, 1837." The term itself is Skt. prakrita, 'natural, unrefined, vulgar,' &c.

1801.—"Samscrito is the speech of the Celestials, framed in grammatical institutes.
Pracrita is similar to it, but manifold as a provincial dialect, and otherwise."— Sanskrit Treaties, quoted by Colebrooke, in
As. Rev. vii. 199.

PRAYA, s. This is in Hung-Kong the name given to what, in most foreign settlements in China is called the Bund; i.e. the promenade or drive

North, called Villa de Praya (for Praya is as much as to say, as strand)."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 278.]

PRESIDENCY (and PRESI-DENT), s. The title 'President,' as applied to the Chief of a principal Factory, was in early popular use, though in the charters of the E.I.C., its first occurrence is in 1661 (see Letters Patent, below). In Sainsbury's Calendar we find letters headed "to Capt. Jourdain, president of the English at Bantam" in 1614 (i. 297-9); but it is to be doubted whether this wording is in the original. A little later we find a "proposal by Mr.
Middleton concerning the appointment of two especial factors, at Surat and Bantam, to have authority over all other factors; Jourdain named." And later again he is styled "John Jourdain, Captain of the house" (at Bantam; see pp. 303, 325), and "Chief Merchant at Bantam" (p. 343).

1628.—"Speaking of the Dutch Commander, as well as of the English President who often in this fashion came to take me for an airing, I should not omit to say that both of them in Surat live in great style, and like the grandees of the land. They go about with a great train, sometimes with people of their own mounted, but particularly with a great crowd of Indian servants on foot and armed, according to custom, with sword, target, bow and arrows."—P. della Valle, ii. 517.

"Our boat going ashore, the President of the English Merchants, who usually resides in Surat, and is chief of all their business in the E. Indies, Persia, and other places dependent thereon, and who is called Sign. Thomas Rastell. . . . came aboard in our said boat, with a minister of theirs (so they term those who do the priest's office among them)."—Ind. ii. 501-2; [Hak.
Soc. i. 19].

1638.—"As soon as the Commanders heard that the (English) President was come to Suhuly, they went ashore. . . .
The two days following were spent in feasting, at which the Commanders of the two Ships traded the President, who afterwards returned to Surat. . . . During my abode at Suratta, I wanted for no advertisement; for I. . . . found company at the Dutch President's, who had his Farms there . . .

* Thomas Rastell or Rastell went out apparently in 1615, in 1616 is mentioned as a chief merchant of the fleet at Swally Road," and often later as chief at Surat (see Sainsbury, i. 476, and
ii. passim).
inasmuch as I could converse with them in their own Language."—Mandela, E.T., ed. 1669, p. 19.

1638.—"Les Anglois ont bien encore vn bureau à Bantam, dans l'Isle de Java, mais il a son President particulier, qui ne depend point du de la Sautar."—Mandela, French ed. 1669, p. 124.

"A mon retour à Suratta je trouvay dans la loge des Anglois plus de cinquante marchands, que le President aout fait venir de tous les autres Bureaux, pour rendre compte de leur administration, et pour estre presens à ce changement de Gouvernement."—Ibid. 188.

1651.—"And in case any Person or Persons, being convicted and sentenced by the President and Council of the said Governor and Company, in the said East Indies, their Factors or Agents there, for any Offence by them done, shall appeal from the same, that then, and in every such case, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said President and Council, Factor or Agent, to seize upon him or them, and to carry him or them home Prisoners to England."—Letters Patent to the Governor, and Company of Merchants of London, trading with the E. Indies, 3d April.

1670.—The Court, in a letter to Fort St. George, fix the amount of tonnage to be allowed to their officers (for their private investments) on their return to Europe:

"Presidents and Agents, at Surat, Fort St. George, and Bantam . 5 tonnes.
Chiefs, at Persia, the Bay (q.v.), Mesulapam, and Macassar : Deputy at Bombay, and Seconds at Surat, Fort St. George, and Bantam . 3 tonnes."

In Notes and Etc., No. i. p. 3.

1702.—"Tuesday 7th April. . . In the morning a Councill . . . afterwards having some Discourse arising among us whether the charge of hiring Calashes, &c., upon Invitations given us from the Shabander or any others to go to their Country Houses or upon any other Occasion of diverting our Selves abroad for health, should be charged to our Honble Masters account or not, the President and Mr. Loyd were of opinion to charge the same. . . But Mr. Rouse, Mr. Ridges, and Mr. Master were of opinion that Batavia being a place of extraordinary charge and Expense in all things, the said Calash hire, &c., ought not to be charged to the Honourable Company's Account."—MS. Records in India Office.

The book containing this is a collocation of fragmentary MS. diaries. But this passage pertains apparently to the proceedings of President Allen Catchpole and his council, belonging to the Factory of Chusan, from which they were expelled by the Chinese in 1701-2; they stayed some time at Batavia on their way home. Mr. Catchpole (or Ketchpole) was soon afterwards chief of an English settlement made upon Pulo Condore, off the Cambojan coast. In 1704-5, we read that he reported favourably on the prospects of the settlement, requesting a supply of young writers, to learn the Chinese language, anticipating that the island would soon become an important station for Chinese trade. But Catchpole was himself, about the end of 1705, murdered by certain people of Macasser, who thought he had broken faith with them, and with him all the English but two (see Bruce's Annals, 483-4, 580, 606, and A. Hamilton, ii. 206 [ed. 1744]). The Pulo Condore enterprise thus came to an end.

1727.—"About the year 1674, President Aungier, a gentleman well qualified for governing, came to the Chair, and leaving Surat to the Management of Deputies, came to Bombay, and rectified many things."—A. Hamilton, i. 188.

PRICKLY-HEAT. A troublesome cutaneous rash (Lichen tropicus) in the form of small red pimplcs, which itch intolerably. It affects many Europeans in the hot weather. Fryer (pub. 1698) alludes to these "fiery pimplcs," but gives the disease no specific name. Natives sometimes suffer from it, and (in the south) use a paste of sandal-wood to alleviate it. Sir Charles Napier in Sind used to suffer much from it, and we have heard him described as standing, when giving an interview during the hot weather, with his back against the edge of an open door, for the convenience of occasional friction against it. [See RED-DOG.]

1631.—"Quas Latinus Hippocrates Cornelius Celcus papulas, Plinius sudamina vocat . . . its crebra sunt, ut ego adhuc neminem novemer qui molestias has effugerit, non magis quam morsae culicem, quos Lusitani Mosquias vocant. Sunt autem hase papulas rubentes, et asperas aliquidum, per sudorem in cutem ejetque; plurumque a capite ad caloem usque, cum summo prurito, et asiduo scalpendi desiderio erumpentes."—Jac. Bontii, Hist., Nat. &c., ii. 18, p. 33.

1665.—"The Sun is but just now rising, yet he is intolerable; there is not a Cloud in the Sky, not a breath of Wind; my horses are spent, they have not seen a green Herb since we came out of Labor: my Indians, for all their black, dry, and hard skin, sink under it. My face, hands and feet are peeled off, and my body is covered all over with pimples that prick me, as so many needles."—Bernier, E.T. 125; [ed. Constable, 389].
PRICKLY-PEAR. 732

PRICKLY-PEAR, s. The popular name, in both E. and W. Indies, of the _Opuntia Dillenii_, Haworth (Cactus Indica, Roxb.), a plant spread all over India, and to which Roxburgh gave the latter name, apparently in the belief of its being indigenous in that country. Undoubtedly, however, it came from America, wide as has been its spread over Southern Europe and Asia. On some parts of the Mediterranean shores (e.g. in Sicily) it has become so characteristic that it is hard to realize the fact that the plant had no existence there before the 16th century. Indeed at Palermo we have heard this scouted, and evidence quoted in the supposed circumstance that among the mosaics of the splendid Duomo of Monreale (12th century) the fig-leaf garments of Adam and Eve are represented as of this uncompromising material. The mosaic was examined by one of the present writers, with the impression that the belief has no good foundation. [See 8th ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 254.] The cactus fruit, yellow, purple, and red, which may be said to form an important article of diet in the Mediterranean, and which is now sometimes seen in London shops, is not, as far as we know, anywhere used in India, except in times of famine. No cactus is named in Drury's _Useful Plants of India_. And whether the Mediterranean plants form a different species, or varieties merely, as compared with the Indian _Opuntia_, is a matter for inquiry. The fruit of the Indian plant is smaller and less succulent. There is a good description of the plant and fruit in _Oviedo_, with a good cut (see Rauwolfoia's Ital. version, bk. viii. 35). That author gives an amusing story of his first making acquaintance with the fruit in S. Domingo, in the year 1615.

Some of the names by which the _Opuntia_ is known in the Punjab seem to belong properly to species of _Euphorbia_. Thus the _Euphorbia Royleana_, Bois., is called _tsiâ_, châ, &c.; and the _Opuntia_ is called _Kabuli tsiâ_. _Gangi kho_, _Kanga châ_, &c. _Gangi châ_ is also the name of an _Euphorbia_ sp. which Dr. Stewart takes to be the _E. Nerifolia_, L. (Punjab Plants, pp. 101 and 194-5). [The common name in Upper India for the prickly pear is _ndigphani_, 'snake-hood,' from its shape.] This is curious; for although certain cactuses are very like certain _Euphorbias_, there is no _Euphorbia_ resembling the _Opuntia_ in form.

The _Zakim_ mentioned in the _Ain_ (Gladwin, 1800, ii. 68.; _Jarrett_, ii. 239.; _Sidi Ali_, ed. Vamery, p. 31) as used for hedges in Guzerat, is doubtless _Euphorbia_ also. The _Opuntia_ is very common as a hedge plant in cantonments, &c., and it was much used by Tippoo as an obstruction round his fortifications. Both the _E. Royleana_ and the _Opuntia_ are used for fences in parts of the Punjab. The latter is objectionable, from harbouring dirt and reptiles; but it spreads rapidly both from birds eating the fruit, and from the facility with which the joints take root.

1685. — "The Prickly-Pear, Bush, or Shrub, of about 4 or 5 foot high ... the Fruit at first is green, like the Leaf. ... It is very pleasant in taste, cooling and refreshing; but if a Man eats 15 or 20 of them they will colour his water, making it look like Blood." — _Dampier_, i. 223 (in W. Indies).

1764. — "On this lay cuttings of the prickly pear: They soon a formidable fence will shoot." — _Grainger_, Bk. i.

1829. — "The castle of _Dumal_ ... is covered with the cactus, or prickly pear, so abundant on the east side of the Aravali." — _Tod, Annals_, Calcutta reprint, i. 326.

1861. — "The use of the prickly pear" (for hedges) "I strongly deprecate; although impenetrable and inexpensive, it conveys an idea of sterility, and is rapidly becoming a nuisance in this country." — _Clogher_, Forests and Gardens, 285.

PROME, n.p. An important place in Pegu above the Delta. The name is Talang, properly _Brun_. The Burmese call it P*de or (in the Aracanese form in which the r is pronounced) P*de and Pré-myo (‘city’).

1545.—"When he (the K. of Bruma) was arrived at the young King’s palace, he caused himself to be crowned King of From, and during the Ceremony . . . made that poor Prince, whom he had deprived of his Kingdom, to continue kneeling before him, with his hands held up. . . . This done he went into a Balcony, which looked on the most great Market-place, whither he commanded all the dead children that lay up and down the streets, to be brought, and then causing them to be hacked very small, he gave them, mingled with Bran, Rice, and Herbs, to his Elephants to eat."—Pinto, E.T. 211-212 (orig. civ.).

c. 1608.—". . . this quarrel was hardly ended when a great rumour of arms was heard from a quarter where the Portuguese were still fighting. The cause of this was the arrival of 12,000 men, whom the King of From sent in pursuit of the King of Arracan, knowing that he had fled that way. Our people hastening up had a stiff and well fought combat with them; for although they were fatigued with the fight which had been hardly ended, those of From were so disheartened at seeing the Portuguese, whose steel they had already felt, that they were fain to retire."—Bonatto, 142. This author has From (p. 152) and Porto (p. 149). [Also see under AVA.]

1755.—"Prome . . . has the ruins of an old brick wall round it, and immediately without that, another with Teak Timber."—Capt. G. Baker, in Dalrymple, i. 178.

1795.—"In the evening, my boat being ahead, I reached the city of Praya-moe, or Prume, . . . renowned in Burman history."—Simson, pp. 288-9.

Prow, Parao, &c., s. This word seems to have a double origin in European use; the Malayá, pár*ru, ‘a boat,’ and the Island word (common to Malay, Javanese, and most languages of the Archipelago) prata or prahá. This is often specifically applied to a peculiar kind of galley, ‘Malay Prow,’ but Crawford defines it as ‘a general term for any vessel, but generally for small craft.’ It is hard to distinguish between the words, as adopted in the earlier books, except by considering date and locality.

1499.—"The King despatched to them a large boat, which they call parão, well manned, on board which he sent a Naire of his with an errand to the Captains. . . ."—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 115.

1610.—(At Calicut) "Some other small ships are called Parao, and they are boats of ten paces each, and are all of a piece, and go with cars made of cane, and the mast also is made of cane."—Varthema, 154.

1510.—"The other Persian said: ‘O Sir, what shall we do?’ I replied: ‘Let us go along this shore till we find a parao, that is, a small bark.’"—Ibid. 269.

1518.—"Item: that any one possessing a zambuco (see SAMBOOK) or a parao of his own and desiring to go in it may do so with all that belongs to him, first giving notice two days before to the Captain of the City."—Livro dos Privilegios da Cidade de Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient. Fascic. v. p. 7.

1523.—"When Dom Sancho (Dom Sancho Anriques; see Correia, ii. 770) went into Muar to fight with the fleet of the King of Bintam which was inside the River, there arose a squall which upset all our paraos and lancharas at the bar mouth. . . ."—Lembrança, de Cousas de India, p. 5.

1582.—"Next day after the Capitaine Generall with all his men being a land, working upon the ship called Berrio, there came in two little Paraos."—Castañeda (tr. by N. L.), t. 62c.

1586.—"The fifth and last festival, which is called Supao Donos, is one in which the King (of Pegu) is embarked in the most beautiful parb, or boat. . . ."—O. Balbi, f. 122.

1606.—Gouvea (f. 27r) uses parb.

"An howre after this comming a board of the hollanderes came a prawe or a canow from Bantam."—Middleton’s Voyage, c. 3 (s).

1611.—"The Portuguese call their own galiots Navires (navios) and those of the Malabars, Palauas. Most of these vessels were Chetils (see GALLERY), that is to say merchantmen. Immediately on arrival the Malabars draw up their Pados or galliots on the beach."—Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 345.

1623.—"In the Morning we discern’d four ships of Malabar Rovers near the shore (they called them Paroes and they goe with Oars like our Galeots or Foirts."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 201.]

1666.—"Con secreto previno Lope de Soares veinte bateles, y gobernandolo y entrando por un rio, hallaron el peligro de cinco naves y ochenta paros con mucha gente resuelta y de valor."—Faria y Sousa, Asia, i. 66.

1673.—"They are owners of several small Provos, of the same make, and Canooses, cut out of one entire Piece of Wood."—Fryer, 20. Elsewhere (e.g. 57, 59) he has Proes.

1727.—"The Andamanaers had a yearly Custom to come to the Nicobar Islands, with a great number of small Praus, and kill or take Prisoners as many of the poor Nicobarens as they could overcome."—A. Hamilton, ii. 65 [ed. 1744].

1816.—". . . Praus, a term under which the Malays include every description of vessel."—Raffles, in As. Res. xii. 132.

1817.—"The Chinese also have many brigs . . . as well as native-built prahuas."—Raffles, Java, i. 203.
PUCKA. 734  PUCKAULY.

1788. — "Pucka — A putrid fever, generally fatal in 24 hours."

Another habitual application of pucka and cutcha distinguishes between two classes of weights and measures. The existence of twofold weight, the pucka ser and the cutcha, used to be very general in India. It was equally common in Medieval Europe. Almost every city in Italy had its libra grossa and libra sottile (e.g. see Pagolotti, 4, 34, 153, 228, &c.), and we ourselves still have them, under the names of pound avoidance and pound Troy.

1783. — "The,Maunder Pucka at Agra is double as much (as the Surat Maunder)." — Fryer, 205.

1803. — "If the rice should be sent to Corayaum, it should be in sufficient quantities to give 72 pucca seers for each load." — Wellington, Dep. (ed. 1837), ii. 43.

In the next quotation the terms apply to the temporary or permanent character of the appointments held.

1886. — "Susan. Well, Miss, I don't wonder you're so fond of him. He is such a sweet young man, though he is cutcha. Thank goodness, my young man is pucka, though he is only a subordinate Government Salt Chowkee." — Trelwylun, The Dawk Bungalow, 222.

The remaining quotations are examples of miscellaneous use:

1853. — "'Well, Jenkyns, any news?' 'Nothing pucka that I know of.' " — Oakfield, ii. 57.

1886. — "I cannot endure a swell, even though his whiskers are pukka." — Trelwylun, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxiii. 220.

The word has spread to China:

"Dis pukka sing-song makes show How smart man make mistake, galow."
Leland, Pidgin English Sing-Song, 54.

"Puckauly, s.; also Puckaul. Hind. pakhal, 'a water-carrier.' In N. India the pakhal [Skt. payas, 'water,' khalla, 'skin'] is a large water-skin (an entire ox-hide) of some 20 gallons content, of which a pair are carried by a bullock, and the pakhal is the man who fills the skins, and supplies the water thus. In the Madras Drill Regulations for 1785 (33), ten puckalies are allowed to a battalion. (See also Williamson's F. M. (1810), i. 229.)

Pucka, adj. Hind. pakal, 'ripe, mature, cooked'; and hence substantial, permanent, with many specific applications, of which examples have been given under the habitually contrasted term cutcha (q.v.). One of the most common uses in which the word has become specific is that of a building of brick and mortar, in contradistinction to one of inferior material, as of mud, matting, or timber. Thus:

[1758. — "... adjacent houses; all of them of the strongest Pecos wall, and all most proof against our Mettelon ye Bostions." Capt. Grant, Report on Siege of Calculcut, ed. by Col. Temple, Ind. Ant., 1890, p. 7.]

1784. — "The House, Cook-room, bottle-connah, godown, &c., are all pucka-built." — In Seton-Karr, i. 41.

1824. — "A little above this beautiful stream, some miserable pukkas sheds pointed out the Company's warehouses." — Heber, ed. 1844, i. 258-60.

1842. — "I observe that there are in the town (Dehli) many buildings pucka-built, as it is called in India." — Wellington to Ld. Ellenborough, in Indian Adm. of Ed. E., p. 306.

1857. — "Your Lahore men have done nobly. I should like to embrace them; Donald, Roberts, Mac, and Dick are, all of them, pukka trucks." — Lord Lawrence, in Life, ii. 11.

1869. — "... there is no surer test by which to measure the prosperity of the people than the number of pukka houses that are being built." — Report of a Sub-Committee on Proposed Indian Census.

This application has given rise to a substantive pukka, for work of brick and mortar, or for the composition used as cement and plaster.

1727. — "Fort William was built on an irregular Tetragon of Brick and Mortar, called Puckah, which is a Composition of Brick-dust, Lime, Molasses, and cut Hemp, and when it comes to be dry, it is as hard and tougher than firm Stone or Brick." — A. Hamilton, ii. 19; [ed. 1744, ii. 7].

The word was also sometimes used substantively for "pucka pice" (see CUTCHA).

1817. — "I am sure I strive, and strive, and yet last month I could only lay by eight rupees and four pukkers." — Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 66.

In (Stockdale's) Indian Vocabulary of 1788 we find another substantive use, but it was perhaps even then inaccurate.

1888. — "On December 18th I went on board a pram bound for the Aru Islands." — Wallace, Malay Archip. 227.
PUCKEROW. 735  PUGGITY, PUGGERIE.

[1588.—Referring to the preparations for the siege of Diu, "which they brought from all the wells on the island by all the bullocks they could collect with their water-skis, which they call pacaals (Pacais)."—Cowte, Decr. V. Bk. iii. ch. 2.]

1790.—"There is another very necessary establishment to the European corps, which is two pockallies to each company; these are two large leathern bags for holding water, slung upon the back of a bullock. . . ."—Munro's Narrative, 183.

1803.—"It (water) is brought by means of bullocks in leathern bags, called here pukkally bags, a certain number of which is attached to every regiment and garrison in India. Black fellows called Puckauly-boys are employed to fill the bags, and drive the bullocks to the quarters of the different Europeans."—Percival's Ceylon, 102.

1804.—"It would be an excellent arrangement to give the adjuvants of corps an allowance of 26 rupees per mess, to supply two pukkally men, and two bullocks of bullocks in leather in India."

1813.—"In cities, in the armies, and with Europeans on country excursions, the water for drinking is usually carried in large leather bags called pacaulies, formed by the entire skin of an ox."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 140; [2nd ed. i. 415].

1842.—"I lost no time in confidentially communicating with Capt. Oliver on the subject of trying some experiments as to the possibility of conveying empty 'puckalls' and 'mustacks' by sea to Suez."—Sir G. Arthur, in Blackfriars's Ind. Admin. 219.

PUCKEROW, v. This is properly the imperative of the Hind. verb pakrāṇi, 'to cause to be seized, pakrāṇi, 'cause him to be seized'; or perhaps more correctly of a compound verb pakarāṇi, 'seize and come'; or in our idiom, 'Go and seize.' But puckerow belongs essentially to the dialect of the European soldier, and in that becomes of itself a verb 'to puckerow,' i.e. to lay hold of (generally of a recalcitrant native). The conversion of the Hind. imperative into an Anglo-Indian verb infinitive, is not uncommon; compare bunow, dumberow, gubberow, lugow, &c.

1868.—"Fanny, I am cutcha no longer. Surely you will allow a lover who is pucka to puckerow!"—Trelawny, The Dark Bungle, 880.

PUDIPATAN, n.p. The name of a very old seaport of Malabar, which has now ceased to have a place in the Maps. It lay between Cannanore and Calicut, and must have been near the Waddakaré of K. Johnston's Royal Atlas. [It appears in the map in Logan's Malabar as Putuppattanam or Puthappanam.] The name is Tamil, Pudupattana, 'New City.' Compare true form of Pondicherry.

C. 545.—"The most notable places of trade are these . . . and then five marts of Malv from which pepper is exported, to wit, Parti, Mangeruth (see MANGALORE) Salopatana, Nanapatana, Pudopatana . . . ."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. (see in Cathay, &c. p. clxxviii.).

C. 1342.—"Buddattana, which is a considerable city, situated upon a great estuary. . . . The haven of this city is one of the finest; the water is good, the betel-nut is abundant, and is exported thence to India and China."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 87.

C. 1420.—"A quam ruree se diobus viginti terrestri vis contultae ad urbem portumque maritimum nomine Pudifatianem."—Conti, in Poggio, de Var. Fort.

1516.—". . . And passing those places you come to a river called Pudripatan, in which there is a good place having many Moorish merchants who possess a multitude of ships, and here begins the Kingdom of Calicut."—Barboes, in Iramusio, i. f. 311r. See also in Stanley's Barbados, and in Tohali-ul-Majahideen, by Rowlandson, pp. 71, 157, where the name (Budifatan) is misspelled Budufatan.

PUG, s. Hind. pug, Skt. padaka, 'a foot'; in Anglo-Indian use the footmarks of an animal, such as a tiger.

[1831.—". . . sanguine we were sometimes on the report of a bura pug from the shikaree."—Orient. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, ii. 178.

[1882.—"Presently the large square 'pug' of the tiger we were in search of appeared."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 90.]

PUGGITY, PUGGERIE, s. Hind. pāgri, 'a turban.' The term being often used in colloquial for a scarf of cotton or silk wound round the hat in turban-form, to protect the head from the sun, both the thing and name have of late years made their way to England, and may be seen in London shop-windows.

C. 1200.—"Prithirāja . . . wore a pagari ornamented with jewels, with a splendid toro. In his ears he wore pearls; on his neck a pearl necklace."—Chand Bardai E.T. by Beames, Ind. Ant. i. 282.

[1627—4 . . . I find it is the common mode of the Eastern People to shave the head all save a long lock which superstitiously they leave at the very top, such especially as wear Turbans, Mandils, Dusters, and Puggaree.'—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 140.

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the consanguinity they claim with Mahomet, as a Siad is akin to that Imposture, and therefore only assumes to himself a Green Vest and Puckery (or Turbat). . . ."—Fryer, 93 ; (comp. 113).

1689.—". . . with a Puggaree or Turbant upon their Heads."—Ovinglon, 314.

1671.—"They (the Negro Police in Demarama) used frequently to be turned out to parade in George Town streets, dressed in a neat uniform, with white puggories framing in their ebony faces."—Jenkins, The Coote.

PUGGY, s. Hind. puji (not in Shakespear's Dict., nor in Platts), from paj (see PUG), 'the foot.' A professional tracker; the name of a caste, or rather an occupation, whose business is to follow thieves by footmarks and the like. On the system, see Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 180 seqq.

[1524.—"There are in some of the districts of Central India (as in Guzerat) puggeres, who have small fees on the village, and whose business it is to trace theives by the print of their feet."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 19.]

1781.—"Good puggies or trackers should be employed to follow the dacoita during the day time."—Times of India, Overland Suppt., May 12, p. 7.

PUHUR, PORE, PYRE, &c., s. Hind. pahar, pahr, from Skt. prahara. 'A fourth part of the day and of the night, a watch,' or space of 8 gharis (see GUBURY).

c. 1526. —"The natives of Hindostan divide the night and day into 60 parts, each of which they denominate a gheri; they likewise divide the night into 4 parts, and the day into the same number, each of which they call a pahar or watch, which the Persians call a Pis."—Baber, 331.

[c. 1590. —"The Hindu philosophers divide the day and night into four parts, each of which they call a pahr."—Isa, ed. Jarrett, iii. 15.]

1633.—"Par." See under GUBURY.

PULICAT, n.p. A town on the Madras coast, which was long the seat of a Dutch factory. Bp. Caldwell's native friend Seshagiri Sástri gives: the proper name as pala-Velkádu, 'old Velkádu or Verkádu,' the last a place-name mentioned in the Tamil Sivávate Teviánum (see also Valentiní below). [The Madras Gloss. gives Pazhaverkádu, 'old acacia forest,' which is corroborated by Dr. Hultzsch (Epigraphia Índica, i. 398).]

1519.—"And because he had it much in charge to obtain all the lac (alacre) that he could, the Governor learning from merchants that much of it was brought to the Coast of Choromandel by the vessels of Puga and Martaban which visited that coast to procure painted cloths and other coloured goods, such as are made in Palaicato, which is on the coast of Choromandel, whence the traders with whom the Governor spoke brought it to Cochin; he, having got good information on the whole matter, sent a certain Fro lentine (sic, fro lentim) called Pero Escroco, whom he knew, and who was good at trade, to be factor on the coast of Choromandel. . . ."—Correa, ii. 567.

1538. —"The said Armenian, having already been at the city of Palaicato, which is in the Province of Choromandel and the Kingdom of Bíanaga, when on his way to Bengal, and having information of the place where the body of S. 1727.—"Pulicat is the next Place of Note to the City and Colony of Fort St. George."
PULTUN, s. Hind. pultan, a corruption of Battalion, possibly with some confusion of platoon or peloton. The S. India form is pataulam, patalam. It is the usual native word for a regiment of native infantry; it is never applied to one of Europeans.

1800.—"All I can say is that I am ready primed, and that if all matters suit I shall go off with a dreadful explosion, and shall probably destroy some campoons and pultons which have been indiscreetly pushed across the Kistna."—A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Mrs. Munro, by Arbuthnot, lix.

1780.—"Besides this boat, a gentleman is generally attended by two others; a pulwar for the accommodation of the kitchen, and a smaller boat, a punda-way" (q.v.).—Hedges, p. 39.

1782.—"To be sold, Three New Dacca Pulwars, 60 feet long, with Houses in the middle of each."—India Gazette, Aug. 31.

1824.—"The ghat offered a scene of bustle and vivacity which I by no means expected. There were so many budgerows and pulwars, that we had considerable difficulty to find a mooring place."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 151.

1860.—"The Pulwar is a smaller description of native travelling boat, of neater build, and less rusticity of character, sometimes used by a single traveller of humble means, and at others serves as cook-boat and accommodation for servants accompanying one of the large kind of boats. ..."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, p. 7, with an illustration.

PULWAUN, s. P.—H. pahlavan, [which properly means 'a native of ancient Persia' (see PAHLAVI). Mr. 3 A Skeat notes that in Malay the word becomes pahlawan, probably from a confusion with Malay dawan, 'to fight'. A champion; a professed wrestler or man of strength.

[1753.—"... the fourth, and least numerous of these bodies, were choice men of the Pehlevans. ..."—Hannay, iii. 104.]

[1813.—"When his body has by these means imbied an additional portion of vigour, he is dignified by the appellation of Puhlian."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 165.]

1828.—"I added a pahlivan or prize-fighter, a negro whose teeth were filled into saws, of a temper so ferocious as his aspect, who could throw any man of his weight to the ground, carry a jackass, devour a sheep whole, eat fire, and make a fountain of his inside, so as to act as a spout."—Hajji Baba in England, i. 15.

PUN, s. A certain number of cowries, generally 80; Hind. puna. (See under COWBEY). The Skt. pana is 'a stake played for a price, a sum', and hence both a coin (whence panam, q.v.) and a certain amount of cowries.

1554.—"Pone." (See under PORTO PIQUENO.)

1683.—"I was this day advised that Mr. Charnock putt off Mr. Ellis's Cowries at 34 pand to ye Rupee in payment of all ye Peons and Servants of the Factory, whereas 36 pandus are really bought by him for a Rupee. ..."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 122.]

1760.—"We now take into consideration the relief of the menial servants of this Settlement, respecting the exorbitant price of labor exacted from them by tailors, washermen, and barbers, which appear in near a quadruple (proportion compared with the prices paid in 1755. Agreed, that after the 1st of April they be regulated as follows:

"No tailor to demand for making:
1 Jamma, more than 3 annas.
1 pair of drawers, 7 pun of cowries.

No washerman:
1 corge of pieces, 7 pun of cowries.
No barber for shaving a single person, more than 7 gundas" (see COWBEY).—Fr. William Conans, March 27, in Long, 209.

PUNCH, s. This beverage, according to the received etymology, was named from the Pers. panj, or Hind. and Mahr. punch, both meaning 'five'; because composed of five ingredients, viz. arrack, sugar, lime-juice, spice, and water. Fryer may be considered to give something like historical evidence of its origin; but there is also something of Indian idiom in the suggestion. Thus a famous horse-medicine in Upper India is known as battla, because it is supposed to contain 32 (‘battla’) ingredients. Schiller, in his Punschblaid, sacrificing truth to trope, omits the spice and makes the ingredients only 4: "Vier Elemente Innig gesellt, Bilden das Leben,.Bauen die Welt."

The Greeks also had a "Punch." perrazhloa, as is shown in the quotation from Athenaeus. Their mixture is not sound inviting. Litré gives the etymology correctly from the Pers. panj, but the 5 elements à la française, as tea, sugar, spirit, cinnamon, and lemon-peel,—no water therefore!

Some such compound appears to have been in use at the beginning of the 17th century under the name of Larkin (q.v.). Both Dutch and French travellers in the East during that century celebrate the beverage under a variety of names which amalgamate the drink curiously with the vessel in which it was brewed. And this combination in the form of Bole-poujis was adopted as the title of a Miscellany published in 1851, by H. Meredith Parker, a Bengal civilian, of local repute for his literary and dramatic tastes. He had lost sight of the original authorities for the term, and his quotation is far astray. We give them correctly below.

C. 210.—"On the feast of the Scirrha at Athena he (Aristodemus on Pindar) says a race was run by the young men. They ran this race carrying each a vine-branch laden with grapes, such as is called secah; and they ran from the temple of Dionysus to that of Athena Sciras. And the winner receives a cup such as is called Five-fold, and of this he partakes joyously with the band of his comrades. But the cup is called perrazhloa because it contains wine and honey and cheese and flour, and a little corn."—Athenaeus, XI. xcii.

pound word transported again to England, and explained as a 'hard word.'

1771.—"Hence every one (at Madras) has it in his Power to eat well, tho' he can afford no other Liquor at Meals than Punch, which is the common Drink among Europeans, and here made in the greatest Perfection."—Lockyer, 22.

1724.—"Next to Drams, no Liquor deserves more to be stigmatised and banished from the Repasts of the Tender, Valetudinary, and Studious, than Punch."—G. Cheyne, An Essay on Health and Longevity, p. 58.

1791.—"Dès que l'Anglais eut cessé de manger, le Paris ... fit une signe à sa femme, qui appella, s. une grande calis-basse plein de punch, qu'elle avait préparé, pendant le souper, avec de l'eau, et du jus de citron, et du jus de canne de sucre. ..."—B. de St. Pierre, Chaumière Indienne, 56.

PUNCH-HOUSE. a. An Inn or Tavern; now the term is chiefly used by natives (sometimes in the hybrid form Punch-ghar, [which in Upper India is now transferred to the meeting-place of a Municipal Board]) at the Presidency towns, and applied to houses frequented by seamen. Formerly the word was in general Anglo-Indian use. [In the Straits the Malay Panches is, according to Mr. Skeat, still in use, though obolescent.]

[1661.—"... the Commandores visiting us, wee delivering him another examination of a Persee (Parsees), who kept a Punch house, where the murder was committed. ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 189.]

PUNCHAYET. s. Hind. punchayat, from punch, 'five.' A council (properly of 5 persons) assembled as a Court of Arbiters or Jury; or as a committee of the people of a village, of the members of a Caste, or what not, to decide on questions interesting the body generally.

1778.—"The Honourable William Hornby, Esq., President and Governor of His Majesty's Castle and Island of Bombay, &c.

"The humble Petition of the Managers of the Panchayet of Parsis at Bombay. ..."—Dosambhai Ramji, H. of the Parsis, 1884, ii. 219.

1810.—"The Parsees ... are governed by their own punchait or village Council.
The word panchait literally means a Council of five, but that of the Guebres in Bombay consists of thirteen of the principal merchants of the sect."—Maria Graham, 41.

1813. "The carpet of justice was spread in the large open hall of the durbar, where the arbitrators assembled: there I always attended, and agreeably to ancient custom, referred the decision to a panchayat or jury of five persons."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 359;

(2nd ed. (ii. 2) Panchant).

1819. "The panchayat itself, although in all but village causes it has the defects before ascribed to it, possesses many advantages. The intimate acquaintance of the members with the subject in dispute, and in many cases with the characters of the parties, must have made their decisions frequently correct, and . . . the judges being drawn from the body of the people, could act on no principles that were not generally understood."—Clapham, in Life, ii. 89.

1821. "I kept up panchayets because I found them . . . I still think that the panchayet should on no account be dropped, that it is an excellent institution for the administration of justice, and in keeping up the principles of justice, which are less likely to be observed among a people to whom the administration of it is not at all intrusted."—Ibid. 124.

1826. "... when he returns assemble a panchayet, and give this cause patient attention, seeing that Hyatty has justice."—Pandurang Hari, 31; [ed. 1873, i. 42].

1832. Bengal Regn. VI. of this year allows the judge of the Sessions Court to call in the alternative aid of a panchayet, in lieu of assessors, and so to dispense with the futwa. See LAW-OFFICER.

1853. "From the death of Runjeet Singh to the battle of Sobron, the Sikh Army was governed by Panchayets or Punches—committees of the soldiery. These bodies sold the Government to the Sikh chief who paid the highest, letting him command until murdered by some one who paid higher."—Sir C. Napier, Defects of Indian Government, 69.

1873. "The Council of an Indian Village Community most commonly consists of five persons . . . the panchayet familiar to all who have the smallest knowledge of India."—Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, 221.

PUNDIT. 740

In the Mahratta and Telegu countries, the word Pundit is usually pronounced Pant (in English colloquial Punt); but in this form it has, as with many other Indian words in like case, lost its original significance, and become a mere personal title, familiar in Mahratta history, e.g. the Nana Dhundopant of evil fame.

Within the last 30 or 35 years the term has acquired in India a peculiar application to the natives trained in the use of instruments, who have been employed beyond the British Indian frontier in surveying regions inaccessible to Europeans. This application originated in the fact that two of the earliest men to be so employed, the explorations by one of whom acquired great celebrity, were masters of village schools in our Himalayan provinces. And the title Pundit is popularly employed there much as Domino used to be in Scotland. The Pundit who brought so much fame on the title was the late Nain Singh, C.S.I. [See Markham, Memoir of Indian Surveys, 2nd ed. 148 seqq.]

1864. "... llamando tal bien on su compania los Fóditos, le presentaron al Nauabo."—Guerrero, Relaciones, 70.

1816. "... Bruchmanae una cum Punditas comparantes, similis quidiam inde ab orbis exercito in Indostane visum negant."—Jarrh, Observations, ii. 81-82.

Puna or sapa, i.e. 'for the marsh.' We cannot be certain of the meaning of this; but we may note that in 1548 the King, as a favour to the city of Goa, and for the commodity of its shipping and the landing of goods, &c., made a grant of the marsh inundated with sea-water (de sapal alagada do sos salgado) which extends along the river-side from the houses of Antonio Correia to the houses of Alfonso Pique, which grant is to be perpetual . . . to serve for a landing-place and quay for the merchants to Moor and repair their ships, and to erect their bankshalls (bengures), and never to be turned away for any other purpose." Possibly the fines went into a fund for the drainage of this sapal and formation of landing-places. See Archiv. Port. Orient., Fasc. 2, pp. 150-151.
1863. "A Pandit Brachman or Heathen Doctor whom I had put to serve my Agah . . . would needs make his Panegyric . . . and at last concluded seriously with this: When you put your Foot into the Stirrup, My Lord, and when you march on Horseback in the front of the Cavalry, the Earth trembleth under your Feet, the Eight Elephants that hold it up upon their Heads not being able to support it." — Bemier, E.T., 85; [ed. Constable, 264].

1785. "I can no longer bear to be at the mercy of our Pandits, who deal out Hindu law as they please; and make it at reasonable rates, when they cannot find it ready made." — Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Mem. by Ed. Teynmouth, 1807, ii. 67.

1791. "Il était au moment de s'embarquer pour l'Angleterre, plein de perplexité et d'ennui, lorsque les brames de Bénarès lui apprirent que le brame supérieur de la fameuse pagode de Jagrenat . . . était seul capable de resoudre toutes les questions de la Société royale de Londres. C'était en effet le plus fameux pandect, ou docteur, dont on eût jamais oui parler." — B. de St. Pierre, La Chauvière Indienne. The preceding exquisite passage shows that the blunder which drew forth the comment of the Greeks made 'Tādāvā (Strabo) and Bādāvā (Ptol.).

1877. "... the most learned of the Pandits or Bramin lawyers, were called up from different parts of Bengal." — Raynal, Hist. i. 42.

1856. "Besides . . . being a Pandit of learning, he (Sir David Brewster) is a bundle of talents of various kinds." — Life and Letters of Sydney Dobell, ii. 14.

1856. "Mr. Vizetelly next makes me say that the principle of imitation is found amongst the Pandects of the Benares . . . The Benares he probably supposes to be some Oriental nation. What he supposes their Pandects to be I shall not presume to guess. . . . If Mr. Vizetelly had consulted the Unitarian Report, he would have seen that I spoke of the Pandits of Benares, and he might without any very long and costly research have learned where Benares is and what a Pandit is." — Macaulay, Preface to his Speeches.

1877. "Colonel Y. — Since Nain Singh's absence from this country precludes my having the pleasure of handing to him in person, this, the Victoria or Patron's Medal, which has been awarded to him, . . . I beg to place it in your charge for transmission to the Pandit." — Address by Sir R. Atreay, Pres. R. Geol. Soc., May 28.

"Colonel Y. — in reply, said: . . . Though I do not know Nain Singh personally, I know his work. . . . He is not a topographical automaton, or merely one of a great multitude of native employés with an average qualification. His observations have added a larger amount of important knowledge to the map of Asia than those of any other living man, and his journals form an exceedingly interesting book of travels. It will afford me great pleasure to take steps for the transmission of the Medal through an official channel to the Pandit." — Reply to the President, same date.

PUNJAUB, n.p. The name of the country between the Indus and the Sutlej. The modern Anglo-Indian province so-called, now extends on one side up beyond the Indus, including Peshawar, the Derajat, &c., and on the other side up to the Jumna, including Delhi. [In 1901 the Frontier Districts were placed under separate administration.] The name is Pers. Panj-ab, 'Five Rivers.' These rivers, as reckoned, sometimes include the Indus, in which case the five are (1) Indus, (2) Jelum (see JELUM) or Behat, the ancient Vitasta which the Greeks made 'Tādāvā (Strabo) and Bādāvā (Ptol.), (3) Chenāb, ancient Chandrabhaga and Asīkī. Ptolemy preserves a corruption of the former Sanskrit name in Zabdābā, but it was rejected by the older Greeks because it was of ill omen, i.e. probably because Grecized it would be Zadropothes, 'the devourer of Alexander.' The alternative Asīkī they rendered 'Asōvīs. (4) Ravi, the ancient Airdavāti, 'Tādāvā (Strabo), Tādāvā (Arrian), 'Abār or Ptol. (5) Biās, ancient Vipāḍa, Tādāvā (Arrian), Bādāvā (Ptol.). This excluded the Sutlej, Satadhur, Henydus of Pliny, Zabdābā or Zabādāvā (Ptol.), as Timur excludes it below. We may take in the Sutlej and exclude the Indus, but we can hardly exclude the Chenāb as Wassāf does below.

No corresponding term is used by the Greek geographers. "Putandum est nomen Panchanadae Graecos aut omnino latiusse, aut casu quodam non ad nos traque tempora pervenie, quod in tanta monumentorum ruina facile accidere potuit" (Lassen, Pentapotamia, 3). Lassen however has termed the country Pentapotamia in a learned Latin dissertation on its ancient geography. Though the actual word Panjāb is Persian, and dates from Mahomedan times, the corresponding Skt. Panchanada is ancient and genuine, occurring in the Mahābhārata and Rāmāyana. The name Panj-ab in older Mahomedan writers is applied to the Indus river, after receiving the rivers of the country which we call Punjaub. In that sense Punj-nad, of equivalent meaning, is still occasionally used. [In S. India the term is sometimes applied to the country watered by the Tumbhadra, Wardha, Malprabha, Ghatprabha and Kistna (Wilks, Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 405.).]

We remember in the newspapers, after the second Sikh war, the report of a speech by a clergyman in England, who spoke of the deposition of "the bloody Punjaub of Lahore."

c. 1020.—"They all (Sind, Jháilâm, Irâwa, Biah) combine with the Satlâder (Sutlej) below Mûltân, at a place called Pannjnad, or 'the junction of the five rivers.' They form a very wide stream."—Al-Birûnî, in Elliot, i. 48.

c. 1300.—"After crossing the Pannj-âb, or five rivers, namely Sind, Jelâm, the river of Lohâwar (i.e., of Lahore, viz. the Râvi), Satlâd, and Bâyah. . . ."—Wazîrî, in Elliot, iii. 36.

c. 1333.—"By the grace of God our caravan arrived safe and sound at Banj-âb, i.e., at the River of the Sind. Banj (panj) signifies "five," and âb, "water;" so that the name signifies "the Five Waters." They flow into this great river, and water the country."—Ibn Batûtâ, iii. 91.

c. 1400.—"All these (united) rivers (Jelâm, Chenâb, Rávî, Bâyâh, Sind) are called the Sind or Pannj-âb, and this river falls into the Persian Gulf near Thatta."—The Emp. Timur, in Elliot, iii. 476.

1790.—"Investigations of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Hindoos, written in the Carnatic, and in the Punjaub, would in many cases widely differ."—Forster, Preface to Journeym.

1793.—"The Province, of which Lahore is the capital, is often named Punjaub than Lahore."—Rennell's Memoir, 3rd ed. 82.

1804.—"I rather think . . . that he (Holkar) will go off to the Punjaub. And what gives me stronger reason to think so is, that on the seal of his letter to me he calls himself 'the Sule of Shaikh Mahmud, the King of Kings.' Shah Mahmud is the brother of Zemun Shah. He seized the musnad and government of Caubul, after having defeated Zemun Shah two or three years ago, and put out his eyes."—Wellington, Desp. under March 17.

1815.—"He (Subptides) . . . overran the fine province of the Punjaub, in his first expedition."—Malcolm, Hist. of Persia, i. 316.

PUNKAH, s. Hind. pânkha.

a. In its original sense a portable fan, generally made from the leaf of the palmrya (Borassus flabelliformis, or 'fan-shaped'), the natural type and origin of the fan. Such pûnkhas in India are not however formed, as Chinese fans are, like those of our ladies; they are generally, whether large or small, of a bean-shape, with a part of the dried leaf-stalk adhering, which forms the handle.

b. But the specific application in Anglo-Indian colloquial is to the large fixed and swinging fan, formed of cloth stretched on a rectangular frame, and suspended from the ceiling, which is used to agitate the air in hot weather. The date of the introduction of this machine into India is not known to us. The quotation from Linschoten shows that some such apparatus was known in the 16th century, though this comes out clearly in the French version alone; the original Dutch, and the old English translation are here unintelligible, and indicate that Linschoten (who apparently never was at Ormuz) was describing, from hearsay, something that he did not understand. More remarkable passages are those which we take from Dozy, and from El-Fakhri, which show that the true Anglo-Indian pûnka was known to the Arabs as early as the 8th century.

1710.—"Aloft in a Gallery the King sits in his chair of State, accompanied with his PUNKAH.

Children and chief Vizier... no other without calling daring to go up to him.
same only two Punks to gather wind."—
W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 439. The word seems here to be used improperly for the men who plied the fans. We find also in the same writer a verb to fankaw:

"... behind one punkawing, another holding his sword."—Ibid. 439.

Terry does not use the word:

1616.—"... the people of better quality, lying or sitting on their Carpets or Pallats, have servants standing about them, who continuously beat the air upon them with Fliabella's, or Fans, of stiffened leather, which keeps off the flies from annoying them, and cool them as they lye."—Ed. 1665,

p. 405.

1663.—"On such occasions they desire nothing but... to lie down in some cool and shady place all along, having a servant or two to fan one by turns, with their great Punks, or Fans."—Bernier, E.T., p. 76;
[ed. Constable, 241].

1757.—"Over her head was held a pun-kaw."—Sir C. Malet, in Parl. Papers, 1821, "Hindoo Widows."

1809.—"He... presented me... two punkaws."—Lord Valentina, i. 428.

1881.—"The chair of state, the silla gestatoria, in which the Pope is borne aloft, is the ancient palanquin of the Roman nobles, and, of course, of the Roman Prince—the fans which go behind are the punkaws of the Eastern Emperors, borrowed from the Court of Persia."—Dean Stanley, Christian Institutions, 207.

c. 1150-60.—"Sous le nom de Khaich on entend des étoffes de mauvais toile de lin qui servent à différentes usages. Dans ce passage de Rhazes (c. A.D. 900) on est des ventilateurs faits de cet étoffe. Ceci se pratique de cette manière : on en prend un morceau de la grandeur d'un tapis, un peu plus grand ou un peu plus petit selon les dimensions de la chambre, et on le rembourre avec des objets qui ont de la consistance et qui ne plient pas facilement, par exemple du sparre. L'ayant ensuite suspendu au milieu de la chambre, on le fait tirer et lacher doucement et continuellement par un homme placé dans le haut de l'appartement.
De cette manière il fait beaucoup de vent et refraîchit l'air. Quand on le trempa dans de l'eau de rose, et alors il parfume l'air en même temps qu'il le refraîchit."— Glossaire sur le Mançouri, quoted in Dozy et Engelmann, p. 342. See also Dozy, Suppt.
aux Dict. Arabes, s.v. Khaich.

1168.—"He (Ibn Hamdun the Kâtîb) once recited to me the following piece of his composition, containing an enigmatical description of a linen fan: (1)

(1) Fast and loose, it cannot touch what it tries to reach; though tied up it moves swiftly, and though a prisoner it is free.
Fixed in its place it drives before it the gentle breeze; though its path lie closed up it moves on in its nocturnal journey."— Quoted by Ibn Khallikan, E.T. iii. 91.

(1) The linen fan (Mirwaha-t al Khaich) is a large piece of linen, stretched on a frame, and suspended from the ceiling of the room. They make use of it in Irak.
See de Sacy's Hariri, p. 474. —Note by MacCrudvin de Slane, ibid. p. 92.

1800.—"One of the innovations of the Caliph Mansur (A.D. 754-774) was the Khaich of linen in summer, a thing which was not known before his time. But the Sassanian Kings used in summer to have an apartment freshly plastered (with clay) every day, which they inhabited, and on the morrow another apartment was plastered for them."— El-Fahri, ed. Akhawati, p. 188.

1596.—"And they use certaine instruments like Waggins, with bellowes, to bear all the people in, and to gather winde to coole themselves withall, which they call cattaventos."—Old English Translation, by W. P., p. 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 52].

The French version is really a brief description of the punkah:

1610.—"Il ont aussi du Cattaventos qui sont certains instruments pendus en l'air es quels se faisant donner le brannle ils font du vent qui les refraîchit."—Ed. 1685, p. 17.

The next also perhaps refers to a suspended punkah:

1682.—"... furnished also with good Cellars with great Flaps to stir the Air, for reposing in the fresh Air from 12 till 4 or 5 of the Clock, when the Air of these Cellars begins to be hot and stuffy."—Bernier,
p. 79; [ed. Constable, 247].

1807.—"As one small concern succeeds another, the punkah vibrates gently over my eyes."—Lord Minto in India, 27.

1810.—"Were it not for the punkah
(a large frame of wood covered with cloth) which is suspended over every table, and kept swinging, in order to freshen the air, it would be scarcely possible to sit out the melnancholy ceremony of an Indian dinner."— Maria Graham, 30.

Williamson mentions that punkahs
"were suspended in most dining halls."—
Vade Mecum, i. 281.

1823.—"Punks, large frames of light wood covered with white cotton, and looking not unlike enormous fire-boards, hung from the ceilings of the principal apartments."— Heber, ed. 1844, i. 28.

1852.—

"Holy stones with scuffs and slaps
(Our Christmas waits !) prelude the day;
For holy and festival occasions Swing fickle punkahs,—or perhaps A windsail dangles in collapse."

Christmas on board a P. and O., near the Equator.
1875.—"The punkah flapped to and fro lazily overhead."—Chesney, The Dilemma, ch. xxxviii.

Mr. Busteed observes: "It is curious that in none of the lists of servants and their duties which are scattered through the old records in the last century (18th), is there any mention of the punkah, nor in any narratives referring to domestic life in India then, that have come under our notice, do we remember any allusion to its use. ... The swinging punkah, as we see it to-day, was, as every one knows, an innovation of a later period. ... This dates from an early year in the present century."—Echoes of Old Calcutta, p. 115. He does not seem, however, to have found any positive evidence of the date of its introduction. ["Hanging punkahs are said by one authority to have originated in Calcutta by accident towards the close of the last (18th) century. It is reported that a clerk in a Government office suspended the leaf of a table, which was accidentally waved to and fro by a visitor. A breath of cool air followed; we incidentally waved to and fro by the famous Faldia, 1. 100."

PUNSAREE, s. A native drug-seller; Hind. pansari. We place the word here partly because C. P. Brown says "it is certainly a foreign word," and assigns it to a corruption of dispensarium; which is much to be doubted. [The word is really derived from Skt. panyāśāla, 'a market, warehouse."

1830.—"Beside this, I purchased from a pansarea some application for relieving the pain of a bruise."—Fraser, The Persian Adventurer, iii. 23.

PURDAH, s. Hind. from Pers. purdā, 'a curtain'; a portière; and especially a curtain screening women from the sight of men; whence a woman of position who observes such rules of seclusion is termed purdana-nshiin, 'one who sits behind a curtain.' (See GOSHA.)

1809.—"On the fourth (side) a purdah was stretched across."—Id. Valenica, i. 100.

1810.—"If the disorder be obstinate, the doctor is permitted to approach the purdah (i.e. curtain, or screen) and to put the hand through a small aperture ... in order to feel the patient's pulse."—Williamson, V. M. i. 150.

[1813.—"My travelling palankeen formed my bed, its purdah or chintz covering my curtains."—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed. ii. 108.]

1878.—"Native ladies look upon the confinement behind the purdah as a badge of rank, and also as a sign of chastity, and are exceedingly proud of it."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 113.

1900.—"Charitable aid is needed for the purdah women."—Pioneer Mail, Jan. 21.

PUREDSEE, s. Hind. pardaesi, 'one from a foreign country.' In the Bombay army the term is universally applied to a sepoy from N. India. [In the N.W.P. the name is applied to a wandering tribe of swindlers and coiners.]

PURWANNA, PERWAUNA, s. Hind. from Pers. parwana, 'an order; a grant or letter under royal seal; a letter of authority from an official to his subordinate; a license or pass.'

1682.—"... we being obliged at the end of two months to pay Custom for the said goods, if in that time we did not procure a Perwanna for the Dye of Decas to excuse us from it."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 34.]

1878.—"... Egmore and Pursewaukum were lately granted us by the Nabob's purwanas."—Wheeler, i. 251.

1759.—"Perwanna, under the Coochuck (or the small seal) of the Nabob Vizier Ulno Malek, Nisam ul Muluck Behadour, to Mr. John Spencer."—In Cambridge's Act. of the War, 230. [See also quotation under HOSBOLHOOKUM.]

1774.—"As the peace has been so lately concluded, it would be a satisfaction to the Rajah to receive your purwanna to this purpose before the departure of the caravan."—Bogle's Diary, in Markham's Tibet, p. 50. But Mr. Markham changes the spelling of his originals.

PUTCHOCK, s. This is the trade-name for a fragrant root, a product of the Himalayas in the vicinity of Kashmir, and forming an article of export from both Bombay and Calcutta to the Malay countries and to China, where it is used as a chief ingredient of the Chinese pastille-rods commonly called jostick. This root was recognised by the famous Garcia de Orta as 1525.—"Pucho of Cambaya worth 35 tanga's a maund."—Lembranças, 50.

[1527.—Mr. Whitaway notes that in a letter of Diogo Calvo to the King, dated Jan. 17, pucho is mentioned as one of the imports to China.—India Office MS. Corpo Chronologico, vol. i.]

1554.—"The baar (see BAHAR) of pucho contains 20 faraçolas (see FRAZAILA), and an additional 4 of picota (q.v.), in all 24 faraçolas..."—A. Nunes, 11.

1563.—"I say that costus in Arabic is called cost or catt; in Guzarat it is called uplot (upalota); and in Malay, for that region there is a great trade and consumption thereof, it is called pucho. I tell you the name in Arabic, because it is called by the same name by the Latins and Greeks, and I tell you in Guzerati, because that is the land to which it is chiefly carried from its birth-place; and I tell you the Malay name because the greatest quantity is consumed there, or taken thence to China."—Garcia, f. 72.

PUTTÁN, PÂTHÁN, n.p. Hind. Pathán. A name commonly applied to Afghans, and especially to people in India of Afghan descent. The derivation is obscure. Elphinstone derives it from Pushtíin and Pukhtíin, pl. Pukhtána, the name the Afghans give to their own race, with which Dr. Trumpp (and Dr. Belieu (Races of Afghanistan, 25) agree. This again has been connected with the Porcípcia of Herodotus (iii. 102, iv. 44). The Afghans have for the same name the usual fantastic etymologies which is quoted below (see quotation, c. 1611). The Mahommedans in India are sometimes divided into four classes, viz. Pathána; Moghuls (see MOGUL), i.e. those of Turki origin; Shaikhe, claiming Arab descent; and Saiyínds, claiming also to be descendants of Mahommed.

1553.—"This State belonged to a people called Patána, who were lords of that hill-country. And as those who dwell on the skirts of the Pyrenees, on this side and on that, are masters of the passes by which we cross from Spain to France, or vice versa, so these Patán people are the masters of the two entrances to India, by which those who go thither from the landward must pass. . ."—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

1563.—". . . This first King was a Patána of certain mountains that march with Bengal."—Garcia, Coll. I. 34.

1572.—"Mas agora de nomes, et de usança, Novos, et varios são os habitantes, Os Delíjs, os Patáns que em possessa De terra, e gente são mais abundantes."—Camões, vii. 20.

[B. Aubertin):

"But now inhabitants of other name And customs new and various there are found, The Delhis and Patáns, who in the same Of land and people do the most abound."]

c. 1611.—". . . the mightiest of the Afghan people was Kais. . . . The Prophet gave Kais the name of Abd Ulrasheed . . . and . . . predicted that God would make his issue so numerous that they, with respect to the establishment of the Faith, would outrace all other people; the angel Gabriel having revealed to him that their attachment to the Faith would, in strength, be like the wood upon which they lay the keel when constructing a ship, which wood the seamen call Pathán: on this account he conferred upon Abd Ulrasheed the title of Pathan* also."—Hist. of the Afghans, E.T., by Dorn, p. 88.

[1688.—"... Osmanceh a Puttonian... "—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 76.]

1648.—"In general the Moors are a haughty and arrogant and proud people, and among them the Pattans stand out superior to the others in dress and manners." —Van Tiets, 58.

1668.—"Martin Affonso and the other Portuguese delivered them from the war that the Patans were making on them."—Paria y sus Fosas, Asia Portuguesa, i. 443.

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the Consanguinity they claim with Mahomet; as a Sial is a kin to that Imposture... A Skeik is a Cousin too, at a distance, into which Relation they admit all new made Proselytes. Meer is somewhat allied also... The rest are adopted under the Name of the Province... as Mogul, the Race of the Tartars... Patan, Duccac."—Fryer, 93.

1726.—"The Patans (Patandars) are very different in garb, and surpass in valour and stout-heartedness in war."—Valentijn, Charo, 109.

1757.—"The Colonel (Clive) complained bitterly of so many insults put upon him, and reminded the Soubahdar how different his own conduct was, when called upon to assist him against the Puttons."—Ices, 149.

1763.—"The northern nations of India, although idolaters... were easily induced to embrace Mahomedanism, and are at this day the Afghans or Patans."—Orme, i. 24, ed. 1803.

1789.—"Moormen are, for the most part, soldiers by profession, particularly in the cavalry, as are also... Patans."—Munro, Narr. 49.

1798.—"... Afghans, or as they are called in India, Patans."—G. Forster, Travels, ii. 47.

[PUTTEE, PUTTY, s. Hind. pati.

a. A piece or strip of cloth, bandage; especially used in the sense of a ligature round the lower part of the leg used in lieu of a gaiter, originally introduced from the Himâlaya, and now commonly used by sportsmen and soldiers. A special kind of cloth appears in the old trade-lists under the name of putehns (see PIECE GOODS).

* We do not know what word is intended, unless it be a special use of Ar. batan, 'the interior or middle of a thing.' Dorn refers to a note, which does not exist in his book. Bellows gives the title conferred by the Prophet as "Plata or Pota, a term which in the Syrian language signifies a rudder." Somebody else interprets it as 'a mast.'

1875.—"Any one who may be bound for a long march will put on leggings of a peculiar sort, a bandage about 6 inches wide and four yards long, wound round from the ankle up to just below the knee, and then fastened by an equally long string, attached to the upper end, which is tightly wound many times round the calf of the leg. This, which is called patawa, is a much cherished piece of dress."—Drew, Jummo, 175.

1900.—"The Puttee leggings are excellent for peace and war, on foot or on horseback."—Times, Dec. 24.

b. In the N.W.P. "an original share in a joint or coparcenary village or estate comprising many villages; it is sometimes defined as the smaller subdivision of a mahal or estate." (Wilson). Hence Putteedaree, pattidari used for a tenure of this kind.

1852.—"Their names were forthwith scratched off the collector's books, and those of their eldest sons were entered, who became forthwith, in village and cutcherry parlance, lumbardars of the shares of their fathers, or in other words, of putee Shere Singh and puttee Baz Singh."—Ruikrs, Notes on the N. W. P. 94.

c. In S. India, soldiers' pay.

1810.—"... hence in ordinary acceptance, the pay itself was called putee, a Canarese word which properly signifies a written statement of any kind."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 415.]

PUTTYWALLA, s. Hind. patti-walid, pati-walid (see PUTTEE), 'one with a belt.' This is the usual Bombay term for a messenger or orderly attached to an office, and bearing a belt and brass badge, called in Bengal chuprassy or peon (qq.v.), in Madras usually by the latter name.

1878.—"Here and there a Belted Government servant, called a Puttiwalla, or Patta- walla, because distinguished by a belt... "—Monier Williams, Modern India, 34.

PUTWA, s. Hind. patwa. The Hibiscus sabdariffa, L., from the succulent acid flowers of which very fair jelly is made in Anglo-Indian households. [It is also known as the Roselle or Red Sorrel (Watt, Eron. Dict. iv. 243). Riddell (Domest. Econ. 337) calls it "Oseille or Roselle jam and jelly."]

PYE, s. A familiar designation among British soldiers and young officers for a Pariah-dog (q.v.);
PYJAMMAS. — 748

PYKE, PAIK.

PYJAMMAS. — a. Hind. pāṭā-jāmā (see JAMMA), lit. 'leg-clothing.' A pair of loose drawers or trousers, tied round the waist. Such a garment is used by various persons in India, e.g. by women of various classes, by Sikhs, and by most Mahommadians of both sexes. It was adopted from the Mahommadians by Europeans as an article of dishabille and of night attire, and is synonymous with Long Drawers, Shulwàurs, and Mogul breeches. [For some distinctions between these various articles of dress see Forbes-Watson, (Textile Manufactures, 57).] It is probable that we English took the habit like a good many others from the Portuguese. Thus Pyrard (c. 1610) says, in speaking of Goa Hospital: " Ils ont force colsons sans quoy ne couchen jamais les Portugais des Indes" (ii. p. 11; [Hak. Soc. ii. 9]). The word is now used in London shops. A friend furnishes the following reminiscence: "The late Mr. B——, tailor in Jermyn Street, some 40 years ago, in reply to a question why pyjamas had first sewn on to them (as was sometimes the case with those furnished by London outfitters) answered: 'I believe, Sir, it is because of the White Ants!'

[1828.— "His chief joy smoking a cigar In loose Face-jams and native slippers." Oriental. Mag., reprint 1873, i. 84.]

1881.—"The rest of our attire consisted of that particularly light and airy white flannel garment, known throughout India as a pajama suit."—Hooker, Ceylon, 329.

PYKE, PAIK. — a. Wilson gives only one original of the term so expressed in Anglo-Indian speech. He writes: "Pāṭik or Pāyik, corruptly Pyke, Hind. &c. (from S. padāṭika), Pāṭik or Pāyik, Mar. A footman, an armed attendant, an inferior police and revenue officer, a messenger, a courier, a village watchman: in Cuttack the Pāṭiks formerly constituted a local militia, holding land of the Zamindārs or Rājas by the tenure of military service," &c., quoting Bengal Regulations. [Platta also treats the two words as identical.] But it seems clear to us that there are here two terms rolled together:

a. Pers. Paik, 'a foot-runner or courier.' We do not know whether this is an old Persian word or a Mongol introduction. According to Hammer Furgstall it was the term in use at the Court of the Mongol princes, as quoted below. Both the words occur in the Ain, but differently spelt, and that with which we now deal is spelt paik (with the fatha point).

b. Hind pāṭik and pāyik (also Mahr.) from Skt. padāṭika, and padāṭ, 'a foot-soldier,' with the other specific application given by Wilson, exclusive of 'courier.' In some narratives the word seems to answer exactly to peon.
PYKE, PAIK. 749

QUAMOCILIT.

In the first quotation, which is from the Ain, the word, it will be seen, is different from that quoted under (a) from the same source.

1590.—"It was the custom in those times, for the palace (of the King of Bengal) to be guarded by several thousand pykes (payak), who are a kind of infantry. An eunuch entered into a confederacy with these guards, who one night killed the King, Futteh Shah, when the Eunuch ascended the throne, under the title of Barbuck Shah."—Gladswin's Tr., ed. 1800, ii. 19 (orig. i. 415; [Jarrett (ii. 149) gives the word as Payikas].

In the next quotation the word seems to be the same, though used for 'a seaman.' Compare uses of Lascar.

1615.—"(His fleet) consisted of 20 beaked vessels, all well manned with the sailors whom they call paiques, as well as with Portuguese soldiers and topases who were excellent musketeers; 50 hired jaffas (see GALLEVAT) of like sort and his own (Sebastian Gonçalves's) galliot (see GALLEVAT), which was about the size of a patacho, with 14 demi-falcons on each broadside, two pieces of 18 to 20 lbs. calibre in the forecastle, and 60 Portuguese soldiers, with more than 40 topases and Cafres (see CAFFEE)."—Borruto, Decada, 452.

1792.—Among a detail of charges at this period in the Zemindarry of Rajahahil appears:

The following quotation from an Indian Regulation of Ld. Cornwallis's time is a good example of the extraordinary multiplication of terms, even in one Province in India, denoting approximately the same thing:

1792.—"All Pykes, Chokeydars (see CHOKIDAR), Paikans, Dusanda, Nigabans, Harrees (see HARBY), and other descriptions of village watchmen are declared subject to the orders of the Daroga (see DARGA) . . .—Regla. for the Police . . . passed by the G.-G. in C., Dec. 7.

"The army of Assam was a militia organised as follows. The whole male population was bound to serve either as soldiers or labourers, and was accordingly divided into sets of four men each, called goles, the individuals comprising the goles being termed pykes."—Johnson's Acc. of Welth's Expedition to Assam, 1792-93-94 (comm. by Gen. Keatinge).

1802.—After a detail of persons of rank in Midnapore:

"None of these entertain armed followers except perhaps ten or a dozen Poons for state, but some of them have Pykes in considerable numbers, to keep the peace on their estates. These Pykes are under the magistrate's orders."—Pyke Report, App. p. 355.

1812.—"The whole of this last-mentioned numerous class of Pykes are understood to have been disbanded, in compliance with the new Police regulations."—Fifth Report, 71.

1834.—"This climber, the most beautiful and luxuriant imaginable, bears also the name of Kamalita, 'Love's Creeper.' Some PYSE! interjection. The use of this is illustrated in the quotations. Notwithstanding the writer's remark (below) it is really Hindustani, viz. pois, 'look out!' or 'make way!' apparently from Skt. paśya, 'look! see!' (see Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. p. 529, col. c; Fallon's Hind. Dict., p. 376, col. a; [Platte, 282b].

[1815.—". . . three men came running up behind them, as if they were clearing the road for some one, by calling out 'pise! pise!' (make way, make way) . . ."—Elphinstone's Report on Murder of Gunadhur Shasny, in Papers relating to E.I. Affairs, p. 14.]

[Other expressions of the same kind are Malayal. po, 'Get out of the way!' and Hind. Mahr. khis, khis, from khis-nd, 'to drop off.'

1598.—"As these hayros goe in the streetes, they cri po, po, which is to say, take heed."—Linckoten, Hak. Soc. i. 280.

1826.—"I was awoke from disturbed rest by cries of kis! kis! (clear the way)."—Pandumurung Hari, ed. 1873, i. 46.

[QUAMOCILIT. s. The Ipomaeas quamoclitlitis, the name given by Linnaeus to the Red Jasmine. The word is a corruption of Skt. Kâma-lalld, 'the creeper of Kâma, god of love.'

1834.—"This climber, the most beautiful and luxuriant imaginable, bears also the name of Kamalita, 'Love's Creeper.' Some have flowers of snowy hue, with a delicate fragrance. ... "— Wunderings of a Pilgrim, i. 310-11.

QUEDDA, n.p. A city, port, and small kingdom on the west coast of the Malay Peninsula, tributary to Siam. The name according to Crawford is Malay kaďah, 'an elephant-trap' (see KEŠDAH). [Mr. Skeat writes: "I do not know what Crawford's authority may be, but kaďah does not appear in Klinkert's Dict. ... In any case the form taken by the name of the country is Kâla. The coralling of elephants is probably a Siamese custom, the method adopted on the E. coast, where the Malays are left to themselves, being to place a decoy female elephant near a powerful noose."] It has been supposed sometimes that Kâla is the Kâlî or Kâlit of Ptolomy's sea-route to China, and likewise the Kâla of the early Arab voyagers, as in the Fourth Voyage of Sinbad the Seaman (see Proc. R. Geog. Soc. 1882, p. 655; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 386). It is possible that these old names however represent Kâlîa, 'a river mouth,' a denomination of many small ports in Malay regions. Thus the port that we call Quedda is called by the Malays Kowlâ Butran.

1516.—"Having left this town of Tanassary, further along the coast towards Malacca, there is another seaport of the Kingdom of Arsam, which is called Queda, in which also there is much shipping, and great interchange of merchandise."—Barros, 188-189.

1553.—" ... The settlements from Tavay to Malaca are these: Tanassary, a notable city, Lungur, Torrão, Queda, producing the best pepper on all that coast, Pedão, Perá, Solungor, and our City of Malaca. ..."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1572.—"Ohla Tavai cidade, onde começa De Sião largo o imperio tão comprido: Tanassari, Quedá, que ha só começa Das que pimenta alli tem produzido." (Cândes, x. 123.)

QUILOA, n.p. t.e. Kilwa, in lat. 9° 0' S., next in remoteness to Sofala, which for a long time was the ne plus ultra of Arab navigation on the East Coast of Africa, as Capt. Boyados was that of Portuguese navigation on the West Coast. Kilwa does not occur in the Geographies of Edrisi or Abulfeda, though Sofala is in both. It is mentioned in the Rotérito, and in Barros's account of Da Gama's voyage. Barros had access to a native chronicle of Quiloa, and says it was founded about A.H. 400, and a little more than 70 years after Magadho and Brava, by a Persian Prince from Shiraz.

1553. — “The Moor, in addition to his natural hatred, bore this increased resentment on account of the chastisement inflicted on him, and determined to bring the ships into port at the city of Quilna, that being a populous place, where they might get the better of our ships by force of arms. To wreak this mischief with greater safety to himself he told Vasco da Gama, as if wishing to gratify him, that in front of them was a city called Quilna, half peopled by Christians of Abyssinia and of India, and that if he gave the order the ships should be steered thither.” — Barros, l. iv. 5.

1572. — “Esta ilha pequena, que habitamos, he em toda esta terra certa escala De todos os que as ondas navegamos De Quilna, de Mombaça, a de Sofala.” — Cambes, i. 54.

By Burton:

QUILON, n.p. A form which we have adopted from the Portuguese for the name of a town now belonging to Travancore; once a very famous and much frequented port of Malabar, and known to the Arabs as Kaulam. The proper name is Tamil, Kollam, of doubtful sense in this use. Bishop Caldwell thinks it may be best explained as ‘Palace’ or ‘royal residence,’ from Kolu, ‘the royal Presence,’ or Hall of Audience. [Mr. Logan says: “Kollam is only an abbreviated form of Koyillagam or Kovillagam, ‘King’s house’” (Malabar, i. 231, note).] For ages Kaulam was known as one of the greatest ports of Indian trade with Western Asia, especially trade in pepper and brazil-wood. It was possibly the Male of Coenas in the 6th century (see MALABAR), but the first mention of it by the present name is about three centuries later, in the Relation translated by Reinaud. The ‘Kollam era’ in general use in Malabar dates from A.D. 824; but it does not follow that the city had no earlier existence. In a Syriac extract (which is, however, modern) in Land's Anecdota Syriaca (Latin, i. 125; Syriac, p. 27) it is stated that three Syrian missionaries came to Kaulam in A.D. 823, and got leave from King Shakirkbirti to build a church and city at Kauil. It would seem that there is some connection between the date assigned to this event, and the ‘Kollam era’; but what it is we cannot say. Shakirkbirti is evidently a form of Chakravarti Bhaja (see under CHUCKER-BUTTY). Quilon, as we now call it, is now the 3rd town of Travancore, pop. (in 1891) 23,380; there is little trade. It had a European garrison up to 1830, but now only one Sepoy regiment.

In ecclesiastical narratives of the Middle Ages the name occurs in the form Columbun, and by this name it was constituted a See of the Roman Church in 1328, suffragan of the Archbishop of Sultaniya in Persia; but it is doubtful if it ever had more than one bishop, viz. Jordanus of Severac, author of the Mirabilia often quoted in this volume. Indeed we have no knowledge that he ever took up his bishopric, as his book was written, and his nomination occurred, both during a visit to Europe. The Latin Church however which he had founded, or obtained the use of, existed 20 years later, as we know from John de' Marignolli, so it is probable that he had reached his See. The form Columbun is accounted for by an inscription (see Ind. Antiq. ii. 360) which shows that the city was called Kolamba, [other forms being Kolambapattana, or Kalamampattanal (Bombay Gazetteer, vol. i. pt. i. 183)]. The form Palum-bus also occurs in most of the MSS. of Friar Odoric's Journey; this is the more difficult to account for, unless it was a mere play (or a trick of memory) on the kindred meanings of colomba.
851.—"De ce lieu (Mascate) les navires mettent la voile pour l'Inde, et se dirigent vers Koulam-Malay; la distance entre Mascate et Koulam-Malay est d'un mois de marche, avec un vent modéré."—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 15.

1196.—"Seven days from thence is Chu-lam, on the confines of the country of the sun-worshippers, who are descendants of Kush... and are all black. This nation is very trustworthy in matters of trade. Pepper grows in this country... Cinnamon, ginger, and many other kinds of spices also grow in this country."—Benjamin of Tudibia, in Early Travels in Palestine, 114-115.

c. 1280-90.—"Royaumes de Ma-pa-rrh. Parmi tous les royaumes étrangers d'au-delà des mers, il n'y eut que Ma-pa-rrh et Ki-lan (Maabar and Quilon) sur lesquels on ait pu parvenir à établir une certaine sujétion; mais surtout Ki-lan. ... Ki-lan a envoyé un ambassadeur à la cour (mongole) pour présenter en tribut des marchandises précieuses et un singe noir."—Chinese Annals, quoted by Pauthier, Marc Pol, ii. 603, 643.

1298.—"When you quit Maabar and go 500 miles towards the S.W. you come to the Kingdom of Colomn. The people are idolators, but there are also some Christians and some Jews," &c.—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 22.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Kankan and Tana; beyond them the country of Malibär, which from the boundary of Karoha to Kolam is 300 parasangs in length. The people are all Samánis, and worship idols. ..."

1310.—"Maabar extends in length from Kolam to Nilwvar (Nellore) nearly 300 parasangs along the sea-coast."

1322.—"... as I went by the sea... towards a certain city called Columbunum (where I bought the pepper in great store)."

1322.—"Poi venni a Colomba, ch'à la region terra d'India per mercanti. Quivi è il gengivo in grande copia e del buono del mondo. Quivi vanni tutti ignudi salvo che portano un panno innanzi alla vergogna, e legaisi di distro."—Palatine MS. of Odoric, in Cathay, App., p. xlvii.

c. 1328.—"In India, whilst I was at Columbunum, were found two cats having wings like the wings of bats."—Friar Jordann, p. 29.

1330.—"... Eccles. v. 493.

c. 1343.—"... The 10th day (from Calicut) we arrived at the city of Kau-lam, which is one of the finest of Malibär. Its markets are splendid, and its merchants are known under the name of Silt (see Choolla). They are rich; one of them will buy a ship with all its fittings and load it with goods from his own store."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 10.

c. 1348.—"... And sailing on the feast of St. Stephen, we navigated the Indian Sea until Palm Sunday, and then arrived at a very noble city of India called Columbunum, where the whole world's pepper is produced. There is a church of St. George there, of which from the boundary of Karuha, in early Halil, iii. 32.

1488.—"... In the year Bharat (644) of the Kolamb ura, King Adityavarma the ruler of Vanchi... who has attained the sovereignty of Cherabaya Mandalam, hung up the bell."

1510.—"... we departed... and went to another city called Colom. The King of this city is a Pagan, and extremely powerful, and he has 20,000 horsemen, and many archers. This country has a good port near to the sea-coast. No grain grows here, but fruits as at Calicut, and pepper in great quantities."—Varthema, 182-3.

1516.—"... Further on along the same coast towards the south is a great city and good sea-port which is named Coulam, in which dwell many Moors and Gentiles and Christians. They are great merchants and very rich, and own many ships with which they trade to Cholimendel, the Island of Ceylon, Bengal, Malaca, Samatara, and Pegu... There is also ducat ad gloriam in futuro which sells this city much pepper."

1572.—"A hum Cochim, e a outro Canezor, A qual Chale, a qual a ilha da Pimenta, A qual Couloa, a qual a Cranganor, E os mais, a quem o mais servir, e contenta."—Cano, vii. 35.

RAJA, RAJAH. *Skt. rájá, 'king.' The word is still used in this sense, but titles have a tendency to degenerate, and this one is applied to many humbler dignitaries, petty chiefs, or large Zemindars. It is also now a title of nobility conferred by the British Government, as it was by their Mahommedan predecessors, on Hindus, as Nawáb is upon Moslem. Ráj, Ráo, Rána, Ráival, Ráya (in S. India), are other forms which the word has taken in vernacular dialects or particular applications. The word spread with Hindu civilisation to the eastward, and survives in the titles of Indo-Chinese sovereigns, and in those of Malay and Javanese chiefs and princes.

It is curious that the term Rájá cannot be traced, so far as we know, in any of the Greek or Latin references to India, unless the very questionable instance of Pliny's Rákkias be an exception. In early Mahommedan writers the now less usual, but still Indian, forms Ráó and Ráê, are those which we find. (Ibn Batuta, it will be seen, regards the words for king in India and in Spain as identical, in which he is fundamentally right.) Among the English vulgarisms of the 18th century again we sometimes find the word barbarised into Roger.

1638.—"... Bábá-uddín fled to one of the heathen Kings called the Rái Kanblah. The word Ráí among those people, just as among the people of Rüm, signifies 'King.'"—Ibn Batuta, iii. 318. The traveller here refers, as appears by another passage, to the Spanish Rèy.

BAJAMUNDRY, n.p. A town, formerly head-place of a district, on the lower Godavery R. The name is in Telgu Rdjamahehdravaramu, 'King-chief's-Town,' and takes its name from Mahendradeva of the Orissa dynasty; see Morris, Godavery Man. 23.

RAJPOOT. *Skt. Rajpút, from Skt. Rājaputra, 'King's Son.' The name of a great race in India, the hereditary profession of which is that of arms. The name was probably only a honorific assumption; but no race in India has furnished so large a number of princely families. According to Chand, the great medieval bard of the Rajpúts, there were 36 clans of the race, issued from four Kshatriyas (Parihár, Prämár, Solanki, and Chauhán) who sprang into existence from the sacred Agnikundu or Firepit on the summit of Mount Abút. Later bards give five eponyms from the firepit, and 99 clans. The Rajpúts thus claim to be true Kshatriyas, or representatives of the second of the four fundamental castes, the Warriors; but the Brahmanas do not acknowledge the claim, and deny that the true Kshatriya is extant. Possibly the story of the fireborn ancestry hides a consciousness that the claim is factitious. "The Rajpoots," says Forbes, "use animal food and spirituous liquors, both unclean in the last degree to their puritanic neighbours, and are scrupulous in the observance of only two rules,—those which prohibit the slaughter of cows, and the remarriage of widows. The clans are not forbidden to eat together, or to intermarry, and cannot be said in these respects to form separate castes" (Rás-málâ, reprint 1878, p. 537).

An odd illustration of the fact that to partake of animal food, and especially of the heroic repeat of the flesh of the wild boar killed in the chase RAJPOOT. 755  RAMASAMMY.

(see Terry's representation of this below) is a Rājpūt characteristic, occurs to the memory of one of the present writers. In Lord Canning's time the young Rājpūt Raja of Alwar had betaken himself to degrading courses, insomuch that the Viceroy felt constrained, in open durbar at Agra, to admonish him. A veteran political officer, who was present, inquired of the agent at the Alwar Court what had been the nature of the conduct thus rebuked. The reply was that the young prince had become the habitual associate of low and profligate Mahommedans, who had so influenced his conduct that among other indications, he would not eat wild pig. The old Political, hearing this, shook his head very gravely, saying, 'Would not eat Wild Pig! Dear! Dear! Dear!' It seemed the ne plus ultra of Rājpūt degradation! The older travellers give the name in the quaint form Rashbūt, but this is not confined to Europeans, as the quotation from Sidi 'Ali shows; though the aspect in which the old English travellers regarded the tribe, as mainly a pack of banditti, might have made us think the name to be shaped by a certain sense of aptness. The Portuguese again frequently call them Reys Butoes, a form in which the true etymology, at least partially, emerges.

1516.—"There are three qualities of these Gentiles, that is to say, some are called Rashbūtes, and they, in the time that their King was a Gentile, were Knights, the defenders of the Kingdom, and governors of the Country."—Barbaa, 50.

1533.—"Insomuch that whilst the battle went on, Saladin placed all his women in a large house, with all that he possessed, whilst below the house were combustibles for use in the fight; and Saladin ordered them to be set fire to, whilst he was in it. Thus the house suddenly blew up with great explosion and loud cries from the unhappy women; whereupon all the people from within and without rushed to the spot, but the Resbūtes fought in such a way that they drove the Guzarat troops out of the gates, and others in their hasty flight cast themselves from the walls and perished."—Correa, iii. 597.

"And with the stipulation that the 200 pardaus, which are paid as allowance to the lascarins of the two small forts which stand between the lands of Bācaim and the Reys butuos, shall be paid out of the revenues of Bācaim as they have been paid hitherto."—Treaty of Nano da Cunha with the K. of Cambaya, in Subsidies, 137.

c. 1554.—"But if the caravan is attacked, and the Bāts (see BHAT) kill themselves, the Rashboutes, according to the law of the Bāts, are adjudged to have committed a crime worthy of death."—Sidi 'Ali Kapddn, in J. As., Ser. I., tom. ix. 96.

RAMASAMMY. a. This corruption of Ramasamym ("Lord Rāma"), a common Hindū proper name in the South, is there used colloquially in two ways:

(a). As a generic name for Hindūs, like 'Tommy Atkins' for a British soldier. Especially applied to Indian coolies in Ceylon, &c.

(b). For a twisted roving of cotton in a tube (often of wrought silver) used to furnish light for a cigar (see FULLETA). Madras use:

RAMBOTA

1880.—"... if you want a clerk to do your work or a servant to attend on you, you would take on a saporoseous Bengali Baboo, or a serflike abject Madrasi Ramasamy... A Madrasi, even if wrongly abused, would simply call you his father, and his mother, and his aunt, defending the poor, and epitome of wisdom, and would take his change of you in the bazaar accounts."—Cornhill Mag., Nov., pp. 582-3.

RAMBOTANG, s. Malay, rambūtan (Filet, No. 6750, p. 256). The name of a fruit (Nephelium lappaceum, L.), common in the Straits, having a thin juicy pulp, closely adhering to a hard stone, and covered externally with bristles like those of the external envelope of a chestnut. From rambūt, hair.

1613.—"And other native fruits, such as "boches (perhaps backang, the Mangifera fordii I.) rambotangs, rambes, buushuos, and pomegranates, and innumerable others. ..."—Codimde de Eredia, 16.

1726.—"... the ramboten-tree (the fruit of which the Portuguese call fructa dos caffaros or Caffer's fruit)."—Valentijn (v.) Sumatra, 3.

1727.—"The Ramboten is a Fruit about the Bigness of a Walnut, with a tough Skin, beset with Cspillamenh; within the Skin is a V.07 "Y7 MP.''-HmgW ii. 81; ed 1 44, 11. 801.

1783.—"Mangustines, barnb, and dorian ..."—Heyne, Tracts, 411.

RAMBAD, s. Hind. from Ar. ramadān (ramadhān). The ninth Mahommedan lunar month, viz. the month of the Fast.

1615.—"... at this time, being the preparation to the Rambad or Lent."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 537; [Hak. Soc. i. 21; also 58, 72, ii. 274].

1623.—"The 29th June: I think that (to-day?) the Moors have commenced their Ramadān, according to the rule by which I calculate."—P. della Valle, ii. 607; [Hak. Soc. i. 179].

1686.—"They are not ... very curious or strict in observing any Days or Times of particular Devotions, except it be Ramadām time as we call it. ... In this time they fast all Day. ..."—Dampier, i. 343.

Ramoosy, n.p. The name of a very distinct caste in W. India, Mahr. Ramost, [said to be from Mahr. ranavādī, 'jungle-dweller']; originally one of the thieving castes. Hence they came to be employed as hereditary watchmen in villages, paid by cash or by rent-free lands, and by various petty dues. They were supposed to be responsible for thefts till the criminals were caught; and were often themselves concerned. They appear to be still commonly employed as hired chokidars by Anglo-Indian households in the west. They come chiefly from the country between Poona and Kolhapur. The surviving traces of a Ramoosy dialect contain Telengu words, and have been used in more recent days as a secret slang. [See an early account of the tribe in: "An Account of the Origin and Present condition of the tribe of Ramoosies, including the Life of the Chief Oomiah Naik, by Capt. Alexander Mackintosh of the Twenty-seventh Regiment, Madras Army," Bombay 1833.]

1817.—"His Highness must long have been aware of Ramoosies near the Mahadeo pagoda."—Elphinstone's Letter to Parkru, in Papers relating to E.I. Affairs, 23.]

1833. —"There are instances of the Ramoosy Naiks, who are of a bold and daring spirit, having a great ascendancy over the village Patella (Patel) and Kowfurnies (Goolurnies), but which the latter do not like to acknowledge openly... and it sometimes happens that the village officers participate in the profits which the Ramoosies derive from committing such irregularities."—Macintosh, Acc. of the Tribe of Ramoosies, p. 19.

1883.—"Till a late hour in the morning he (the chameleon) sleeps sounder than a ramoosy or a chowkeydar; nothing will wake him."—Tribes on My Frontier.

RAM - RAM! The commonest salutation between two Hindus meeting on the road; an invocation of the divinity.

1652.—"... then they approach the idol waving them (their hands) and repeating many times (the words) Ram, Ram, i.e. God, God."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 283.]

1678.—"Those whose Zeal transports them no further than to die at home, are immediately Washed by the next of Kin, and bound up in a Sheet; and as many as go with him carry them by turns on a Cottstaff; and the rest run almost naked and shaved, crying after him Ram, Ram."—Fryer, 101.
1726.—"The wives of Bramines (when about to burn) first give away their jewels and ornaments, or perhaps a pinang, (q.v.); which is under such circumstances a great present, to this or that one of their male or female friends who stand by, and after taking leave of them, go and lie over the corpse, calling out only Ram, Ram."—Valentijn, v. 51.

[1828.—See under SUTTEE.]

c. 1885.—Sir G. Birdwood writes: "In 1869-70 I saw a green parrot in the Crystal Palace aviary very doeful, dull, and miserable to behold. I called it 'pretty poll,' and coaxedit in every way, but no notice of me would it take. Then I bestowed upon it the title of being a Mahratta popet, and hailed it Ram Ram! and spoke in Mahratti to it; when at once it roused up out of its lethargy, and hopped and swung about, and answered me back, and cuddled up close to me against my knuckles. And every day thereafter, when I visited it, it was always in an eager flurry to salute me as I drew near to it."

RANEE, s. A Hindu queen; īānī, fem. of īāj, from Skt. īājī (= regina).

1673.—"Bedmurr (Bednur) . . . is the Capital City, the Residence of the Ranne, the Relict of Sham Shunker Naig."—Fryer, 162.

1809.—"The young Rannie may marry whomesoever she pleases."—Lord Valentia, i. 364.

1879.—"There were once a Raja and a Rān̂é who had an only daughter."—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 1.

RANGOON, n.p. Burm. Rān-gun, said to mean 'War-end'; the chief town and port of Pegu. The great Pagoda in its immediate neighbourhood had long been famous under the name of Dagon (q.v.), but there was no town in modern times till Rangoon was founded by Alompra during his conquest of Pegu, in 1755. The name probably had some kind of intentional assonance to Da-gun, whilst it "proclaimed his forecast of the immediate destruction of his enemies." Occupied by the British forces in May 1824, and again, taken by storm, in 1852, Rangoon has since the latter date been the capital, first of the British province of Pegu, and latterly of British Burma. It is now a flourishing port with a population of 134,176 (1881); [in 1891, 180,324].

RANJOW, s. A Malay term, ran-jān. Sharp-pointed stakes of bamboo of varying lengths stuck in the ground to penetrate the naked feet or body of an enemy. See Marsden, H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed., 276. [The same thing on the Assam frontier is called a poe (Lacin, Wild Races, 308), or panji (Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 233).]

BASEED, s. Hind. rāsid. A native corruption of the English 'receipt,' shaped, probably, by the Pers. rāsīdā, 'arrived'; viz. an acknowledgment that a thing has 'come to hand.'

1877.—"There is no Sindi, however wild, that cannot now understand 'Rāsid' (receipt), and 'Aptī' (appeal)."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 282.

BAT-BIRD, s. The striated bush-babbler (Chattarhoea caudata, Dumeril); see Tribes on My Frontier, 1883, p. 3.

BATTAN, s. The long stem of various species of Asiatic climbing palms, belonging to the genus Calamus and its allies, of which canes are made (not 'bamboo-canes,' improperly so called), and which, when split, are used to form the seats of cane-bottomed chairs and the like. From Malay rotan, [which Crawfurd derives from rawat, 'to pare or trim'], applied to various species of Calamus and Dae monorops (see Filet, No. 696 et seq.). Some of these attain a length of several hundred feet, and are used in the Himalaya and the Kāsia Hills for making suspension bridges, &c., rivaling rope in strength.

1511.—"The Governor set out from Malaca in the beginning of December, of this year, and sailed along the coast of Pedir. He met with such a contrary gale that he was obliged to anchor, which he did with a great anchor, and a cable of rōtās, which are slender but tough canes, which they twist and make into strong cables."—Correa, Lendas, ii. 229.

1563.—"They took thick ropes of rōtās (which are made of certain twigs which are very flexible) and cast them round the feet, and others round the hands."—Garcia, f. 90.

1598.—"There is another sort of the same reeds which they call Rōta; these are thinner like twiggies of Willow for baskets. . . ."—Linschoten, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 97].

c. 1610.—"Il y a une autre sorte de canne qui ne vient jamais plus grosse que le petit doigt . . . et il ploye comme osier. Ils l'appellent Rōtān. Ils en font des cables de naure, et quantité de sortes de paniers sentiment entre lasse."—Pyramy de Laval, i. 297; [Hak. Soc. i. 831, and see i. 207].
RAVINE DEER. The sportsman's name, at least in Upper India, for the Indian gazelle (Gazella Bennetti, Jerdon, [Blandan, Mammalia, 526 seqq.]).

BAZZIA, s. This is Algerine-French, not Anglo-Indian, meaning a sudden raid or destructive attack. It is in fact the Ar. ghaziya, 'an attack upon infidels,' from ghazi, 'a hero.'

REAPER, s. The small laths, laid across the rafters of a sloping roof to bear the tiles, are so called in Anglo-Indian house-building. We find no such word in any Hind Dictionary; but in the Mahratti Dict. we find rip in this sense.

[1734-5.—See under BANKSHALL.]

REAS, REES, s. Small money of account, formerly in use at Bombay; the 25th part of an anna, and 400th of a rupee. Port. real, pl. reés. Accounts were kept at Bombay in rupees, quarters, and reas, down at least to November 1834, as we have seen in accounts of that date at the India Office.

1673.—[In Gos] "The 'vinteen. . . 15 Basrooks (see BUDGROOK), whereas 75 make a Tango (see TANGA), and 60 Rees make a Tango."—Fryer, 207.

1727.—"Their Accounts (Bombay) are kept by Bayes and Ruppers. 1 Ruper is . . . 400 Bayes."—A. Hamilton, ii. App. 6; [ed. 1744, ii. 315].

RED CLIFFS, n.p. The nautical name of the steep coast below Quilon. This presents the only bluffs on the shore from Mt. Dely to Cape Comorin, and is thus identified, by character and name, with the ḫyddir ḫes of the Periplus.

c. 80-90.—"Another village, Bakarē, lies by the mouth of the river, to which the ships about to depart descend from Nel-kynda. . . . From Bakarē extends the Red-Hill (rūḥdd ḫes) and then a long stretch of country called Paralia."—Periplus, §§ 55-58.

1727.—"I wonder why the English built their Fort in that place (Anjengo), when they might as well have built it near the Red Cliffs to the northward, from whence they have their Water for drinking."—A. Hamilton, i. 392; [ed. 1744, i. 334].

1813.—"Water is scarce and very indifferent; but at the Red cliffs, a few miles to the north of Anjengo, it is said to be very good, but difficult to be shipped."—Milburn, Or. Comm. i. 385. See also Durr's New Directory, 5th ed. 1780, p. 161.

1814.—"From thence (Quilone) to Anjengo the coast is hilly and romantic; especially about the red cliffs at Boccoli (qu. Baxaph as above) where the women of Anjengo daily repair for water, from a very fine spring."—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 394; [2nd ed. i. 213].

1841.—"There is said to be fresh water at the Red Cliffs to the northward of Anjengo, but it cannot be got conveniently; a considerable surf generally prevailing on the coast, particularly to the southward, renders it unsafe for ships' boats to land."—Hawburgh's Direc. ed. 1841, i. 515.

RED-DOG, s. An old name for Prickly-heat (q.v.).

c. 1752.—"The red-dog is a disease which affects almost all foreigners in hot countries, especially if they reside near the shore, at the time when it is hottest."—Oeser's Voyage, i. 190.

REGULATION, s. A law passed by the Governor-General in Council, or by a Governor (of Madras or Bombay) in Council. This term became obsolete in 1833, when legislative authority was conferred by the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. cap. 85) on those authorities; and thenceforward the term used is Act. By 13 Geo. III. cap. 63, § xxxv., it is enacted that it shall be lawful for the G.-G. and Council of Fort William in Bengal to issue Rules or Decrees and Regulations for the good order and civil government of the Company's settlements, &c. This was the same Charter Act that established the Supreme Court. But the authorised compilation of "Regulations of the Govt. of Fort William in force at the end of 1853," begins only with the Regulations of 1793, and makes no allusion to the earlier Regulations. No more does Regulation XLI. of 1793, which prescribes the form, numbering, and codifying of the Regulations to be issued. The fact seems to be that prior to 1793, when the enactment of Regulations was systematized, and the Regulations began to be regularly numbered, those that were issued partook rather of the character of resolutions of Government and circular orders than of Laws.

1888.—"The new Commissioner . . . could discover nothing prejudicial to me, except, perhaps, that the Regulations were not sufficiently observed. The sacred Regulations! How was it possible to fit them on such very irregular subjects as I had to deal with?"—Lt.-Col. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 376.

1880.—"The laws promulgated under this system were called Regulations, owing to a lawyer's doubts as to the competence of the Indian authorities to infringe on the legislative powers of the English Parliament, and to modify the 'laws and customs' by which it had been decreed that the various nationalities of India were to be governed."—Saty. Review, March 13, p. 335.

REGULATION PROVINCES. See this explained under NON-REGULATION.

REGUR, s. Dakh. Hind. regar, also legar. The peculiar black loamy soil, commonly called by English people in India 'black cotton soil.' The word may possibly be connected with H.—P. reg, 'sand'; but regada and regadi is given by Wilson as Telugu. [Platts connects it with Skt. rekha, 'a furrow.'] This soil is not found in Bengal, with some restricted exception in the Rajmahal Hills. It is found everywhere on the plains of the Deccan trap-country, except near the coast. Tracts of it are scattered through the valley of the Krishna, and it occupies the flats of Coimbatore, Madura, Salem, Tanjore, Ramnud, and Tinnevelly. It occurs north of the Nerbudda in Saugor, and occasionally on the plain of the eastern side of the Peninsula, and comprises the great flat of Surat and Broach in Guzerat. It is also found in Pegu. The origin of regar has been much debated. We can only give the conclusion as stated in the Manual of the Geology of India, from which some preceding particulars are drawn: "Regur has been shown on fairly trustworthy evidence to result from the impregnation of certain argillaceous formations with organic matter, but . . . the process which has taken place is imperfectly understood, and . . . some peculiarities in distribution yet require explanation."

BEHN, s. [Hind. reh, Skt. rej, 'to shine, shake, quiver.'] A saline efflorescence which comes to the surface in extensive tracts of Upper India, rendering the soil sterile. The salts (chiefly sulphate of soda mixed with more or less of common salt and carbonate of soda) are superficial in the soil, for in the worst reh tracts sweet water is obtainable at depths below 60 or 80 feet. [Plains infested with these salts are very commonly known in N. India as Usur Plains (Hind. asar, Skt. ashara, 'impregnated with salt.')] The phenomenon seems due to the climate of Upper India, where the ground is rendered hard and impervious to water by the scorching sun, the parching winds, and the treeless character of the country, so that there is little or no water-circulation in the subsoil. The salts in question, which appear to be such of the substances resulting from the decomposition of rock, or of the detritus derived from rock, and from the formation of the soil, as are not assimilated by plants, accumulate under such circumstances, not being diluted and removed by the natural purifying process of percolation of the rain-water. This accumulation of salts is brought to the surface by capillary action after the rains, and evaporated, leaving the salts as an efflorescence on the surface. From time to time the process culminates on considerable tracts of land, which are thus rendered barren. The canal-irrigation of the Upper Provinces has led to some aggravation of the evil. The level of the canal-waters being generally high, they raise the level of the reh-polluted water in the soil, and produce in the lower tracts a great increase of the efflorescence. A partial remedy for this lies in the provision of drainage for the subsoil water, but this has only to a small extent been yet carried out. [See a full account in Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. i. 400 seq.]

BEINOL, s. A term formerly in use among the Portuguese at Goa, and applied apparently to 'Johnny New-comes' or Griffins (q.v.). It is from reino, 'the Kingdom' (viz. of Portugal). The word was also sometimes used to distinguish the European Portuguese from the country-born.

1598.—"... they take great pleasure and laugh at him, calling him Reynol, which is a name given in jest to such as newly come from Portugal, and know not how to behave themselves in such grave manner, and with such ceremonies as the Portuguese use there in India."—Linschoten, ch. xxxi; [Hak. Soc. i. 208].

C. 1610.—"... quand ces soldats Portugais arrivent de nouveau aux Indes portans ancor leurs habita du pays, ceux qui sont là de long tās quand ils les voyent par les rues les appellent Renol, chargé de poux, et mille autres inuires et mocqueries."—Morquet, 304.

[... "When they are newly arrived in the Indies, they are called Raignolles, that is to say 'men of the Kingdom,' and the older hands mock them until they have made one or two voyages with them, and have learned the manners and customs of the Indies; this name sticks to them until the fleet arrives the year following."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 123.]

[1727.—"The Reynolds or European fidalgos."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 251.]

At a later date the word seems to have been applied to Portuguese deserters who took service with the E.I. Co. Thus:

C. 1760.—"... With respect to the military, the common men are chiefly such as the Company sends out in their ships, or deserters from the several nations settled in India, Dutch, French, or Portuguese, which last are commonly known by the name of Reynols."—Grose, i. 38.

RESHIRE, n.p. Reshirh. A place on the north coast of the Persian Gulf, some 5 or 6 miles east of the modern port of Bushire (q.v.). The present village is insignificant, but it is on the site of a very ancient city, which continued to be a port of some consequence down to the end of the 16th century. I do not doubt that this is the place intended by Beyzel in the quotation from A. Nunes under Dubber. The spelling Baxel in Barros below is no doubt a clerical error for Baxel.

C. 1340.—"Reshirh... This city built by Lahore, was rebuilt by Shapur son of Ardesthir Babegh; it is of medium size, on the shore of the sea. The climate is very hot and unhealthy... The inhabitants generally devote themselves to sea-trade, but poor and feeble that they are, they live chiefly in dependence on the merchants of other countries. Dates and the cloths called Rischieh are the chief productions."—Hammadalla Mascāfī, quoted in Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse.

1514.—"... And thereupon Pero Dalboquerque sailed away... and entered through the straits of the Persian sea, and explored all the harbours, islands, and villages which are contained in it... and when he was as far advanced as Bārum, the winds being now westerly—he tacked about, and stood along in the tack for a two days' voyage, and reached Baxel, where he found Mirbuzace, Captain of the Xoque Imsail, (Shah Ismail Safa, of Persia), who had captured 20 tarradas from a Captain of the King of Ormuz."—Abboquere, Hak. Soc. iv. 114-115.

"On the Persian side (of the Gulf) is the Province of Baxel, which contains many villages and fortresses along the sea, engaged in a flourishing trade."—Ibid. 189-7.

1534.—"And at this time insurrection was made by the King of Baxel, (which is a city on the coast of Persia); who was a vassal of the King of Ormuz, and in the latter King's support, and with the help from the Captain of the Castle, Antonio da Silveira. And he sent down Jorge de Cramato with a galliot and two foists and 100 men, all well equipped, and good musketeers; and bade him tell the King of Baxel that he must give up the fleet which he kept at sea for the purpose of plundering, and must return to his allegiance to the K. of Ormuz."—Correa, iii. 557.

1553.—"... And Francisco de Gouvea arrived at the port of the city of Baxel, and having anchored, was forthwith visited by a Moor on the King's part, with refreshments and compliments, and a message that... he would make peace with us, and submit to the King of Ormuz."—Barros, IV. iv. 26.

1554.—"Beyzel." See under DUBBER, as above.

1856.—"48 hours sufficed to put the troops in motion northwards, the ships of war, led by the Admiral, advancing along the coast to their support. This was on the morning of the 9th, and by noon the enemy was observed to be in force in the village of Reshire. Here amidst the ruins of old houses, garden-walls, and steep ravines, they occupied a formidable position; but notwithstanding their firmness, wall after wall was surmounted, and finally they were driven from their last defence (the old fort of Reshire) bordering on the cliffs at the margin of the sea."—Despatch in Lovre's H. of the Indian Navy, ii. 346.
RESIDENT, s. This term has been used in two ways which require distinction. Thus (a) up to the organization of the Civil Service in Warren Hastings's time, the chiefs of the Company's commercial establishments in the provinces, and for a short time the European chiefs of districts, were termed Residents. But later the word was applied (b) also to the representative of the Governor-General at an important native Court, e.g. at Lucknow, Delhi, Hyderabad, and Baroda. And this is the only meaning that the term now has in British India. In Dutch India the term is applied to the chief European officer of a province (corresponding to an Indian Zillah) as well as to the Dutch representative at a native Court, at Solo and Djokjocarta.

1748.—"We received a letter from Mr. Henry Kelsall, Resident at Ballasore."—Ft. William Consn., in Long, 3.
1760.—"Agreed, Mr. Howitt the present Resident in Rajah Tilkuck Chund's country (i.e. Burdwan) for the collection of the tuencas (see TUNCA), be wrote to."—Ibid. March 29, Ibid. 244.

b.—— 1798.—"Having received overtures of a very friendly nature from the Rajah of Berar, who has requested the presence of a British Resident at his Court, I have despatched an ambassador to Nagpore with full powers to ascertain the precise nature of the Rajah's views."—Mary GIS WELLESLEY, Despatches, i. 99.

RESPONDENTIA, s. An old trade technicality, thus explained: "Money which is borrowed, not upon the vessel as in bottomry, but upon the goods and merchandise contained in it, which must necessarily be sold or exchanged in the course of the voyage, in which case the borrower personally is bound to answer the contract" (Wharton's Law Lexicon, 6th ed., 1876; and see N.E.D. under Bottomry). What is now a part of the Calcutta Course, along the bank of the Hoogly, was known down to the first quarter of the last century, as Respondentia Walk. We have heard this name explained by the supposition that it was a usual scene of proposals and contingent Jawabh, (q.v.) but the name was no doubt, in reality, given because this walk by the river served as a sort of 'Change, where bargains in Respondentia and the like were made.

1720.—"I am concerned with Mr. Thomas Theobalds in a Respondentia Bond in the 'George' Brigantine."—Testament of Ch. DAWES, Merchant. In Wheeler, ii. 340.
1727.—"There was one Captain Perrin Master of a Ship, who took up about 500 L. on Respondentia from Mr. Ralph Sheldon... payable at his Return to Bengal."—A. Hamilton, ii. 14; [ed. 1744, ii. 12].
1748.—"... which they are enabled to do by the Money taken up here on Respondentia bonds..."—In Wheeler, ii. 427.
1776.—"I have desired my Calcutta Attorney to insure some Money lent on Respondentia on Ships in India... I have also subscribed £500 towards a China Voyage."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, Feb. 20.
1794.—"... I assure you, Sir, European articles, especially good wine, are not to be had for love, money, or Respondentia."—The Indian Observer, by Hugh Boyd, &c., p. 206.
[1840.—"A Grecian Gate has been built at the north end of the old Respondentia walk..."—Davidson, Diary of Travels, ii. 209.]

RESSAILAR, s. P.—H. Rasaaiddr. A native subaltern of irregular cavalry, under the Bessaadar (q.v.). It is not clear what sense Rasaad has in the formation of this title (which appears to be of modern devising). The meaning of that word is 'quickness of apprehension; fitness, perfection.'

RESSALA, s. Hind. from Ar. risala. A troop in one of our regiments of native (so-called) Irregular Cavalry. The word was in India applied more loosely to a native corps of horse, apart from English regimental technicalities. The Arabic word properly means the charge or commission of a risal, i.e. of a civil officer employed to make arrests (Dozy), [and in the passage from the Asf, quoted under RESSAILAR, the original text has Risalah]. The transition of meaning, as with many other words of Arabic origin, is very obscure.

1758.—"... Presently after Shokum Singh and Haroon Cawn (formerly of Boy Dullub's
RESSALDA, s. P.-H. Rissaldar (Rissala). Originally in Upper India the commander of a corps of Hindustani horse, though the second quotation shows it, in the south, applied to officers of infantry. Now applied to the native officer who commands a ressala in one of our regiments of "Irregular Horse." This title is applied honorifically to overseers of post-horses or stables. (See Panjab Notes & Queries, ii. 84.)

RESIDENT, n. Much the same as Dawk Bungalow (q.v.). Used only in Ceylon only. [But the word is in common use in Northern India for the chokies along roads and canals.]

[1894. "'Best-Houses' or 'staging bungalows' are erected at intervals of twenty or fifteen miles along the roads."]

RESUM, s. Lascar's Hind. for ration (Roebuck).

RHINOCEROS, s. We introduce this word for the sake of the quotations, showing that even in the 18th century this animal was familiar not only in the Western Himalaya, but in the forests near Peshawar. It is probable that the nearest rhinoceros to be found at the present time would be not less than 800 miles, as the crow flies, from Peshawar. See also GANADA, [and for references to the animal in Greek accounts of India, M'Crindle, Ancient India, its Invasion by Alexander, 186].

CRHOTASS, n.p. This (Rohitá) is the name of two famous fortresses in India, viz. a. a very ancient rock-fort in the Sháhábúd district of Behar, occupying part of a tabular hill which rises on the north bank of the Son river to a height of 1490 feet. It was an important stronghold of Sher Shah, the successful rival of the Mogul Humáyün: b. A fort at the north end of the Salt-range in the Jhelum District, Punjab, which was built by the same king, named by him after the ancient Rohtâs. The ruins are very picturesque.

c. 1560.—"Sher Shâh was occupied night and day with the business of his kingdom, and never allowed himself to be idle. . . . He kept money (khazâna) and revenue (thârd) in all parts of his territories, so that, if necessary required, soldiers and money were ready. The chief treasure was in Rohtâs under the care of Ikhâtiyar Khân."—Waqi'-i-Muchâkhi, in Elliot, iv, 551.

[c. 1590.—]"Rohtâs is a stronghold on the summit of a lofty mountain, difficult of access. It has a circumference of 14 kos and the land is cultivated. It contains many springs, and whenever the soil is excavated to the depth of 3 or 4 yards, water is visible. In the rainy season many lakes are formed, and more than 200 waterfalls gladden the eye and ear."—Ain, li, 152.

1665.—". . . You must leave the great road to Patna, and bend to the South through Eskerburgh (E [Akbarpur]) and the famous Fortress of Rhodes."—Tavernier, E.T. ii, 53; [ed. Ball, i, 121.]

[1764.—]"From Shaw Mull, Kelladar of Rotas to Major Munro."—In Long, 359.

RICE. s. The well-known cereal, Oryza sativa, L. There is a strong temptation to derive the Greek φόρτα, which is the source of our word through It. rice, Fr. riz, etc., from the Tamil ari, 'rice deprived of husk,' ascribed to a root ari, 'to separate.' It is quite possible that Southern India was the original seat of rice cultivation. Roxburgh (Flora Indica, ii, 200) says that a wild rice, known as Nevarres [Skt. nûdra, Tel. nîvdrî] by the Telinga people, grows abundantly about the lakes in the Northern Circars, and he considers this to be the original plant.

It is possible that the Arabic al-ruzuz (arruzz) from which the Spaniards directly take their word arroz, may have been taken also directly from the Dravidian term. But it is hardly possible that φόρτα can have had that origin. The knowledge of rice apparently came to Greece from the expedition of Alexander, and the mention of φόρτα by Theophratus, which appears to be the oldest, probably dates almost from the lifetime of Alexander (d. B.C. 323). Aristobulus, whose accurate account is quoted by Strabo (see below), was a companion of Alexander's expedition, but seems to have written later than Theophratus.

The term was probably acquired on the Oxus, or in the Punjab. And though no Skt. word for rice is nearer φόρτα than vrihi, the very common exchange of aspirant and sibilant might easily give a form like vri or brsi (comp. hindû, sindî, &c.) in the dialects west of India. Though no such exact form seems to have been produced from old Persian, we have further indications of it in the Pushtu, which Raverty writes, sing. 'a grain of rice' w'rîzâh, pl. 'rice' w'rizey, the former close to oryza. The same writer gives in Barakai (one of the uncultivated languages of the Kabul country, spoken by a 'Tajik' tribe settled in Logar, south of Kabul, and also at Kanigoram in the Waziri country) the word for rice as w'rîza, a very close approximation again to oryza. The same word is indeed given by Leech, in an earlier vocabulary, largely coincident with the former, as rîza. The modern Persian word for husked rice is birinj, and the Armenian brinj. A nasal form, deviating further from the hypothetical brisi or vri, but still probably the same in origin, is found among other languages of the Hindû Kush tribes, e.g. Burishki (Khajuna of Leitner) brou; Shina (of Gilgit), brûj; Khowar of the Chitral Valley (Arniyah of Leitner), gijnj (Buddulph, Tribes of Hindoo Koosh, App., pp. xxxiv., lxx., cxxxix.).

of Madagascar (Urania speciosa), cooked to pass as a bird's quill. Mr. Silber in his excellent book on Madagascar (The Great African Island, 1880), noticed this, but pointed out that the object was more probably the immensely long midrib of the rofa palm (Syzygium Raphia). Sir John Kirk, when in England in 1882, expressed entire confidence in this identification, and on his return to Zanzibar in 1883 sent four of these midribs to England. These must have been originally from 36 to 40 feet in length. The leaflets were all straip, but when entire the object must have strongly resembled a Brobdingnagian feather. These roc's quills were shown at the Forestry Exhibition in Edinburgh, 1884. Sir John Kirk wrote:

"I send to-day per S.S. Aroet... four midribs of the Raphia palm, called here Moah. They are just as sold and shipped up and down the coast. No doubt they were sent in Marco Polo's time in exactly the same state — i.e. stripped of their leaflets and with the tip broken off. They are used for making stages and ladders, and last long if kept dry. They are also made into doors, by being cut into lengths, and pinned through."

Some other object has recently been shown at Zanzibar as part of the wings of a great bird. Sir John Kirk writes that this (which he does not describe particularly) was in the possession of the R. C. priests at Bagamoyo, to whom it had been given by natives of the interior, and these declared that they had brought it from Tanganyika, and that it was part of the wing of a gigantic bird. On another occasion they repeated this statement, alleging that this bird was known in the Udoe (f) country, near the coast. The priests were able to communicate directly with their informants, and certainly believed the story. Dr. Hildebrand also, a competent German naturalist, believed in it. But Sir John Kirk himself says that 'what the priests had to show was most undoubtedly the whalebone of a comparatively small whale' (see letter of the present writer in Athenaeum, March 22nd, 1884).

(Par Van der Lil et Marcel Devic, pp. 62-83.)

ROCK-PIGEON. The bird so called by sportsmen in India is the Pterocles excubius of Temminck, belonging to the family of sand-grouse (Pteroclidae). It occurs throughout India, except in the more wooded parts. In their swift high flight these birds look something like pigeons on the wing, whence perhaps the misnomer.

ROGUE (Elephant) s. An elephant (generally, if not always a male) living in apparent isolation from any herd, usually a bold marauder, and a danger to travellers. Such an elephant is called in Bengal, according to Williamson, saun, i.e. sain [Hind. sain, Skt. shanda]; sometimes it would seem gunda [Hind. gunda, 'a rascal']; and by the Sinhalese hóra. The term rogue is used by Europeans in Ceylon, and its origin is somewhat obscure. Sir Emerson Tennent finds such an elephant called, in a curious book of the 18th century, runkedor or runkedor, of which he supposes that rogue may perhaps have been a modification. That word looks like Port. ronkador, 'a snorer, a noisy fellow, a bully,' which gives a plausible sense. But Littre gives rogue as a colloquial French word conveying the idea of arrogance and rudeness. In the following passage which we have copied, unfortunately without recording the source, the word comes still nearer the sense in which it is applied to the elephant: "On commence à s’apercevoir des Bayonne, que l’humeur de ces peuples tient vn peu de celle de ses voisins, et qu’ils sont rouges et peu communicatifs avec l’Étranger." After all however it is most likely that the word is derived from an English use of the word. For Skeat shows that rogue, from the French sense of ‘malapert, saucy, rude, surly,’ came to be applied as a cant term to beggars, and is used, in some old English passages which he quotes, exactly in the sense of our modern 'tramp.' The transfer to a vagabond elephant would be easy. Mr. Skeat refers to Shakespeare:—

"And wast thou fain, poor father, To hovel thee with swine, and rogue forlorn!"—K. Lear, iv. 7.

1878.—"Much misconception exists on the subject of rogue or solitary elephants. The usually accepted belief that these elephants are turned out of the herds by their companions or rivals is not correct. Most of the so-called solitary elephants are the lords of some herds near. They leave their companions at times to roam by themselves, usually to visit cultivation or open country . . . sometimes again they make the expedition merely for the sake of solitude. They, however, keep more or less to the jungle where their herd is, and follow its movements."—Sanderson, p. 52.

ROGUE’S RIVER, n.p. The name given by Europeans in the 17th and 18th centuries to one of the Sunder- bund channels joining the Lower Hoogly R. from the eastward. It was so called from being frequented by the Arakan Rovers, sometimes Portuguese vagabonds, sometimes native Muggs, whose vessels lay in this creek watching their opportunity to plunder craft going up and down the Hoogly.

Mr. R. Barlow, who has partially annotated Hedger’s Diary for the Hak- luyt Society, identifies Rogue’s River with Channel Creek, which is the channel between Saugor Island and the Delta. Mr. Barlow was, I believe, a member of the Bengal Pilot service, and this, therefore, must have been the application of the name in recent tradition. But I cannot reconcile this with the sailing directions in the English Pilot (1711), or the indications in Hamilton, quoted below.

The English Pilot has a sketch chart of the river, which shows, just oppo- site Buffalo Point, "R. Theeves," then, as we descend, the R. Rangafula, and, close below that, "Rogues" (without the word River), and still further below, Channel Creek or R. Jessore. Rangafula R. and Channel Creek we still have in the charts.
After a careful comparison of all the notices, and of the old and modern charts, I come to the conclusion that the R. of Rogues must have been either what is now called Chingri Khal, entering immediately below Diamond Harbour, or Kalpi Creek, about 6 m. further down, but the preponderance of argument is in favour of Chingri Khal. The position of this quite corresponds with the R. Theves of the old English chart; it corresponds in distance from Saugor (the Gunga Saugor of those days, which forms the extreme S. of what is styled Saugor Island now) with that stated by Hamilton, and also in being close to the “first safe anchoring place in the River,” viz. Diamond Harbour. The Rogues’ River was apparently a little above the head of the Grand Middle Ground or great shoals of the Hoogly, whose upper termination is now some 7½ m. below Chingri Khal. One of the extracts from the English Pilot speaks of the “R. of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegum.” Now there is a town on the Chingri Khal, a few miles from its entrance into the Hoogly, which is called in Rennell’s Map Ottogunge, and in the Atlas of India Sheet Huttoogum. Further, in the tracing of an old Dutch chart of the 17th century, in the India Office, I find in a position corresponding with Chingri Khal, D’Roovers Spruit, which I take to be ‘Robber’s (or Eogue’s) River’.

1683.—“And so we parted for this night, before which time it was resolved by ye Councill that if I should not prevail to go this way to Decca, I should attempt to do it with ye Slooops by way of the River of Rogues, which goes through to the great River of Decca.”—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 36.

1711.—“Directions to go up along the Western Shore. . . . The nearer the Shore the better the Ground until past the River of Tygers. . . . You may begin to edge over towards the River of Rogues about the head of the Grand Middle Ground; and when the Buffalo Point bears from you 1 N. 2 of a Mile, steer directly over for the East Shore E.N.E.”—The English Pilot, Pt. iii. p. 54.

“Mr. Herring, the Pilot’s Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hooghly. . . . From the lower point of the Narrows on the Starboard side . . . the Eastern Shore is to be kept close aboard, until past the said Creek, afterwards allowing only a small Bith for the Point off the RIVER of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegum. . . . From the River Rogues, the Starboard (qu. larboard!) shore with a great ship ought to be kept close aboard all along down to Channel Trees, for in the going lies the Grand Middle Ground.”—Ibid. p. 57.

1737.—“The first safe anchoring Place in the River, is off the Mouth of a River about 12 Leagues above Saugor,” commonly known by the Name of Eogue’s River, which had that Appellation from some Banditti Portuguese, who were ‘followers of Shah Sijah . . . for those Portuguese . . . after their Master’s Flight to the Kingdom of Aracatan, betook themselves to Piracy among the Islands at the Mouth of the Ganges, and this River having communication with the Channel (see CHITTAGONG) to the Westward, from this River they used to sail out.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 3 [ed. 1744].

1752.—“. . . ‘On the receipt of your Honors’ orders per Dunnington, we sent for Capt. Pinson, the Master Attendant, and directed him to issue out fresh orders to the Pilots not to bring up any of your Honors’ Ships higher than Eogue’s River.’”—Letter to Court, in Long, p. 32.

ROHILLA, n.p. A name by which Afghans, or more particularly Afghans settled in Hindustan, are sometimes known, and which gave a title to the province Rohilkand, and now, through that, to a Division of the N.W. Provinces embracing a large part of the old province. The word appears to be Pushtu, rohela or rohela, adj., formed from roh, ‘mountain,’ thus signifies ‘mountaineer of Afghani- stán.’ But a large part of E. Afghani- stán specifically bore the name of Roh. Keene (Fall of the Moghul Monarchy, 41) puts the rise of the Rohillas of India in 1744, when ‘Ali Mahommed revolted, and made the territory since called Rohilkhand independent. A very comprehensive application is given to the term Roh in the quotation from Firishta. A friend (Major J. M. Trotter) notes here: “The word Rohilla is little, if at all, used now in Pushtu, but I remember a line of an ode in that language, ‘Sādāt Rohilaī yam pa Hindūbdīr gād,’ meaning, ‘I am a simple mountaineer, compelled to live in Hindustan’; i.e. ‘an honest man among knaves.’”

* This is shown by a 17th century Dutch chart in L.O. to be a creek on the west side, very little below Diamond Point. It is also shown in Tsasun’s Maps of the R. Hoogly, 1883; not later.

* This also points to the locality of Diamond Harbour, and the Chingri Khal.

1875.—"The old native coins seem to have consisted of Varaghans, rookas and Doodocs. The Varaghan is what is now generally called a pagoda... The rookas have now entirely disappeared, and have probably been melted into rupees. They varied in value from 1 to 2 Rupees. Though the coins have disappeared, the name still survives, and the ordinary name for silver money generally is rookaloo."—Gribble, Man. of Cuddapah, 286 seq.

BOOK, s. In chess the rook comes to us from Span. roque, and that from Ar. and Pers. rukh, which is properly the name of the famous Gryphon, the roc of Marco Polo and the Arabian Nights. According to Marcel Devic it meant ‘warrior.’ It is however generally believed that this form was a mistake in transferring the Indian rath (see BUT) or ‘chariot,’ the name of the piece in India.

BOOM, n.p. ‘Turkey’ (Rüm); BOOMEE, n.p. (Rémi); ‘an Ottoman Turk.’ Properly ‘a Roman.’ In older Oriental books it is used for an European, and was probably the word which Marco Polo renders as ‘a Latin’—represented in later times by firninghee (e.g. see quotation from Ibn Batuta under RAJA). But Rüm, for the Roman Empire, continued to be applied to what had been part of the Roman Empire after it had fallen into the hands of the Turks, first to the Seljukian Kingdom in Anatolia, and afterwards to the Ottoman Empire seated at Constantinople. Garcia de Orta and Jarric deny the name of Rumi, as used in India, to the Turks of Asia, but they are apparently wrong in their expressions. What they seem to mean is that Turks of the Ottoman Empire were called Rumi; whereas those others in Asia of Turkish race (whom we sometimes call Toorka), as of Persia and Turkestan, were excluded from the name.

Bandur-Rumi is, as the traveller explains, the 'Port of the Turks.' Gogola, a suburb of Diu on the mainland, was known to the Portuguese some years later, as VILLA DOS RUMES (see GOGOLLA, and quotation from Maffei above). The quotation below from Damian a Goes alludes apparently to Gogola.

BOUND, a. This is used as a Hind. word, round, or corruptly rāum gash, a transfer of the English, in the sense of patrolling, or 'going the rounds.' [And we find in the Madras Records the grade of 'Rounder,' or 'Gentlemen of the Bound,' officers whose duty it was to visit the sentries.

[1683.—"... it is order'd that 18 Soulidors, 1 Corporall & 1 Rounder goe upon the Sloop Cominer for Hugly. . . ."
—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. ii. 35.]

BONDULL, a. An obsolete word for an umbrella, formerly in use in Anglo-India. [In 1676 the use of the Roundell was prohibited, except in the case of "the Councell and Chaplaine." (Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cxxxiii.) In old English the name roundel is applied to a variety of circular objects, as a mat under a dish, a target, &c. And probably this is the origin of the present application, in spite of the circumstance that the word is sometimes found in the form arundel. In this form the word also seems to have been employed for the conical hand-gear on a lance, as we learn from Bluteau's great Port. Dictionary: "Arundella, or Arandella, is a guard for the right hand, in the form of a funnel. It is fixed to the thick part of the lance or mace borne by men at arms. The Licentiate Covarrubias, who piques himself on finding etymologies for every kind of word, derives Arandella from Arundel, a city (so he says) of the Kingdom of England." Cobarruvias (1611) gives the above explanation; adding that it also was applied to a kind of smooth collar worn by women, from its resemblance to the other thing. Unless historical proof of this last etymology can be traced, we should suppose that Arundel is, even in this sense, probably a corruption of roundel. [The N.E.D. gives arrondell, arundell as forms of arondelle, 'a swallow."

1754. — “Some years before our arrival in the country, they (the E. I. C.) found such sumptuary laws so absolutely necessary, that they gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to hire a Roundel-boy, whose business it is to walk by his master, and defend him with his Roundel or Umbrella from the heat of the sun. A young fellow of humour, upon this last order coming over, altered the form of his Umbrella from a round to a square, called it a Squiredel instead of a Roundel, and insisted that no order yet in force forbid him the use of it.” —Ives, 21.

1785. — “He (Clive) enforced the Sumptuary laws by severe penalties, and gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to have a roundel-boy, whose business is to walk by his master, and defend him with his roundel or umbrella from the heat of the sun.”
—Carraccoi, i. 283. This ignoble writer has evidently copied from Ives, and applied the passage (untruly, no doubt) to Clive.

ROWANNAH, s. Hind. from Pers. raudnah, from raid, 'going.' A pass or permit.

BOWGE, s. Hind. raus, rois, rauns. A Himālayan tree which supplies excellent straight and strong alpenstocks and walking-sticks, Cotoneaster barcellaris, Wall., also C. acumina (N.O. Rosaceae). [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 581.]

1838. — “We descended into the Khud, and I was amusing myself jumping from rock to rock, and thus passing up the centre of the brawling mountain stream, aided by my long pahāri pole of rau wood.”
—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 241; [also i. 112].

BOWNEE, s.

a. A fausse-braye, i.e. a subsidiary enceinte surrounding a fortified place on the outside of the proper wall and on the edge of the ditch; Hind. raoni. The word is not in Shakespear, Wilson, Platts or Fallon. But it occurs often in the narratives of Anglo-Indian siege operations. The origin of the word is obscure. [Mr. Irvine suggests Hind. rundhnd, 'to enclose as with a hedge', and says: "Fallon evidently knew nothing of the word rauni, for in his E. H. Dict. he translates fausse-braye by dhus, maiti kā pushkā; which also shows that he had no definite idea of what a fausse-braye was, dhus meaning simply an earthen or mud fort." Dr. Grieson suggests Hind. raman, 'a park,' of which the fem., i.e. diminutive, would be ramani or ronan; or possibly the word may come from Hind. ren, Skt. renu, 'sand,' meaning "an entrenchment of sand."]

1799. — “On the 20th I ordered a mine to be carried under (the glacis) because the guns could not bear on the ronsee.”
—Jas. Skinner's Mil. Memoirs, i. 172. J. B. Fraser, the editor of Skinner, parenthetically interprets ronsee here as 'counterscarp'; but that is nonsense, as well as incorrect.

b. This word also occurs as representative of the Burmese yo-wei-ni, or (in Arakan pron.) ro-wei-ni, ‘red-leaf,’ the technical name of the standard silver of the Burmese ingot currency, commonly rendered Flowered-silver.

1796.—“Bouni or fine silver, Ummersapoora currency.”—Notification in Seton-Karr, li. 179.

1800.—“The quantity of alloy varies in the silver current in different parts of the empire; at Rangoon it is adulterated 25 per cent.; at Ummersapoora, pure, or what is called flowered silver, is most common; in the latter all duties are paid. The modifications are as follows:

“Bouni, or pure silver.

Rownaka, 5 per cent. of alloy.”
Symes, 327.

ROWTEE, s. A kind of small tent with pyramidal roof, and no projection of fly, or eaves. Hind. rdofī.

[1813.—“... the military men, and others attached to the camp, generally possess a dwelling of somewhat more comfortable description, regularly made of two or three folds of cloth in thickness, closed at one end, and having a flap to keep out the wind and rain at the opposite one: these are dignified with the name of ruteseez, and come nearer (than the pawl) to our ideas of a tent.”—Brougham, Letters, ed. Constable, p. 20.

[1875.—“For the servants I had a good rauti of thick lined cloth.”—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 80.]

BOY, s. A common mode of writing the title rāsi (see RAJA); which sometimes occurs also as a family name, as in that of the famous Hindu Theist Rammohun Roy.

BOZA, s. Ar. rauda, Hind. rauza. Properly a garden; among the Arabs especially the rauza of the great mosque at Medina. In India it is applied to such mausolea as the Taj (generally called by the natives the Taj-rauza); and the mausoleum built by Aurungzib near Aurungzād.

1813.—“... the rauza, a name for the mausoleum, but implying something sanctified.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 41; [2nd ed. ii. 413].

BOYE, s. Hind. raḏī and raḏī; a coverlet quilted with cotton. The etymology is very obscure. It is spelt in Hind. with the Ar. letter ṭawd; and F. Johnson gives a Persian word so spelt as meaning ‘a cover for the head in winter.’ The kindred meaning of mirzā is apt to suggest a connection between the two, but this may be accidental, or the latter word factitious. We can see no likelihood in Shakespeare's suggestion that it is a corruption of an alleged Skt. ranjīkā, ‘cloth.’ [Platt gives the same explanation, adding “probably through Pers. rādzi,” from razīdan, ‘to dye.”]

The most probable suggestion perhaps is that raḏī was a word taken from the name of some person called Rāzī, who may have invented some variety of the article; as in the case of Spencer, Wellingtons, &c. A somewhat obscure quotation from the Pers. Dict. called Bahār-i-Ajam, extracted by Vullers (s.v.), seems to corroborate the suggestion of a personal origin of the word.

1784.—“... I have this morning ... received a letter from the Prince addressed to you, with a present of a red-leaf and a shawl handkerchief.”—Warren Hastings to his Wife, in Busteed, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 185.

1834.—“... I arrived in a small open pavilion at the top of the building, in which there was a small Brahminy oow, clothed in a wadded rauzd, and lying upon a carpet.”—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 135.

1887.—“... I had brought with me a soft quilted razī to sleep on, and with a rug wrapped round me, and sword and pistol under my head, I lay and thought long and deeply upon my line of action on the morrow.”—Lieut.-Col. Lexis, A Fly on the Wheel, 301.

RUBBEE, s. Ar. rābi, ‘the Spring.’ In India applied to the crops, or harvest of the crops, which are sown after the rains and reaped in the following spring or early summer. Such crops are wheat, barley, gram, linseed, tobacco, onions, carrots and turnips, &c. (See KRUBBEE.)

[1785.—“... we have granted them the Dewannyee (see DEWAUNTY) of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, from the beginning of the Fumal Robby of the Bengal year 1172. ...”—Firmans of Shah Ahmad, in Veleti, View of Bengal, App. 167.
RUBLE.

1866. — "It was in the month of November, when, if the rains closed early, irrigation is resorted to for producing the young ruphee crops." — Confessions of an Orderly, 179.

BUBLE, s. Russ. The silver unit of Russian currency, when a coin (not paper) equivalent to 3s. 14d.; [in 1901 about 2s. 14d.]. It was originally a silver ingot; see first quotation and note below.

1591. — "This penality or mulct is 20 dinges (see TANGA) or pence upon every ruphe or mark, and so ten in the hundred. . . . Hee (the Emperor) hath besides for every name conteyned in the write that passe out of their courts, five al嘞tent, an allee 5 pence stering or thereabouts." — Treatise of the Russian Commonwealth, by Dr. Giles Fletcher, Hak. Soc. 51.

c. 1654. — "Dog dollars they (the Russians) are not acquainted with, these being attended with loss . . . their own dinars they call Boubles." — Macartus, E.T. by Balfour, i. 280.

BUFFUGUE, s. P.—H. rafagar, Pers. raφa, ‘darning.’ The modern rafagar in Indian cities is a workman who repairs rents and holes in Kashmir shawls and other woollen fabrics. Such workmen were regularly employed in the cloth factories of the E.I. Co., to examine the manufactured clothes and remove petty defects in the weaving.

1750. — "On inspecting the Dacca goods, we found the Seerbetties (see PIECE-GOODS) very much frayed and very badly raφa-gird or joined." — Bengal Letter to E.I. Co., Feb. 25, India Office MSS.

* These ingots were called saum. Ibn Batuta says: "At one day’s journey from Uskak are the hills of the Rua, who are Christians; they have red hair and blue eyes, they are ugly in feature and crafty in character. They have silver mines, and they bring from their country saum, i.e. ingots of silver, with which they buy and sell in that country. The weight of each ingot is five ounces." —II. 414. Pegolotti (c. 1340), speaking of the land of China, says that on arriving at Cassai (i.e. Khiasy of Marco Polo or Hang-chau-fu) "you can dispose of the somai of silver that you have with you . . . and you may reckon the somai to be worth a golden florin" (see in Calhaya, &c. ii. 288-9, 293). It would appear from Wusaf, quoted by Hammer (Geschichte der Goldenen Horde, 224), that gold ingots also were called saum or saum. The ruble is still called saum in Turkistan.

1851. — "Rafu-gars are darners, who repair the cloths that have been damaged during bleaching. They join broken threads, remove knots from threads, &c." — Taylor, Cotton Manufacture of Dacca, 97.

RUM, s. This is not an Indian word. The etymology is given by Wedgwood as from a slang word of the 16th century, rume for ‘good’; rume-booze, ‘good drink’; and so, rum. The English word has always with us a note of vulgarity, but we may note here that Corresio in his Italian version of the Rāmāyana, whilst describing the Palace of Rāvana, is bold enough to speak of its being pervaded by "an odoriferous breeze, perfumed with sandalwood, and bdellium, with rum and with sirop" (iii. 282). "Mr. N. Darnell Davis has put forth a derivation of the word rum, which gives the only probable history of it. It came from Barbados, where the planters first distilled it, somewhere between 1640 and 1646. A MS. ‘Description of Barbados,’ in Trinity College, Dublin, written about 1661, says: ‘The chief fulding they make in the Island is Rumbullion, alias Kill-Divil, and this is made of sugar-canes distilled, a hot, hellish, and terrible liquor.’ G. Warren’s Description of Surinam, 1661, shows the word in its present short term: ‘Rum is a spirit extracted from the juice of sugar-canes . . . called Kill-Divil in New England!’ ‘Rambullion’ is a Devonshire word, meaning ‘a great tumult,’ and may have been adopted from some of the Devonshire settlers in Barbados; at any rate, little doubt can exist that it has given rise to our word rum, and the longer name rumbowling, which sailors give to their grog." — Academy, Sept. 5, 1885.

RUM-JOHNNY, s. Two distinct meanings are ascribed to this vulgar word, both, we believe, obsolete.

a. It was applied, according to Williamson, (V.M., i. 167) to a low class of native servants who plied on the wharves of Calcutta in order to obtain employment from new-comers. That author explains it as a corruption of Ramaţni, which he alleges to be one of the commonest of Mahomedan names. [The Merry-Jhony Gully of Calcutta (Carey, Good Old Days, 1.
139) perhaps in the same way derived its name from one Mir Jân.]

1810.—"Generally speaking, the present bánians, who attach themselves to the captains of European ships, may without the least hazard of controversy, be considered as nothing more or less than Rum-johnnies 'of a larger growth.'”—Williamson, V.M., i. 191.

b. Among soldiers and sailors, 'a prostitute'; from Hind. râmd-jâni, Skt. râmd-jâni, 'a pleasing woman,' 'a dancing-girl.'

[1799.—"... and the Râmjanîs (Hindu dancing women) have been all day dancing and singing before the idol."—Colebrooke, in Life, 158.]

1814.—"I lived near four years within a few miles of the solemn groves where those voluptuous devotees pass their lives with the râmjanîs or dancing-girls attached to the temples, in a sort of luxurious superstition and sanctified indolence unknown in colder climates."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 6; [2nd ed. ii. 127].

[1816.—"... But we must except that class of females called râvjannees, or dancing-girls, who are attached to the temples."—Asianic Journal, ii. 375, quoting Warden, Tour to Madras and China.]

RUMNA, s. Hind. râmna, Skt. râmaka, 'causing pleasure,' a chase, or reserved hunting-ground.

1760.—"Abdal Chab Cawn murdered at the Rûlna in the month of March, 1760, by some of the Hecaraahs...."—Van Sittart, i. 63.

1792.—"The Peahwa having invited me to a novel spectacle at his rumna (read rûmna), a large tract of country, about 30 miles from Poonaah...."—Sir C. Malet, in Forbes, Or. Mem. [2nd ed. ii. 82]. (See also verses quoted under PAWNEE.)

RUMNA (OF CUTCH), n.p. Hind. rûmna. This name, applied to the singular extent of sand-flat and salt-waste, often covered by high tides, or by land-floods, which extends between the Peninsula of Cutch and the mainland, is a corruption of the Skt. irîna or irîna, 'a salt-swamp, a desert,' or of arâayya, 'a wilderness.' The Rûnna is first mentioned in the Periplus, in which a true indication is given of this tract and its dangers.

c. A.D. 80-90.—"But after passing the Sinthus R. there is another gulph running to the north, not easily seen, which is called Irîno, and is distinguished into the Great and the Little. And there is an expanse of shallow water on both sides, and swift continnal odessey extending far from the land.”—Periplus, § 40.

1837.—"The guides had maliciously misled them into a place called the Kháchir-an. In this place all the land is impregnated with salt, to a degree impossible to describe."—Shamsi-Širdij-Ajîf, in Elliot, iii. 324.

1858.—"Muzaffar fled, and crossed the Rân, which is an inlet of the sea, and took the road to Jezâmir. In some places the breadth of the water of the Rân is 10 kos and 20 kos. He went into the country which they call Kach, on the other side of the water."—Tabâkhti-Akbar, Ibid. v. 440.

1869.—"Between Chiawaneh, Sircar Ahmedabad, Putten, and Surat, is a low tract of country, 40 kos in length, and in breadth from 7 to 30 kos, which is called Rum. Before the commencement of the periodical rains, the sea swells and inundates this spot, and leaves by degrees after the rainy season."—Ayens, ed. Gladaría, 1800, ii. 71; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 249].

1849.—"On the morning of the 24th I embarked and landed about 6 p.m. in the Rûn of Sindh.

"... a boggie syriea, neither sea Nor good dry land. ..."

Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 14.

RUPEE, a. Hind. rûpâya, from Skt. rûpâya, 'wrought silver.' The standard coin of the Anglo-Indian monetary system, as it was of the Mahommedan Empire that preceded ours. It is commonly stated (as by Wilson, in his article on this word, which contains much valuable and condensed information) that the rupee was introduced by Sher Šâh (in 1542). And this is, no doubt, formally true; but it is certain that a coin substantially identical with the rupee, i.e. approximating to a standard of 100 ratis (or 176 grains troy) of silver, an ancient Hindu standard, had been struck by the Mahommedan sovereigns of Delhi in the 13th and 14th centuries, and had formed an important part of their currency. In fact, the capital coins of Delhi, from the time of Iyaltimish (A.D. 1211-1236) to the accession of Mahommed Tughlak (1325) were gold and silver pieces, respectively of the weight just mentioned. We gather from the statements of Ibn Batuta and his contemporaries that the gold coin, which the former generally calls tanga and sometimes gold dinár, was worth 10 of the silver coin, which he calls dinár, thus indicating that the relation of gold to silver value was, or had recently been, as
10. 1. Mahommed Tughlak remodelled the currency, issuing gold pieces of 200 grs. and silver pieces of 140 grs.—an indication probably of a great "depreciation of gold" (to use our modern language) consequent on the enormous amount of gold bullion obtained from the plunder of Western and Southern India. Some years later (1380) Mahommed developed his notable scheme of a forced currency, consisting entirely of copper tokens. This threw everything into confusion, and it was not till six years later that any sustained issues of ordinary coin were recommenced. From about this time the old standard of 175 grs. was readopted for gold, and was maintained till the time of Sher Shâh. But it does not appear that the old standard was then resumed for silver. In the reign of Mahommed's successor Feroz Shâh, Mr. E. Thomas's examples show the gold coin of 175 grs. standard running parallel with continued issues of a silver (or professedly silver) coin of 140 grs.; and this, speaking briefly, continued to be the case to the end of the Lodî dynasty (i.e., 1526). The coinage seems to have sunk into a state of great irregularity, not remedied by Baber (who struck ashrafs (see ASH-RAFEEM and dirhama, such as were used in Turkestan) or Humâyûn, but the reform of which was undertaken by Sher Shâh, as above mentioned.

His silver coin of 175-178 grs. was that which popularly obtained the name of rápiya, which has continued to our day. The weight, indeed, of the coins so styled, never very accurate in native times, varied in different States, and the purity varied still more. The former never went very far on either side of 170 grs., but the quantity of pure silver contained in it sunk in some cases as low as 140 grs., and even, in exceptional cases, to 100 grs. Variation however was not confined to native States. Rupees were struck in Bombay at a very early date of the British occupation. Of these there are four specimens in the Br. Mus. The first bears obv. 'THE RUPEE OF BOMBAY. 1677. By AUTHORITY OF CHARLES THE SECOND; rev. 'A. DEO. PAX. ET. INCREMENTUM.—MON. BOMBAY. ANG. REIGIUS.' A* 7.' Weight 177.8 gr. The fourth bears obv. 'HON. SOC. ANG. IND. ORI.' with a shield; rev. 'A. DEO. PAX. ET. INCREMENTUM.—MON. BOMBAY. ANG. REIGIUS.' A* 7.' Weight 177.8 gr. Different Rupees minted by the British Government were current in the three Presidencies, and in the Bengal Presidency several were current; viz. the Sikka (see SICCA) Rupee, which latterly weighed 192 grs., and contained 176 grs. of pure silver; the Furrakhshâd, which latterly weighed 180 grs.,* containing 165-215 of pure silver; the Benares Rupee (up to 1819), which weighed 174-76 grs., and contained 168-885 of pure silver. Besides these there was the Chaldâni or 'current' rupee of account, in which the Company's accounts were kept, of which 116 were equal to 100 sikkas. ["The bhori or Company's Arcot rupee was coined at Cuttack, and was in value 3½ per cent. less than the Sikka rupee." (Beveridge, Bakarganj, 99.) The Bombay Rupee was adopted from that of Surat, and from 1800 its weight was 178-32 grs.; its pure silver 164.94. The Rupee at Madras (where however the standard currency was of an entirely different character, see PAGODA) was originally that of the Nawâb of the Carnatic (or 'Nabob of Arcot') and was usually known as the Arcot Rupee. We find its issues varying from 171 to 177 grs. in weight, and from 160 to 170 of pure silver; whilst in 1811 there took place an abnormal coinage, from Spanish dollars, of rupees with a weight of 188 grs. and 169-20 of pure silver.

Also from some reason or other, perhaps from commerce between those places and the 'Coast,' the Chittagong and Dacca currency (i.e. in the extreme east of Bengal) "formerly consisted of Arcot rupees; and they were for some time coined expressly for those districts at the Calcutta and

* The term Sonaut rupees, which was of frequent occurrence down to the reformation and unification of the Indian coinage in 1835, is one very difficult to elucidate. The word is properly sanaati, pl. of Ar. sanat(f), a year. According to the old practice in Bengal, coins deteriorated in value, in comparison with the rupee of account, when they passed the third year of their currency, and these rupees were termed Sanaati or Sonaut. But in 1778, to put a stop to this inconvenience, Government determined that all rupees coined in future should bear the impression of the 14th or year of Shâh 'Alam (the Mogul then reigning). And in all later uses of the term Sonaut it appears to be equivalent in value to the Furrakhshâd rupee, or the modern 'Company's Rupee" (which was of the same standard).
These examples will give some idea of the confusion that prevailed (without any reference to the vast variety besides of native coinages), but the subject is far too complex to be dealt with minutely in the space we can afford to it in such a work as this. The first step to reform and assimilation took place under Regulation VII. of 1833, but this still maintained the exceptional SICCA in Bengal, though assimilating the rupees over the rest of India. The SICCA was abolished as a coin by Act XIII. of 1836; and the universal rupee of British territory has since been the "Company's Rupee," as it was long called, of 180 grs. weight and 160 pure silver, representing therefore in fact the Parakkhabdool Rupee.

1615.—"Rupias Jangars (Jahangir's) of 100 piece, which goeth four for five ordinary roupies of 80 pieces called Cassanes (see KUZZANNA), and we value them at 2s. 4d. per piece: Cassus (see SICCA) of Amadavur which goeth for 86 pieces; Challenges of Agra, which goeth for 88 pieces."—Postier, Letters, iii. 87.[8]

1616.—"Rupias monetae genus est, quem singulas xxvi assibus gallicis aut circiter aequivalent."—Jarrie, iii. 83. But as for his Government of Patan only, he gave the King eleven Leckes of Rupias (the Rupia is two shillings, twopence sterling)... wherein he had Regall Authoritie to take what he listed, which was esteemed at five thousand horse, the pay of every one at two hundred Rupias by the years."—Sir R. Roe, in Purchas, i. 546; [Hak. Soc. i. 299, with some differences of reading].

"They call the pieces of money ROOPES, of which there are some of divers values, the meanest worth two shillings and threepence, and the best two shillings and ninepence sterling."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

"This money, consisting of the two-shilling pieces of this country called ROOPES."—Postier, Letters, iv. 229.

1848.—"Reducing the Rupie to four and twenty Holland Stuyvers."—Van Twist, 26.

1853.—"Rupie est vne monnoye des Indes de la valeur de 80c." (i.e. sous).—De la Boutlaye-le-Gous, ed. 1657, p. 355.

[1666.—"And for a Roupy (in Bengal) which is about half a Crown, you may have 20 good Pullets and more; Geese and Ducks, in proportion."—Bernier, E.T. p. 140; [ed. Contable, 438].

1673.—"The other was a Goldsmith, who had coined copper RUPEES."—Fryer, 97.

1677.—"We do, by these Presents... give and grant unto the said Governor and Company... full and free Liberty, Power, and Authority... to stamp and coin... Monies, to be called and known by the Name or Names of RUPEES, Pieces, and Budgrooks, or by such other Name or Names..."—Letters Patent of Charles II. In Charters of the E.I. Co., p. 111.

1771.—"We fear the worst however; that is, that the Government are about to interfere with the Company in the management of Affairs in India. Whenever that happens it will be high Time for us to decamp. I know the Temper of the King's Officers pretty well, and however they may decry our manner of acting they are ready enough to grasp at the RUPEES whenever they fall within their Reach."—M.S. Letter of James Rennell, March 31.

BUSSUD, s. Pers. rasad. The provisions of grain, forage, and other necessaries got ready by the local officers at the camping ground of a military force or official cortège. The vernacular word has some other technical meanings (see Wilson), but this is its meaning in an Anglo-Indian mouth.

[c. 1640-50.—Rasad. (See under TANA.)

BUT, s. Hind. rathi, 'a chariot.' Now applied to a native carriage drawn by a pony, or oxen, and used by women on a journey. Also applied to the car in which idols are carried forth on festival days. [See BOOK.]

[1810-17.—"Tippoo's Aumil... wanted iron, and determined to supply himself from the rut, (a temple of carved wood fixed on wheels, drawn in procession on public occasions, and requiring many thousand persons to effect its movement)."—Wilts, Sketches, Madras reprint, ii. 281.

[1813.—"In this camp hackeries and ruths, as they are called when they have four wheels, are always drawn by bullocks, and are used, almost exclusively, by the Baces, the Nach girls, and the bankers."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 117.]

[1829.—"This being the case I took the liberty of taking the rut and horse to camp as prize property."—Mem. of John Skipp, ii. 183.

BUTTEE, BETTEE, s. Hind. ratti, rati, Skt. rakthd, from rakta, 'red.' The seed of a leguminous creeper (Abrus precatorius, L.) sometimes called country liquorice— a pretty scarlet pea with a black spot—used from time immemorial in India as a goldsmith’s weight, and known in England as ‘Crab’s eyes.’ Mr. Thomas has shown that the ancient rāți may be taken as equal to 1.75 grs. Troy (Numismata Orientalia, New ed., pt. i. pp. 12-14).

This work of Mr. Thomas contains interesting information regarding the old Indian custom of basing standard weights upon the weight of seeds, and we borrow from his paper the following extract from Manu (vii. 132): “The very small mote which may be discerned in a sunbeam passing through a lattice is the first of quantities, and men call it a trasārenu. 133. Eight of these trasārenus are supposed equal in weight to one minute poppy-seed (ilchyd), three of those seeds are equal to one black mustard-seed (rāja-sarshapa), and three of these last to a white mustard-seed (gaurasarshapa).” 134. Six white mustard-seeds are equal to a middle-sized barley-corn (yava), three such barley-corns to one krishnala (or rāttika), five krishnala of gold are one māsha, and sixteen such māshas one swarna,” &c. (ibid. p. 19). In the Ain, Abul Fazl calls the ratti surkh, which is a translation (Pers. for ‘red’). In Persia the seed is called chashm-i-kurūs, ‘Cock’s eye’ (see Blochmann’s E.T., i. 16 n., and Jarrett, ii. 354). Further notices of the ratti used as a weight for precious stones will be found in Sir W. Elliot’s Coins of Madras (p. 49). Sir Walter’s experience is that the ratti of the gem-dealers is a double ratti, and an approximation to the manjadi (see Mangelin). This accounts for Tavernier’s valuation at 3½ grs. [Mr. Ball gives the weight at 2.66 Troy grs. (Tavernier, ii. 448).]

C. 1676.—“At the mine of Soumelpour in Bengal, they weigh by Rati’s, and the Rati is seven eighths of a Carat, or three grains and a half.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 140; [ed. Ball, ii. 39].

RYOT. s. Ar. ra’iyat, from ra’d, ‘to pasture,’ meaning originally, according to its etymology, ‘a herd at pasture’; but then ‘subjects’ (collectively). It is by natives used for ‘a subject’ in India, but its specific Anglo-Indian application is to ‘a tenant of the soil’; an individual occupying land as a farmer or cultivator. In Turkey the word, in the form raiya, is applied to the Christian subjects of the Porte, who are not liable to the conscription, but pay a poll-tax in lieu, the Khardj, or Neyya (see Jezya).

[1809.—“Riats or clowns.” (See under DOAL.)]

1776.—“For some period after the creation of the world there was neither Magistrate nor Punishment . . . and the Ryots were nourished with piety and morality.”—Hathed, Gentio Code, 41.

1789.—“To him in a body the Ryots complain’d That their houses were burnt, and their cattle drain’d.”

The Letters of Simpkin the Second, &c. xi. 1790.—“A raiyat is rather a farmer than a husbandman.”—Coblebrook, in Life, 42.

1809.—“The ryots were all at work in their fields.”—Lord Valentia, ii. 127.

1813.—“And oft around the cavern fire On visionary schemes debate, To snatch the Rayahs from their fate.”

Byron, Bride of Abydos.

1820.—“An acquaintance with the customs of the inhabitants, but particularly of the rayets, the various tenures . . . the agreements usual among them regarding cultivation, and between them and soucaris (see Sowcar) respecting loans and advances . . . is essential to a judge.”—Sir T. Munro, in Life, ii. 17.

1870.—“Ryot is a word which is much . . . misused. It is Arabic, but no doubt comes through the Persian. It means ‘protected one,’ ‘subject,’ ‘a commoner,’ as distinguished from ‘Rases’ or ‘noble.’ In a native mouth, to the present day, it is used in this sense, and not in that of tenant.”—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 166.

The title of a newspaper, in English but of native editing, published for some years back in Calcutta, corresponds to what is here said; it is Races and Raiyat.

1877.—“The great financial distinction between the followers of Islam . . . and the rayahs or infidel subjects of the Sultan, was the payment of harath or capitación tax.”—Finlay, II. of Greece, p. 22 (ed. 1877).

1884.—“Using the rights of conquest after the fashion of the Normans in England, the Turks had everywhere, except in the Cyclades . . . seized on the greater part of the most fertile lands. Hence they formed the landlord class of Greece; whilst the Bayahs, as the Turks style their non-Musulman subjects, usually farmed the territories of their masters on the metayer system.”—Murray’s Handbook for Greece (by A. F. Yule), p. 54.
RYOTWARY, adj. A technicality of modern coinage. Hind. from Pers. ra'iayat, derived from the preceding. The ryotwary system is that under which the settlement for land revenue is made directly by the Government agency with each individual cultivator holding land, not with the village community, nor with any middleman or landlord, payment being also received directly from every such individual. It is the system which chiefly prevails in the Madras Presidency; and was elaborated there in its present form mainly by Sir T. Munro.

1824.—"It has been objected to the ryotwary system that it produces unequal assessment and destroys ancient rights and privileges; but these opinions seem to originate in some misapprehension of its nature."—Minutes, &c., of Sir T. Munro, i. 265. We may observe that the spelling here is not Munro's. The Editor, Sir A. Arbuthnot, has followed running in this as Sir T. Munro, which is a common blunder. The system of land revenue is now made directly by the Government of Hindostan, not with the cultivator holding land, but with any middleman or landlord, payment being also received directly from every such individual.

SABAIO, ĆABAIO, &c., n.p. The name generally given by the Portuguese writers to the Mahommedan prince who was in possession of Goa when they arrived in India, and who had lived much there. He was in fact that one of the captains of the Bahmaní kingdom of the Deccan who, in the division that took place on the decay of the dynasty towards the end of the 16th century, became the founder of the 'Adil Sháhí family which reigned in Bijapur from 1489 to the end of the following century (see IDALCÁN). His real name was Abdul Muzaffar Yusuf, with the surname Sabá or Savá. There does not seem any ground for rejecting the intelligent statement of De Barros (II. v. 2) that he had this name from being a native of Savá in Persia [see Bombay Gazetteer, xxiii. 404]. Garcia de Orta does not seem to have been aware of this history, and he derives the name from Sáhib (see below), apparently a mere guess, though not an unnatural one. Mr. Birch's surmise (Albuquerque, ii. 82), with these two old and obvious sources of suggestion before him, that the word may possibly be connected with sipáhi, Arabic, a soldier, is quite inadmissible (nor is sipáhi Arabic). [On this word Mr. Whiteway writes: "In his explanation of this word Sir H. Yule has been misled by Barros. Couto (Dec. iv. Bk. 10 ch. 4) is conclusive, where he says: 'This Çuúf extended the limits of his rule as far as he could till he went in person to conquer the island of Goa, which was a valuable possession for its income, and was in possession of a lord of Canara, called Savá, a vassal of the King of Canara, who then had his headquarters at what we call Old Goa. ... As there was much jungle here, Savá, the lord of Goa, had certain houses where he stayed for hunting. ... These houses still preserve the memory of the Hindu Savá, as they are called the Saváyo's house, where for many years the Governors of India lived. As our João de Barros could not get true information of these things, he confused the name of the Hindu Savá with that of Çuó (¿ Yúsuf) Adil Sháh, saying in the 5th Book of his 2nd Decade that when we went to India a Moor called Savá was lord of Goa, that we ordinarily called him Saváyo, and that he was a vassal of the King of the Deccan, a Persian, and native of the city of Savá. At this his sons laughed heartily when we read it to them, saying that their father was anything but a Turk, and his name anything but Çuúf.' This passage makes it clear that the origin of the word is the Hindu title Śivá, Hind. Savá, 'having the excess of a fourth,' 'a quarter better than other people,' which is one of the titles of the Mahárájá of Jaypur. To show that it was more or less well known, I may point to the little State of Sunda, which lay close to Goa on the S.E., of which the Rája was of the Vijayanagar family. This little State became independent after the destruction of Vijayanagar, and remained in existence till absorbed by Tippoo Sultan. In this State Ćivá was a common honorific of the ruling family. At the same time Barros was not alone in calling Adil Sháh the Sabaio (see Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 24), where the name occurs. The mistake having been made, everyone accepted it."]
There is a story, related as unquestionable by Firishta, that the Sabaio was in reality a son of the Turkish Sultan Aga Murad (or 'Amurath') II., who was saved from murder at his father's death, and placed in the hands of 'Imad-nd-din, a Persian merchant of Sava, by whom he was brought up. In his youth he sought his fortune in India, and being sold as a slave, and going through a succession of adventures, reached his high position in the Deccan (Briggs, Firishta, iii. 7-8).

1510.—"But when Afonso Dalboquerque took Goa, it would be about 40 years more or less since the Cabalo had taken it from the Hindoos."—Dalboquerque, ii. 96.

"In this island (Goa called Goga) there is a fortress near the sea, walled round about our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain called Svaivu, who has 400 Mameluks, he himself being also a Mameluuke. . . ."—Varthema, 116.

1516.—"Going further along the coast there is a very beautiful river, which sends two arms into the sea, making between them an island, on which stands the city of Goa belonging to Daymem (Deccan), and it was a principality of itself with other districts adjoining in the interior; and in it there was a great Lord, as vassal of the said King (of Deccan) called Saborio, who being a good soldier, well mannered and experienced in war, this lordship of Goa was bestowed upon him, that he might continually make war on the King of Narsinga, as he did until his death. And then he left this city to his son Cabaym Hydalcan. . . ."

—Barros, Lisbon ed. 257.

1583.—"O. . . . And returning to our subject, as Adol in Persian means 'justice,' they called the prince of these territories Adelham, as it were 'Lord of Justice.'

"R. A name highly inappropriate, for neither he nor the rest of them are wont to do justice. But tell me also why in Spain they call him the Sabaio!"

"O. Some have told me that he was so called because they used to call a Captain by this name; but I afterwards came to know that in fact saib in Arabic means 'lord.' . . ."—Garcia, f. 36.

SABLE-FISH. See HILSA.

SADRES, SADRASPATAM, n.p. This name of a place 42 m. south of Mudras, the seat of an old Dutch factory, was probably shaped into the usual form in a sort of conformity with Madras or Madrasapatam. The correct name is Sadura, but it is sometimes made into Sadrang- and Shatranj-patam. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tam. Shathuranoppatam, Skt. chatur-anga, 'the four military arms, infantry, cavalry, elephants and cars.'] Fryer (p. 28) calls it Sandrasalapatam, which is probably a misprint for Sandrasapatam.

1672.—"From Trepnoplier you come . . . to Sadrasapatam, where our people have a Factory."—Baldens, 152.

1726.—"The name of the place is properly Sadrangapatam; but for short it is also called Sadrapatam, and most commonly Sadraspatam. In the Tellings it indicates the name of the founder, and in Persian it means 'thousand troubles' or the Shaboard which we call chess."—Valentijn, Choromandel, 11. The curious explanation of Shatranj or 'chess,' as 'a thousand troubles,' is no doubt some popular etymology; such as P. sad-vaio, 'a hundred griefs.' The word is really of Sanskrit origin, from Chaturanga, literally, 'quadruplicate'; the four constituent parts of an army, viz. horse, foot, chariots and elephants.

[1727.—"Saderas, or Saderas Patam." (See under LONG-CLOTH.)]

1780.—"J'avais pensé que Sadra au-roit été le lieu où devaient finir mes con- trariété et mes courses."—Haufner, p. 141.

"... Non, je ne suis point Anglais," m'écrit-je avec indignation et transport; 'je suis un Hollandais de Sadingapatam.'—Ibid. 191.

1781.—"The chief officer of the French now despatched a summons to the English commandant of the Fort to surrender, and the commandant, not being of opinion he could resist . . . evacuated the fort, and proceeded by sea in boats to Sudrang Puttan."—H. of Hyder Nuit, 447.

SAFFLOWER, s. The flowers of the annual Carthamus tinctorius, L. (N.O. Compositae), a considerable article of export from India for use of a red dye, and sometimes, from the resemblance of the dried flowers to saffron, termed 'bastard saffron.' The colouring matter of safflower is the basis of rouge. The name is a curious modification of words by the 'striving after meaning.' For it points, in the first half of the name, to the analogy with saffron, and in the second half, to the object of trade being a flower. But neither one nor the other of these meanings forms any real element in the word. Safflower appears to be an eventual corruption of the Arabic name of the thing, 'usfär. This word we find in medieval trade-books (e.g. in Pegolotti) to take various forms such as asflore, esfrole, uisflure, saffrole, saffore; from the last of which the transition to safflower is natural. In the old Latin translation of Avicenna, it seems to be called Crocus hortulanus, for the corresponding Arabic is given hasfar. Another Arabic name for this article is kurtum, which we presume to be the origin of the botanist's carthamus. In Hind. it is called kusumbha or kusum. Bretschneider remarks that though the two plants, saffron and safflower, have not the slightest resemblance, and belong to two different families and classes of the nat. system, there has been a certain confusion between them among almost all nations, including the Chinese.

c. 1200.—"Usfur ... Abu Hanifa. This plant yields a colouring matter, used in dyeing. There are two kinds, cultivated and wild, both of which grow in Arabia, and the seeds of which are called al-kurtum."—Ibn Baithar, ii. 186.

c. 1343.—Afflora vuol esser fresco, e ascutto, e colorito rosso in colore di buon saffranero, e non giallo, e chiaro a modo di femminella di saffranero, e che non sia trasandato, che quando e vecchio e trasandato si spolverizza, e fae vermini.—Pogolotti, 372.

1612.—"The two Indian ships aforesaid did discharge these goods following ... orsafi, which is a red die, great quantity.—Capt. Saris, in Purchas, i. 347.

[1667-8.—... madder. saffower, argoll, castoreum.—List of Goods imported in Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 76.]

1810.—"Le safran bâtard ou carthame, nommé dans le commerce safranum, est appelé par les Arabes ... safour ou ...—Siv. de Sacy, note on Abdallatif, p. 123.

1813.—*"Safflower (Cussum, Hind., A4four Arab.). The flower of an annual plant, the Carthamus tinctorius, growing in Bengal and other parts of India, which when well-cured is not easily distinguishable from saffron by the eye, though it has nothing of its smell or taste."—Mulburn, ii. 233.

Saffron. s. Arab. saffarun. The true saffron (Crocus sativus, L.) in India is cultivated in Kashmir only. In South India this name is given to turmeric, which the Portuguese called açafrao da terra ('country saffron'). The Hind. name is haldai, or in the Deccan halad; [Skt. haridra, harry, 'green, yellow']. Garcia de Orta calls it croco Indiano, 'Indian saffron.' Indeed, Dozy shows that the Arab. kurtum for turmeric (whence the bot. Lat. curcuma) is probably taken from the Greek krēkos or obl. krēkon.

Moodeen Sherif says that kurkum is applied to saffron in many Persian and other writers.

c. 1200.—"The Persians call this root al-Hard, and the inhabitants of Basra call it al-Kurtum, and al-Kurtum is Saffron. They call these plants saffron because they dye yellow in the same way as Saffron does."—Ibn Baithar, ii. 370.

1663.—"R. Since there is nothing else to be said on this subject, let us speak of what we call 'country saffron.' "O. This is a medicine that should be spoken of, since it is in use by the Indian physicians; it is a medicine and article of trade much exported to Arabia and Persia. In this city (Goa) there is little of it, but much in Malabar, i.e. in Cananor and Calicut. The Canarins call the root alad; and the Malabars sometimes give it the same name, but more properly call it mangle, and the Malays cukek. The Persians, darard, which is as much as to say 'yellow-wood.' The Arabs call it habet; and all of them, each in turn, say that this saffron does not exist in Persia, nor in Arabia, nor in Turkey, except what comes from India."—Garci, f. 78r. Further on he identifies it with curcuma.

1728.—"Cureuma, or Indian Saffron."—Valentijm, Chor. 42.

Sagar-Pesha, s. Camp-followers, or the body of servants in a private establishment. The word, though usually pronounced in vulgar Hind. as written above, is Pers. shagird-pesha (lit. shagird, 'a disciple, a servant,' and pesha, 'business').

[1767.—*"Saggur Depessah-pay ... ."—In Long, 513.]

Sago, s. From Malay sago. The farinaceous pith taken out of the stem of several species of a particular genus of palm, especially Metroxylon sacra Mart., and M. Rumphi, Wild, found in every part of the Indian Archipelago, including the Philippines, wherever there is proper soil. They are most abundant in the eastern part of the region indicated, including the Moluccas and N. Guinea, which probably formed the original habitat; and in these they supply the sole bread of the natives. In the remaining parts of the Archipelago, sago is the food only of certain wild tribes, or consumed (as in Mindanao) by the poor only, or prepared (as at Singapore, &c.) for export. There are supposed to be five species producing the article.

1298.—*"They have a kind of trees that produce flour, and excellent flour it is for... food. These trees are very tall and thick, but have a very thin bark, and inside the bark they are crammed with flour."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi.

1330.—"But as for the trees which produce flour, tis after this fashion... And the result is the best pasta in the world, from which they make whatever they choose, cates of sorts, and excellent bread, of which I, Friar Odoric, have eaten."—Fr. Odoric, in Casley, &c., p. 32.

1522.—"Their bread (in Tidore) they make of the wood of a certain tree like a palm-tree, and they make it in this way. They take a piece of this wood, and extract from it certain long black thorns which are situated there; then they pound it, and make bread of it which they call sagu. They make provision of this bread for their sea voyages."—Pigaiaeta, Hak. Soc. p. 136. This is a bare description, and seems to refer to the Sagwire, not the true sago-tree.

1552.—"There are also other trees which are called sago, from the pith of which bread is made."—Castaneda, vi. 24.

1553.—"Generally, although they have some millet and rice, all the people of the Islands of Maluco eat a certain food which they call Sagu, which is the pith of a tree like a palm-tree, except that the leaf is softer and smoother, and the green of it is rather dark."—Barros, III. v. 5.

1579.—"... and a Kind of meal which they call Sagu, made of the toppe of certaine trees, tasting in the Mouth like some curds, but melts away like sugar."—Drake's Voyage, Hak. Soc. p. 142.

Also in a list of "Certaine Worldes of the Naturlall Language of Isaua"; "Sagu, bread of the Country."—Hakl. iv. 246.

c. 1600.—"Primo Saguus genuina, Malacie Sahu, sive Lapia tuni, h.e. vera Sagu."—Rumphius, i. 75. (We cannot make out the language of Lapia tuni.)

1727.—"And the inland people subsist mostly on Sagow, the Pith of a small Twig split and dried in the Sun."—A. Hamilton, ii. 93; [ed. 1744].

SAGWIRE. 781 SAHIB.

Sagwire, s. A name applied often in books, and, formerly at least, in the colloquial use of Europeans settlers and traders, to the Gomuti palm or Arenga saccharifera, Labill., which abounds in the Ind. Archipelago, and is of great importance in its rural economy. The name is Port. sagueira (analogous to palmeira), in Span. of the Indies saguran, and no doubt is taken from sago, as the tree, though not the Sago-palm of commerce, affords a sago of inferior kind. Its most important product, however, is the sap, which is used as toddy (q.v.), and which in former days also afforded almost all the sugar used by natives in the islands. An excellent cordage is made from a substance resembling black horse-hair, which is found between the trunk and the fronds, and this is the gomuti of the Malays, which furnished one of the old specific names (Borassus Gomutius, Loureiro). There is also found in a like position a fine cotton-like substance which makes excellent tinder, and strong stiff spines from which pens are made, as well as arrows for the blow-pipe, or Sumpitan (see Barberane). "The seeds have been made into a confection, whilst their pulpy envelope abounds in a poisonous juice—used in the barbarian wars of the natives—to which the Dutch gave the appropriate name of 'hell-water'" (Crawfurdi, Des. Dict. p. 146). The term sagwire is sometimes applied to the toddy or palm-wine, as will be seen below.

1515.—"They use no sustenance except the meal of certain trees, which trees they call Sagur, and of this they make bread."—Giov. da Empoli, 86.

1615.—"(We cannot make out the title by which, all over India, European gentlemen, and it may be said Europeans generally, are addressed, and spoken of, when no disrespect is intended, by natives. It is also the general title (at least where Hindustani or Persian is used) which is affixed to the name or office of a European, corresponding thus rather to Monsieur than to Mr. For Colonel Sahib, Collector Sahib, Lord Sahib, and even Sergeant Sahib are thus used, as well as the general vocative Sahib! 'Sir!' In other Hind. use the word is equivalent to 'Master'; and it is occasionally used as a specific title both among Hindus and Musulmans, e.g. Appa Sahib, Tipa Sahib; and generically is affixed to the titles of men of rank when indicated by those titles, as Khan Sahib, Nawab Sahib, Raja Sahib. The word is Arabic, and originally means 'a companion'; (sometimes a companion of Mahomed). [In the Arabian Nights it is the title of a Wazir (Burton, i. 218).]

1673.—"... To which the subtle Heather replied, Sahib (i.e. Sir), why will you do more than the Creator meant?"—Fryer, 417.

1689.—"Thus the distracted Husband in his Indian English confest, English fashion, Sahib, best fashion, have one Wife best for one Husband."—Ovington, 926.

1853.—"He was told that a 'Sahib' wanted to speak with him."—Oakfield, ii. 252.

1878.—"... forty Elephants and five Sahibs with guns and innumerable followers."—Life in the Mufussil, i. 194.

[ST. DEAVES, n.p. A corruption of the name of the island of Sandwip in the Bay of Bengal, situated off the coast of Chittagong and Noakhali, which is best known in connection with the awful loss of life and property in the cyclone of 1876.

[1868.—"From Chittagonga we sailed away the 28th January, after had sent small vessels to search round the island St. Deaves."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxxx.]

a. An English sailor's corruption, which for a long time maintained its place in our maps. It is the Sindan of the old Arab Geographers, and was the first durable settling-place of the Parsee refugees on their emigration to India in the 8th century. [Dossa-bhai Framji, Hist. of the Parseis, i. 30.]

The proper name of the place, which is in lat. 20° 12' and lies 88 m. north of Bombay, is apparently Soydan (see Hist. of Cambay, in Bo. Govt. Selections, No. xxvi., N.S., p. 52), but it is commonly called Sanjan. E. B. Eastwick in J. Bo. As. Soc. R. i. 167, gives a Translation from the Persian of the "Kijsab-i-Sanjan, or History of the arrival and settlement of the Parsees in India." Sanjan is about 3 m. from the little river-mouth port of Umbargarh. "Evidence of the greatness of Sanjan is found, for miles around, in old foundations and bricks. The bricks are of very superior quality."—Bomb. Gazetteer, vol. xiv. 302, [and for medieval references to the place, ibid. I. Pt. i. 262, 620 seq.].

b. ST. JOHN'S ISLAND, n.p.

This again is a corruption of Sanj.
Shan, or more correctly Shang-chuang, the Chinese name of an island about 60 or 70 miles S.W. of Macao, and at some distance from the mouth of the Canton River, the place where St. Francis Xavier died, and was originally buried.

1637.—"We came Anchor the same Day, on the N.E. end of St. John's Island. This Island is in Lat. about 32 d. 30 min. North, lying on the S. Coast of the Province of Quantung or Canton in China."—Dampier, i. 406.

1727.—"A Portoguese Ship . . . being near an Island on that Coast, called after St. Juan, some Gentlemen and Priests went ashore for Diversion, and accidentally found the Saint's Body uncorrupted, and carried it Passenger to Goa."—A. Hamilton, i. 252 ; [ed. 1744, ii. 255].

1730.—"St. John's," in Dunn's New Directory, 472.

c. ST. JOHN'S ISLANDS. This is also the chart-name, and popular European name, of two islands about 6 m. S. of Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo Sikajang, or as Denvys (Desc. Dict. 321) writes the word, Pulo Skiijang.

SAIVA, s. A worshipping of Ñiva; Skt. Ñêiva, adj., 'belonging to Ñiva.'

1631.—"The second sect of the Bramins, 'Beivi' . . . by name, say that a certain Eswara is the supreme among the gods, and that all the others are subject to him."—Rogerius, 17.

1837.—"This temple is reckoned, I believe, the holiest in India, at least among the Shaivites."—By. Mitman, in Memoirs, p. 48.

SALA, s. Hind. sadā, 'brother-in-law,' i.e. wife's brother; but used elliptically as a low term of abuse.

[1856.—"Another reason (for infanticide) is the blind pride which makes them hate that any man should call them sala, or Susseor—brother-in-law, or father-in-law."—Forbes, Râs Mâla, ed. 1878, 616.]

1881.—"Another of these popular Paris sayings is 'et ta seur!' which is as insulting a remark to a Parisian as the apparently harmless remark skâl, 'brother-in-law,' is to a Hindoo."—Sat. Rev., Sept. 10, 326.

SALAAM, s. A salutation; properly oral salutation of Mahommedans to each other. Arab. salâm, 'peace.' Used for any act of salutation; or for 'compliments.'

[c. 60 B.C. —

1648.—". . . this salutation they call salam ; and it is made with bending of the body, and laying of the right hand upon the head."—Van Twist, 55.

1857.—"The Salam of the Religious Bramins, is to join their Hands together, and spreading them first, make a motion towards their Head, and then stretch them out."—Owington, 183.

1694.—"The Town Conicopolies, and chief inhabitants of Egmure, came to make their Salaams to the President."—Wheeler, i. 281.

1717.—"I wish the Priests in Tranquebar a Thousand fold Schaliam."—Philipp's Acc. 62.

1809.—"The old priest was at the door, and with his head uncovered, to make his salaams."—Ed. Valencia, i. 273.

1818.—
"'Ho! who art thou! —This low salam Replies, of Moesin faith I am.'— Byron, The Giaour.

1832.—"Il me rendit tous les salaams que je fis autrefois au Grand Mogol."—Jacquesmont, Corresp. ii. 187.

1844.—"All chiefs who have made their salaams are entitled to carry arms personally."—O. of Sir C. Napier, 2.

SALAK, s. A singular-looking fruit, sold and eaten in the Malay regions, described in the quotation.
It is the fruit of a species of ratan (Salacca edulis), of which the Malay name is rotan-salak.

1788-71. — "The salac (Calamus rotyang salarce) which is the fruit of a prickly bush, and has a singular appearance, being covered with scales, like those of a lizard; it is nutritious and well tasted, in flavour somewhat resembling a raspberry." — Saurinus, E.T. i. 241.

SALEB, SALEP, s. This name is applied to the tubers of various species of orchis found in Europe and Asia, which from ancient times have had a great reputation as being restorative and highly nutritious. This reputation seems originally to have rested on the 'doctrine of signatures,' but was due partly no doubt to the fact that the mucilage of saleb has the property of forming, even with the addition of 40 parts of water, a thick jelly. Good modern authorities quite disbelieve in the virtues ascribed to saleb, though a decoction of it, spiced and sweetened, makes an agreeable drink for invalids. Saleb is identified correctly by Ibn Baithar with the Satyrium of Dioscorides and Galen. The full name in Ar. (analogous to the Greek orchis) is Khushal-thalab, i.e. 'testiculus vulpis'; but it is commonly known in India as salab miri, i.e. Saleb of Egypt, or popularly salep-miry. In Upper India saleb is derived from various species of Euclophia, found in Kashmir and the lower Himalaya. Saloop, which is, or used to be, supplied hot in winter mornings by itinerant vendors in the streets of London, is, we believe, a representative of Saleb; but we do not know from what it is prepared. [In 1889 a correspondent to Notes & Queries (7 ser. vii. 35) stated that "within the last twenty years saloop vendors might have been seen plying their trade in the streets of London. The term saloop was also applied to an infusion of the sassafras bark or wood. In Pereira's Materia Medica, published in 1850, it is stated that 'sassafras tea, flavoured with milk and sugar, is sold at daybreak in the streets of London under the name of saloop.' Saloop in balls is still sold in London, and comes mostly from Smyrna."]

In the first quotation it is doubtful what is meant by salif; but it seems possible that the traveller may not have recognised the tha'lab, sa'lab in its Indian pronunciation.

1734. — "After that, they fixed the amount of provision to be given by the Sultan, viz. 1000 Indian riifes of flour: 1000 of meat, a large number of riifes (how many I don't now remember) of sugar, of ghee, of saleb, of areca, and 1000 leaves of betel." — Ibn Battuta, iii. 382.

1727. — "They have a fruit called Salob, about the size of a Peach, but without a stone. They dry it hard: ... and being beaten to Powder, they dress it as Tea and Coffee are. ... They are of opinion that it is a great restorative." — A. Hamilton, i. 125; [ed. 1744, i. 126].

1754. — In his list of Indian drugs Ives (p. 44) gives "Rad. Salop, Persia Rs. 35 per maund.]"

1838. — "Saleb Misree, a medicine, comes (a little) from Russia. It is considered a good nutritious for the human constitution, and is for this purpose powdered and taken with milk. It is in the form of flat oval pieces of about 80 grains each. ... It is sold at 2 or 3 Rupees per ounce." — Des. of articles found in Bazaars of Cabool. In Punjub Trade Report, 1862, App. vi.

1882 (!). — "Here we knock against an ambulant salep-shop (a kind of tea which people drink on winter mornings); there against roaming oil, salt, or water-vendors, bakers carrying brown bread on wooden trays, peddlars with cakes, fellows offering dainty little bits of meat to the knowing purchaser." — Levitonia, The Capital of Cyprus, ext. in St. James's Gazette, Sept. 10.

SALEM, n.p. A town and inland district of S. India. Properly Shalem, which is perhaps a corruption of Chera, the name of the ancient monarchy in which this district was embraced. ["According to one theory the town of Salem is said to be identical with Seran or Sheran, and occasionally to have been named Sheralan; when S. India was divided between the three dynasties of Chola, Sera and Pandia, according to the generally accepted belief, Karur was the place where the three territorial divisions met; the boundary was no doubt subject to vicissitudes, and at one time possibly Salem or Seran was a part of Sera." — Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 18.]

SALEMPOORY, s. A kind of chintz. See allusions under PALEM-PORE. [The Madras Gloss., deriving the word from Tel. sale, 'weaver,' pura, Skt. 'town,' describes it as "a kind of cotton cloth formerly manufactured at Nellore; half the length of ordinary Punjums" (see PIECE-GOODS). The third quotation indicates that it was sometimes white.]

[1598. — "Sarampuras." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 95.]

[1611. — "I was only doubtful about the white Betteelas and Salmopurys." — De Laet, Letters, i. 155.]

[1614. — "Salampora, being a broad white cloth."—Foster, ibid. ii. 32.]

1800. — "Certain goods for Bantam priced as follows:

1747. — "The Warehousekeeper reported that on the 1st inst. when the French entered our Bounds and attacked us . . . it appeared that 5 Pieces of Long Cloth and 10 Pieces of Salampores were stolen. That Two Pieces of Salampores were found upon a Peon . . . and the Person detected is ordered to be severely whipped in the Face of the Public. . . ."—Pt. St. David Conen., March 30 (MS. Records in India Office).

c. 1780. — ".. . en l'yon y fabrique differentes especes de toilles de coton, telles que salempours."—Haugger, ii. 461.

SALIGRAM. (this word seems to be properly the name of a place, 'Village of the Sat-tree'—a real or imaginary tirtha or place of sacred pilgrimage, mentioned in the Mahabharata). [Other and less probable explanations are given by Oppert, Anc. Inhabitants, 337.] A pebble having mystic virtues, found in certain rivers, e.g. Gandak, Son, &c. Such stones are usually marked by containing a fossil ammonite. The salagram is often adopted as the representative of some god, and the worship of any god may be performed before it.* It is daily worshipped by the Brahmans; but it is especially connected with Vaishnava doctrine. In May 1883 a salagram was the ostensible cause of great popular excitement among the Hindus of Calcutta. During the proceedings in a family suit before the High Court, a question arose regarding the identity of a salagram, regarded as a household god. Counsel on both sides suggested that the thing should be brought into court. Mr. Justice Norris hesitated to give this order till he had taken advice. The attorneys on both sides, Hindus, said there could be no objection; the Court interpreter, a high-caste Brahman, said it could not be brought into Court, because of the coining, but it might with perfect propriety be brought into the corridor for inspection; which was done. This took place during the excitement about the "Hbert Bill," giving natives magisterial authority in the provinces over Europeans; and there followed most violent and offensive articles in several native newspapers reviling Mr. Justice Norris, who was believed to be hostile to the Bill. The editor of the Bengal Gazette, an educated man, and formerly a member of the covenanted Civil Service, the author of one of the most unscrupulous and violent articles, was summoned for contempt of court. He made an apology and complete retraction, but was sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

c. 1590. — "Salgram is a black stone which the Hindus hold sacred. . . . They are found in the river Sown, at the distance of 40 oose from the mouth."—Ayen, Gladwin's E.T. 1800, ii. 26; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 150].

1782. — "Avant de finir l'histoire de Vichenou, je ne puis me dispenser de parler de la pierre de Salagraman. Elle n'est autre chose qu'une coquille petrifiee du genre des cornes d'Ammones : les Indians prétendent qu'elle représente Vichenou, parce qu'ils en ont découvert de neuf nuances différentes, ce qu'ils rapportent aux neuf incarnations de ce Dieu. . . . Cette pierre est aux sectateurs de Vichenou ce que le Lingam est à ceux de Chiven."—Sonnerat, i. 307.

[1822. — "In the Nerbuddah are found those types of Shiva, called Bolgrammas, which are sacred pebbles held in great estimation all over India."—Wallace, Fifty Years in India, 296.]

1824. — "The salagrami is black, hollow, and nearly round; it is found in the Gonduk River, and is considered a representation of Vishnou. . . . The Salagrami is the only stone that is naturally divine; all the other stones are rendered sacred by incantations."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 468.

1885. — "My father had one (a Salagram). It was a round, rather flat, jet black, small shining stone. He paid it the greatest reverence possible, and allowed no one to touch it, but worshipped it with his own hands. When he became ill, and as he would not allow a woman to touch it, he made it over to a Brahman ascetic with a money present."—Sundrjbé, in Punjab Notes and Queries, ii. 109. The sylagrama is in fact a Hindu fetish.

SALLABAD, 2. This word, now quite obsolete, occurs frequently in the early records of English settlements in India, for the customary or prescriptive exactions of the native Governments, and for native prescriptive claims in general. It is a word of Mahratti development, siddéd, 'perennial,' applied to permanent collections or charges; apparently a factitious word from Pers. asl, 'year,' and Ar. ada, 'ages.'

[1860.—"Sallabaud." See under Boocka.

1708.—"... although these are hardships, yet by length of time become Sallabod (as we esteem them), there is no great demur made now, and are not recited here as grievances."—In Wheeler, ii. 19.

1716.—"The Board upon reading them came to the following resolutions:—That for anything which has yet appeared the Comates (Comasty) may cry out their Penagundoo Nagarum... at their houses, feasts, and weddings, &c., according to Sallabod but not before the Pagoda of Chindy Pillary..."—Ibid. 234.

1788.—"Sallabaud. (Usual Custom). A word used by the Moors Government to enforce their demand of a present."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

SALOOBEE, 2ALU80TBEEL, s. Hind. Sototar, Sototr. A. native farrier or horse-doctor. This class is now almost always Mahomedan. But the word is taken from the Skt. name Sotithora, the original owner of which is supposed to have written in that language a treatise on the Veterinary Art, which still exists in a form more or less modified and imperfect. "A knowledge of Sanskrit must have prevailed pretty generally about this time (14th century), for there is in the Royal Library at Lucknow a work on the veterinary art, which was translated from the Sanskrit by order of Ghyásu-d din Muhammad Sháh Khilji. This rare book, called Kurutu-l-Mulk, was translated as early as A.H. 783 (A.D. 1381), from an original styled Sototar, which is the name of an Indian, who is said to have been a Brähman, and the tutor of Susruta. The Preface says the translation was made 'from the barbarous Hindi into the refined Persian, in order that there may be no more need of a reference to infidels,'"* (Elliot, v. 573-4.)

[1831.—"... your aloces are not genuine." 'Oh yes, they are,' he exclaimed. "My saltooree got them from the Bussar."—Or. Sport. Mag., reprint 1878, ii. 225.]

a. A considerable island immediately north of Bombay. The island of Bombay is indeed naturally a kind of pendant to the island of Salsette, and during the Portuguese occupation it was so in every sense. That occupation is still marked by the remains of numerous villas and churches, and by the survival of a large R. Catholic population. The island also contains the famous and extensive coves of Kâphéri (see Kennedy). The old city of Tana (q.v.) also stands upon Salsette. Salsette was claimed as part of the Bombay dotation of Queen Catherine, but refused by the Portuguese. The Mahrattas took it from them in 1739, and it was taken from these by us in 1774. The name has been by some connected with the salt-works which exist upon the islands (Saltinae). But it appears in fact to be the corruption of a Mahratti name Shásethi, from Sháshashti, meaning 'Sixty-six' (Skt. Shat-shashti), because (it is supposed) the island was alleged to contain that number of villages. This name occurs in the form Shatssashti in a stone inscription dated Sak. 1103 (A.D. 1182). See Bo. J. R. As. Soc. xii. 334. Another inscription on copper plates dated Sak. 748 (A.D. 1027) contains a grant of the village of Nauru, "one of the 66 of Sri Shanaaka (Thana)," thus entirely confirming the etymology (J.R. As. Soc. ii. 383). I have to thank Mr. J. M. Campbell, C.S.I., for drawing my attention to these inscriptions.

b. Salsette is also the name of the three provinces of the Goa territory which constituted the Velhas Conquistas or Old Conquests. These lay all along the coast, consisting of (1)

* "It is curious that without any allusion to this work, another on the Veterinary Art, styled Salotari, and said to comprise in the Sanskrit original 16,000 stotras, was translated in the reign of Sháh Jahn... by Saiyid 'Abdu'llah Khan Bahadur Piras Jang, who had found it among some other Sanskrit books which... had been plundered from Amar Singh, Rúd of Chitor."
the Ilhas (viz. the island of Goa and minor islands divided by rivers and creeks), (2) Bardez on the northern mainland, and (3) Salsete on the southern mainland. The port of Marmagaon, which is the terminus of the Portuguese Indian Railway, is in this Salsete. The name probably had the like origin to that of the Island Salsete; a parallel to which was found in the old name of the Island of Goa, Tiptoris, meaning (Mahar.) Tis-todi, "30 hamlets." [See BARGANY.]

A.D. 1186.—"I, Aperaditya ("the paramount sovereign, the Ruler of the Konkans, the most illustrious King") have given with a libation of water 24 drachms, after exempting other taxes, from the fixed revenue of the oart in the village of Mahauli, connected with Shat-shahshiti." —Inscription edited by Pandit Bhagavatidal Indraji, in J. Bo. Br. R. A. S. xii. 332. [And see Bombay Gazetteer, i. Pt. ii. 544, 567.]

And the island of Salsete fedas (319,000)
And in paddy xxi murus 1 candil."

S. Botelho, Tombo, 142.

1588.—"Beyond the Isle of Elephanta (do Alifanta) about a league distant is the island of Salsete. This island is seven leagues in length, five in breadth; on the north it borders the Gulf of Cambay, on the south it has the I. of Elephanta, on the east the mainland, and on the west the I. of Bombay or of Boa Vida. This island is very fertile, abounding in provisions, cattle, and game of sorts; and in its hills is great plenty of timber for building ships and galleys. In that part of the island which faces the S.W. wind is built a great and noble city—called Thana; and a league and a half in the interior is an immense edifice called the Pagoda of Salsete; both one and the other objects most worthy of note; Thana for its decay (destrojido) and the Pagoda as a work unique in its way, and the like of which is nowhere to be seen."—João de Castro, Primo Relatorio da India, 69-70.

1584.—"And to the Tanadar (tenadar) of Salsete 30,000 reis.

"He has under him 12 pences (pitbs) of whom the said governor takes 7; leaving him 5, which at the aforesaid rate amount to 10,800 reis.

"And to a Parva (see PARVOE) that he has, who is the country writer . . . and having the same pay as the Tenadar Mor, which is 3 paraves a month, amounting in a year at the said rate to 10,800 reis."—Botelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 211-212.

1610.—"Frey Manuel de S. Mathias, guardian of the convent of St. Francis in Goa, writes to me that . . . in Goa alone there are 90 resident friars; and besides in Baçaim and its adjuncts, viz., in the island of Salsete and other districts of the north they have 18 parishes (Freguerias) of native Christians with vicars; and five of the convents have colleges, or seminaries where they bring up little orphans; and that the said Ward of Goa extends 800 leagues from north to south."—Livros das Monges, 298.

[1674.—"From whence these Pieces of Land receive their general Name of Salset . . . either because it signifies in Camorcin a Granary . . ."—Fryer, 62.]

1760.—"It was a melancholy sight on the loss of Salset, to see the many families forced to seek refuge on Bombay, and among them some Portuguese Hidalgoes or noblemen, reduced of a sudden from very flourishing circumstances to utter beggary."—Grose, i. 72.

1768.—"Those lands are comprised in 66 villages, and from this number it is called Salsete."—Foral of Salsete, India Office MS.

1777.—"The acquisition of the Island of Salset, which in a manner surrounds the Island of Bombay, is sufficient to secure the latter from the danger of a famine."—Price's Tracts, i. 101.

1808.—"The island of Sashthy (corrupted by the Portuguese into Salsete) was conquered by that Nation in the year of Christ 1594, from the Mohammedan Prince who was then its Sovereign; and thereupon parcelled out, among the European subjects of Her Most Faithful Majesty, into village allotments, at a very small Foro or quit-rent."—Bombay, Regn. i. of 1808, sec. ii.

1610.—"And he next day, by order of the Governor, with his own people and many more from the Island (Goa) passed over to the mainland of Salsete and An-trus, scouring the districts and the tan- daras, and placing in them by his own hand tanadars and collectors of revenue, and put all in such order that he collected much money, incomuch that he sent to the factor at Goa very good intelligence, accompanied by much money."—Correa, ii. 161.

1546.—"We agree in the manner following, to wit, that I Idalhasa (Idalcan) promise and swear on our Koran (no noun mocaffa), and by the head of my eldest son that I will remain always firm in the said amity with the King of Portugal and with his governors of India, and that the lands of Salsete and Bardez, which I have made contract and donation of to His Highness,
I confirm and give anew, and I swear and promise by the oath aforesaid never to reclaim them or make them the Subject of War."—Treaty between D. John de Castro and Idalzaa, who was formerly called Idalplo (Adil Khan).—Boteho, Tombo, 40.

1598.—"On the South side of the Island of Cos, where the river runneth againe into the Sea, there cometh soon out with the coast a land called Salessette, which is also under the subjection of the Portingales, and is . . . planted both with people and fruite."—Linschoten, 51; [Hak. Soc. i. 177].

1602.—"Before we treat of the Wars which in this year (c. 1546) Idalza (Adil Shah) waged with the State about the mainland provinces of Saielote and Bardeé, which caused much trouble to the Government of India, it seems well to us to give an account of these Moors Kings of Visiapor."—Cueto, IV. x. 4.

SALWEN, n.p. The great river entering the sea near Martaban in British Burma, and which the Chinese in its upper course call Lu-kang. The Burmese form is Than-loon, but the original form is probably Shàn. ["The Salween River, which empties itself into the sea at Maulmain, rivals the Irrawaddy in length but not in importance" (Forbes, British Burma, 8).]

SAMBOK, s. Ar. sabāk, and sunbāk (there is a Skt. word śambāka, a bivalve shell, but we are unable to throw any light on any possible transfer); a kind of small vessel formerly used in Western India and still on the Arabian coast. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. Pt. ii. 470.] It is smaller than the bagalk (see BUGGALOW), and is chiefly used to communicate between a roadstead and the shore, or to go inside the reefs. Burton renders the word 'a foyst,' which is properly a smaller kind of galley. See description in the last but one quotation below.

c. 330.—"It is the custom when a vessel arrives (at Makadshau) that the Sultan's sunbāk boards her to ask whom the ship comes, who is the owner, and the skipper (or pilot), what she is laden with, and what merchants or other passengers are on board."— Ibn Batuta, ii. 188; also see pp. 17, 181, &c.

1498.—"The Zambuco came loaded with doves' dung, which they have in those isalnds, and which they were carrying, it being merchandize for Cambay, where it is used in dyeing cloths."—Correa, Lendas, i. 33-34.

"In the curious Vocabulary of the language of Calicut, at the end of the ROTEIO of Vasco da Gama, we find: "Bar-cas; Cambuco."

secure the navigation of the ships and Zambuos of their ports . . . provided they do not carry spices or drugs that we require for our cargoes, but if such be found, for the first occasion they shall lose all the spice and drugs so loaded, and on the second they shall lose both ship and cargo, and all may be taken as prize of war."—Treaty of Lopo Soares with Couloa (Quilon), in Beirut,

Tombo, Subsidios, p. 32.

1518.—"Zambuco." See under PROW.

1543.—"Item—that the Zambuoos which shall trade in his port in rice or arroz (paddy) and cottons and other matters shall pay the customary dues."—Treaty of Martia Afonso; Souza with Coulovam, in Beirut,

Tombo, 37.

[1814.—"Sambouk." See under DOH.

1856.—"Our pilgrim ship . . . was a Sambuk of about 400 ardds (50 tons), with narrow wedge-like bows, a clean water-line, a sharp keel, undecked except upon the poop, which was high enough to act as a sail in a gale of wind. We carried 2 masts, imminently raking forward, the main considerably longer than the mizen, and the former was provided with a large triangular lateen. . . ."—Burton, Pilgrimage to El

Matinah and Mecca, i. 276; [Memorial ed.

i. 188].

1858.—"The vessels of the Arabs called Sambuk are small Baggelows of 80 to 100 tons burden. Whilst they run out forward into a sharp prow, the after part of the car is disproportionately broad and elevated above the water, in order to form a counterpoise to the colossal triangular sail which is hoisted to the masthead with such a spread that often the extent of the yard is greater than the whole length of the vessel."—F. von Neumann, in Zeitschr. dr

SAMBRE, SAMBUR, s. Hind. sahbar, stambar; Skt. sambar. A kind of stag (Rusa Aristotelii, Jerdon: [Blanford, Mammalia, 543 sqq.]) the SAMPAN.

A kind of small boat or skiff. The word appears to be Javanese and Malay. It must have been adopted on the Indian shores, for it was picked up there at an early date by the Portuguese; and it is now current all through the further East. [The French have adopted the Annamite form tamban.] The word is often said to be originally Chinese, 'sampan,' = 'three boards,' and this is possible. It is certainly one of the most ordinary words for a boat in China. Moreover, we learn, on the authority of Mr. E. C. Baber, that there is another kind of boat on the Yangtse which is called wen-pan, 'five boards.' Giles however says: 'From the Malay sampan = three boards'; but in this there is some confusion. The word has no such meaning in Malay.

1510. — "My companion said, 'What means then might there be for going to this island?' They answered: 'That it was necessary to purchase a chiampana,' that is a small vessel, of which many are found there."—Varthema, 242.

1518. — "They (the Moors of Quilacare) perform their voyages in small vessels which they call chanchanas."—Barbosa, 172.

c. 1540. — "In the other, whereof the captain was slain, there was not one escaped, for Quiay Pasian pursued them in a chanchana, which was the Boat of his Junk."—Pinto (Cogan, p. 79), orig. ch. ix.

1868. — "The harbour is crowded with men-of-war and trading vessels ... from vessels of several hundred tons burthen down to little fishing-boats and passenger sampans."—Wallace, Malay Archip. 21.

a. A kind of ardent spirit made in China from rice. Mr. Baber doubts this being Chinese; but according to Wells Williams the name is san-shao, 'thrice fired' (Guide, 220). 'Distilled liquor' is shao-siu, 'fired liquor.' Compare Germ. Brantwein, and XXX beer. Strabo says: 'Wine the Indians drink not except when sacrificing, and that is made of rice in lieu of barley' (xv. c. i. § 53).

SANDAL, SANDLE, SANDERS,

SANDAL-WOOD, s. From Low Latin santalum, in Greek σάνταλος, and in later Greek σάνταλος; coming from the Arab. sandal, and that from Skt. chandana. The name properly belongs to the fragrant wood of the Santalum album, L. Three woods bearing the name santalum, white, yellow, and red, were in official use in the Middle Ages. But the name Red Sandalwood, or Red Sanders, has been long applied, both in English and in the Indian vernaculars, to the wood of Pterocarpus santalinus L., a tree of S. India, the wood of which is inodorous, but which is valued for various purposes in India (pillars, turning, &c.), and is exported as a dyewood. According to Hanbury and Flückiger this last was the sanders so much used in the cookery of the Middle Ages for colouring sauces, &c. In the opinion of those authorities it is doubtful whether the red sandal of the medieval pharmacologists was a kind of the real odorous sandal-wood, or was the wood of Pterocarpus santalinus. It is possible that sometimes the one and sometimes the other was meant. For on the one hand, even in modern times, we find Milburn (see below) speaking of the three colours of the real sandal-wood; and on the other hand we find Matthioli in the 16th century speaking of the red sandal as inodorous.

It has been a question how the Pterocarpus santalinus came to be called sandal-wood at all. We may suggest, as a possible origin of this, the fact that its powder "mixed with oil is used for bathing and purifying the skin" (Drury, s.v.), as much as the true sandal-wood powder also is used in the East.

C 545.—"And from the remote regions, I speak of Tsiinista and other places of export, the imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, Sandalwood (rîdësbari), and so forth..." —Corras, in Cathay, &c., clxxvii.

1292.—"Encore sachiess que en este yede a arbesse de sandal vermoile aussi grant comme sont les arbesdes nostrecontre...et il en ont bonsome nos avuns d'autres arbes sauves." —Marco Polo, Geog. Text. ch. cxxi.

C 1890.—"Take powdered rice and boil it in almond milk...and colour it with Saunders." —Recipe quoted by Wright, Domestic Manners, &c., 350.

1554.—"Le Santal done croist es Indies Orientales et Occidentales: en grandes Forests, et fort espessees. Il s'en traverse trois especes: mais le plus pasle est le meilleur: le blanc apris: le rouge est mis au dernier ranc, pource qu'il n'a aucune odeur: mais les deux premiers sentent fort bon." —Matthioli (old Fr. version), liv. i. ch. xix.

1563.—"The Sandal grows about Timor, which produces the largest quantity, and it is called chundana; and by this name it is known in all the regions about Malacca; and the Arabs, being those who carried on the trade of those parts, corrupted the word and called it sandal. Every Moor, whatever his nation, calls it thus..." —Garcia, f. 185r. He proceeds to speak of the sandal vermelho as quite a different product, growing in Tenasserim and on the Coromandel Coast.

1584.—"...Sandalas wild from Cochin. Sandalas domestick from Malacca..." —Ws. Barret, in Hist. ii. 412.

1613.—"...certain renegado Christians of the said island, along with the Moors, called in the Hollander, who thinking it was a fine opportunity, went one time with five vessels, and another time with seven, against the said fort, at a time when most of the people...were gone to Solor for the Sandal trade, by which they had their living." —Bocarro, Decada, 728.

1615.—"Committee to procure the commodities recommended by Capt. Saris for Japan, viz. pictures of wars, steel, skins, sandal-wood." —Santiago, i. 390.

1618.—"When the trees are felled, the bark is taken off; they are then cut into billets, and buried in a dry place for two months, during which period the white ants will eat the outer wood without touching the sandal; it is then taken up and...sorted into three kinds. The deeper the colour, the higher is the perfume; and hence the merchants sometimes divide sandal into red, yellow, and white; but these are all different shades of the same colour." —Milburn, i. 291.

1825.—"Redwood, properly Red Sanders, is produced chiefly on the Coromandel Coast, whence it has of late years been imported in considerable quantity to England, where it is employed in dyeing. It...comes in round billets of a thickish red colour on the outside, a deep brighter red within, with a wavy grain; no small or taste." —Tbid. ed. 1826, p. 249.

SANDOWAY, n.p. A town of Arakan, the Burmese name of which is Thandum (Sand-wê), for which an etymology ('iron-tied'), and a corresponding legend are invented, as usual [see Burmah Gazetteer, ii. 606]. It is quite possible that the name is ancient, and represented by the Sadâ of Ptolemy.

1558.—"In crossing the gulf of Bengal there arose a storm which dispersed them in such a manner that Martin Affonso found himself alone, with his ship, at the island called Negamale, opposite the town of Sodo, which is on the mainland, and there was wrecked upon a reef..." —Barros, IV. ii. 1.

In I. ix. 1, it is called Soodoe.

1698.—"Other places along this Coast subjected to this King (of Arracan) are Coromoria, Sodoe, Zarra, and Port Mangaoni." —Appendix to Oriagton, p. 563.
Sanguicel.

This is a term (pl. sanguiceli) often used by the Portuguese writers on India for a kind of boat, or small vessel, used in war. We are not able to trace any origin in a vernacular word. It is perhaps taken from the similar proper name which is the subject of the next article. [This supposition is rendered practically certain from the quotation from Albuquerque below, furnished by Mr. Whiteway.] Bluteau gives "Sanguicel; termo da India. He hum genero de embarcaçao pequena q serve na costa da India para dar alcanso aos parços dos Mouros," 'to give chase to the prows of the Moors.'

[1512. — "Here was Nuno Vaz in a ship, the St. John, which was built in *Sanguicel." — Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 99. In a letter of Nov. 30, 1513, he varies the spelling to Camgicar. There are many other passages in the same writer which make it practically certain that Sanguicels were the vessels built as Sanguicel.]

1598. — "The Conde (Francisco da Gama) was occupied all the winter (q.v.) in reforming the fleets... and as the time came on he nominated his brother D. Luis da Gama to be Captain-Major of the Indian Seas for the expedition to Malabar, and wrote to Baçaim to equip six very light Sanguicels according to instructions which should be given by Sebastian Botelho, a man of great experience in that craft. These orders were given by the Count Admiral because he perceived that big fleets were not of use to guard convoys, and that it was light vessels like these alone which could catch the parrots and vessels of the pirates... for these escaped our fleets, and got hold of the merchant vessels at their pleasure, darting in and out, like light horse, where they would..." — Couto, Dec. XII. liv. ch. 18.

1605. — "And seeing that I am informed that... the incursions of certain pirates who still infest that coast might be prevented with less apparatus and expense, if we had light vessels which would be more effective than the foists and galleys of which the fleets have hitherto been composed, seeing how the enemy use their *sanguicels, which our ships and galleys cannot overtake, I enjoin and order you to build a quantity of light vessels to be employed in guarding the coast in place of the fleet of galleys and foists..." — King's Letter to Dom Afonso de Castro, in Livros das Memórias, t. 26.

1614. — "The eight Malabarese sanguicels that Francis de Miranda despatched to the north from the bar of Goa went with three chief captains, each of them to command a week in turn..." — Bocarro, Decada, 262.

Sanguicel, Sanguieca.

Zinguiar, &c., n.p. This is a place often mentioned in the Portuguese narratives, as very hostile to the Goa Government, and latterly as a great nest of corsairs. This appears to be Sangameshvar, lat. 17° 9′, formerly a port of Canara on the River Shastri, and standing 20 miles from the mouth of that river. The latter was navigable for large vessels up to Sangameshvar, but within the last 50 years has become impassable. [The name is derived from Skt. sangama-isvara, 'Siva, Lord of the river conflouence.]

1516. — "Passing this river of Dabul and going along the coast towards Goa you find a river called Zinguiar, inside of which there is a place where there is a traffic in many wares, and where enter many vessels and small Zambucos (Sambuck) of Malabar to sell what they bring, and buy the products of the country. The place is peopled by Moors, and Gentiles of the aforesaid Kingdom of Daquum" (Decan). — Barros, Lisbon ed. p. 286.

1558. — "Thirty-five leagues from Guoa, in the middle of the Gulf of the Malabars there runs a large river called Zangisara. This river is well known and of great renown. The bar is bad and very tortuous, but after you get within, it makes amends for the difficulties without. It runs inland for a great distance with great depth and breadth." — De Castro, Primeiro Rotero, 36.

1598. — De Barros calls it Zingar in II. i. 4, and Sanga in IV. i. 14.

1584. — "There is a Haven belonging to those ryvers (rovers), distant from Goa about 12 miles, and is called Sanguise, where many of those Rovers of the Malabars do so much mischief that no man can passe by, but they receive some wrong by them... Which the Viceroy understanding, prepared an armne of 15 Foists, over which he made chief Captain a Gentleman, his Nephew called Don Julianes Mascarenhas, giving him express commandement first to go unto the Haven of Sanguise, and utterly to raise the same downe to the ground." — Linschoten, ch. 92; Hak. Soc. ii. 170.

1602. — "Both these projects he now began to put in execution, sending all his treasures (which they said exceeded ten millions in gold) to the river of Sanguise, which was also within his jurisdiction, being a seaport, and there embarking it at his pleasure." — Couto, ix. 8. See also Dec. X. iv.,

"How D. G. Esteane Mascarenhas arrived in Malabar, and how he entered the river of Sanguise to chastise the Naique of that place; and of the disaster in which he met his death." (This is the event of 1684 related by Linschoten); also Dec. X. vi. 4:

"Of the things that happened to D. Jeronymo Mascarenhas in Malabar, and how he had a SAWJIRIT, a. The name of the classical language of the Brahmans, Sanskrita, meaning in that language 'purified' or 'perfected.' This was obviously at first only an epithet, and it is not of very ancient use in this specific application. To the Brahmans Sanskrit was the bhūsha, or language, and had no particular name. The word Sanskrit is used by the proto-grammarians Pāṇini (some centuries before Christ), but not as a denomination of the language. In the latter sense, however, both 'Sanskrit' and 'Prakrit' (Pārācrit) are used in the Bṛhad Samhitā of Varahamihira, c. A.D. 504, in a chapter on omens (Ixxxvi. 3), to which Prof. Kern's translation does not extend. It occurs also in the Mimāṣaḥ-ḥatuktaka, translated by Prof. H. H. Wilson in his Hindu Theatre, under the name of the 'Toy-cart'; in the works of Kumārila Bhatta, a writer of the 7th century; and in the Pāniniyaṇḍū Śīkāḍa, a metrical treatise ascribed by the Hindus to Pāṇini, but really of comparatively modern origin.

There is a curiously early mention of Sanskrit by the Mahommedan poet Amir Khusrū of Delhi, which is quoted below. The first mention (to our knowledge) of the word in any European writing is in an Italian letter of Sassetti's, addressed from Malabar to Bernardo Davanzati in Florence, and dating from 1586. The few words on the subject, of this writer, show much acumen.

In the 17th and 18th centuries such references to this language as occur are found chiefly in the works of travellers to Southern India, and by these it is often called Granondic, or the like, from grantha, 'a book' (see GRUNTH, GRUNTHUM) i.e. a book of the classical Indian literature. The term Sanskrit came into familiar use after the investigations into this language by the English in Bengal (viz. by Wilkins, Jones, &c.) in the last quarter of the 18th century. [See Macdonell, Hist. of Sanskrit Lit. ch. i.]

1727.—"There is an excellent Harbour for Shipping 8 Leagues to the Southward of Calcutt, called Sanguiser, but the Country about being inhabited by Repressers, it is not frequented."—A. Hamilton, [ed. 1744] i. 244.

A.D. 21—"Maitreyā. Now, to me, there are two things at which I cannot choose but laugh, a woman reading Sanskrit, and a man singing a song: the woman sniffles like a young cow when the rope is first passed through her nostrils; and the man wheezes like an old Pandit repeating his bead-roll."—The Toy-Cart, E.T. in Wilson's Works, xi. 60.

1318.—"But there is another language, more select than the other, which all the Brahmans use. Its name from of old is Sahaṣkrat, and the common people know nothing of it."—Amit Khusr, in Elido, iii. 503.

1586.—"Sono scritto le loro scienze tutte in una lingua che dimandano Sāmascritta, che vuol dire 'bene articolata': della quale certamente si ha notizia quando fu loro primo averve (com' io dico) memorie antichissime. c. 1590.—"Although this country (Kashmir) has a peculiar tongue, the books of knowledge are Sanskrit (or Sahasakrit). They also have a written character of their own, with which they write their books. The substance which they chiefly write upon is Tūs, which is like a thin leaf, which with a little pains they make into leaves, and it lasts for years. In this way ancient books have been written thereon, and the ink is such that it cannot be washed out."—Aïn (orig.), i. p. 583; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 351].

1623.—"The Jesuites conceive that the Bramanes are of the dispersion of the Israelites, and their Bookes (called Samescretan) doe somewhat agree with the Scriptures, but that they understand them not."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 559.

1651.—"... Souri signifies the Sun in Samsaortam, which is a language in which all the mysteries of Heathendom are written, and which is held in esteem by the Bramines just as Latin is among the Learned in Europe."—Rogerius, 4.

In some of the following quotations we have a form which it is difficult to account for:

SAPECA, SAPÉQUE, s. This word is used at Macao for what we call cash (q.v.) in Chinese currency; and it is the word generally used by French writers for that coin. Giles says: "From sapek, a coin found in Tonquin and Cochin-China, and equal to about half a pfennig (ufs Thaler), or about one-sixth of a German Kreutzer" (Gloss. of Reference, 122). We cannot learn much about this coin of Tonquin. Milburn says, under 'Cochin China': "The only currency of the country is a sort of cash, called sappica, composed chiefly of tutenague (see TOOTNAGUE), 600 making a quan: this is divided into 10 mace of 60 cash each, the whole strung together, and divided by a knot at each mace" (ed. 1825, pp. 444-445). There is nothing here inconsistent with our proposed derivation, given later on. Mace and Sappica are equally Malay words. We can hardly doubt that the true origin of the term is that communicated by our friend Mr. E. C. Baber: "Very probably from Malay sa, 'one,' and paku, 'a string or file of the small coin called pichis.' Pichis is explained by Crawford as 'Small coin... money of copper, brass, or tin... It was the ancient coin of Java, and also the only one of the Malays when first seen by the Portuguese.' Paku is written by Favre peku (Dict. Malais-Français) and is derived by him from Chinese pe-ko, 'cent.' In the dialect of Canton pak is the word for 'a hundred,' and one pak is the colloquial term for a string of one hundred cash." Sapek would then be properly a string of 100 cash, but it is not difficult to conceive that it might through some misunderstanding (e.g. a confusion of peku and pichis) have been transferred to the single coin. There is a passage in Mr. Gerson da Cunha's Contributions to the Study of Portuguese Numismatics, which may seem at first sight inconsistent with this derivation. For he seems to imply that the smallest denomination of coin struck by Albuquerquè at Goa in 1510 was called copayqua, i.e. in the year before the capture of Malacca, and consequent familiarity with Malay terms. I do not trace his authority for this; the word is not mentioned in the Commentaries of Albuquerquè, and it is quite possible that the dinheiro, as these small copper coins were also called, only received the name copayqua at a later date, and some time after the occupation of Malacca (see Da Cunha, pp. 11–19, and 22). [But also see the quotation of 1510 from Correa under PARDAO. This word has been discussed by Col. Temple (Ind. Antiq., August 1897, pp. 222 seq.), who gives quotations establishing the derivation from the Malay sapaku.

[1639]—“It (cauxa, cash) hath a four-square hole through it, at which they string them on a Straw; a String of two hundred Caxzas, called Sata, is worth about three farthings sterling, and five Sata tied together make a Sapoono. The Javians, when this money first came amongst them, were so cheated with the Novelty, that they would give six bags of Pepper for ten Sapoons, thirteen whereof amount to but a Crown.”—Mandeville, Voyages, E.T. p. 117.

[1708]—“This is the reason why the Caxzas are valued so little; they are punched in the middle, and string’d with little twistes of Straw, two hundred in one twist, which is called Santa, and is worth nine Deniers. Five Santas tied together make a thousand Caxzas, or a Sapoon (? Sapoono).”—Collection of Dutch Voyages, 199.

[1830]—“The money current in Bali consists solely of Chinese pice with a hole in the centre. . . . They however put them up in hundreds and thousands; two hundred are called sutah, and are equal to one rupee copper, and a thousand called Sapaku, are valued at five rupees.—Singapore Chronicle, June 1830, in Moor, Indian Arch. p. 94.

[1802]—“This is a brief history of the Sapoo (more commonly known to us as the cash), the only native coin of China, and which is found everywhere from Malaysia to Japan.”—Ridgeway, Origin of Currency, 157.]

SAPPAN-WOOD. a. The wood of Cusalpina sappan; the bakam of the Arabs; and the Brazil-wood of medieval commerce. Bishop Caldwell at one time thought the Tamil name, from which this was taken, to have been given because the wood was supposed to come from Japan. Rumphius says that Siam and Champa are the original countries of the Sappan, and quotes from Rheede that in Malabar it was called Tajampangan, suggestive apparently of a possible derivation from Champa. The mere fact that it does not come from Japan would not disprove this derivation any more than the fact that turkeys and maize did not originally come from Turkey would disprove the fact of the birds and the grain (gran turco) having got names from such a belief. But the tree appears to be indigenous in Malabar, the Deccan, and the Malay Peninsula; whilst the Malayal. shappamam, and the Tamil shappu, both signifying ‘red (wood),’ are apparently derivatives from shava, ‘to be red,’ and suggest another origin as most probable. [The Mad. Gloss. gives Mal. chappannam, from chappu, ‘leaf,’ Skt.anga, ‘body’; Tam. shappamam.] The Malay word is also sapang, which Crawford supposes to have originated the trade-name. If, however, the etymology just suggested be correct, the word must have passed from Continental India to the Archipelago. For curious particulars as to the names of this dye-wood, and its vicissitudes, see BRAZIL; [and Burnell’s note on Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 121].

SARBATANE, SARBACANE, s. This is not Anglo-Indian, but it often occurs in French works on the East, as applied to the blowing-tubes used by various tribes of the Indian Islands for discharging small arrows, often poisoned. The same instrument is used among the tribes of northern South America, and in some parts of Madagascar. The word comes through the Span. cebatana, cerbatana, zarbatana, also Port. sarabatana, &c., Ital. cerbatana, Mod. Greek zapofera, from the Ar. zarbatana, 'a tube for blowing pellets' (a pea-shooter in fact!). Dozy says that the r must have been sounded in the Arabic of the Spanish Moors, as Pedro de Alcama translates zebratana by Ar. zarbatana. The resemblance of this to the Malay sumpitian (q.v.) is curious, though it is not easy to suggest a transition, if the Arabic word is, as it appears, old enough to have been introduced into Spanish. There is apparently, however, no doubt that in Arabic it is a borrowed word. The Malay word seems to be formed directly from sumpit, 'to discharge from the mouth by a forcible expiration' (Crawfurd, Mal. Dict.).

SARBASIJA, S. This is the name of some weapon used in the extreme south of India; but we have not been able to ascertain its character or etymology. We conjecture, however, that it may be the long lance or pike, 18 or 20 feet long, which was the characteristic and formidable weapon of the Marava Colleries (q.v.). See Bp. Caldwell's H. of Tinnevelly, p. 103 and passim; [Stuart, Man. of Tinnevelly, 50]. This explanation is probably incorrect. Welsh (Military Rem. i. 104) defines sarabogies as "a species of park guns, for firing salutes at feasts, &c.; but not used in war." It has been suggested that the word is simply Hind. sarboja, 'a head-load,' and Mr. Grierson writes: "'Laden with a head' may refer to a head carried home on a spear." Dr. Pope writes: "Sarboji is not found in any Dravidian dialect, as far as I know. It is a synonym for Sivaji. Sarbo (sarbo)-ji is honorific. In the Tanjore Inscription it is Sersogni. In mythology Siva's name is 'arrow,' 'spear,' and 'head-burthen,' of course by metonomy." Mr. Brandt suggests Tam. sara, "war," baji, "a tube." No weapon of the name appears in Mr. Egerton's Hand-book of Indian Arms.

1801.—"The Rt. Hon. the Governor in Council... orders and directs all persons, whether Polygars (see BOLIGAR), Colleries, or other inhabitants possessed of arms in the Provinces of Dingull, Tinnevelly, Rammnadpuram, Sivangangai, and Madura, to deliver the said arms, consisting of Muskets, Matchlocks, Pikes, Gingauls (see GINGALL), and Sarabogoi to Lieut.-Col. Agnew..."

SARBOSKI, S. Hind. sara, sardji. The cloth which constitutes the main part of a woman's dress in Siam in the early part of the 16th century; from Shahr-in-nou, Pers. 'New-city;' the name by which Yuthia or Ayodya (see JUDEA), the capital founded on the Menam about 1350, seems to have become known to the traders of the Persian Gulf. Mr. Braddell (J. Ind. Arch. v. 317) has suggested that the name (Sheher-al-nou, as he calls it) refers to the distinction spoken of by La Louliere between the Thai-Yai, an older people of the race, and the Thai-Noi, the people known to us as Siamese. But this is less probable.
We have still a city of Siam called Lophaburi, anciently a capital, and the name of which appears to be a Sanskrit or Pali form, Nava-pura, meaning the same as Shahr-i-nao; and this indeed may have first given rise to the latter name. The Cemnese of Nicolò Conti (c. 1430) is generally supposed to refer to a city of Bengal, and one of the present writers has identified it with Lakhnauti or Gaur, an official name of which in the 14th cent. was Shahr-i-nao. But it is just possible that Siam was the country spoken of.

SARONG, a. Malay. sarung: the body-cloth, or long kilt, tucked or girt at the waist, and generally of coloured silk or cotton, which forms the chief article of dress of the Malays and Javanese. The same article of dress, and the name (saran) are used in Ceylon. It is an old Indian form of dress, but is now used only by some of the people of the south; e.g. on the coast of Malabar, where it is worn by the Hindus (white), by the Mappilas (Moplah) of that coast, and the Labbais (Lobby) of Coromandel (coloured), and by the Bunts of Canara, who wear it of a dark blue. With the Labois the coloured sarong is a modern adoption from the Malays. Crawfurd seems to explain sarung as Javanese, meaning first 'a case or sheath,' and then a wrapper or garment. But, both in the Malay islands and in Ceylon, the word is no doubt taken from Skt. stranga, meaning 'variegated' and also 'a garment.'

[1880. — "... the cloth or sarong, which has been described by Mr. Mureden to be 'not unlike a Scotti highlander's plaid in appearance, being a piece of party-coloured cloth, about 6 or 8 feet long, and 3 or 4 feet wide, sewed together at the ends, forming, as some writers have described it, a wide sack without a bottom.' With the Malays, the sarong is either worn slung over the shoulders as a sash, or tucked round the waist and descending to the ankles, so as to enclose the legs like a petticoat."—Raffles, Java, i. 96.]

1888. — "He wore a sarong or Malay petticoat, and a green jacket."—Wallace, Mal. Arch. 171.

SATIGAM, n.p. Stedpon, formerly and from remote times a port of much trade on the right bank of the Hoogly R., 30 m. above Calcutta, but for two and a half centuries utterly decayed, and now only the sit of a few huts, with a ruined mosque as the only relic of former importance. It is situated at the bifurcation of the Saraswati channel from the Hoogly, and the decay dates from the silting up of the former. It was commonly called by the Portuguese Porto Pequeno (q.v.).

c. 1340.—"About this time the rebellion of Fakhrá broke out in Bengal. Fakhrá and his Bengal forces killed Kádar Khán (Governor of Lakhnauti). . . . He then plundered the treasury of Lakhnauti, and secured possession of that place and of Batáin and Sunárgánw. —Zán ud-dín Barni, in Bhisti, iii. 246.

1535.—"In this year Diogo Rabello, finishing his term of service as Captain and Factor of the Choromandel fishery, sailed from the Governor went to Bengal in a vessel of his . . . and he went well armed along with two foists which equipped with his own money, the Governor only lending him artillery and nothing more. . . . So this SATIN. 797 SATRAP.

Diogo Rabello arrived at the Port of Satiana, where he found two great ships of Cambaya which three days before had arrived with great quantity of merchandise, selling and buying: and these, without touching them, he caused to quit the port and go down the river, forbidding them to carry on any trade, and he also sent one of the foists, with 30 men, to the other port of Chatigron, where they found three ships from the Coast of Choromandel, which were driven away from the port. And Diogo Rabello sent word to the Gourind that he was sent by the Governor with choice of peace or war, and that he should send to ask the King if he chose to liberate the (Portuguese) prisoners, in which case he also would liberate his ports and leave them in their former peace. . . ."—Corrêa, iii. 649.

[c. 1590. — "In the Sarkar of Satiana, there are two ports at a distance of half a tos from each other; the one is Satîgan, the other Hugli: the latter the chief; both are in the possession of the Europeans. Fine pomegranates grow here."—Ait., ed. Jarrett, ii. 125.]

SATIN, s. This is of course English, not Anglo-Indian. The common derivation [accepted by Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. 2nd ed. s.v.) is with Low Lat. seta, 'silk,' Lat. seta, seta, 'a bristle, a hair,' through the Port. setim. Dr. Wells Williams (Mid. King., ii. 123) says it is probably derived eventually from the Chinese sz-tiin, though intermediately through other languages. It is true that sz-tiin or sz-tauan is a common (and ancient) term for this sort of silk texture. But we may remark that trade-words adopted directly from the Chinese are comparatively rare (though no doubt the intermediate transit indicated would meet this objection, more or less). And we can hardly doubt that the true derivation is that given in Cathay and the Way Thither, p. 486; viz. from Zaiun or Zayton, the name by which Chwan-chau (Chinchew), the great medieval port of western trade in Fokien, was known to western traders. We find that certain rich stuffs of damask and satin were called from this place, by the Arabs, Zaiûnâ; the Span. acetamini (for 'satin'), the medieval French satony, and the medieval Ital. setani, afford intermediate steps.

c. 1350. — "The first city that I reached after crossing the sea was Zaiun. It is a great city, superb indeed; and in it they make damasks of velvet as well as those of satin (tinkkâ—see KINCOE, ATLAS, which are called from the name of the city zaïtunâ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 289.

1352. — In an inventory of this year in Domôl d'Aroy we have: "Sazon at 4 écus the ell." (p. 342).

1405. — "And besides, this city (Samar- kand) is very rich in many wares which come to it from other parts. From Russia and Tartary come hides and linens, and from Cathay silk-stuffs, the best that are made in all that region, especially the setunis, which are said to be the best in the world, and the best of all are those that are without pattern."—Clavijo (translated anew—the passage corresponding to Markham's at p. 171). The word setun occurs repeatedly in Clavijo's original.

1440. — In the Libro de GabeUa, &c., of Giov. da Uzzano, we have mention among silk stuffs, several times, of "setani velutati, and other kinds of setani."—Della Decima, iv. 58, 107, &c.

1441. — "Before the throne (at Bijanagar) was placed the Ilkhan after the saïtunâ satin, round which three rows of the most exquisite pearls were sewn."—Abdurrazâk, in Elliot, iv. 120. (The original is "darpahe-i takht bâliâk az azîs-i-sâtûnâ"); see Not. et Ext. iv. 387. Quatremère (ibid. 462) translated 'un carreau de satin olive,' taking saïtun in its usual Arabic sense of 'an olive tree.' Also see Elliot, iv. 113.

SATRAP, s. Anc. Pers. kshatrapa, which becomes satrap, as kshatryathiya becomes shah. The word comes to us direct from the Greek writers who speak of Persia. But the title occurs not only in the books of Ezra, Esther, and Daniel, but also in the ancient inscriptions, as used by certain lords in Western India, and more precisely in Surashtra or Peninsular Guzerat. Thus, in a celebrated inscription regarding a dam, near Gîrnâr:

c. A.D. 150. — "... he, the Mähâ-Kshahatrâpa Rudrâdâman ... for the increase of his merit and fame, has rebuilt the embankment three times stronger."—In Indiæm Antiquitatem, vii. 262. The identity of this with satrap was pointed out by James Prinsep, 1838 (J. As. Soc. Ben. vii. 345).
[There were two Indian satrap dynasties, viz. the Western Satraps of Saurashtra and Gujarât, from about A.D. 150 to A.D. 388; for which see Rapson and Irdrâji, The Western Kshâtrâpas (J. R. A. S., N.S., 1890, p. 639); and the Northern Satraps of Mathura and the neighbouring territories in the 1st cent. A.D. See articles by Rapson and Irdrâji in J. R. A. S., N.S., 1894, pp. 525, 541.]

1883. — "An eminent Greek scholar used to warn his pupils to beware of false analogies in philology. 'Because,' he used to say, 'σατράπης is the Greek for satrap, it does not follow that ḫâdrārim is the Greek for satrap.'"—Sal. Rev. July 14, p. 63.
SATSUMA, n.p. Name of a city and formerly of a principality (daimio-ship) in Japan, the name of which is familiar not only from the deplorable necessity of bombarding its capital Kagosima in 1863 (in consequence of the murder of Mr. Richardson, and other outrages, with the refusal of reparation), but from the peculiar cream-coloured pottery made there and now well known in London shops.

1615.—"I said I had received suffation at his highest hands in having the good hap to see the face of soe mightie a King as the King of Shashima; wherein he smiled."—Colt's Diary, i. 4-5.

1617.—"Speeches are given out that the cabouques or Japon players (or whorees) going from hence to Tushima to meete the Corean ambassadors, were set on by the way by a boat of Karma theves, and killed all both men and women, for the money they had gotten at Firando."—Ibid. 256.

SAUGOR, SAUGOR ISLAND, n.p. A famous island at the mouth of the Hoogly R., the site of a great fair and pilgrimage—properly Ganga Sagara (the Ocean Ganges). It is said once to have been populous, but in 1688 (the date is clearly wrong) to have been swept by a cyclone-wave. It is now a dense jungle haunted by tigers.

1683.—"We went in our Budgeros to see ye Pagodas at Sagor, and returned to ye Oyster River, where we got as many Oysters as we desired."—Hedges, March 12; [Hak. Soc. i. 68].

1684.—"James Price assured me that about 40 years since, when ye Island called Gonga Sagur was inhabited, ye Raja of ye Island gathered yearly Rent out of it, to ye amount of 26 Lacks of Rupees."—Ibid. Dec. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1705.—"Sagore est une ile ou il y a une Pagode tres-respectee parmi les Gentils, oh ils vont en pelerinage, et oh il y a deux Faquers qui y font leur residence. Ces Faquers sevrent charmer les betes feroces, qu'on y trouve en quantite, sans quoi ils seroient tous les jours exposes a etre devorcs."—Lulliier, p. 123.

1727.—"...among the Pagans, the island Sagor is accounted holy, and great numbers of Josquies go yearly thither in the Months of November and December, to worship and wash in Salt-Water, tho' many of them fall Sacrifices to the hungry Tigers."—A. Hamilton, ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

SAUL-WOOD, s. Hind. sad, from Skt. sàla; the timber of the tree Shorea robusta, Gaertner, N.O. Dipterocarpacea, which is the most valuable building timber of Northern India. Its chief habitat is the forest immediately under the Himalaya, at intervals throughout that region from the Brahmaputra to the Bias; it abounds also in various more southerly tracts between the Ganges and the Godavery. [The botanical name is taken from Sir John Shore. For the peculiar habitat of the Sàl as compared with the Teak, see Forsyth, Highlands of C.I. 25 seqq.] It is strong and durable, but very heavy, so that it cannot be floated without more buoyant aids, and is, on that and other accounts, inferior to teak. It does not appear among eight kinds of timber in general use, mentioned in the Ain. The saul has been introduced into China, perhaps at a remote period, on account of its connection with Buddha's history, and it is known there by the Indian name, so-lo (Breitschneider on Chinese Botan. Works, p. 6).

c. 650.—"L'Honorable du sicle, animé d'une grande pitie, et obfissant à l'ordre des temps, jugba utile de paraître dans le monde. Quand il eut fini de convertir les hommes, il se plongea dans les joies du Nirvana. Se plaçant entre deux arbres Sàlas, il tourna sa tête vers le nord et s'endormit."—Hoven Thang, Mémoires (Voyages des Pél. Buddh. ii. 340).

1765.—"The produce of the country consists of shaln timbers (a wood equal in quality to the best of our oak)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 200.

1774.—"This continued five kos; towards the end there are sàl and large forest trees."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 19.

1810.—"The saul is a very solid wood... it is likewise heavy, yet by no means so ponderous as teak; both, like many of our former woods, sink in fresh water."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 69.

SAYER, SYRE, &c., s. Hind. from Arab. ad'tir, a word used technically for many years in the Indian accounts to cover a variety of items of taxation and impost, other than the Land Revenue.

The transitions of meaning in Arabic words are (as we have several times had occasion to remark) very obscure; and until we undertook the investigation of the subject for this article (a task in which we are indebted to the kind help of Sir H. Waterfield, of the India Office, one of the busiest men in the public service, but, as so often happens, one of the readiest to render assistance) the obscurity attaching to the word sayer in this sense was especially great.

Wilson, s.v. says: "In its original purport the word signifies moving, walking, or the whole, the remainder; from the latter it came to denote the remaining, or all other, sources of revenue accruing to the Government in addition to the land-tax." In fact, according to this explanation, the application of the term might be illustrated by the ancient story of a German Professor lecturing on botany in the pre-scientific period. He is reported to have said, 'Every plant, gentlemen, is divided into two parts. This is the root,—and this is the rest of it!' Land revenue was the root, and all else was "the rest of it."

Sir C. Trevelyan again, in a passage quoted below, says that the Arabic word has "the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.'" Neither of these explanations, we conceive, pace tantorum rerum, is correct.

The term Sayer in the 18th century was applied to a variety of inland imposts, but especially to local and arbitrary charges levied by zemindars and other individuals, with a show of authority, on all goods passing through their estates by land or water, or sold at markets (bazar, haut, gunge) established by them, charges which formed in the aggregate an enormous burden upon the trade of the country.

Now the fact is that in sādir two old Semitic forms have coalesced in sound though coming from different roots, viz. (in Arabic) sair, producing sādir, 'walking, current,' and sār, producing sādir, 'remainder,' the latter being a form of the same word that we have in the Biblical Shear-jashub, 'the remnant shall remain' (Isaiah, vii. 3). And we conceive that the true sense of the Indian term was 'current or customary charges'; an idea that lies at the root of sundry terms of the same kind in various languages, including our own Customs, as well as the dustoooy which is so familiar in India. This interpretation is aptly illustrated by the quotation below from Mr. Stuart's Minute of Feb. 10, 1790.

At a later period it seems probable that some confusion arose with the other sense of sādir, leading to its use, more or less, for 'et ceteras,' and accounting for what we have indicated above as erroneous explanations of the word.

I find, however, that the Index and Glossary to the Regulations, ed. 1832 (vol. iii.), defines: "Sayer. What moves. Variable imports, distinct from land-rent or revenue, consisting of customs, tolls, licenses, duties on merchandise, and other articles of personal moveable property; as well as mixed duties, and taxes on houses shops, bazaars, &c." This of course throws some doubt on the rationale of the Arabic name as suggested above.

In a despatch of April 10, 1771, to Bengal, the Court of Directors drew attention to the private Bazar charges, as "a great detriment to the public collections, and a burthen and oppression to the inhabitants"; enjoining that no Buzars or Gunjes should be kept up but such as particularly belonged to the Government. And in such the duties were to be rated in such manner as the respective positions and prosperity of the different districts would admit.

In consequence of these instructions it was ordered in 1773 that "all duties coming under the description of sayer Chelluntah (H. chalanta, 'in transit'), and Rah-derry (radaree)... and other oppressive impositions on the foreign as well as the internal trade of the country" should be abolished; and, to prevent all pretext of injustice, proportional deductions of rent were conceded to the zemindars in the annual collections. Nevertheless the exactions went on much as before, in defiance of this and repeated orders. And in 1786 the Board of Revenue issued a proclamation declaring that any person levying such duties should be subject to corporal punishment, and that the zemindar in whose zemindarry such an offence might be committed, should forfeit his lands.

Still the evil practices went on until 1790, when Lord Cornwallis took up the matter with intelligence and determination. In the preceding year he had abolished all radaree duties in Behar and Benares, but the abuses in Bengal Proper seem to have been more swarming and persistent. On June 11, 1790, orders were issued resuming the collection of all duties indicated.
into the hands of Government; but this was followed after a few weeks (July 28) by an order abolishing them altogether, with some exceptions, which will be presently alluded to. This double step is explained by the Governor-General in a Minute dated July 18: “When I first proposed the resumption of the Sayer from the Landholders, it appeared to me advisable to continue the former collection (the unauthorised articles excepted) for the current year, in order that by the necessary accounts [we might have the means] for making a fair adjustment of the compensation, and at the same time acquire sufficient knowledge of the collections to enable us to enter upon the regulation of them from the commencement of the ensuing year. . . . The collections appear to be so numerous, and of so intricate a nature, as to preclude the possibility of regulating them all; and as the establishment of new rates for such articles as it might be thought advisable to continue would require much consideration, . . . I recommend that, instead of continuing the collection . . . for the current year . . . all the existing articles of Sayer collection (with the exception of the Abkarry (Abkarse) . . .) be immediately abolished; and that the Collectors be directed to withdraw their officers from the Gunges, Bazars and Hants,” compensation being duly made. The Board of Revenue could then consider on what few articles of luxury in general consumption it might be proper to reimpose a tax.

The Order of July 28 abolished “all duties, taxes, and collections coming under the denomination of Sayer (with the exception of the Government and Calcutta Customs, the duties levied on pilgrims at Gya, and other places of pilgrimage,—the Abkarry . . . which is to be collected on account of the Government . . . the collections made in the Gunges, Bazars and Hants situated within the limits of Calcutta, and such collections as are confirmed to the landholders and the holders of Gunges &c. by the published Resolutions of June 11, 1790, namely, rent paid for the use of land (and the like) . . . or for orchards, pasture-ground, or fisheries sometimes included in the sayer under the denomination of phulkur (Hind. phalkar, from phal, ‘fruit’), bunkur (from Hind. ban, ‘forest or pasture-ground’), and julkur (Hind. jalkar, from jal, ‘water’) . . .” These Resolutions are printed with Regn. XXVII. of 1793.

By an order of the Board of Revenue of April 28, 1790, correspondence regarding Sayer was separated from ‘Land Revenue’; and on the 16th idem the Abkarry was separately regulated.

The amount in the Accounts credited as Land Revenue in Bengal seems to have included both Sayer and Abkarry down to the Accts. presented to Parliament in 1796. In the “Abstract Statement of Receipts and Disbursements of the Bengal Government” for 1793-94, the “Collections under head of Sayer and Abkarry” amount to Rs. 10,98,256. In the Accounts, printed in 1799, for 1794-5 to 1796-7, the “Land and Sayer Revenues” are given, but Abkari is not mentioned. Among the Receipts and Disbursements for 1800-1 appears “Sayer Collections, including Abkaree, 7,81,925.” These forms appear to have remained in force down to 1833. In the accounts presented in 1834, from 1828-9, to 1831-2, with Estimate for 1832-3, Land Revenue is given separately, and next to it Sayer and Abkaree Revenue. Except that the spelling was altered back to Sayer and Abkarry, this remained till 1856. In 1857 the accounts for 1854-5 showed in separate lines,—

Land Revenue,
Excise Duties, in Calcutta, Sayer Revenue,
Abkarry ditto.

In the accounts for 1861-2 it became—

Land Revenue,
Sayer and Miscellaneous,
Abkaree,

and in those for 1863-4 Sayer vanished altogether.

The term Sayer has been in use in Madras and Bombay as well as in Bengal. From the former we give an example under 1802; from the latter we have not met with a suitable quotation.

The following entries in the Bengal accounts for 1858-59 will exemplify the application of Sayer in the more recent times of its maintenance:

Under Bengal, Behar and Orissa:
Sale of Trees and Sunken Boats . . . Rs. 555 0 0

(Under Pugu and Martaban Provinces:

1802.—"The Government having reserved to itself the entire exercise of its discretion in continuing or abolishing, temporarily or permanently, the articles of revenue included according to the customs and practice of the country, under the several heads of salt and saltpetre,—or the sayer or duties by sea or land,—of the abkarry . . . .—of the excise . . . .—of all taxes personal and professional, as well as those derived from markets, fairs and bazaars,—of labkira (see LACKERAGE) lands. . . . The permanent land-tax shall be made exclusively of the said articles now recited." —Madras Regulation, XXV. § iv.

1817.—"Besides the land-revenue, some other duties were levied in India, which were generally included under the denomination of Sayer." —Mill, H. of Br. India, v. 417.

1863.—"The next head was 'Sayer,' an obsolete Arabic word, which has the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.' It has latterly been composed of a variety of items connected with the Land Revenue, of which the Revenue derived from Forests has been the most important. The progress of improvement has given a value to the Forests which they never had before, and it has been determined . . . . to constitute the Revenue derived from them a separate head of the Public Accounts. The other Miscellaneous Items of Land Revenue which appeared under 'Sayer,' have therefore been added to Land Revenue, and that remains has been denominated 'Forest Revenue.'" —Sir C. Trenlyan, Financial Statement, dd. April 30.

SCAVENTGER, s. We have been rather startled to find among the MS. records of the India Office, in certain "Lists of Persons in the Service of the Right. Honble. the East India Company, in Fort St. George, and the other Places on the Coast of Choromandell," beginning with Febry. 1704, and in the entries for that year, the following:

"Fort St. David."

"5. Trevor Gaines, Land Customer and Scavenger of Cuddalore, 5th Councl."

"7. John Buitt, Scavenger and Corn-

Under 1714 we find again, at Fort St. George:

"Joseph Smart, Rentall General and Scavenger, 8th of Council."

and so on, in the entries of most years down to 1761, when we have, for the last time:

"Samuel Wridley, 7th of Council, Masuli-

Some light is thrown upon this surprising occurrence of such a term by a reference to Cowle's Law Dictionary, or The Interpreter (published originally in 1607) new ed. of 1727, where we read:

"Scavage, Scavagium. It is otherwise called Scheewage, Shewage, and Scheawing; maybe deduced from the Saxon Sceawian (Sceawian!) Ostendere, and is a kind of Toll or Custom exacted by Mayors, Sheriffs, &c., of Merchant-strangers, for Wares showed or offered for Sale within their Precincts, which is prohibited by the Statute 19 H. 7, 8. In a Charter of Henry the Second to the City of Canterbury it is written Scawinga, and (in Mon. Ang. 2, p. 890) Scawing; and elsewhere I find it in Latin Tributum Osternum. The City of London still retains the Custom, of which in An old printed Book of the Customs of London, we read thus, Of which Custom halfen del appertaineth to the Sheriffs, and the other halfen del to the Hosty in whose Houses the Merchants been lodged; And it is to see that Scawage is the Show by cause that Merchants (sic) shown unto the Sheriffs Merchandizes, of the which Customs ought to be taken ere that any thing thereof be sold, &c."

"Scatenger, From the Belgick Scawas, to scrape. Two of every Parish within London and the suburbs are yearly chosen into this Office, who hire men called Rakers, and carts, to cleanse the streets, and carry away the Dirt and Filth thereof, mentioned in 14 Car. 2, cap. 2. The Germans call him a Drecketrow, from one Simon, a noted Scavenger of Marpurg."

"Schulbins, The officer who collected the Scavage-Money, which was sometimes done with Extortion and great Oppression." (Then quotes Hist. of Durham from Wharton, Anglia Sacra, Pt. i. p. 75; "Anno 1311. Schavaldos insurgentes in Episcopatu (Richardus episcopus) fortiter compositi. Aliquí suspe-debantur, aliqui extra Episcopatum fugabaturn.")"

In Spelman also (Glossarium Archaeo-

The scavage then was a tax upon goods for sale which were liable to duty, the word being, as Skeat points out, a Low French (or Low Latin) formation from shew. ["From O.F. escawo-er, to examine, inspect. O. Sax. skawon, to behold; cognate with A.S. sceawian, to look at.""] (Concise Dict. s.v.)] And the scavenger or scaven ger was originally the officer charged with the inspection of the goods and collection of this tax. Passages quoted below from the Libr Albus of the City of London refer to these officers, and Mr. Riley in his translation of that work (1861, p. 34) notes that they were "Officers whose duty it was originally to take custom upon the Scavage, i.e. inspection of the opening out, of imported goods. At a later date, part of their duty was to see that the streets were kept clean; and hence the modern word 'scavenger,' whose office corresponds with the raker (raker) of former times." [The meaning and derivation of this word have been discussed in Notes & Queries, 2 ser. ix. 325; 5 ser. v. 49, 452.]

We can hardly doubt then that the office of the Coronandel scavenger of the 18th century, united as we find it with that of "Rentall General," or of Land-customer," and held by a senior member of the Company's Covenanted Service, must be understood in the older sense of Visitor or Inspector of Goods subject to duties, but (till we can find more light) we should suppose rather duties of the nature of bazar tax, such as at a later date we find classed as sayer (q.v.), than customs on imports from seaward. It still remains an obscure matter how the charge of the scavagers or scavengers came to be transferred to the oversight of streets and street-cleaning. That this must have become a predominant part of their duty at an early period is shown by the Scavenger's Oath which we quote below from the Liber Albus. In Skinner's Etymologicon, 1671, the definition is Collecter sordum abrasarium (erroneously connecting the word with shaving and scraping), whilst he adds: "Nostri Scavengres vilissimo omnium ministerio sordes et purgamenta urbis auferendi funguntur." In Cotgrave's English-French Dict., ed. by Howel, 1673, we have: "Scavengr. Boueure. Gadoour"—agreeing precisely with our modern use. Neither of these shows any knowledge of the less sordid office attaching to the name. The same remark applies to Lye's Juvius, 1743. It is therefore remarkable to find such a survival of the latter sense in the service of the Company, and coming down so late as 1761. It must have begun with the very earliest of the Company's establishments in India, for it is probable that the denomination was even then only a survival in England, due to the Company's intimate connection with the city of London. Indeed we learn from Mr. Norton, quoted below, that the term scavage was still alive within the City in 1829.

"Walterus Hermi et Willelmus de Dunolmo, Ballivi, ut Cuatodes... de Lxxv.i. vj. & x. de comsuetudinis omnemodarum mercandiarum venientium de partibus transmarinis ad Civitatem prae dictam, de quibus consuetudo debetur qua vocatur Scavagium..."—Mag. Rot. 59. Hon. III., extracted in T. Madox, H. and A., of Ed. Exchequer, 1779, l. 779.

"Serement de Scavageours.
Vous jurrez qu vous surveillez diligentieusement que les pavements dans vostre Garde soient bien et droiturement reparailles et nyent enchannees a nozance des veysens; et que les chemys, ruwas, et venelles soient nettes des fiens et de touts maners des ordures, pur honestee de la citee; et que toutz les chemynes, founes, terrailles soient de pierre, et suffisamment defensables encontre peril de few; et si vous trouves rien a contraire vous monstrez al Alderman, issint que l'Alderman ordigne pur amendement de celle. Et cos ne lernes, si Dieu vous eyde et les Saints."—Ibid. p. 318.

1694. — Letter from the Lords of the Council to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, requesting them to admit John de Cardenay to the office of Collector of Scavage, the reversion of which had been granted to him.—Index to the Remembrancia of the C. of London (1878), p. 284.

1807. — Letter from the Lord Mayor to the Lord Treasurer... enclosing a Petition from the Ward of Alderagate, complaining that William Court, an inhabitant of that Ward for 8 or 10 years past, refused to undergo the office of Scavenger in the Parish, claiming exemption... being privileged as Clerk to Sir William Spencer, Knight, one of the Auditors of the Court of Exchequer, and praying that Mr. Court, although privileged, should be directed to find a substitute or deputy and pay him.—Ibid. 288.

1823. — Letter... reciting that the City by ancient Charters held... "the office of Package and Scavage of Strangers' goods, and merchandise carried by them by land or water, out of the City and liberties to foreign parts, whereby the Customs and Duties due to H.M. had been more duly paid, and a stricter oversight taken of such commodities so exported."—Remembrancia, p. 321.

1832. — Order in Council, reciting that a Petition had been presented to the Board from divers Merchants born in London, the sons of Strangers, complaining that the "Packer of London required of them as much fees for Package, Balliage, Shewage, &c., as of Strangers not English-born..."—Ibid. 322.

1760. — "Mr. Handle, applying to the Board to have his allowance of Scavenger increased, and representing to us the great fatigue he undergoes, and loss of time, which the Board being very sensible of, Agreed we allow him Rs. 20 per month more than before on account of his diligence and assiduity in that post."—Pt. William Consm., in Long, 245. It does not appear from this what the duties of the scavenger in Mr. Handle's case were.

1829. — "The oversight of customary goods. This office, termed in Latin superstinus, is translated in another charter by the words search and surveying, and in the 2nd Charter of Charles II. it is termed the scavage, which appears to have been its most ancient and common name, and that which is retained to the present day.... The real nature of this duty is not a toll for showing, but a toll paid for the oversight of showing; and under that name (supervisus aperitio) it was claimed in an action of debt in the reign of Charles II. The duty performed was seeing and knowing the merchandise on which the King's import customs were paid, in order that no concealment, or fraudulent practices... should deprive the King of his just dues... (The duty) was well known under the name of scavage, in the time of Henry III., and it seems at that time to have been a franchise of the commonalty."—G. Norton, Commentaries on the Hist., d.o., of the City of London, 3rd ed. (1869), pp. 380-381.

Scymitar, s. This is an English word for an Asiatic sabre. The common Indian word is talwdr (see Tulwa). We get it through the French cimeter, Ital. scimitarra, and according to Marcel Devic originally from Pers. shamshir (shimshir as he writes it). This would be still more obscure unless we consider the constant clerical confusion in the Middle Ages between c and t, which has led to several metamorphoses of words; of which a notable example is Fr. carquois from Pers. tirkash. Scimitarra representing shamshir might equally thus become scimitarras. But we cannot prove this to have been the real origin. This word (shamaheers) was known to Greek writers. Thus:

C. A.D. 114.—"Δωρα χρημα Τοµαϊνυ υφασματα ωικα και σαμυφες αι δε ελει σταθυ επαραιμα."—Quoted in Suidas Lexicon, a.v.

1595.—"... By this scimitar,

* In a Greek translation of Shakspere, published some years ago at Constantinople, this line is omitted!

1610.—"... Anon the Patron starting up, as if of a sodaine restored to life; like a mad man skips into the boat, and drawing a Turkish Cymiter, beginneth to lay about him (thinking that his vesseall had been surprised by Parats), when they all leapt into the sea; and diving under water like so many Dues-dappers, ascended without the reach of his furie."—Sandy's Relation, &c., 1615, p. 28.

1614.—"... Some days ago I visited the house of a goldsmith to see a scimitar (scimitarras) that Nasuhkhasz the first vizir, whom I have mentioned above, had ordered as a present to the Grand Signor. Seacunny, s. This is, in the phraseology of the Anglo-Indian marine, a steersman or quartermaster. The word is the Pers. sukk'din, from Ar. sukk'din, a helm.'

c. 1580.—"As Mocadoues, Scocees. e Voges."—Primor e Honra, &c. i. 68s. ("To the Mocadoums, Seacunnies, and oarsmen."

SEBUNDY. 805

1810.—"The gunners and quartermasters... are Indian Portuguese; they are called Secunmies."—Maria Graham, 85.

1855.—... the Secunmies, or helmsmen, were principally Manila men."—Neele, Residence in Spain, 45.

SEBUNDY, s. Hind. from Pers. "sibbandi (sin, 'three'). It is applied to irregular native soldiery, a sort of militia, or imperfectly disciplined troops for revenue or police duties, &c. Certain local infantry regiments were formerly officially termed Sebundy. The last official appearance of the title that we can find is in application to "The Sebundy Corps of Sappers and Miners" employed at Darjeeling. This is in the E.I. Register down to July, 1869, after which the title does not appear in any official list. Of this corps, if we are not mistaken, the late Field-Marshal Lord Napier of Magdala was in charge, as Lieut. Robert Napier, about 1840. An application to Lord Napier, for corroboration of this reminiscence of many years back, drew from him the following interesting note:—

"Captain Gilmore of the (Bengal) Engineers was appointed to open the settlement of Darjeeling, and to raise two companies of Sebundy Sappers, in order to provide the necessary labour.

"He commenced the work, obtained some Native officers and N.C. officers from the old Bengal Sappers, and enlisted about half each company.

"The first season found the little colony quite unprepared for the early commencement of the Rains. All the Cailles, who did not die, fled, and some of the Sappers deserted. Gilmore got sick; and in 1838 I was suddenly ordered from the extreme border of Bengal—Nyacollie—to relieve him for one month. I arrived somehow, with a pair of pitahgs as my sole possession.

"Just then, our relations with Nepal became strained, and it was thought desirable to complete the Sebundy Sappers with men from the Border Hills unconnected with Nepal—Garrons and similar tribes. Through the Political Officer the necessary number of men were enlisted and sent to me.

"When they arrived I found, instead of the 'fair recruits' announced, a number of most unfit men; some of them more or less crippled, or with defective sight. It seemed probable that, by the process known to us in India as waddle budlee (see BULDEE), the original recruits had managed to insert substitutes during the journey! I was much embarrassed as to what I should do with them; but night was coming on, so I encamped them on the newly opened road, the only clear space amid the dense jungle on either side. To complete my difficulty it began to rain, and I pitted my poor recruits! During the night there was a storm—and in the morning, to my intense relief, they had all disappeared!"

"In the expressive language of my sergeant, there was not a 'visage' of the men left.

"The Sebundies were a local corps, designed to furnish a body of labourers fit for mountain-work. They were armed, and expected to fight if necessary. Their pay was 8s. a month, instead of a Sepoy's. The pensions of the Native officers were smaller than in the regular army, which was a ground of complaint with the Bengal Sappers, who never expected in accepting the new service that they would have lower pensions than those they enlisted for.

"I eventually completed the corps with Nepalese, and, I think, left them in a satisfactory condition.

"I was for a long time their only sergeant-major. I supplied the Native officers and N.C. officers from India with a good peajacket each, out of my private means, and with a little gold-lace made them smart and happy.

"When I visited Darjeeling again in 1872, I found the remnant of my good Sapper officers living as pensioners, and waiting to give me an affectionate welcome.

"My month's acting appointment was turned into four years. I walked 30 miles to get to the place, lived much in hovels and temporary huts thrown up by the Hill-men, and derived more benefit from the climate than from my previous visit to England. I think I owe much practical teaching to the Hill-men, the Hills and the Climate. I learnt the worst the elements could do to me—very nearly—excepting earthquakes! And I think I was thus prepared for any hard work."

"At Dacca I made acquaintance with my venerable friend John Cowe. He had served in the Navy so far back as the memorable siege of Havannah, was reduced when a lieutenant, at the end of the American War, went out in the Company's military service, and here I found him in command of a regiment of Sebundees, or native militia."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in L. of the Lindsays, iii. 161.

1875.—"The Board were pleased to direct that in order to supply the place of the Sebundy corps, four regiments of Sepoys be employed in securing the collection of the revenues."—In Seton-Karr, i. 92

SEEDY, s. Hind. std; Arab. saiyid, 'lord' (whence the Cid of Spanish romantic history), saiyydi, 'my lord'; and Mahr. sidiihi. Properly an honorific name given in Western India to African Mahommedans, of whom many held high positions in the service of the kings of the Deccan.
Of these at least one family has survived in princely position to our own day, viz. the Navab of Jangira (see JUNGEERA), near Bombay. The young heir to this principality, Siddhi Ahmad, after a minority of some years, was installed in the Government in Oct., 1883. But the proper application of the word in the ports and on the shipping of Western India is to negroes in general. [It is a title still applied to holy men in Marocco and the Maghrib; on the East African cost it is assumed by negro and ebroid Moslems, e.g. Sidi Mubarak Bombay; and 'Seedy boy' is the Anglo-Indian term for a Zanzibari-man (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 231).]

SEEMUL, SIMMUL, &c. (sometimes we have seen Symbol, and Cymbal), a. Hind. semal and sembhal; [Skt. šālmalī]. The (so-called) cotton-tree Bombax Malabaricum, D.C. (N.O. Malvaceae), which occurs sporadically from Malabar to Sylhet, and from Burma to the Indus and beyond. It is often cultivated. “About March it is a striking object with its immense buttressed trunks, and its large showy red flowers, 6 inches in breadth, clustered on the leafless branches. The flower-buds are used as a potherb and the gum as a medicine” (Punjab Plants). We remember to have seen a giant of this species near Kishangarh, the buttresses of which formed chambers, 12 or 13 feet long and 7 or 8 wide. The silky cotton is only used for stuffing pillows and the like. The wood, though wretched in quality for any ordinary purpose, lasts under water, and is commonly the material for the curbs on which wells are built and sunk in Upper India.

[c. 1807.—“... the Salmoii, or Simul ... is one of the most gaudy ornaments of the forest or village. ...”—Buchanan Hamilton, E. India, ii. 789.]

SEER, s. Hind. ser; Skt. setak. One of the most generally spread Indian denominations of weight, though, like all Indian measures, varying widely in different parts of the country. And besides the variations of local ser and ser we often find in the same locality a pakka (punca) and a kachchhā (cutchha) ser; a state of things, however, which is human, and not Indian only (see under PUCKA). The ser is generally (at least in upper India) equivalent to 80 tolas or rupee-weights; but even this is far from universally true. The heaviest ser in the Useful Tables (see Thomas’s ed. of Prinsep) is that called “Coolpahar,” equivalent to 123 tolas, and weighing 3 lbs. 1 oz. 6¼ dr. avoird.; the lightest is the ser of Malabar and the S. Mahratta country, which is little more than 8 oz. [The Macleod ser of Malabar, introduced in 1802, is of 130 tolas; 10 of these weigh 33 lb. (Madras Man. ii. 516).]

Regulation VII. of the Govt. of India of 1833 is entitled “A Reg. for altering the weight of the Furruckabud Rupee (see RUPEE) and for assimilating it to the legal currency of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies; for adjusting the weight of the Company’s sicca Rupee, and for fixing a standard unit of weight for India.” This is the nearest thing to the establishment of standard weights that existed up to 1870. The preamble says: “It is further convenient to introduce the weight of the Furruckabud Rupee as the unit of a general system of weights for Government transactions throughout India.” And Section IV. contains the following:

“The Tola or Sicca weight to be equal to 180 grains troy, and the other denominations or weights to be derived from this unit, according to the following scale:—

8 Bunties = 1 Masha = 15 troy grains.
12 Mashas = 1 Tola = 180 ditto.
80 Tolás (or sicca weight) = 1 Seer = 24 lbs. troy.
40 Seers = 1 Mūn or Bazar Māund = 100 lbs. troy.”

Section VI. of the same Regulation says:

“The system of weights and measures (?) described in Section IV. is to be adopted at the mints and assay offices of Calcutta and Sāngor respectively in the adjustment and verification of all weights for government or public purposes sent thither for examination.”

But this does not go far in establishing a standard unit of weight for India: though the weights detailed in § iv. became established for Government purposes in the Bengal Presidency. The ser of this Regulation was thus 14,400 grains troy—2½ lbs. troy, 2057 lbs. avoirdupois.

In 1870, in the Government of Lord Mayo, a strong movement was made by able and influential men to introduce the metrical system, and an Act was passed called “The Indian Weights and Measures Act” (Act XI. of 1870) to pave the way for this. The preamble declares it expeditious to provide “for the ultimate adoption of an uniform system of weights and measures throughout British India, and the Act prescribes certain standards, with powers to the Local Governments to declare the adoption of these.

Section II. runs:

“Standards.—The primary standard of weight shall be called ser, and shall be a weight of metal in the possession of the Government of India, which weight, when weighed in a vacuum, is equal to the weight known in France as the kilogramme des Archives.”
Again, Act XXXI. of 1872, called “The Indian Weights and Measures of Capacity Act,” repeats in substance the same preamble and prescription of standard weight. It is not clear to us what the separate object of this second Act was. But with the death of Lord Mayo the whole scheme fell to the ground. The ser of these Acts would be 2 lbs. avoirdupois, or 0’143 of a pound greater than the 80 tola ser.

1554.—“Porto Grande de Bemgala.—‘The maund (mão) with which they weigh all merchandise is of 40 cers, each cer 18½ ounces; the said maund weighs 46½ arrobas (rotile).”—A. Nunes, 37.

1648.—“One Cer weighs 18 peyzen... and makes ½ pound Troy weight.”—Van Twist, 62.

SEER-FISH, s. A name applied to several varieties of fish, species of the genus Cybium. When of the right size, neither too small nor too big, these are reckoned among the most delicate of Indian sea-fish. Some kinds salt well, and are also good for preparing as Tamarind-Fish. The name is sometimes said to be a corruption of Pers. sih (qu. Pers. ‘black?’) but the quotations show that it is a corruption of Port. serra. That name would appear to belong properly to the well-known saw-fish (Pristis) —see Bluteau, quoted below; but probably it may have been applied to the fish now in question, because of the serrated appearance of the rows of fins, behind the second dorsal and anal fins, which are characteristic of the genus (see Day’s Fishes of India, pp. 254-256, and plates lv., lvii.).

1554.—“Eu aos Marinheiros hum peixe serra per mae, a cada hum.”—A. Nunes, Livro dos Peixes, 43.

1698.—“There is a fish called Pexa Serra, which is cut in round pieces, as we cut Salmon and salt it. It is very good.”—Linschoten, 88; [Hakl. Soc. ii. 11].

1720.—“Peixe Serra is ordinarily produced in the Western Ocean, and is so called” etc. (describing the Saxe-fish). . . .

“But in the Sea of the Islands of Qui-rimba (i.e. off Mozambique) there is a different peixe serra resembling a large corvina,” but much better, and which it is the custom to pickle. When cooked it seems just like herring.”—Bluteau, Vocab. tbl. 666-667.

1727.—“They have great Plenty of Seer-fish, which is as savoury as a Salmon or Trout in Europe.”—A. Hamilton, i. 379; [ed. 1744, i. 382].

[1813.—“... the robal, the seer-fish, the grey mullet... are very good.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 36.]

1860.—“Of those in ordinary use for the table the finest by far is the Seer-fish, a species of Scomber, which is called Toru-natu by the natives. It is in size and very similar to the salmon, to which the flesh of the female fish, notwithstanding its white colour, bears a very close resemblance, both in firmness and in flavour.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, 205.

SEERPAW, s. A Pers. through Hind. sar-a-pd — ‘cap-a-pie.’ A complete suit, presented as a Khilat (Killut) or dress of honour, by the sovereign or his representative.

c. 1666.—“He... commanded, there should be given to each of them an embroider’d Vest, a Turban, and a Girdle of Silk Embroidery, which is that which they call Sar-apah, that is, an Habit from head to foot.”—Berner, E.T. 37; [ed. Constable, 147].

1673.—“Sir George Oxendine... had a Colat (Killut) or Serpaw, a Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul.”—Fryer, 87.

1680.—“Answear is returned that it hath not been accustomed for the Government to go out to receive a bare Phyrmanawd (Firman), except there come therewith a Serpaw or a Tashriffe (Tashreef).”—Fl. St. Geo. Com. Dec. 2, in N. & E. No. iii. 40.

1715.—“We were met by Padre Stephannus, bringing two Seer-paws.”—In Wheeler, ii. 245.

1727.—“As soon as he came, the King embraced him, and ordered a serpaw or a royal Suit to be put upon him.”—A. Hamilton, i. 171 [ed. 1744].

1735.—“The last Nabob (Sadatulla) would very seldom suffer any but himself to send a Serpaw; whereas in February last Suuta Sahib, Subder Ali Sahib, Jehare Khan and Imaum Sahib, had all of them taken upon them to send distinct Seer-paws to the President.”—In Wheeler, iii. 140.

1758.—“Another deputation carried six costly Seer-paws; these are garments which are presented sometimes by superiors in token of protection, and sometimes by inferiors in token of homage.”—Orme, i. 159.

* Corvina is applied by Cuvier, Cantor and others to fish of the genus Sciaena of more recent ichthyologists.
† “Cybium (Scomber, Linn.) guttatum.”—Tennent.
SEETULPUTTY. 809 SEPOY, SEAPOY.

SEETULPUTTY, s. A fine kind of mat made especially in Eastern Bengal, and used to sleep on in the cold weather. [They are made from the split stems of the mukta pata, Phrynium dichotomum, Roxb. (see Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. 216 seq.).] Hind. stulpatá, 'cold-slip.' Williams's spelling and derivation (from an Arab. word impossibly used, see SICLEEGUR) are quite erroneous.

1816.—"A very beautiful species of mat is made especially in the south-eastern districts . . . from a kind of reedy grass. . . . These are peculiarly slippery, whence they are designated 'seekul-patá' (i.e. polished sheets). . . . The principal use of the 'seekul-patá' are to be laid under the lower sheet of a bed, whereby to keep the body cool."—Williams, V. M. ii. 41.

[1818.—"Another kind (of mat) the shálúlpatá, laid on beds and couches on account of their coolness, are sold from one rupee to five each."—Word, Hindoos, i. 106.]

1839.—In Fallon's Dicty, we find the following Hindi riddle:—
"Cháin ká pyála faltá, kó jórta nahin;
Máli ji ká bag laga, kó jórta nahin;
Níá-patí bícháí, kó sóa nahin;
Ráj-baasi máá, kó ród nahin."

Which might be rendered:
"A china bowl that, broken, none can join;
A flowery field, whose blossoms none purloin;
A royal scion slain, and none shall weep;
A stulpatá spread where none shall sleep."

The answer is an Egg; the Starry Sky; a Snake (Ráj-baasi, 'royal scion,' is a placatory name for a snake); and the Sea.

SEMBALL, s. Malay-Javan. sambíl, símbal. A spiced condiment, the curry of the Archipelago. [Dennys (Descr. Dict. p. 337) describes many varieties.]

1817.—"The most common seasoning employed to give a relish to their insipid food is the tombock (i.e. red-pepper); triturated with salt it is called sambal."—Raffles, H. of Java, ii. 98.

SEPOY, SEAPOY. s. In Anglo-Indian use a native soldier, disciplined and dressed in the European style. The word is Pers. sipáh, from sipáh, 'soldiery, an army'; which J. Oppert traces to old Pers. spáda, 'a soldier' (Le peuple et la Langue des Médes, 1879, p. 24). But Sáh is a horseman in Armenian; and sound etymologists connect sipáh with ap, 'a horse'; [others with Skt. pádáti, 'a foot-soldier']. The original word sipáh occurs frequently in the poems of Amir Khusrú (c. a.d. 1300), bearing always probably the sense of a 'horse-soldier,' for all the important part of an army then consisted of horsemen. See spáh below.

The word sepoy occurs in Southern India before we had troops in Bengal; and it was probably adopted from Portuguese. We have found no English example in print older than 1750, but probably an older one exists. The India Office record of 1747 from Fort St. David's is the oldest notice we have found in extant MS. [But see below.]

1830.—"Pride had inflated his brain with wind, which extinguished the light of his intellect, and a few sipáhs from Hindustán, without any religion, had supported the credit of his authority."—Amir Khuzár, in Elliot, iii. 539.

1865.—"Souldier—Suppya and Haddee."—Persian Gloss. in Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1877, p. 99.]

1862.—"As soon as these letters were sent away, I went immediately to Ray Nundall's to have ye Seappy, or Nabob's horseman, consigned to me, with order to see ye Persanna put in execution; but having thought better of it, ye Ray desired me to have patience till tomorrow morning. He would then present me to the Nabob, whose commands to ye Seappy and Bulchunds Vebert would be more powerfull and advantageous to me than his own."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 55, seq. Here we see the word still retaining the sense of 'horseman' in India.

1717.—"A Company of Sepoys with the colours."—Vité, in dicta, II. ex. On this Sir H. Yule notes: "This is an occurrence of the word sepoy, in its modern signification, 30 years earlier than any I had been able to find when publishing the A.-I. Gloss. I have one a year earlier, and expect now to find it earlier still."

1733.—"You are next . . . to make a complete survey . . . of the number of fighting Sepoys. . . ."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 56.]

1737.—"Elle com tota forza desponsável, que eram 1156 soldados pagos em que entram 281 chegados na mão Mercês, e 780 tipos ou lascars (lascars), recruteados ou de território."—Boquejo dos Possessos Portugueses no Oriente, &c., por Joaquim Pedro Celestino Soares, Lisboa, 1851, p. 58.

1746.—"The Enemy, by the best Intelligence that could be got, and best Judgment that could be formed, had or would have on Shore next Morning, upwards of 3000 Europeans, with at least 500 Cofrys, and a number of Cephoys and Peons."—Ext. of Diary, &c., in App. to A Letter to a Propr. of the E. I. Co., London, 1750, p. 94.

[1746.—Their strength on shore I compute 2000 Europeans Scopials and 300 Coffeers.—Letter from Madras, Oct. 9, in Bengal Consultations. Ibid. p. 800, we have Scopials.

1747.—"At a Council of War held at Fort St. David the 26th December, 1747.

Present:—
Charles Floyer, Esq., Governor.
George Gibson
John Holland
John Crompton
John Rodolph de Gingens
William Brown
John Ugate
Robert Sanderson.

"It is further ordered that Capt'n Crompton keep the Detachment under his Command at Cuddalore, in a readiness to march upon the enemy at the drift of a Choutry; to order against the Fort as soon as the Signal shall be made from the Place, and then upon his firing two Muskets, Boats shall be sent to bring them here, and to leave a serjeant at Cuddalore who shall conduct his Seapoy to the Garden Guard, and the Serjeant shall have a Word by which He shall be received at the Garden."—Original MS. Proceedings (in the India Office).

The Council of Fort St. David write to Bombay, March 16th, "if they could not supply us with more than 300 Europeans, We should be glad of Five or Six Hundred of the best Northern People their way, as they are reported to be much better than ours, and not so liable to Desertion."

In Consn. May 30th they record the arrival of the ships Leven, Warwick, and Lichester, Princess Augusta; "on the 28th inst., from Bombay, (bringing) us a General from that Presidency," as entered No. 38, advising of having sent us by them sundry stores and a Reinforcement of Men, consisting of 70 European Soldiers, 200 Topasses (Topasses), and 100 well-trained Seapois, all of which under the command of Capt. Thomas Andrews, a Good Officer. . . .

And under July 13th. "The Reinforcement of Seapois having arrived from Tellicherry, which, with those that were sent from Bombay, making a formidable Body, besides what are still expected; and as there is far greater Dependance to be placed on those People than on our own Peons . . . many of whom have a very weakly Appearance, AGREE, that a General Review be now had of them, that all such may be discharged, and only the Choicest of them continued in the Service."—M.S. Records in India Office.

1752.—". . . they quit their entrenchments on the first day of March, 1752, and advanced in order of battle, taking possession of a rising ground on the right, on which they placed 50 Europeans; the front consisted of 1500 Sipois, and one hundred and twenty or thirty French."—Complete Hist. of the War in India, 1761, pp. 9-10.

1758.—A Tabular Statement (Mappe) of the Indian troops, 20th Jan. of this year, shows "Corpo de Sipais" with 1162 "Sipais promptos."—Bosporo, as above.

"A stout body of near 1000 Seopys has been raised within these few days."—In Long, 184.

[1759.—"Boat rice extraordinary for the Gentoo Scopols. . . ."—Ibid. 174.]

1768.—"The Indian natives and Moors, who are trained in the European manner, are called Seopys."—Orme, i. 80.

1768.—"Major Carnac . . . observes that your establishment is loaded with the expense of more Captains than need be, owing to the unnecessarily making it a point that they should be Captains who command the Seopy Battalions, whereas such is the nature of Seopys that it requires a peculiar genius and talent to be qualified for that service, and the Battalion should be given only to such who are so without regard to rank."—Court's Letter. of March 9. In Long, 250.

1770.—"England has at present in India an establishment to the amount of 9600 European troops, and 54,000 sipahis well armed and disciplined."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 458.

1774.—"Sipais sono li soldati Indiani."—Della Tomba, 207.

1778.—"La porta del Ponte della città si custodiva dalli sipais soldati Indiani radunati da tutte le tribù, a religione."—Fra Paolino, Viaggio, 4.

1780.—"Next morning the sepoys came to see me . . . I told him that I owed him my life . . . He then told me that he was not very rich himself, as his pay was only a pagoda and a half a month—and at the same time drew out his purse and offered me a rupee. This generous behaviour, so different to what I had hitherto experienced, drew tears from my eyes, and I thanked him for his generosity, but I would not take his money."—Hon. J. Lindsay's Imprisonment, Lives of Lindsay, iii. 274.

1782.—"As to Europeans who run from their natural colours, and enter into the service of the country powers, I have heard one of the best officers the Company ever had . . . say that he considered them no otherwise than as so many Seopys; for acting under blacks they became mere blacks in spirit."—Price, Some Observations, 96-98.

"There was not a captain, nor scarce a sepoys.
But a Prince would depose, or a Brahmin destroy."—Letter of Simpkin the Second, &c., 8.

1808.—"Our troops behaved admirably: the sepoys astonished me."—Wellington, ii. 384

* Not a general officer, but a letter from the body of the Council.
1827.—"He was betrothed to the daughter of a Sipahie, who served in the mud-fort which they saw at a distance rising above the jungle."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

1836.—"The native army of the E. I. Company. . . their formation took place in 1767. They are usually called sepoys, and are light and short."—In R. Phillips, A Million of Facts, 718.

1881.—"As early as A.D. 1592 the chief of Sindh had 200 natives dressed and armed like Europeans: these were the first 'sepoys.'"—Burton's Camoens, A Commentary, ii. 445.

The French write cipaye or cipai:

1759.—"De quinze mille Cipayes dont l'armée est censée composée, j'en compte à peu près huit cent sur la route de Pondicherry, chargé de sucre et de poivre et autres marchandises, quant aux Coulis, ils sont tous employés pour le même objet."—Letter of Lally to the Governor of Pondicherry, in Cambridge's Account, p. 150.

c. 1835-39.—
"Il ne criant ni Kriss ni zagaires, Ilregarde l'homme sans fuir,
Et rit des balles des cipayes
Qui rebondissent sur son cuir."

Th. Gautier, L'Hippopotame.

Since the conquest of Algeria the same word is common in France under another form, viz., spéhi. But the Spahi is totally different from the sepoy, and is in fact an irregular horseman. With the Turks, from whom the word is taken, the spéhi was always a horseman.

1554.—"Aderant magnis muneribus praepositii multi, aderant praeteriori equites ommes Spahi, Garipugi, Ulufigi, Giamzarorum magnus numerus, sed nullius in tanto convenitu nobilis nisi ex suis virtutibus et fortibus facti."—Busbroq, Epitomae, i. 90.

1672.—"Mille ou quinze cents Spahis, tous bien équipés et bien montés . . . terminoient toute ceste longue, magnifique, et pompeuse cavalcade."—Journal d'Ant. Galland, i. 142.

1675.—"The other officers are the sardar (Sirdar), who commands the Janizaries . . . the Spahi Aga, who commands the Spahies or Turkish Horse."—Wheeler's Journal, 348.

[1886.—"I being providentially got over the river before the Spahies employed by them could give them intelligence."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 229.]

1788.—"The Arab and other inhabitants are obliged, either by long custom . . . or from fear and compulsion, to give the Spahies and their company the monnath

. . . which is such a sufficient quantity of provision for ourselves, together with straw and barley for our mules and horses."—Shaw's Travels in Barbary, ed. 1757, p. xii.

1786.—"Bajazet had two years to collect his forces . . . we may discriminate the janizaries . . . a national cavalry, the Spahis of modern times."—Gibbon, ch. lxv.

1877.—"The regular cavalry was also originally composed of tribute children. . . . The sipahi acquired the same pre-eminence among the cavalry which the janizaries held among the infantry, and their sedition conduct rendered them much sooner troublesome to the Government."—Finlay, H. of Greece, ed. 1877, v. 37.

SERAI, SERYE. a. This word is used to represent two Oriental words entirely different.

a. Hind. from Pers. sard, sarai. This means originally an edifice, a palace. It was especially used by the Tartars when they began to build palaces. Hence Sarthi, the name of more than one royal residence of the Mongol Khans upon the Volga, the Sarra of Chaucer. The Russians retained the word from their Tartar oppressors, but in their language sarai has been degraded to mean 'a shed.' The word, as applied to the Palace of the Grand Turk, became, in the language of the Levantine Franks, serail and serraglio. In this form, as P. della Valle lucidly explains below, the "striving after meaning" connected the word with Ital. serrato, 'shut up'; and with a word serraglio perhaps previously existing in Italian in that connection. [Serraglio, according to Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s. v.) is "formed with suffix-aglio (L. aculum) from Late Lat. serare, 'to bar, shut in'—Lat. sera, a 'bar, bolt'; Lat. serere, 'to join together.' It is this association that has attached the meaning of 'women's apartments' to the word. Sarai has no such specific sense.

But the usual modern meaning in Persia, and the only one in India, is that of a building for the accommodation of travellers with their pack-animals; consisting of an enclosed yard with chambers round it.

Recurring to the Italian use, we have seen in Italy the advertisement of a travelling menagerie as Serraglio di Belve. A friend tells us of an old Scotchman whose ideas must have run in this groove, for he used to talk of 'a Serraglio of blackguards.' In the Diary in England of Annibale Litolfi of Mantua the writer says: "On entering the tower there is a Serraglio in which, from grandeur, they keep lions and tigers and cat-lions." (See Rawdon Browne's Calendar of Papers in Archives of Venice, vol. vi. pt. iii. 1657-8. App.) [The Stanf. Dict. quotes Evelyn as using the word of a place where persons are confined : 1644. "I passed by the Piazza Juda, where their serraglio begins" (Diary, ed. 1872, i. 142.)

c. 1584.— "At Saraium Turcia palatium principis est, vel aliiun amplum aedificium, non a Car* voce Tatarica, quae regem significat, dictum ; vnde Reineccius Sarag- lianm Turcia vocari putet, ut regiam. Nam alia quoque domus, extra Sultani regiam, nomen hoc ferunt . . . vt ampla Turcoorum hospitia, sive diversiora publica, quae vulgo Caramansaray (Caramanseray) nostri vocant."—Leunclauius, ed. 1650, p. 403.

1609.— "... by it the great Seray, besides which are divers others, both in the city and suburbs, wherein divers neede lodgings are to be let, with doores, lockes, and keys to each."—W. Fisch, in Purchas, i. 434.

1614.— "This term serraglio, so much used among us in speaking of the Grand Turk's dwelling . . . has been corrupted into that form from the word serai, which in their language signifies properly ' a palace. . . . But since this word serai resembles serraiolo, as a Venetian would call it, or serraglio as we say, and seeing that the palace of the Turk is (seralto or) shut up all round by a strong wall, and also because the women and a great part of the courtiers dwell in it barred up and shut in, so it may perchance have seemed to some to have deserved such a name. And thus the real term serai has been converted into ser- raglio."—P. della Valle, i. 36.

1615.— "Onely from one dayes Journey to another the Sophie hath caused to be erected certaine kind of great harbours, or huge lodgings (like hamlets) called caravan-sara, or suroyses, for the benefite of Caravans. . . ."—De Montfort, 8.

1616.— "In this kingdom there are no Innes to entertainge strangers, only in great Townes and Cities are faire Houses built for their receit, which they call Sarry, not inhabited, where any Passenger may haue roome freely, but must bring with him his Bedding, his Cooke, and other necessaries."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1475.

1638.— "Which being done we departed from our Sarry (or Inne)."—W. Brutton, in Halk. v. 49.

* On another B.M. copy of an earlier edition than that quoted, and which belonged to Jos. Scaliger, there is here a note in his autograph: "Id est Carazer, non est vox Tatarica, sed Vindica seu Illyrica, ex Latino detorta."

1648.— "A great saray or place for housing travelling folk."—Van Twist, 17.

[1754.— "... one of the Sciddees (seedy) officers with a party of men were lodged in the Sorroy. . . ."—Forster, Bombay Letters, i. 307.]

1782.— "The stationery tenants of the Serawss, many of them women, and some of them very pretty, approach the traveller on his entrance, and in allowing language describe to him the varied excellencies of their several lodgings."—Forster, Journey, ed. 1806, i. 86.

1825.— "The whole number of lodgers in and about the serai, probably did not fall short of 500 persons. What an admirable scene for an Eastern romance would such an inn as this afford!"—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 122.

1850.— "He will find that, if we omit only three names in the long line of the Delhi Emperors, the comfort and happiness of the people were never contemplated by them; and with the exception of a few sarais and bridges,—and these only on roads traversed by the imperial camps—he will see nothing in which purely selfish consideratıons did not prevail."—Sir H. M. Elliot, Original Preface to Historians of India, Elliot, i. xxiii.

b. A long-necked earthenware (or metal) flagon for water; a goglet (q.v.). This is Ar.—P. purdah. [This is the dorah or bulleh of Egypt, of which Lane (Mod. Egypt. ed. 1871, i. 186 seq.) gives an account with illustrations.]

c. 1666.— "... my Nasab having vouch-safed me a very particular favour, which is, that he hath appointed to give me every day a new loaf of his house, and a Souray of the water of Ganges . . . Souray is that Tin-flagon full of water, which the Servant that marcheth on foot before the Gentleman on horseback, carrieth in his hand, wrappt up in a sleeve of red cloth."—Bernier, E.T. 114; [ed. Constable, 356].

1808.— "We had some bread and butter, two suraues of water, and a bottle of brandy."—Elphinstone, in Lijr, i. 183.

[1880.— "The best known is the gilt silver work of Cashmere, which is almost confined to the production of the water-vessels or sarais, copied from the clay goblets in use throughout the northern parts of the Panjab."—Birdwood, Indust. Arts of India, 149.]

SERANG, s. A native boatswain, or chief of a lascar crew; the skipper of a small native vessel. The word is Pers. sarhang, 'a commander or overseer.' In modern Persia it seems to be used for a colonel (see Wills, 80).

1599.— "... there set sail two Portugese vessels which were come to Amaclo (Macao) from the City of Goa, as occurs every year. They are commanded by Captains, with Pilots, quartermasters, clerks, and other officers, who are Portuguese; but manned by sailors who are Arabs, Turks, Indians, and Bengalis, who serve for so much a month, and provide themselves under the direction and command of a chief of their own whom they call the Saranghi, who also belongs to one of these nations, whom they understand, and recognise and obey, carrying out the orders that the Portuguese Captain, Master, or Pilot may give to the said Saranghi."—Carletti, V'sagyi, ii. 206.

1890.—"Indus quem de hoc Ludo consuluit fuit scriba matris peritus ab officio in nave sub dictu es sarang, Anglico Sanctissimae sed Nisson."—Hyde, De Lutis Orient. in Synagoga, ii. 284.

1822.—"... the ghant syrangs (a class of men equal to the kidnappers of Holland and the crimps of England). ..."—Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 256.

SERAPHIN. See XERAFIN.

SERENDIB, n.p. The Arabic form of the name of Ceylon in the earlier Middle Ages. (See under CEYLON.)

SERINGAPATAM, n.p. The city which was the capital of the Kingdom of Mysore during the reigns of Hyder Ali and his son Tippoo. Written Śrī-rāṇga-pattana, meaning according to vulgar interpretation 'Vishnū's Town.' But as both this and the other Srirangam (Seringam town and temple, so-called, in the Trichinopoly district) are on islands of the Cauvry, it is possible that rāṇga stands for Lanka, and that the true meaning is 'Holy-Isle-Town.'

[SERPEYCH, a. Pers. sarpech, sarpest; an ornament of gold, silver or jewels, worn in front of the turban; it sometimes consists of gold plates strung together, each plate being set with precious stones. Also a band of silk and embroidery worn round the turban.

[1758.—"... a fillet. This they call sarpech, which is wore round the turban; persons of great distinction generally have them set with precious stones."—Hawney, iv. 191.

[1786.—"Surpashess." See under CUL-GE.

[1813.—"Serpeych." See under KIL-LUT.

SETT, s. Properly Hind. seth, which according to Wilson is the same word with the Chetti (see CHETTY) or Shetti of the Malabar Coast, the different forms being all from Skt. śreṣṭha, 'best, or chief,' śreṣṭhī, 'the chief of a corporation, a merchant or banker.' C. P. Brown entirely denies the identity of the S. Indian shetti' with the Skt. word (see CHETTY).

1740.—"The Setts being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Flick Chund (sic.), they being of a different caste; and consequently they could not do business with them."—In Long, p. 9.

1757.—"To the Setts Mootabray and Roopchund the Government of Chandunagore was indebted a million and a half Rupees."—Orme, ii. 138 of reprint (Bk. viii.).

1770.—"As soon as an European arrived the Gentoo, who know mankind better than is commonly supposed, study his character ... and lend or procure him money upon bottomry, or at interest. This interest, which is usually 9 per cent. at this is higher when he is under a necessity of borrowing of the Cheyks."

"These Cheyks are a powerful family of Indians, who have, time immemorial, inhabited the banks of the Ganges. Their riches have long ago procured them the management of the bank belonging to the Court. ..."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 427. Note that by Cheyks the Abbé means Setts.

[1883.—"... from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin a security endorsed by the Mathura Seth is as readily convertible into cash as a Bank of England Note in London or Paris."—F. S. Grose, Mathura, 14.]

SETTLEMENT, s. In the Land Revenue system of India, an estate or district is said to be settled, when instead of taking a quota of the year's produce the Government has agreed with the cultivators, individually or in community, for a fixed sum to be paid at several periods of the year, and not liable to enhancement during the term of years for which the agreement or settlement is made. The operation of arranging the terms of such an agreement, often involving tedious and complicated considerations and enquiries, is known as the process of settlement. A Permanent Settlement is that in which the annual payment is fixed in perpetuity. This was introduced in Bengal by Lord Cornwallis in 1793, and does not exist except within that great Province, [and a few districts in the Benares division of the N.W.P., and in Madras.]
SEVEN PAGODAS, n.p. The Tam. Mavallipuram, Skt. Mahabali-pura, 'the City of the Great Bali,' a place midway between Sadras and Covelong. But in one of the inscriptions (about 620 A.D.) a King, whose name is said to have been Amara, is described as having conquered the chief of the Mahamalla race. Malla was probably the name of a powerful highland chieftain subdued by the Chalukyas. (See Croie, Man. of Chingleput, 92 seq.) Dr. Oppert (Orig. Inhabit., 98) takes the name to be de-erved from the Malla or Palli race.

SEVEN SISTERS, or BROTHERS. The popular name (Hind. sati-bhati) of a certain kind of bird, about the size of a thrush, common throughout most parts of India, Malacocercus terreiclor, Hodgson, 'Bengal babbler' of Jerdon. The latter author gives the native name as Seven Brothers, which is the form also given in the quotation below from Tribes on My Frontier. The bird is so named from being constantly seen in little companies of about that number. Its characteristics are well given in the quotations. See also Jerdon's Birds (Godwin-Austen's ed., ii. 59). In China certain birds of starling kind are called by the Chinese pa-ka, or 'Eight Brothers,' for a like reason. See Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist, 1866, p. 319. (See MYNA.)

1878. — "The Seven Sisters pretend to feed on insects, but that is only when they cannot get peas . . . sad-coloured birds hopping about in the dust, and incessantly talking whilst they hop." — Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 30-31.

1883. — "... the Sathbi or 'Seven Brothers' . . . are too shrewd and knowing to be made fun of. . . Among themselves they will quarrel for the hour, and bandy foul language like fishwives; but let a stranger treat one of their number with disrespect, and the other six are in arms at once. . . Each Presidency of India has its own branch of this strange family. Here (at Bombay) they are brothers, and in Bengal they are sisters; but everywhere, like Wordsworth's opinionative child, they are seven." — Tribes on My Frontier, 143.

SEVENDROOG, n.p. A somewhat absurd corruption, which has been applied to two forts of some fame, viz.:

a. Suvarna-druga, or Suwandra, on the west coast, about 78 m. below Bombay (Lat. 17° 48' N.). It was taken in 1755 by a small naval force from Tulajj Angria, of the famous piratical family. [For the commander of the expedition, Commodore James, and his monument on Shooter's Hill, see Dougias, Bombay and W. India, i. 117 seq.]

b. Swandra; a remarkable double hill-fort in Mysore, standing on a two-topped bare rock of granite, which was taken by Lord Cornwallis's army in 1791 (Lat. 12° 55'). [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 228, ii. 232) calls it Sevenity Droog, and Sevendroog.]

SEYCHELLE ISLANDS, n.p. A cluster of islands in the Indian Ocean, politically subordinate to the British Government of Mauritius, lying between 3° 40' & 4° 50' S. Lat., and about 950 sea-miles east of Mombas on the E. African coast. There are 29 or 30 of the Seychelles proper, of which Mahé, the largest, is about 17 m. long by 3 or 4 wide. The principal islands are granitic, and rise "in the centre of a vast plateau of coral" of some 120 m. diameter.

These islands are said to have been visited by Soares in 1506, and were known vaguely to the Portuguese navigators of the 16th century as the Seven Brothers (Os sete Irmanos or Hermanos), sometimes Seven Sisters (Seta Irmanas), whilst in Delisle's Map of Asia (1700) we have both "les Sept Frères" and "les Sept Souris." Adjoining these on the W. or S.W. we find also on the old maps a group called the Almirantes, and this group has retained that name to the present day, constituting now an appendage of the Seychelles.

The islands remained uninhabited, and apparently unvisited, till near the middle of the 16th century. In 1742 the celebrated Mahé de la Bourdonnais, who was then Governor of Mauritius and the Isle of Bourbon, despatched two small vessels to explore the islands of this little archipelago, an expedition which was renewed by Lazare Picault, the commander of one of the two vessels, in 1774, who gave to the principal island the name of Mahé, and to the group the name of Iles de Bourdonnais, for which Iles Mahé (which is the name given in the
A question naturally has suggested itself to us as to how the group came by the name of the Seychelles Islands; and it is one to which no trustworthy answer will be easily found in English, if at all. Even French works of pretension (e.g. the Dictionnaire de la Rousse) are found to state that the islands were named after the “Minister of Marine, Herault de Sèchelles, who was eminent for his services and his able administration. He was the first to establish a French settlement there.” This is quoted from La Rousse; but the fact is that the only man of the name known to fame is the Jacobin and friend of Danton, along with whom he perished by the guillotine. There never was a Minister of Marine so called! The name Sèchelles first (so far as we can learn) appears in the Hydrographie Française of Belin, 1767, where in a map entitled Carte réduite du Canal de Mozambique the islands are given as Les Îles Sèchelles, with two enlarged plans en cartouche of the Port de Sèchelles. In 1767 also Chev. de Grenier, commanding the Heure du Berger, visited the Islands, and in his narrative states that he had with him the chart of Picault, “envoyé par Le Bourdonnais pour reconnoître les îles des Sept Frères, lesquelles ont été depuis nommées îles Mahé et ensuite îles Sèchelles.” We have not been able to learn by whom the latter name was given, but it was probably by Morphey of the Cerf; for among Dalrymple’s Charts (pub. 1771), there is a “Plan of the Harbour adjacent to Bat River on the Island Seychelles, from a French plan made in 1756, published by Bellin.” And there can be no doubt that the name was bestowed in honour of Moreau de Sèchelles, who was Contrôleur-Général des Finances in France in 1754-56, i.e. at the very time when Governor Magon sent Capt. Morphey to take possession. One of the islands again is called Silhouette, the name of an official who had been Commissaire du roi près la Compagnie des Indes, and succeeded Moreau de Sèchelles as Controller of Finance; and another is called Praslin, apparently after the Duc de Choiseul Praslin who was Minister of Marine from 1766 to 1770. The exact date of the settlement of the islands we have not traced. We can only say that it must have been between 1769 and 1772. The quotation below from the Abbé Rochon shows that the islands were not settled when he visited them in 1769; whilst that from Capt. Neale shows that they were settled before his visit in 1772. It will be seen that both Rochon and Neale speak of Mahé as “the island Seychelles, or Sècheyles,” as in Belin’s chart of 1767. It seems probable that the cloud under which Le Bourdonnais fell, on his return to France, must have led to the suppression of his name in connection with the group.

The islands surrendered to the English Commodore Newcome in 1794, and were formally ceded to England with Mauritius in 1815. Seychelles appears to be an erroneous English spelling, now however become established. (For valuable assistance in the preceding article we are indebted to the courteous communications of M. James Jackson, Librarian of the Société de Géographie at Paris, and of M. G. Marcel of the Bibliothèque Nationale. And see, besides the works quoted here, a paper by M. Elie Pujot, in L’Explorateur, vol. iii. (1876) pp. 523-526).

The following passage of Pyrard probably refers to the Seychelles:

c. 1610.—“Le Roy (des Maldives) enueya par deux foyes vn tres expert pilote pour aller descouvrir vne certaine ilee nommée pollouyguy, qui leur est presque inconnu. . . . Ils disez aussi que le diable les y tourmentoit visiblement, et que pour l’isle elle est fertile en toutes sortes de fruites, et mesmo ils ont opinion que ces gros Cocon medicinaux qui sont si chers-là en viennent. . . . Elle est sous la hauteur de dix degrés au delà de la ligne et enuiron six vingt lieux des Maldives. ..." (see COCO-DE-MEB).—Pyrrad de Laval, i. 212. [Also see Mr. Gray's note in Hak. Soc. ed. i. 296, where he explains the word polloway in the above quotation as the Malay pulo, 'an island,' Malé Feldth Tri.]

1769.—"The principal places, the situation of which I determined, are the Sechelles islands, the flat of Carapados, the Salha da Maha, the island of Diego Garcia, and the Adu islands. The island Sechelles has an exceedingly good harbour. ... This island is covered with wood to the very summit of the mountains. ... In 1769 when I spent a month here in order to determine its position with the utmost exactness, Sechelles and the adjacent islands were inhabited only by monstrosity crocodiles; but a small establishment has since been formed on it for the cultivation of cloves and nutmegs."—Voyage to Madagascar and the E. Indies by the Abbé Rochon, E.T., London, 1792, p. liii.

1772.—"The island named Seychelles is inhabited by the French, and has a good harbour. ... I shall here deliver my opinion that these islands, where we now are, are the Three Brothers and the adjacent islands: as there are no islands to the eastward of these in that latitude, and many to the westward."—Capt. SHABUNDER, s. Pers. Shabbandar, lit. 'King of the Haven,' Harbour-Master. This was the title of an officer at native ports all over the Indian seas, who was the chief authority with whom foreign traders and ship-masters had to transact. He was often also head of the Customs. Hence the name is of prominent and frequent occurrence in the old narratives. Portuguese authors generally write the word Xabander; ours Shabunder or Sabunder. The title is not obsolete, though it does not now exist in India; the quotation from Lane shows its recent existence in Cairo, [and the Persians still call their Consuls Shah-bandar (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 158)]. In the marine Malay States the Shabbandar was, and probably is, an important officer of State. The passages from Lane and from Tavernier show that the title was not confined to seaports. At Aleppo Thevenot (1663) calls the corresponding official, perhaps by a mistake, 'Sheik Bandar' (Voyages, iii. 121). [This is the office which King Mihhrjan conferred upon Sindiad the Seaman, when he made him "his agent for the port and registrar of all ships that entered the harbour" (Burton, iv. 361)].

SHADDOKC, a. This name properly belongs to the West Indies, having been given, according to Grainger, from that of the Englishman who first brought the fruit thither from the East, and who was, according to Crawford, an interloper captain, who traded to the Archipelago about the time of the Revolution, and is mentioned by his contemporary Dampier. The fruit is the same as the pommelo (q.v.). And the name appears from a modern quotation below to be now occasionally used in India. [Nothing definite seems to be known of this Capt. Shaddock. Mr. R. C. A. Prior (7 ser. N. & Q., vii. 375) writes: "Lunan, in 'Fortus Jamaicaensis,' vol. ii. p. 171, says, 'This fruit is not near so large as the shaddock, which received its name from a Capt. Shaddock, who first brought the plant from the East Indies.' The name of the captain is believed to have been Shattock, one not uncommon in the west of Somersetshire. Sloane, in his 'Voyage to Jamaica,' 1707, vol. i. p. 41 says, 'The seed of this was first brought to Barbados by one Capt. Shaddock, commander of an East Indian ship, who touch'd at that island in his passage to England, and left its seed there.' Watt (Econ. Dict. ii. 349) remarks that the Indian vernacular name Batavī nībā, 'Batavian lime,' suggests its having been originally brought from Batavia.]

SHADE (TABLE-SHADE, WALL-SHADE), s. A glass guard to protect a candle or simple oil-lamp from the wind. The oldest form, in use at the beginning of the last century, was a tall glass cylinder which stood on the table, the candlestick and candle being placed bodily within in. In later days the universal form has been that of an inverted dome fitting into the candlestick, which has an annular socket to receive it. The wall-shade is a bracket attached to the wall, bearing a candle or cocoa-nut oil lamp, protected by such a shade. In the wine-drinking days of the earlier part of last century it was sometimes the subject of a challenge, or forfeit, for a man to empty a wall-shade filled with claret. The Shades have private marks."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 8.

SHADY, 1817. "I am now finishing this letter by candle-light, with the help of a handkerchief tied over the shade."—T. Muso, in Life, i. 611.

SHAGREEN, s. This English word, French chargrin; Ital. zigino; Mid. High Ger. zuger, comes from the Pers. saghri, Turk. daghri, meaning properly the croupe or quarter of a horse, from which the peculiar granulated leather, also called saghri in the East, was originally made. Diez considers the French (and English adopted) chargrin in the sense of vexation to be the same word, as certain hard skins prepared in this way were used as files, and hence the word is used figuratively for gnawing vexation, as (he states) the Ital. imma also is (Etym. Wörterbuch, ed. 1861, ii. 240). He might have added the figurative origin of tribulation. [This view is accepted by the N.E.D.; but Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict.) denies its correctness.]

SHAGRE, SHALE, SHALOO, SALLO, &c., s. We have a little doubt as to the identity of all these words; the two latter occur in old works as names of cotton stuffs; the

It is exceedingly difficult to disentangle the meanings and derivations of this series of words.  In the first place we have saloon, Hind. sallâ, the Turkey-red cloth above described; a word which is derived by Platts from Skt. sâlā, ‘a kind of astrangent substance,’ and is perhaps the same word as the Tel. sâlā, ‘cloth.’  This was originally an Indian fabric, but has now been replaced in the bazaars by an English cloth, the art of dyeing which was introduced by French refugees who came over after the Revolution (see 7 ser. N. & Q. viii. 465 seq.). See PIECE-GOODS, SALOO.

Next we have shelah, which may be identical with Hind. sâlā, which Platts connects with Skt. chela, chalā, ‘a piece of cloth,’ and defines as ‘a kind of scarf or mantle (of silk, or lawn, or muslin; usually composed of four breadth depending from the shoulders loosely over the body: it is much worn and given as a present, in the Dakhhan); silk turban.’  In the Deccan it seems to be worn by men (Herzlot, Qanono-e-Islam, Madras reprint, 18). The Madras Glosses give sheelal, Mal. shala, said to be from Skt. chala, ‘a strip of cloth,’ in the sense of clothes; and sulâ, Hind. sala, ‘gauze for turbans.’

SHAMA. a Hind. shāmā [Skt. śyāma, ‘black, dark-coloured.’] A favourite song-bird and cage-bird, Kittia cinclia macrura, Gmel.  ‘In confinement it imitates the notes of other birds, and of various animals, with ease and accuracy’ (Jerdon. The long tail seems to indicate the identity of this bird rather than the maind (see MYNA) with that described by Aelian. [Mr. M'Crindle (Invasion of India, 186) favours the identification of the bird with the Maind.]

c. A.D. 250.—"There is another bird found among the Indians, which is of the size of a starling. It is particoloured; and in imitating the voice of man it is more lquirrelous and clever than a parrot. But it does not readily bear confinement, and yearning for liberty, and longing for inter-course with its kind, it prefers hunger to bondage with fat living. The Macedonians who dwell among the Indians, in the city of Bucephala and thereabouts... call the bird repulue ('Tally'); and the name arose from the fact that the bird twitches its tail just like a wagtail."—Aelian, de Nat. Anim. xvi. 8.

SHAMAN, SHAMANISM. These terms are applied in modern times to superstitions of the kind that connects itself with exorcism and "devil-dancing" as their most prominent characteristic, and which are found to prevail with wonderful identity of circumstance among non-Caucasian races over parts of the earth most remote from one another; not only among the vast variety of Indo-Chinese tribes, but among the Dravidian tribes of India, the Veddahs of Ceylon, the races of Siberia, and the red nations of N. and S. America. "Hinduism has assimilated these 'prior superstitions of the sons of Tur,' as Mr. Hodgson calls them, in the form of Tantrika mysteries, whilst, in the wild performance of the Dancing Dervishes at Constantinople, we see, perhaps, again, the infection of Turanian blood breaking out from the very heart of Musulman orthodoxy" (see Notes to Marco Polo, Bk. II. ch. 50). The characteristics of Shamanism is the existence of certain sooth-sayers or medicine-men, who profess a special art of dealing with the mischievous spirits who are supposed to produce illness and other calamities, and who invoke these spirits and ascertain the means of appeasing them, in trance produced by fantastic ceremonies and convulsive dancings.

The immediate origin of the term is the title of the spirit-conjuror in the Tunguz language, which is shaman, in that of the Manchus becoming saman, pl. samasa. But then in Chinese Sha-môn or Shi-môn is used for a Buddhist ascetic, and this would seem to be taken from the Skt. dhamana, Pali samana. Whether the Tunguz word is in any way connected with this or adopted from it, is a doubtful question. W. Schott, who has treated the matter elaborately (Über den Doppelnenn des Wortes Schaman und über den tungusischen Schamanen-Cultus am Hofe der Mandju Kasern, Berlin Akad. 1842), finds it difficult to suppose any connection. We, however, give a few quotations relating to the two words in one series. In the first two the reference is undoubtedly to Buddhist ascetics.

c. B.C. 320.—"Tous δε Σαρμάνας, τούς μεν ἑττομάτων 'Θολούς φησίν ἐνομιζό-σθαι, γιώτας εν ταῖς υἱαῖς ἀπὸ φθόλων καὶ καρτών ἀγημ., ἐσθήσας ὀ βέιες ἀπὸ φλοίων ψευδαίων, ἀφροδίατον χωρίς καὶ ὤντον."—From Megat above, in Strabo, xvi. c. 712. Our religion is one of peace and quiet, and fighting and slaying is prohibited, as well as all kinds of shedding of blood."—Chach Nâma, in Elliot, i. 156.

SHAMEEANA, SEMIANNA. s.
Pers. shamīydān or shāmiydān [very doubtfully derived from Pers. shah, 'king,' mīydān, 'centre'], an awning or flat tent-roof, sometimes without sides, but often in the present day with canauts; sometimes pitched like a porch before a large tent; often used by civil officers, when on tour, to hold their court or office proceedings coram populo, and in a manner generally accessible. 1609.—"A sort of Calico here called semijens are also in abundance, it is broader than the Calico."—Danvers, Letters, i. 297.

1613.—"The Hector having certain chucerers (chucker) of fine Semian chowters."—Ibid. i. 217. In Foster, iv. 289, semanes.

1616.—"... there is erected a throne fourfe foote from the ground in the Durbar Court from the backes whereof, to the place where the King comes out, a square of 56 paces long, and 43 broad was rayled in, and covered with fair Semianes or Canopies of Cloth of Gold, Silke, or Velvet joinned together, and sustained with Canes so covered."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i.; Hak. Soc. i. 142.

1676.—"We desire you to furnish him with all things necessary for his voyage, ... with bridle and saddie, Semenoes, canats (Canaut)."—Fortest, Bombay Letters, i. 897.

1814.—"I had seldom occasion to look out for gardens or pleasure grounds to pitch my tent or erect my Summilianas or Shamianas, the whole country being generally a garden."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 455; 2nd ed. ii. 64. In ii. 294 he writes Shumeana.

1857.—"At an early hour we retired to rest. Our beds were arranged under large canopies, open on all sides, and which are termed by the natives 'Shameenanah.'"—M. Thorkild, Personal Adventures, 14.

SHAMPOO, v. To knead and press the muscles with the view of relieving fatigue, &c. The word has now long been familiarly used in England. The Hind. verb is champat, from the imperative of which, champoe, this is most probably a corruption, as in the case of Bunow, Puckerow, &c. The process is described, though not named, by Terry, in 1616: "Taking thus their ease, they often call their Barbers, who tenderly grip and smite their Armes and other parts of their bodies instead of exercise, to stirre the blood. It is a pleasing wantonness, and much valued in these hot climes." (In Purchas, ii. 1475). The process was familiar to the Romans under the Empire, whose slaves employed in this way were styled tractator and tradatrix. [Perhaps the earliest reference to the practice is in Strabo (McCrindle, Ancient India, 72.)] But with the ancients it seems to have been allied to vice, for which there is no ground that we know in the Indian custom.

1748.—"Shampooing is an operation not known in Europe, and is peculiar to the Chinese, which I had once the curiosity to go through, and for which I paid but a trifle. However, had I not seen several China merchants shampooed before me, I should have been apprehensive of danger, even at the sight of all the different instruments. ..." (The account is good, but too long for extract.)—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748. London, 1762, p. 226.

1760-60.—"The practice of champ, which by the best intelligence I could gather is derived from the Chinese, may not be unworthy particularising, as it is little known to the modern Europeans. ..."—Grose, i. 113. This writer quotes Martial, iii. Ep. 92, and Seneca, Epist. 66, to show that the practice was known in ancient Rome.

1780.—"The Sultan generally rose at break of day: after being shampooed, and rubbed, he washed himself, and read the Koran for an hour."—Beaton, War with Tippoo, p. 159.

1810.—"Shampooing may be compared to a gentle kneading of the whole person, and is the same operation described by the voyagers to the Southern and Pacific ocean."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, Madras [reprint, i. 276.]

"Then whilst they fanned the children, or shampooed them if they were restless, they used to tell stories, some of which dealt of marvels as great as those recorded in the 1001 Nights."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 410.

"That considerable relief is obtained from shampooing, cannot be doubted; I have repeatedly been restored surprisingly from severe fatigue. ..."—Williamson, P. M. ii. 198.

1813.—"There is sometimes a voluptuousness in the climate of India, a stillness in nature, an indescribable softness, which soothes the mind, and gives it up to the most delightful sensations: independent of the effects of opium, shampooing, and other luxuries indulged in by oriental sensualists."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 35; [2nd ed. i. 25.]

SHAN, n.p. The name which we have learned from the Burmese to apply to the people who call themselves the great T'ai, kindred to the Siamese, and occupying extensive tracts in Indo-China, intermediate between Burma, Siam, and China. They are the same people that have been known, after the Portuguese, and some of the early R. C. Missionaries, as Laos (q.v.); but we now give the name an extensive signification covering the whole race. The Siamese, who have been for centuries politically the most important branch of this race, call (or did call themselves—see De la Loublere, who is very accurate) T'ai-Noe or 'Little T'ai,' whilst they applied the term T'ai-Yai, or 'Great T'ai,' to their northern kindred or some part of these; sometimes also calling the latter T'ai-quit, or the 'T'ai left behind.' The T'ai or Shan are certainly the most numerous and widely spread race in Indo-China, and innumerable petty Shan States exist on the borders of Burma, Siam, and China, more or less dependent on, or tributary to, their powerful neighbours. They are found from the extreme north of the Irawadi Valley, in the vicinity of Assam, to the borders of Camboja; and in nearly all we find, to a degree unusual in the case of populations politically so segregated, a certain homogeneity in language, civilisation, and religion (Buddhist), which seems to point to their former union in considerable States.

One branch of the race entered and conquered Assam in the 13th century, and from the name by which they were known, Ahom or Aham, was derived, by the frequent exchange of aspirant and sibilant, the name, just used, of the province itself. The most extensive and central Shan State, which occupied a position between Ava and Yunnan, is known in the Shan traditions as Mung-Mau, and in Burma by the Buddhista-classical name of Kaukambji (from a famous city of that name in ancient India) corrupted by a usual process into Ko-Shan-pyi and interpreted to mean 'Nine-Shan-States.' Further south were those T'ai States which have usually been called Laos, and which formed several considerable kingdoms, going through many vicissitudes of power. Several of their capitals were visited and their ruins described by the late Francis Garnier, and the cities of these and many smaller States of the same race, all built on the same general quadrangular plan, are spread broadcast over that part of Indo-China which extends from Siam north of Yunnan.

Mr. Cushing, in the Introduction to his Shan Dictionary (Rangoon, 1881), divides the Shan family by dialectic indications into the Ahoms, whose language is now extinct, the Chinese Shan (occupying the central territory of what was Mau or Kaouambji), the Shan (proper, or Burmese Shan), Laos (or Siamese Shan), and Siamese.

The term Shan is borrowed from the Burmese, in whose peculiar orthography the name, though pronounced Shan, is written shan. We have not met with its use in English prior to the Mission of Col. Symes in 1796. It appears in the map illustrating his narrative, and once or twice in the narrative itself, and it was frequently used by his companion, F. Buchanan, whose papers were only published many years afterwards in various periodicals difficult to meet with. It was not until the Burmese war of 1824-1826, and the active investigation of our Eastern frontier which followed, that the name became popularly known in British India. The best notice of the Shan’s that we are acquainted with is a scarce pamphlet by Mr. Ney Elias, printed by the Foreign Dept. of Calcutta in 1876 (Introductory Sketch of the History of the Shans, &c.). [The ethnology of the race is discussed by J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 187 seqq. Also see Prince Henri d’Orleans, Du Tonkin aux Indes, 1898; H. S. Hallett, Among the Shans, 1885, and A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, 1890.]

Though the name as we have taken it is a Burmese oral form, it seems to be essentially a genuine ethnic name for the race. It is applied in the form Sam by the Assamese, and the Kakhens; the Siamese themselves have an obsolete Siam (written Siyam) for themselves, and Sieng (Siyang) for the Laos. The former word is evidently the Sien, which the Chinese used in the compound Sien-lo (for Siam—see Marco Polo, 2nd ed. Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3), and from which we got, probably through a Malay medium, our Siam (q.v.). The Burmese distinguish the Siamese Shans as Yudia (see JUDEA) Shans, a term perhaps sometimes including Siam itself. Symes gives this (through Arakanese corruption) as 'Yoodra-Shaan,' and he also (no doubt improperly) calls the Manipur people 'Cassay Shaan' (see CASSAY).

1795.—"These events did not deter Shan-buans from pursuing his favourite scheme of conquest to the westward. The fertile plains and populous towns of Munnpooors and the Cassay Shaan, attracted his ambition.'—Symes, p. 77.

"Zemea (see JANGOMAT), Sandanpoors, and many districts of the Yoodra Shaan to the eastward, were tributary, and governed by Chobwas, who annually made payment to the Birman king."—Ibid. p. 102.

"Shaan, or Shan, is a very comprehensive term given to different nations, some independent, others the subjects of the greater states."—Ibid. p. 274.

c. 1818.—"... They were assisted by many of the Zabod (see CHOBWA) or petty princes of the Siam, subject to the Burmese, who, wearied by the oppressions and exactions of the Burmese Mandarins and generals, had revolted, and made common cause with the enemies of their cruel masters. ... The war which the Burmese had to support with these enemies was long and disastrous ... instead of overcoming the Siam (they) only lost day by day the territories ... and saw their princes range themselves ... under the protection of the King of Siam."—Sangermano, p. 57.

1861.—"Fie, Fie! Captain Spry! You are surely in joke With your wires and your trams, Going past all the Shams With branches to Ham-you (see BANO), and end in A-smoke."—Ode on the proposed Yunnan Railway. Bhamo and Esmok were names constantly recurring in the late Capt. Spry’s railway projects.

SHANBAFF, SINABAFF, &c., s. Pers. shähbaf. A stuff often mentioned in the early narratives as an export from Bengal and other parts of India. Perhaps indeed these names indicate two different stuffs, as we do not know what they were, except that (as mentioned below) the sinabaff was a fine white stuff. Sinabaff is not in Vuller’s Lexicon. Shanbaff is, and is explained as genus panni grossioris, sic descripta (E. T.):—"A very coarse and cheap stuff which they make for the sleeves of kabas (see CARAYA) for sale."—Bihar-i-Ajam. But this cannot have been the character of the stuffs sent by Sultan Mahammed Tughlak (as in the first quotation) to the Emperor of China. [Badger (quoted by Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 153) identifies the word with sina-baffa, ‘China-woven’ cloths.]

1843.—"When the aforesaid present came to the Sultan of India (from the Emp. of China) ... in return for this present he sent another of greater value ... 100 pieces of shahbaf, and 500 pieces of shahbaf."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 8.

1498.—"The overseer of the Treasury came next day to the Captain-Major, and brought him 20 pieces of white stuff, very fine, with gold embroidery which they call beyramess (biyramess), and other 20 large white stuffs, very fine, which were named sinabafos."—Correa, K.T. b. 5.

S. See under ALJOFAR.

1510.—"One of the Persians said: ‘Let us go to our house, that is, to Calicut.’ I answered, ‘Do not go, for you will lose these fine sinabafos’ (which were pieces of cloth we carried)."—Farthema, 269.

1516.—"The quintal of this sugar was worth two ducats and a half in Malabar, and a good Sinabaffo was worth two ducats."—Barbosa, 179.

[... "Also they make other stuffs which they call Mamonas (Mamūdas), others dugnas (dognas), others shawras (see Shawras), under PIECE-GOODS, others sinabafas, which last are the best, and which the Moors hold in most esteem to make shirts of."—Ibid., Lisbon ed. 362.]

SHASTER, s. The Law books or Sacred Writings of the Hindus. From Skt. āstra, ‘a rule, a religious code, a scientific treatise.

1612.—"... They have many books in their Latin. ... Six of these they call Xastra, which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Purdha (Purorna), which are the limbs."—Couto, V. vi. 8.

1630.—"... The Banians deliver that this book, by them called the Shaster, or the Book of their written word, consisted of these three tracts."—Lord’s Display, ch. viii.

1651.—In Rupinusa, the word is everywhere misprinted Iastra.

1717.—"The six Sāstrangal contain all the Points and different Ceremonies in Worship. ..."—Phillips’ Account, 40.

1765.—"... at the capture of Calcutta, A.D. 1756, I lost many curious Genoo manuscripts, and among them two very correct and valuable copies of the Genoo Shastah."—J. Z. Holwell, Interesting Hist. Events, &c., 2d ed., 1780, i. 3.

1770.—"The Shastah is looked upon by some as a commentary on the sacred, and by others as an original work."—Rgival (tr 1777), i. 50.
SHASTREE.  824  SHEEAH, SHIA.

1776.—"The occupation of the Brahmin should be to read the Bhâgavad Gita and other Shasters."—Halad, Genico Code, 39.

[SHASTREE, s. Hind. shâdri (see SHASTER). A man of learning, one who teaches any branch of Hindu learning, such as law.

[1824.—"Gungadur Shastree, the minister of the Baroda state, . . . was murdered by Trimbuckjee under circumstances which left no doubt that the deed was perpetrated with the knowledge of Bajerow."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 307.]

SHAWL, s. Pers. and Hind. shâl, also dooshâla, 'a pair of shawla.' The Persian word is perhaps of Indian origin, from Skt. svâlâ, 'variegated.' Sir George Birdwood tells us that he has found among the Old India records "Carmania shelles" and "Carmania shawools," meaning apparently Ker- man shawla. He gives no dates unfortunately. [In a book of 1685 he finds "Shawlies Carmania" and "Carmania Wool"; in one of 1704, "Chawools" (Report on Old Records, 27, 40). Carmania goats are mentioned in a letter in Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.] In Meninski (published in 1890) shâl is defined in a way that shows the humble sense of the word originally:

"Panni viuores qui partim albi, partim cineriti, partim nigri eae solent ex lana et pilis caprinis; hujusmodi pannum seu telam injicent humores Dervisia . . . instar stolae aut pallii." To this he adds, "Datur etiam sericoa ejusmodi tela, fere instar nostrî multitûdi, sive simplicis sive duplicatis." For this the 2nd edition a considerable number substitutes: "Shal-i-Hindia" (Indian shawl). "Pela serica subtillissima ex India adferri solita."

c. 1590.—"In former times shawls were often brought from Kashmir. People folded them in four folds, and wore them for a very long time. . . . His Majesty encourages in every possible way the (shâl-bâtî) manufacture of shawls in Kashmir. In Lahor also there are more than 1000 workshops."—Ain i. 92. [Also see ed. Jarrett, ii. 349, 355.]

c. 1665.—"Ils mettent sur eux a toute saison, lorsqu'ils sortent, une Chal, qui est une maniere de toilette d'une laine tres-fine qui se fait a Cachemire. Ces Chals ont environ deux aunes (the old French aune, nearly 47 inches English) de long sur une de large. On les achete vingt-cinque ou trente ecus si elles sont fines. Il y en a meme qui costent cinquante ecus, mais ce sont les tres-fines."—Thernod, v. 110.

c. 1686.—"Ces chales sont certaines pieces d'ette de une aune et demie de long, et d'une de large on environ, qui sont brodées aux deux bouts d'une espèce de broderie, faite au métier, d'un pied ou environ de large. . . . J'en ai vu de ceux que les Omraks font faire exprès, qui coûtont jusqu'à cent cinquante Roupies; des autres qui sont de cette laines du pays, je n'en ai pas vu qui passaient 50 Roupies."—Berruyer, ii. 280-281; [ed. Coastable, 402].

1717.—". . . Con tutto ciò preziosissime nobilitas, senza comparazione magnifiche sono le telè che si chiamano Scial, si nella lingua Hindustana, come ancora nella lingua Persiana. Tali Scial altro non sono, che alcuni manti, che si posano sulla testa, e facendo da man destra, e da man sinistra scandere la due metà, con queste si cinge. . . ."—MS. Narrative of Padre Ip. Desideri.

[1682.—"Another rich Skarf, which they call schal, made of a very fine stuff."—J. Davies, Ambassador's Trar., Bk. vi. 226, Staf. Dict.]

1727.—"When they go abroad they wear a Shawle folded up, or a Pile of White Cotton Cloth lying loose on the Top of their Heads."—A. Hamilton, ii. 50; [Shawl in ed. 1744, ii. 49].

c. 1760.—"Some Shawls are manufactured there . . . Those coming from the province of Cachemire on the borders of Tartary, being made of a peculiar kind of silky hair, that produces from the loom a cloth beautifully bordered at both ends, with a narrow flowered selvage, about two yards and a half long, and a yard and a half wide . . . and according to the price, which is from ten pounds and upwards to fifteen shillings, join, to exquisite fineness, a substance that renders them extremely warm, and so pliant that the fine ones are easily drawn through a common ring on the finger."—Grace, i. 118.

1781.—"Sonderat writes challes. He says: . . . Ces stoffes (faites avec la laines des montons de Tibet) surpassent nos plus belles soieries en finesse."—Voyage, i. 52.

It seems from these extracts that the large and costly shawl, woven in figures over its whole surface, is a modern article. The old shawl, we see, was from 6 to 8 feet long, by about half that breadth; and it was most commonly white, with only a border of figured weaving at each end. In fact what is now called a Rampoor Chudder when made with figured ends is probably the best representation of the old shawl.

SHEEAAH, SHIA, s. Arab. ña, i.e. 'sect.' A follower (more properly the followers collectively) of the Mahomedan 'sect,' or sects rather, which specially venerate 'Ali, and regard the Imams (see IMAM), his descendants, as the true successors to the Caliphate. The Persians (since the accession of the "Sophy" dynasty, (q.v.) are Shi'a, and a good many of the Moalems in India. The sects which have followed more or less secret doctrines, and the veneration of hereditary quasi-divine heads, such as the Karmathites and Ismaelites of Muselman history, and the modern Bohras (see BORA) and "Mulahis," may generally be regarded as Shi'a. [See the elaborate article on the sect in Hughes, Dict. of Islam, 572 seq.]

c. 1809.—"... dont encore il est ainsi, que tuit cil qui croient en la loy Haali dient que cil qui croient en la loy Mahommet sont mesercrant; et aussi tuit cil qui croient en la loy Mahommet dient que tuit cil qui croient en la loy Haali sont mesercrant." — Joinville, 262.

1653.—"Among the Moors have always been controversies ... which of the four first Caliphs was the most legitimate successor to the Caliphate. The Arabians favoured Bubac, Hamar, and Othuman, the Persians (Parsee) favoured Alle, and held the others for usurpers, and as holding it against the testament of Mahamed ... to the last this schism has endured between the Arabians and the Persians. The latter took the appellation Xiâ, as much as to say "Union of one Body," and the Arabs called them in reproach "Rafadiy (Râfââ), a heretic (lit. 'deserter')," as much as to say "People astray from the Path, whilst they call themselves Chany (see SUNNEE), which is the contrary." — Barrois, II. x. 6.

1690.—"The Sunnites adherents of tradition, like the Arabs, the Turks, and an infinite number of others, accept the primacy of those who actually possess it. The Persians and their adherents who are called Shieh (Schiê), i.e. "Sectaries," and are not ashamed of the name, believe in the primacy of those who have only claimed it (without possessing it), and obstinately contend that it belongs to the family of Ali only." — P. della Valle, ii. 75; [conf. Hak. Soc. i. 159].

1692.—"He is by Religion a Mahometan, descended from Persian Ancestors, and retaineth their opinions, which differing in many points from the Turkes, are distinguished in their Sects by the terms of Seaw and Sunnae." — Purchas, Pilgrimage, 995.

1693.—"Les Persans et Kesselbachs (Kusiliebese) se disent Schal ... si les Ottmanes estoient Schals, on de la Secte de Haly, les Persans seeroient Sonnia qui est la Secte des Ottomans." — De la Bouillaye-le-Geou, ed. 1657, 106.

1673.—"His Substitute here is a Chias Moor." —Fryer, 29.

1798.—"In contradistinction to the Sonnis, who in their prayers cross their hands on the lower part of the breast, the Schalis drop their arms in straight lines." — G. Forster, Travels, ii. 129.

1805.—"The word Sh'eeah, or Sheen, properly signifies a troop or sect ... but has become the distinctive appellation of the followers of Aly, or all those who maintain that he was the first legitimate Khuslefsah, or successor to Mahommed." — Bailtie, Digest of Mah. Law, ii. xii.

1869.—"La tolerance indienne est venue diminuer dans l'Inde le fanatisme Musulman. La Sunnites et Schiites n'ont point entre eux cette animosité qui divise les Turcs et les Persans ... ces deux sectes divisent les musulmans de l'Inde; mais comme je viens de dire, elles n'excitent généralement entre eux aucune animosité." — Garin de Tassy, Rel. Mus., p. 12.

SHERMAUL, 8. Pers.—Hind. shirmdl, a cake made with flour, milk and leaven; a sort of brioche. [The word comes from Pers. shir, 'milk,' mldl, 'crushing'] Riddell (Domest. Econ. 461) gives a receipt for what he calls "Nauna Sheer Mhal," naan being Pers., 'bread."

1832.—"The dishes of meeta (milâd, 'sweet') are accompanied with the many varieties of bread common to Hindoostaun, without leaven, as Sheen-maul, ishekarwânî (bakir-khâni), chapaati (chupatty), &c.; the first two have milk and ghee mixed with the flour, and nearly resemble our pie-crust." — Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 101.

SHEIKH, 8. Ar. shâkh; an old man, elder, chief, head of an Arab tribe. The word should properly mean one of the descendants of tribes of genuine Arab descent, but at the present day, in India, it is often applied to converts to Islam from the lower Hindu tribes. For the use of the word in the sense of a saint, see under FEER.

1698.—"'Lieutenant (which the Arabians called sequen)." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 24.

1625.—"They will not haue them judged by any Customes, and they are content that their Xeques doe determine them as he list." — Purchas, Pilgrimage, ii. 1146.

1737.—"... but if it was so, that he (Abraham) was their Sheek, as they allege, they neither follow him in Morals or Religion." — A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 37.

1855.—"Some parents employ a sheykh or fikee to teach their boys at home." — Lane, Mod. Egypt., ed. 1871, i. 77.

SHERBET, 8. Though this word is used in India by natives in its native (Arab. and Pers.) form sharbat,*

* In both written alike, but the final i in Arabic is generally silent, giving sharbat, in Persian sharbat. So we get ~owred from Pers. and Turk, mandr, in Ar. (and in India) mandr, mandra. 4 SHERBET. 826 SHEVAROY HILLS.

'draught,' it is not a word now specially in Anglo-Indian use. The Arabic seems to have entered Europe by several different doors. Thus in Italian and French we have sorbetto and sorbet, which probably came direct from the Levantine or Turkish form shurbat or shorbat; in Sp. and Port. we have xarabe, azarabe (ash-sharab, the standard Ar. sharab, 'wine or any beverage') and zorabe, and from these forms probably Ital. sciroppe, siroppe, with old French yserop and mod. French sirop; also English syrup, and more directly from the Spanish, shrub. Mod. Span. again gets, by reflection from French or Italian, sorbete and sirop (see Dusx, 17, and Marcel Devis, s.v. sirop). Our sherbet looks as if it had been imported direct from the Levant. The form shrub is applied in India to all wines and spirits and prepared drinks, e.g. Port-shrub, Sherry-shrub, Lall-shrub, Brandy-shrub, Beer-shrub.

c. 1384.—"... They bring cups of gold, silver, and glass, filled with sugar-candy-water; i.e. syrup diluted with water. They call this beverage sherbet" (ash-shurbet).— Ibn Batuta, iii. 124.

1654.—"... potio est gratissima praesertim ubi multa nullo, quae Constantiopolis nullo tempore deficit, fuerit refrigerata, Arabo Serbeto vocant, hoc est, potionem Arabicam."—Buaboq, Ep. i. p. 92.

1678.—"The physicians of the same country use this xarabe (of tamarinds) in bilious and ardent fevers."—Acosta, 67.

c. 1580.—"Et saccharo potum juvendissimum parent quem Sarbat vocant."—Proper Alpinus, Pt. i. p. 70.

1611.—"In Persia there is much good wine of grapes which is called Xarab in the language of the country."—Teisserin, i. 16.

c. 1630.—"Their liquor may perhaps better delight you; 'tis faire water, sugar, rose-water, and juice of Lemons mixed, call'd Sherbets or Zerbets, wholesome and potable."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1658, p. 241.

1682.—"The Mooros ... drank a little milk and water, but not a drop of wine; they also drank a little sorbet, and jucalat (see JOCOLE)."—Evelyn's Diary, Jan 24.

1827.—"On one occasion, before Barakel-Hadgi left Madras, he visited the Doctor, and partook of his sherbet, which he preferred to his own, perhaps because a few glasses of rum or brandy were usually added to enrich the compound."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. x.

1927.—"The Egyptians have various kinds of sherbets. ... The most common kind (called simply shurbet or shurbet suk-har ...) is merely sugar and water ... lemonade (ley'molando, or sharab el-leymoûm) is another."—Lana, Med. Egypt., ed. 1837, i. 206.

1853.—"The Egyptiona have Beer-shraub. ... They also drank a little shurbet, and preferred to his own, perhaps because a few sherbets have been imported direct from the Levant. The form shrub is applied in India to all wines and spirits and prepared drinks, e.g. Port-shrub, Sherry-shrub, Lall-shrub, Brandy-shrub, Beer-shrub.

SHEREEF, a. Ar. sharif, 'noble.' A dignitary descended from Mahomed.

1498.—"The ambassador was a white man who was Sharif, as much as to say a religious" (i.e. cleric).—Roserto, 2nd ed. 30.

1672.—"Sherif." See under CASIB. [a. 1666.—"The first (embassage) was from the Sherif of Mecca. ..."—Berner, ed. Constable, 183.] 1701.—"... y Sherif of Judda. ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 282.

SHERISTADAR, a. The head ministerial officer of a Court, whose duty it is to receive plaints, and see that they are in proper form and duly stamped, and generally to attend to routine business. Properly H.—P. from sar-rishad-dar or sarishtad-dar, 'register-keeper.' Sar-rishad, an office of registry, literally means 'head of the string.' C. P. Brown interprets Sarishtadar as "he who holds the end of the string (on which puppet dances)"—satirically, it may be presumed. Perhaps 'keeper of the clue,' or 'of the file' would approximately express the idea.

1786.—"With the object of establishing the officers of the Canzonee's Department upon its ancient footing, altogether independent of the Zemindars ... and to prevent confusion in the time to come ... For these purposes, and to avail ourselves as much as possible of the knowledge and services of Mr. James Grant, we have determined on the institution of an office well-known in this country under the designation of Chief Sheristadar, with which we have invested Mr. Grant, to act in that capacity under your Board, and also to attend as such at your deliberations, as well as at our meetings in the Revenue Department."—Letter from G. O. in C. to Board of Revenue, July 19 (Bengal Rev. Regulation xix.).

1878.—"Nowadays, however, the Sheristadar's signature is allowed to authenticate copies of documents, and the Assistant is thus spared so much drudgery."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 117.

SHIBAR, SHIBBAR. 897 SHIKAREE, SHEKARRY.

Origin of the name has given rise to much difference of opinion. Mr. Lefanu (Mon. of Saloon, ii. 19 seq.) thinks that the original name was possibly Sivarayan, whereas the German name Shvaras and the English Shvaroys; or that Sivarayan may by confusion have become Shvarayan, named after the Raja of Sera; lastly, he suggests that it comes from sharpu or sharru, 'the slope or declivity of a hill, and say, 'a mouth, passage, way.' This he is inclined to accept, regarding Shvarayan or Shvaroys, as 'the cliff which dominates (rayan) the way (say) which leads through or under the declivity (sharru).'' The Madras Gloss, gives the Tam. form of the name as Shvarayanmalai, from Sheran, 'the Chera race,' irayan, 'king,' and malai, 'mountain.'

[1823. — 'Mr. Cockburn . . . had the kindness to offer me the use of a bungalow on the Shvaraya hills.' — R. C. M. in Madras, 292.]

Shibar, Shibbar, a. A kind of coasting vessel, sometimes described as a great pattamar. Molesworth (Mahr. Dict. s.v.) gives shibdr which, in the usual dictionary way, he defines as 'a ship or large vessel of a particular description.' The Bombay Gazetteer (x. 171) speaks of the 'shibali, a large vessel, found from 100 to 300 tons, generally used in the Ratnagiri sub-division ports;' and in another place (xiii. Pt. ii. 720) says that it is a large vessel chiefly used in the Malabar trade, deriving the name from Pers. shahi-bahr, 'royal-carrier.'

[1864. — 'The Maccaddam (MOCUDDUM) of this shibbar bound for Goa.' — Yule, in Hedge's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. clxxv.; also see clxxvii.]

[1727. — '... the other four were Grabs or Gallies, and Shebbaras, or half Gallies.' — A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 134.]

[1758. — '... then we cast off a boat called a large seebar, bound to Muscat. ...' — I. c., 196.]

Shigaram, a. A Bombay and Madras name for a kind of hack palanquin carriage. The camel-shigaram is often seen on roads in N. India. The name is from Mahr. shigjr, Skt. shghra, 'quick or quickly.' A similar carriage is the jutkah, which takes its name from Hind. jhatka, 'swift.'

not prevent their buying from him the spoils of the chase."—Pollon, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 13.

b. As applied to the European sportsman himself: e.g. "Jones is well known as a great Shikaree." There are several books of sporting adventure written circa 1860-75 by Mr. H. A. Leveson under the name of 'The Old Shekarty.'

[c. A shooting-boat used in the Cashmere lakes.

[1875.—"A shikārī is a sort of boat, that is in daily use with the English visitors; a light boat manned, as it commonly is, by six men, it goes at a fast pace, and, if well fitted with cushions, makes a comfortable conveyance. A bandāqī (see BUNDOOK) shikārī is the smallest boat of all; a shooting punt, used in going after wild fowl on the lakes."—Drew, Jummo, &c., 161.]

SHIKAR-GĀH, s. Pers. A hunting ground, or enclosed preserve. The word has also a technical application to patterns which exhibit a variety of figures and groups of animals, such as are still woven in brocade at Benares, and in ahlūwā- work in Kwhmir and elsewhere (see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 17, and notes). [The great areas of jungle maintained by the Amirs of Sind and called Shikargāhs are well known.

[1881.—"Once or twice a month when they (the Ameers) are all in good health, they pay visits to their different shikargāhs or preserves for game."—J. Burnes, Visit to the Court of Sind, 102.]

SHIKHÔ, n. and v. Burmese word. The posture of a Burmese in presence of a superior, i.e. kneeling with joined hands and bowed head in an attitude of worship. Some correspondence took place in 1883, in consequence of the use of this word by the then Chief Commissioner of British Burma, in an official report, to describe the attitude used by British envoys at the Court of Ava. The statement (which was grossly incorrect) led to remonstrance by Sir Arthur Phayre. The fact was that the envoy and his party sat on a carpet, but the attitude had no analogy whatever to that of shikho, though the endeavour of the Burmese officials was persistent to involve them in some such degrading attitude. (See KOWTOW.)

1855. — "Our conductors took off their shoes at the gate, and the Woodouk made an ineffectual attempt to induce the Envoy to do likewise. They also at four different places, as we advanced to the inner gate, dropt on their knees and shikhood towards the palace."—Ibid, Mission to Ava, 82.

1882. — "Another ceremony is that of shekholing to the spire, the external emblem of the throne. All Burmans must do this at each of the gates, at the foot of the steps, and at intervals in between. . . .—The Burman, His Life and Nations, ii. 206.

SHINBIN, SHINBEAM, &c., s. A term in the Burmese teak-trade; apparently a corruption from Burm. shin-bydn. The first monosyllable (shin) means 'to put together side by side,' and bydn, 'plank,' the compound word being used in Burmese for 'a thick plank used in constructing the side of a ship.' The shinbin is a thick plank, about 15" wide by 4" thick, and running up to 25 feet in length (see Milburn, i. 47). It is not sawn, but split from green trees.

SHINKALI, SHIGALA, n.p. A name by which the City and Port of Oranganore (q.v.) seems to have been known in the early Middle Ages. The name was probably formed from Tiranvan-jonicum, mentioned by Dr. Gundert below. It is perhaps the Gingaleh of Rabbi Benjamin in our first quotation; but the data are too vague to determine this, though the position of that place seems to be in the vicinity of Malabar.

sh. 1187. — "Gingaleh is but three days distant by land, whereas it requires a journey of fifteen days to reach it by the sea; this place contains about 1,000 Israelites."—Benjamin of Tudela, in Wright's Early Travels, p. 117.

c. 1800.—"Of the cities on the shore (of Malibār) the first is Sindābār (Gos), then Fakcnūr (see BACANORE), then the country of Manjadrūr (see MANGALORE) . . . then Shinkali (or Jimkol), then Kalam (see QUILOO).—Rashiduddin, see J. R. As. &c., N.S., iv. pp. 342, 345.

c. 1820.—"Le pays de Manibar, appelé pays du Poivre, comprend les villes suivantes. . . . "—Le ville de Shinkli, dont la majeure partie de la population est composée de Juifs.
1830.—"And the forest in which the pepper growth extendeth for a good 18 days' journey, and in that forest there be two cities, the one whereof is called Flandrina (see PANDARANT), and the other Cyniglin. . . ."—Fr. Odorico, in Cathay, &c., 75-76.

c. 1380.—"Etiam Salqiyat (see GHALLA) et Shinkala urbes Malabaricae sunt, quorum alteram Judaei inoculant. . . ."—Abulfeda, in Goldemister, 186.

c. 1349.—"And in the second India, which is called Mynibar, there is Cynkall which signifieth Little India (Little China) "for Kali is 'little.'"—John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 373.

1844.—"The place (Codungalur) is identified with Tirumal-jiculam river-harbour, which Cheraoman Perumal is said to have declared the best of the existing 18 harbours of Kera. . . ."—Dr. Gundert, in Madras Journal, xiii. 120.

"One Kerala Utpati (i.e. legendary history of Malabar) of the Naerani, says that their forefathers. . . . built Codungalur, as may be learned from the inscription at the northern entrance of the Tirumal-jiculam temple. . . ."—Ibid. 122.

SHINTOO, SINTOO, a. Japanese Shintau, 'the Way of the Gods.' The primitive religion of Japan. It is described by Faria y Sousa and other old writers, but the name does not apparently occur in those older accounts, unless it be in the Santo of Couto. According to Kaempfer the philosophic or Confucian sect is called in Japan Shinto. But that hardly seems to fit what is said by Couto, and his Santo seems more likely to be a mistake for Santo. [See Lowell's articles on Esoteric Shinto, in Proc. As. Soc. Japan, 1893.]

1612.—"But above all these idols they adore one Seudo, of which they say that it is the substance and principle of All, and that its abode is in the Heavens."—Couto, V. viii. 12.

1727.—"Le Sinto qu'on appelle aussi Sinsuj et Kamiimiti, est le Culte des Idoles, et est anciennement dans le pays. Sin et Kami sont les noms des Idoles qui font l'objet de ce Culte. Sin (sic) signifie la Foi, ou la Religion. Sinsuj et au pluriel Sinsuj, ce sont les personnes qui professent cette Religion."—Kaempfer, Hist. de Japon, i. 176; [E.T. 204].

1770.—"Far from encouraging that gloomy fanaticism and fear of the gods, which is inspired by almost all other religions, the Xinto sect had applied itself to prevent, or at least to moderate that disorder of the imagination."—Raynal (E.T. 1777), i. 137.

1878.—"The indigenous religion of the Japanese people, called in later times by the name of Shintau or Way of the Gods, in order to distinguish it from the way of the Chinese moral philosophers, and the way of Buddha, had, at the time when Confucianism and Buddhism were introduced, passed through the earliest stages of development."—Westminster Rev., N.S., No. cv. 29.

[SHIRAZ, n.p. The wine of Shiraz was much imported and used by Europeans in the 17th century, and even later.

1627.—"Sheras then probably derives it self either from sherab which in the Persian Tongue signifies a Grape here abounding. . . . or else from sheer which in the Persian signifies Milk."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 127.

1890.—"Each Day there is prepar'd (at Suratt) a Publick Table for the Use of the President and the rest of the Factory. . . . The Table is spread with the choicest Meat Suratt affords . . . and equal plenty of generous Sheras and Arak Punch . . ."—Ovington, 394.

1727.—"Shyrash is a large City on the Road, about 550 Miles from Gomorroon."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 98.

1813.—"I have never tasted this (pomegranate wine), nor any other Persian wine, except that of Shiras, which, although much extolled by poets, I think inferior to many wines in Europe."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 486.

SHIREENBAF, a. Pers. Shirinbaf, 'sweet-woof.' A kind of fine cotton stuff, but we cannot say more precisely what. c. 1848.—". . . one hundred pieces of shirinbaf . . . ."—Yon Batuta, iv. 3.

1609.—"Serrafat, a fine light stuff or cotton whereof the Moors make their cas- bays or clothing."—Dawers, Letters, i. 29.

1673.—". . . shiring chintz, Broad Baffa. . . ."—Fryer, 88.
SHISHAM. See under SISSOO.

SHISHMUKHULL, a. Pers. shisam-kaal, lit. ‘glass apartment’ or palace. This is or was a common appendage of native palaces, viz. a hall or suite of rooms lined with mirror and other glittering surfaces, usually of a gimcrack aspect. There is a place of exactly the same description, now gone to hideous decay, in the absurd Vila Palagina at Bagheria near Palermo.

1835.—‘The Shesh-mahal, or house of glass, is both curious and elegant, although the material is principally pounded talc and looking-glass. It consists of two rooms, of which the walls in the interior are divided into a thousand different panels, each of which is filled up with raised flowers in silver, gold, and colours, on a ground-work of tiny convex mirrors.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 365.

SHOE OF GOLD (or of Silver). The name for certain ingots of precious metal, somewhat in the form of a Chinese shoe, but more like a boat, which were formerly current in the trade of the Far East. Indeed of silver they are still current in China, for Giles says: “The common name among foreigners for the Chinese silver ingot, which bears some resemblance to a native shoe. May be of any weight from 1 oz. and even less, to 50 and sometimes 100 oz., and is always stamped by the assayer and banker, in evidence of purity” (Gloss. of Reference, 198). [In Hissar the Chinese silver is called still from the slabs (sil) in which it is sold (Mackagan, Mon. on Gold and Silver Work in Punjab, p. 5.)] The same form of ingot was probably the Baltish (or yasal) of the Middle Ages, respecting which see Cathay, &c., 115, 481, &c. Both of these latter words mean also ‘a cushion,’ which is perhaps as good a comparison as either ‘shoe’ or ‘boat.’ The word now used in C. Asia is yambu. There are cuts of the gold and silver ingots in Tavernier, whose words suggest what is probably the true origin of the popular English name, viz. a corruption of the Dutch Goldschuyt.

1586.—“... valuable goods exported from this country (China) ... are first, a quantity of gold, which is carried to India, in loaves in the shape of boats ...”—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391b.

1611.—“Then, I tell you, from China I could load ships with cakes of gold fashioned like boats, containing, each of them, roundly speaking, 2 marks weight, and so each cake will be worth 2000 ducats.”—Coutu, Dialogo do Soldado Pratico, p. 155.

1676.—“The Pieces of Gold mark’d Fig. 1, and 2, are by the Hollander called Golschut, that is to say, a Boat of Gold, because they are in the form of a Boat. Other Nations call them Lepees of Gold. ... The Great Pieces come to 12 hundred Gilders of Holland Money, and thirteen hundred and fifty Livres of our Money.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 8.

1702.—“Sent the Moolah to be delivered the Nabob, Dewan, and Buxie 48 Chas Oranges ... but the Dewan bid the Moolah write the Governor for a hundred more that he might send them to Court: which is understood to be One Hundred shoes of gold, or so many thousand pagodes or rupees.”—In Wheeler, i. 397.

1704.—“Price Current, July, 1704, (at Malacca). ... Gold, China, in Shoes 9d Touch.”—Lockyer, 70.

1782.—“A silver ingot ‘Yambu’ weighs about 2 (Indian) sees ... = 4 lbs., and is worth 165 Co.’s rupees. Koowooal, also called ‘Yambucka,’ or small silver ingot, is worth 33 Rs. ... 5 yambuckas, being equal to 1 yambu. There are two descriptions of ‘yambucka’: one is a square piece of silver, having a Chinese stamp on it; the other, in the form of a boat, has no stamp. The Yambu is in the form of a boat, and has a Chinese stamp on it.”—Punjab Trade Report, App. xxxvi.-xxxviii. 1.

1785.—“The yambo or keris is a silver ingot something the shape of a deep boat with projecting bow and stern. The upper surface is lightly hollowed, and stamped with a Chinese inscription. It is said to be pure silver, and to weigh 50 (Cashgar) troy oz. = 9000 grains English.”—Report of Forsyth’s Mission to Kashgar, 494.

1786.—“... he received his pay in Chinese yambo (gold coins), at the rate of 128 rubles each, while the real commercial value was only 115 rubles.”—Schuyler, Turkestan, ii. 322.

1801.—A piece of Chinese shoe money, value 10 taels, was exhibited before the Numismatic Society.—Athenæum, Jan. 26, p. 118. Perhaps the largest specimen known of Chinese “boat-money” was exhibited. It weighed 846 ounces troy, and represented 50 taels, or £28, 6s. 0d. English.—Ibid. Jan. 25, 1902, p. 1290.

SHOE-FLOWER, s. A name given in Madras Presidency to the flower of the Hibiscus Rosa-sinensis, L. It is a literal translation of the Tam. shapattu-pu, Singh. soppatumala, a name given because the flowers are used at Madras to blacken shoes. The Malay name Kempang sopat means the same. Voigt gives shoe-flower as the English name, and adds: “Petals astringent, used by the Chinese to blacken their SHOE-GOOSE, s. This ludicrous corruption of the Pers. nighth-gosh, lit. 'black-eared,' i.e. lynx (Felis Caracal) occurs in the passage below from A. Hamilton. [The corruption of the same word by the Times, below, is equally amusing.]

[c. 1330.—"...ounces, and another kind something like a greyhound, having only the ears black, and the whole body perfectly white, which among these people is called Siagols."—Friar Jordanus, 18.]

1727. — "Antelopes, Hares and Foxes, are their wild game, which they hunt with Dogs, Leopards, and a small fierce creature called by them a Shoe-goose."—A. Hamilton, i. 124; [ed. 1744, i. 125.]

1802. — "...between the cat and the lion, are the...Syagush, the lynx, the tigress..."—Ritchin, Essay on Abstinence from Animal Food, 12.

1813.—"The Moguls train another beast for antelope-hunting called the Syah-gush, or black-ears, which appears to be the same as the caracal, or Russian lynx."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 277; [2nd ed. i. 175 and 169.]

[1866.—"In 1760 a Moor named Abdallah arrived in India with a 'Shawl Goat' (so spelt, evidently a Shawl Goat) as a present for Mr. Secretary Pitt."—Account of I. O. Records, in Times, Aug. 8.]

SHOKE, s. A hobby, a favourite pursuit or whim. Ar.—shauf.

1798.—"This increased my shoung...for soldiering, and I made it my study to become a proficient in all the Hindostanee modes of warfare."—Mly. Mem. of Lt.-Col. J. Skinner, i. 109.

[1866.—"One Hakim has a shoukh for turning everything ollapoolia."—Confessions of an Orderly, 94.]

SHOLA, s. In S. India, a wooded ravine; a thicket. Tam. sholdi.

1882.—"At daylight...we left the Sisapara bungalow, and rode for several miles through a valley interspersed with sholass of rhododendron trees."—Markham, Peru and India, 356.

1876.—"Here and there in the hollows were little jungles; sholas, as they are called."—Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, Notes of Indian Journey, 202.

SHOOKA, s. Ar.—H. shuk-ka (properly 'an oblong strip'), a letter from a king to a subject.

1787.—"I have received several melanchoaly Shukhas from the King (of Dehi) calling on me in the most pressing terms for assistance and support."—Letter of Lord Cornwallis, in Corresp. i. 307.

SHOLDABBY, s. A small tent with steep sloping roof, two poles and a ridge-piece, and with very low side walls. The word is in familiar use, and is habitually pronounced as we have indicated. But the first dictionary in which we have found it is that of Platta. This author spells the word chholdari, identifying the first syllable with jhol, signifying 'puckering or bagging.' In this light, however, it seems possible that it is from jhol in the sense of a bag or wallet, viz. a tent that is crammed into a bag when carried. [The word is in Fallon, with the rather doubtful suggestion that it is a corruption of the English 'soldier's' tent. See PAWL.]

1808.—"I have now a sholdarree for myself, and a long paull (see PAWL) for my people."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 184.

[1869.—"...the men in their suldaris, or small single-roofed tents, had a bad time of it..."—Ball, Jungle Life, 156.]

SHERAB, SHERBE, s. Ar. sharbd; Hind. sharbd, sharb, 'wine.' See under SHERBET.

SHROFF, s. A money-changer, a banker. Ar. SARAF, SAIYAF, SIRAF. The word is used by Europeans in China as well as in India, and is there applied to the experts who are employed by banks and mercantile firms to check the quality of the dollars that pass into the houses (see Giles under next word). Also shroffage, for money-dealer's commission. From the same root comes the Heb. shoréf, 'a goldsmith.' Compare the figure in Malachi, iii. 3: "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi." Only in Hebrew the goldsmith tests metal, while the saraf tests coins. The Arab poet says of his mare: "Her forefeet scatter the gravel every midday, as the dirhams are scattered at their testing by the saraf." (W. R. S.)

1554—"Salaries of the officers of the Custom Houses, and other charges for which the Treasurers have to pay. . . . Also to the Xarafos, whose charge it is to see to the money, two parados a month, which make for a year seven thousand and two hundred reis." — Botelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 228.

1560—"There are in the city many and very wealthy xarafos who change money." —Tenero, ch. i.

1584—"5 tangas make a seraphin (see XERAPINE) of gold; but if one would change them into basaruchis (see BUD-GROOK) he may have 5 tangas and 16 basaruchis, which ouerplus they call cerafago . . . ."—Barret, in Hakt. ii. 410.

1585—"This present year, because only two ships came to Goa, (the reals) have sold at 12 per cent. of Xarafaggio (shroffage), as this commission is called, from the word Xarafos, which is the title of the banker." —Susetti, in De Gubernatis, Storia, p. 208.

1598—"There is in every place the street exchangers of money, by them called Xarafos, which are all Christian Jews." —Linschoten, 66; [Hak. Soc. i. 291, and see 244.]

c. 1610.—"Dans ce Marché . . . aussi sont les changeurs qu'ils nomment Cherafes, dont il y en a en plusieurs autres endroits; leurs boutiques sont aux bouts des rues et carrefours, toutes couiertes de monnay, dont ils payent tribut au Roy." —Pyrard de Laval, ii. 39; [Hak. Soc. ii. 67].

1614—". . . having been borne in hand by our Sarafes to pay money there." —Foster, Letters, iii. 282. The "Shiff of Bentam" (ibid. iv. 7) may perhaps be a shroff, but compare Shrefet.

1678—"It could not be improved till the Governor had released the Shroffs or Bankers."—Fryer, 413.

1697-3—"In addition to the cash and property which they had got by plunder, the enemy fixed two lacs of rupees as the price of the ransom of the prisoners. . . . To make up the balance, the Sarafes and merchants of Nandurbär were importuned to raise a sum, small or great, by way of loan. But they would not consent." —Kaft Khan, in Elliot, vii. 392.

1750—". . . the Irruption of the Mo- ratzaks, into Coromante, was another event that brought several eminent Shroffs and wealthy Merchants into our Town; inso- much, that I may say, there was hardly a Shroff of any Note, in the Mogul empire but had a House in it; in a word, Madras was become the Admiration of all the Coun- try People, and the Envy of all our European Neighbours." —Letter to a Proprietor of the E. I. Co. 63-54.

1809—"I had the satisfaction of hearing the Court order them (i.e. Gen. Martín's executors) to pay two lacs and a half to the plaintiff, a shroff of Lucknow." —Ed. Valencia, i. 243.

[1891—"The banker in Persia is looked on simply as a small tradesman—in fact the business of the Sarof is despised."

—Wills, in the Land of the Lion and the Sun, 192.]

SHROFF, TO, v. This verb is applied properly to the sorting of different rupees or other coins, so as to discard refuse, and to fix the various amounts of discount or agio upon the rest, establishing the value in standard coin. Hence figuratively 'to sift,' choosing the good (men, horses, facts, or what not) and rejecting the inferior.

[1554—(See under Batta, b.)]

1875—"Shroffing schools are common in Canton, where teachers of the art keep bad dollars for the purpose of exercising their pupils; and several works on the subject have been published there, with numerous illustrations of dollars and other foreign coins, the methods of scooping out silver and filling up with copper or lead, comparisons between genuine and counterfeit dollars, the difference between native and foreign milling, etc., etc."—Giles, Glossary of Reference, 129.

1882—"(The Compradores) "derived a profit from the process of shroffing which (the money received) underwent before being deposited in the Treasury."—The Face Value at Canton, 55.

SHRUB, s. See under SHERBET.

SHULWAURS, a. Trousers, or drawers rather, of the Oriental kind, the same as pyjamas, long-drawers, or mogul-breches (qq.v). The Persian is shalwar, which according to Prof. Max Müller is more correctly shulvod, from shul, 'the thigh,' related to Latin crus, curwus, and to Skt. kshura or khrvra, 'hoof' (see Pu-ray on Daniel, 570). Be this as it may, the Ar. form is shrwrd (vulg. sharwati), pl. sarwul, [which Burton (Arab. Nights, i. 205) translates 'bag-trousers' and 'petticoat-trousers,' "the latter being the divided skirt of the future." This appears in the ordinary editions of the Book of Daniel in Greek, as spadphapse, and also in the Vulgate, as follows: "Et capillus capitis eorum non esset adustus, et sarabala eorum non fuissent immutata, et odor ignis.
The word is widely spread as well as old; it is found among the Tartars of W. Asia as jâlbdr, among the Siberians and Bashkirds as sâlbdr, among the Kalmaks as shâlbâr, whilst it reached Russia as shavâwâr, Spain as saraguelh, and Portugal as sarelos. A great many Low Latin variations of the word will be found in Ducange, sarabula, sarâbula, sarabella, sarabola, sarâvura, sarâbura, and more! [And Crawford (Desc. Dict. 124) writes of Malay dress: "Trowsers are occasionally used under the sarung by the richer classes, and this portion of dress, like the imitation of the turban, seems to have been borrowed from the Arabs, as is implied by its Arabic name, sarâul, corrupted saluvur."]

In the second quotation from Isidore of Seville below it will be seen that the word had in some cases been interpreted as 'turbana.'

A.D. (1).—"Kal eudromw tonâ bârdras tei oks ekplêroves to pur tov ouxomatov autôn kai ti brê to kefalês autôn ouk éphlogesthai kai ta sarabara autôn ouk hêllôxai, kai osmê tâuros ouk dêin avtois."—Gr. Tr. of Dan. iii. 27.

C. A.D. 500.—"Sarabara, ta peri tâs xemidias (sic) evnedulxoteras."—Hesychius, s.v.

C. 1000.—"Sarabara, istori Pervii énoi de lýngwv bpsakia."—Suidas, s.v.

which may be roughly rendered:

"A garb outlandish to the Greeks, Which some call Shalwars, some call Breeks!"

C. 900.—"The deceased was unchanged, except in colour. They dressed him then with sarâwâl, overhose, boote, a kurtak and khuftân of gold-cloth, with golden buttons, and put on him a golden cap, garnished with sable."—Ibn Fustâlân, in Fræhn, 15.

C. 1800.—"Disconsolatur aitare eorum, et oportet reconciliari per episcopum . . . si intraret ad ipsum aliquis qui non esset Nestorius; si intraret eciam ad ipsum quicumque sine sotrabulis vel capite cooptero."—Ricoldo of Monte Croce, in Peregrinatores Quatuor, 122.

1330.—"Haec autem mulieres vadunt discalcetatae portantes sarabulas usque ad terram."—Frâier Odoric, in Cathay, &c., App. iv.

c. 1495.—"The first who wore sarâwâl was Solomon. But in another tradition it is alleged that Abraham was the first."—The 'Beginnings,' by Soytî, quoted by Fræhn, 118.

1567.—"Portuanno braghessi quasi alla turchesca, et anche salwari."—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. f. 389.

1824.—". . . tell me how much he will be contented with! Can I offer him five Tomauns, and a pair of crimson Shulwaurs!"—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 179.

1881.—"I used to wear a red shirt and velvetine sharrovary, and lie on the sofa like a gentleman, and drink like a Swede."—Ten Years of Penal Servitude in Siberia, by Fedor Dostoyefski, E.T. by Maria v. Thilo, 191.

SIAM, n.p. This name of the Indo-Chinese Kingdom appears to come to us through the Malays, who call it Sîyâm. From them we presume the Portuguese took their Reyno de Sianó as Barros and Couto write it, though we have in Correa Siam precisely as we write it. Camões also writes Sêão for the kingdom; and the statement of De la Loubère quoted below that the Portuguese used Siam as a national, not a geographical, expression cannot be accepted in its generality, accurate as that French writer usually is. It is true that both Barros and F. M. Pinto use as Siames for the nation, and the latter also uses the adjective form o reyno Siame. But he also constantly says rey de Siaò. The origin of the name would seem to be a term Sien, or Siam, identical with Shan (q.v.). "The kingdom of Siam is known to the Chinese by the name Sien-lo . . . The supplement to Matwanlin’s Encyclopedia describes Sien-lo as on the seaboard, to the extreme south of Chen-ching (or Cochín China). 'It originally consisted of two kingdoms, Sien and Lo-hóh. The Sien people are the remains of a tribe which in the year (A.D. 1341) began to come down upon the Lo-hóh and united with the latter into one nation.' See Marco Polo, 2nd ed., Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3. The considerations there adduced indicate that the Lo who occupied the coast of the Gulf before the descent of the Sien, belonged to the Loatian Shans, Thainyats, or Great Tai, whilst the Sien or Siamese proper were the Tai Not, or Little Tai. (See also SABRAU.) ["The name Siam . . . whether it is 'a barbarous Anglicism derived from the Portuguese or Italian word Sciam,' or is derived from the Malay Sayam, which means 'brown.'—J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 205.]

1616.—"Proceeding further, quitting the kingdom of Pegu, along the coast over against Malaca there is a very great kingdom of pagans which they call Dansam (of ANSEAM); the king of which is a pagan also, and a very great lord."—Barbosa (Lisbon, Acad.), 369. It is difficult to interpret this ANSEAM, which we find also in C. Federici below in the form ASIAM. But the Asa is probably a Malay prefix of some kind. [Also see ANSEAM in quotation from the same writer under MALACCA.]

c. 1522.—"The king (of Zzuba) answered him that he was welcome, but that the custom was that all ships which arrived at his country or port paid tribute, and it was only 4 days since that a ship called the Junk of Ciama, laden with gold and slaves, had paid him his tribute, and to verify what he said, he showed them a merchant of the said Ciama, who had remained there to trade with the gold and slaves."—PIGAFETTA, Hak. Soc. 85.

"All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the king of Siam, who is named Siri Zaebedera, and who inherits India (see JUDEA)."—Ibid. 156.

1525.—"In this same Port of Pam (Pahang), which is in the kingdom of SYAMA, there was another junk of Malaca, the captain whereof was Alvaro da Costan, and it had aboard 15 Portuguese, at the same time that in Joatane (Patane) they seized the ship of Andre de Bryta, and the junk of Gaspar Soares, and as soon as this news was known they laid hands on the junk and the crew and the cargo; it is presumed that the people were killed, but it is not known for certain."—Lembrança das Coisas da Índia, 6.

1672.—"Vês Pam, Patâne, rainos e a longura. De Sylo, que estas e outros mais sujeitas; Olho o rio Menso que se derrama. Do grande laço, que Chiamsey se chiamá."—Camões, x. 25.

By Burton:

"See Pam, Patane and in length obscure, Siam that ruleth all with lordly sway; behold Manam, who rolls his lordly tide from source Chiamsey called, lake long and wide."

C. 1657.—"Va etiandio ogn anno per l'istesso Capitano (di Malaca) va nauhio in Asion, a carrocare di Verrino" (Brazilwood).—Cos. Federici, in Romuano, iii. 396.

"Fu già Sion vna grandissima Città e sedia d'Imperio, ma l'anno MDLVIII fu pressa dal Re del Pegu, qual caminando per terra quattro mesi di viaggio, con vn eserito d'vn million, e quattro cento mila uomini da guerra, la venne ad assediare . . . e lo so io perciocche mi ritrovnai in Pegh sei mesi dopo la sua partita."—Ibid.

1598.—". . . The King of Siam at this time is become tributarie to the king of Pegu. The cause of this most bloodie battle was, that the king of Siam had a white Elephant."—Linschoten, p. 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 102. In ii. 1 Siam].

1611.—"We have news that the Hollanders were in Siam."—NAMET, LETTERS, i. 149.

1688.—"The Name of Siam is unknown to the Siames. Tis one of those words which the Portuguese of the Indies do use, and of which it is very difficult to discover the Original. They use it as the Name of the Nation and not of the Kingdom: And the Names of Pegu, Lao, Mogul, and most of the Names which we give to the Indian Kingdoms, are likewise National Names."—De la Loubère, E.T. p. 6.

SICCA, s. As will be seen by reference to the article RUPPE, up to 1835 a variety of rupees had been coined in the Company's territories. The term sica (sikk, from Ar. sikka, 'a coinage die,'—and 'coined money,'—whence Pers. sikka zadan, 'to coin') had been applied to newly coined rupees, which were at a batta or premium over those worn, or assumed to be worn, by use. In 1783 the Government of Bengal, with a view to terminating, as far as that Presidency was concerned, the confusion and abuses engendered by this system, ordered that all rupees coined for the future should bear the impress of the 19th year of Shah 'Alam (the "Great Mogul" then reigning), and this rupee, "19 San Sikrah," struck in the 19th year, was to be the legal tender in Bengal, Bahar, and Oissas. This rupee, which is the Sicca of more recent monetary history, weighed 192 grs. troy, and then contained 176:13 grs. of pure silver. The "Company's Rupee," which introduced uniformity of coinage over British India in 1836, contained only 165 grs. silver. Hence the Sicca bore to the Company's Rupee (which was based on the old Purruckabād rupee) the proportion of 16:15 nearly. The Sicca was allowed by Act VII. of 1833 to survive as an exceptional coin in Bengal, but was abolished as such in 1836. It continued, however, a ghastly exhibition of pure silver. 1587.—"... o quanto à moeda ser chapada de sua saya (read sica) pois já a concedia."—Ibid. 226.

[1615.—"... cecus of Amadavra which goeth for eighty-six pious (see FIOE). ..."—Foster, Letters, i. 57.]

1683.—"... Having received 25,000 Rupees Siccas for Rajaman."—Hedges, Diary, April 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 75.]

1705.—"Les roupees Sicca valent à Bengale 59 solas."—Lozillier, 255.

1779.—"In the 2nd Term, 1779, on Saturday, March 6th: Judgment was pronounced for the plaintiff. Damages fifty thousand Sicca rupees.

Francis, in Escheor of Old Calcutta, 243. [To this Mr. Busteed adds: "Nor does there seem to be any foundation for the other time-honoured story (also repeated by Kaye) in connection with this judgment, viz., the alleged interruption of the Chief Justice, while he was delivering judgment, by Mr. Justice Hyde, with the eager suggestion or reminder of 'Siccas, Siccas, Brother Imprey,' with the view of making the damages as high as the awarded figure as possible. Mr. Merivale says that he could find no confirmation of the old joke. ... The story seems to have been first promulgated in a book of 'Personal Recollections' by John Nicholls, M.P., published in 1822."—Ibid. 3rd ed. 229.]

"III.—The weight and standard of the Calcutta sicca rupee and its sub-divisions, and of the Purruckabād rupee, shall be as follows:

Sicca sicca rupee 182 176 16

"IV.—The use of the sicca weight of 176-666 grains, hitherto employed for the receipt of bullion at the Mint, being in fact the weight of the Moorschiedad rupee of the old standard, ... shall be discontinued, and in its place the following unit to be called the Tola (q.v.) shall be introduced."

—India Regulation VII. of 1833.

[SICKMAN, s. adj. The English sick man has been adopted into Hind. sepyo patois as meaning ‘one who has to go to hospital,’ and generally sikmdn ho jānd means ‘to be disabled.’] [1665.—“That sickman Chaseman.”—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. colxv.

1843.—“... my hired cart was broken —(or, in the more poetical garb of the sephees, ‘seek man hoyga,’ i.e. become a sick man).”—Davidson, Travels, i. 251.]

SICLEEGUR, s. Hind. saikalgar, from Ar. saikal, ‘polish.’ A furbisher of arms, a sword-armourer, a sword- or knife-grinder. [This, in Madras, is turned into Chickledar, Tel. chikili-darudu.]

[1826.—“My father was a shlekul-ghur, or sword-grinder.”—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 218.]

SIKH, SEIKH, n.p. Panjâbi-Hind. Sikh, ‘a disciple,’ from Skt. Śīkṣya; the distinctive name of the disciples of Nānak Shāh who in the 16th century established that sect, which eventually rose to warlike predominance in the Punjab, and from which sprang Ranjit Singh, the founder of the brief Kingdom of Lahore.

c. 1650-60.—“The Nanak-Panthians, who are known as composing the nation of the Sikhs, have neither idols, nor temples of idole. . .” (Much follows.) — Dabistä, ii. 246.

1708-9.—“There is a sect of infidels called Gurd (see GOOBOO), more commonly known as Sikhs. Their chief, who dresses as a fakir, has a fixed residence at Lahore. . . . This sect consists principally of Jut and Khäté of the Panjab and of other tribes of infidels. When Aurangzeb got knowledge of these matters, he ordered these deputy Gurs to be removed and the temples to be pulled down.” — Khät Khat, in Elliot, vii. 413.

1756.—“April of 1716, when the Emperor took the field and marched towards Lahore, against the Sykers, a nation of Indians lately reared to power, and bearing mortal enmity to the Mahomedans.” — Orme, ii. 22. He also writes Sikhs.

1781.—“Before I left Calcutta, a gentleman with whom I chanced to be discoursing of that sect who are distinguished from the worshippers of Bóthas, and the followers of Mahomer by the appellation Seek, informed me that there was a considerable number of them settled in the city of Patna, where they had a College for teaching the tenets of their philosophy.” — Wilkins, in As. Res. i. 383.

1781-2.—“In the year 1128 of the Héjira” (1716) “a bloody action happened in the plains of the Pendjab, between the Sykers and the Indian Tribes, in which the latter, commanded by Abdol-semed-Khan, a famous Viceroy of that province, gave these inhuman freebooters a great defeat, in which their General, Benda, fell into the victors' hands. . . . He was a Bye by profession, that is one of those men attached to the tenets of Guru-Govind, and who from their birth or from the moment of their admission never cut or shave either their beard or whiskers or any hair whatever of their body. They form a particular Society as well as a sect, which distinguishes itself by wearing almost always blue cloaths, and going armed at all times.” &c.—Seer Mutahhirs, i. 87.

1782.—“News was received that the Seekhs had crossed the Jumna.” — India Gazette, May 11.

1783.—“Unhurt by the Sloques, tigers, and thieves, I am safely lodged at Nourpour.” — Forster, Journey, ed. 1805, i. 247.

1784.—“The Seekhs are encamped at the distance of 12 coss from the Pass of Dirderry, and have plundered all that quarter.” — In Setos-Karr, i. 13.

1790.—“Particulars relating to the seizure of Colonel Robert Stewart by the Sloques.” — Calcul. Monthly Register, &c., i. 152.

1810.—Williamson (V. M.) writes Seekhs.

The following extract indicates the prevalence of a very notable error:—

1840.—“Runjeet possesses great personal courage, a quality in which the Sikhs (sic) are supposed to be generally deficient.” — Orme, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, 88.

We occasionally about 1840-5 saw the word written by people in Calcutta, who ought to have known better, Sheiks.

SILBOOT, SILPET, SLIPPET, s. Domestic Hind. corruptions of ‘slipper.’ The first is an instance of “striving after meaning” by connecting it in some way with ‘boot.’ [The Railway ‘ sleeper’ is in the same way corrupted into silpat.]

SILLADAR, adj. and s. Hind. from Pers. silah-dar, ‘bearing or having arms,’ from Ar. silaš, ‘arma.’ [In the Arabian Nights (Burton, ii. 114) it has the primary sense of an ‘armour-bearer.’] Its Anglo-Indian application is to a soldier, in a regiment of irregular cavalry, who provides his own arms and horse; and sometimes to regiments composed of such men—“a corps of Silladar Horse.” [See Irvine, The Army of the Indian Moguls, (J. R. As. Soc., July 1896, p. 549).]

1766.—“When this intelligence reached the Nawab, he leaving the whole of his troops and baggage in the same place, with only 6000 stable horse, 9000 Sillahdars, 4000 regular infantry, and guns . . . fell bravely on the Mahtrattas.” . . . — Mir Husain Allah, H. of Hydor Naik, 173.

1804.—“It is my opinion, that the arrangement with the Soubah of the Deccan should be, that the whole of the force . . . should be silladar horse.” — Wellington, iii. 671.

1813.—“Bhau . . . in the prosecution of his plan, selected Malhar Row Holcar, a Silledar or soldier of fortune.” — Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 549.

[SILLAPOSH, s. An armour-clad warrior; from Pers. silah, ‘body armour,’ posh, Pers. poshidan, ‘to wear.’]

1798.—“The Silla posh or body-guard of the Rajah (of Jaipur).” — W. Franklin, Mil. Mem. of Mr. George Thomas, ed. 1805, p. 165.

1829.—“. . . he stood two assaults, in one of which he slew thirty Sillahposh, or men in armour, the body-guard of the prince.” — Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, ii. 462.

SILLAGOOOR, a. Ship Hind. for ‘sail-maker’ (Roebuck).

SIMKIN, s. Domestic Hind. for champagne, of which it is a corruption; sometimes samkin.

1853.—“The dinner was good, and the iced simkin, Sir, delicious.” — Oakfield, ii. 127.
SIND, SCINDE, &c., n.p. The territory on the Indus below the Punjab. [In the early inscriptions the two words Sindhu-Sauvira are often found conjoined, the latter probably part of Upper Sind (see Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 36.)] The earlier Mahomedans hardly regarded Sind as part of India, but distinguished sharply between Sind and Hind, and denoted the whole region that we call India by the copula 'Hind and Sind.' We know that originally these were in fact but diverging forms of one word; the aspirant and bilabial tendencies in several parts of India (including the extreme east) — compare Assam, Ahom — and the extreme west, as in some other regions, to exchange places.

But from the association with the Khazars, and in a passage on the preceding page with Alans and Khazars, we may be almost certain that these Sindis are not Indian, but a Sarmatic people mentioned by Ammianus (xxii. 8), Valerius Flaccus (vi. 86), and other writers.

Horse soldiers (Laqward a guoal), whom he supplies with horses, 300 at 70 feldes a month." — Lembraça, p. 37.

The preceding extract is curious as showing the comparative value put upon Arabs, Khorasans (qu. Afnans), Sindis, Rumi, (i.e. Turks), Fartaks (Arabs of Hadramaut), &c.

c. 1760. — "Scindy, or Tatta." — Gower, i. 286.

SINDABUR, SANDABUR, n.p. This is the name by which Goa was known to the old Arab writers. The identity was clearly established in Cathay and the Way Thither, pp. 444 and ccl. We will give the quotations first, and then point out the grounds of identification.

A.D. 943. — "Crocodileis abound, it is true, in the ajedn or bays formed by the Sea of India, such as that of Sindabura in the Indian Kingdom of Bighira, or in the bay of Zabaj (see JAVA) in the dominion of the Maharas." — Mafragi, i. 207.

1013. — "I have it from Abi Yusaf bin Muslim, who had it from Abi Bakr of Fas at Saimur, that the latter heard told by Mous the Sindaburi: 'I was one day conversing with the Sahib of Sindabur, when suddenly he burst out laughing... It was, said he, because there is a beard on the wall, and it said, 'There is a guest coming today... Don't you go till you see what comes of it.' So we remained talking till one of his servants came in and said 'There is a ship of Oman come in.'

Shortly after, people arrived, carrying hampers with various things, such as cloths, and rose-water. As they opened one, out came a long lizard, which instantly clung to the wall and went to join the other one.
It was the same person, they say, who enchanted the crocodiles in the estuary of Sindábur, so that now they hurt nobody.'
——Livre des Merveilles de l'Inde. V. der Lüth et Deric, 157-158.

c. 1160. — "From the city of Barth (Beruch, i.e. Broach) following the coast, to Sindábur 4 days.

'Sindábur is on a great inlet where ships anchor. It is a place of trade, where one sees fine buildings and rich beasts." — Elliot,
i. 179. And see Elliott, i. 89.

c. 1380. — "Beyond Guzerat are Konkan and Tana; beyond them the country of Malibar. . . . The people are all Samanis (Buddhists), and worship idols. Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindábur, then Faknur, then the country of Manjarur, then the country of Hilli. . . ." — Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1384. — "A traveller states that the country from Sindábur to Hanávar toward its eastern extremity joins with Malabar." — Abu'dusa, Fr. ii. II. ii. 115.
Further on in his Table he jumbles up
(as Edris has done) Sindábur with Sindán (see ST. JOHN).

"The heat is great at Aden. This is the port frequented by the people of India; great ships arrive there from Cambay, Tana, Kaulam, Calicut, Fandarkina, Sháliyát, Manjarur, Fákánur, Hanaur, Sandábur, et cetera." — Ibn Batuta, ii. 177.

c. 1343-4. — "Three days after setting sail
we arrived at the Island of Sindábur, within which there are 36 villages. It is summoned by an inlet, and at the time of tide the water of this is fresh and pleasant, whilst at low tide it is salt and bitter.
There are in the island two cities, one ancient, built by the pagans; the second built by the Musulmans when they conquered the island the first time. . . . We left this island behind us and anchored at a small island near the mainland, where we found, among other things, a grove, and a tank of water. . . ." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 61-62.

1350. 1375. — In the Medicoen and the Catalan maps of those dates we find on the coast of India Chintabor and Chintábor respectively, on the west coast of India.

c. 1564. — "24th Voyage: from Guvah-Sindábur to Aden. If you start from Guvah-Sindábur at the end of the season, take care not to fall on Cape Fal," etc.—
Mohit, in J. A. S. B. v. 564.

The last quotation shows that Goa was known in the middle of the 16th century to Oriental seamen as Goa-Sindábur, whatever Indian name the last part repre-semed; probably, from the use of the name by the earlier Arab writers, and from the Chintabor of the European maps, Chamá-ber rather than Sindábur. No Indian name like this has yet been recovered from inscriptions as attaching to Goa; but the Turkish author of the Mohit supplies the connection, and Ibn Batuta's description even without this would be sufficient for the identification. His description, it will be seen, is different, is Goa, and what Goa is the only one partaking of that character upon the coast. He says it contained 36 villages; and Barros tells us that Goa Island was known to the natives as Tinnábi, a name signifying "Thirty villages." (See BAL-SETSE.) Its vicinity to the island where Ibn Batuta proceeded to anchor, which we shall have shown to be Anechdiva (q.v.), is another proof. Turning to Rashiduddin, the order in which he places Sindábur, Faknur (Bacanore), Manjarur (Mangalore),
Hill (Mt. D'Elly), is perfectly correct, if for Sindábur we substitute Goa. The passage from Edrisi and one indicated from Abu'dusa only show a confusion which has misled many readers since.

SINGALESE, CINGHALESE, n.p.
Native of Ceylon; pertaining to Ceylon.
The word is formed from Singhala, 'Dwelling of Lions,' the word used by the natives for the Island, and which is the origin of most of the names given to it (see CEYLON). The explanation given by De Barros and Couto is altogether fanciful, though it leads them to notice the curious and obscure fact of the introduction of Chinese influence in Ceylon during the 15th century.

1552. — "That the Chinese (Chijr) were masters of the Choromandel Coast, of part of Malabar, and of this Island of Ceylon, we have not only the assertion of the Natives of the latter, but also evidence in the buildings, names, and language that they left in it. . . . and because they were in the vicinity of this Cape Galle, the other people who lived from the middle of the Island upwards called those dwelling about there Chingalla, and their language the same, as much as to say the language, or the people

1583. — "(The Cachin Chinese) are of the race of the Chingalays, which they say are the best kind of all the Malabars." — Hück, in Hakl. ii. 397.

1598. — " . . . inhabited with people called Cingalas, . . . " — Lisachotus, 24; [Hak.
Soc. i. 77; in i. 81, Cingalas].

c. 1610. — "Ils tiennent donc que . . . les premiers qui y allèrent, et qui les ont commandés (dits les Malaves) furent . . . les Cingalas de l'Isle de Ceylan." — Payard de Laval, i. 185; [Hak. Soc. i. 105, and see i. 265].

1612. — Couto, after giving the same explanation of the word as Barros, says: "And as they spring from the Chins, who are the falsest heathen of the East . . . so are they of this island the weakest, falsest, and most tricky people in all India, insomuch that, to this day, you never find faith or truth in a Chingalia."—V. i. 5.

1681.—"The Chingalies are naturally a people given to sloth and laziness: if they can but anyways live, they abhor to work."—Knor, 32.

SINGAPORE, SINGAPORE, n.p.

This name was adopted by Sir Stamford Raffles in favour of the city which he founded, February 23, 1819, on the island which had always retained the name since the Middle Ages. This it derived from Singapura, Skt. 'Lion-city,' the name of a town founded by Malay or Javanese settlers from Sumatra, probably in the 14th century, and to which Baram refers. His etymology of Singalese quoted in the preceding article. The words on which his etymology of Singalese is founded are no doubt Malay: singah, 'to tarry, halt, or lodge,' and paura, 'to pretend'; and these were probably supposed to refer to the temporary occupation of Sinhapura, before the chiefs who founded it passed on to Malacca.

It may be noted that Denny's (Desc. Dict. s.v.) derives the word from singha, 'a place of call,' and paura, 'a city.' In Dalboquerque's Comm. Hak. Soc. iii. 73, we are told: "Singapura, whence the city takes its name, is a channel through which all the shipping of those parts passes, and signifies in his Malay language, 'treacherous delay'" (See quotation from Barros below.)

The settlement of Hinduized people on the site, if not the name, is probably as old as the 4th century, A.D., for inscriptions have been found there in a very old character. One of these, on a rock at the mouth of the little river on which the town stands, was destroyed some 40 or 50 years ago for the accommodation of some wretched bungalow.

The modern Singapore and its prosperity form a monument to the patriotism, sagacity, and fervid spirit of the founder. According to an article in the Geogr. Magazine (i. 107) derived from Mr. Archibald Ritchie, who was present with the expedition which founded the colony, Raffles, after consultation with Lord Hastings, was about to establish a settlement for the protection and encouragement of our Eastern trade, in the Nicobar Islands, when his attention was drawn to the superior advantages of Singapore by Captains Ross and Crawford of the Bombay Marine, who had been engaged in the survey of those seas. Its great adaptation for a mercantile settlement had been discerned by the shrewd, if somewhat vulgar, Scot, Alexander Hamilton, 120 years earlier. It seems hardly possible, we must however observe, to reconcile the details in the article cited, with the letters and facts contained in the Life of Raffles; though probably the latter had, at some time or other, received information from the officers named by Mr. Ritchie.

1512.—"And as the enterprise was one to make good booty, everybody was delighted to go on it, so that they were more than 1200 men, the soundest and best armed of the garrison, and so they were ready incontinent, and started for the Strait of Sincapura, where they were to wait for the junkes."—Correa, ii. 284-5.

1555.—"Anciently the most celebrated settlement in this region of Malacca was one called Cingapura, a name which in their tongue means 'pretended halt' (falsa dorma); and this stood upon a point of that country which is the most southerly of all Asia, and lies, according to our graduation, in half a degree of North Latitude ... before the foundation of Malacca, at this same Cingapura ... flocked together all the navigators of the Seas of India from West and East. . . ."—Barros, ii. vi. 1.

[The same derivation is given in the Comm. of Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. iii. 73.]

1572.—

"Mas na ponta da terra Cingapura.
Verôa, onde o caminho as naos se estreita;
Daqui, tornando a costa & Cynosura,
Se incurva, e para a Aurora se entrega."—Candes, x. 125.

By Burton :

"But on her Lands-end throneed see Cingaputr, where the wide sea-road shrinks to narrow way:
Thence curves the coast to face the Cynosure, and lastly trends Aurora-wards its lay."—1598.—"... by water the coast stretcheth to the Cape of Singapura, and from thence it runneth upwards [inwards] again. ..."

1599.—"In this voyage nothing occurred worth relating, except that, after passing the Strait of Sincapura, situated in one degree and a half, between the main land and a variety of islands ... with so narrow a channel that from the ship you could jump ashore, or touch the branches of the trees on either side, our vessel struck on a shoal."—Viggo di Carletti, ii. 269-9.

1606.—"The 5th May came there 2 Prows from the King of Johore, with the Shabander [Shahbunder] of Singapora, called Sir Raja Nagara. ..."—Valentijn, v. 331.

1616.—"Found a Dutch man-of-war, one of a fleet appointed for the siege of Malacca, with the aid of the King of Acheen, at the entrance of the Straits of Singapora."—Sainsbury, i. 468.

1727.—"In anno 1708 I called at Johore on my Way to China, and he treated me very kindly, and made me a Present of the Island of Sincapura, but I told him it could be of no use to a private Person, tho' a proper Place for a Company to settle a Colony in, lying in the Center of Trade, and being accommodated with good Rivers and safe Harbours, so conveniently situated that all Winds served Shipping, both to go out and come in."—A. Hamilton, ii. 98; [ed. 1744, ii. 97].

1818.—"We are now on our way to the eastward, in the hope of doing something, but I much fear the Dutch have hardly left us an inch of ground. ... My attention is principally turned to Johore, and you must not be surprised if my next letter to you is dated from the site of the ancient city of Singapura."—Raffles, Letter to Marsden, dated Sandheads, Dec. 12.

SINGARA, s. Hind. singhârd, Skt. singadatta, singa, 'a horn.' The caltrop or water-chestnut; Trapa bipolaris, Roxb. (N.O. Haloragaceae).

[c. 1590. — The Ais (ed. Jarrett, ii. 65) mentions it as one of the crops on which revenue was levied in cash.

1789.—In Kashmir "many of them ... were obliged to live on the Kernel of the singera, or water-nut. ..."—Forster, Travels, ii. 29.

[1809.—Buchanan-Hamilton writes singhara.—Eastern India, i. 241.]

1835.—"Here, as in most other parts of India, the tank is spoiled by the water-chestnut, singhara (Trapa bipolaris), which is everywhere as regularly planted and cultivated in fields under a large surface of water, as wheat or barley is in the dry plains. ... The nut grows under the water after the flowers decay, and is of a triangular shape, and covered with a tough brown integument adhering strongly to the kernel, which is wholly esculent, and of a fine cartilaginous texture. The people are very fond of these nuts, and they are carried often upon bullocks' backs two or three hundred miles to market."—Shenwan, Rambles, &c. (1844), i. 101; [ed. Smith, i. 94.]

1859.—"The nuts of the Trapa bipolaris, called Sincapura, are sold in all the Bazaars of India; and a species called by the same name, forms a considerable portion of the food of the inhabitants of Cashmere, as we learn from Mr. Forster [loc. cit.] that it yields the Government 12,000/. of revenue; and Mr. Moorcroft mentions nearly the same sum as Ranjeet Sing's share, from 96,000 to 128,000 ass-loads of this nut, yielded by the Lake of Oaller."—Royle, Hist. Plants, i. 211.

SIPAESELAR, a. A General-in-chief; Pers. sipah-salâr, 'army-leader,' the last word being the same as in the title of the late famous Minister-Regent of Hyderabad, Sir Sâlâr Jang, i.e. 'the leader in war.'

C. 1000-1100.—"Voici quelle étroit alors la loisir et la puissance des Orphéens dans le royaume. Ils possédent la charge de sâb-mâlar, ou de généralissime de toute la Georgie. Tous les officiers du palais étaient de leur dependance."—Hist. of the Orphéens, in St. Martin, Mem. sur l'Arménie, ii. 77.

1358.—"At 16 my father took me by the hand, and brought me to his own Monastery. He there addressed me: 'My boy, our ancestors from generation to generation have been commanders of the armies of the Jaggat and the Berlas family. The dignity of (Sipah Salâr) Commander-in-Chief has now descended to me, but as I am tired of this world ... I mean therefore to resign my public office. ...'—Awb. Mem. of Timour, E.T. p. 22.

1712.—"Omnibus illis superior est ... Sipah Salâr, sive Imperator Generalis Regni, Praesidium dignitatum expiciens. ..."—Kempfer, Amoen. Exot. 73.

1755.—"After the Sipahsalâr Hydur, by his prudence and courage, had defeated the Mahrattas, and recovered the country taken by them, he placed the government of Seringaputtam on a sure and established basis. ..."—Murr Huscain, Ali Khan, H. of Hydur Nuiik, O. T. F. p. 61.

C. 1803.—In a collection of native letters, the titles of Lord Lake are given as follows: "Aska-ul-Mulk Khâja Durâs, General Gerard Lake Bahâdur, Sipahsalâr-i-kishwar-i-Hind," "Valiant of the Kingdom, Lord of the Cycle, Commander-in-chief of the Territories of Hindustan."—North Indian Notes and Queries, iv. 17.]

SIRCAR, a. Hind. from Pers. surkdr, 'head (of affairs).' This word has very diverse applications; but its senses may fall under three heads.
a. The State, the Government, the Supreme authority; also 'the Master' or head of the domestic government. Thus a servant, if asked 'Whose are those horses?' in replying 'They are the sarkār's', may mean according to circumstances, that they are Government horses, or that they belong to his own master.

b. In Bengal the word is applied to a domestic servant who is a kind of house-steward, and keeps the accounts of household expenditure, and makes miscellaneous purchases for the family; also, in merchants' offices, to any native accountant or native employed in making purchases, &c.

c. Under the Mahommedan Governments, as in the time of the Mogul Empire, and more recently in the Deccan, the word was applied to certain extensive administrative divisions of territory. In its application in the Deccan it has been in English generally spelt Circar (q.v.).

1759.—"... there is no separation between your Honour ... and this Sircar. ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 129.

1800.—"Would it not be possible and proper to make people pay the circar according to the exchange fixed at Seringapatam?"—Wellington, i. 60.

1866.—"... the Sircar Buhadoor gives me four rupees a month. ..."—Confessions of an Orderly, 43.

1777.—"There is not in any country in the world, of which I have any knowledge, a more pernicious race of vermin in human shape than are the numerous cast of people known in Bengal by the appellation of Sircars; they are educated and trained to deceive."—Price’s Tracts, i. 24.

1810.—"The Sircar is a genius whose whole study is to handle money, whether receivable or payable, and who contrives either to confuse accounts, when they are acceptable to his view, or to render them most expressively intelligible, when such should suit his purpose."—Williamson, V.M. i. 200.

1822.—"One morning our Sircar, in answer to my having observed that the articles purchased were highly priced, said, ‘You are my father and my mother, and I am your poor little child. I have only taken 2 annas in the rupee dustoorie’" (dustoor).—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 21-22.

1834.—"… And how the deuce,’ asked his companion, ‘do you manage to pay for them?’ ‘Nothing so easy,—I say to my Sircar: Baboo, go pay for that horse 2000 rupees, and it is done, Sir, as quickly as you could dock him.’"—The Baboo and Other Tales, i. 13.

c. 1580.—"In the fortieth year of his majesty’s reign, his dominions consisted of 105 Sircaras, subdivided into 2737 kusbas (cuaba), ‘the revenue of which he settled for ten years at 3 Arrebs, 62 Crores, 97 Lackhs, 55,246 Dams’ (q.v.)—Gladwin, 1800, ii. 1; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115.]

SIRDAR. s. Hind. from Pers. sar-dar, and less correctly sir-dār, ‘leader, a commander, an officer’; a chief, or lord; the head of a set of palankin-bearers, and hence the sirdār-bearer, or elliptically the Sirdār, is in Bengal the style of the valet or body-servant, even when he may have no others under him (see BEAREE). [Sirdār is now the official title of the Commander-in-Chief of the Egyptian army; Sirdār Bahaddur is an Indian military distinction.]

[c. 1610.—"... a captain of a company, or, as they call it, a Sardar."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 254.

1875.—"Sardar."—Life of Leyden.

1808.—"... I, with great difficulty, knocked up some of the villagers, who were nearly as much afraid as Christie’s Will, at the visit of a SIRDAR” (here an officer).—Mrs. Sherwood, Last Days of Booby, 63.

1826.—"... Gopee’s father had been a Sirdar of some consequence."—Pandurang Hari, 174; [ed. 1873, i. 252.]

SIRDĀRS. s. This is the name which native valets (bearer) give to common drawers (underclothing). A friend (Gen. R. Maclagan, R.E.) has suggested the origin, which is doubtless “short drawers” in contradistinction to Long-drawers, or Pyjamas (q.v.). A common bearer’s pronunciation is sirdrīj; as a chest of drawers is also called ‘Drāj kt almaird’ (see ALMYRA).

SIRKY. s. Hind. sirkī. A kind of unplatted matting formed by laying the fine cylindrical culms from the upper part of the Saccharum sara, Roxb. (see SURKUNDA) side by side, and binding them in single or double layers. This is used to lay under the thatch of a house, to cover carts and Wood shows that this wood was exported from India to Chaldaea in remote ages. Sissoo has continued in recent times to be exported to Egypt. (see Forskal, quoted by Royce, Hindu Medicine, 128.) Royce notices the resemblance of the Biblical shittim wood to shisham.

c. A.D. 80.—". . . Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza (Brouch) to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers, and beams of teak (ξυλα σαγαλίων καὶ δοξών) . . . and logs of shisham (φαλάγγις σαμαίμων) . . ."—Periplus, Maria Bryktr., cap 36.

c. 545.—". . . These again are passed on from Sileshidiba to the marts on this side, such as Malé, where the pepper is grown, and Kalliana, whence are exported brass, and shisham logs (σάμαμα τοία), and other wares."—Cosmas, lib. xi.

I before 1200.—

There are the wolf and the parrot, and the peacock, and the dove.
And the plant of Zinz, and al-sa'irm, and pepper . . . .

Verbes on India by Abu'l-qali', the Sindi, quoted by Karri, in Gildemeister, p. 215.

1810.—". . . Sissoo grows in most of the great forests, intermixed with saal . . . This wood is extraordinarily hard and heavy, of a dark brown, inclining to a purple tint when polished."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 71.

1839.—". . . As I rode through the city one day I saw a considerable quantity of timber lying in an obscure street. On examining it I found it was shisham, a wood of the most valuable kind, being not liable to the attacks of white ants."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, ed. 1851, p. 102.

SITTING-UP. A curious custom, in vogue at the Presidency towns more than a century ago, and the nature of which is indicated by the quotations. Was it of Dutch origin?

1777.—"Lady Impey sits up with Mrs. Hastings; sulgo toad-eating."—Ph. Francis' Diary, quoted in Busted, Echoes of Old Calcula, 124; [3rd ed. 125].

1780.—"When a young lady arrives at Madras, she must, in a few days afterwards sit up to receive company, attended by some beau or master of the ceremonies, which perhaps continues for a week, or until she has seen all the fair sex and gentlemen of the settlement."—Mauro's Narr., 56.

1795.—"You see how many good reasons there are against your scheme of my taking horse instantly, and hastening to throw myself at the lady's feet; as to the other, of proxy, I can only agree to it under certain conditions. . . . I am not to be forced to sit up, and receive male or female visitors. I am not to be obliged to deliver my opinion on patterns for capes or petticoats for any lady. — T. Muir to his Sister, in Life, i. 109.

1810. — “Among the several justly exploded ceremonies we may reckon that of ‘Sitting up.’ This ‘Sitting up,’ as it was termed, generally took place at the house of some lady of rank or fortune, who, for three successive nights, threw open her mansion for the purpose of receiving all who chose to pay their respects to such ladies as might have recently arrived in the country.” — William-son, V.M. i. 113.

SITTINGY, s. Hind. from Ar. šatranj, šatrañj, and that from Pers. šatranj, ‘chess,’ which is again of Skt. origin, chaturanga, ‘quadripartite’ (see SADRAS). A carpet of coloured cotton, now usually made in stripes, but no doubt originally, as the name implies, in chequers.

1648. — “... Een andere soorte van alechte Tapijtten die mē noemt Chitrangaa.” — Van Twast, 68.

1673. — “They pull off their Slipper, and after the usual Salama, seat themselves in Ghoultries, open to some Tank of purifying Water; commonly spread with Carpets or Sittingeess.” — Fryer, 93.

[1688. — “2 sittingeess.” — In Yule, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 1161.] 1785.—“To be sold by public auction ... the valuable effects of Warren Hastings, Esquire ... carpets and sittingeess.” — In Seton-Karr, i. 111.

SIWALIK, n.p. This is the name now applied distinctively to that outer range of tertiary hills which in various parts of the Himalaya runs parallel to the foot of the mountain region, separated from it by valleys known in Upper India as düns (see DEHOM). But this special and convenient sense (d) has been attributed to the term by modern Anglo-Indian geographers only. Among the older Mahommedan historians the term Siwalik is applied to a territory to the west of and perhaps embracing the Aravalli Hills, but certainly including specifically Nagore (Nágaur) and Mandawar the predecessor of modern Jodhpur, and in the vicinity of that city. This application is denoted by (a).

In one or two passages we find the application of the name (Siwalik) extending a good deal further south, as if reaching to the vicinity of Málwa. Such instances we have grouped under (b). But it is possible that the early application (a) habitually extended thus far.

At a later date the name is applied to the Himalaya; either to the range in its whole extent, as in the passages from Chereffeddin (Shariffuddin ‘Ali of Yezd) and from Baber; sometimes with a possible limitation to that part of the mountains which overlooks the Punjab; or, as the quotation from Rennell indicates, with a distinction between the less lofty region nearest the plains, and the Alpine summits beyond, Siwalik applying to the former only.

The true Indian form of the name is, we doubt not, to be gathered from the occurrence, in a list of Indian national names, in the Vishnu Purāna, of the Saivālas. But of the position of these we can only say that the nations, with whom the context immediately associates them, seem to lie towards the western part of Upper India. (See Wilson’s Works, Vishnu Purāna, ii. 175.) The popular derivation of Siwalik as given in several of the quotations below, is from savalkh, ‘One lakh and a quarter’; but this is of no more value than most popular etymologies.

We give numerous quotations to establish the old application of the term, because this has been somewhat confused in Elliot’s extracts by the interpolated phrase ‘Siwalik Hills,’ where it is evident from Raverty’s version of the Tabakdī-i-Nādirī that there is no such word as Hills in the original.

We have said that the special application of the term to the detached sub-Himalayan range is quite modern. It seems in fact due to that very eminent investigator in many branches of natural science, Dr. Hugh Falconer; at least we can find no trace of it before the use of the term by him in papers presented to the Asiatic Society of Bengal. It is not previously used, so far as we can discover, even by Royle; nor is it known to Jacquemont, who was intimately associated with Royle and Cautley, at Sahāranpur, very shortly before Falconer’s arrival there. Jacquemont (Journal, ii. 11) calls the range: ‘la première chaine de montagnes que j’appellerai les montagnes de Dekhā.’ The first occurrence that we can find in a paper by Falconer on the ‘Aptitude of the Himalayan Range for the Culture of the 'Tea Plant,' in vol. iii. of the J. As. Soc. Bengal, which we quote below. A year later, in the account of the Siwalik formation, by Falconer and Cautley, in the As. Researches, we have a fuller explanation of the use of the term Siwalik, and its alleged etymology.

It is probable that there may have been some real legendary connection of the hills in the vicinity with the name of Siva. For in some of the old maps, such as that in Bernier’s Travels, we find Siva given as the name of a province about Hurdwar; and the same name occurs in the same connection in the Mem. of the Emperor Jahangir (Elliot, vi. 382). [On the connection of Siva worship with the lower Himalaya, see Atkinson, Himalayan Gazetteer, ii. 743.]

1118.—“Again he rebelled, and founded the fortress of Nágawr, in the territory of Siwalik, in the neighbourhood of Bhráh(l)”.—Tašabdi-i-Násir, E.T. by Raverty, 110.

1192.—“The seat of government, Ajnár, with the whole of the Siwalik (territory), such as (i) Hánisí, Sursutti, and other tracts, were subdued.”—Ibid. 468-469.

1227.—“A year subsequent to this, in 624 H., he (Sultan Ilyas-timin) marched against the fort of Mandawar within the limits of the Siwalik [territory], and its capture, likewise the Almighty God facilitated for him.”—Ibid. 611.

c. 1247.—“... When the Sultan of Islam, Násir-ud Dún,’ wa-ud-Din, ascended the throne of sovereignty after Malik Balban had come [to Court], he, on several occasions made a request for Uchchah together with Multan. This was acquiesced in, under the understanding that the Siwalik [territory] and Nágawr should be relinquished by him to other Malikas ...”—Ibid. 781.

1253.—“When the new year came round, on Tuesday, the 1st of the month of Muharram, 651 H., command was given to Ulugh Khán-i-’A’gam ... to proceed to his fiefs, the territory of Siwalik and Hánisí.”—Ibid. 693.

1257.—“Malik Balban ... withdrew (from Dehli), and by way of the Siwalik [country], and with a slight retinue, less than 200 or 300 in number, returned to Uchchah again.”—Ibid. 786.

1255.—“When the royal tent was pitched at Talh-pat, the [contingent] forces of the Siwalik [districts], which were the fiefs of Ulugh Khán-i-’A’gam, had been delayed ... (he) set out for Hánisí ... (and there) issued his mandate, so that, in the space of 14 days, the troops of the Siwalik, 1528.—"The northern range of hills has been mentioned . . . after leaving Kashmir, these hills contain innumerable tribes and states, pargannahs and countries, and extend all the way to Bengal and the shores of the Great Ocean. . . . The chief trade of the inhabitants of these hills is in musk, beeswax, saffron, safflower, lead, and copper. The natives of Hind call these hills Sewālik-Parbat. In the language of Hind Sewālik means a lak and a quarter (or 125,000), and Parbat means a hill, that is, the 125,000 hills. On these hills the snow never melts, and from mme these hills below Nindūna as far as the Sewālik.-Tārikh-Khān Jahān Lodī, in Elliot, iv. 107-8. Nindūna was on Bālnāth, a hill over the Jelam (Siwalik).—Babar, p. 313.

1545.—"Shēr Shāh's dying regrets.

"On being remonstrated with for giving way to low spirits, when he had done so much for the good of the people during his short reign, after earnest solicitation, he said, 'I have had three or four desires on my heart, which still remain without accomplishment. . . . One is, I wished to have depopulated the country of Roh, and to have inhabited it by the people of the tract between the Nilāb and Lahore, including the hills below Nindūna as far as the Sewālik.'_—Tārikh-i-Dāddā, in Elliot, iv. 493-4.

1547-8.—"After their defeat the Nāsīs took refuge with the Ghakkars, in the hill-country bordering on Kashmir. Islām Shāh . . . during the space of two years was engaged in constant conflicts with the Ghakkars, whom he desired to subdue. . . . Skirting the hills he went thence to Mārin (I.), and all the Rājās of the Sewālik presented themselves. . . . Parwarān, the Rājā of Gwāilor, became a staetman of the Rājā of Sewālik, he was a hill, which is on the right hand side the hill towards the north, amongst the hills, as you go to Kāngra and Nagarkot." (See NUGGUGH-OCOTE).—Tārikh-i-Dāddā, in Elliot, iv. 493-4.

1555.—"The Imperial forces encountered the Afghans near the Sewālik mountains, and gained a victory which elicited gracious marks of approval from the Emperor. Sikandar took refuge in the mountains and jungles. . . . Rājā Rām Chand, Rājā of Nagarkot, was the most renowned of all the Rājās of the hills, and he came and made his submission. —Tābakhti-i-Akbar, in Elliot, v. 248.

1560.—"The Emperor (Akbar) then marched onwards towards the Sewālik hills, in pursuit of the Khān-Khānān. He reached the neighbourhood of Tailwār, a district in the Sewālik, belonging to Rājā Girdār Chand. . . . A party of adventurous soldiers dashed forward into the hills, and surrounding the place put many of the defenders to the sword."—Ibid, 267.

1570.—"Husain Khān . . . set forth from Lucknow with the design of destroying down the idols, and demolishing the idol temples. For false reports of their unbounded treasures had come to his ears. He proceeded through Oudh, towards the Sewālik hills. . . . He then ravaged the whole country, as far as the Kudhāh of Wajrāl, in the country of Rājā Ranksa, a powerful zamīndār, and from that town to Ajmīr which is his capital."—Bādānī, in Elliot, iv. 497.

1594-5.—"The force marched to the Sewālik hills, and the Bakhshī resolved to begin by attacking Jamāli, one of the strongest forts of that country."—Akbār Nāma, in Elliot, v. 125.

". . . returned to Kanauj . . . after that he marched into the Sewālik hills, and made all the zamīndāris tributary. The Rājā of Kamān. . . . came out against Rām Deo and gave him battle."—Firuzkhā's Introduction, in Elliot, vi. 561.

1739.—"Mr. Daniel, with a party, also visited Sirinagar the same year [1789]: . . . It is situated in an exceedingly deep and very narrow valley; formed by Mount Sewālik, the northern boundary of Hindostan, on the one side; and the vast range of snowy mountains of Himālāh or Imāus, on the other; and from the report of the natives, it would appear, that the nearest part of the base of the latter (on which snow was actually falling in the month of May), was not more than 14 or 15 G. miles in direct distance to the N. or N.E. of Sirinagar town.

"In crossing the mountains of Sewālik, they met with vegetable productions, proper to the temperate climates."—Rennell's Mem., ed. 1793, pp. [368-369].

1834.—"On the flank of the great range there is a line of low hills, the Sewālik, which commence at Roopur, on the Satīej, and run down a low way to the south, skirting the great chain. In some places they run up to, and rise upon, the Himalayas; in others, as in this neighbourhood (Saharanpur), they are separated by an intermediate valley. Between the Jumna and Ganges they attain their greatest height, which Capt. Herbert estimates at 2,000 feet above the plains at their foot, or 3,000 above the sea. Saharanpur is about 1,000 feet above the sea. About 25 miles north are the Sewālik hills."—Falconer, in J.A.S.B. iii. 182.

1835.—"We have named the fossil Sivatherium from Siva the Hindu god, and Θυπλος, bellua. The Sivālik, or Sub-Himalayan range of hills, is considered, in the Hindu mythology, as the Lāt in or edge of the roof of Siva's dwelling on the Himalayas, and hence they are called the Sivālika or Sītalā, which by an easy transition of sound became the Sewālik of the English.

"The fossil has been discovered in a tract which may be included in the Sewālik range, and we have given the name of Siva-therium to it, to commemorate the remarkable formation, so rich in new animals. Another derivation of the name of the hills, as explained by the Mahars, or High Priest at Dehra, is as follows:—

"Seewalik, a corruption of Siva-vadu, a name given to the tract of mountains between the Jumna and Gangetic, from having been the residence of Iswara Siva and his son Ganesh."—Falconer and Hauley, in As. Res., xix. p. 2.

1879.—"Those ranging fringes of the later formations are known generally as the Sub-Himalayas. The most important being the Siwalik hills, a term especially applied to the hills south of the Deyra Dina, but frequently employed in a wider sense."—Medlicott and Blanford, Man. of the Geology of India, Intro. p. x.

[1890. — Even so late as this year the old inaccurate etymology of the word appears:

"The term Seewalik is stated by one of the native historians to be a combination of two Hindoo words 'swa' and 'lai' (sic), the word 'swa' signifying one and a quarter, and the word 'lai' being the term which expresses the number of one hundred thousand."—Thornhill, Haunts and Haubiis, 213.]

SLAVE. We cannot now attempt a history of the former tenure of slaves in British India, which would be a considerable work in itself. We only gather a few quotations illustrating that history.

1876.—"Of three Thieves, two were executed and one made a Slave. We do not approve of putting any to death for theft, nor that any of our own nation should be made a Slave, a word that becomes not an Englishman's mouth."—The Court to Ft. St. Geo., March 7. In Notes and Exts. No. i. p. 18.

1882.—"... making also proclamation by beat of drum that if any Slave would run away from us he should be free, and liberty to go where they pleased."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 88].

[... "There being a great number of Slaves yearly exported from this place, to ye great grievance of many persons whose Children at Dehra, is as commonly stolen away from them, by those who are constant traders in this way, the Agent, &c., considering the Scandal that might accrue to ye Government, &c., the great losse that many parents may undergo by such actions, have order'd that noe more Slaves be sent off the shores again."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 70.]

1752.—"Sale of Slaves ... Rs. 10 : 1 : 3."—Among Items of Revenue. In Long, 34.

1837.—"We have taken into consideration the most effectual and speedy method for supplying our settlements upon the West Coast with slaves, and we have therefore fixed upon two ships for that purpose ... to proceed from hence to Madagascar to purchase as many as can be procured, and the said ships conveniently carry, who are to be delivered by the captains of those ships to our agents at Fort Marlborough at the rate of £15 a head."—Court's Letter of Dec. 8. In Long, 283.

1764.—"That as an inducement to the Commanders and Chief Mates to exert themselves in procuring as large a number of Slaves as the Ships can conveniently carry, and to encourage the Surgeons to take proper care of them in the passage, there is to be allowed 20 shillings for every Slave shipped at Madagascar, to be divided, viz. £5. 4d. a head to the Commander, and £5. 8d. to the Chief Mate, also for every one delivered at Fort Marlborough the Commander to be allowed the further sum of £5. 8d. and the Chief Mate 3s. The Surgeon is likewise to be allowed 10s. for each Slave landed at Fort Marlborough."—Court's Letter, Feb. 22. In Long, 366.

1778.—Mr. Busteed has given some curious extracts from the charge-sheet of the Calcutta Magistrate in this year, showing Slaves and slave-girls, of Europeans, Portuguese, and Armenians, sent to the magistrate to be punished with the rattan for running away and such offences.—Echoes of Old Calcutta, 117 seqq. [Also see extracts from newspapers, &c., in Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 71 seqq.]

1872.—"On Monday the 29th inst. will be sold by auction ... a bay Buggy Horse, a Buggy and Harness ... some cut Diamonds, a quantity of China Sugar candy ... a quantity of the best Danish Clare ... deliverable at Serampore; two Slave Girls about 6 years old; and a great variety of other articles."—India Gazette, July 27.

1785.—"Malver. Hair-dresser from Europe, proposes himself to the ladies of the settlement to dress hair daily, at two gold mohurs per month, in the latest fashion, with garnet flowers, &c. He will also instruct the slaves at a moderate price."—In Serow-Kurr, i. 119. This was surely a piece of slang. Though we hear occasionally, in the advertisements of the time, of slave boys and girls, the domestic servants were not usually of that description.

1794.—"50 Rupees Reward for Discovery. "RUN OFF about four Weeks ago from a Gentleman in Bombay, A Malay Slave called Cambing or Rambing. He stole a Silk Purse, with 45 Venetians, and some Silver Buttons. . . ."—Bombay Courier, Feb. 22.

SLING, SELING, n.p. This is the name used in the Himalayan regions for a certain mortar in the direction of China which supplies various articles of trade. Its occurrence in Trade Returns at one time caused some discussion as to its identity, but there can be no doubt that it is Si-ning (Fu) in Kan-su. The name Sling is also applied, in Ladak and the Punjab, to a stuff of goat's wool made at the place so called.

c. 1790.—"Kokenor is also called Togom博, which means blue lake. . . . The Tibetans pretend that this lake belongs to them, and that the limits of Tibet adjoin those of the towns of Shilim or Shillingh."—P. Orazio della Penna, E.T. in Markham's Tibet, 2d ed. 314.

1774.—"The natives of Kashmir, who like the Jews of Europe, or the Armenians in the Turkish Empire, scatter themselves over the Eastern kingdoms of Asia . . . have formed extensive establishments at Lhasa and all the principal towns in the country. Their agents, stationed on the coast of Coromandel, in Bengal, Benares, Nepal, and Kashmir, furnish them with the commodities of these different countries, which they dispose of in Tibet, or forward to their associates at Seling, a town on the borders of China."—Bogle's Narrative, in Markham's Tibet, 124.

1793.—". . . it is certain that the product of their looms (i.e. of Tibet and Nepal) is as inconsiderable in quantity as it is insignificant in quality. The Joos (read TOOS) or flannel procured from the former, were it really a fabric of Tibet, would perhaps be admitted as an exception to the latter part of this observation; but the fact is that it is made at a Siling, a place situated on the western borders of China."—Kirkpatrick's Acc. of Nepal (1811), p. 134.

1862.—"Siling is a 'Pushmina' (fine wool) cloth, manufactured of goat-wool, taken from Karashnihr and Urumchi, and other districts of Turkish China, in a Chinese town called Siling."—Punjab Trade Report, App. p. cxix.

1871.—"There were two Calmucks at Yarkand, who had belonged to the suite of the Chinese Amban. . . . Their own home they say is Zilm" (qu. Zilm 3) "a country and town distant 1 month's journey from either Aksoor or Khoten, and at an equal distance in point of time from Lhasa . . . Zilm possesses manufactures of carpets, horse-trappings, pen-holders, &c. . . . This account is confirmed by the fact that articles such as those described are imported occasionally into Ladak, under the name of Zilm or Zirm goods." Now if the town of Zilm is six weeks journey from either Lhasa or Aksoor, its position may be guessed at."—Shaw, Visits to High Tartary, 33.

SLOTH, a. In the usual way of transferring names which belong to other regions, this name is sometimes applied in S. India to the Lemur (Loris gracilis, Jerdon).

SNAKE-STONE, s. This is a term applied to a substance, the application of which to the part where a snake-bite has taken effect, is supposed to draw out the poison and render it innocuous. Such applications are made in various parts of the Old and New Worlds. The substances which have this reputation are usually of a porous kind, and when they have been chemically examined have proved to be made of charred bone, or the like. There is an article in the 13th vol. of the Asiatic Researches by Dr. J. Davy, entitled An Analysis of the Snake-Stone, in which the results of the examination of three different kinds, all obtained from Sir Alex. Johnstone, Chief Justice of Ceylon, is given. (1) The first kind was of round or oval form, black or brown in the middle, white towards the circumference, polished and somewhat lustrous, and pretty enough to be sometimes worn as a neck ornament; easily cut with a knife, but not scratched by the nail. When breathed on it emitted an earthy smell, and when applied to the tongue, or other moist surface, it adhered firmly. This kind proved to be of bone partially calcined. (2) We give below a quotation regarding the second kind. (3) The third was apparently a bezoar, (q.v.), rather than a snake-stone. There is another article in the As. Res. xvi. 382 seqq. by Captain J. D. Herbert, on Zehr Moherch, or Snake-Stone. Two kinds are described which were sold under the name given (Zahr muhra, where zahr is 'poison,' muhra, 'a kind of polished shell,' 'a bead,' applied to a species of bezoar). Both of these were mineral, and not of the class we are treating of.

c. 1666.—"C'est dans cette Ville de Dieu que se font les Pierres de Cobra si renommées: elles sont composées de racines qu'on brûle, et dont on amasse les cendres pour les mettre avec une sorte de terre qu'ils ont, et les brûler encore une fois avec cette terre: et après cela on en fait la pâte dont ces Pierres sont formées. . . . Il faut faire sortir avec une équille, un peu de sang de la plaise, y appliquer la Pierre, et l'y laisser jusqu'à ce qu'elle tombe d'elle même."—Thermot, v. 97.
1673.—"Here are also those Elephant Legged St. Thomas, which the unbiassed Enquirers will tell you chances to them two ways: By the Venom of a certain Snake, by which the Jaugiu (see JOSEE) or Pilgrim furnishes a Stone (which we call a snake-stone), and is a Counter-poison of all Deadly Bites; if it stick, it attracts the Poyson; and put into Milk it recovers itself again, leaving its virulence therein, discovered by its Greenness."—Fryer, 58.

1676.—"There is the Serpent's stone not to be forgot, about the bigness of a double (doubloon!); and some are almost oval, thick in the middle and thin about the sides. The Indians report that it is bred in the head of certain Serpents. But I rather take it to be a story of the Idolot's Priests, and that the Stone is rather a composition of certain Drugs. ... If the Person bit be not much wounded, the place must be incis'd; and the Stone being appli'd there, the poison shall fall off till it has drawn all the poison to it: To cleanse it you must steep it in Womans-milk, or for want of that, in Cows-milk. ... There are two ways to try whether the Serpent-stone be true or false. The first is, by putting the Stone in your mouth, for there it will give a sharp smart to the Part of the Tongue. The other is by putting it in a glass full of water; if the Stone be true, the water will fall a boiling, and rise in little bubbles .... —Taernier, E.T., Pt. ii. 155; [ed. Ball, ii. 152]. Taernier also speaks of another snake-stone alleged to be found behind the hood of the Cobra: "This Stone being rubb'd against another Stone, yields a slime, which being drank in water," &c. &c. —Ibid.

1690.—"The thing which he carried ... is a Specific against the Poison of Serpents ... and therefore obtained the name of Snake-stone. It is a small artificial Stone. ... The Composition of it is Ashes of burnt Roots, mixt with a kind of Earth, which is found at Diu. ..."—Orvington, 260-261.

1712.—"Pedra de Cobra: its dictus lapis, vocabulo a Lusitanis imposito, adversus viperae morsus praestat auxilius, externe applicatus. In serpente, quod vulgo credunt, non inventur, sed arte secretis fabricatur a Brahmanis. Pro duxtro et felici usu, oportet adesse admanum, aduersus vulnera nonnulla, suspicium, alter arrogari illico in locum posse. ... Quo ipso feror, ut istis lapidibus nihil efficaciam inesse credam, nisi quam actuali factum testatur qui vel absoluit praestant."—Kemper, Amoen. Ecst. 395-7.

1772.—"Being returned to Ruode-Zand, the much celebrated Snake-stone (Snake-stones) was shown to me, which few of the farmers here could afford to purchase, it being sold at a high price, and held in great esteem. It is imported from the Indies, especially from Malabar, and cost several, frequently 10 or 12, rix dollars. It is round, and convex on one side, of a black colour, with a pale ash-grey speck in the middle, and tubulated with very minute pores. ... When it is applied to any part which has been bitten by a serpent, it sticks fast to the wound, and extracts the poison; as soon as it is saturated, it falls off of itself. ..."—Thomson, Travels, E.T. i. 155 (A Journey into Caffraria).

1796.—"Of the remedies to which ours of venomous bites are often ascribed in India, some are certainly not less frivolous than those employed in Europe for the bite of the viper; yet to infer from thence that the effects of the poison cannot be very dangerous, would not be more rational than to ascribe the recovery of a person bitten by a Cobra de Capello, to the application of a snake-stone, or to the words muttered over the patient by a Bramin."—Patrick Russell, Account of Indian Serpents, 77.

1820.—"Another kind of snake-stone ... was a small oval body, smooth and shining, externally black, internally grey; it had no earthly smell when breathed on, and had no absorptive or adhesive power. By the person who presented it to Sir Alexander Johnstone it was much prized, and for adequate reason if true, 'it had saved the lives of four men.'"—Dr. Dary, in At. Res. xiii. 318.

1860.—"The use of the Pumoo-Kaoo, or snake-stone, as a remedy in cases of wounds by venomous serpents, has probably been communicated to the Singhalees by the itinerant snake-charmers who resort to the island from the Coast of Coromandel; and more than one well-authenticated instance of its successful application has been told to me by persons who had been eye-witnesses. ... (These follow.) "... As to the snake-stone itself, I submitted one, the application of which I have been describing, to Mr. Faraday, and he has communicated to me, as the result of his analysis, his belief that it is 'a mass of charred wood, which, perhaps several times, and then charred again.' ... The probability is, that the animal charcoal, when instantaneously applied, may be sufficiently porous and absorbent to extract the venom from the recent wound, together with a portion of the blood, before it has had time to be carried into the system ...."—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 197-200.

1861.—"'Have you been bitten?' 'Yes, Sahib,' he replied, calmly; 'the last snake was a vicious one, and it has bitten me. But there is no danger,' he added, extracting from the recesses of his mysterious bag a small piece of white stone. This he wetted, and applied to the wound, to which it seemed to adhere ... he apparently suffered no ... material hurt. I was thus effectively convinced that snake-charming is a real art, and not merely clever conjuring, as I had previously imagined. These so-called snake stones are well known throughout India."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, 91-92.

1872.—"With reference to the snake-stones, which, when applied to the bites, are said to absorb and suck out the poison,
... I have only to say that I believe they are perfectly powerless to produce any such effect ... when we reflect on the quantity of poison, and the force and depth with and to which it is injected ... and the extreme rapidity with which it is hurried along in the vascular system to the nerve centres, I think it is obvious that the application of one of these stones can be of little use in a real bite of a deadly snake, and that a belief in their efficacy is a dangerous delusion. "—Fayerer, Thanatophidia of India, pp. 38, 40.

[1880.]—"It is stated that in the pouch-like throat appendages of the older birds (adjutants), the fang of a snake is sometimes to be found. This, if rubbed above the place where a poisonous snake has bitten a man, is supposed to prevent the venom spreading to the vital parts of the body. Again, it is believed that a so-called 'snake' stone is contained within the head of the adjutant. This, if applied to a snake-bite, attaches itself to the punctures, and extracts all the venom. . . ."—Ball, Jungle Life, 82.

SNEAKER, s. A large cup (or small basin) with a saucer and cover. The native servants call it simigar. We had guessed that it was perhaps formed in some way from simi in the sense of 'china-ware,' or from the same word, used in Ar. and Pers., in the sense of 'a salver' (see CHINA, s.). But we have since seen that the word is not only in Grose's Lexicon Balatronicum, with the explanation 'a small bowl,' but is also in Todd: 'A small vessel of drink.' A sneaker of punch is a term still used in several places for a small bowl; and in fact it occurs in the Spectator and other works of the 18th century. So the word is of genuine English origin; no doubt of a semi-slang kind.

1714.—"Our little burlesque authors, who are the delight of ordinary readers, generally abound in these sort phrases, which have in them more vivacity than wit. I lately saw an instance of this kind of writing, which gave me so truly an idea of it, that I could not forbear begging a copy of the letter. . . .

"Past 2 o'clock and

'DEAR JACK,

'a frosty morning,

'I have just left the Right Worshipful and his myrmidons about a sneaker of 5 gallons. The whole magistracy was pretty well disguised before I gave them the slip.'

The Spectator, No. 616.

1715.—

'Hugh Peters is making

A sneaker within

For Luther, Buchanan, John Knox, and Calvin; And when they have tense'd off A brace of full bowls,

3 H

You'll swear you ne'er met

With honeeter souls."

1743.—"Wild . . . then retired to his seat of contemplation, a night-cellar, where, without a single farthing in his pocket, he called for a sneaker of punch, and placing himself on a bench by himself, he softly vented the following soliloquy."—Fielding, Jonathan Wild, Bk. ii. ch. iv.

1772. — "He received us with great cordiality, and entreated us all, five in number, to be seated in a bungalow, where there were only two broken chairs. This compliment we could not accept of; he then ordered five sneakers of a mixture which he denominated punch."—Letter in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 217.

[SNOW RUPEE, s. A term in use in S. India, which is an excellent example of a corruption of the 'Hobson-Jobson' type. It is an Anglo-Indian corruption of the Tel. teanaunu, 'authority, currency.]

SOFALA, n.p. Ar. Sufâla, a district and town of the East African coast, the most remote settlement towards the south made upon that coast by the Arabs. The town is in S. Lat. 20° 10', more that 2° south of the Zambesi delta. The territory was famous in old days for the gold produced in the interior, and also for iron. It was not visited by V. da Gama either in going or returning.

c. 1150. — "This section embraces the description of the remainder of the country of Sofala. . . . The inhabitants are poor, miserable, and without resources to support them except iron; of this metal there are numerous mines in the mountains of Sofala. The people of the islands . . . come hither for iron, which they carry to the continent and islands of India . . . for although there is iron in the islands and in the mines of that country, it does not equal the iron of Sofala."—Edrisi, i. 65.

c. 1220.—"Sofala is the most remote known city in the country of the Zenj . . . wares are carried to them, and left by the merchants who then go away, and coming again find that the natives have laid down the price [they are willing to give] for every article beside it. . . . Sofâlit gold is well-known among the Zenj merchants."—Yâkût, Mu'amal al-Buldan, a.v.

In his article on the gold country, Yâkût describes the kind of dumb trade in which the natives decline to come face to face with the merchants at greater length. It is a practice that has been ascribed to a great variety of uncivilised races; e.g. in various parts of Africa; in the extreme north of Europe and of Asia; in theCLOSE Islands; to the Veddas of Ceylon, to the Poliars of Malabar, and (by Pliny, surely under some mistake) to the Seres or Chinese. See on this subject a note in Marco Polo, Bk. iv. ch. 21; a note by Mr. De B. Prinsep, in J. R. As. Soc., xviii. 948 (in which several references are erroneously printed); Tenney's Ceylon, l. 593 seqq.; Rawlinson's Harrold, under Bk. iv. ch. 198.

c. 1580.—"Sofala is situated in the country of the Zenj. According to the authority of the K作业, the inhabitants are Muelim. Ibn Sayd says that their chief means of subsistence are the extraction of gold and of iron, and that their clothes are of leopardskin."—Abufeda, Fr. Tr. i. 222.

"A merchant told me that the town of Sofala is a half month's march distant from Culina (Quiloa), and that from Sofala to Yaff (Nufi) ... is a month's march. From Yaff they bring gold-dust to Sofala."—Ibn Batuta, i. 192-3.

1499.—"Coming to Mozambique (i.e. Vasco and his squadron on their return) they did not desire to go in because there was no need, so they kept their course, and being off the coast of Sofala, the pilots warned the officers that they should be alert and ready to strike sail, and at night they should keep their course, with little sail set, and a good look-out, for just thereabouts there was a river belonging to a place called Coffala, whence there sometimes issued a tremendous squall, which tore up trees and carried cattle and all into the sea. . . ."—Correa, Lendas, i. 134-135.

1516.—"... at xvi. leagues from them there is a river, which is not very large, whereon is a town of the Moors called Sofala, close to which town the King of Portugal has a fort. These Moors establish the fact, that there was a river belonging to a place called Coffala, whence there sometimes issued a tremendous squall, which tore up trees and carried cattle and all into the sea. . . ."—Barros, 4.

1523.—"Item—that as regards all the ships and goods of the said Realm of Urmuz, and its ports and vassals, they shall be secure by land and by sea, and they shall be as free to navigate where they please as vassals of the King our lord, save only that they shall not navigate inside the Strait of Mecca, nor yet Sofala and the ports of that coast, as that is forbidden by the King our lord. . . ."—Treaty of Dom Duarte de Meneses, with the King of Ormus, in Botelho, Tombo, 80.

1558.—"Vasco da Gama . . . was afraid that there was some gulf running far inland, from which he would not be able to get out. And this apprehension made him so careful to keep well from the shore that he passed without even seeing the town of Coffala, so famous in these parts for the quantity of gold which the Moors procured there from the Blacks of the country by trade. . . ."—Barros, I. iv. 8.

1572.—"... Fizemos desta costa algum desvio Deitando para o pégo toda a armada: Porque, ventando Noto mando e frio, Não nos espanhase a agua da enseada, Que a costa faz ali daquella banda, Donde a rica Sofala o ouro manda."—Camões, v. 73.

By Burton:

"off from the coast-line for a spell we stood, till deep blue water 'neath our keelsons lay; for frigid Notus, in his fainty mood, was fain to drive us leeward to the Bay made in that quarter by the crooked shore, whence rich Sofala sendeth golden ore."

1665.—"Mombasa and Quiloa and Melind, And Sofala, thought Ophir, to the realm Of Congo, and Angola farthest south."—Paradise Lost, xi. 399 seqq.

Milton, it may be noticed, misplaced the accent, reading Sofala.

1727.—"Between Delagoa and Mizambiqu is a dangerous Sea-coast, it was formerly known by the names of Buffa and Gama, but now by the Portuguese, who knew that country best, is called Sena."—A. Hamilton, i. 8 (ed. 1744).

SOLA, vulg. SOLAR, s. This is properly Hind. shold, corrupted by the Bengali inability to utter the shibboleth, to sold, and often again into solar by English people, led astray by the usual "striving after meaning." Shold is the name of the plant Aeschynomene aspera, L. (N.O. Leguminozae), and is particularly applied to the light pith of that plant, from which the light thick Sola toppes, or pith hats, are made. The material is also used to pad the roofs of palankins, as a protection against the sun's power, and for various minor purposes, e.g. for slips of tinder, for making models, &c. The word, until its wide diffusion within the last 45 years, was peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In the Deccan the thing is called bhend, Mahr. bhenda, and in Tamil, neiti, ["breaking with a crackle." Solar hats are now often advertised in London. [Hats made of elder pith were used in S. Europe in the early 16th century. In Albert Dürer's Diary in the Netherlands (1520-21) we find: "Also Tomas in has given me a plaited hat of elder-pith." (Mrs. Heaton, Life of Albrecht Dürer, 289). Miss Eden, in 1839, speaks of Europeans wearing "broad white feather hats to keep off the sun" (Up the Country, ii. 56).
Illustrations of the various shapes of Sola hats used in Bengal about 1854 will be found in Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 186 seq.

1836.—"I stopped at a fisherman's, to look at the curiously-shaped floats he used for his very large and heavy fishing-nets; each float was formed of eight pieces of sholls, tied together by the ends. . . . When the light and spongy pith is wetted it can be cut into thin layers, which pasted together are formed into hats; Chinese paper appears to be made of the same material."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 100.

1872.—"In a moment the flint gave out a spark of fire, which fell into the soló; the sulphur match was applied; and an earthen lamp. . . ."—Govinda Samanta, i. 10.

1878.—"My solar toepee (pith hat) was whisked away during the struggle."—Life in the Moghul, i. 164.

1885.—"I have slipped a pair of galoshes over my ordinary walking-boots; and, with my solar toepee (or sun helmet) on, have ridden through a mile of deserted streets and thronged bazaars, in a grilling sunshine."—A Professional Visit in Persia, St. James's Gazette, March 9.

[SOMBA, SOMBAY. s. A present. Malay sombahan.

(1814.—"Sombay or presents."—Foster, Letters, ii. 112.

(1815.—". . . concluded rather than pay the great Somba of eight hundred reals."—Ibíd. iv. 43.)

SOMBREIRO, s. Port. sombreiro. In England we now understand by this word a broad-brimmed hat; but in older writers it is used for an umbrella. Summerhead is a name in the Bombay Arsenal (as M.-Gen. Keatinge tells me) for a great umbrella. I make no doubt that it is a corruption (by 'striving after meaning') of Sombreiro, and it is a capital example of Hobson-Jobson.

1563.—"And the next day the Captain-Major before daylight embarked armed with all his people in the boats, and the King (of Cochín) in his boats which they call tones (see DONEY) . . . and in the tone of the King went his Sombreiros, which are made of straw, of a diameter of 4 palms, mounted on very long canes, some 3 or 4 fathoms in height. These are used for state ceremonial, showing that the King is there in person, as it were his pennon or royal banner, for no other lord in his realm may carry the like."—Correa, i. 378.

1516.—"And besides the page I speak of who carries the sword, they take another page who carries a sombreiro with a stand to shade his master, and keep the rain off him; and some of these are of silk stuff finely wrought, with many fringes of gold, and set with stones and seed pearl. . . ."—Barboez, Lisbon ed. 296.

1553.—"At this time Dom Jorge discerned a great body of men coming towards where he was standing, and amid them a sombreiro on a lofty staff, covering the head of a man on horseback, by which token he knew it to be some noble person. This sombreiro is a fashion in India coming from China, and among the Chinese no one may use it but a gentleman, for it is a token of nobility, which we may describe as a one-handed pallium (having regard to those which we use to see carried by four, at the reception of some great King or Prince on his entrance into a city) . . . —Barros, III. x. 9. Then follows a minute description of the sombreiro or umbrella.

(1599.—". . . a great broad sombreiro or shadow in their hands to defend them in the Summer from the Sunne, and in the Winter from the Raine."—Hakl. ii. i. 261 (Staf. Dict.).

(1602.—In his character of D. Pedro Mascarenhas, the Viceroy, Couto says he was anxious to change certain habits of the Portuguese in India: "One of these was to forbid the tall sombreiros for warding off the rain and sun, to relieve men of the expense of paying those who carried them; he himself did not have one, but used a woollen umbrella with small cords (f), which they called for many years Mascarenhas. Afterwards finding the sun intolerable and the rain immoderate, he permitted the use of tall umbrellas, on the condition that private slaves should bear them, to save the wages of the Hindus who carry them, and are called boys de sombreiro (BOY).

—Couto, Dec. VII. Bk. i. ch. 12.) (1630.—"Betwixt towns men usually travel in Chariots drawn by Oxen, but in Towns upon Palamkeens, and with Sombreiros de Sol over them."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 46.

1657.—"A costé du cheval il y a un homme qui s'entête Wistnow, afin qu'il ne recevoit point d'incommodité soit par les mouches, ou par la chaleur; et à chaque costé on porte deux Zombreiros, afin que le Soleil ne les laisse pas sur luy."—Abr. Roger, Fr. Tr. ed. 1670, p. 228.

1673.—"None but the Emperor have a Sombreiro among the Moguls."—Fryer, 36.

1727.—"The Portuguese ladies . . . sent to beg the Favour that he would pick them out some lusty Dutch men to carry their Palenqueens and Somereras or Umbrellas."—A. Hamilton, i. 338; [ed. 1744, i. 340].

1768-71.—"Close behind it, followed the heir-apparent, on foot, under a sombreal, or sunshade, of state."—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 87.

(1846.—"No open umbrellas or summerheads allowed to pass through the gates."—Public Notice on Gates of Bombay Town, in Douglas, Glimpses of Old Bombay, 56.)
SOMBRERO, CHANNEL OF

SOMBRERO, CHANNEL OF
THE, n.p. The channel between the northern part of the Nicobar group, and the southern part embracing the Great and Little Nicobar, has had this name since the early Portuguese days. The origin of the name is given by A. Hamilton below. The indications in C. Federici and Hamilton are probably not accurate. They do not agree with those given by Horsburgh.

1566.—"Si passa per il canale di Nicobar, ouero per quello del Sombrero, li quali son per mezzo l'isola di Sumatra..."—C. Federici, in Rambusio, iii. 391.

1727.—"The Islands off this Part of the Coast are the Nicobars... The northernmost Cluster is low, and are called the Carnicubas... The middle Cluster is fine champain Ground, and all but one, well inhabited. They are called the Somere Islands, because on the South End of the largest Island, is an Hill that resembleth the top of an Umbrella or Someresa."—A. Hamilton, ii. 68 [ed. 1744].

1843.—"Sombrero Channel, bounded on the north by the Islands of Katchull and Noncouwy, and by Morve or Passage Island on the South side, is very safe and about seven leagues wide."—Horsburgh, ed. 1843, ii. 59-60.

SONAPARANTA, n.p. This is a quasi-classical name, of Indian origin, used by the Burmese Court in State documents and formal enumerations of the style of the King, to indicate the central part of his dominions; Skt. Suvarna (Pali Son) pránta (or perhaps aparánta), 'golden frontier-land,' or something like that. There can be little doubt that it is a survival of the names which gave origin to the Chrysea of the Greeks. And it is notable, that the same series of titles embraces Tambarida ('Copper Island' or Region) which is also represented by the Chalciots of Ptolemy. [Also see J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 103.]

(Ancient).—"There were two brothers resident in the country called Sunaparanta, merchants who went to trade with 500 wagons..."—Legends of Gotama Buddha, in Hardy's Manual of Buddhism, 269.

1636.—"All comprised within the great districts of Tha-Koo, TsaIan, Legyain, Phuang-Ior, Lyid, and Thamung-thot is constituted the Kingdom of Thuna-paranta. All within the great districts of Pagun, Ava, Pinya, and Myen-Zain, is constituted the Kingdom of Tampa-paranta..." (etc.)—From an Inscription at the Great Pagoda of Khung-Mhoo-dau, near Ava; from the MS. Journal of Major H. Burney, accompanying a Letter from him, dated 11th September, 1830, in the Foreign Office, Calcutta. Burney adds: "The Ministers told me that by Thunaparanta they mean all the countries to the northward of Ava, and by Tampa-dowa all to the southward. But this inscription shows that the Ministers themselves do not exactly understand what countries are comprised in Thunaparanta and Tampa-dowa."

1787.—"The King despotick; of great Merit, of great Power, Lord of the Countries Thomasprandah, Tompevah, and Gambola, Sovereign of the Kingdom of Burugmhae (Burm), the Kingdom of Siam and Hughen (!), and the Kingdom of Cassay."—Letter from the King of Burma, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 106.

1795.—"The Lord of Earth and Air, the Monarch of extensive Countries, the Sovereign of the Kingdoms of Sonahparinadi, Tombadava... etc..."—Letter from the King to Sir John Shore, in Smyth, 487.

1855.—"His great, glorious and most excellent Majesty, who reigns over the Kingdoms of Thunaparanta, Tampadeva, and all the great umbrella-wearing chiefs of the Eastern countries, the King of the Rising Sun, Lord of the Celestial Elephants, and Master of many white Elephants, and (great Chief of Righteousness..."—King's Letter to the Governor-General (Lord Dalhousie), Oct. 2, 1855.

SONTHALS, n.p. Properly Santals, [the name being said to come from a place called Saont, now Silda in Medinipur, where the tribe remained for a long time (Dalton, Deor. Eth. 210-11)]. The name of a non-Aryan people belonging to the Kolarian class, extensively settled in the hilly country to the west of the Hoogly R. and to the south of Bhagalpur, from which they extended to Balasore at interval, sometimes in considerable masses, but more generally much scattered. The territory in which they are chiefly settled is now formed into a separate district called Santal Parganas, and sometimes Santals. Their settlement in this tract is, however, quite modern; they have emigrated thither from the S.W. In Dr. F. Buchanan's statistical account of Bhagalpur and its Hill people the Santals are not mentioned. The earliest mention of this tribe that we have found is in Mr. Sutherland's Report on the Hill People, which is printed in the Appendix to Long. No date is given there, but we learn from Mr. Man's book, quoted below, that the date is 1817. The word is, however, much older than this. Forbes (Or. Mem. ii. 374 seq.) gives an account taken from Lord Teignmouth of witch tests among the Soountar.

[1798.—"... amongst a wild and unlettered tribe, denominated Soountar, who have reduced the detection and trial of persons suspected of witchcraft to a system."—As. Res. iv. 359.]

1817.—"For several years many of the industrious tribes called Sonthurs have established themselves in these forests, and have been clearing and bringing into cultivation large tracts of lands. . . ."—Sutherland's Report, quoted in Long, 569.

1887.—"This system, indicated and proposed by Mr. Eden,* was carried out in its integrity under Mr. George Yule, C.B., by whose able management, with Messrs. Robinson and Wood as his deputies, the Sonthals were raised from misery, dull despair, and deadly hatred of the government, to a pitch of prosperity which, to my knowledge, has never been equalled in any other part of India under the British rule. The Regulation Courts, with their horde of leeches in the shape of badly paid, and corrupt Amlah (Omlah) and pettifogging Mooktars, were abolished, and in their place a Number of active English gentlemen, termed Assistant Commissioners, and nominated by Mr. Yule, were set down among the Sonthals, with a Code of Regulations drawn up by that gentleman, the pith of which may be summed up as follows:—

"To have no medium between the Sonthal and the Hakim, i.e. Assistant Commissioner.

"To patiently hear any complaint made by the Sonthal from his own mouth, without any written petition or charge whatever, and without any Amlah or Court at the time.

"To carry out all criminal work by the aid of the villagers themselves, who were to bring in the accused, with the witnesses, to the Hakim, who should immediately attend to their statements, and punish them, if found guilty, according to the tenor of the law."

"These were some of the most important of the golden rules carried out by men who recognised the responsibility of their situation; and with an adored chief, in the shape of Yule, for their ruler, whose firm, judicious, and gentlemanly conduct made them work with willing hearts, their endeavours were crowned with a success which far exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine. . . ."—Sonthalia and the Sonthals, by R. G. Man, Barrister-at-Law, &c. Calcutta, 1887, pp. 125-127.

SOODRA, SOOJER, s. Skt. sūdra, [usually derived from root sūc, 'to be afflicted,' but probably of non-Aryan origin]. The (theoretical) Fourth Caste of the Hindus. In South India, there being no claimants of the 2nd or 3rd classes, the highest castes among the (so-called) Sūdras come next after the Brahmans in social rank, and sūdra is a note of respect, not of the contrary as in Northern India.

1630.—"The third Tribe or Cast, called the Shudderries."—Lord, Display, &c., ch. xii.

1651.—"La quatrième ligne est celle des Soudras; elle est composée du commun peuple: cette ligne a sous soy beaucoup et diverses familles, dont une chacune prétend surpasser l'autre. . . ."—Abr. Roiger, Fr. ed. 1670, p. 8.

[c. 1665. — "The fourth caste is called Charadors or Soudra."—Tawerner, ed. Ball, ii. 194.

1867.—"... and fourthly, the tribe of Soudra, or artisans and labourers."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 325.

1874.—"The . . . Chudrer (these are the Nayaros)."—Faria y Souza, ii. 710.

1717.—"The Brahmans and the Tsuddhrers are the proper persons to satisfy your Enquiries."—Phillips, An Account of the Religion, &c., 14.

1858.—"Such of the Aborigines as yet remained were formed into a fourth class, the Cudra, a class which has no rights, but only duties."—Whitney, Or. and Ling. Studies, ii. 6.

1867.—"A Brahman does not stand aloof from a Soudra with a keener pride than a Greek Christian shows towards a Copt."—Dixon, New America, 7th ed. i. 276.

SOOJEE, SOOJA, s. Hind. sūji, [which comes probably from Skt. sūc, 'pure'; a word curiously misinterpreted ('the coarser part of pounded wheat') by the usually accurate Shakespeare. It is, in fact, the fine flour, made from the heart of the wheat, used in India to make bread for European tables. It is prepared by grinding between two millstones which are not in close contact. [Sūj] is a granular meal obtained by moistening the grain overnight, then grinding it. The fine flour passes through a coarse sieve, leaving the Sūji and bran above. The latter is got rid of by winnowing, and the round, granular meal or Sūji, composed of the harder pieces of the grain, remains" (Watt. Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 167).] It is the semolina of Italy. Bread made from this was called in Low Latin simella; Germ. Semmelbrüdchen, and old English simmel-cakes. A kind of porridge made with soojes SOORKY. a. Pounded brick used to mix with lime to form a hydraulic mortar. Hind. from Pers. surkhā, ‘red-stuff.’

c. 1770.—“The terrace roofs and floors of the rooms are laid with fine pulverized stones, which they call surkhe; these are mixed up with lime-water, and an inferior kind of molasses, and in a short time grow as hard and as smooth, as if the whole were one large stone.”—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 514.

1777.—“The inquiry verified the information. We found a large group of miserable objects confined by order of Mr. Mills; some were simply so; some under sentence from him to beat Balkhey.”—Report of Impex and others, quoted in Stephen’s Nuncornar and Impex, ii. 201.

1784.—“One lack of 9-inch bricks, and about 1400 maunds of soorky.”—Notifs. in Seton-Karr, i. 34; see also ii. 15.

1811.—“The road from Calcutta to Barapore...like all the Bengal roads it is paved with bricks, with a layer of sulky, or broken bricks over them.”—Solyna, Les Hindou, iii. The word is misspelled as well as misswritten. The substance in question is khoa (q.v.).

SOORMA. a. Hind. from Pers. surma. Sulphuret of antimony, used for the purpose of darkening the eyes, kubl of the Arabs, the stimus and stibium of the ancients. With this Jezebel “painted her eyes” (2 Kings, ix. 30; Jeremiah, iv. 30 R.V.) “With it, I believe, is often confounded the sulphuret of lead, which in N. India is called soorme (es is the feminine termination in Hindust.), and used as a substitute for the former: a mistake not of recent occurrence only, as Sprengel says, ‘Distinguit vero Plinius maren a feminâ’” (Royle, on Ant. of Hindu Medicine, 100). [See Watt’s Econ. Dict. i. 271.]

[1822.—“Soorna, or the oxide of antimony, is found on the western frontier.”—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 13.

1832.—“Sulmab—A prepared permanent black dye, from antimony...”—Mrs. Meer Hossan Ali, Observations, ii. 72.]

SOOSIE. a. Hind. from Pers. sīrī, Some kind of silk cloth, but we know not what kind. [Sir G. Birdwood (Industr. Arts, 246) defines sīsī as “fine-coloured clothes, made chiefly at Battala and Sialkote, striped in the direction of the warp with silk, or cotton lines of a different colour, the cloth being called dokkānī [dohkhānī], ‘in two stripes’ if the stripe has two lines, if three, tinkānī [tunkhānī], and so on.” In the Punjab it is a striped stuff used for women’s trousers. This is made of fine thread, and is one of the fabrics in which English thread is now largely used’ (Francis, Mon. on Cotton Manufactures, 7). A silk fabric of the same name is made in the N.W.P., where it is classed as a variety of chakhānī, or check (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 93). Forbes Watson (Textile Manufactures, 85) speaks of soossas as chiefly employed for trousering, being a mixture of cotton and silk. The word seems to derive its origin from Sussa, the Biblical Shushan, the capital of Susiana or Elam, and from the time of Darius I. the chief residence of the Achaemenian kings. There is ample evidence to show that fabrics from Babylon were largely exported in early times. Such was perhaps the “Babylonish garment” found at Ai (Josh. vii. 21), which the R.V. marg. translates as a “mantle of Shinar”). This a writer in Smith’s Dict. of the Bible calls “robes trimmed with valuable furs, or the skins themselves ornamented with embroidery” (i. 452). These Babylonian fabrics have been often described (see Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, 537; Maspero, Dawn of Civ., 470, 758; Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1926 seq.; Fraser, Pashamia, iii. 545 seq.). An early reference to this old trade in costly cloths will be found in the quotation from the Periplus under CHINA, which has been discussed by Sir H. Yule (Introduct. to Gill, River of Golden Sand, ed. 1883, p. 88 seq.). This Sās cloth appears in a log of 1746 as Soacla, and was known to the Portuguese in 1550 as Sojjes (J. R. As. Soc. Jan. 1900, p. 158.).]
SOPHY, n.p. The name by which the King of Persia was long known in Europe—"The Sophy," as the Sultan of Turkey was "The Turk" or "Grand Turk," and the King of Delhi the "Great Mogul." This title represented Safi, Safavi, or Safi, the name of the dynasty which reigned over Persia for more than two centuries (1449-1723, nominally to 1736). The first king of the family was Isma'il, claiming descent from 'Ali and the name indeed is assumed by Isma'il the most famous of the dynasty was Shah Abbas (1585-1629).

c. 1524.—"Susiana, quae est Shushan Palatium illud regni Sophli."—Abraham Perissol, in Hyde, Synagoga Disertri, i. 76.

"Quae regiones nomine Persiae et regnatur quem Turcian Chosiba, nos Sophli vocamus."—Busby, Epist. iii. (171).

1661.—"The Queenes Maiesties Letters to the great Sophy of Persia, sent by M. Anthonie Jenkinson."

"Elizabitha Dei gratia Angliae Franciae et Hiberniae Regina, &c. Potestissimo et inuictissimo Principi, Magno Sophli Persasum, Medorum, Hiraneorum, Caaranorum, Margianorum, popolarum cie et vitra Tygrim fluimium, et omnium intra Mare Caspium et Persicum Sinum nationum atque Gentium Imperatoris salutem et rerum prosperarum foecissimas incrementum."—In Hakl. i. 381.

[1668.—"The King of Persia (whom here we call the great Sophy) is not there so called, but is called the Shaugh. It were dangerous to call him by the name of Sophy, because that Sophy in the Persian tongue is a beggar, and it were as much as to call him the great beggar."—Jeffrey Ducket, ibid. i. 447.]

1598.—"And all the Kings continued so with the name of Xa, which in Persia is a King, and Ismael is a proper name, whereby Xa Ismael, and Xa Thomas are as much as to say King Ismael, and King Thomas, and of the Turkes and Rumes are called Suffy or Sophy, which signifies a great Captain."—Limachotus, ch. xxvii; [Hak. Soc. i. 173].

1601.—"Sir Toby. Why, man, he's a very devil: I have not seen such a figure . . . They say, he has been fencer to the Sophy."—Twelfth Night, III. iv.

[1610.—"This King or Sophy, who is called the Great Chaa."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 263.]

1626.—"Were it to bring the Great Turk bound in chains Through France in triumph, or to couple up The Sophy and great Prester-John together; I would attempt it."

c. 1630.—"Ismail at his Coronation proclaimed himself King of Persia by the name of Pot-shaw (Padahaw)-Ismael-Sophy. Whence that word Sophy was borrowed is much controverted. Whether it be from the Armenian idiom, signifying Wool], of which the Shahees are made that ennobled his new order. Whether the name was from Sophy his grandsire, or from the Greek word Sophos imposed upon Aydar at his conquest of Trebizond by the Greeks there, I know not. Since then, many have called the Kings of Persia Sophy's: but I see no reason for it; since Ismael's son, grand and great grandsons Kings of Persia never continued that name, till this that now reigns, whose name indeed is Soffe, but casual."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, 286.

1665.—"As when the Tartar from his Russian foe, By Astracon, over the snowy plains Retires; or Bactrian Sophy, from the horns Of Turkish crescent, leaves all waste beyond The realm of Aladule, in his retreat To Tauris or Cazbeen. . . ."

Paradise Lost, x. 431 seqq.

SOUBA, SOOBAB, s. Hind. from Pers. sabā. A large Division or Province of the Mogul Empire (e.g. the Sūbah of the Deccan, the Sābāh of Bengal). The word is also frequently used as short for Sūbadār (see SOUBADAR), 'the Viceroy' (over a sabā). It is also "among the Marathas sometimes applied to a smaller division comprising from 5 to 8 tarafā (Wilson).

1594. — "In the fortieth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 106 Sīcoras... The empire was then parcelled into 12 grand divisions, and each was committed to the government of a Sūbadār... upon which occasion the Sovereign of the world distributed 12 Lack's of beetle. The names of the Sūbahs were Allahabad, Agra, Owdb, Ajmer, Ahmedabad, Bahar, Bengal, Deby, Kabul, Lahoor, Multan, and Malwa: when his majesty conquered Berar, Khandees, and Ahmednagur, they were formed into three Sūbahs, increasing the number to 15." — Ayen, ed. Gladwin, ii. 1-5; ed. Jarrett, ii. 115.

1758. — "Princes of this rank are called Subahs. Nizam al muttek was Subah of the Deccan (or Southern) provinces... The Nabobs of Condanore, Cudapah, Carnatic, Yalore, &c., the Kings of Trichinopoly, Myore, Tanjore, are subject to this Subahship. Here is a subject ruling a larger empire than any in Europe, excepting that of the Muscovite." — Orme, Fragments, 308-309.

1820. — "The Delhi Sovereigns whose vast empire was divided into Soubahs, or Governments, each of which was ruled by a Soubahdar or Viceroy." — Malcolm, Cent. India, i. 2.

SOUBADAR, SUBADAR, a Hind. from Pers. sabadar, 'one holding a sabā' (see SOUBA).

a. The Viceroy, or Governor of a sabā.

b. A local commandant or chief officer.

c. The chief native officer of a company of Sepoys; under the original constitution of such companies, its actual captain.

a. See SOUBA.

b. —

1683. — "The Sūbadar of the Town being a Person of Quality... he (the Ambassador) thought good to give him a Visit." — Fryer, 77.

1805. — "The first thing that the Subdar of Vire Rajendra Patah did, to my utter astonishment, was to come up and give me such a shake by the hand, as would have done credit to a Scotsman." — Letter in Leyden's Life, 49.

[Soudagur, s. P.—H. sauddgar, Pers. saudd, 'goods for sale'; a merchant, trader; now very often applied to those who sell European goods in civil stations and cantonments.

[1808.—"... and kill the merchants (sodagares mercadores)."—Livres des Mon- cots, i. 183.

[c. 1809.—"The term Soudagur, which implies merely a principal merchant, is here (Behar) usually given to those who keep what the English of India call Europe shops; that is, shops where all sorts of goods imported from Europe, and chiefly consumed by Europeans, are retailed."—Buchanan, Eastern India, i. 275.

[c. 1817.—"This sahib was a very rich man, a Soudagur. ..."—Mrs. Sherwood, Last Days of Boosy, 84.]

a. The fruit Anona muricata, L., a variety of the Custard apple. This kind is not well known on the Bengal side of India, but it is completely naturalised at Bombay. The terms soursop and sweetsop are, we believe, West Indian.

b. In a note to the passage quoted below, Granger identifies the soursop with the swarack of the Dutch. But in this, at least as regards use in the East Indies, there is some mistake. The latter term, in old Dutch writers on the East, seems always to apply to the Common Jack fruit, the 'sourjack,' in fact, as distinguished from the superior kinds, especially the champada of the Malay Archipelago.

1764.—"... a neighbouring hill Which Nature to the Soursop had re- signed."—Granger, Bk. 2.

b.—

1659.—"There is another kind of tree (in Ceylon) which they call Sursack ... which has leaves like a laurel, and bears its fruit, not like other trees on twigs from the branches, but on the trunk itself."—G. A. Saar, ed. 1672, p. 84.

1841.—Walter Schutz says that the famous fruit Jaka was called by the Netherlands in the Indies Soursack.—p. 286.

1675.—"The whole is planted for the most part with coco-palms, mangoes, and sunracks."—Ryklof van Goens, in Valentin, Ceylon, 223.

1768-71.—"The Sursack-tree has a fruit of a similar kind with the duricon (duriow), but it is not accompanied by such a fatid smell."—Staverinus, E.T. i. 238.

1778.—"The one which yields smaller fruit, without seed, I found at Columbo, Gale, and several other places. The name by which it is properly known here is the Maldivian Sour Sack, and its use here is less universal than that of the other sort, which ... weighs 30 or 40 lbs."—Thunberg, E.T. iv. 255.

[1824.—"... The sowars who accom- panyed him."—Heber, Orig. i. 404.

1827.—"Hartley had therefore no re- source save to keep his eye steadily fixed on the lighted match of the sowar ... who rode before him."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

[1830.—"... Meera, an Asawar well known on the Collector's establishment."—Or. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, i. 390.]

Sowar, Shooter, s. Hind. from Pers. shatur-sawdar, the rider of a dromedary or swift camel. Such riders are attached to the establishment of the Viceroy on the march, and of other high officials in Upper India. The word sowar is quite mis-used by the Great Duke in the passage below, for a camel-driver, a sense it never has. The word written, or intended, may however have been surwaar (q.v.).

[1815.—"As we approached the camp his cont-sawars (camel-riders) went ahead of us."

1834.—I found a fresh horse at Suffer Jung's tomb, and at the Kutub (sotub) a couple of riding camels and an attendant Shurvar Sowar."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 129.

[1837.—"There are twenty Shooter Su- war (I have not an idea how I ought to spell those words), but they are native soldiers mounted on swift camels, very much trapped, and two of them always ride before our carriage."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 81."

1840.—"Sent a Shuttar Sarwar (camel driver) off with an express to Simla."—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runj. Singh, 179.

1842.—"At Peshawur, it appears by the papers I read last night, that they have camels, but no sowars, or drivers."—Letter of Lord Wellington, in Indian Administration of Lat. Ellenborough, 228.

1857.—"I have given general notice of the Shuttar Sowar going into Meerut to all the Meerut men."—H. Greathead's Letters during Siege of Delhi, 42.

SOWARRY, SUWARREE. s. Hind. from Pers. saワdリ, a cavalcade, a cortège of mounted attendants.

1803.—"They must have tents, elephants, and other sаワdリs; and must have with them a sufficient body of troops to guard their persons."—A. Welsley, in Life of Nana, i. 846.

1809.—"He had no саWalリ."—Ed. Varletius, i. 388.

1814.—"I was often reprimanded by the Zemindars and native officers, for leaving the саWalリs, or state attendants, at the outer gate of the city, when I took my evening excursion."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 420; [2nd ed. ii. 372].

1826.—"The саWalリ, or suite of Trimhuckie, arrived at the palace."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 119.

1827.—"Orders were given that on the next day all should be in readiness for the SаWalリs, a grand procession, when the Prince was to receive the Begum as an honoured guest."—Sir Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

1831.—"Je tâcherai d'éviter toute la pousière de ces immenses саWalリs."—Jacquemont, Corresp. ii. 121.

1837.—"The Raja of Benares came with a very magnificent саWalリes of elephants and camels."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 35.

SOWARRY CAMEL. s. A swift or riding camel. See SOWAB, SHOOTER.

1856.—"I am told you dress a camel beautifully," said the young Princess, 'and I was anxious to... ask you to instruct my people how to attire a саWalリ camel.' This was flattering me on a very weak point: there is but one thing in the world that I perfectly understand, and that is how to dress a camel."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 86.

SOWCAR. s. Hind. сaワdリar; alleged to be from Skt. сaハa, 'right,' with the Hind. affix kar, 'doer'; Guj. Mahr. саWalリdr. A native banker; corresponding to the Chetty of S. India.

1803.—"You should not confine your dealings to one саWalリ. Open a communication with every саWalリ in Poona, and take money from any man who will give it you for bills."—Wellington, Desp., ed. 1857, ii. 1.

1826.—"We were also саWalリs, and granted bills of exchange upon Bombay and Madras, and we advanced money upon interest."—Pandurang Hari, 174; [ed. 1873, i. 261].

[In the following the word is compounded with Sowar:]

1877.—"It was the habit of the саWalリs, as the goldsmiths are called, to bear their wealth upon their persons."—Mrs. Guthrie, My Year in an Indian Fort, i. 294.

SOY. s. A kind of condiment once popular. The word is Japanese so-yu (a young Japanese fellow-passenger gave the pronunciation clearly as shо-у.)—A. B.), Chin. shi-уu. [Mr. Platts (9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 475) points out that in Japanese as written with the native character so would not be сиyу, but сиyу-уу; in the Romanised Japanese this is simplified to shоу (colloquially this is still further reduced, by dropping the final vowel, to shо or soу). Of this monosyllable only the so represents the classical сиyу; the final consonant (у) is a relic of the termination -у. The Japanese word is itself derived from the Chinese, which at Shanghai is се-yu, at Amoy, сi-уu, at Canton, shи-yu, of which the first element means 'salted beans,' or other fruits, dried and used as condiments: the second element merely means 'oil.' It is made from the beans of a plant common in the Himalayas and E. Asia, and much cultivated, viz. Glycine Soja, Sieb. and Zucc. (Soja hispida, Moench.), boiled down and fermented. [In India the bean is eaten in places where it is cultivated, as in Chutia Nagpur (Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 510 seq.).]

1679.—"... Mango and Sala, two sorts of sauce brought from the East Indies."—Journal of John Locke, in Ed. King's Life of L., i. 249.

1688.—"I have been told that soy is made with a fishy composition, and it seems most likely by the Taste; tho' a Gentleman of my Acquaintance who was very intimate with one that sailed often from Tonquin to Japan, from whence the true Soy comes, told me that it was made..."
on1 with Wheat and a sort of Beans mixt with Water and Salt."—Dampier, ii. 28.

1690.—". . . Sony, the choicest of all Sawees."—Ovington, 377.

1778.—An elaborate account of the preparation of Soy is given by Thunberg, Travels, E.T. iv. 121-122; and more briefly by Kaempfer on the page quoted above.

[1800.—"Mushrooms shed into small pieces, flavoured with soap."—Mrs. Fraser, A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan, i. 238.]

SPIN, s. An unmarried lady; popular abbreviation of "Spinster." [The Port. equivalent soúlera (súlier) was used in a derogatory sense (Gray, note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 128).]

SPONGE-CAKE, s. This well-known form of cake is called throughout Italy pane di Spagna, a fact that suggested to us the possibility that the English name is really a corruption of Spanish-cake. The name in Japan tends to confirm this, and must be our excuse for introducing the term here.

1880.—"There is a cake called kaseieira resembling sponge-cake. . . . It is said to have been introduced by the Spaniards, and that its name is a corruption of Castilla."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 235.

SPOTTED-DEER, a. Axis maculatus of Gray; [Cervus axis of Blanford (Mammalia, 548)]; Hind. chital, Skt. chitra, 'spotted.'

1673.—"The same Night we travelled easily to Megatana, using our Fowling- Pieces all the way, being here presented with Rich Game, as Peacocks, Doves, and Pigeons, Chittén, or Spotted Deer."—Fryer, 71.

[1677.—"Spotted Deer we shall send home, some by ye Europe ships, if they touch here."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.]

1679.—"There being convenience in this place for ye breeding up of Spotted Deer, which the Hon'ble Company doe every year order to be sent home for His Majesty, it is ordered that care be taken to breed them up in this Factory (Madapollam), to be sent home accordingly."—Pt. N. George Council (on Tour), 16th April, in Notes and Eats., Madras, 1871.

1682.—"This is a fine pleasant situation, full of great shady trees, most of them Tamarins, well stored with peacocks and Spotted Deer like our fallow-deer."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 39].

SQUEEZE, a. This is used in Anglo-Chinese talk for an illegal extraction. It is, we suppose, the translation of a Chinese expression. It corresponds to the malatolta of the Middle Ages, and to many other slang phrases in many tongues.

1682.—"If the licence (of the Hong merchants) . . . was costly, it secured to them uninterrupted and extraordinary pecuniary advantages; but on the other hand it subjected them to 'calls' or 'squeeses' for contributions to public works . . . for the relief of districts suffering from scarcity . . . as well as for the often imaginary . . . damage caused by the overflowing of the Yangtse Kiang or the Yellow River."—The Fanevra at Canton, p. 36.

STATION, s. A word of constant recurrence in Anglo-Indian colloquial. It is the usual designation of the place where the English officials of a district, or the officers of a garrison (not in a fortress) reside. Also the aggregate society of such a place.

[1882.—"The nobles and gentlemen are frequently invited to witness a 'Station' bail."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 196.]

1886.—"And if I told how much I ate at one Mofussil station, I'm sure twould cause at home a most extraordinary sensation."—Trendley, The Dak Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. p. 391.

"Who asked the Station to dinner, and allowed only one glass of Simkin to each guest."—Ibid. 231.

STEVEDORE, s. One employed to stow the cargo of a ship and to unload it. The verb estivar [Lat. stipare] is used both in Sp. and Port. in the sense of stowing cargo, implying originally to pack close, as to press wool. Estivador in the sense of a wool-packer only is given in the Sp. Dictionaries, but no doubt has been used in every sense of estivar. See Skeat, s.v.

STICK-INSECT, s. The name commonly applied to certain orthopterous insects, of the family...
Phasmidae, which have the strongest possible resemblance to dry twigs or pieces of stick, sometimes 6 or 7 inches in length.

1754. — "The other remarkable animal which I met with at Cuddalore was the animal Stalk, of which there are different kinds. Some appear like dried straws tied together, others like grass. . . ." — Ivs, 20.

1860. — "The Stick-insect. — The Phasmidae or spectres . . . present as close a resemblance to small branches, or leafless twigs, as their congener do to green leaves. . . ." — Bail, Jungle Life, 308.

STICKLAC, s. Lac encrusted on sticks, which in this form is collected in the jungles of Central India.

1880. — "Where, however, there is a regular trade in stick-lac, the propagation of the insect is systematically carried on by those who wish for a certain and abundant crop." — Bail, Jungle Life, 308.

STINK-WOOD, s. Fodidia Mauritiana, Lam., a myrtaceous plant of Mauritius, called there Bois puant.

"At the Carnival in Goa, one of the sports is to drop bits of this stick-wood into the pockets of respectable persons." — Birdwood (MS.).

STRIDhana, STREEdHANA, s. Skt. sth-dhana, 'women's property.'

A term of Hindu Law, applied to certain property belonging to a woman, which follows a law of succession different from that which regulates other property. The term is first to be found in the works of Jones and Colebrooke (1790-1800), but has recently been introduced into European scientific treatises. [See Mayne, Hindu Law, 541 seqq.]

1875. — "The settled property of a married woman . . . is well known to the Hindoos under the name of stridhan." — Maine, Early Institutions, 321.

STUPA. See TOPE.

SUÁKIN, n.p. This name, and the melancholy victories in its vicinity, are too familiar now to need explanation. Arab. Sawakin.

c. 1381. — "This very day we arrived at the island of Sawakin. It is about 6 miles from the mainland, and has neither drinkable water, nor corn, nor trees. Water is brought in boats, and there are cisterns to collect rain water. . . ." — Ibn Batuta, ii. 161-2.

1598. — "The Ptolemaic continued speaking with our people, and said to Don Rodrigo that he would have great pleasure and complete contentment, if he saw a fort of ours erected in Macuha, or in Guaquemac, or in Zylla." — Correa, iii. 42; [see Dalboquesty: Comm. ii. 229.]

[c. 1590. — ". . . thence it (the sea) washes both Persia and Ethiopia where are Dakhank and Suwarun, and is called the Gulf of Omán and the Persian Sea." — Ais, ed. Jarrett, ii. 121.]

SUCKER-BUCKER, n.p. A name often given in N. India to Upper Sind, from two neighbouring places, viz., the town of Sikkak on the right bank of the Indus, and the island fortress of Bakkar or Bhakkar in the river. An alternative name is Roroe-Bucker, from Rohri, a town opposite Bakkar, on the left bank, the name of which is probably a relic of the ancient town of Atr or Alor, though the site has been changed since the Indus adopted its present bed. [See McGrindle, Invasion of India, 352 seqq.]

c. 1388. — "I passed 5 days at Lahari . . . and quitted it to proceed to Bakkar. They thus call a fine town through which flows a canal derived from the river Sind." — Ibn Batuta, iii. 114-115.

1521. — Shah Beg "then took his departure for Bhakkar, and after several days' marching arrived at the plain surrounding Bakkar." — Turkda Nama, in Hickt, i. 311.

1554. — "After a thousand sufferings we arrived at the end of some days' journey, at Siawan (Sokara), and then, passing by Patara and Darija, we entered the fortress of Bakr." — Sidä Aït, p. 136.

[c. 1590. — "Bhakkar (Bhukkar) is a notable fortress; in ancient chronicles it is called Mansuhr." — Aïs, ed. Jarrett, ii. 327.]

1616. — "Bucor, the Chiefie City, is called Bucor Sucor." — Terry, [ed. 1777, p. 75.]

1758. — "Vient ensuite Bucor, ou comme il est écrit dans la Géographie Turque, Paker, ville située sur une colline, entre deux bras de l'Indus, qui en font une île . . . la géographie . . . ajoute que Louchk (i.e. Ror) est une autre ville située vis-à-vis de cette île du côté meridional, et que Sakor, autrement Bucor, est en même position du côté septentrional." — D'Anville, p. 37.

SUCKET, s. Old English. Wright explains the word as 'dried sweetmeats or sugar-plums.' Does it not in the quotations rather mean loof-sugar? [Palmer (Folk Etymology, 378) says that the original meaning was a 'slice of melon or gourd.' Ital. sucetta, 'a kind of meat made of Pumphions or Gourdes' (Florio) from succa, 'a gourd or pumpkin,' which is a shortened form of cucumis, a corruption of Lat. cucurbito (Diaz). This is perhaps the same word which appears in the quotation from Linschoten below, where the editor suggests that it is derived from Mahr sukata, 'slightly dried, desiccated,' and Sir H. Yule suggests a corruption of H. sonth, 'dried ginger.'

[1587. — "... packed in a friaze, two little barrels of suckat..." — Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII. xii. pt. i. 451.]

1584. — "White sucket from Zindi" (i.e. Sind) "Cambais, and China." — Barret, in Hakl. ii. 412.

[1589. — "Ginger by the Arabians, Persians and Turkes is called Gengibil (see GINGER), in Gusurate, Decan, and Bengal, when it is fresh and green Adrac, and when dried sukte." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 79.]

c. 1620-30. —

"... For this, This Candy wine, three merchants were undone; These suckets brake as many more."
Beaum. and Fletch., The Little French Lawyer, i. 1.

SUCLAT, SACKCLOTH, &c., s. Pers. sakallet, sakallat, saklatin, saklatun, applied to certain woollen stuffs, and particularly now to European broadcloth. It is sometimes defined as scarlet broad cloth; but though this colour is frequent, it does not seem to be essential to the name. [Scarlet was the name of a material long before it denoted a colour. In the Liberale Roll of 14 Hen. III. (1290, quoted in N. & Q. 8 ser. i. 129) we read of sangvine scarlet, brown, red, white and scarlet coloris de Marbl.] It has, however, been supposed that our word scarlet comes from some form of the present word (see Skeat, s.v. Scarlet).* But the fact that the Arab dictionaries give a form saklalt must not be trusted to. It is a modern form, probably taken from the European word, [as according to Skeat, the Turkish iskerlat is merely borrowed from the Ital. scarlatto].

The word is found in the medieval literature of Europe in the form siclatown, a term which has been the subject of controversy both as to etymology and to exact meaning (see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 58, notes). Among the conjectures as to etymology are a derivation from Ar. sahl, 'polishing' (see SICLEGUE); from Sicily (Ar. Sakhiliya); and from the Lat. ciclas, ciclada. In the Arabic Vocabulary of the 13th century (Florence, 1871), siklatun is translated by ciclas. The conclusion come to in the note on Marco Polo, based, partly but not entirely, on the modern meaning of sakallet, was that siklatun was probably a light woollen texture. But Dozy and De Jong give it as "etoffe de soie, broche d'or," and the passage from Edrisi supports this undoubtedly. To the north of India the name siklat is given to a stuff imported from the borders of China.

1040. — "The robes were then brought, consisting of valuable frocks of saklatun of various colours. ..." — Batbati, in Bittot, ii. 148.

c. 1160. — "Almeria (Almaria) was a Musulman city at the time of the Moravidae. It was then a place of great industry, and reckoned, among others, 800 silk lookes, where they manufactored costly robes, brocades, the stuffs known as Slatun Isfahani ... and various other silk tissues."

— Edrisi (Joubert), ii. 40.

c. 1220. — "Tabriz. The chief city of Azarbaijan. ... They make there the stuffs called 'udabbi (see TABBY), Slatin, Kh Atbi, fine satins and other textures which are exported everywhere." — Yafuti, in Barbier de Meynard, i. 193.

c. 1370. —

"... His hear, his berr, was lyk saffronn
That to his girdel raughte adoun
Hise shoes of Cordewane,
Of Brugges were his hosen broun
His Robe was of Syklatoun
That coeste many a Jane."
Chaucer, Sir Thopas, 4 (Furnival, Ellesmere Text).

c. 1590. —

"Suklat-i-Rami o Farangi o Portogaldi" (Broadcloth of Turkey, of Europe, and of Portugal). ... — Aita (orig.) i. 110. Blochmann renders 'Scarlet Broadcloth' (see above). [The same word, suclat, is used later on of 'woollen stuffs' made in Kashmir (Jarrett, Aita, ii. 355)].

1673. — "Suftahaim is already full of London Cloath, or Sackcloth Londre, as they call it." — Fryer, 224.

"... His Hose of London Sackcloth of any Colour." — Ibid. 391.

[1840. — "... his simple dress of sock- last and flat black woollen cap."
— Lloyd, Gerard, Narr. i. 167.]
SUDDEN DEATH. Anglo-Indian slang for a fowl served as a spatchcock, the standing dish at a dawk-bungalow in former days. The bird was caught in the yard, as the traveller entered, and was on the table by the time he had bathed and dressed.

[c. 1848.—"'Sudden death' means a young chicken about a month old, caught, killed, and grilled at the shortest notice."—Berncastle, Voyage to China, i. 193.]

Sudder, adj., but used as s. Literally 'chief,' being Ar. sdr. This term had a technical application under Mahommedan rule to a chief Judge, as in the example quoted below. The use of the word seems to be almost confined to the Bengal Presidency. Its principal applications are the following:

a. Sudder Board. This is the 'Board of Revenue,' of which there is one at Calcutta, and one in the N.W. Provinces at Allahabad. There is a Board of Revenue at Madras, but not called 'Sudder Board' there.

b. Sudder Court, i.e. 'Sudder Adawlut (sadr 'addadal). This was till 1863, in Calcutta and in the N.W.P., the chief court of appeal from the Mofussil or District Courts, the Judges being members of the Bengal Civil Service. In the year named the Calcutta Sudder Court was amalgamated with the Supreme Court (in which English Law had been administered by English Barrister-Judges), the amalgamated Court being entitled the High Court of Judiciary. A similar Court also superseded the Sudder Adawlut in the N.W.P.

c. Sudder Ameen, i.e. chief Ameen (q.v.). This was the designation of the second class of native Judge in the classification which was superseded in Bengal by Act XVI. of 1868, in Bombay by Act XIV. of 1869, and in Madras by Act III. of 1873. Under that system the highest rank of native Judge was Principal Sudder Ameen; the 2nd rank, Sudder Ameen; the 3rd, Moonisff. In the new classification there are in Bengal Subordinate Judges of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd grade, and Munsifs (see MOONISFF) of 4 grades; in Bombay, Subordinate Judges of the 1st class in 3 grades, and 2nd class in 4 grades; and in Madras Subordinate Judges in 3 grades, and Munsifs in 4 grades.

d. Sudder Station. The chief station of a district, viz. that where the Collector, Judge, and other chief civil officials reside, and where their Courts are.

c. 1840.—"The Sadr-Judah ('Chief of the Word') i.e. the Kadi-al-Kuda (Judge of Judges) (GAZEE) . . . possesses ten townships, producing a revenue of about 60,000 tankas. He is also called Sadr-al-Islam."—Shahabuddin Dinnish, in Notes et Extra. xiii. 185.

SUFEENA, s. Hind. safina. This is the native corr. of subpoena. It is shaped, but not much distorted, by the existence in Hind. of the Ar. word safina for 'a blank-book, a note-book.'

SUGAR. a. This familiar word is of Skt. origin. Sarkara originally signifies 'grit or gravel,' hence crystallised sugar, and through a Prakrit form sakara gave the Pura. shakkar, the Greek ζάχαρα and ζάχαρε, and the late Latin saccharum. The Ar. is sukkar, or with the article as-suukkar, and it is probable that our modern forms, It. zucchero and zucchere, Fr. sucre, Germ. Zucker, Eng. sugar, came as well as the Sp. azucar, and Port. açucar, from the Arabic direct, and not through Latin or Greek. The Russian is sakhar; Polish cukier; Hung. cukor. In fact the ancient knowledge of the product was slight and vague, and it was by the Arabs that the cultivation of the sugar-cane was introduced into Egypt, Sicily, and Andalusia. It is possible indeed, and not improbable, that palm-sugar (see JAGGERY) is a much older product than that of the cane. [This is disputed by Watt (Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. p. 31), who is inclined to fix the home of the cane in E. India.] The original habitat of the cane is not known; there is only a slight and doubtful statement of Loureiro, who, in speaking of Cochin-China, uses the words.
SUGAR. 863  SUGAR.

"habitat et colitur," which may imply its existence in a wild state, as well as under cultivation, in that country. De Candolle assigns its earliest production to the country extending under cultivation, in that country. De Cochín-China.

The ancient idch the ancients and later writers, that the original saccharum of Greek and Roman writers was not sugar but the siliceous concretion sometimes deposited in bamboos, and used in medieval medicine under the name tabasheer (q.v.) (where see a quotation from Royle, taking the same view). It is just possible that Pliny in the passage quoted below may have jumbled up two different things, but we see no sufficient evidence even of this. In White's Latin Dict. we read that by the word saccharum is meant (not sugar but) "a sweet juice distilling from the joints of the bamboo." This is nonsense. There is no such sweet juice distilled from the joints of the bamboo; nor is the substance tabasheer at all sweet. On the contrary it is slightly bitter and physically in taste, with no approach to sweetness. It is a hydrate of silica. It could never have been called "honey" (see Dioscorides and Pliny below); and the name of bamboo-sugar appears to have been given to it by the Arabs merely because of some resemblance of its concretions to lumps of sugar. [The same view is taken in the Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. xxii. 625, quoting Not. et Estr., xxv. 267.] All the erroneous notices of sārāqāp seem to be easily accounted for by lack of knowledge; and they are exactly paralleled by the loose and inaccurate stories about the origin of camphor, of lac, and what-not, that may be found within the boards of this book.

In the absence or scarcity of sugar, honey was the type of sweetness, and hence the name of honey applied to sugar in several of these early extracts. This phraseology continued down to the Middle Ages, at least in its application to uncrystallised products of the sugar-cane, and analogous substances. In the quotation from Pegolotti we apprehend that his three kinds of honey indicate honey, treacle, and a syrup or treacle made from the sweet pods of the carob-tree.

Sugar does not seem to have been in early Chinese use. The old Chinese books often mention shi-mi or 'stone-honey' as a product of India and Persia. In the reign of Taitsung (627-650) a man was sent to Gangetic India to learn the art of sugar-making; and Marco Polo below mentions the introduction from Egypt of the further art of refining it. In India now, Chini (Cheeny) (Chinese) is applied to the whiter kinds of common sugar; Muri (Miskro) or Egyptian, to sugar-candy; jow sugar is called lund.

c. A.D. 60.——

"Quaque ferens rapidum diviso gurgite fontem Vastis Indus aquis mixtum non sentit.

Quos bibunt tenera dulcis ab arundine succos.

Lucas, III. 285.

"Aiunt inventri apud Indos mel in arundinum folia, quod aut nos illius coli, aut ipsius arundinis humor dulcis et pinguis gignat."—Seneca, Epist. lxxxiv.

C. A.D. 66.——"It is called odkxyapem, and is a kind of honey which solidifies in India, and in Arabia Felix; and is found upon canes, in its substance resembling salt, and crunched by the teeth as salt is. Mixed with water and drunk, it is good for the belly and stomach, and for affections of the bladder and kidneys."—Dioscorides, Mat. Med. ii. c. 104.

c. 170.——"But all these articles are hotter than is desirable, and so they aggravate fevers, much as wine would. But oxymel alone does not aggravate fever, whilst it is an active purgative. . . . Not undeservedly, I think, that saccharum may also be counted among things of this quality."—Galen, Methodus Medendi, viii.

c. 636.——"In Indiis stagnis nasi arundinis calamisque dicuntur, ex quorum radicibus expressum surrexiium succum bibunt. Wade et Varro ait:
Indica non magno in arbore crescit arundo; illius et lentis premittur radicibus humor.
Dulcia qui nequeant succo concedere molla."—Isidori Hispaniensis Originae, Lib. xvii. cap. vii.

c. 1220.—"Sunt inuper in Terra (Sancta) canamellae de quibus sucohara ex compressione eiliquatur."—Jacobi Vitriaci, Hist. Jheropolim. cap. lxxvi.

c. 1298.—"Bengala est une provence vers midi. . . . Il font grant merchandie, car il ont espi e galanga e gingerie e suocares et de maintes autres choses espoires." — Marco Polo, Geog. Text, ch. xxxvi.

1298. — "Je vous di que en ceste provençes" (Quinsae or Chelkian) "naist et se fait plus sucre que ne fait en tout le autre monde, et ce est encore grandissime vente." — Ibid. ch. cliii.

1298. — "And before this city" (a place near Fu-chau) "came under the Great Can these people knew not how to make fine sugar (zuccherio); they only used to boil and skim the juice, which, when cold, left a black paste. But after they came under the Great Can some men of Babylonia (i.e. of Cairo) "who happened to be at the Court proceeded to this city and taught the people to refine sugar with the ashes of certain trees." — Idem. in Ramusio, ii. 49.

C. 1343. — "In Cyprus the following articles are sold by the hundred-weight (cattara di peso) and at a price in besants: Round pepper, sugar in powder (polvere di suocherio) . . . sugars in loaves (suoccheri in pane), bees' honey, sugar-cane honey, and carob-honey (mele di apé, mele di cannameli, mele di carobab). . ." — Pegolotti, 64.

"Loaf sugars are of several sorts, viz. suoccherio muzzcherio, caffettino, and bambillonia; and of musciatto, and dammaschino; and the muzzcherio is the best sugar there is; for it is more thoroughly boiled, and its paste is whiter, and more solid, than any other sugar; it is in the form of the bambillonia sugar like this Δ; and of this muzzcherio kind but little comes to the west, because nearly the whole is kept for the mouth and for the use of the Sudan himself. "Zuccherio caffettino is the next best after the muzzcherio . . ." "Zuccherio Bambillonia is the next best after the best caffettino. "Zuccherio musciatto is the best after that of Bambillonia.

"Zuccherio chandi, the bigger the pieces are, and the whiter, and the brighter, so much the better and finer, and there should not be too much small stuff. "Powdered sugars are of many kinds, as of Cyprus, of Rhodes, of the Cranio of Monreale, and of Alexandria; and they are all made originally in entire loaves; but as they are not so thoroughly done, as the other sugars that keep their loaf shape . . . the loaves tumble to pieces, and return to powder, and so it is called powdered sugar . . ." (and a great deal more). — Ibid. 362-365. We cannot interpret most of the names in the preceding extract. Bambillonia is 'Sugar of Babylon,' i.e. of Cairo, and Dammaschino of Damascus. Muscheria (see CANDY [SUGAR]), the sugar-oat (zuccherio), Caffettino, and Musciatto, no doubt all represent Arabic terms used in the trade at Alexandria, but we cannot identify them.

c. 1345. — "J'ai vu vendre dans le Bengale . . . un riki (roti) de sucre (al-sukkar), poids de Dihily, pour quatre drachmes." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 211.

1516. — "Moreover they make in this city (Bengala, i.e. probably Chittagong) much and good white cane sugar (zuccherio branco de cana), but they do not know how to consolidate it and make leaves of it, so they wrap up the powder in certain wrappers of raw hide, very well stitched up; and make great loads of it, which are dispatched for sale to many parts, for it is a great traffic." — Barboas, Lisbon ed. 382.

[1630. — "Let us have a word or two of the prices of sugar and sugar candy." — Forrot, Bombay Letters, i. 3.] 1507. — "Chacun sait que par effet des regards de Farid, des monceaux de terre se changeaient en sucre. Tel est le motif du surnom de Schahar gosaj, 'tresor de sucre' qui lui a ete donne." — Arâșk-î-Mahbî, quoted by Garcin de Tassy, Ref. Mus. 95. (This is the saint, Farid-uddin Shâhârândi (d. A.D. 1338) whose shrine is at Pîk Paktan in the Punjab.) [See Crooke, Popular Religion, &c. i. 214 sqq.]

1810. — "Although the sugar cane is supposed by many to be indigenous in India, yet it has only been within the last 50 years that it has been cultivated to any great extent. . . Strange to say, the only sugar-candy used until that time" (20 years before the date of the book) "was received from China; latterly, however, many gentlemen have speculated deeply in the manufacture. We now see sugar-candy of the first quality manufactured in various places of Bengal, and I believe that it is at least admitted that the raw sugars from that quarter are eminently good." — Williamson, V. M. ii. 133.

SULTAN. S. Ar. sulṭān, 'a Prince, a Monarch.' But this concrete sense is, in Arabic, post-classical only. The classical sense is abstract 'dominion.' The corresponding words in Hebrew and Araamic have, as usual, š and s. Thus šoklān in Daniel (e.g. vi. 26—"in the whole dominion of my kingdom") is exactly the same word. The concrete word, corresponding to sulṭān in its post-classical sense, is šaltī, which is applied to Joseph in Gen. xlii. 6—"governor." So Saladin (Yūsuf Salāḥ-ad-dīn) was not the first Joseph who was sulṭān of Egypt. ['In Arabia it is a not uncommon proper name; and as a title it is taken by a host of petty kingslets. The Abbaside Caliphs (as Al-Wāsik . . .) formerly created these Sultans as their regents. Al Tā'ir bīlīlah (A.D. 974) invested the famous Sabukturin with the office . . . Sabukturin's son, the famous Mahmūd of the Ghaznavite dynasty in 1003, was the first to adopt 'Sultān' as an independent title some 200 years after the death of Harîn-al-Rashid" (Burton, Arab. SUMATRA.
a. n.p. This name has been applied to the great island since about A.D.
1400. There can be no reasonable doubt that it was taken from the very similar name of one of the maritime principalities upon the north coast of the island, which seems to have originated in the 13th century. The seat of this principality, a town called Samudra, was certainly not far from Pasei, the Pacem of the early Portuguese writers, the Passir of some modern charts, and probably lay near the inner end of the Bay of Telo Samawe (see notes to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii.
276 seqq.). This view is corroborated by a letter from C. W. J. Wenniker (Bijdragen tot de Taal-Land-en Volken-kunde van Nederlandsch Indie, ser. iv.
vol. 6. (1882), p. 298) from which we learn that in 1881 an official of Netherlands India, who was visiting Pasei, not far from that place, and on the left bank of the river (we presume the river which is shown in maps as entering the Bay of Telo Samawe near Pasei) came upon a kampong, or village, called Samudra. We cannot doubt that this is an indication of the site of the old capital.

The first mention of the name can be recognised in Samar, the name given in the text of Marco Polo to one of the kingdoms of this cost, intervening between Baorma, Pacem, and Dagroian or Dragoian, which last seems to correspond with Pedir. This must have been the position of Samudra, and it is probable that it d has disappeared accidentally from Polo's Samara. Malay legends give trivial stories to account for the ety-mony of the name, and others have been suggested; but in all probability it was the Stk. Samudra, the 'sea.' [See Miscellaneous Papers relating to Indo-China, 2nd ser. ii. 50; Leyden, Malay Annals, 65.] At the very time of the alleged foundation of the town a kingdom was flourishing at Dwara Samudra in S. India (see Door Summumd).

The first authentic occurrence of the name is probably in the Chinese annals, which mention, among the Indian kingdoms which were prevailed on to send tribute to Kublai Khan, that of Sumutala. The chief of this State is called in the Chinese record Tu-han-pa-ti (Pauthier, Marc Pol, 605), which seems to exactly represent the Malay words Tuan-Pati, 'Lord Ruler.'

We learn next from Ibn Batuta that at the time of his visit (about the middle of the 14th century) the State of Sumutra, as he calls it, had become important and powerful in the Archipelago; and no doubt it was about that time or soon after, that the name began to be applied by foreigners to the whole of the great island, just as Lamori had been applied to the same island some centuries earlier, from Lombrì, which was then the State and port habitually visited by ships from India. We see that the name was so applied early in the following century by Nicolo Conti, who was in those seas apparently c. 1420-30, and who calls the island Shamuthra. Fra Mauro, who derived much information from Conti, in his famous World-Map, calls the island Isola Siamotra or Taprobane. The confusion with Taprobane lasted long.

When the Portuguese first reached those regions Pedir was the leading State upon the coast, and certainly no State known as Samudra or Sumatra then continued to exist. Whether the city continued to exist, even in decay, is obscure. The Ain, quoted below, refers to the "port of Sumatra," but this may have been based on old information. Valentijn seems to recognise the existence of a place called Samudra or Samotadara, though it is not entered in his map. A famous mystic theologian who flourished under the great King of Achin, Iskandar Muda, and died in 1630, bore the name of Shamuddin Shamatrarti, which seems to point to a place called Shamatrai as his birthplace. And a distinct mention of "the island of Samatra" as named from "a city of this northern part" occurs in the so-called "Voyage which Juan Serano made when he fled from Malacca" in 1512, published by Lord Stanley of Alderley at the end of his translation of Barbeois. This man, on leaving Pedir and going down the coast, says: "I drew towards the south and south-east direction, and reached to another country and city which is called Samatra," and so on. Now this indicates the position in which the city of Sumatra must really have been, if it continued to exist. But, though this passage is not, all the rest of the narrative seems to be mere plunder from Varthema. Unless, indeed, the plunder was the other way; for there is reason to believe that Varthema never went east of Malabar.

There is, however, a like intimation in a curious letter respecting the Portuguese discoveries, written from Lisbon in 1515, by a German, Valentino Moravia (the same probably who published a Portuguese version of Marco Polo, at Lisbon, in 1502) and who shows an extremely accurate conception of Indian geography. He says: "The greatest island is that called by Marco Polo the Venetian Java Minor, and at present it is called Sumotra from a port of the said island." (see in De Gubernatis, Viagg. Ital. 391).

It is probable that before the Portuguese epoch the adjoining States of Pasei and Sumatra had become united. Mr. G. Phillips, of the Consular Service in China, was good enough to send to one of the present writers, when engaged on Marco Polo, a copy of an old Chinese chart showing the northern coast of the island, and this showed the town of Sumatra (Sumantala). It seemed to be placed in the Gulf of Pasei, and very near where Pasei itself still exists. An extract of a Chinese account "of about A.D. 1413" accompanied the map. This was fundamentally the same as that quoted below from Groeneveldt. There was a village at the mouth of the river called Tulu-mangkin (qu. Telu-Samawe?). A curious passage also will be found below, extracted by the late M. Pauthier from the great Chinese Imperial Geography, which alludes to the disappearance of Sumatra from knowledge.

We are quite unable to understand the doubts that have been thrown upon the derivation of the name, given to the island by foreigners, from that of the kingdom of which we have been speaking (see the letter quoted above from the Bijdragen).

SUNDA, n.p. The western and most mountainous part of the island of Java, in which a language different from the proper Javanese is spoken, and the people have many differences of manners, indicating distinction of race. In the 16th century, Java and Sunda being often distinguished, a common impression grew up that they were separate islands; and they are so represented in some maps of the 16th century, just as some medieval maps, including that of Fra Mauro (1459), show a like separation between England and Scotland. The name Sunda is more properly indeed that of the people than of their country. The Dutch call them Sundanese (Soendanezen). The Sunda country is considered to extend from the extreme western point of the island to Cheribon, i.e. embracing about one-third of the whole island of Java. Hinduism appears to have prevailed in the Sunda country, and held its ground longer than in "Java," a name which the proper Javanese restrict to their own part of the island. From this country the sea between Sumatra and Java got from Europeans the name of the Straits of Sunda. Geographers have also called the great chain of islands from Sumatra to Timor "the Sunda Islands."

[Mr. Whiteway adds: "There was another Sunda near Goa, but above the Ghâts, where an offspring of the Vijâyanagara family ruled. It was founded at the end of the 16th century, and in the 18th the Portuguese had much to do with it, till Tippeo Sultân absorbed it, and the ruler became a Portuguese pensioner."]

1516. — "And having passed Sumatera towards Java there is the island of Sunda, in which there is much good pepper, and it has a king over it, who they say desires to serve the King of Portugal. They ship thence many slaves to China."—Barboa, 1528.

1528. — "Duarte Coelho in a ship, along with the galeas and a xoan, went into the port of Sunda, which is at the end of the island of Sumatra, on a separate large island, in which grows a great quantity of excellent pepper, and of which there is a great traffic from this port to China, this being in fact the most important merchandise exported thence. The country is very abundant in provisions, and rich in groves of trees, and has excellent water, and is peopled with Moors who have a Moorish king over them."—Correia, iii. 92.

1553. — "Of the land of Jâia we make two islands, one before the other, lying west and east as if both on one parallel. ... But the Jaes themselves do not reckon two islands of Jâia, but one only, of the length that has been stated ... about a third in length of this island towards the west constitutes Sunda, of which we have now to speak. The name of that part we consider their country to be an island divided from Jâia by a river, little known to our navigators, called by them Chiamo or Chenano, which cuts off right from the sea, all that third part of the land in such a way that when these natives define the limits of Jâia they say that on the west it is bounded by the Island of Sunda, and separated from it by this river Chiamo, and on the east by the island of Bali, and that on the north they have the island of Madura, and on the south the unexplored sea."—Barroa, i. 12.

1554.—"The information we have of this port of Calapa, which is the same as Quenda, and of another port called Bocas, these two being 16 leagues one from the other, and..."
SUNDERBUNDS, n.p. The well-known name of the tract of intersecting creeks and channels, swampy islands, and jungles, which constitutes that part of the Ganges Delta nearest the sea. The limits of the region so-called are the mouth of the Hooghly on the west, and that of the Megna (i.e. of the combined great Ganges and Brahmaputra) on the east, a width of about 220 miles. The name appears not to have been traced in old native documents of any kind, and hence its real form and etymology remain uncertain. Sundara-vana, ‘beautiful forest’; Sundari-vana, or -ban, ‘forest of the Sundari tree’; Chandra-ban, and Chandra-bandi, ‘moon-forest’ or ‘moon-embankment’; Chandra-bhanda, the name of an old tribe of salt-makers; Chandra-dhip-ban from a large zemindar called Chandra-dip in the Bakerganj district at the eastern extremity of the Sunderbunds; these are all suggestions that have been made. Whatever be the true etymology, we doubt if it is to be sought in sundara or sundari. [As to the derivation from the Sundari tree which is perhaps most usually accepted, Mr. Beveridge (Man. of Bakarganj, 24, 167, 39) remarks that this tree is by no means common in many parts of the Bakarganj Sunderbunds; he suggests that the word means ‘beautiful wood’ and was possibly given by the Brahmins.]

The name has never (except in one quotation below) been in English mouths, or in English popular orthography, Sunderbunds, but Sunderbunds, which implies (in correct transliteration) an original sandara or chandra, not sundara. And going back to what we conjecture may be an early occurrence of the name in two Dutch writers, we find this confirmed. These two writers, it will be seen, both speak of a famous Sandery, or Santry, Forest in Lower Bengal, and we should be more positive in our identification were it not that in Van der Broucke’s map (1660) which was published in Valentijn’s East Indies (1726) this Sandery Forest is shown on the west side of the Hoogly R., in fact about due west of the site of Calcutta, and a little above a place marked as Basanderi, located near the exit into the Hooghly of what represents the old Saraswati R., which enters the former at Sankral, not far below Fort William. This has led Mr. Blochmann to identify the Sanderi Bosch with the old Mahall Basandhari which appears in the Ain as belonging to the Sirkār of Sultānābād (Gladiwin’s Ayeen, ii. 207, orig. i. 407; Jarrett, ii. 140; Blochm. in J.A.S.B. xili. pt. i. p. 232), and which formed one of the original “xxiv. Pergunnas.”

Un-doubtedly this is the Basanderi of V. den Broucke’s map; but it seems possible that some confusion between Basandari and Bosch Sandery (which would be Sandarban in the vernacular) may have led the map-maker to misplace the latter. We should gather from Schulz that he passed the Forest of Sandry about a Dutch mile below Sankral, which he mentions. But his statement is so nearly identical with that in Valentijn that we approve.

* Basandhari is also mentioned by Mr. James Grant (1766) in his View of the Resources of Bengal, as the Perguma of Balsa-basmandy; and by A. Hamilton as a place on the Damûdar, producing much good sugar (P. & R. Report, p. 405; J. R. A. iii. 4). It would seem to have been the present Perguma of Balsa, some 12 or 14 miles west of the northern part of Calcutta. See Hunter’s Bengal Gaz. i. 965.

† So called in the German version which we use; but in the Dutch original he is Sokouts.
hend they have no separate value. Valentijn, in an earlier page, like Bernier, describes the Sunderbunds as the resort of the Arakan pirates, but does not give a name (p. 166).

1661.—"We got under sail again" (just after meeting the Arakan pirates) "in the morning early, and went past the Forest of Santry, so styled because (as has been credibly related) Alexander the Great with his mighty army was hindered by the strong rush of the ebb and flood at this place, from advancing further, and therefore had to turn back to Macedonia."—Walter Schultz, 155.

c. 1666.—"And thence it is" (from piratical raids of the Mugs, &c.) "that at present there are seen in the mouth of the Ganges, so many fine isles quite deserted, which were formerly well peopled, and where no other inhabitants are found but wild Beasts, and especially Pygers."—Bernier, E.T. 54; [ed. Constable, 442].

1728.—"This (Bengal) is the land wherein they will have it that Alexander the Great, called by the Moors, whether Hindostanders or Persians, Sulthaan Iskender, and in their historians Iskender Dowlcarnan, was . . . they can show you the exact place where King Purus held his court. The natives will prate much of this matter; for example, that in front of the SANDER BUND (Sunder Boch, which we show in the map, and which they call properly after him Iskenderic) he was stopped by the great and rushing streams."—Valentijn, v. 179.

1728.—"But your petitioners did not arrive off Sunderbund Wood till four in the evening, where they rowed backward and forward for six days; with which labour and want of provisions three of the people died."—Pelham of Sherpur Mahal, of Amur and others, to Govr. of Ft. St. Geo., in Wheeler, ii. 41.

1764.—"On the 11th Bhaudan, whilst the Boats were at Kerma in Sunderbund Wood, a little before daybreak, Captain Ross arose and ordered the Manjee to put off with the Budgerow . . . ."—Native Letter regarding Murder of Captain John Ross by a Native Cree. In Long, 383. This instance is an exception to the general remark made above that the English popular orthography has always been Sunder, and not Soonder-bunds.

1788.—"If the Jelinghy be navigable we shall soon be in Calcutta; if not, we must pass a second time through the Sunderbunds."—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Life, ii. 83.

"A portion of the Sunderbunds . . . for the most part overflowed by the tide, as indicated by the original Hindoo name of Chunderbund, signifying mounds, or offering of the moon."—James Grant, in App. to Fifth Report, p. 260. In a note Mr. Grant notices the derivation from "Sunder- dery wood," and "Sunder-ban," "beautiful wood," and proceeds: 'But we adhere to our own etymology rather . . . above all, because the richest and greatest part of the Sunderbunds is still comprised in the ancient Zemindarry pergunnah of Chander deep, or lunar territory.'

1792.—"Many of these lands, what is called the Sundra bunds, and others at the mouth of the Ganges, if we may believe the history of Bengal, was formerly well inhabited."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, Pref. p. 5.

1793.—"That part of the delta bordering on the sea, is composed of a labyrinth of rivers and creeks, . . . this tract known by the name of the Woods, or Sunderbunds, is in extent equal to the principality of Wales."—Kerrell, Mem. of Map of Hind., 3rd ed., p. 359.

1853.—"The scenery, too, exceeded his expectations; the terrible forest solitude of the Sunderbunds was full of interest to an European imagination."—Oakfield, i. 38.

[SUNGBAR, s. Pers. sanga, sang, a stone.] A rude stone breastwork, such as is commonly erected for defence by the Afridis and other tribes on the Indian N.W. frontier. The word has now come into general military use, and has been adopted in the S. African war.

1900.—"Conspicuous sungars are constructed to draw the enemy's fire."—Pioneer Mail, March 16.]

The same word seems to be used in the Hills in the sense of a rude wooden bridge supported by stone piers, used for crossing a torrent.

[1833.—"Across a deep ravine . . . his Lordship erected a neat sanga, or mountain bridge of pines."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 117.

1871.—"A sanga bridge is formed as follows: on either side the river piers of rubble masonry, laced with mahogany beams of timber, are built up; and into these are inserted stout poles, one above the other in successively projecting tiers, the interstices between the latter being filled up with cross-beams, &c."—Harcourt, Himalayan Districts of Kooloo, p. 57 seq.]

SUNGTARA, s. Pers. sângtâra. The name of a kind of orange, probably from Cîntra. See under ORANGE a quotation regarding the fruit of Cîntra, from Albulfedâ.

c. 1526.—"The Sangtârah . . . is another fruit . . . In colour and appearance it is like the citron (Târawî), but the skin of the fruit is smooth."—Baker, 328.

c. 1590.—"Sîkar Sihet is yet more mountainous . . . Here grows a delicious fruit called Soontara (stâtaru) in colour like an orange, but of an oblong form."—Ayens, by Gladwin, ii. 10; [Jarrett (ii. 124) writes Suntarrah].

1793.—"The people of this country have infinitely more reason to be proud of their oranges, which appear to me to be very superior to those of Silhet, and probably indeed are not surpassed by any in the world. They are here called Suntilla, which I take to be a corruption of Sengtrerrah, the name by which a similar species of orange is known in the Upper Provinces of India."—Kirpatrick's Nepal, i. 129.

1835.—"The most delicious oranges have been procured here. The rind is fine and thin, the flavour excellent; the natives call them 'cinta.'—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 99.

SUNN, s. Beng. and Hind. san, from Skt. sana; the fibre of the Crotalaria juncea, L. (N.O. Leguminosae); often called Bengal, or Country, hemp. It is of course in no way kindred to true hemp, except in its economic use. In the following passage from the Ain the reference is to the Hibiscus canabinus (see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 597).

c. 1590.—"Hemp grows in clusters like a nosegay. . . . One species bears a flower like the cotton-shrub, and this is called in Hindostan, sun-paut. It makes a very soft rope."—Ayen, by Gladwin, i. 89; in Blochmann (i. 57) Pfaisan.

1833.—"Sunn . . . a plant the bark of which is used as hemp, and is usually sown around cotton fields. —Playfair, Taleef-i-Shereef, 96.

[SUNNEE, SOONNEE, s. Ar. sinni, which is really a Pers. form and stands for that which is expressed by the Ar. Akhi's-Sunnah, 'the people of the Path,' a 'Traditionist.' The term applied to the large Mahomedan sect who acknowledge the first four Khalifahs to have been the rightful descendants of the Prophet, and are thus opposed to the Sheehahs. The latter are much less numerous than the former, the proportion being, according to Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's estimate, 15 millions Shiiahs to 145 millions of Sunnis.

[c. 1590.—"The Mahomedans (of Kashmir) are partly Sunnis, and others of the sects of Aly and Noorbukshy; and they are frequently engaged in wars with each other."—Ayen, by Gladwin, ii. 125; ed. Jarrett, ii. 352.

[1628.—"The other two . . . are Sonn, as the Turks and Moghol."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 132.

[1812.—"A fellow told me with the gravest face, that a lion of their own country would never hurt a Shyayah . . . but would always devour a Sunn."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 62.]

SUNNUD, s. Hind. from Ar. sanad. A diploma, patent, or deed of grant by the government of office, privilege, or right. The corresponding Skt.—H. is ksana.

[c. 1590.—"A paper authenticated by proper signatures is called a sunudd . . ."—Ayen, by Gladwin, i. 214; ed. Blochmann, i. 259.]

1758.—"They likewise brought sunnuds, or the commission for the nabolicship."—Orme, Hist., ed. 1803, ii. 284.

1793.—"That your Petitioners, being the Brahins, &c. . . . were permitted by Sunnuud from the president and council to collect daily alms from each shop or doocan (Doocauu) of this place, at 5 cowries per diem."—In Long, 184.

1778.—"If the path to and from a House . . . be in the Territories of another Person, that Person, who always hath passed to and fro, shall continue to do so, the other Person aforesaid, though he hath a Right of Property in the Ground, and hath an attested Sunnuud thereof, shall not have Authority to cause him any Let or Molestation."—Hales, Code, 100-101.

1778.—"I enclose you sunnuda for pension for the Killadar of Chittisdroog."—Wellington, i. 45.

1800.—"I wished to have traced the nature of landed property in Soondaah . . . by a chain of Sunnuds up to the 9th century."—Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 249.

1809.—"This sunnud is the foundation of all the rights and privileges annexed to a jagoeer (Jagbeer)."—Harrington's Analysis, ii. 410.

SUNYASEE, s. Skt. sannyasa, lit. 'one who resigns, or abandons, scil. 'worldly affairs'; a Hindu religious mendicant. The name of Sunyasee was applied familiarly in Bengal, c. 1760-75, to a body of banditti claiming to belong to a religious fraternity, who, in the interval between the decay of the imperial authority and the regular establishment of our own, had their head-quarters in the forest-tracts at the foot of the Himalaya. From these they used to issue periodically in large bodies, plundering and levying exactions far and wide, and returning to their asylum in the jungle when threatened with pursuit. In the days of Nawab Mir Kasim Ali (1760-64) they were bold enough to plunder the city of Dacca; and in 1786 the great geographer James Rennell, in an encounter with a large body of them in the territory of Koch (see COOCHE) Bihar, was nearly cut to pieces. Rennell himself, five years later, was employed to carry out a project which he had formed for the suppression of these bands, and did so apparently with what was considered at the time to be success, though we find the depredators still spoken of by W. Hastings as active, two or three years later.

1826. — "Being looked upon with an evil eye by many persons in society, I pretended to bewail my brother's loss, and gave out my intention of becoming a Sannyase, and retiring from the world." — Pandurang Hati, 394; [ed. 1873, iii. 267; also i. 189].

SUPHRA, n.p. The name of a very ancient port and city of western India; in Skt. Sāḍārakā, popularly Suphā. It was near Wasā (Baquin of the Portuguese—see (1) Bassein)—which was for many centuries the chief city of the Konkan, where the name still survives as that of a well-to-do town of 1700 inhabitants, the channel by which vessels in former days reached

* This affair is alluded to in one of the extracts in Long (p. 842): "Agreed ... that the Fakirs who were made prisoners at the relating of Dacca may be employed as Cookies in the repair of the Factory." — Proos. of Council of St. Williams, Dec. 6, 1769.

* Williams (Skt. Dict. a.v.) gives Sāḍārakā as "the name of a mythical country"; but it was real enough. There is some ground for believing that there was another Sāḍārakā on the coast of Orissa, Zawrdo of Polasny.
it from the sea being now dry. The city is mentioned in the Mahabharata as a very holy place, and in other old Sanskrit works, as well as in cave inscriptions at Karli and Nasik, going back to the 1st and 2nd centuries of the Christian era. Excavations affording interesting Buddhist relics, were made in 1882 by Mr. (now Sir) J. M. Campbell (see his interesting notice in Bombay Gazetteer, xiv, 314-342; xvi, 125) and Pandit Indrajit Bhagwanlal. The name of Supara is one of those which have been plausibly connected, through Sophir, the Coptic name of India, with the Ophir of Scripture. Some Arab writers call it the Shefala of India.

SUPREME COURT. The designation of the English Court established at Fort William by the Regulation Act of 1773 (13 Geo. III. c. 63), and afterwards at the other two Presidencies. Its extent of jurisdiction was the subject of acrimonious controversies in the early years of its existence; controversies which were closed by 21 Geo. III. c. 70, which explained and defined the jurisdiction of the Court. The use of the name came to an end in 1862 with the establishment of the 'High Court,' the bench of which is occupied by barrister judges, judges from the Civil Service, and judges promoted from the native bar.

The Charter of Charles II., of 1661, gave the Company certain powers to administer the laws of England, and that of 1683 to establish Courts of Judicature. That of Geo. I. (1726) gave power to establish at each Presidency Mayor's Courts for civil suits, with appeal to the Governor and Council, and from these, in cases involving more than 1000 pagodas, to the King in Council. The same charter constituted the Governor and Council of each Presidency a Court for trial of all offences except high treason. Courts of Requests were established by charter of Geo. II., 1753. The Mayor's Court at Madras and Bombay survived till 1787, when (by 37 Geo. III. ch. 142) a Recorder's Court was instituted at each. This was superseded at Madras by a Supreme Court in 1801, and at Bombay in 1823.
SURA, a. Toddy (q.v.), i.e. the fermented sap of several kinds of palm, such as coco, palmyra, and wild-date. It is the Skt. sura, ‘vinous liquor,’ which has passed into most of the vernaculars. In the first quotation we certainly have the word, though combined with other elements of uncertain identity, applied by Cosmas to the milk of the coco-nut, perhaps making some confusion between that and the fermented sap. It will be seen that Linschoten applies sura in the same way. Bluteau, curiously, calls this a Caffre word. It has in fact been introduced from India into Africa by the Portuguese (see Ann. Marit. iv. 293).

c. 545. — "The Argell" (i.e. Narcit, or nargoola, or coco-nut) "is at first full of very sweet water, which the Indians drink, using it instead of wine. This drink is called Romoco-sura," and is exceedingly pleasant."—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., clxxvi.

[1564. — "Cura." See under ARBAC.]

1683. — "They grow two qualities of palm-tree, one kind for the fruit, and the other to give cura."—Garcia, f. 67.

1578. — "Sura, which is, as it were, vino mosto."—Acosta, 100.

1598. — "... in that sort the pot in short space is full of water, which they call sura, and is very pleasant to drink, like sweet wine, and somewhat better."—Linschoten, 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 48].

1609-10. — "... A goodly country and fertile ... abounding with Date Trees, whence they draw a liquor, called Tarree (Toddy) or Sura. ..."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 436.

1643. — "La je fis boire mes mariniers de telle sorte que peu s'en sortant qu'il ne rennemmen notre amadis ou batteau: Ce breuvage estoit du sura, qui est du vin fait de palmes."—Mercuet, Voyages, 252.

c. 1550. — "Nor could they drink either Wine, or Sury, or Strong Water, by reason of the great Imposta which be laid upon them."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 86; [ed. Ball, i. 343].

1653. — "Les Portugais appellent ce tari ou vin des Indes, Soure ... de cette liqueur le singe, et la grande chauss-souris ... sont extremement amateurs, aussi bien que les Indiens Musulmans (sic), Parsis, et quelque tribus d'Indou. ..."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1667, 293.

SURAT, n.p. In English use the name of this city is accented Suratt; but the name is in native writing and parlance generally Sôrôt. In the Aśa, however (see below), it is written Sôrat; also in Saddik Isafahani (p. 106). Surat was taken by Akbar in 1573, having till then remained a part of the falling Mahomedean kingdom of Guzerat. An English factory was first established in 1608-9, which was for more than half a century the chief settlement of the English Company in Continental India. The transfer of the Chiefs to Bombay took place in 1687.

We do not know the origin of the name. Various legends on the subject are given in Mr. (now Sir J.) Campbell's Bombay Gazetteer (vol. ii.), but none of them have any probability. The ancient Indian Saurashtra was the name of the Peninsula of Guzerat or Kattywar, or at least of the maritime part of it. This latter name and country is represented by the differently spelt and pronounced Sârath (see SURATH). Sir Henry Elliot and his editor have repeatedly stated the opinion that the names are identical. Thus: "The names 'Surat' and 'Sûrath' are identical, both being derived from the Sankrit Saurasthāra; but as they belong to different places a distinctness in spelling has been maintained. 'Surat' is the city; 'Sûrath' is a prânt or district of Kattiwar, of which Junâgarh is the chief town" (Elliot, v. 350; see also 197). Also: "The Sanskrit Sûrasthâra and Gúrjâra survive in the modern names Surat and Guzerat, and however the territories embraced by the old terms have varied, it is hard to conceive that Surat was not in Surâstâra nor Guzerat in Gurjâra. All evidence goes to prove that the old and modern names applied to the same places. Thus Ptolemy's Sûrastre or Surastra comprises Surat. ..." (Dowson (b) ibid. i. 369). This last statement seems distinctly erroneous. Surat is in Ptolemy's Σουραστη, not in Σουραστρη, which represents, like Saurashtra, the peninsula. It must remain doubtful whether there was any connection between the names, or the resemblance was accidental. It is possible that continental Surat may have originally had some name implying its being the place of passage to Saurashtra or Sorath.

Surat is not a place of any antiquity. There are some traces of the existence of the name ascribed to the 14th century, in passages of uncertain value in certain native writers. But it only 1528.—"Heytor da Silveira put to sea again, scouring the Gulf, and making war everywhere with fire and sword, by sea and land; and he made an onslaught on Currete and Reynel, great cities on the sea-coast, and sacked them, and burnt part of them, for all the people fled, they being traders and without a garrison."—Correa, iii. 277.

1553.—"Thence he proceeded to the bar of the river Tapty, above which stood two cities the most notable on that gulf. The first they call Surat, 3 leagues from the mouth, and the other Reiner, on the opposite side of the river and half a league from the bank. ... The latter was the most sumptuous in buildings and civilisation, inhabited by warlike people, all of them Moors inured to maritime war, and it was from this city that most of the foists and ships of the King ofCambay's fleet were furnished. Surat again was inhabited by an unwarlike people whom they call Banyans, folk given to mechanic crafts, chiefly to the business of weaving cotton cloths."—Barros, IV, iv. 8.

1554.—"So saying they quitted their rowing-benches, got ashore, and started for Surat."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 83.

1573.—"Next day the Emperor went to inspect the fortress ... During his inspection some large mortars and guns attracted his attention. Those mortars bore the name of Sulaimán, from the name of Sulaimán Sultan of Turkey. When he made his attempt to conquer the ports of Gujarát, he sent these ... with a large army by sea. As the Turks ... were obliged to return, they left these mortars. ... The mortars remained upon the sea-shore, until Khudáwán Kháin built the fort of Surat, when he placed them in the fort. The one which he left in the country of Surat was taken to the fort of Junaghar by the ruler of that country."—Tabar Kal-i-Albar, in Elliot, v. 350.

1610.—"Surat is among famous ports. The river Tapty runs hard by, and at seven o'clock distance joins the salt sea. Rántí on the other side of the river is now a port dependent on Surat, but was formerly a big city. The ports of Khándevl and Bálár are also annexed to Surat. Fruit, and especially the ananas, is abundant. ... The sectaries of Zardasht, emigrant from Persia, have made their dwelling here; they reverence the Zond and Pazhán and erect their dakhmas (or places for exposing the dead). ... Through the carelessness of the agents of Government and the commanding officers of the troops (shipah-salátrán, Shipah Bélár), a considerable tract of this Sírkár is at present in the hands of the Frank, e.g. Daman, Sanján (St. John's), Társphir, Mábim, and Bázílé (see (1) Bassail), that are both cities and ports."—Ains, orig. i. 488; [ed. 1638.—"Within a League of the Road we entred into the River upon which Surat is seated, and which hath on both sides a very fertile soil, and many fair gardens, with pleasant Country-houses, which being all white, a colour which it seems the Indians are much in love with, afford a noble prospect amidst the greenness whereby they are encompassed. But the River, which is the Tapte ... is so shallow at the mouth of it, that Barks of 70 or 80 Tun can hardly come into it."—Mandelslo, p. 12.

1690.—"Suart is reckon'd the most fam'd Emporium of the Indian Empire, where all Commodities are vendible. ... And the River is very commodious for the Importation of Foreign Goods, which are brought up to the City in Boats and Yachts, and Country Boats."—Ovington, 218.

1779.—"There is some report that he (Gen. Goddard) is gone to Bender-Bougot ... but the truth of this God knows."—Sei'r Mútaq, iii. 328.
Sūrath, more properly Sūrath, and Sōreth, n.p. This name is the legitimate modern form and representative of the ancient Indian Saurashtra and Greek Svarasthêa, names which applied to what we now call the Kathyrwar Peninsula, but especially to the fertile plains on the sea-coast. ["Saurashtra, the land of the Sun, afterwards Sanskritized into Saurāśṭra the Goody Land, preserves its name in Sūrath, the southern part of Kāthiavāda. The name appears as Surasthira in the Mahābhārata and Pāṇini's Gānaptidha, in Rudrādāna's (A.D. 150) and Skandagupta's (A.D. 466) Gīmnār inscriptions, and in several Valabhi copper-plates. Its Pārākṛta form appears as Sūratha in the Nāśik inscription of Gotamiputra (A.D. 150) and in later Pārākṛta as Sūrathā in the Tirthakalpa of Jinaprabha of the 13th or 14th century. Its earliest foreign mention is perhaps Strabo's Sōraēstos and Pliny's Orature (Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 6). The remarkable discovery of one of the great inscriptions of Śaka (B.C. 250) on a rock at Gīmnār, near Jūnāgarh in Saurashtra, shows that the dominion, whose capital was at Pataliputra (Pālīmūḍhra) or Pātana, extended to this distant shore. The application of the modern form Sūrath or Sōrath has varied in extent. It is now the name of one of the four prānī or districts into which the peninsula is divided for political purposes, each of these prānī containing a number of small States, and being partly managed, partly controlled by a Political Assistant. Sūrath occupies the south-western portion, embracing an area of 5,220 sq. miles.

Sūrkunda, a. Hind. sarkand, [Skt. sara, 'reed-grass,' kand, 'joint, section']. The name of a very tall reed-grass, Saccharum Sōra, Roxb., perhaps also applied to Saccharum procercum, Roxb. These grasses are often tall enough in the riverine plains of Eastern Bengal greatly to overtop a tall man standing in a howda on the back of a tall elephant. It is from the upper part of the flower-bearing stalk of surkunda that surky (q.v.) is derived. A most intelligent visitor to India was led into a curious mistake about the name of this grass by some official, who ought to have known better. We quote the passage. ———'s story about the main branch of a river channel probably rests on no better foundation.

1875.—"As I drove yesterday with ——— I asked him if he knew the scientific name of the tall grass which I heard called tiger-grass at Ahmedabad, and which is very abundant here (about Lahore). I think it is a saccharum, but am not quite sure. 'No,' he said, 'but the people in the neighbourhood call it Sikander's Grass, as they still call the main branch of a river 'Sikander's channel.' Strange, is it not!—how that great individuality looms through history."—Grant Duff, Notes of an Indian Journey, 105.

Surooose. s. Pers. sur-posh, 'head-cover,' [which again becomes corrupted into our Tarboosh (tarbush), and Tarbrush of the wandering Briton]. A cover, as of a basin, dish, hooka-bowl, &c.

1829.—"Tugging away at your hookah, find no smoke; a thief having unloosed your silver chelam (see CHILLUM) and suroose."—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 169.

tion. It is in Skt. Satadru, 'flowing in a hundred channels,' Sutadru, Sutadri, Satadru, &c., and is the Sut, Zapat, or Zadaphos, or Zaddarpos of Ptolemy, the Sydrus (or Hesudrus) of Pliny (vi. 21).

c. 1020.—"The Sultán ... crossed in safety the Sihán (Indus), Jelám, Chandrá, Ubra (Rávi), Bah (Biyáh), and Satadur. . . ."—Al-Úbi, in Elliot, ii. 41.

c. 1080.—"They all combine with the Sutadri below Múthán, at a place called Panjnad, or 'the junction of the five rivers.'—Al-Birrinc, in Elliot, i. 48. The same writer says: "(The name) should be written Shatauld. It is the name of a province in Hind. But I have ascertained from well-informed people that it should be Sutadur, not Shatauld." (sic.)—Ibid. p. 52.

c. 1310.—"After crossing the Panjáb, or five rivers, namely, Sind, Jelám, the river of Lohár, Satúl, and Biyáh. . . ."—Wasséf, in Elliot, iii. 38.

c. 1380.—"The Sultán (Firoz Sháh) . . . conducted two streams into the city from two rivers, one from the river Jumna, the other from the Sutlég. . . ."—Táríkh-i-Firoz Sháh, in Elliot, iii. 300.

c. 1450.—"In the year 756 H. (1355 A.D.) the Sultán proceeded to Dálippládr, and conducted a stream from the river Sutlág, for a distance of 40 kos as far as Jusásár."—Táríkh-i-Mádhrúk Sháhí, in Elliot, iv. 8.

c. 1562.—"Letters came from Lahore with the intelligence that Ibrahim Husain Mirzá had crossed the Sutadi, and was marching upon Dálippládr. . . ."—Tabárát-i-Al-bari, in Elliot, v. 358.

c. 1590.—"Súbah Dáli. In the 3rd climate. The length (of this Súbah) from Púlwar to Lodhánas, which is on the bank of the river Sutlág, is 165 Károh.—Atá, orig. i. 513; [ed. Jarrett, p. 278].

c. 1793.—"Near Moulan they unite again, and bear the name of Sétla, until both the substance and name are lost in the Indus."—Rennell, Memoir, 102.

In the following passage the great French geographer has missed the Sutlég:

1753.—"Les cartes qui ont précédé celles que j'ai composées de l'Arie, ou de l'Inde . . . ne marquaient aucune rivière entre l'Hypasie, ou Hypasie, dernier des fleuves qui se rendent dans l'Indus, et le Gémé, qui est le Jomanes de l'Antiquité . . . Mais la marche de Timur a indiqué dans cette intervalle deux rivieres, celle de Kéké, et celle de Pamit. Dans un ancien itinéraire de l'Inde, que Pline nous a conservé, on trouve entre l'Hypasie et le Jomanes une rivière sous le nom d'Hyphasis de à égale distance d'Hyphasis et de Jomanes, et qu'on a tout lieu de prendre pour Kéké."—D'Anville, p. 47.

SUTTEE, s. The rite of widow-burning; i.e. the burning of the living widow along with the corpse of her husband, as practised by people of certain castes among the Hindus, and eminently by the Râjpûtas.

The word is properly Skt. sati, 'a good woman,' 'a true wife,' and thence specially applied, in modern vernaculars of Sanskrit parentage, to the wife who was considered to accomplish the supreme act of fidelity by sacrificing herself on the funeral pile of her husband. The application of this substantive to the suicidal act, instead of the person, is European. The proper Skt. term for the act is sahagamana, or 'keeping company;' [sahamaru, 'dying together']. A very long series of quotations in illustrations of practice, from classical times downwards, might be given.

We shall present a selection.

We should remark that the word (sati or sutter) does not occur, so far as we know, in any European work older than the 17th century. And then it only occurs in a disguised form (see quotation from P. Della Valle). The term masti which he uses is probably madh-sati, which occurs in Skt. Dictionaries ('a wife of great virtue'). Della Valle is usually eminent in the correctness of his transcriptions of Oriental words. This conjecture of the interpretation of masti is confirmed, and the traveller himself justified, by an entry in Mr. Whitworth's Dictionary of a word Masti-kalla used in Canara for a monument commemorating a sati. Kalla is stone and masti=madh-sati. We have not found the term exactly in any European document older than Sir C. Malet's letter of 1787, and Sir W. Jones's of the same year (see below).

Suttee is a Brahmanical rite, and there is a Sanskrit ritual in existence (see Classified Index to the Tanjors MSS., p. 135a). It was introduced into Southern India with the Brahman civilization, and was prevalent there chiefly in the Brahmanical Kingdom of Vijayanagar, and among the Maharrattas. In Malabar, the most primitive part of S. India, the rite is forbidden (Anudhranyaya, v. 26). The cases mentioned by Teixeira below, and in the Lettres Édissantes, occurred at Tanjore and Madura. A (Mahatta) Brahman at Tanjore told one of the present writers that he had to perform commemorative funeral rites for his grandfather and grandmother on the same day, and this indicated that his grandmother had been a sati.

The practice has prevailed in various regions besides India. Thus it seems to have been an early custom among the heathen Russians, or at least among nations on the Volga called Russians by Magi and Ibn Fognán. Herodotus (Bk. v. ch. 5) describes it among certain tribes of Thracians. It was in vogue in Tonga and the Fiji Islands. It has prevailed in the island of Bali within our own time, though there accompanying Hindu rites, and perhaps of Hindu origin,—certainly modified by Hindu influence. A full account of Suttee as practised in those Malay Islands will be found in Zollinger's account of the Religion of Sassak in J. Ind. Arch. ii. 166; also see Friedrich's Bali as in note preceding. [A large number of references to Suttee are collected in Frazer, Pauwamm, iii. 198 seqq.]

In Diodorus we have a long account of the rivalry as to which of the two wives of Keteus, a leader of the Indian contingent in the army of Eumenes, should perform Suttee. One is rejected as with child. The history of the other terminates thus:

Β. C. 317.—"Finally, having taken leave of those of the household, she was set upon the pyre by her own brother, and was regarded with wonder by the crowd that had run together to the spectacle, and heroically ended her life; the whole force with their arms thrice marching round the pyre before it was kindled. But she, laying herself beside her husband, and even at the violence of the flame giving utterance to no unbecoming cry, stirred pity indeed in others of the spectators, and in some excess of eulogy; not but what there were some of the Greeks present who reproached such rites as barbarous and cruel...."—Diod. Sic. Biblioth. xix. 33-34.

c. 320.
"Felix Eois lex funeris una maritis Quos Aurora suos rubra colorat equis;
Namque ubi mortifero jacta est fax ultima lecto
Uxorum fuis stat pia turbae comis;
Et certamen habet ietis, quae viva sequatur
Conjugium; pudor est non licuisse mori,

Ardent victories; et flammes pectora praebent, Impununtque suis ora perusta viris."

Proprietis* Lib. iii. xiii. 16-22.

c. B. C. 20.—"He (Aristobulus) says that he had heard from some persons of wives burning themselves voluntarily with their deceased husbands, and that those men who refused to submit to this custom were disgraced."—Strabo, xv. 62 (E. T. by Hamilton and Falconer, iii. 112).

c. 851.—"All the Indians burn their dead. Serendib is the farthest out of the islands dependent upon India. Sometimes when they burn the body of a King, his wives cast themselves on the pile, and burn with him; but it is at their choice to abstain."—Reinaud, Relation, &c. i. 50.

c. 1200.—"Hearing the Raja was dead, the Parmarí became a sati:—dying she said—
The son of the Jadavanl will rule the country, may my blessing be on him!"—Chand. Bardi, in Ind. Ant. i. 227. We cannot be sure that sati is in the original, as this is a condensed version by Mr. Beames.

1298.—"Many of the women also, when their husbands die and are placed on the pile to be burnt, do burn themselves along with the bodies."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 17.

c. 1322.—"The idolaters of this realm have one detestable custom (that I must mention). For when any man dies they burn him; and if he leave a wife they burn her alive with him, saying that she ought to go and keep her husband company in the other world. But if the woman have sons by her husband she may abide with them, as she will."—Odoric, in Cathay, &c., i. 79.

Also in Zampa or Champa: "When a married man dies in this country his body is burned, and his living wife along with it. For they say that she should go to keep company with her husband in the other world also."—Ibid. 97.

c. 1328.—"In this India, on the death of a noble, or of any people of substance, their bodies are burned; and she their wives follow them alive to the fire, and for the sake of worldly glory, and for the love of their husbands, and for eternal life, burn along with them, with as much joy as if they were going to be wedded. And those who do this have the higher repute for virtue and perfection among the rest."— Pr. 242, 20.

* The same poet speaks of Evadne, who threw herself at Thebes on the burning pile of her husband Cephalus (I. xv. 21), a story which Paley thinks must have come from some early Indian-legend.

C. 1843.—"The burning of the wife after the death of her husband is an act among the Indians recommended, but not obligatory. If a widow burns herself, the members of the family get the glory thereof, and the fame of fidelity in fulfilling their duties. She who does not give herself up to the flames puts on coarse raiment and abides with her kindred, wretched and despised for having failed in duty. But she is not compelled to burn herself." (There follows an interesting account of instances witnessed by the traveller.)—Ibn Batuta, ii. 138.

C. 1590.—"There are in this Kingdom (the Deccan) many heathen, natives of the country, whose custom is that when they die they are burnt, and their wives along with them; and if these will not do it they remain in disgrace with all their kindred. And as it happens oft times that they are unwilling to do it, their Brahmin kinsfolk persuade them thereto, and this in order that such a fine custom should not be broken and fall into oblivion."—Summario de Genii, in Ramusio, i. f. 329.

C. 1586.—"In this country of Camboja . . . when the King dies, the lords voluntarily bathe with him, and so do the King's wives at the same time, and so also do other women on the death of their husbands."—Ibid. f. 386.

1522.—"They told us that in Java Major it was the custom, when one of the chief men died, to burn his body; and then his principal wife, adorned with garlands of flowers, has herself carried in a chair by four men. . . . comforting her relations, who are afflicted because she is going to burn herself with the corpse of her husband . . . saying to them, 'I am going this evening to sup with my dear husband and to sleep with him this night.' . . . After again consoling them (she) casts herself into the fire and is burned. If she did not do this she would not be looked upon as an honest woman, nor as a faithful wife.

C. 1586.—Cesare Federici notices the rite as peculiar to the Kingdom of Benares (see BIBNAGAR): 'vidi cose strane e bestiali di quella gentilità; vanno primamente abbruscire i corpi morti con d'huomini come di donne nobili; e se l'huomo è maritato, la moglie è obbligata ad abbrucirsi vivi col corpo del marito.'
—Orig. ed. p. 36. This traveller gives a good account of a Suttee.

1588.—"In the interior of Hindustan it is the custom when a husband dies, for his widow willingly and cheerfully to cast herself into the flames (of the funeral pile), although she may have been appointed in every city and district, who were to watch carefully over these two cases, to discriminate between them, and to prevent any woman being forcibly burnt."—Abul Fazl, Akbar Namah, in Elliot, vi. 99.

1588.—"Among other sights I saw one I may note as wonderful. When I landed (at Negapatam) from the vessel, I saw a pit full of kindled charcoal; and at that moment a young and beautiful woman was brought by her people on a litter, with a great company of other women, friends of hers, with great festivity, she holding a mirror in her left hand, and a lemon in her right hand. . . ."—and so forth.—G. Babbi, f. 82r. 83.

1588.—"The custom of the country (Java) is, that whencesoever the King doeth die, they take the body so dead and burn it, and preserve the ashes of him, and within five days next after, the issue of the said King so dead, according to the custom and use of their country, every one of them goe together to a place appointed, and the chiefe of the women which was nearest to him in accompt, hath a ball in her hand, and throweth it from her, and the place where the ball resteth, thither they goe all, and turn their faces to the south, every one with a dagger in their hand (which dagger they call a crixe (see CREASE), and as sharpe as a razor), stab themselves in their owne blood, and fall a-grouelling on their faces, and so end their dayes."—T. Candish, in Halk. iv. 388. This passage refers to Blambangan at the east end of Java, which till a late date was subject to Bali, in which such practices have continued to our day. It seems probable that the Hindu rite here came in contact with the old Polynesian practices of a like kind, which prevailed e.g. in Fiji, quite recently. The narrative referred to below under 1833, where the victims were the slaves of a deceased queen, points to the latter origin. W. Humboldt thus alludes to similar passages in old Javanese literature: "Thus may we reckon as one of the finest episodes in the Brata Yuda, the story how Satya Wati, when she had sought out her slain husband among the wide-spread heap of corpses on the battlefield, stabs herself by his side with a dagger."—Kawi-Sprache, i. 89 (and see the whole section, pp. 97-105).
SUTTEE. 881 SUTTEE.

[c. 1590.—"When he (the Rajah of Asham) dies, his principal attendants of both sexes voluntarily bury themselves alive in his grave."—Asa, ed. Darrett, ii. 118.]

1598.—The usual account is given by Linckelh, ch. xxxvi., with a plate; [Hak. Soc. i. 249].

[c. 1610.—See an account in Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 394.]

1611.—"When I was in India, on the death of the Naique (see NAIEK) of Madure, a countrywoman opposed that of Choromandel, 400 wives led his burned themselves along with him."—Teixira, i. 9.

1620.—"The author . . . when in the territory of the Karnatik . . . arrived with company with his father at the city of Southern Mathura (Madurs), where, after a few days, the ruler died and went to hell. The chief had 700 wives, and they all threw themselves at the same time into the fire."

Muhammad Sharif Hanafi, in Elliot, vii. 139.

1623.—"When I asked further if force was ever used in these cases, they told me that usually it was not among persons of quality, when one had left a young and handsome widow, and there was a risk either of her desiring to marry again (which they consider a great scandal) or of a worse misuse. In such cases the relations of her husband, if they were very strict, would compel her, even against her will, to burn . . . a barbarous and cruel law indeed! But in short, as regarded Giacamma, no one exercised either compulsion or persuasion; and she did the thing of her own free choice; both her kindred and herself exulting in it, as in an act magnificent (which in sooth it was) and held in high honour among them. And when I asked about the ornaments and flowers that she wore, they told me this was customary as a sign of the joyousness of the MASTI. (MASTI is what they call a woman who gives herself up to be burnt upon her husband).”—P. della Valle, ii. 471; [Hak. Soc. ii. 275, and see ii. 296 seq.].

1633.—"The same day, about noon, the queen's body was burnt without the city, with two and twenty of her female slaves; and we consider ourselves bound to render an exact account of the barbarous ceremonies practised in this place on such occasions as we were witness to . . . ."—Narrative of a Dutch Mission to Bali, quoted by Craswold, H. of Ind. Arch., ii. 244-283, from Precoc. It is very interesting, but too long for extract.

1650.—"They say that when a woman becomes a SUTTEE, that is burns herself with the deceased, the Almighty pardons all the sins committed by the wife and husband and that they remain a long time in paradise; nay if the husband were in the infernal regions, the wife by this means draws him thence and takes him to paradise. . . . Moreover the SUTTEE, in a future birth, returns not to the female sex . . . but she who becomes not a SUTTEE, and passes her life in widowhood, is never emancipated from the female state . . . . It is however criminal to force a woman into the fire, and equally to prevent her who voluntarily devotes herself."—Daboist, ii. 75-76.

1650-60.—Tavernier gives a full account of the different manners of SUTTEE, which he had witnessed often, and in various parts of India, but does not use the word. We extract the following:

1648.—". . . there fell of a sudden so violent a Shower, that the Priests, willing to get out of the Rain, thrust the Woman all along into the Fire. But the Shower was so vehement, and endured so long, that the Fire was quench'd, and the Woman was not burn'd. About midnight she arose, and went and knock'd at one of her Kinsman's Houses, where were many Hollander saw her, looking so gaily and grimly, that it was enough to have scared them; however the pain she endured did not so far terrify her, but that three days after, accompany'd by her Kindred, she went and was burn'd according to her first intention."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 84; [ed. Ball, i. 219].

Again:

"In most places upon the Coast of Coromandel, the Women are not burnt with their deceased Husbands, but they are buried alive with them in holes, where the Bramins make a foot deeper than the tallness of the man and woman. Usually they choose a Sandy place; so that when the man and woman are both let down together, all the Company with Basketts of Sand fill up the hole above half a foot higher than the surface of the ground, after which they jump and dance upon it, till they believe the woman to be stif't."—Ibid. 171; [ed. Ball, ii. 216].

1667.—Bernier also has several highly interesting pages on this subject, in his "Letter written to M. Chapelan, sent from Chiraz in Persia." We extract a few sentences: "Concerning the Women that have actually burn'd themselves, I have so often been present at such dreadful spectacles, that at length I could endure no more to see it, and I retain still some horror when I think on't. The Pile of Wood was presently all on fire, because store of Oyl and Butter had been thrown upon it, and I saw at the time through the Flames that the Fire took hold of the Cloaths of the Woman . . . . All this I saw, but observ'd not that the Woman was at all disturb'd; yes it was said, that she had been heard to pronounce with great force these two words, Fire, Twice, to signify, according to the Opinion of those who hold the Souls Transmigration, that this was the 5th time she had burnt herself with the same Husband, and that there remain'd but two times for perfection; as if she had at that time this Remembrance, or some prophetical Spirit."—E.T. p. 99; [ed. Constable, 303 seq.].
1677.—Suttee, described by A. Basset, in "Valentijn v. (Ceylon) 300.

1727.—"I have seen several burned several Ways..." I heard a Story of a Lady that had received Addresses from a Gentleman who afterwards deserted her, and her Relations died shortly after the Marriage... and as the Fire was well kindled... she espied her former Admirer, and beckoned him to come to her. When he came, she took him in her Arms, as if she had a Mind to embrace him; but being stronger than he, she carried him into the Flames in her Arms, where they were both consumed with the Corpse of her Husband."—A. Hamilton, i. 278; [ed. 1744, i. 280].

"The Country about (Calcutta) being overspread with Paganism, the Custom of Wives burning themselves with their deceased Husbands, is also practised here. Before the Mogul's War, Mr. Channock went one time with his Ordinary Guard of Soldiers, to see a young Widow act that tragic Catastrophe, but he was so smitten with the Widow's Beauty, that he sent his Guards to take her by Force from her Executors, and conducted her to his own Lodgings. They lived lovingly many Years, and had several Children; at length she died, after he had settled in Calcutta, but instead of converting her to Christianity, she made him a Froslyte to Paganism, and the only part of Christianity that was remarkable in him, was burying her decently, and he built a Tomb over her, where all his Life after her Death, he kept the anniversary Day of her Death by sacrificing a Cock on her Tomb, after the Pagan Manner." —Ibid. [ed. 1744], ii. 6-7. [With this compare the curious lines described as an Epitaph on "Joseph Townsend, Pilot of the Ganges" (6 ser. Notes & Queries, i. 466 seq.)]

1774.—"Here (in Bali) not only women, often kill themselves, or burn with their deceased Husbands, but men also burn in honour of their deceased masters."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 170.

1787.—"Soon after I and my conductor had quitted the house, we were informed the suttee (for that is the name given to the person who so devotes herself) had passed..."—Sir C. Macle, in Partly Papers of 1821, p. 1 ("Hindoo Widows ").

"..."My Father, said he (Pundit Rhadacaut), died at the age of one hundred years, and my mother, who was eighty years old, became a nun, and burned herself to expiate sins."—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Life, ii. 120.

1792.—"In the course of my endeavours I found the poor suttee had no relations at Poonah."—Letter from Sir C. Macle, in Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 394; [2nd ed. i. 28, and see i. 178, in which the previous passage is quoted].

1808.—"These proceedings (Hindu marriage ceremonies in Guzerat) take place in the presence of a Brahmin... And farther, now the young woman vows that her affections shall be fixed upon her Lord alone, not only in all this life, but will follow in death, or to the next, that she will die, that she may burn with him, through as many transmigrations as shall secure their joint immortal bliss. Seven successions of suttees (a woman seven times born and burning, thus, as often) secure to the loving couple a seat among the gods."—R. Drummond.

1809.—
"O sight of misery!
You cannot hear her cries... their sound in that wild dissonance is drowned;...
But in her face you see
The supplication and the agony...
See in her swelling throat the desperate strength
That with vain effort struggles yet for life;
Her arms contracted now in fruitless strife,
Now wildly at full length,
Towards the crowd in vain for pity spread,...
They force her on, they bind her to the dead."—Kohama, i. 12.

In all the poem and its copious notes, the word suttee does not occur.

[1815.—"In reference to this mark of strong attachment (of Sati for Siva), a Hindoo widow burning with her husband on the funeral pile is called suttee."—Ward, Hindoos, 2nd ed. ii. 25.]

1828.—"After having bathed in the river, the widow lighted a brand, walked round the pile, set it on fire, and then mounted cheerfully: the flame caught and blazed up instantly; she sat down, placing the head of the corpse on her lap, and repeated several times the usual form, "Ram, Ram, Suttee; Ram, Ram, Suttee."—"Wanderings of a Pilgrim," i. 91-92.

1829.—"Regulation XVII.
"A Regulation for declaring the practice of Suttee, or of burning or burying alive the widows of Hindoes, illegal, and punishable by the Criminal Courts."—Passed by the G.-G. in C., Dec. 4.

1839.—"Have you yet heard in England of the horrors that took place at the funeral of that wretched old Runjest Singh? Four wives, and seven slave-girls were burnt with him; not a word of remonstrance from the British Government."—Letters from Madras, 278.

1843.—"It is lamentable to think how long after our power was firmly established in Bengal, we, grossly neglecting the first and plainest duty of the civil magistrate, suffered the practices of infanticide and suttee to continue unchecked."—Macaulay's Speech on Gates of Somnauth.
1872.—"La coutume du suicide de la Satî n’en est pas moins fort ancienne, puisque déjà les Grecs d’Alexandria la trouveront en usage chez un peuple au moins du Penjâb. Le premier témoignage brahmanique qu’on en trouve est celui que le Cens, le Brikaddevâlî qui, peut-être, remonte tout aussi haut. A l’origine elle parait avoir été propre à l’aristocratie militaire."—Cornhill Mag. vol. xxiv. 675.

1873.—"I have been told by several Suggestees that they sail in their Paduakans to the northern parts of New Holland... to gather Swallow (Biche de Mer), which they sell to the annual China junk at Macassar."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 83.

SWALLOW, SWALLOE, s. The old trade-name of the sea-slug, or tripang (q.v.). It is a corruption of the Bugi (Makassar) name of the creature, swalâl (see Crawford’s Malay Dict.; [Scott, Malayans Words, 107]).

1874.—"The gold might for us as well have been worshipped in the shape of a Swamy at Juggernaut."—The Indian Observer, p. 167.

SWALLY, SWALLY ROADS, SWALLY MARINE, SWALLY HOLE, n.p. Swalâl, the once familiar name of the roadstead north of the mouth of the Tapti, where ships for Surat usually anchored, and discharged or took in cargo. It was perhaps Ar. swalâlî, ‘the shores’ (?). [Others suggest Skt. śvīdâlās, ‘abode of Siva.’]

SWAMY, SAMMY, s. This word is a corruption of Skt. sudhâmin, ‘Lord.’ It is especially used in S. India, in two senses: (a) a Hindu idol, especially applied to those of Siva or Subramaniam; especially, as Sammy, in the dialect of the British soldier. This comes from the usual Tamil pronunciation adî. (b) The Skt. word is used by Hindus as a term of respectful address, especially to Brahmins.

1875.—"The Franks have houses there for the goods which they continually despatch for embarkation."—P. della Valle, ii. 668.

1876.—"As also passing by... eight ships riding at Surat River’s Mouth, we then came to Swally Marine, where were flying the Colours of the Three Nations, English, French, and Dutch... who here land and ship off all Goods, without molestation."—Fryer, 82.

1877.—"The 22d of February 1671, from Swally hole the Ship was despatched alone."—Ibid. 217.

1890.—"In a little time we happily arrived at Swallybar, and the Tide serving, came to an Anchor very near the Shore."—Ovington, 163.

1878.—"One season the English had eight good large Ships riding at Swally... the Place where all Goods were unloaded from the Shipping, and all Goods for Exportation were there ship’d off."—A. Hamilton, i. 163; [ed. 1744].

1881.—"These are sometimes called the inner and outer sands of Swallow, and are both dry at low water."—Horsburgh’s India Directory, ed. 1841, i. 474.

SWAMY-HOUSE, s. An idol-temple, or pagoda. The Sammy-house of the Delhi ridge in 1857 will not soon be forgotten.

1780.—"The French cavalry were advancing before their infantry; and it was the intention of Colliaud that his own should wait until they came in a line with the flank-fire of the field-pieces of the Sammy-house."—Orme, iii. 443.

1829.—"Here too was a little detached Swamie-house (or chapel) with a lamp burning before a little idol."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 99.

1857.—"We met Wilby at the advanced post, the 'Sammy House,' within 600 yards of the Bastion. It was a curious place for three brothers to meet in. The view was charming. Delhi is as green as an emerald just now, and the Jumma Musjid and Palace are beautiful objects, though held by infidels."—Letters written during the Siege of Delhi, by Hervey Grewall, p. 112.

[SWAMY JEWELRY, s. A kind of gold and silver jewelry, made chiefly at Trichinopoly, in European shapes covered with grotesque mythological figures.

[1880. — "In the characteristic Swami work of the Madras Presidency the ornamentation consists of figures of the Puranic gods in high relief, either beaten out from the surface, or affixed to it, whether by soldering, or wedging, or screwing them on."—Birdwood, Industr. Arts, 122.]

SWAMY-PAGODA. s. A coin formerly current at Madras; probably so called from the figure of an idol on it. Milburn gives 100 Swamy Pagodas = 110 Star Pagodas. A "three swámi pagoda" was a name given to a gold coin bearing on the obverse the effigy of Chenna Keswam Swámi (a title of Krishna) and on the reverse Lakshimi and Rukmini (C.P.B.).

SWATCH, s. This is a marine term which probably has various applications beyond Indian limits. But the only two instances of its application are both Indian, viz. "the Swatch of No Ground," or elliptically "The Swatch," marked in all the charts just off the Ganges Delta, and a space bearing the same name, and probably produced by analogous tidal action, off the Indus Delta. [The word is not to be found in Smyth, Sailor's Word-book.]

not indigenous among them. And in fact when we turn to Oviedo, we find the following distinct statement:

"Batatas are a staple food of the Indians, both in the Island of Spagnuola and in the others... and a ripe Batata properly dressed is just as good as a marchpane twist of sugar and almonds, and better indeed. ... When Batatas are well ripened, they are often carried to Spain, i.e., if the voyage be a quiet one, for if there be delay they get spoilt at sea. I myself have carried them from this city of S. Domingo to the city of Avila in Spain, and although they did not arrive as good as they should be, yet they were thought a great deal of, and reckoned a singular and precious kind of fruit."—In Ramusio, iii. f. 134.

It must be observed however that several distinct varieties are cultivated by the Pacific islanders even as far west as New Zealand. And Dr. Bretschneider is satisfied that the plant is described in Chinese books of the 3rd or 4th century, under the name of Kan-chu (the first syllable =‘sweet’). See B. on Chin. Botan. Words, p. 13. This is the only good argument we have seen for Asiatic origin. The whole matter is carefully dealt with by M. Alph. De Candolle (Origine des Plantes cultivées, pp. 43-49), concluding with the judgment: "Les motifs sont beaucoup plus forts, ce me semble, en faveur de l’origine américaine."

The "Sanskrit name" Ruktaloo, alleged by Mr. Piddington, is worthless. Alū is properly an esculent Arum, but in modern use is the name of the common potato, and is sometimes used for the sweet potato. Raktalū, more commonly rat-dālū, is in Bengal the usual name of the Yam, no doubt given first to a highly-coloured kind, such as Dioscorea purpurea, for rakt- or rat-dāl means simply ‘red potato’: a name which might also be well applied to the batatas, as it is indeed, according to Forbes Watson, in the Deccan. There can be little doubt that this vegetable, or fruit as Oviedo calls it, having become known in Europe many years before the potato, the latter robbed it of its name, as has happened in the case of brazil-wood (q.v.). The batata is clearly the ‘potato’ of the fourth and others of the following quotations. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 117 seqq.]

1519.—"At this place (in Brazil) we had refreshment of victuals, like fowls and meat of calves, also a variety of fruits, called batata, pigne (pine-apples), sweet, of singular goodness."—Pigafetta, E.T. by Lord Stanley of A., p. 43.

1540.—"The root which among the Indians of Spagnuola Island is called Batata, the negroes of St. Thomé (C. Verde group) called Ignane, and they plant it as the chief staple of their maintenance; it is of a black colour, i.e. the outer skin is so, but inside it is white, and as big as a large turnip, with many branchlets; it has the taste of a chestnut, but much better."—Voyage to the I. of St. Thomé under the Equinocital, Ramosuro, i. 117v.

c. 1550.—"They have two other sorts of roots, one called batata... They generate windiness, and are commonly cooked in the embers. Some say they taste like almond cakes, or sugared chestnuts; but in my opinion chestnuts, even without sugar, are better."—Gicrol. Benzoni, Hak. Soc. 86.

1588.—"Wee met with sixe or seventeene sayles of Canoes full of Sauages, who came off to Sea unto vs, and brought with them in their Boates, Plantans, Cocos, Potato-roots, and fresh fish."—Voyage of Master Thomas Candolle, Purchas, i. 65.

1600.—"The Batatas are somewhat redder of colour, and in forme almost like Iniamas (see YAM), and taste like Earth-nuts."—In Purchas, ii. 967.

1615.—"I took a garden this day, and planted it with Potatos brought from the Liques, a thing not yet planted in Japan. I must pay a tax, or 5 shillings sterling, per annum for the garden."—Cocks’s Diary, i. 11.

1645.—"... pattato; c’est une racine comme nœueux, mais plus longue et de couleur rouge et jaune: cela est de tresbon goût, mais si l’on en mange beaucoup, elle degoute fort, et est assez ventueuse."—Mocquet, Voyages, 83.

1764.—"There let Potatoes mantle o’er the ground, Sweet as the cane-juice is the root they bear."—Grainger, Bk. iv.

SYCE, s. Hind. from Ar. sdīs. A groom. It is the word in universal use in the Bengal Presidency. In the South horse-keeper is more common, and in Bombay a vernacular form of the latter, viz. ghordīwāl (see GORA-WALLAH). The Ar. verb, of which sdīs is the participle, seems to be a loan-word from Syriac, saus, ‘to coax.’

[1759.—In list of servants’ wages: "Syce, Rs. 2."—In Long, 182.]

1779.—"The bearer and soffe, when they returned, came to the place where I was, and laid hold of Mr. Ducarel. I took hold of Mr. Shie and carried him up. The bearer and soffe took Mr. Ducarel out. Mr. Keable was standing on his own house looking, and asked, ‘What is the matter?’
The bearer and seise said to Mr. Keeble, "These gentlemen came into the house when my master was out."—Evidence on Trial of Grand v. Francis, in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 230.

1810.—"The Syce, or groom, attends but one horse."—Williamson, V.M. i. 254.

1806.—"Philip de Brito issued an order that a custom-house should be planted at Serian (Serito), at which duties should be paid by all the vessels of this State which went to trade with the kingdom of Pegu, and with the ports of Martaban, Tavoy, Tenasserim, and Juncalon. . . . Now certain merchants and shipowners from the Coast of Coromandel refused obedience, and this led Philip de Brito to send a squadron of 6 ships and galliots with an imposing and excellent force of soldiers on board, that they might cruise on the coast of Tenasserim, and compel all the vessels that they met to come and pay duty at the fortress of Serian."—Bocarro, 185.

SYCER, s. In China applied to pure silver bullion in ingots, or shoes (q.v.). The origin of the name is said to be $x$ (pron. at Canton sai and sei)= sy, i.e. "fine silk"; and we are told by Mr. Giles that it is so called because, if pure, it may be drawn out into fine threads. [Linschoten (1598) speaks of: "Pieces of cut silver, in which sort they pay and receive all their money" (Hak. Soc. i. 132).]

1711.—"Formerly they used to sell for Sises, or Silver full fine; but of late the Method is alter'd."—Lockyer, 135.

SYRAS, CYRUS. See under CYRUS.

SYRIAM, n.p. A place on the Peguon R., near its confluence with the Rangoon R., six miles E. of Rangoon, and very famous in the Portuguese dealings with Pegu. The Burmese form is Than-tyeng, but probably the Talain name was nearer that which foreigners give it. [See Burma Gazetteer, ii. 672. Mr. St John (J. R. As. Soc., 1894, p. 151) suggests the Mwn word strang or string, "a swinging cradle."] Syriam was the site of an English factory in the 17th century, of the history of which little is known. See the quotation from Dalrymple below.

1587.—"To Cirion a Port of Pegu come ships from Mecca with woolen Cloth, Scarlets, Veltets, Opium, and such like."—R. Fitch, in Habi. ii. 393.

1600.—"I went thither with Philip Brito, and in fifteene dayes arrived at Sirian the chiefe Port in Pegu. It is a lamentable spectacle to see the bankes of the Riuers set with infinite fruit-bearing trees, now over-welmed with ruines of gilded Temples, and noble edifices; the wayes and fields full of skulls and bones of wretched Peguans, killed or famished, and cast into the River in such numbers that the multitude of carcasses prohibiteth the way and passage of ships."—The Jesuit Andrew Bore, in Purchas ii. 1748.

SYUD, s. Ar. saiyyid, 'a lord.' The designation in India of those who claim to be descendants of Mahommed. But the usage of Saiyyid and Sharif varies in different parts of Mahommedan Asia. ["As a rule (much disputed) the Sayyid is a descendant from Mahommed through his grand-child Hasan, and is a man of the pen; whereas the Sharif derives from Husayn and is a man of the sword" (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 209).]

1404.—"On this day the Lord played at chess, for a great while, with certain Zaytes; and Zaytes they call certain men who come of the lineage of Mahommed."—Clarija, § 4xv. (Markham, p. 141-2).

1869.—"Il y a dans l'Inde quatre classes de musulmans: les Saiyids ou descendants de Mahomet par Huçain, les Sikhâhs ou Arabes, nommés vulgairement Maures, les Pathans ou Afgans, et les Mogols. Ces quatre classes ont chacune fourni à la religion de saints personnages, qui sont souvent désignés par ces dénominations, et par d'autres spécialement consacrés à la couronne de Mîr pour les Saiyids, Kâhs pour les Pathans, Mîr-A, Beg, Agh, et Kârds pour les Mogols."—Garci de Tavay, Religion Mus. dans l'Inde, 22.
TABASHEER, a. "Sugar of Bamboo." A siliceous substance sometimes found in the joints of the bamboo, formerly prized as medicine, [also known in India as Bānsalochar or Bānskāpār]. The word is Pers. tabāshir, but that is from the Skt. name of the article, tvakhāshīra, and tvakhāshīra. The substance is often confounded, in name at least, by the old Materia Medica writers, with spōdium and is sometimes called tepōdio di canna. See Ces. Federici below. Garcia De Orta goes at length into this subject (f. 193 seqq.). [See SUGAR.]

c. 1150. — "Thanah (miswritten Bunah) est une jolie ville située sur un grand golfe. . . . Dans les montagnes environnantes croissent le . . . kana et le . . . tabāshīr . . . Quand au tabāshīr, on le fait liser en le mêlant avec de la cendre d'ivoire; mais le véritable est celui qu'on extrait des racines du roseau dit . . . al Shariki." — Edinr, i. 179.

c. 1583. — "And much less are the roots of the cane tabāshīr; so that according to both the translations Arion is wrong; and Averrois says it that is charcoal from burning the canes of India, whence it appears that he never saw it, since he calls such a white substance charcoal." — Garcia, f. 185a.

c. 1578. — "The Spōdium or Tabāsīr of the Persians . . . was not known to the Greeks." — Accts, 285.

1588. — " . . . these Mambus have a certain Matter within them, which is as much as to say, as Sugar of Mambu, and is a very deep Medicinable thing much esteemed, and much sought for by the Arabian, Persians, and Moors, that call it Tabāshīr." — Lin- schoten, p. 104; [Hak. Soc. ii. 56].

1837. — "Allied to these in a botanical point of view is Saccharum officinarum, which has needlessly been supposed not to have yielded saccharum, or the substance known by this name to the ancients; the same authors conjecturing this to be Tabasheer . . . Considering that this substance is pureicism, it is not likely to have been arranged with the honeys and described under the head of τινι ξαγχανοα μελισσων." — Royle on the Ant. of Hindoo Medicine, p. 83. This confirms the views expressed in the article SUGAR.

1854. — "In the cavity of these cylinders water is sometimes secreted, or, less commonly, an opaque white substance, becoming opaline when wetted, consisting of a flinty secretion, of which the plant divests itself, called Tabasheer, concerning the optical properties of which Sir David Brewster has made some curious discoveries." — Engl. Cyc. Nat. Hist. Section, article Bamboo.

TABBY, s. Not Anglo-Indian. A kind of watered silk stuff; Sp. and Port. tabi, Ital. tabino, Fr. tabis, from Ar. 'attabī, the name said to have been given to such stuffs from their being manufactured in early times in a quarter of Baghdad called al-'attabīya; and this derived its name from a prince of the 'Omaysi family called Attāb. [See Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 371.]

12th cent. — "The 'Attabīya . . . here are made the stuffs, called 'Attābīya, which are silks and cottons of divers colours." — Ibn Jabair, p. 227.

[c. 1220. — "Attabi." See under SU- LAT.]

TABOOT, s. The name applied in India to a kind of shrine, or model of a Mahomedan mausoleum, of flimsy material, intended to represent the tomb of Husain at Kerbela, which is carried in procession during the Moharram (see Herkottis, 2nd ed. 119 seqq., and Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Musulm. dans l'Inde, 36). [The word is Ar. tabūd, 'a wooden box, coffin.' The term used in N. India is ta'zīya (see TAZEEA).]

1856. — "There is generally over the vault in which the corpse is deposited an oblong monument of stone or brick (called 'tarkkebeh') or wood (in which case it is called taboot')." — Lane, Mod. Egypt., 5th ed. i. 298.

TACK-RAVAN, s. A litter carried on men's shoulders, used only by royal personages. It is Pers. takhi-ravan, 'travelling-throne.' In the Hindi of Behar the word is corrupted into tartarwan.

[平安 1690.—"... several articles of Chinese and Japan workmanship; among which were a processy and a taunt ravan, or travelling throne, of exquisite beauty, and much admired."—Barnier, ed. Constable, 128; in 370, taunt ravan.

[1758.—"Mohammed Shah, emperor of Hindostan, seated in a royal litter (tahk ravan, which signifies a moving throne) issued from his camp. ..."—Harvey, iv. 168.]

TAEL, s. This is the trade-name of the Chinese ounce, viz., ½ of a catty (q.v.); and also of the Chinese money of account, often called "the ounce of silver," but in Chinese called liang. The standard liang or tael is, according to Dr. Wells Williams,=579.84 grs. troy. It was formerly equivalent to a string of 1000 tim, or (according to the trade-name) cash (q.v.). The China tael used to be reckoned as worth 6s. 8d., but the rate really varied with the price of silver. In 1879 an article in the Fortnightly Review put it at 5s. 7½d. (Sept. p. 369); the exchange at Shanghai in London by telegraphic transfer, April 13, 1885, was 4s. 9½d.; [on Oct. 3, 1901, 2s. 7½d.]. The word was apparently got from the Malays, among whom tail or tahil is the name of a weight; and this again, as Crawford indicates, is probably from the India tola (q.v.). [Mr. Pringle writes: "Sir H. Yule does not refer to such forms as tahle (see below), tales (plural in Fryer's New Account, p. 210, sub Machanw), Taye (see quotation below from Saris), tayes (see quotation below from Moquet), or tasey, and taeys (Philip's translation of Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 149). These probably come through the medium of the Portuguese, in which the final l of the singular tael is changed into s in the plural. Such a form as taes might easily suggest a singular wanting the final s, and from such a singular French and English plurals of the ordinary type would in turn be fashioned." (Diary F. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 126.).] The Chinese scale of weight, with their trade-names, runs: 16 taels=1 catty, 100 catties=1 pecul=133¼ lbs. avoird. Milburn gives the weights of Achin as 4 copangs (see Kopang)=1 mace, 5 mace=1 mayam, 16 mayam=

1 tael (see TAEL), 5 tales=1 buncal, 20 buncals=1 catty, 200 catties=1 bahar; and the catty of Achin as=2 lbs. 1 oz. 13 dr. Of these names, mace, tale and bahar (qq.v.) seem to be of Indian origin, mayam, bangkal, and kats Malayan.

1540. — "And those three junkes which were then taken, according to the assertion of those who were aboard, had contained in silver alone 200,000 taels (taeis), which are in our money 300,000 cruzados, besides much else of value with which they were freighted."—Pinto, cap. xxxv.

1598. — "A Tael is a full ounce and a half Portingale weight."—Linschoten, 44; [Hak. Soc. i. 149].

1599. — "Est et ponderis genus, quod Tael vocant in Malacca. Tael unum in Malacca pendet 16 massas."—De Bry, ii. 64.

"... Four hundred coppers make a coupang (see KOBANG). Four coupang are one mai. Four massas make a Perdaw (see PARDAO). Four Perdaws make a Tael."—Capt. T. Davis, in Purchas, i. 123.

c. 1608. — "Bezar stones are thus bought by the Tale ... which is one Ounce, and the third part English."—Siris, in do., 392.

1613. — "A Taye is five shillinge sterling."—Siris, in do. 389.

1643. — "Les Portugais sont fort desirous de ces Chinois pour esclaves ... il y a des Chinois faicts a ce mestier ... quand ils voyent quelque beau petit garçon ou fille ... les enleuent par force et les cachent ... puis viennent sur la rive de la mer, ou ils açoient que sont les trafiquans à qui ils les vendent 12 et 15 sous chacun, qui est environ 25 escus."—Moquet, 342.

c. 1656.—"Vn Religieux Chinois qui a esté surpris avec des femmes de debauche ... l'on a perçu le col avec vn fer chaud; à ce fer est attaché vne chaîne de fer d'environ dix brasses qu'il est obligé de traiiner jusques à ce qu'il ait apporté au Courant trente theys d'argent qu'il faut qu'il amasse en demandant l'amonisme."—In Theroenot, Divers Voyages, ii. 67.

TAHSEELDAR, s. The chief (native) revenue officer of a subdivision (taheel, conf. Pergunnah, Talook) of a district (see ZILLAH). Hind. from Pers. tahsiddr, and, that from Ar. tahsil, 'collection.' This is a term of the Mahommedan administration which we have adopted. It appears by the quotation from Williamson that the term was formerly employed in Calcutta to designate the cash-keeper in a firm or private establishment, but this use is long obsolete.
TAILOR-BIRD, s. This bird is so called from the fact that it is in the habit of drawing together "one leaf or more, generally two leaves, on each side of the nest, and stitches them together with cotton, either woven by itself, or cotton thread picked up; and after putting the thread through the leaf, it makes a knot at the end to fix it." (Jerdon.) It is Orthotomos longicauda, Gmelin (sub-fam. Drymocinacea).

[1813.—"Equally curious in the structure of its nest, and far superior to the bayna in the variety and elegance of its plumage, is the tailor-bird of Hindostan." (Here follows a description of its nest.)—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed. i. 33.]

1883.—"Clear and loud above all... sounds the to-wheel, to-wheel, to-wheel of the tailor-bird, a most plain-looking little greenish thing, but a skilful workman and a very Beaconsfield in the matter of keeping its own counsel. Aided by its industrious spouse, it will, when the monsoon comes on, spin cotton, or steal thread from the durree, and sew together two broad leaves of the laurel in the pot on your very doorstep, and when it has warmly lined the bag so formed it will bring up therein a large family of little tailors."—Tribes on My Frontier, 145.

TALAIING, n.p. The name by which the chief race inhabiting Pegu (or the Delta of the Irawadi) is known to the Burmese. The Talaiings were long the rivals of the Burmese, alternately conquering and conquered, but the Burmese have, on the whole, so long predominated, even in the Delta, that the use of the Talaiing language is now nearly extinct in Pegu proper, though it is still spoken in Martaban, and among the descendants of emigrants into Siamese territory. We have adopted the name from the Burmese to designate the race, but their own name for their people is Môn or Mûn (see MONE).

Sir Arthur Phayre has regarded the name Talaiing as almost undoubtedly a form of Telinga. The reasons given 1663.—"I shall not stay to discourse of the Monument of Etbar, because whatever beauty is there, is found in a far higher degree in that of Taj Mahal, which I am now going to describe to you... judge whether I had reason to say that the Mausoleum, or Tomb of Taj-Mahal, is something worthy to be admired. For my part I do not yet well know, whether I am somewhat infected still with Hindustan; but I must needs say, that I believe it ought to be reckoned amongst the Wonders of the World..."—Berner, E.T. 94-96; [ed. Constable, 298].

1665.—"All of the Monuments that are to be seen at Agra, that of the Wife of Chah,Jahan is the most magnificent: she caus'd it to be set up on purpose near the Turi-macan, to which all strangers must come, that they should admire it. The Turmacan [Taj-i-mulka, 'Place of the Taj'] is a great Bazar, or Market-place, comprised of six great courts, all encompass'd with Portico's; under which there are Warehouses for Merchants. The monument of this Begum or Sultaness, stands on the East side of the City... I saw the beginning and completion of this great work, that cost two and twenty years labour, and 20,000 men always at work."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 50; [ed. Bail, i. 109].

1856.—"But far beyond compare, the glorious Taj, seen from old Agra's towering battlements, and mirrored clear in Jumna's silent stream; Sun-lighted, like a pearly diadem set royal on the melancholy brow Of withered Hindostan; but, when the moon Dims the white marble with a softer light, Like some queenéd maiden, veiled in dainty lace, And waiting for her bridegroom, stately, pale, But yet transcendent in her loveliness."—The Banyan Tree.
are plausible, and may be briefly stated in two extracts from his Essay given in the histories of Thahtun and Pegu to the first Kings of those cities are Indian; but they cannot be accepted as historically true. The countries from which the Kings are said to have derived their origin . . .
may be recognised as Karnā, Kalinga, Venga and Vizianagaram . . . probably mistaken for the more famous Vijayanagar. . . . The word Talingāna never occurs in the Peguan histories, but only the more ancient name Kalinga" (op. cit. pp. 32-33). "The early settlement of a colony or city for trade, on the coast of Rāmānya by settlers from Talingana, satisfactorily accounts for the name Talaing, by which the people of Pegu are known to the Burmees and all peoples of the west. But the Peguans call themselves by a different name . . . Mun, Mun, or Mon" (ibid. p. 34).

Prof. Forchhammer, however, who has lately devoted much labour to the study of Talaing archaeology and literature, entirely rejects this view.
He states that prior to the time of Alompra's conquest of Pegu (middle of 18th century) the name Talaing was entirely unknown as an appellation of the Muns, and that it nowhere occurs in either inscriptions or older palm-leaves, and that by all nations of Further India the people in question is known by names related to either Mun or Pegu. He goes on: "The word 'Talaing' is the term by which the Muns acknowledged their total defeat, their being vanquished and the slaves of their Burmese conqueror.
They were no longer to bear the name of Muns or Peguans. Alompra stigmatized them with an appellation suggestive at once of their submission and disgrace. Talaing means" (in the Mun language) "'one who is trodden under foot, a slave.' . . . Alompra could not have devised more effective means to extirpate the national consciousness of a people than by burning their books, forbidding the use of their language, and by substittuting a term of abject reproach for the name under which they had maintained themselves for nearly 2000 years in the marine provinces of Burma. The similarity of the two words 'Talaing' and 'Telingana' is purely accidental; and all deductions, historical or etymological . . . from the resemblance . . . must necessarily be void ab initio" (Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma, Pt. ii. pp.

11-12, Rangoon, 1884).

Here we leave the question. It is not clear whether Prof. F. gives the story of Alompra as a historical fact, or as a probable explanation founded on the etymology. Till this be clear we cannot say that we are altogether satisfied. But the fact that we have been unable to find any occurrence of Talaing earlier than Symes's narrative is in favour of his view.

Of the relics of Talaing literature almost nothing is known. Much is to be hoped from the studies of Prof.
Forchhammer himself.

There are linguistic reasons for connecting the Talaing or Mun people with the so-called Kolarian tribes of the interior of India, but the point is not yet a settled one. [Mr. Baines notes coincidences between the Mon and Munda languages, and accepts the connection of Talaing with Telinga (Census Report, 1891, i. p. 198.)]

1795.—"The present King of the Birmans . . . has abrogated some severe penal laws imposed by his predecessors on the Talaing, or native Peguans. Justice is now imper-tially distributed, and the only distinction at present between a Birman and a Talaing consists in the exclusion of the latter from places of public trust and power."—Symes, 183.

TALAPOIN, a. A word used by the Portuguese, and after them by French and other Continental writers, as well as by some English travellers of the 17th century, to designate the Buddhist monks of Ceylon and the Indo-Chinese countries. The origin of the expression is obscure. Monseigneur Pallegoix, in his Desc. du Royalme Thai ou Siam (ii. 23) says:
"Les Européens les ont appelés talapoins, probablement du nom de "l'éventail qu'ils tiennent à la main, lequel s'appelle talapat, qui signifie feuille de palmier." Childers gives Talapannam, Pali, 'a leaf used in writing, &c.' This at first sight seems to have nothing to support it except similarity of sound; but the quotations from Pinto throw some possible light, and afford probability to this origin, which is also accepted by Koeppen (Rel. des Buddhas, i. 331 note), and by Bishop Bigandet (J. Ind. Archip. iv. 220). [Others, however, derive it from Peguan Talapoin, tala (not tala), 'lord,' 'pover, 'wealth.]

c. 1564.—"... ha processio... na qual se affirman... que hixo quarenta mil Sacerdotes... dos quases muitos tinham diferentes dignidades, como erão Gregos (!), Talagrepas, Rolinas, Neepols, Bicos, Sacerdotes e Chanforges, os quases titulavam pelas vestes, curdas, de que hiao ornados, e pelas divinas, e insignias, que levavam nas mãos, se conhecido, quase erão huns, e quase erão outros."—F. M. Pinto, ch. clix. Thus rendered by Cogan: "A Procession... it was the common opinion of all, that in this Procession were 40,000 Priests... most of them were of different dignities, and called Gregos, Talagrepas &c.

Now by the ornaments they wear, as also by the devices and ensigns which they carry in their hands, they may be distinguished."—p. 218.

"O Chabainha lhe mandou húa carta por hum seu Grego Talapoi, religioso já de idade de oitenta annos."—Pinto, ch. clx. By Cogan: "The Chabainha sent the King a Letter by one of his Priests that was fourscore years of age."—Cogan, 159.

[1666.—"Talapoins." See under COB-MIN.]

c. 1583.—"... Si veggono le case di legno tutte decorate et ornate di bellissimi giardini fatti alla loro vanza, nelle quali habitan tutti i Talapoi, che sono i loro Frati, che stanno a governo del Pagado."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 96.

1586.—"There are... many good houses for the Talapoins to preach in."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 98.

1597.—"The Talapoi persuaded the Iangoman, brother to the King of Pegu, to usurpe the Kingdom, which he refused, pretending his Oath. They replied that no Religion had given him, if he placed his brother in the Ykut, that is, a Golden Throne, to be adored of the people for a God."—Nicolas Pimenta, in Purchas, ii. 1747.

1612.—"There are in all those Kingdoms many persons belonging to different Religious Orders; one of which in Pegu they call Talapois."—Conto, V. vi. 1.

1659.—"Whilst we looked on these temples, wherein those idol gods sat, there came the Arocan Talapoys, or Priests, and fell down before the idols."—Walter Schultze, Reisen, 77.

1689.—"S'il vous arrive de fermer la bouche aux Talapoins et de mettre en évidence leurs erreurs, ne vous attendez qu'à les avoir pour ennemis impluscables."—Lett. Edif. xxv. 64.

1699.—"Their Religious they call Talapoi, who are not unlike mendicant Fryers, living upon the Alms of the People, and so highly venerated by them that they would be glad to drink the Water wherein they wash their Hands."—Orington, 592.

1696.—"... à permettre l'entrée de son royaume aux Talapoin."—La Bruyère, Caractères, ed. Jonast, 1881, ii. 305.

1725.—"This great train is usually closed by the Priests or Talapois and Musicians."—Valerijin, v. 142.

1727.—"The other Sects are taught by the Talapoin, who... preach up Morality to be the best Guide to human Life, and affirm that a good Life in this World can only recommend us in the next to have our Souls transmigrated into the Body of some innocent Beast."—A. Hamilton, i. 151; [ed. 1744, i. 162].

"The great God, whose Adoration is left to their Talapoins or Priests."—Ibid. ii.; [ed. 1744, ii. 54].

1759.—"When asked if they believed the existence of any Superior Being, they (the Curious men) replied that the Burghmamns and Pegu Talapoin told them so."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 100.

1818.—"A certain priest or Talapoin conceived an inordinate affection for a garment of an elegant shape, which he possessed, and which he diligently preserved to prevent its wearing out. He died without correcting his irregular affection, and immediately becoming a louse, took up his abode in his favourite garment."—Sangermano, p. 20.

1880.—"The Phonggyes (Poongases), or Buddhist Monks, sometimes called Talapoin, a name given to them, and introduced into Europe by the Portuguese, from their carrying a fan formed of ida-pat, or palm-leaves."—Saty. Ren., Feb. 21, p. 266, quoting Bp. Bigandet.

TALAPIN. 381 TALEE.

TALOE, s. Tam. tali. A small trinket of gold which is fastened by a string round the neck of a married woman in S. India. It may be a curious question whether the word may not be an adaptation from the Ar. tahili, "qui signifie proprement: prononcer la formule la ilaha illa illah. ... Cette formule, écrite sur un morceau de papier, servait d'amulette... le tout était renfermé dans un étui auquel on donnait le nom de tahili!" (Dozy & Engelmann, 346). These Mahomedan tahili were worn by a band, and were the origin of the Span. word tali, 'a baldric.' [But the tali is a Hindu, not a Mahommedan ornament, and there seems no doubt that it takes its name from Skt. tala, ‘the palmya’ (see TALIPOT), it being the original practice for women to wear this leaf dipped in saffron-water (Mad. Gloss, s.v. Logan, Malabar, i. 134.)] The Indian word appears to occur first in Abraham Rogersius, but the custom is alluded to by early writers, e.g. Gouvea, Synodo, f. 43v.

1651. — "So the Bridegroom takes this Tall, and ties it round the neck of his bride."—Rogersius, 45.

1672. — "Among some of the Christians there is also an evil custom, although they for the greater tightening and fast-making of the marriage bond, allow the Bridgroom to tie a Tall or little band round the Bride’s neck; although in my time this was as much as possible denounced, seeing that ti is a custom derived from Heathenism."—Baldaeus, Zeylon (German), 406.

1674. — "The bridgroom attaches to the neck of the bride a ribbon to which three little pieces of gold in honour of the three gods; and this they call Tal; and it is the sign of being a married woman."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Port., ii. 707.

1726. — "And on the betrothal day the Tall, or bride’s betrothal band, is tied round her neck by the Bramin . . . and this she must not untie in her husband’s life."—Valentijn, Chor. 51.

[1813. — "... the tall, which is a ribbon with a gold head hanging to it, is held ready; and, being shown to the company, some prayers and blessings are pronounced; after which the bridgroom takes it, and hangs it about the bride’s neck."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 312.]

TALIAR, TARRYAR, s. A watchman (S. India). Tam. talaiyari, [from talat ‘head,’ a chief watchman].

1689. — "The Peons and Tarryars sent in quest of two soldiers who had deserted . . . returned with answer that they could not light of them, whereupon the Peons were turned out of service, but upon Verona’s intercession were taken in again and fined each one month’s pay, and to repay the money paid them for Batta (see Batta); also the Pedda Naigu was fined in like manner for his Tarryars."—Fort St. Geo. Conans, Feb. 10. In Notes and Arts., Madras, 1873, No. III. p. 8.

1688. — "Taliers and Peons appointed to watch the Black Town . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 287.

1707. — "Resolving to march 250 soldiers, 200 talliers, and 200 peons."—Ibid. ii. 74.

[1800. — "In every village a particular officer, called Taliiari, keeps watch at night, and is answerable for all that may be stolen."—Buchanan, Myore, i. 3.]

TALIPOT, s. The great-leaved fan-palm of S. India and Ceylon, Corypha umbraculifera, L. The name, from Skt. tala-pattra, Hind. talipot, ‘leaf of the talpa tree,’ properly applies to the leaf of such a tree, or to the smaller leaf of the palmya (Borassus flabelliforans), used for many purposes, e.g. for slips to write on, to make fans and umbrellas, &c. See OLLAH, PALMYRA, TALAPAIN. Sometimes we find the word used for an umbrella, but this is not common. The quotation from Jordanus, though using no name, refers to this tree. [Arrían says: ‘These trees were called in Indian speech tala, and there grew on them, as there grows at the tops of the palm-trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool’ (Indica, viii.).]

c. 1328. — "In this India are certain trees which have leaves so big that five or six men can very well stand under the shade of one of them."—Fr. Jordanus, 29-30.

c. 1430. — "These leaves are used in this country for writing upon instead of paper, and in rainy weather are carried on the head as a covering, to keep off the wet. Three or four persons travelling together can be covered by one of these leaves stretched out." And again: ‘There is also a tree called tal, the leaves of which are extremely large, and upon which they write.’—N. Conti, in India in the XV. Cent., 7 and 13.

1672. — "Talpeta or sunshades."—Baldaeus, Dutch ed., 102.

1681. — "There are three other trees that must not be omitted. The first is Talipot . . ."—Exor. 15.

1749. — "They (the priests) have the honour of carrying the Tallipot with the broad end over their heads foremost; which none but the King does."—Ibid. 74. [See TALIPOT.]

1809. — "The tallipot tree . . . affords a prodigious leaf, impenetrable to sun or rain, and large enough to shelter ten men. It is a natural umbrella, and is of as eminent service in that country as a great-coat tree would be in this. A leaf of the tallipot-tree is a tent to the soldier, a parasol to the traveller, and a book to the scholar."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3rd ed. iii. 15.
form, recognised by Jawhari, and other lexicographers, of talàmidh, 'disciples.' That students should turn a penny by saying prayers for others is very natural." This, therefore, confirms our conjecture of the origin.

1838. — "They treated me civilly, and set me in front of their mosque during their Easter; at which mosque, on account of its being their Easter, there were assembled from divers quarters a number of their Cadints, i.e. of their bishops, and of their Talismans, i.e. of their priests." — Letter of Friar Pascal, in Cahay, &c., p. 235.

1471. — "In questa città è una fossa d'acqua nel modo di una fontana, la qual è guardata da quelli suoi Thalassimani, cioè preti; quest'acqua dicono che ha gran vertù contra la lebra, e contra le cauletta." — Giovafa Barbaro, in Ramusio, ii. t. 107. 1858. — "Non vi sarebbe piú confusione / S'a Damasco il Soldan desse l'assalto; / Un muover d'arme, un correr di persone / E di talismanni un gridar d'alto." — Ariosto, xviii. 7.

1610. — "Some hauing two, some foure, some sise adjoyning turrets, exceeding high, and exceding slender: turras afoft on the outside like the maine top of a ship... from which the Talismanni with elated voices (for they vse no bels) do congregate the people..." — Sandys, p. 31.

c. 1830. — "The Fylalti converse most in the Alcoran. The Derwissi are wandering wolves in sheepes clothing. The Talismans regard the hours of prayer by turning the 4 hour'd glasses. The Muyezini

*Talisman.s. This word is used by many medieval and post-medieval writers for what we should now call a moollah, or the like, a member of the Mahommedan clergy, so to call them. It is doubtless the corruption of some Ar. term, but of what it is not easy to say. Qu. talà♠ma, 'disciples, students'? [See Burton, Ar. Night., ix. 165.] Of this Prof. Robertson Smith writes: 'I have got some fresh light on your Talisman.'

W. Bedwell, the father of English Arabists, in his Catalogue of the Chapters of the Turkish Alkoran, (1615) along with the Moham- medis Impostures, and Arabician Trudyman, has the following, quoted from Postellus de Orbis Concordia, i. 13: 'Haec precatio (the fàtità) illis est communis ut nobis dominica: et ita quibusdum ad hattologiam usque re- citatur ut centies idem, aut duo aut tria vocabula repetant dicendo, Al-hamdu lillah, hamdu lillah, hamdu lillah, et cetera ejus vocabula eodem modo. Idque facit in publica oratione Taalima, id est sacrificialis, pro his qui negligenter orant ut aiunt, ut ea repititione suppleat eorum erroribus... Quidam medio in campo tam assidue, ut defessi consendant; alií circumgirando corpus, etc.

Here then we have a form without the s, and one which from the vowels seem to be ti'lina, 'a very learned man.' This, owing to the in- fluence of the guttural, would sound in modern pronunciation nearly as Taalima. At the same time ti'lina is not the name of an office, and prayers on behalf of others can be undertaken by any one who receives a mandate, and is paid for them; so it is very possible that Postellus, who was an Arabic scholar, made the pointing suit his idea of the word meant, and that the real word is talà♠ma, a shortened TALIBA HIND, S. Sea-Hind. for 'cut-water.' Port. talhamar.—Roebuck.

TALIMAHR, s. Hind. from Ar ta'lčah. An invoice or schedule.

TALOOK, s. This word, Ar ta'alluk, from root 'a'λλ, 'to hang or depend,' has various shades of meaning in different parts of India. In S. and W. India it is the subdivision of a district, presided over as regards revenue matters by a taheeldar. In Bengal it is applied to tracts of proprietary land, sometimes not easily distinguished from Zemindaries, and sometimes subordinate to or dependent on Zemindars. In the N.W. Prov. and Oudh the ta'alluk is an estate the profits of which are divided between different proprietors, one being superior, the other inferior (see TALOOKDAR). Ta'alluk is also used in Hind. for 'department' of administration.

1885. — "In October, 1779, the Dacca Council were greatly disturbed in their minds by the appearance amongst them of John Doe, who was then still in his prime. One Chundermooee deposed to John Doe and his assign certain lands in the pergunna Bullara... whereupon George III., by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, commanded the Sheriff of Calcutta to give John Doe possession. At this Mr. Shakespeare burst into fury, and in language which must have surprised John Doe, proposed 'that a securit be appointed for the collection of Patparrah Talook, with directions to pay the same into Bullara cutcherry.'"—Sir J. Stephens, Nuncupar and Impex, ii. 159-60. A securit is an 'officer specially appointed to collect the revenue of an estate, from the management of which the owner or farmer has been removed."—(Wilson).

TALOOKDAR, a. Hind. from Per. ta'allukdar, 'the holder of a ta'alluk' (see TALOOK) in either of the senses of that word; i.e. either a Government officer collecting the revenue of a ta'alluk (though in this sense it is probably now obsolete everywhere), or the holder of an estate so designated. The famous Talookdars of Oudh are large landowners, possessing both villages of which they are sole proprietors, and other villages, in which there are subordinate holders, in which the Talookdar is only the superior proprietor (see CARMENIC, Kachari Technicalities).

[1769. — "... incitements are frequently employed by the Talookdars to augment the concourse to their lands."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 283. In his Glossary he defines "Talookdar, the Zemeen-dar of a small district."]

TAMARIND, s. The pod of the tree which takes its name from that product, Tamariandus indica, L., N.O. Leguminosae. It is a tree cultivated throughout India and Burma for the sake of the acid pulp of the pod, which is laxative and cooling, forming a most refreshing drink in fever. The tree is not believed by Dr. Brandis to be indigenous in India, but is supposed to be so in tropical Africa. The origin of the name is curious. It is Ar. tamar-ul-Hindi, 'date of India,' or perhaps rather in Persian form, tamar-i-Hindi. It is possible that the original name may have been thammar, 'fruit' of India, rather than tamar, 'date.'

1298. — "When they have taken a merchant vessel, they force the merchants to swallow a stuff called Tamariindi, mixed in sea-water, which produces a violent purging."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed., ii. 383.

c. 1335. — "L'arbre appelé hammar, c'est à dire al-tamarn-al-Hindi, est un arbre sauvage qui couvre les montagnes."—Maqdīl-al-abhar, in Not. et Ext. xiii. 175.

1563. — "It is called in Malavar puli, and in Guzerat ambli, and this is the name they have among all the other people of this India; and the Arab calls it tamariindi, because it is... well known, is our tamara, or, as the Castilians say, dedit [i.e. date], so that tamariindi are 'dates of India; and this was because the Arabs could not think of a name more appropriate on account of its having stones inside, and not because either the tree or the fruit had any resemblance."—Garcia, f. 200. [Ruli is the Malayal. name; ambidita is probably Hind. in Skt. ambid, 'the tamarind."

1580.—"In faberibus verbo pestilentibus, ataque omnibus alia ex putridis, exurentibus, aqueam, infusa fuerit cum svaehar ebibunt."—Prosper Alpinus (De Plantis Aegypt.) ed. Lugd. Bat. 1735, ii. 20.

1582.—"They have a great store of Tamarindos . . ."—Castanheda, by N. L. f. 94.

[1588.—"Tamarinde is by the Egyptians called Derelaide (qu. ddr-al-sayyida, 'Our Lady's tree')."—Linchohet, Hak. Soc. ii. 121.]

1611.—"That wood which we cut for firewood did all hang swayed with cobs of great fruit (as the Bokood in England) called Tamarin; it hath a very soure tast, and by the Apostocharies is held good against the Scurrie."—N. Dounton, in Purchas, i. 277.

[1623.—"Tamarinds, which the Indians call Hambele" (init., as in quotation from Garcia above).—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 92.]

1629.—"A singularly beautiful Tamarind tree (ever the most graceful, and amongst the most magnificent of trees). . . ."—Mem. of Odd. Momanis, 99.

1877.—"The natives have a saying that sleeping beneath the 'Date of Hid' gives you fever, which you cure by sleeping under a nim tree (Melia azedarach), the ilac of Persia."—Burton, Sinh Revisted, i. 92. The nim (see NEEM) (pace Capt. Burton) is not the 'ilac of Persia' (see BUCKYNE). The prejudice against encamping or sleeping under a tamarind tree is general in India. But, curiously, Bp. Pallegrox speaks of it as a custom of the practice of the Siamese "to rest and play under the beneficient shade of the Tamarind."—Doc. du Royaume Tha ou Siam, i. 136.

TAMARIND-FISH. s. This is an excellent zest, consisting, according to Dr. Balfour, of white pomfret, cut in transverse slices, and preserved in tamarinds. The following is a note kindly given by the highest authority on Indian fish matters, Dr. Francis Day:

"My account of Tamarind fish is very short, and in my Fishes of Malabar as follows:

"The best Tamarind fish is prepared from the Seir fish (see SEER-FISH), and the Latas calcarifer, known as Cockrup in Calcutta; and a rather inferior quality from the Polyneumus (or Roe-ball, to which genus the Mango-fish belongs), and the more common from any kind of fish. The above refers to Malabar, and more especially to Cochin. Since I wrote my Fishes of Malabar I have made many inquiries as to Tamarind fish, and found that the white pomfret, where it is taken, appears to be the best for making the preparation."

TAMBERANEE, s. Malayal. tam-burdun, 'Lord; God, or King.' It is a title of honour among the Nairs, and is also assumed by Saiva monks in the Tamil countries. [The word is derived from Mal. tam, 'one's own,' purdun, 'lord.' The junior male members of the Malayali Raja's family, until they come of age, are called Tambah, and after that Tamburun. The female members are similarly styled Tambatti and Tamburatti (Logan, Malabar, iii. Gloss. s.v.).]

1510.—"Dio l'altro Tamaral: zo Per Dio ug L'altro respiode Tamarani: zo Per Dio."—Fartheta, ed. 1817, f. 45.

[c. 1610.—"They (the Nairs) call the King in their language Tambiraine, meaning -Lord."—Fyrgard de Lewis, Hak. Soc. i. 367.]

TANA, TANNA, n.p. Thana, a town on the Island of Salsette on the strait ('River of Tana') dividing that island from the mainland and 20 m. N.E. of Bombay, and in the early Middle Ages the seat of a Hindu kingdom of the Konkan (see CONCANT), as well as a seaport of importance. It is still a small port, and is the chief town of the District which bears its name.

c. 1020.—"From Dhär southwards to the river Nerbbuda, nine; thence to Mahratdes . . . eighteen; thence to Konkan, of which the capital is Tana, on the seashore, twenty-five parasangs."—Al-Biruni, in Elliot, i. 60.

[c. 1150.—"Tannah," misswritten Banah. See under TABASHEER.]

1288.—"Tana is a great Kingdom lying towards the West . . . There is much traffic here, and many ships and merchants frequent the place."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 27.

1321.—"After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday in Thana of India, I baptised about 90 persons in a certain city called Parocco, ten days' journey distant therefrom, and I have since baptised more than twenty, besides thirty-five who were baptised between Thana and Supera (Suppara)."

[c. 1525.—"And having thus embarked I passed over in 28 days to Tana, where for the faith of Christ four of our Minor Friars had suffered martyrdom . . . The land is under the dominion of the Saracens . . ."

—Fr. Odoric, Ibid. i. 57-58.
1516.—"25 leagues further on the coast is a fortress of the before-named king, called Tana-Mayambu" (this is perhaps rather Bombay).—Barbosa, 68.

1519.—"And because the norwest winds blew strong, winds contrary to his course, after going a little way he turned and anchored in sight of the island, where were stationed the foists with their captain-in-chief Aliza, who seeing our fleet in motion put on his oars and assembled at the River of Tana, and when the wind came round our fleet made sail, and anchored at the mouth of the River of Tana, for the wind would not allow of its entering."—Corro, iii. 290.

1673.—"The Chief City of this Island is called Tanaw; in which are Seven Churches and Colleges, the chiefest one of the Paulistines (see Paulist). . . Here are made good Stuffs of Silk and Cotton."—Fryer, 73.

TANA, THANA, s. A Police station. Hind. thāna, [Skt. thānā, 'a place of standing, a post']. From the quotation following it would seem that the term originally meant a fortified post, with its garrison, for the military occupation of the country; a meaning however closely allied to the present use.

c. 1640-50.—"Thānā means a corps of cavalry, matchlockmen, and archers, stationed within an enclosure. Their duty is to guard the roads, to hold the places surrounding the Thānā, and to despatch provisions (rāsad, see RUSWUD) to the next Thānā."—Pāṭishāh nāmah, quoted by Blochmann, in Aśa, i. 945.

TANADAR, THANADAR, s. The chief of a police station (see TANA), Hind. thānādār. This word was adopted in a more military sense at an early date by the Portuguese, and is still in habitual use with us in the civil sense.

1516.—In a letter of 4th Feb. 1515 (i.e. 1516), the King Don Manoel constitutted João Machado to be Tanadar and captain of land forces in Goa.—Archiv. Port. Orient. fasc. 5, 1-3.

1519.—"The Senhor Duarte Pereira; this is the manner in which you will exercise your office of Tanadar of this Isle of Tycoari (i.e. Goa), which the Senhor Capitão will now encharge you with."—Ibid. p. 35.

c. 1543.—"In Aguaci is a great mosque (mizquida), which is occupied by the tana-dars, but which belongs to His Highness; and certain petayas, (yards!) in which date (paddy) is collected, which also belong to His Highness."—Tumbo in Subdivision, 218.

1602.—"So all the force went aboard of the light boats, and the Governor in his hazzard-galley entered the river with a grand clangour of music, and when he was in mid-channel there came to his galley a boat, in which was the Tanadar of the City (Dabul), and going aboard the galley presented himself to the Governor with much humility, and begged pardon of his offences. . . ."—Conto, iv. i. 9.

[1813.—"The third in succession was a Tanadar, or petty officer of a district . . ."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 5.]

TANGA, s. Mahr. tānk, Turki tanga. A denomination of coin which has been in use over a vast extent of territory, and has varied greatly in application. It is now chiefly used in Turkistan, where it is applied to a silver coin worth about 7d. And Mr. W. Erskine has stated that the word tanga or tanka is of Chagatai Turki origin, being derived from tang, which in that language means 'white.' (H. of Baber and Humayun, i. 546). Though one must hesitate in differing from one usually so accurate, we must do so here. He refers to Josafa Bar- bero, who says this, viz. that certain silver coins are called by the Min grelians tēttar, by the Greeks aspt, by the Turks akha, and by the Zaga tais tengh, all of which words in the respective languages signify 'white.' We do not however find such a word in the dictionaries of either Vambery or of Pavet de Courtelle;—the latter only having tangah, 'fer-blanc.' And the obvious derivation is the Skt. taṅka, 'a weight (of silver) equal to 4 māsha . . . a stamped coin.' The word in the forms tākī (see TUCKA) and tanga (for these are apparently identical in origin) is, "in all dialects, laxly used for money in general" (Wilson).

In the Lahore coinage of Mahmud of Ghazni, A.H. 418-419 (A.D. 1027-28), we find on the Skt. legend of the reverse the word tanka in correspondence with the dirham of the Ar. obverse (see Thomas, Pathan kings, p. 49). Tanka or Tanga seems to have continued to be the popular name of the chief silver coin of the Delhi sovereigns during the 13th and first part of the 14th centuries, a coin which was substantially the same with the rupee (q.v.) of later days. In fact this application of the word in the form tākī (see TUCKA) is usual in Bengal down to our own day. Ibn Batuta indeed, who was in India in the time of Mahommed Tughlak, 1333—1343 or thereabouts, always calls the gold coin then current a tanka or dinar of gold. It was, as he repeatedly states, the equivalent of 10 silver dinars. These silver dinars (or rupees) are called by the author of the Maadlik-al-Abdar (c. 1340) the "silver tanka of India." The gold and silver tanka continue to be mentioned repeatedly in the history of Feroz Shah, the son of Mahommed (1351-1388), and apparently with the same value as before. At a later period under Sikandar Buhlol (1488-1517), we find black (or copper) tankas, of which 20 went to the old silver tanka.

We cannot say when the coin, or its name rather, first appeared in Turkistan. But the name was also prevalent on the western coast of India as that of a low denomination of coin, as may be seen in the quotations from Linschoten and Grose. Indeed the name still survives in Goa as that of a copper coin equivalent to 60 reis or about 2d. And in the 16th century also 60 reis appears from the papers of Gerson da Cunha to have been the equivalent of the silver tanga of Goa and Bassein, though all the equations that he gives suggest that the rei may have been more valuable then.

The denomination is also found in Russia under the form dengi. See a quotation under COFECKE, and compare PARDAO.

c. 1835.—"According to what I have heard from the Shaikh Mubarak, the red tak (see LACK) contains 100,000 golden tankahs, and the white tak 100,000 (silver) tankahs. The golden tanka, called in this country the red tanka, is equivalent to three mithkals, and the silver tanka is equivalent to 8 haštānāh dirhams, this dirham being of the same weight as the silver dirhem current in Egypt and Syria."—Masadlik-al-Abdar, in Not. et Estz. xiii. 211.

c. 1340.—"Then I returned home after sunset and found the money at my house. There were 3 bags containing in all 6233 tankas, i.e. the equivalent of the 56,000 dinars (of silver) which was the amount of my debts, and of the 12,000 which the sultan had previously ordered to be paid me, after of course deducting the tenth part according to Indian custom. The value of the piece called tanka is 24 dinars in gold of Barbary."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 426. [Here the gold tanga is spoken of.]

c. 1570.—"Sultan Firoz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tanka, and the silver tanka."—Tārīkh-i-Firoz Shāh, in Elliot, ii. 357.

1404.—"... vna sua moneda de plata que llaman Tangues."—Clavijo, t. 466.
1516.—"... a round coin like ours, and with Moorish letters on both sides, and about the size of a fajon (see FANAM) of Calicut, ... and its worth 55 maravedis; they call these tangas, and they are of very fine silver."—Barossa, 45.

[1519. — Rules regulating ferry-dues at Goa: "they may demand for this one tanga only."—Archiv. Port. Orient. fasc. 5, p. 18.]

c. 1541.—"Todar ... fixed first a golden ashruf (see ASHRAFEES) as the enormous remuneration for one stone, which induced the Ghakkars to flock to him in such numbers that afterwards a stone was paid with a rupee, and this pay gradually fell to 5 tankas, till the fortress (Rōtbās) was completed."—Tārīkh-i-Khan-jahān Lodī, in Elliot, v. 115. (These are the Bahūll or Sikandari tankas of copper, as are also those in the next quotation from Elliot.)

1559.—""The old Muscovite money is not round but oblong or egg-shaped, and is called dengas. 100 of these coins make a Hungarian gold-piece; 6 dengas make an altin: 20 a grifina; 100 a poltina; and 200 a ruble."—Herberts, in Rasmus, ii. 158v.

[1571. — "Gujarati tankahs at 100 tankahs to the rupee. At the present time the rupee is fixed at 40 dams. ... As the current value of the tankah of Pattan, etc., was less than that of Gujarāt."—Mirat-i-Ahmadi, in Bayley, Gujarāt, pp. 6, 11.]

[1591. — "Dingoes." See under RUBLE.]

1592-3.—"At the present time, namely, a.h. 1002, Hindustan contains 3200 towns, and upon each town are dependent 200, 500, 1000, or 1500 villages. The whole yields a revenue of 640 crores (see CROPE) and 200-muradī tankas."—Tabakat-i-Akbār, in Elliot, v. 186.

1598.—"There is also a kind of reckoning of money which is called Tangas, not that there is any such coined, but are so named onely in telling, five Tangas is one Pardaw (see PARDAO), or Xeraphin badde money, for you must understand that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde, for foure Tangas good money are as much as five Tangas badde money."—Linschoten, ch. 35; [Hak. 1854. — "These animals, called Tāngun, are wonderfully strong and enduring; they are never shod, and the hoof often cracks. ... The Tibetans give these foals of value messes of pig's blood and raw liver, which they devour greedily, and it is said to strengthen them wonderfully; the custom is, I believe, general in Central Asia."—Hooker, Himalayan Journals, 1st ed. ii. 131.

1816. — "The Tanjore Pilla, it is said, is made use of with great success in India, against the bite of mad dogs, and that of the most venomous serpents."—Asiatic Journal, ii. 381.

TANK, s. A reservoir, an artificial pond or lake, made either by excavation or by damming. This is one of those perplexing words which seem to have a double origin, in this case one Indian, the other European.

As regards what appears to be the Indian word, Shakespear gives: "Tānkh (in Guzerat), an underground reservoir for water." [And so Pāta.] Wilson gives: "Tānken or tāker, Mahr. ... Tānkh (said to be Guzerāthi). A reservoir of water, an artificial pond, commonly known to Europeans in India as a Tank. Tānki, Guz. A reservoir of water; a small well." R. Drummond, in his Illustrations of Guzerattee, &c., gives: "Tanka (Mah.) and Tankoo (Guz.) Reservoirs, constructed of stone or brick or lime, of larger and lesser size, generally inside houses. ... They are almost entirely covered at top, having but a small aperture to let a pot or bucket down." "In the towns of Bikaner," says Tod, "most families have large cisterns or reservoirs called Tanks, filled by the rains" (Rajputana, ii. 209). Again, speaking of towns in the desert of Māwār, he says; "they collect the rain water in reservoirs called Tanka, which they are obliged to use sparingly, as it is said to produce night blindness" (ii. 300). Again, Dr. Spilsbury (J.A.S.B. ix. pt. 2, 881), describing a journey in the Nerbudda Basin, cites the word, and notes: "I first heard this word used by a native in the Betool district; on asking him if at the top of Bowergurth there was any spring, he said No, but there was a Tanka or place made of pukka (stone and cement) for holding water." Once more, in an Appendix to the Report of the Survey of India for 1881-1882, Mr. G. A. MacGill, speaking of the rain cisterns in the driest part of Rajputana, says: "These cisterns or wells are called by the people tanka" (App. p. 12). See also quotation below from a Report by Major Strahan. It is not easy to doubt the genuineness of the word, which may possibly be from Skt. tadaga, tadga, tadka, 'a pond, pool, or tank.'

Fr. Paolino, on the other hand, says the word tanque used by the Portuguese in India was Portoghesa corrotta, which is vague. But in fact tanque is a word which appears in all Portuguese dictionaries, and which is used by authors so early after the opening of communication with India (we do not know if there is an instance actually earlier) that we can hardly conceive it to have been borrowed from an Indian language, nor indeed could it have been borrowed from Guzerat and Rajputana, to which the quotations above ascribe the vernacular word. This Portuguese word best suits, and accounts for that application of tank to large sheets of water which is habitual in India. The indigenous Guzerati and Mahratti word seems to belong rather to what we now call a tank in England; i.e. a small reservoir for a house or ship. Indeed the Port. tanque is no doubt a form of the Lat. stagnum, which gives It. stagno, Fr. old estang and estan, mod. étang, Sp. estanque, a word which we have also in old English and in Lowland Scotch, thus:

1589. — "They had in them stanges or pondes of water full of fish of sundrie sortes." —Parkes's Mendoza, Hak. Soc. ii. 46.

1785. — "I never drank the Muses' tank, Castalia's burn and a that; But there it streams, and richly reams, My Helicon I ca' that." —Burns.

It will be seen that Pyrard de Laval uses estang, as if specifically, for the tank of India.

1498. — "And many other saints were there painted on the walls of the church, and these wore diadems, and their portraiture was in a divers kind, for their teeth were so great that they stood an inch beyond the mouth, and every saint had 4 or 5 arms, and below the church stood a great tanque wrought in cut stone like many others that we had seen by the way."

—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 57.

"So the Captain Major ordered Nicolas Coelho to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was, and he found in the said island (Anchediva) a building, a church of great ashlar work which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones which stood in the midst of the body of the chapel. Moreover they found just beyond the church a tanque of wrought ashlar in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tanque of the depth of 4 fathoms, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship Berrio."

—Ibid. 95.

1610. — "Early in the morning these Pagans go to wash at a tank, which tank is a pond or still water (—ad una Tancho il qual Tancho è una fossa d'acqua morta)."

—Varthema, 149.

"Near to Calicut there is a temple in the midst of a tank, that is, in the middle of a pond of water." —Ibid. 175.

1653. — "In this place where the King (Bahádur Sháh) established his line of battle, on one side there was a great river, and on the other a tanque (tanque) of water, such as they are used to make in those parts. For as there are few streams to collect the winter's waters, they make these tanks (which might be more properly called lakes), all lined with stone. They are so big that many are more than a league in compass." —Barros, IV. vi. 5.

c. 1610. — "Son logis estoit soligne près d'une lieue du palais Royal, situé sur un estang, et basty de pierres, ayant bien demy lieux de tour, comme nous les autres estanges." —Pyrard de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 262; [Hak. Soc. i. 367].

[1615. — "I rode early ... to the tancks to take the ayre." —Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 78.]

1616. — "Besides their Rivers ... they have many Ponds, which they call Tankes." —Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1470.

1638. — "A very faire Tanke, which is a square pit paved with grey marble." —W. Bruton, in Hart. v. 50.

1648. — "... a standing water or Tanck. ..." —Van Twist, Gen. Beschr. 11.

1672. — "Outside and round about Suratte, there are elegant and delightful houses for recreation, and stately cemeteries in the usual fashion of the Moors, and also divers tanks and reservoirs built of hard and solid stone."—Baldaeu, p. 12.

1673.—"Within a square Court, to which a stately Gate-house makes a Passage, in the middle whereof a tank vaulted..."—Dryer, 27.

1754.—"The post in which the party intended to halt had formerly been one of those reservoirs of water called tanks, which occur so frequently in the arid plains of this country."—Orme, i. 354.

1799.—"One crop under a tank in Mysore or the Carnatic yields more than three hem."—T. Munro, in {Life}, i. 241.

1809.—
"Water so cool and clear, The peasants drink not from the humble well.

* * * *

Nor tanks of costliest masonry dispense
To those in towns who dwell,
The work of kings in their beneficence."—Xehama, xiii. 6.

1883.—"... all through sheets 124, 125, 126, and 101, the only drinking water is from 'tanks,' or from 'tota.' The former are circular pits puddled with clay, and covered in with wattle and daub domes, in the top of which are small trap doors, which are kept locked; in these the villages store rain-water; the latter are small and somewhat deep ponds dug in the valleys where the soil is clayey, and are filled by the rain; these latter of course do not last long, and then the inhabitants are entirely dependent on their tanks, whilst their cattle migrate to places where the well-water is fit for use."—Report on Cent. Ind. and Rajputana Topogr. Survey (Bicaner and Joysalmeer), by Major C. Strachan, R.E., in {Report of the Survey in India}, 1882-1883, p. 4. The writer in the Rajputana Gazetteer (Bikanir) (i. 182) calls these covered pits kund, and the simple excavations dar.

TANOR, n.p. An ancient town and port about 22 miles south of Calicut. There is a considerable probability that it was the Tynides of the Periplus. It was a small kingdom at the arrival of the Portuguese, in partial subjection to the Zamorin. [The name is Malayal. Tnur, tan, the tree Terminalis bellerica, dar, village.]

1516.—"Further on... are two places of Moors 6 leagues from one another. One is called Paravanor, and the other Tanor, and inland from these towns is a lord to whom they belong; and he has many Naies, and sometimes he rebels against the King of Calicut. In these towns there is much shipping and trade, for these Moors are great merchants."—Barbosa, Hak. Soc. 153.

1521.—"Cotaste was a great man among the Moors, very rich, and lord of Tanor, who carried on a great sea-trade with many ships, which trafficked all about the coast of India with passes from our Governors, for he only dealt in wares of the country; and thus he was the greatest possible friend of the Portuguese, and those who were near to his dwelling were entertained with the greatest honour, as if they had been his brothers. In fact for this purpose he kept houses fitted up, and both cots and bedsteads furnished in our fashion, with tables and chairs and oaks of wine, with which he regaled our people, giving them entertainments and banquets, insomuch that it seemed as if he were going to become a Christian..."—Correa, ii. 679.

1528.—"And in the year (A.R.) 935, a ship belonging to the Franks was wrecked off Tanor... Now the Ray of that place affording aid to the crew, the Zamorin sent a messenger to him demanding of him the surrender of the Franks who composed it, together with such parts of the cargo of the ship as had been saved, but that chieftain having refused compliance with this demand, a treaty of peace was entered into with the Franks by him; and from this time the subjects of the Ray of Tanor traded under the protection of the passes of the Franks."—Toli-fut-ut-Mujakideen, E.T. 124-125.

1558.—"For Lopo Soares having arrived at Cochín after his victory over the Zamorin, two days later the King of Tanor, the latter's vassal, sent (to Lopo) to complain against the Zamorin by ambassadors, begging for peace and help against him, having fallen out with him for reasons that touched the service of the King of Portugal."—Barros, i. vii. 10.

1727.—"Four leagues more southerly is Tannore, a Town of small Trade, inhabited by Mahometans."—A. Hamilton, i. 322; [ed. 1744].

TAPPAUL, s. The word used in S. India for 'post,' in all the senses in which dawk (q.v.) is used in Northern India. Its origin is obscure. C. P. Brown suggests connection with the Fr. étape (which is the same originally as the Eng. staple). It is sometimes found in the end of the 18th century written tappa or tappy. But this seems to have been derived from Telugu clerks, who sometimes write tappā as a singular of tappīla, taking the latter for a plural (C.P.B.). Wilson appears to give the word a southern origin. But though its use is confined to the South and West, Mr. Beames assigns it to it an Aryan origin: "tappa 'post-office,' i.e. place where 1799.—"You will perceive that we have but a small chance of establishing the tapad to Poonah."—Wellington, i. 50.

1800.—"The tapad does not go 30 miles a day."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 244.

TARA, TARE, s. The name of a small silver coin current in S. India at the time of the arrival of the Portuguese. It seems to have survived longest in Calicut. The origin we have not traced. It is curious that the commonest silver coin in Sicily down to 1860, and worth about 44d., was a tari, generally considered to be a corruption of dirhem. I see Sir Walter Elliot has mooted this very question in his Coins of S. India (p. 138). [The word is certainly Malayal. tdram, defined in the Madras Gloss. as "a copper coin, value 1½ pies." Mr. Gray in his note to the passage from Pyrard de Laval quoted below, suggests that it took its name from tdra, 'a star'.]

1442.—"They cast (at Vizianagaram), in pure silver a coin which is the sixth of the fanam, which they call tari."—Abdurrazak, in India in the XV. Cent. 26.

1506.—(The Viceroy, D. Francisco D'Almeida, wintering his fleet in Cochin). "As the people were numerous they made quite a big town with a number of houses covered with upper stories of timber, and streets also where the people of the country set up their stalls in which they sold plenty of victuals, and cheap. Thus for a vinten of silver you got in change 20 silver coins that they called tara, something like the scale of a sardine, and for such coin they gave you 12 or 15 figs, or 4 or 5 eggs, and for a single vinten 3 or 4 fowls, and for one tara fish enough to fill two men's bellies, or rice enough for a day's victuals, dinner and supper too. Bread there was none, for there was no wheat except in the territory of the Moors."—Correa, i. 624.

1510.—The King of Narsinga (or Vizianagar) "coins a silver money called tare, and others of gold, twenty of which go to a pardoo, and are called fanam... And of these small ones of silver, there go 16 to a fanam."—Varthema, 130.

[cf. 1610.—"Each man receives four tarens, which are small silver coins, each of the value of one-sixteenth of a lari."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 344. Later on (i. 412) he says "16 tarens go to a Phanam"].

1673.—(at Calicut). "Their coin admits no Copper; Silver Tares, 28 of which make a Fanam, passing instead thereof."—Pryer, 55.

"" Calicut.

*"Tares are the peculiar Coin, the rest are common to India."—Ibid. 207.

1727.—"Calicut . . . coins are 10 Tar to a Fanam, 44 Fanams to a Rupee."—A. Hamilton, ii. 318; [ed. 1744].

[1737.—"We are to allow each man 4 measures of rice and 1 tar per diem."—Agreement in Logan, Malabar, iii. 95, and see "tara" in iii. 192. Mr. Logan (vol. iii. Gloss. s.v.) defines the tara as equal to 2 pies.]

TARE AND TRET. Whence comes this odd form in the books of arithmetic? Both partners apparently through Italy. The first Fr. tare, It. tara, from Ar. taraba, 'to reject,' as pointed out by Dozy. Tret is alleged to be from It. tribare, 'to crumble or grind,' perhaps rather from trito, 'ground or triturated.' [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) derives it from Fr. traiter, 'a draught,' and that from Lat. tractus, trahere, 'to draw.']

TAREGA, s. This represents a word for a broker (or person analogous to the hong merchants of Canton in former days) in Pegu, in the days of its prosperity. The word is from S. India. We have in Tel. taraga, 'the occupation of a broker'; Tam. taragar, 'a broker.'

1568.—"Sono in Pegu otro senare del Re che si chiamano Tarega li quali sono 1583.—"... e se fosse almeno che a tempo del pagamento per non pagar si abbastanza dalla città, o si ascondesse, il Tarreoc è obbligato pagar per lui ... i Tarrecci così si demandano i sensani."—G. Balbi, i. 107, 108.

1587.—"There are in Pegu eight Brokers, whom they call Tarrechs, which are bound to sell your goods at the price they be Woorth, and you give them for their labour two in the hundred: and they be bound to make your debt good, because you sell your merchandises upon their word."—R. Pitch in Hakl. ii. 393.

TARIFF, s. This comes from Ar. tarīf, tar'īf, 'the making known.' Dozy states that it appears to be comparatively modern in Spanish and Port., and has come into Europe apparently through Italian.

[1591.—"So that helping your memoria with certain Tablei or Tarifas made of purpose to know the numbers of the soldiery that are to enter into ranke."—Garraw, Art Wars, p. 224 (Stanf. Dict.).

[1617.—"... a brief Tarret of Persia."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 482.]

TAROUK, TABOUP, n.p. Burm. Tarük, Tarüp. This is the name given by the Burmese to the Chinese. Thus a point a little above the Delta of the Irrawadi, where the invading army of Kublai Khan (c. 1285) is said to have turned back, is called Tarük-mau, or Chinese Point. But the use of this name, according to Sir A. Phayre, dates only from the Middle Ages, and the invasion just mentioned. Before that the Chinese, as we understand him, are properly termed Tsin; though the coupled names Tarük and Tare, which are applied in the chronicles to early invaders, "may be considered as designations incorrectly applied by later copyists." And Sir A. Phayre thinks Tarük is a form of Türk, whilst Tare is now applied to the Manchus. It seems to us probable that Tarük and Tare are probably meant for 'Turk and Tartar' (see H. of Burma, pp. 8, 11, 56). [Mr. Scott (Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 193] suggests a connection with the Teru or Tero State, which developed about the 11th century, the race having been expelled from China in 778 A.D.]

TASHERIF, s. This is the Ar. tashrif, 'honouring'; and thus "conferring honour upon anyone, as by paying him a visit, presenting a dress of honour, or any complimentary donation" (Wilson). In Northern India the general use of the word is as one of ceremonious politeness in speaking of a visit from a superior or from one who is treated in politeness as a superior; when such an one is invited to 'bring his tashrif,' i.e. 'to carry the honour of his presence,' 'to condescend to visit.'—The word always implies superiority on the part of him to whom tashrif is attributed. It is constantly used by polite natives in addressing Europeans. But when the European in return says (as we have heard said, through ignorance of the real meaning of the phrase), 'I will bring my tashrif,' the effect is ludicrous in the extreme, though no native will betray his amusement. In S. India the word seems to be used for the dress of honour conferred, and in the old Madras records, rightly or wrongly, for any complimentary present, in fact a honorarium. Thus in Wheeler we find the following:

1674.—"He (Lingapa, nank of Poomalee) had, he said, carried a Tasheerif to the English, and they had refused to take it. ..."—Op. cit. i. 84.

1680.—"It being necessary to appoint one as the Company's Chief Merchant (Verona, being deceased), resolved Bern Pedda Vincatady, do succeed and the Taisherifs be given to him and the rest of the principal Merchants, viz., 3 yards Scarlet to Pedda Vincatady, and 2½ yards each to four others. ... "The Governor being informed that Verona's young daughter was melancholy and would not eat because her husband had received no Tasheerif, he also is Tasheerifed with 2½ yards Scarlet cloth."—Fort St. Geo. Comms., April 6. In Notes and Esq., Madras, 1873, p. 16.

1685.—"'Gopall Pundit having been at great charge in coming hither with such a numerous retinue ... that we may engage him ... to continue his friendship, to attain some more and better privileges there (at Cocholores) than we have as yet—It is ordered that he with his attendants be Tasheerifed as followeth' (a list of presents follows).—In Wheeler, i. 148. [And see the same phrase in Pringle, Diary, &c., i. 1].

TATTOO, and abbreviated, TAT, s. A native-bred pony. Hind. tatté, [which Platts connects with Skt. tara, "passing over"].

1324.—"Turhlak sent his son Mahommed to bring Khurd behind. Mahommed seized the latter and brought him to his father mounted on a tattà, i.e. a pack-horse."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 207.

1784. — "On their arrival at the Chotuly they found a miserable dooley and 15 tattoo horses."—In Seton-Karr, i. 15.

1785. — "We also direct that strict injunctions be given to the baggage department, for sending all the lead Tattoos, bullocks, &c., to grass, the rainy season being now at hand."—Tippoo's Letters, 105.

1804. — "They can be got for 25 rupees each horse upon an average; but I believe, when they receive only this sum they must tattoo them. From 30 to 35 rupees each horse is the sum paid to the best horsemen."—Wellington, iii. 174.

1806. — "These tattos are a breed of small ponies, and are the most useful and hardly little animals in India."—Broughton's Letters, 156; [ed. 1892, 117].

1810. — "Every servant . . . goes share in some tattoo . . . which conveys his luggage."—Williamson, V. M. i. 311.

1824. — "Tattoos. These are a kind of small, cat-hatted, and ill-looking ponies; but they are hardy and walk faster than oxen."—Seeley, Wonders of Ellora, ch. ii.

1826. — "... when I mounted on my tattoo, or pony, I could at any time have commanded the attendance of a dozen grooms, so many pressed forward to offer me their services."—Pandurang Hari, 21; [ed. 1873, i. 28].

[1789. — "Mounting our tats, we were on the point of proceeding homewards." —Oriental Sport. Mag., ed. 1873, i. 437.]

1830. — "... mon tattoo est fort au dessous de la taille d'un arabe."—Jacquement, Corresp. i. 347.

1840. — "... its bright brass patent axles, and its little hog-maned tattà, And its ever jetty harness, which was always made by Watta. . . . A fine line in honour of the late Mr. Simms, in Parker's Bole Ponjis, 1851, ii. 215."

1853. — "... Smith's plucky proposal to run his notable tat, Pickles."—Oakfield, i. 94.

1875. — "... Smith's plucky proposal to run his notable tat, Pickles."—Oakfield, i. 94.

1786. — "... when I mounted on my tattoo, or pony, I could at any time have commanded the attendance of a dozen grooms, so many pressed forward to offer me their services."—Pandurang Hari, 21; [ed. 1873, i. 28].

1830. — "Mounting our tats, we were on the point of proceeding homewards." —Oriental Sport. Mag., ed. 1873, i. 437.]

1810. — "... when I mounted on my tattoo, or pony, I could at any time have commanded the attendance of a dozen grooms, so many pressed forward to offer me their services."—Pandurang Hari, 21; [ed. 1873, i. 28].

1853. — "... Smith's plucky proposal to run his notable tat, Pickles."—Oakfield, i. 94.

1875. — "... Smith's plucky proposal to run his notable tat, Pickles."—Oakfield, i. 94.

1873. — "... They keep close all day for 3 or 4 Months together . . . repelling the Heat by a coarse wet Cloath, continually hanging before the chamber-windows."—Fryer, 47.

1808. — "... now, when the hot winds have set in, and we are obliged to leave them and go abroad, the heat acts so powerfully on the body that you are commonly affected with a severe catarrh."—In Carey, Good Old Days, i. 80.

1808. — "... now, when the hot winds have set in, and we are obliged to leave them and go abroad, the heat acts so powerfully on the body that you are commonly affected with a severe catarrh."—In Carey, Good Old Days, i. 80.

1809. — "... Our style of architecture is by no means adapted to the climate, and the large windows would be insufferable, were it not for the tattys which are easily applied to a house one story high."—Ed. Valenbia, i. 104.

1810. — "... During the hot winds tats (a kind of mat), made of the root of the koosa grass, which has an agreeable smell, are placed against the doors and windows."—Maria Graham, 125.

1814. — "... Under the roof, throughout all the apartments, are iron rings, from which the tattes or screens of sweet scented grass, were suspended."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 6; [2nd ed. ii. 392].

1828. — "... An early breakfast was over; the well watered tattes were applied to the windows, and diffused through the apartment a cool and refreshing atmosphere which was most comfortably contrasted with the white heat and roar of the fierce wind without."—The Kuzzibush, I. ii.

TATTY. s. Hind. tattì and tattà, which Platts connects with Skt. tantra, 'a thread, the warp in a loom'. A screen or mat made of the roots of fragrant grass (see CUSCUS) with which door or window openings are filled up in the season of hot winds. The screens being kept wet, their fragrant evaporation as the dry winds blow upon them cools and refreshes the house greatly, but they are only efficient when such winds are blowing. See also THERMANTIDOTE. The principle of the tatty is involved in the quotation from Dr. Fryer, though he does not mention the grass-mats.

TAVOY, n.p. A town and district of what we call the Tenasserim Province of B. Burma. The Burmese call it Dha-we; but our name is probably adopted from a Malay form. The original name is supposed to be Siamse. [The Burmah Gazetteer (ii. 681) gives the choice of three etymologies: 'landing place of bamboos'; from its arms (dha, 'a sword,' way, 'to buy'); from Hta-way, taken from a cross-legged Buddha.]

1553.—"The greater part of this tract is mountainous, and inhabited by the nation of Brammas and Jangomas, who interpose on the east of this kingdom ( Pegu) between it and the great kingdom of Siam; which kingdom of Siam borders the sea from the city of Tavoy downwards."—Barros, III. iii. 4.

1583.—"Also some of the rich people in a place subject to the Kingdom of Pegu, called Tavoe, where is produced a quantity of what they call in their language Calatia, but which in our language is called Calais (see CALAY), in summer leave their houses and go into the country, where they make some sheds to cover them, and there they stop three months, leaving their usual dwellings with food in them for the devil, and this they do in order that in the other nine months he may give them no trouble, but rather be propitious and favourable to them."—G. Balbi, i. 125.

1587.—"... Island of Tav¢, from which cometh great store of Tinne which serveth all India."—R. Fitch, in Halk. ii. 395.

1695.—"10th. That your Majesty, of your wonted favour and charity to all distresses, would be pleased to look with Eyes of Pity, upon the poor English Captive, Thomas Browne, who is the only one surviving of four that were accidentally drove into Tanwy by Storm, as they were going for Atchen about 10 years ago, in the service of the English Company."—Petition to the King of Burmah, presented at Ava by Edward Fleetwood, in Dalrymple, Or. Repert. ii. 374.

[TAWEEZ, s. Ar. ta'wiz, lit. 'praying for protection by invoking God, or by uttering a charm'; then 'an amulet or phylactery'; and, as in the quotation from Herklotz, 'a structure of brick or stone-work over a tomb.' [1826.—"Let her who doth this Tawey wear, Guard against the Gossins's snare."

Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 148.

[1832.—"The generality of people have the tombs of dead persons made of mud or stone... forming first three square Tawees or platforms...."—Herklotz, Qanun-e-Islam, 2nd ed. 284.]

[TAZEE, s. Pers. tazz, 'invading, invader;' from tiz, 'running.' A favourite variety of horse, usually of Indian breed. The word is also used of a variety of greyhound. [c. 1590.—"Horses have been divided into seven classes... Arabs, Persian horses, Mughal, Turki horses, Yaboo (see YABOO) and Jangiah horses. The last two classes are also mostly Indian breed. The best kind is called Tazz. "—Arts, i. 234-5.

[1839.—"A good breed of the Indian kind, called Tazzoa, is also found in Bennoo and Damann. ..."—Elphinstone, Cawki, ed. 1842, i. 189.

[1888.—"The Tazzee, or greyhounds are not looked upon as useless...."—Wills, Modern Persia, ed. 1891, p. 306.

TAZEEA, n. A.—P.—H. ta'ziiya, 'mourning for the dead.' In India the word is applied to the taboot, or representations, in flimsy material, of the tombs of Hussein and Hassan which are carried about in the Muharram (see MOHURRAM) processions. In Persia it seems to be applied to the whole of the mystery-play which is presented at that season. At the close of the procession the ta'ziya must be thrown into water; if there be no sufficient mass of water they should be buried. [See Sir L. Pelly, The Miracle Play of Hasan and Husain.] The word has been carried to the W. Indies by the coolies, whose great festival (whether they be Mahomedans or Hindus) the Muharram has become. And the attempt to carry the Tazeas through one of the towns of Trinidad, in spite of orders to the contrary, led in the end of 1884 to a sad catastrophe. [Mahomedan Lascars have an annual celebration at the London Docks.]

1809.—"There were more than a hundred Taziiyas, each followed by a long train of Fuquieres, dressed in the most extravagant manner, beating their breasts... such of the Mahatta Surchars as are not Brahmins, frequently construct Taziiyas at their own tent, and expend large sums of money upon them."—Broughton, Letters, 72; ed. 1892, 53.
1869. — "En lisant la description . . . de ces fêtes on croira souvent qu'il s'agit de fêtes hindous. Telle est par exemple la solennité du taśa ou detul, établie en commémoration du martyre de Huçain, laquelle est semblable en bien de points à celle du Durga-puja. . . . Le tasiya dure dix jours comme le Durga-puja. Le dixième jour, les Hindous précipitent dans la rivière la statue de la déesse au milieu d'une foule immense, avec un grand appareil et au son de mille instruments de musique; la même chose a lieu pour les représentations du tombeau de Huçain."—Garin de Tassy, Rel. Musulm. p. 11.

TEA. s. Crawford alleges that we got this word in its various European forms from the Malay Te, the Chinese name being Chhā. The latter is indeed the pronunciation attached, when reading in the 'mandarin dialect,' to the character representing the tea-plant, and is the form which has accompanied the knowledge of tea to India, Persia, Portugal, Greece (ταρά) and Russia. But though it may be probable that Te, like several other names of articles of trade, may have come to us through the Malay, the word is, not the less, originally Chinese, Ti (or Tay as Medhurst writes it) being the utterance attached to the character in the Fuh-kien dialect. The original pronunciation, whether direct from Fuh-kien or through the Malay, accompanied the introduction of tea to England as well as other countries of Western Europe. This is shown by several couplets in Pope, e.g.

". . . There stands a structure of majestic frame Which from the neighbouring Hampton takes its name. . . .
Here thou, great ANNA, whom three Realms obey, Dost sometimes counsel take, and sometimes tea."

Rape of the Lock, iii.

Here tay was evidently the pronunciation, as in Fuh-Kien. The Rape of the Lock was published in 1711. In Gray's Trivia, published in 1720, we find tea rhyme to pay, in a passage needless to quote (ii. 296). Fifty years later there seems no room for doubt that the pronunciation had changed to that now in use, as is shown by Johnson's extemporised verses (c. 1770):

"I therefore pray thee, Renny, dear,
That thou wilt give to me
With cream and sugar softly'd well, Another dish of tea"—and so on.

The change must have taken place between 1720 and 1750, for about the latter date we find in the verses of Edward Moore:

"One day in July last at tea,
And in the house of Mrs. P."

The Trial of Sarah, &c.

[But the two forms of pronunciation seem to have been in use earlier, as appears from the following advertisement in The Gazette of Sept. 9, 1658 (quoted in 8 ser. N. & Q. vi. 266): "That excellent, and by all Physitians approved, China Drink, called by the Chinesans Toha, by other nations Tay, alias Tee, is sold at the Sultaness Head, a coffee house in Sweetings Rents by the Royal Exchange, London." And in Zedler's Lexicon (1745) it is stated that the English write the word either Tee or Taa, but pronounce it Tiy, which seems to represent our modern pronunciation. ["Strange to say, the Italians, however, have two names for tea, cia and te, the latter, of course, is from the Chinese word te, noticed above, while the former is derived from the word ch'a. It is curious to note in this connection that an early mention, if not the first notice, of the word in English is under the form cha (in an English Glossary of A.D. 1671); we are also told that it was once spelt tcha—both evidently derived from the Cantonese form of the word: but 13 years later we have the word derived from the Fokienese te, but borrowed through the French and spelt as in the latter language the; the next change in the word is early in the following century when it drops the French spelling and adopts the present form of tea, though the Fokieneese pronunciation, which the French still retain, is not dropped for the modern pronunciation of the now wholly Anglicised word tea till comparatively lately. It will thus be seen that we, like the Italians, might have had two forms of the word, had we not discarded the first, which seemed to have made but little lodgement with us, for the second." (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 583 seq.)]
Dr. Bretschneider states that the Tea-shrub is mentioned in the ancient Dictionary Râ-ya, which is believed to date long before our era, under the names K'ia and K'ü-tü (K'ü=‘bitter’), and a commentator on this work who wrote in the 4th century A.D. describes it, adding “From the leaves can be made by boiling a hot beverage” (On Chinese Botanical Works, &c., p. 13). But the first distinct mention of tea-cultivation in Chinese history is said to be a record in the annals of the Tang Dynasty under A.D. 793, which mentions the imposition in that year of a duty upon tea. And the first western mention of it occurs in the next century, in the notes of the Arab traders, which speak not only of tea, but of this fact of its being subject to a royal impost. Tea does not appear to be mentioned by the medieval Arab writers upon Materia Medica, nor (strange to say) do any of the European travellers to Cathay in the 13th and 14th centuries make mention of it. Nor is there any mention of it in the curious and interesting narrative of the Embassy sent by Shâh Rukh, the son of the great Timur, to China (1419-21).* The first European work, so far as we are aware, in which tea is named, is Ramusio’s (posthumous) Introduction to Marco Polo, in the second volume of his great collection of Navigationi e Viaggi. In this he repeats the account of Cathay which he had heard from Hajji Mahommed, a Persian merchant who visited Venice. Among other matters the Hajji detailed the excellent properties of Chia Catâi (i.e. Pers. Châh-i-Khidâ, ‘Tea of China’), concluding with an assurance that if these were known in Persia and in Europe, traders would cease to purchase rhubarb, and would purchase this herb instead, a prophecy which has been very substantially verified. We find no mention of tea in the elaborate work of Mendoca on China. The earliest notices of which we are aware will be found below. Milburn

* Mr. Major, in his Introduction to Parkes’s Mendoca for the Hak. Soc. says of this embassy, that at their halt in the desert 13 marches from So-chau, they were regaled “with a variety of strong liquors, together with a pot of Chinese tea.” It is not stated by Mr. Major whence he took the account; but there is nothing about tea in the translation of M. Quatemere (not, at Est. xiv. pt. 1), nor in the Persian text given by him, nor in the translation by Mr. Rehanka in the Ind. Ant. ii. 75 seqq.

Dr. Milburn gives some curious extracts from the E.I. Co.’s records as to the early importation of tea into England. Thus, 1666, June 30, among certain “rarety,” chiefly the production of China, provided by the Secretary of the Company for His Majesty, appear:

“221 lbs. of tea at 50s. per lb. =£56 17 6
For the two cheepe persons that attended his Majesty,
then . . . . . . 6 15 6”

In 1667 the E.I. Co.’s first order for the importation of tea was issued to their agent at Bantam: “to send home by these ships 100lb. weight of the best tea that you can get.” The first importation actually made for the Co. was in 1669, when two canisters were received from Bantam, weighing 143½ lbs. (Milburn, ii. 531.) [The earliest mention of tea in the Old Records of the India Office is in a letter from Mr. R. Wickham, the Company’s Agent at Firando, in Japan, who, writing, June 27, 1615, to Mr. Eaton at Miaco, asks for “a pt. of the best sort of chaw” (see Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 26, where the early references are collected).]

A.D. 851.—“The King (of China) reserves to himself . . . a duty on salt, and also on a certain herb which is drunk infused in hot water. This herb is sold in all the towns at high prices; it is called sakha. It has more leaves than the robâb (Medicago sativa recens) and something more of aroma, but its taste is bitter. Water is boiled and poured upon this herb. The drink so made is serviceable under all circumstances.”—Relation, &c., trad. par Reynaud, i. 40.

c. 1545.—“Moreover, seeing the great delight that I above the rest of the party took in this discourse of his, he (Chagg: Memet, i.e. Hajji Mahommed), asked me that all over the country of Cathay they make use of another plant, that is of its leaves, which is called by those people Chial Catâi: it is produced in that district of Cathay which is called Cachanfu. It is a thing generally used and highly esteemed in all those regions. They take this plant whether dry or fresh, and make it well in water, and of this decoction they take one or two cups on an empty stomach; it removes fever, headache, stomach-ache, pain in the side or joints; taking care to drink it as hot as you can bear; it is good also for many other ailments which I can’t now remember, but I know gout was one of them. And if one chance to feel his stomach oppressed by overmuch food, if he will take a little of this decoction he will in a short time have digested it. And thus it is so precious and highly esteemed that every one going on a journey takes it with him, and judging from what he said these people would at any time gladly swap a sack of rhubarb for an ounce of Chiai Cathai. These people of Cathay say (he told us) that if in our country, and in Persia, and the land of the Franks, it was known, merchants would no longer invest their money in Rhubarb."—Ra-musio, Dicbirationes, in ii. f. 15.

1560.—"Whatsoever person or persons come to any man's house of qualities, he hath a custom to offer him in a fine basket one Porcelane . . . with a kind of drinks which they call chia, which is somewhat bitter, red, and medicinal, which they are wont to make with a certaine concoction of herbes."—De Oris, in Purchas, iii. 180.

1565.—"Ritus est Japanorum . . . benevolentiae causa praebere spectandas, quae apud se pretiosissima sunt, id est, omnino instrumentum necessarium ad po-

1800. — "... Of all the followers of Mahomet ... none are so rigidly Abstemious as the Arabians of Muscut, ... For Tea and Coffee, which are judged the privilege'd Liquors of all the Mahometans, as well as Turks, as those of Persia, India, and other parts of Arabia, are condemned by them as unlawful." — Ovington, 427.

1796. — "I remember well how in 1681 I for the first time in my life drank thee at the house of an Indian Chaplain, and how I could not understand how sensible men could think it a treat to drink what tasted no better than bay-water." — Valentijn, v. 190.

1789. — "And now her vase a modest Naiad fills With liquid crystal from her pebbly rills; Files the dry cedar round her silver urn, (Bright climbs the blaze, the cracking faggots burn.) Culls the green herb of China's envy'd bowers, In gaudy cups the steaming treasure pours; And sweetly smiling, on her bended knee, Presents the fragrant quintessence of Tea." — Darwin, Botanic Garden, Loves of the Plants, Canto ii.

1844. — "The Polish word for tea, Herbata, signifies more properly 'herb,' and in fact there is little more of the genuine Chinese beverage in the article itself than in its name, so that we often thought with longing of the delightful Russian Thahat, genuine in word and fact." — J. I. Kohl, Austria, p. 444.

The following are some of the names given in the market to different kinds of tea, with their etymologies.

1. (TEA) BOHEA. This name is from the Wu-i (dialectically Bû-tî) Shan Mountains in the N.W. of Fuh-kien, one of the districts most famous for its black tea. In Pope's verse, as Crawford points out, Bohea stands for a tea in use among fashionable people. Thus:

"To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea, To muse, and spill her solitary tea."
—Epistle to Mrs Teresa Blount.

[The earliest examples in the N.E.D. carry back the use of the word to the first years of the 18th century.]

1711. — "There is a parcel of extraordinary fine Bohee Tea to be sold at 2s. per Pound, at the sign of the Barber's Pole, next door to the Brazier's Shop in Southamptton Street in the Strand." — Advt. in the Spectator of April 2, 1711.

1711. — "Oh had I rather unadmired remained On some lone isle or distant northern land;
Where the gilt chariot never marks the way,
Where none learn ombre, none e'er taste boheas."
— Belinda, in Rape of the Lock, iv. 153.

The last quotation, and indeed the first also, shows that the word was then pronounced Bohay. At a later date Bohea sank to be the market name of one of the lowest qualities of tea, and we believe it has ceased altogether to be a name quoted in the tea-market. The following quotations seem to show that it was the general name for "black-tea."

1711. — "Bohea is of little Worth among the Moors and Gentoo's of India, Arabs and Persians: ... that of 45 Tale (see Tea) would not fetch the Price of green Tea of 10 Tale a Pecull." — Locke, 115.

1721. — "Where Indus and the double Ganges flow,
On odoriferous plains the leaves do grow,
Chief of the treat, a plant the boast of fame Sometimes called green, Bohea's the greater name."
— Allan Ramsey's Poems, ed. 1800, i. 214-14.

1726. — "Anno 1670 and 1680 there was knowledge only of Boey Tea and Green Tea, but later they speak of a variety of other sorts ... Congo ... Pago ... Tongue, Ramaryn Tea, rare and very dear."

1727. — "In September they strip the Bush of all its Leaves, and, for Want of warm dry Winds to cure it, are forced to lay it on warm Plates of Iron or Copper, and keep it stirring gently, till it is dry, and that Sort is called Bohea." — A. Hamilton, ii. 289; [ed. 1744, ii. 288].

But Zedler's Lexicon (1745) in a long article on Tea gives Thee Boheas as "the worst sort of all." The other European trade-names, according to Zedler, were The-Mocco, Congo which the Dutch called the best, but Thee Cancho was better still and dearer, and Chaucon best of all.

2. (TEA) CAMPOY, a black tea also. Kam-pui, the Canton prom. of the characters Kien-ui, "select-dry (over a fire)."

3. (TEA) CONGOU (a black tea). This is Kang-hu (tâ) the Amoy pronunciation of the characters Kung-fe, 'work or labour.' [Mr. Pratt (9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 26) writes: "The N.E.D. under Congou derives it from the standard Chinese Kung-fu (which happens also to be the Cantonese spelling); ‘the omission of the f,’ we are told, ‘is the foreigner’s corruption.’ It is nothing of the kind. The Amoy name for this tea is Kong-hu, so that the omission of the f is due to the local Chinese dialect.”]

4. HYSON (a green tea). This is He- (hes and as in the south) -ch’un, ‘bright spring,’ [which Mr. Ball (Things Chinese, 586) writes yu-te’in, ‘before the rain’], characters which some say formed the hong name of a tea-merchant named Le, who was in the trade in the dist. of Hiu-ning (S.W. of Hang-chau) about 1700; others say that He-chun was Le’s daughter, who was the first to separate the leaves, so as to make what is called Hyson. [Mr. Ball says that it is so called, “the young hyson being half-opened leaves plucked in April before the spring rains.”]

c. 1772.—
“...And Venus, goddess of the eternal smile, Knowing that stormy brows but ill become Fair patterns of her beauty, bath ordained Celestial Tea;—a fountain that can cure
The ills of passion, and can free from frowns.

To her, ye fair! in adoration bow!
Whether at blushing morn, or dewy eve,
Her smoking cordials greet your fragrant board
With Hyson, or Bohea, or Congo crown’d.”

R. Ferguson, Poems.

5. OOLONG (bl. tea). Wu-lung, ‘black dragon’; respecting which there is a legend to account for the name. [“A black snake (and snakes are sometimes looked upon as dragons in China) was coiled round a plant of this tea, and hence the name” (Ball, op. cit. 586).]

6. PEKOE (do.). Pak-ho, Canton pron. of characters poh-hao, ‘white-down.’

7. POUCHONG (do.). Pao-chung, ‘fold-sort.’ So called from its being packed in small paper packets, each of which is supposed to be the produce of one choice tea-plant. Also called Padre-souchong, because the priests in the Wu-i hills and other places prepare and pack it.

1781.—“Les Nations Européennes retirent de la Chine des thés connus sous les noms de thé bouy, thé vert, et thé saothon.”—Sonnert, ii. 249.

9. TWANKAY (green tea). From T’un-ki’, the name of a mart about 15 m. S.W. of Hwei-chau-fu in Nganhwei. Bp. Moule says (perhaps after W. Williams?) from T’un-k’i, name of a stream near Yen-shau-fu in Chi-kiang. [Mr. Pratt (loc. cit.) writes; “The Amoy Tun-ke is nearer, and the Cantonese Tun-kei nearer still, its second syllable being absolutely the same in sound as the English. The Twankay is a stream in the E. of the province of Nganhwui, where Twankay tea grows.”] Twankay is used by Theodore Hook as a sort of slang for ‘tea.’

10. YOUNG HYSON. This is called by the Chinese Yii-t’sien, ‘rain-before,’ or ‘Yu-before,’ because picked before K’ai-yu, a term falling about 20th April (see HYSON above). According to Giles it was formerly called, in trade, Uchain, which seems to represent the Chinese name. In an “Account of the Prices at which Teas have been put up to Sale, that arrived in England in 1784, 1785” (MS. India Office Records) the Teas are (from cheaper to dearer):—

“Bohea Tea.
Souchong, Hyson.”

TEA-CADDY, s. This name, in common English use for a box to contain tea for the daily expenditure of the household, is probably corrupted, as Crawford suggests, from catty, a weight of 1½ lb. (q.v.). A “catty-box,” meaning a box holding a catty, might easily serve this purpose and lead to the name. This view is corroborated by a quotation which we have given under caddy (q.v.) A friend adds the remark that in his youth ‘Tea-caddy’ was a Londoner’s name for Harley Street, due to the number of E.I. Directors and proprietors supposed to inhabit that district.
TEAPOY. 910

TEAPOY, s. A small tripod table. This word is often in England imagined to have some connection with tea, and hence, in London shops for japanned ware and the like, a teapoy means a tea-chest fixed on legs. But this is quite erroneous. Tepad is a Hindustâni, or perhaps rather an Anglo-Hindustâni word for a tripod, from Hind. tin, 3, and Pers. *pad, 'foot.' The legitimate word from the Persian is tipa (properly shktpda), and the legitimate Hindi word tipad or tripad, but tipa or tepay was probably originated by some European in analogy with the familiar charpoy (q.v.) or 'four-legs,' possibly from inaccuracy, possibly from the desire to avoid confusion with another very familiar word sepay, seapoy. [Platts, however, gives tipa as a regular Hind. word, Skt. tri-pada-stka.] The word is applied in India not only to a three-legged table (or any very small table, whatever number of legs it has), but to any tripod, as to the tripod-stands of surveying instruments, or to trestles in carpentry. Shktpda occurs in 'Ali of Yazd's history of Timur, as applied to the trestles used by Timur in bridging over the Indus (Elliott, iii. 482). A teapoy is called in Chinese by a name having reference to tea: viz. Châ-ch'ârh. It has 4 legs.

[c. 1809.—"(Dinapoor) Sepaya, a wooden stand for a lamp or candle with three feet." —Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 945.]

1844.—"Well, to be sure, it does seem odd—very odd;—and the old gentleman chuckled,—'most odd to find a person who don't know what a teapoy is. ... Well, then, a teapoy or tripoy is a thing with three feet, used in India to denote a little table, such as that just at your right.'

"'Why, that table has four legs,' cried Peregrine.

"'It's a teapoy all the same,' said Mr. Havethelacks."—Peregrine Pulteney, i. 112.

TEAK, s. The tree, and timber of the tree, known to botanists as Tectona grandis, L., N.O. Verbenaceae. The word is Malayâl. tekka, Tam. tekku. No doubt this name was adopted owing to the fact that Europeans first became acquainted with the wood in Malabar, which is still one of the two great sources of supply; Pegu being the other. The Skt. name of the tree is taka, whence the modern Hind. name sâgad or sâgen and the Mahr. âdg. From this last probably was taken âdj, the name of teak in Arabic and Persian. And we have doubtless the same word in the savalda of the Periplus, one of the exports from Western India, a form which may be illustrated by the Mahr. adj. sâgâl, 'made of the teak, belonging to teak.' The last fact shows, in some degree, how old the export of teak is from India. Teak beams, still undecayed, exist in the walls of the great 'palace of the Sassanid Kings at Seleucia or Ctesiphon, dating from the middle of the 6th century. [See Birdwood, First Letter Book, Intro. XXIX.] Teak has continued to recent times to be imported into Egypt. See Forskal, quoted by Royle (Hindu Medicine, 198). The gopher-wood of Genesis is translated âdj in the Arabic version of the Pentateuch (Royle). [It was probably cedar (see Encycl. Bibl. s.v.)]

Teak seems to have been hardly known in Gangetic India in former days. We can find no mention of it in Baber (which however is indexless), and the only mention we can find in the Ain, is in a list of the weights of a cubic yard of 72 kinds of wood, where the name "Sâgaun" has not been recognised as teak by the learned translator (see Blochmann's E.T. i. p. 228).

c. A.D. 80.—"In the innermost part of this Gulf (the Persian) is the Port of Apo- logos, lying near Pasea Charax and the river Euphrates.

"Sailing past the mouth of the Gulf, after a course of 8 days you reach another port of Persia called Omnah. Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza, to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers and beams of teak (तुक, savalda or kal doqol), and horns and spars of shisham (see BISCOO (कारवालव)) and of ebony. . . ."—Peripl. Maris Eryth. § 35-36.

1800.—(under Hârûn al Rashid) "Farl continued his story . . . I heard loud wailing from the house of Abdallah . . . they told me he had been struck with the judâm, that his body was swollen and all black. . . . I went to Rashid to tell him, but I had not finished when they came to say Abdallah was dead. Going out at once I ordered them to hasten the obsequies. . . . I myself said the funeral prayer. As they let down the bier a slip took place, and the bier and earth fell in together; an intolerable stench arose . . . a second slip took place. I then called for planks of teak (âk). . . ."—Quotation in Magîdî, Prairies d'Or, vi. 298-299.

c. 880.—"From Kol to Sindân, where they collect teak-wood (âk) and cane, 18 far-
The following order, in a King's Letter to the Goa Government, no doubt refers to Pegu teak, though not naming the particular timber :

1597. — "We enjoin you to be very vigilant not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegu, nor from that of Achem (see ACHEEN), and you must arrange how to treat this matter, particularly with the King of Achem." — In Archiv. Port. Orient. fisc. li. 606.

1602. — "... It was necessary in order to appease them, to give a promise in writing that the body should not be removed from the house, but should have public burial in our church in sight of everybody; and with this assurance it was taken in solemn procession and deposited in a box of teak (teca), which is a wood not subject to decay. ..." — Souza, Orient. Conquest. (1710), ii. 285.

1631. — Bontius gives a tolerable cut of the foliage, &c., of the Teak-tree, but writing in the Archipelago does not use that name, describing it under the title "Karnkja, Kista Maalja dinta." — Lib. vi. cap. 16. On this Rheeved, whose plate of the tree is, as usual, excellent (Hortus Malabaricus, iv. tab. 27), observes justly that the teak has no resemblance to an oak-tree, and also that the Malay name is not Kista but Jati: Kista seems to be a mistake of some kind growing out of Kayj-jati, 'Teak-wood.'

1644. — "Hi nastas terras de Damam muyta e boa madeyra de Teca, a milhor de toda a India, e tambem de muyta parte do mundo, porque com ser muy fasil de larar he perdurable, e particularmente nam he tocando ages." — Bocarro, MS.

1675. — "At Cock-crow we parted hence and observed that the Sheds here were round thatched and lined with broad Leaves of Teca (the Timber Ships are built with) in Fashion of a Bee-hive." — Fryer, 142.

1727. — "Gundave is next, where good Quantities of Teak Timber are out, and exported, being of excellent Use in building of Houses or Ships." — A. Hamilton, i. 178; [ed. 1744].

1744. — "Tecka is the name of costly wood which is found in the Kingdom of Martaban in the East Indies, and which never decays." — Seidler, Unum Lexicon, s.v.

1759. — "They had endeavoured to burn the Teak Timbers also, but they lying in a sunky place, could not take fire." — Capt. Alves, Report on Loss of Negrias, in Dalrymple, i. 349.

c. 1760. — "As to the wood it is a sort called Teak, to the full as durable as oak." — Gros, i. 108.

1777. — "Experience hath long since shewn, that ships built with oak, and joined together with wooden trunnels, are by no means so well calculated to resist the extremes of heat and damp, in the tropical latitudes of Asia, as the ships which are built in India of Teakwood, and bound with iron spikes and bolts." — Price's Tracts, i. 191.

1798. — "The teak forests, from whence the marine yard at Bombay is furnished with that excellent species of ship-timber, lie along the western side of the Gout mountains ... on the north and north-east of Bussean ... I cannot close this subject without remarking the unpardonable negligence we are guilty of in delaying to build teak ships of war for the service of the Indian seas." — Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. 260.

[1800. — "Tayca, Tectona Robusta." — Buchanan, Mysore; i. 26.]

TEE. s. The metallic decoration, generally gilt and hung with tinkling bells, on the top of a dagoba in Indo-Chinese countries, which represents the chaturas [chhattras] or umbrellas which in ancient times, as royal emblems, crowned these structures. Burm. Hti, 'an umbrella.'

1800. — "... In particular the Tee, or umbrella, which, composed of open iron-work, crowned the spire, had been thrown down."—Symes, i. 198.

1855.—"... gleaming in its white plaster, with numerous pinnacles and tall central spire, we had seen it (Gaudapalen Temple at Pugan) from far down the Irawadi rising like a dim vision of Milan Cathedral. It is cruciform in plan... exhibiting a massive basement with porches, and rising above in a pyramidal gradation of terraces, crowned by a spire and hato. The latter has broken from its stays at one side, and now leans over almost horizontally... "—Yule, Mission to Ava, 1858, p. 42.

1876.—"... a feature known to Indian archaeologists as a Tree..."—Ferguson, Ind. and East. Archit. 64.

TEEK, adj. Exact, precise, punctual; also parsimonious, [a meaning which Platts does not record]. Used in N. India. Hind. thik.

[1843.—"They all feel that the good old rule of right (teek), as long as a man does his duty well, can no longer be relied upon."—G. W. Johnson, Stranger in India, i. 290.]

[1878.—"... it is necessary to send an explanation to the magistrate, and the return does not look so thak (a word expressing all excellence)."—Life in the Mojinaiti, i. 253.]

TEERUT, TEERTHA, s. Skt. and Hind. tirth, tirtha. A holy place of pilgrimage and of bathing for the good of the soul, such as Hurdwar, or the confluence at Praga (Allahabad).

[1823.—"The Gentiles call it Ramtirth, that is, Holy Water."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 205.]

C. 1790.—"Au temple l’enfant est reçu par les devas (Deva-dast) des mains des parents, on arbre baignée dans le tirtha ou étang du temple, elles lui mettent des vêtements neufs..."—Hafsa, ii. 114.

[1858.—"He then summoned to the place no less than three corses and half, or thirty millions and half of teerutis, or angels (sic) who preside each over his special place of religious worship."—Heeman, Journey through Oudh, ii. 4.]

TEHR, TAIR, &c., s. The wild goat of the Himalaya; Hemitragus jemilacus, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 508]. In Nepal it is called jhadar. (See SROBOW.)

TEJPAT, s. Hind. tejpat, Skt. tejapatra, "pungent leaf." The native name for malabathrum.

1833.—"Last night as I was writing a long description of the tea-pat, the leaf of the cinnamon-tree, which humbly pecks beef, leaving the honour of crowning heroes to the Laurus nobilis..."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 278.

1872.—Tejpat is mentioned as sold by the village shopkeeper, in Govinda Sawanka, i. 223.

(1) TELINGA, n.p. Hind. Telang, Skt. Taxalanga. One of the people of the country east of the Deccan, and extending to the coast, often called, at least since the Middle Ages, Tilingana or Tilingana, sometimes Tiling or Tilingle. Though it has not, perhaps, been absolutely established that this came from a form Trilinka, the habitual application of Tri-Kalina, apparently to the same region which in later days was called Tilinga, and the example of actual use of Tilinga, both by Ptolemy (though he carries us beyond the Ganges) and by a Tibetan author quoted below, do make this a reasonable supposition (see Bp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar, 2nd ed. Introd. pp. 30 seqq., and the article KLING in this book).

A.D. c. 150.—"Trilinka, to kai Tril-inka, Basilios... k. k. A."—Ptolemy, vi. 2, 23.

1309.—"On Saturday the 10th of Shab'a, the army marched from that spot, in order that the pure tree of Islaém might be planted and flourish in the soil of Tilang, and the evil tree which had struck its roots deep, might be torn up by force... When the blessed canopy had been fixed about a mile from Arangal (Warangal, N.E. of Hyderabad), the tents around the fort were pitched so closely that the head of a needle could not get between them."—A'ad Khan, in Elliot, ii. 80.

1321.—"In the year 721 H. the Sultan (Ghiyas-ud-din) sent his eldest son, Ulugh Khan, with a canopy and an army against Arangal and Tilang."—Zaiduddin Barai, Ibid. 231.

c. 1335.—"For every mile along the road there are three dawat (post stations)... and so the road continues for six months' marching, till one reaches the countries of Tilang and Mas'ar..."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 192.

In the list of provinces of India under the Sultan of Delhi, given by Shihab-ud-din Dimishki, we find both Talang and Talaha, probably through some mistake.—Not. et Ext. Pt. i. 170-171.

c. 1590.—"Suba Berar. ... Its length from Badia (or Patia) to Bairagari is 200 Korok (or koe); its breadth from Bilar to Hindia 180. On the east of Bairagari it marches with Bator; on the north with Hindia; on the south with Tilinga; on the west with Makarabid..."—IIs (orig.) i. 476; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228; and see 230, 237].
1808.—"In the southern lands of India, since the day when the Turushkas (Turks, i.e. Mahomedans) conquered Magadha, many abodes of Learning were founded; and though they were inconsiderable, the continuance of instruction and exorcism was without interruption, and the Pandit who was called the Son of Men, dwelt in Kalinga, a part of Telinga."—Tarandhaka’s H. of Buddhaist. (Germ. ed. of Schiefner), p. 284. See also 118, 159, 166.

c. 1614.—"Up to that time none of the samindara of distant lands, such as the Raja of Telang, Pegu, and Malabar, had ventured upon disobedience or rebellion."—Firiksha, in Elliot, vol. vii. 549.

1793.—"Telingana, of which Wallangoll was the capital, comprehended the tract lying between the Kistnah and Godavery rivers, and east of Vissiapour...."—Rennell’s Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [cxi.]

(2) TELINGA, s. This term in the 18th century was frequently used in Bengal as synonymous with sepoys, or a native soldier disciplined and clothed in quasi-European fashion, [and is still commonly used by natives to indicate a sepoy or armed policeman in N. India] no doubt because the first soldiers of that type came to Bengal from what was considered to be the Telinga country, viz. Madras.

1758.—"... the latter commanded a body of Hindu soldiers, armed and acoutred and disciplined in the European manner of fighting; I mean those soldiers that are become so famous under the name of Telingas."—Seir Musaquerhin, ii. 92.

c. 1758.—"... Sepoys, sometimes called Telingas."—Grose, in his Glossary, see vol. i. xiv.

1760.—"... 300 Telingees are run away, and entered into the Beerboom Rajah’s service."—In Long, 235; see also 236, 237, and (1761) p. 258, Tellingers.

c. 1765.—"Somoro’s force, which amounted to 15 or 16 field-pieces and 6000 or 7000 of those foot soldiers called Talinghas, and which are armed with flint munition, and accoutred as well as disciplined in the French or European manner."—Seir Musaquerhin, ii. 254.

1766.—"... Gardi (see GARDEE), which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India, save Bengal... where they are stiled Telingas, because the first Sipahies that came in Bengal (and they were imported in 1757 by Colonel Clive) were all Telingas or Telungous born... speaking hardly any language but their native..."—Note by Tr. of Seir Musaquerhin, ii. 93.

c. 1805.—"The battalions, according to the old mode of France, were called after the names of cities and forts.... The Telingas, composed mostly of Hindoos, from Oude, were disciplined according to the old English exercise of 1780..."—Sketch of the Regular Corps, &c., in Service of Native Princes, by Major Lewis Ferdinand Smith, p. 50.

1827.—"You are a Sahib Angrezie. ... I have been a Telinga... in the Company’s service, and have eaten their salt. I will do your errand."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon’s Daughter, ch. xiii.

1833.—"We have heard from natives whose grandfathers lived in those times, that the Oriental portions of Clive’s army were known to the Bengalis of Nundea as Telingas, because they came, or were supposed to have accompanied him from Telingana or Madras."—Saty. Review, Jan. 29, p. 120.

TELOOOGO, n.p. The first in point of diffusion, and the second in culture and copiousness, of the Dravidian languages of the Indian Peninsula. It is "spoken all along the eastern coast of the Peninsula, from the neighbourhood of Pulicat" (94 m. N. of Madras) "where it supersedes Tamil, to Chicaole, where it begins to yield to the Oriya (see OONIYA), and inland it prevails as far as the eastern boundary of the Maratha country and Mysore, including within its range the ‘Ceded Districts’ and Karnul (see KURNOOL), a considerable part of the territories of the Nizam... and a portion of the Nagpûr country and Gond vána" (Bp. Caldwell’s Dravid. Gram. Intro. p. 29). Telugu is the name given to the language of the people themselves (other forms being, according to Bp. Caldwell, Telunga, Telinga, Tellinga, Tenugu, and Tenungu), as the language of Telingâna (see TELINGA (1)). This is its language (as appears in the passage from Fryer) that used to be, perhaps sometimes is, called Gentoo at Madras. [Also see BADEGA.]

1673.—"Their Language they call generally Gentu... the peculiar name of their speech is Telinga."—Fryer, 33.

1783.—"The Telinga language is said to be in use, at present, from the River Penmar in the Carnatic, to Orissa, along the coast, and inland to a very considerable distance."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [cxi.]

TEMBOOOL, Betel-leaf. Skt. tăm-bâl, adopted in Pers. as tăm-bâl, and in Ar. al-tâm-bâl. [It gives its name to the Tambolhis or Tamolis, sellers of betel in the N. Indian bazars.]
TENASSERIM, n.p. A city and territory on the coast of the Peninsula of Further India. It belonged to the ancient kingdom of Pegu, and fell with that to Ava. When we took from the latter the provinces east and south of the Delta of the Irrawadi, after the war of 1824-28, these were officially known as "the Martaban and Tenasserim Province," or often as "the Tenasserim Provinces." We have the name probably from the Malay form Tanasari. We do not know to what language the name originally belongs. The Burmese call it Ta-tena-ri.[* "The name Tenasserim (Malay Tanah-sari), 'the land of happiness or delight,' was long ago known with that to Ava. When we know to what the name probably comes from the Malay form Tanah-sari, 'the land of happiness or delight,' was long given by the Malays to the Burmese province, which still keeps it, the Burmese corruption being Tanang-sari" (Gray, on Pyrard de Laval, quoted below).]

1489.—"The inhabitants of the shores of the Ocean come thither (to Hormuz) from the countries of Chia (China), Jâvâh, Bânsâla, the cities of Zirbâd (q.v.), of Tenasserim, of Sokotâra, of Shahrinao (see BARNAU), of the Isles of Diwhâ Mahâl (Maldives)."—Abdur-rassãl, in Not. et Acta. xiv. 429.

1498.—"Tenesar is peopled by Christians, and the King is also a Christian ... in this land is much brassyl, which makes a fine vermilion, as good as the grain, and it costs here 8 cruzados a bahar; whilst in Quayro (Cairo) it costs 90; also there is here aloe-wood, but not much."—Pereira de V. da Gama, 110.

1501.—Tanaeser appears in the list of places in the East Indies of which Amerigo Vespucci had heard from the Portuguese fleet at C. Verde. Printed in Baldeiti Bosis II Milione, pp. liii. seqq.

1506.—"At Tenassar grows all the versi (brazil, and it costs ½ ducatos the bear (bahar), equal to 4 kantars. This place, though on the coast, is on the mainland. The King is a Gentile; and thence comes pepper, cinnamon, galanga, camphor that is eaten, and camphor that is not eaten .... This is indeed the first mart of spaces in India."—Leonardo Co' Maser, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. p. 28.

1510.—"The city of Tanaasari is situated near the sea, etc."—Varthema, 195. This adventurer's account of Tenasserim is an imposture. He describes it by implication as in India Proper, somewhere to the north of Coromandel.

1516.—"And from the Kingdom of Pegu as far as a city which has a seaport, and is named Tenassary, there are a hundred leagues ..."—Barbosa, 188.

1588.—"The Pilot told us that rose by his altitude not far from a city called Tenassary, in the Kingdom of Pegu."—C. Frederik, in Halk. ii. 359. See Lancaster.

c. 1590.—"In Kambayat (Cambay) a Nâk-huda (Naada) gets 800 R. ... In Pegu and Dabnassari, he gets half as much again as in Cambay."—Alm. i. 281.

1598.—"Between two Islands the coast runneth inwards like a bow, wherein lyeth the town of Tenassari."—Lincoln, Hak. Soc. i. 103. In the same page he writes Tenassarla.

1608.—"The small quantities they have here come from Tanserisya."—Davies, Letters, i. 22.

[c. 1610.—"Some Indians call it (Ceylon) Tenasirin, signifying land of delights, or earthly paradise."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 140, with Gray's note (Hak. Soc.) quoted above.]

1727.—"Mr. Samuel White was made Governor of Sham-bender (Shambone) or Custom-Master at Merjoe (Mergui) and Tana-sirin, and Captain Williams was Admiral of the King's Navy."—A. Hamilton, ii. 64; [ed. 1744].

1783.—"Tana-sirin. ..."—Forrest V. to Mergui, 4.

TERAI, TERYE, s. Hind. târdî, 'moist (land) from tar, 'moist' or 'green.' [Others, however, connect it with tara, tâla, 'beneath (the Himalaya).'] The term is specially applied to a belt of marshy and jungly land which runs along the foot of the Himalayas north of the Ganges, being that zone in which the moisture which has sunk into the talus of porous material exudes. A tract on the south side of the Ganges, now part of Bha-galâpur, was also formerly known as the Jungle-terry (q.v.).

1793.—"Hellours, though standing very little below the level of Cheesir Ghat's top is nevertheless comprehended in the Turry or Turryani of Nepaul . . . Turryani properly signifies low marshy lands, and is sometimes applied to the flats lying below the hills in the interior of Nepaul, as well as to the low tract bordering immediately on the Company’s northern frontier.”—Kirkpatrick’s Nepaul (1811), p. 40.

1824.—“Mr. Boulderson said he was sorry to learn from the raja that he did not consider the unhealthy season of the Terrai yet over . . . I asked Mr. B. if it were true that the monkeys forsok these woods during the unwholesome months. He answered that not the monkeys only, but everything which had the breath of life instinctively deserts them from the beginning of April to October. The tigers go up to the hills, the antelopes and wild hogs make incursions into the cultivated plain . . . and not so much as a bird can be heard or seen in the frightful solitude.”—Feber, ed. 1844, 250-251.

[The word is used as an adj. to describe a severe form of malarial fever, and also a sort of double felt hat, worn when the sun is not so powerful as to require the use of a sola topee.

[1879.—“Remittent has been called Jungle Fever, Terrai Fever, Bengal Fever, &c., from the locality in which it originated. . . .”—Moore, Family Med. for India, 211.”

[1880.—“A Terrai hat is sufficient for a Collector.”—Ali Baba, 85.]

THAKOOR. s. Hind. thakur, from Skt. thakura, ‘an idol, a deity.’ Used as a term of respect, Lord, Master, &c., but with a variety of specific applications, of which the most familiar is as the style of Rajpút nobles. It is also in some parts the honorific designation of a barber, after the odd fashion which styles a tailor khaliya (see CALEFÁ); a bhihisi, jama’ddar (see JEMADÁR); a sweeper, mehtar. And in Bengal it is the name of a Brahman family, which its members have Anglicised as Tagore, of whom several have been men of character and note, the best known being Dwárkanáth Tagore, “a man of liberal opinions and enterprising character” (Wilson), who died in London in 1840.

[c. 1610.—“The nobles in blood (in the Maldives) add to their name Tacourou.”—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 217.

[1798.—“The Thour (so Rajput chief-tains are called) was nacked from the waist upwards, except the sacrificial thread or scarf on his shoulders and a turban on his head.”—L. of Colebrooke, 462.

[1881.—“After the sons have gone to their respective offices, the mother changing her clothes retires into the thakurghar (the place of worship), and goes through her morning service . . .”—S. C. Bose, The Hindoos as they are, 13.]

THERMANTIDOTE. s. This learned word (“heat-antidote”) was applied originally, we believe, about 1830-32 to the invention of the instrument which it designates, or rather to the application of the instrument, which is in fact a winnowing machine fitted to a window aperture, and incased in wet tatties (q.v.), so as to drive a current of cooled air into a house during hot, dry weather. We have a dim remembrance that the invention was ascribed to Dr. Spilsbury.

1881.—“To the 21st of June, this oppressive weather held its sway; our only consolation grapes, iced-water, and the thermantidote, which answers admirably, almost too well, as on the 22d. I was laid up with rheumatic fever and lumbago, occasioned . . . by standing or sleeping before it.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 208.

[Mrs Parkes saw for the first time a thermantidote at Cawnpore in 1830. —Ibid. i. 134.]

1840.—“. . . The thermometer at 112° all day in our tents, notwithstanding tatties, thermantidotes, and every possible invention that was likely to lessen the stifling heat.”—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjéet Singh, 182.

1853.—“. . . then came punkahs by day, and next punkahs by night, and then tatties, and then thermantidotes, till at last May came round again, and found the unhappy Anglo-Indian world once more surrounded with all the necessary but uncomfortable sweltering panoply of the hot weather.”—Oakfield, i. 263-4.

1878.—“They now began (c. 1840) to have the benefit of thermantidotes, which however were first introduced in 1831; the name of the inventor is not recorded.”—Calcutta Rev. cxxiv. 718.

1880.—“. . . low and heavy punkahs swing overhead; a sweet breathing of wet khaskhas grass comes out of the thermantidote.”—Sir Ali Baba, 112.

THUG. s. *Hind. thay, Mahr. thak, Skt. sthaga, ‘a cheat, a swindler.’ And this is the only meaning given and illustrated in R. Drummond’s Illustrations of Guzaratte, &c. (1806). But it has acquired a specific meaning, which cannot be exhibited more precisely or tersely than by Wilson:

This book was printed in England, whilst the author was in India; doubtless he was innocent of this quaint error.
"Latterly applied to a robber and assassin of a peculiar class, who sallying forth in a gang...and in the character of wayfarers, either on business or pilgrimage, fall in with other travellers on the road, and having gained their confidence, take a favourable opportunity of strangling them by throwing their handkerchiefs round their necks, and then plundering them and burying their bodies." The proper specific designation of these criminals was phānsigār or phansigār, from phaṁśi, 'a noose.'

According to Mackenzie (in As. Res. xiii.), the existence of gangs of these murderers was unknown to Europeans till shortly after the capture of Seringapatam in 1799, when about 100 were apprehended in Bangalore. But Fryer had, a century earlier, described a similar gang caught and executed near Surat. The Phānsigārs (under that name) figured prominently in an Anglo-Indian novel called, we think, "The English in India," which one of the present writers read in early boyhood, but cannot now trace. It must have been published between 1826 and 1830.

But the name of Thug first became thoroughly familiar not merely to that part of the British public taking an interest in Indian affairs, but even to the mass of Anglo-Indian society, through the publication of the late Sir William Sleeman's book "Ramasseana; or a Vocabulary of the peculiar language used by the Thugs, with an Introduction and Appendix, descriptive of that Fraternity, and of the Measures which have been adopted by the Supreme Government of India for its Suppression," Calcutta, 1836; and by an article on it which appeared in the Edinburgh Review, for Jan. 1837, (lxxiv. 357). One of Col. Meadows Taylor's Indian romances also, Memoirs of a Thug (1839), has served to make the name and system familiar. The suppression of the system, for there is every reason to believe that it was brought to an end, was organised in a masterly way by Sir W. (then Capt.) Sleeman, a wise and admirable man, under the government and support of Lord William Bentinck. [The question of the Thugs and their modern successors has been again discussed in the Quarterly Review, Oct. 1901.]

c. 1665.—"Les Voleurs de ce pays-là sont les plusadroits du monde; ils ont l'usage d'un certain lasso à nouez complant, qu'ils savent jeter si subtilement au cou d'un homme, quand ils sont à sa portée, qu'ils ne le manquent jamais; en sorte qu'en un moment ils l'étranglent..." &c.—Thomson, v. 123.

1673.—"They were Fifteen, all of a Gang, who used to lurk under Hedges in narrow Lanes, and as they found Opportunity, by a Device of a Weight tied to a Cotton Bow-string made of Guts...they used to throw it upon Passengers, so that winding it about their Necks, they pulled them from their Beasts and dragging them upon the Ground strangled them, and possessed themselves of what they had...they were sentenced to Les Talismans, to be hanged; wherefore being delivered to the Chief or Sheriff's Men, they led them two Miles with Ropes round their Necks to some Wither-trees: In the night after they were cheerful, and went singing, and smoking Tobacco...as jolly as if going to a Wedding; and the Young Lad now ready to be tied up, boasted, That though he were not 14 Years of Age, he had killed his Fifteen Men..."—Fryer, 97.

1785.—"Several men were taken up for a most cruel method of robbery and murder, practised on travellers, by a tribe called Phansecours, or strangers...under the pretence of travelling the same way, they enter into conversation with the strangers, share their sweetmeats, and pay them other little attentions, until an opportunity offers of suddenly throwing a rope round their necks with a slip-knot, by which they dexterously contrive to strangle them on the spot."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 13; (2nd ed. ii. 397).

1808.—"Phansecours. A term of abuse in Gujarat, applied also, truly, to thieves or robbers who strangle children in secret or travellers on the road."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, s.v.

1820.—"In the more northern parts of India these murderers are called Thugs, signifying deceivers."—As. Res. xiii. 250.

1823.—"The Thugs are composed of all castes, Mahomedans even were admitted: but the great majority are Hindus; and among these the Brahmins, chiefly of the Bundelcund tribes, are in the greatest numbers, and generally direct the operations of the different bands."—Malcolm, Central India, ii. 187.

1831.—"The inhabitants of Jubulpore were this morning assembled to witness the execution of 25 Thugs...The number of Thugs in the neighbouring countries is enormous; 115, I believe, belonged to the party of which 25 were executed, and the remainder are to be transported; and report says there are as many in Saugor Jail..."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 201-202.

1843.—"It is by the command, and under the special protection of the most powerful goddesses that the Thugs join themselves to the unsuspecting traveller, make friends with him, slip the noose round his neck, plunge their knives in his eyes, hide him in the earth, and divide his money and baggage."—Macaulay, Speech on Gates of Somnauth.

1874.—"If a Thug makes strangling of travellers a part of his religion, we do not allow him the free exercise of it."—W. Newman, in Fortnightly Rev., N.S. x. 181.

[Tavernier writes: "The remainder of the people, who do not belong to either of these four castes, are called Pauzzecour." This word Mr. Ball (ii. 186) suggests to be equivalent to either pariah or phansigar. Here he is in error. Pauzzecour is really Skt. Pancha-Gauda, the five classes of northern Brahmins, for which see Wilson, (Indian Caste, ii. 124 seqq.).]

TIBET, n.p. The general name of the vast and lofty table-land of which the Himalaya forms the southern marginal range, and which is said to extend from the Indus elbow, N.W. of Kashmir, to the vicinity of Sining-fu in Kansuh (see SLING) and to Tatsienlu on the borders of Szechuen, the last a distance of 1800 miles. The origin of the name is obscure, but it came to Europe from the Mahommedans of Western Asia; its earliest appearance being in some of the Arab Geographies of the 9th century. Names suggestive of Tibet are indeed used by the Chinese. The original form of these (according to our friend Prof. Terrien de la Couperie) was Tu-pot; a name which is traced to a prince so called, whose family reigned at Liang-chau, north of the Yellow R. (in modern Kansuh), but who in the 6th century was driven far to the south-west, and established in eastern Tibet a State to which he gave the name of Tu-pot, afterwards corrupted into Tu-poh and Tu-fan. We are always on ticklish ground in dealing with derivations from or through the Chinese. But it is doubtless possible, perhaps even probable, that these names passed into the western form Tibet, through the communication of the Arabs in Turkestan with the tribes on their eastern border. This may have some corroboration from the prevalence of the name Tibet, or some proximate form, among the Mongols, as we may gather both from Carpini and Rubruck in the 13th century (quoted below), and from Sanang Setzen, and the Mongol version of the Bodhimor several hundred years later. These latter write the name (as represented by I. J. Schmidt), Tíbet and Tobót.

[c. 590.—"Tobbat." See under INDIA.]

851.—"On this side of China are the countries of the Taghazhas and the Kâh-kân of Tibbat; and that is the termination of China on the side of the Turks."—Relation, &c., tr. par Reinaud, pt. i. p. 60.

c. 880.—"Quand un étranger arrive au Tibet (al-Tibbat), il éprouve, sans pouvoir s'en rendre compte, un sentiment de gaieté et de bien être qui persiste jusqu'au départ."—Ibn Khurdâbâd, in J. As. Soc. vi. tom. v. 522.

c. 910.—"The country in which lives the goat which produces the musk of China, and that which produces the musk of Tobbat are one and the same; only the Chinese get into their hands the goats which are nearest their side, and the people of Tobbat do likewise. The superiority of the musk of Tobbat over that of China is due to two causes; first, that the musk-goat on the Tobbat side of the frontier finds aromatic plants, whilst the tracts on the Chinese side only produce plants of a common kind."—Relation, &c., pt. 2, pp. 114-115.

c. 930.—"This country has been named Tibet because of the establishment there of the Himyarites, the word thabat signifying to fix or establish oneself. That etymology is the most likely of all that have been proposed. And it is thus that Di'bal, son of Ali-al-Khuza'i, vaunts this fact in a poem, in which when disputing with Al-Kumair he exalts the descendants of Kafifan above those of Ninzar, saying:

"Tis they who have been famous by their writings at the gate of Merv,
And who were writers at the gate of Chin,
Tis they who have bestowed on Samar- kand the name of Shanir,
And who have transported thither the Tibetans"—(Al-Tubbätins).]

Mas'udî, i. 352.

c. 976.—"From the sea to Tibet is 4 months' journey, and from the sea of Fârs to the country of Kansuh is 3 months' journey."—Ibn Hauâlî, in Estot, i. 33.

* This refers to an Arab legend that Samar-kand was founded in very remote times by Tobba'-al-Akbar, Himyarite King of Yemen, (see e.g. Edrisî, by Jautbert, ii. 198), and the following: "The author of the Treatise on the Figure of the Earth says on this subject: "This is what was told me by Abu-Bakr-Dimashki!—I have seen over the great gate of Samar-kand an iron tablet bearing an inscription, which, according to the people of the place, was engraved in Himyarite characters, and as an old tradition related, had been the work of Tobba.'"—Shihbuddin Dimashki, in Nat. et Est. xii. 254.

TICAL.

3 months' journey, and at the base is the country of Thabbat, which has the antelope which give musk."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 438-439.

TICAL, s. This (tikal) is a word which has long been in use by foreign traders to Burma, for the quasi-standard weight of (uncoined) current silver, and is still in general use in B. Burma as applied to that value. This weight is by the Burmese themselves called kyat, and is the hundredth part of the viss (q.v.), being thus equivalent to about 1/100 rupee in value.

The origin of the word tikal is doubtful. Sir A. Phayre suggests that possibly it is a corruption of the Burmese words ta-kyat, "one kyat." On the other hand perhaps it is more probable that the word may have represented the Indian tuka (see TUCKA). The word is also used by traders to Siam. But there likewise it is a foreign term; the Siamese word being bat. In Siam the tikal is according to Crawford a silver coin, as well as a weight equivalent to 225½ grains. English. In former days it was a short cylinder of silver bent double, and bearing two stamps, thus half-way between the Burmese bullion and proper coin.*

1668. "The proportion of their (Siamese) Money to ours is, that their Tical, which weighs no more than half a Crown, is yet worth three shillings and three half-pence."—La Louvère, E.T. p. 72.

1727. "Pegu Weight. 1 Vize is . . . 39 on. Troy, or 1 Vino 100 Tascals. 140 Vinc . . . a Bakaar (see RAHAR). The Bakaar is 3 Pecul China."—A. Hamilton, ii. 317; [ed. 1744].

1759. " . . . a dozen or 20 fowls may be bought for a Tical (little more than a Crown)."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 121.

[Col. Temple notes that the pronunciation has always been twofold. At present in Burma it is usual to pronounce it like nich, and in Siam like zum. He regards it as certain that it came from taka through Talasing and Peguan t'ka.]
TICCA, TICKER. 919 TIFFIN.

1775.—Stevens, New and Complete Guide to E. I. Trade, gives 1 Peaug weight = 1 Taul (read Tical).
100 Taul (Tical) = 1 vis (see VISA) = 3 lb.

150 vis = 1 candy.

And under Siam:

sense was a modification of this one, that his "tiffin" was a participial noun from the verb to tiff, and that the Indian tiffin is identical with the participial noun. This has perhaps some corroboration both from the form "tiffin" used in some earlier Indian examples, and from the Indian use of the verb "to Tiff." [This view is accepted by Prof. Skeat, who derives tiff from Norweg. tøn, 'a drawing in of the breath, sniff,' tøva, 'to sniff' (Concise Dict. s.v.; and see 9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 425, 460, 506; v. 13.)] Rumphius has a curious passage which we have tried in vain to connect with the present word; nor can we find the words he mentions in either Portuguese or Dutch Dictionaries. Speaking of Toddy and the like he says:

"Homines autem qui eas (potiones) coligent ac aevo præparent, dicuntur Portugalici nomine Tiffadores, atque opus ipsum Tiffar; nostratibus Belgis tisseren" (Herb. Ambœinense, l. 6).

We may observe that the comparatively late appearance of the word tiffin in our documents is perhaps due to the fact that when dinner was early no lunch was customary. But the word, to have been used by an English novelist in 1811, could not then have been new in India.

We now give examples of the various uses:

TIFF, v. In the sense of taking off a draught.

1812.—"He tiff'd his punch and went to rest."—Combe, Dr. Syntz, i. Canto v. (This is quoted by Mr. Davies.)

TIFFIN (the Indian substantive).

1807.—"Many persons are in the habit of sitting down to a repeat at one o'clock, which is called tiffin, and is in fact an early dinner."—Cordiner's Ceylon, i. 83.

1810.—"The (Mahommedan) ladies, like ours, indulge in tiffings (slight repeats), it being delicate to eat but little before company."—Williamson, V. M. i. 352.

(published 1812) "The dinner is scarcely touched, as every person eats a hearty meal called tiffin, at 2 o'clock, at home."—Mary Graham, 29.

1811.—"Gertrude was a little unfortunate in her situation, which was next below Mrs. Fashionist, and who... detailed the delights of India, and the routine of its day; the changing linen, the carry-combing... the idleness, the dissipation, the sleeping and the necessity of sleep, the gay tiffings, were all delightful to her in reciting."—The Countess and Gertrude, or Modes of Discipline, by Laditia Maria Hawkins, ii. 12.

1824.—"The entreaty of my friends compelled me to remain to breakfast and an early tiffin...—Seely, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iii.

1835.—"Reader! I, as well as Pliny, had an uncle, an East Indian Uncle... everybody has an Indian Uncle... He is not always so orientally rich as he is reputed; but he is always orientally munificent. Call upon him at any hour from two till five, he insists on your taking tiffin; and such a tiffin! The English corresponding term is luncheon; but how meagre a shadow is the European meal to its glowing Asiatic cousin...—De Quincey, The Holy Bible, Works, iii. 255.

1835.—"Come home and have some tiffin, Dobbin," a voice cried behind him, as a pudgy hand was laid on his shoulder... But the Captain had no heart to go a-feasting with Joe Sedley."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, i. 235.

1835.—"A vulgar man who enjoys a champagne tiffin and swindles his servants... may be a pleasant companion to those who do not hold him in contempt as a vulgar knave, but he is not a gentleman."—Sir C. Napier, Farewell Address.

1835.—"This was the case for the prosecution. The court now adjourned for tiffin."—Oakfield, i. 519.

1835.—"The last and most vulgar form of 'nibbling' the press is well known as the luncheon or tiffin trick. It used to be confined to advertising tradesmen and hotel-keepers, and was practised on newspaper reporters. Now it has been practised on a loftier scale...—Saty. Rev., March 25, 357.
TO TIFF, in the Indian sense.

1808.——"He hesitated, and we were interrupted by a summons to tiff at Flower's. After tiffin Clove said he should be glad to go."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 116.

1814.——"We found a pool of excellent water, which is scarce on the hills, and laid down to tiff on a full soft bed, made by the grass of last year and this. After tiffin, I was cold and unwell."—Ibid. p. 253.

Tiffin here is a participle, but its use shows how the noun tiffin would be originally formed.

1816.——"If the huntsman now informed them all they were to tiff at Bobby Hall. Mounted again, the party starts, Upsets the hackeries and carts, Hamsals (see HUMMAUL) and pelan- quins and coolies. Dobbs (see DOBBS) and burrawas (!) and coolies."

The following, which has just met our eye, is bad grammar, according to Auglo-Indian use:

1885.——"Look here, RANDOLPH, don't you know,' said Sir PEELE . . . 'Here you've been gallivanting through India, riding on elephants, and tiffin with Rajahs . . . ."

—Punch, Essence of Parliament, April 25, p. 204.

TIGER, a. The royal tiger was apparently first known to the Greeks by the expedition of Alexander, and a little later by a live one which Seleucus sent to Athens. The animal became, under the Emperors, well known to the Romans, but fell out of the knowledge of Europe in later days, till it again became familiar in India. The Greek and Latin τίγρας, tigris, is said to be from the old Persian word for an arrow, τιγρά, which gives the modern Pers. (and Hind.) tir.*

Pliny says of the River Tigris: "a celeritate Tigris incipit vocari. Ita appellant Medii sagittam" (vi. 27). In speaking of the animal and its "velociatis tremendae," Pliny evidently glances at this etymology, real or imaginary. So does Pausanias probably, in his remarks on its colour. [This view of the origin of the name is accepted by Schrader (Prehist. Ant. of the Aryan Peoples, E.T. 260), who writes: "Nothing like so far back in the history of the Indo-Europeans does the lion's dreadful rival for supremacy over the beasts, the tiger, go. In India the songs of the Rigveda have nothing to say about him; his name (vyāghra) first occurs in the Atharvaveda, i.e. at a time when the Indian immigration must have extended much farther towards the Ganges; for it is in the reeds and grasses of Bengal that we have to look for the tiger's proper home. Nor is he mentioned among the beasts of prey in the Avesta. The district of Haryana, whose numerous tigers the later writers of antiquity speak of with especial frequency, was then called Vehrana, 'wolf-land.' It is, therefore, not improbable . . . that the tiger has spread in relatively late times from India over portions of W. and N. Asia."

* Sir H. Rawlinson gives tigras as old Persian for an arrow (see Herod. vol. iii. p. 552). Vullers seems to consider it rather an Induction than a known word for an arrow. He says: "Besides the name of that river (Tigris) Arsan, which often occurs in the Skāhāna, and which properly signifies 'running' or 'swift'; another Medo-Persic name Tigras is found in the cuneiform inscriptions, and is cognate with the Zend word tejāo, tejēram, and Pehlevi tejēran, i.e. a running river, which is entered in Anquetil's vocabulary. And these, along with the Persian τή an arrow; tegh 'a sword,' telah and teyg 'sharp,' are to be referred to the Zend root tikhah, Skt. tij, 'to sharpen.' The Persian word tir, 'an arrow,' may be of the same origin, since its primitive form appears to be tigras, from which it seems to come by elision of the g, as the Skt. tij, 'arrow,' comes from tvar, for tihara, where is seems to have taken the place of g. From the word tigras . . . seem also to be derived the usual names of the river Tigris, Pers. Dīkhā, Ar. Dījah" (Vullers, s.v. tir).

c. B.C. 321.—"And Ulpius ... said: 'Do we anywhere find the word used a masculine, τίνω τιγρίνι; for I know that Philostratus says thus in his Neera: 'A. We have seen the tigress (τίνω τιγρίνι) that Seleucus sent us: Are we not bound to send Seleucus back Some beast in fair exchange!""

In Athenaeus, xiii. 57.

c. B.C. 290.—"According to Megasthenes, the largest tigers are found among the Prashi, almost twice the size of lions, and of such strength that a tame one led by four persons seized a mule by its head, and overpowered it, and dragged it to him."

And the land that lies in the interior above this towards the East embraces many tracts, some of them of deserts or of great mountains, with all kinds of wild beasts, panthers and tigers (τιγραί) and elephants, and immense serpents (ποικίλας) and byzans (κυριώτατας) and cyanophala (of many species, and many and populous nations till you come to the Ganges."—Periplus, § 50.

c. A.D. 180.—"That beast again, in the talk of Ctesias about the Indians, which is alleged to be called by them Martiōra (Marticōra), and by the Greeks Androphagus (Man eater), I am convinced is really the tiger (τίγρινος τιγρίνου). The story that he has a triple range of teeth in each jaw, and sharp prickles at the tip of his tail which he shoots at those who are at a distance, like the arrows of an archer,—I don't believe it to be true, but only to have been generated by the excessive fear which the beast inspires. They have been wrong also about his colour;—no doubt when they see him in the bright sunlight he takes that colour and looks red; or perhaps it may be because of his going so fast, and because even when not running he is constantly darting from side to side; and then (to be sure) it is always from a long way off that they see him."—Pausanias, IX. xxi. 4. [See Frager's tr. i. 470; v. 86. Martichōra is here Pers. mardwakahur, 'eater of men.]

1298.—"Encho rechásie q ile Grant Sire a bien leopards assez que tuit sont bon da chacer et da prendre bestes. ... Il ha plosor Lyons grandismes, greignors asees qe cele de Babtlonie et sunt de mont horrenes et de mont biaus color, car il sunt tout verges por lnoir, non et vermoil et blance. Il sunt afaites a prandre sengler sauvagies et les buef sauvagies, et orses et asnes sauvagies et cerf et caviroll et autres bestes."—Marco Polo, Geog. Text. ch. xci. Thus Marco Polo can only speak of this huge animal, striped black and white, as of a Lion. And in a medieval Bestiary, a chapter on the Tigre which begins: "Une Besse est qui est andelée Tigre, c'est une maniere de serpeint."—(In Cahier et Martin, Milanges d'Arch&ol. ii. 140).

1474.—"This meane while there came in certain men sent from a Prince of India, with certain strange bestes, the first whereof was a leone lodde in a chayne by one that had skyll, which they call in their languaze Baburuth. She is like vno to hyman, but she is redd coloured, streaked all over with black strykes; her face is redd with certain white and blacke spottes, the belye white, and tayled like the lyone: seemynge to be a marvaillouse fier beast."—Joanfa Barbare, Hek. Soc. pp. 53-54. Here again is an excellent description of a tiger, but the name seems unknown to the traveller. Baburuth is in the Ital. original Baburuth, Pers. babr, a tiger.

1553.—... Beginning from the point of Qingapura and all the way to Puliocambilam, i.e. the whole length of the Kingdom of Malaca ... there is no other town with a name except this City of Malacca, only some havens of fishermen, and in the interior very few villages. And indeed of these wretched people sleep at the top of the highest trees they can find, for up to a height of 20 palms the tigers can seize them at a leap; and if anything saves the poor people from these beasts it is the bonfires they keep burning at night, which the tigers are much afraid of. In fact these are so numerous that many come to the city itself at night in search of prey. And it has happened, since we took the place, that a tiger leapt into a garden surrounded by a good high timber fence, and lifted a beam of wood with three slaves who were laid by the heels, and with these made a clean leap over the fence."—Burro, I. vi. 1. Lest I am doing the great historian wrong to this Munchhausen-like story, I give the original: "E jà aconsecc ... saltar hum tigre em hum quintal cercado de maderas bem alto, e levon hum tronco de madeira com tres (tree!) escravos que estavam presos nelle, com os quases saltou de claro em claro per cims da cerca." 1583. "We also escaped the peril of the multitude of tigers which infest those tracts" (the Pegu delta) "and prey on whatever they can get at. And although we were neverthelesss it was asserted that the ferocity of these animals was such that they would press even into the water to seize their prey." —Gaspavo Balbi, f. 94e.

1586. "We went through the wilderness because the right way was full of horses and advanced towards the thicket of Oeurra, where we found but few Villages, but almost all Wildnesses, and saw many Buffes, Swine, and Deer; Grasse longer than a man, and very many Tigres." —R. Pitch, in Purchas, ii. 1736.

1675. "Going in quest whereof, one of our Soldiers, a Youth, killed a Tigre-Royal; it was brought home by 30 or 40 Combies (Koombe), the Body tied to a long Bamboo, the Tail did ... it was a Tigre of the Biggest and Noblest Kind, Five Feet in Length beside the Tail, Three and a Half in Height, it was of a light Yellow, streaked with Black, like a Tabby Cat ... the Visage Fierce and Majestick, the Teeth gnashing." —Fryer, 170.

1886. "In ye afternoon they found a great Tiger, one of ye black men shot a barbed arrow into his Buttock. Mr. Frenchfeld and Capt. Raynes alighted off their horses and advanced towards the thicket where ye Tiger lay. The people making a great noise, ye Tiger flew out upon Mr. Frenchfeld, and he shot him with a brace of Bullets into ye breast, at which he made a great noise, and returned again to his den. The Black Men seeing of him wounded fell upon him, but the Tiger had so much strength as to kill 2 men, and wound a third, before he died. At Night ye Bages sent me the Tiger." —Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 66-87.

1754. "There was a Charter granted to the East India Company. Many Disputes arose about it, which came before Parliament; all Arts were used to corrupt or delude the Members; among others a Tyger was baited with Solomony, on the Day the great Question was to come on. This was such a Novelty, that several of the Members were drawn off from their Attendance, and absent on the Division. ..." —A Collection of Letters relating to the E.I. Company, &c. (Tract), 1754, p. 13.

1869. "Les tigres et les léopards sont considérés, autant par les Hindous que par les musulmans, comme étant la propriété des pirs (see PEER); aussi les naturels du pays ne sympathisent pas avec les Européens pour la chasse du tigre." —Garcia de Tassy, Rel. Mus. p. 24.

1872. "One of the Frontier Battalion soldiers approached me, running for his life. ... This was his story: —"

1875. "Having reduced the kingdom of Tanjore, one of the Frontier Battalion soldiers approached me, running for his life. ... This was his story: —"

1956. "It is called haz and rmeola; and perhaps from the people so called who may have supplied it in the Himalaya—Tigre Roya (Ooer), and perhaps from the people so called who may have supplied it in the Himalaya—T. Lndn, p. 444.

TINCALL, s. Borax. Pers. tünkär, but apparently originally Skt. tünkär, and perhaps from the people so called who may have supplied it in the Himalaya—Tigre Roya (Ooer), and perhaps from the people so called who may have supplied it in the Himalaya—T. Lndn, p. 444.

1575. "A small quantity of Tutenagy (Toomagnus), Tinkal and Japan Copper was also found here. ..." —Ives, 105.

TINDAL, s. Malayal. tandul, Telug. tandelu, also in Mahr. and other vernaculars tandel, tandail, [which Platts connects with tand, Skt. tantra, 'a line of men,' but the Madras Gloss. derives the S. Indian forms from Mal. tandu, 'an ear, valli, 'to pull.'] The head or commander of a body of men; but in ordinary specific application a native petty officer of lascaris, whether on board ship (boatswain) or in the ordnance department, and sometimes the head of a gang of labourers on public works.

c. 1348. "The second day after our arrival at the port of Kailukari this princess invited the nādhodā (Nacoda) or owner of the ship, the kurnā (see CRANNY) or clerk, the merchants, the persons of distinction, the tandil ..." —Ibn Batuta, iv. 250. The Moorish traveller explains the word as muṣuddan (Mocuddum, q.v.) al-rajāl, which the French translators render as "général des pistons," but we may hazard the correction of "Master of the crew."

c. 1590.—"In large ships there are twelve classes. 1. The Nāthad, or owner of the ship. . . . 3. The Tandil, or chief of the khalipas (see CLASSY) or sailors. . . ."—Attn., i. 380.

1673.—"The Captain is called Nuquedah, the boatswain Tindal. . . ."—Fryer, 107.

1758.—"One Tindal, or Corporal of Lascars."—Orme, ii. 386.

[1828.—"I desired the tindal, or steersman to answer, 'Bombay.'"—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1872, ii. 157.]

TINNEVELLY, n.p. A town and district of Southern India, probably Tīrinvel-ātī, 'Sacred Rice-hedge.' [The Madras Gloss. gives 'Sacred Paddy-village.'] The district formed the southern part of the Madura territory, and first became a distinct district about 1744, when the Madura Kingdom was incorporated with the territories under the Nawāb of Arcot (Culdwell, H. of Tinnevelly).

TIPPARBY, s. Beng. and Hind. tipāti, tepāti, the fruit of Physalis peruviana, L., N.O. Solanaceae. It is also known in India as 'Cape gooseberry,' [which is usually said to take its name from the Cape of Good Hope, but as it is a native of tropical America, Mr. Ferguson (8 ser. N. & Q. xii. 106) suggests that the word may really be capo or cap, from the peculiarity of its structure noted below.] It is sometimes known as 'Brazil cherry.' It gets its generic name from the fact that the inflated calyx encloses the fruit as in a bag or bladder (φύρα). It has a slightly acid gooseberry flavour, and makes excellent jam. We have seen a suggestion somewhere that the Bengali name is connected with the word tēripāti, 'inflated,' which gives its name to a species of tet rodon or globe-fish, a fish which has the power of dilating the oesophagus in a singular manner. The native name of the fruit in N.W. India is mako or mako, but tipāri is in general Anglo-Indian use. The use of an almost identical name for a gooseberry-like fruit, in a Polynesian Island (Kingsmill group) quoted below from Wilkes, is very curious, but we can say no more on the matter.

1845.—"On Makin they have a kind of fruit resembling the gooseberry, called by the natives 'teiparā'; this they pound, after it is dried, and make with molasses into cakes, which are sweet and pleasant to the taste."—U.S. Expedition, by C. Wilkes, U.S.N., v. 81.

TIPPOO SAHIB, n.p. The name of this famous enemy of the English power in India was, according to C. P. Brown, taken from that of Tipu Sultān, a saint whose tomb is near Hyderabad. [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, i. 522, ed. 1869), says that the tomb is at Arcot.]

TIRKUT, s. Fore sail. Sea Hind. from Port. triqueot (Roebuck).

TIVAN, n.p. Malayāl. Tīvar, or Tīvan, pl. Tīvar or Tīvar. The name of what may be called the third caste (in rank) of Malabar. The word signifies 'islander,' [from Mal. tiru, Skt. dīpa, 'an island']; and the people are supposed to have come from Ceylon (see TIER COTTY).

1510.—"'The third class of Pagans are called Tīva, who are artisans.'"—Barthewa, 142.

1516.—"The cleanest of these low and rustic people are called Tīva (read Tīwan) who are great labourers, and their chief business is to look after the palm-trees, and gather their fruit, and carry everything . . . for hire, because there are no draught cattle in the country."—Barbou, Lisbon ed. 335.

[1800.—"All Tir can eat together, and intermarry. The proper duty of the cast is to extract the juice from palm-trees, to boil it down to Jaggery (Jaggery), and to distil it into spirituous liquors; but they are also very diligent as cultivators, porters, and cutters of firewood."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 415; and see Logan, Malabar, i. 110, 142.]

TOBACCO, s. On this subject we are not prepared to furnish any elaborate article, but merely to bring together a few quotations touching on the introduction of tobacco into India and the East, or otherwise of interest.

[F.c. 1550.—". . . Abū Kir would carry the cloth to the market-street and sell it, and with its price buy meat and vegetables and tobacco. . . ."—Burton, Arab. Nights, vii. 210. The only mention in the Nights and the insertion of some scribe.]

"It has happened to me several times, that going through the provinces of Guatemala and Nicaragua I have entered the house of an Indian who had taken this herb, which in the Mexican language is called tabacco, and immediately perceived the sharp fetid smell of this truly diabolical and stinking smoke, I was obliged to go away in haste, and seek some other place.

—Giroldo Bensoi, Hak. Soc. p. 81. [The word tabaco is from the language of Bayty, and the first, the pipe, or rather, the plant, thirdly, the sleep which followed its use (Mr. J. Platt, 9 ser. N. & Q. viii. 322.).]

1585.—"Et hi" (viz. Ralph Lane and the first settlers in Virginia) "reduces Indicam illam plantam quam Tobacco vocant et Nicotiam, quam contra eruditates ab Indis edocti, usi erant, in Anglia primum, quod suum, intulerunt. Ex illo sano tempore usu coepit esse cereberrimo, et magno presto, dum quam plurimi graveolentem illius fumum, aliis lascivientia, aliis valetudinis consueltas, per tubulum testaceum inexpelli aviditate passim hauriunt, et un potis non excitant effluent; adeo ut tabernae Tabaccaenas non minus quam cervariae et vinariae passim per oppida haneantur. Ut Anglum corpore (quod salse ille dicit) quix hae plantae tantoper delectantur in Mesopotamia naturum doceantur videantur; quam iisdem quibus Barbari delectantur et sanari se possent credant." —Gul. Camdeni, Annal. Rerum Anglicanum... regn. Elisabetha, ed. 1717, ii. 449.

1592.—"Into the woods thence forth in haste shee went To seeke for herbes that mote him remedi: For shee of herbes had great intendment, Taught of the Nymphe which from her infancy Her nourced had in true Nobility: This whethere yt divine Tobacco were, Or Panaceae, or Polygony, Shee fownd, and brought it to her patient dese: Who al this while lay bleeding out his hart-blood neere." —The Faerie Queen, III. v. 32.

1597.—"His Lordship" (E. of Essex at Villafrancos) "made no answer, but called for tabacco, seeming to give but small credit to this alarm; and so on horseback, with these noblemen and gentlemen on foot beside him, took tabacco, whilst I was telling his Lordship of the men I had sent forth, and the order I had given them. Within some quarter of an hour, we might hear a good round volley of shot betwixt the 30 men I had sent to the chapel, and the enemy, which made his Lordship cast his pipe from him, and listen to the shooting." —Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, p. 62.

1598.—"Cob. Ods me I marke what pleasure or felicity they have in taking this roughish Tobacco. It is good for nothing but to choke a man, and fill him full of sneeze and embers: there were four died out of one house last week with taking of it, and two more the bell went for yesternight: one of them they say will never scape it; he voided a bushel of soot yesterday upward and downward... its little better than rats-bane or roseaker." —Every Man in his Humour, III. 2.

1604.—"Oct. 19. Demise to Tho. Lane and Ph. Bold of the new Impost of 6s. 8d., and the old Custom of 2s. per pound on Tobacco. —Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, James I., p. 159.

1604 or 1606.—"In Bijnur I had found some tabacco. Never having seen the like in India, I brought some with me, and prepared a handsome pipe of jewel work... His Majesty (Aker) was enjoying himself after receiving my presents, and asking me how I had collected so many strange things in so short a time, when his eye fell upon the tray with the pipe and its appurtenances: he expressed great surprise and examined the tabacco, which was made up in pipefuls; he inquired what it was, and where I had got it. The Nawab Khân-i'Azam replied: 'This is tabacco, which is well known in Mecca and Medina, and this doctor has brought it as a medicine for your Majesty.' His Majesty looked at it, and ordered me to prepare and take him a pipeful. He began to smoke it, when a physician approached and forbade his doing so... (omitting much that is curious). "As I had brought a large supply of tabacco and pipes, I sent some to several of the nobles, while others sent to ask for some; indeed all, without exception, wanted some, and the practice was introduced. After that the merchants began to sell it, so the custom of smoking spread rapidly." —Amd Bng, in Eliti, vi. 165-167.

1610.—"The Turkes are also incredible takers of Opium... carrying it about with them both in peace and in warre; which they say expellet all feare, and makes them courageous; but I rather think giddy headed... And perhaps for the self same cause they also delight in Tobacco; they take it through reeds that have toynd into them great heads of wood to contain it: I doubt not but lately taught them, as brought them by the English: and were it not sometimes lookt into (for Morat Basea not long since commanded a pipe to be thrust through the nose of a Turk, and so to be led in derision through the City,) no question but it would prove a principall commodity. Nevertheless he that will take it in corners, and are so ignorant therein, that that which in England is not saleable, doth passe here amongst them for most excellent." —Sandys, Journey, 66.

1615.—"Il tabacco ancora usano qui" (at Constantinople) "di pialiar in conversazione per gusto: ma io non ho voluto mai provarne, e ne avara cognizione in Italia che molti ne pigliano, ed in particolare il signore cardinale Crescenzo qualche volta per medicamento insegnatagli dal Signor don Virgilio Orsino, che primo di tutti, se io non falle, gli anni addiastro li portò in Roma d'Inghilterra." —P. della Valle, i. 76.

1616.—"Such is the miraculous omnipotence of our strong tasted Tobacco, as it cures all sorts of diseases (which neuer any drugge could do before) in all persons and at all times... It cures the gout in the feet and (which is miraculous) in that very 1617.—"As the smoking of tobacco (tambard) had taken very bad effect upon the health and mind of many persons, I ordered that no one should practise the habit. My brother Shah 'Abbâs, also being aware of its evil effects, had issued a command against the use of it in Iran. But Khân-i-'Alam was so much addicted to smoking, that he could not abstain from it, and often smoked."—Memos de Jahângir, in Elliot, v. 651. See the same passage rendered by Bluckmann, in Ind. Antiq. i. 164.

1623.—"Incipit nostro seculo in immenso crescere usus toba.cco, atque affectis hominum occultâ quidem deslexationes, ut qui illi semel asseti sint, difficile postes abstinent."—Bacon, H. Vitae et Mortis, in B. Montague's ed. x. 189.

We are unable to give the date or Persian author of the following extract (though clearly of the 17th century), which with an introductory sentence we have found in a fragmentary note in the handwriting of the late Major William Yule, written in India about the beginning of last century:

"Although Tobacco be the produce of an European Plant, it has nevertheless been in use by our Physicians medicinally for some time past. Nay, some creditable People even have been friendly to the use of it, though from its having been brought sparingly in the first instance from Europe, its rarity prevented it from coming into general use. The Culture of this Plant, however, became speedily almost universal; within a short period after its introduction into Hindostan; and the produce of it rewarded the Cultivator far beyond every other article of Husbandry. This became more especially the case in the reign of Shah Jehan (commenced A.H. 1037) when the Practice of Smoking pervaded all Ranks and Classes within the Empire. Nobles and Beggars, Pious and Wicked, Devotees and Free-thinkers, poets, historians, rhetoricians, doctors and patients, high and low, rich and poor, all! all seemed intoxicated with a decided preference over every other luxury, may even often over the necessaries of life. To a stranger no offering was so acceptable as a Whiff, and to a friend one could produce nothing half so grateful as a Chillum. So great was the habit that the confirmed Smoker would abstain from Food and Drink rather than relinquish the gratification he derived from inhaling the Fumes of this deleterious Plant! Nature recoils at the very idea of touching the Saliva of another Person, yet in the present instance our Tobacco smokers pass the moistened Tube from one mouth to another without hesitation on the one hand, and it is received with complacency on the other! The more acrid the Fumes so much the more grateful to the Palate of the Connoisseur. The Smoke is a Collyrium to the Eyes, whilst the Fire, they will tell you, supplies to the Body the waste of radical Heat. Without doubt this is a most pleasing Companion, whether to the Wayworn Traveller or to the solitary Hermit. It is a Friend in whose Bosom we may repose our most confidential Secrets; and a Counsellor upon whose advice we may rely in our most important Concerns. It is an elegant Ornament in our private Apartments; it gives joy to the Beloved in the Public Hall. The Music of its Sound puts the warbling of the Nightingale to Shame, and the Fragrance of its Perfume brings a Blush on the Cheek of the Rose. Life in short is prolonged by the Fumes inhaled at each inspiration, whilst every expiration of them is accompanied with exstatic delight. . . ." (excerts deuri)

1787.—"Tambard. It is known from the Madur-i-Rahim that the tobacco came from Ecbatana to the Dakhin, and from the Dakhin to Upper India, during the reign of Akber Shah (1556-1605), since which time it has been in general use."—Bahâr-i-'Ajam, quoted by Bluckmann, in Ind. Antiq. i. 164.

The leather nose-bag in which a horse's feed is administered. "In the Nerbudda valley, in Central India, the women wear a profusion of toe-rings, some standing up an inch high. Their shoes are consequently curiously shaped, and are called tobras" (M. Gen. R. H.)
TODDY. 927  TODDY.

Keating). As we should say, 'buckets.' [The use of the nosebag is referred to by Sir T. Herbert (ed. 1634): "The horses (of the Persians) feed usually of barley and chopt-straw put into a bag, and fastened about their heads, which implies the manger." Also see TUBA.]

1808.—"... stable-boys are apt to serve themselves to a part out of the poor beasts allowance; to prevent which a thrifty housewife sees it put into a tobra, or mouth bag, and spits thereon to make the Hostler look and leave it alone."—Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

[1875.—"... One of the horsemen dropped his tobra or nose-bag."—Drew, Jummoon, 240.]

TODDY, s. A corruption of Hind. tārī, i.e. the fermented sap of the tār or palmrya, Skt. tāla, and also of other palms, such as the date, the coco-palm, and the Caryaottura urenz; palm-wine. Toddy is generally the substance used in India as yeast, to leaven bread. The word, as is well known, has received a new application in Scotland, the immediate history of which we have not traced. The tāla-tree seems to be indicated, though confusedly, in this passage of Megasthenes from Arrian:

c. B.C. 320.—"Megasthenes tells us ... the Indians were in old times nomadio ... were so barbarous that they wore the skins of such wild animals as they could kill, and subsisted (!) on the bark of trees; that these trees were called in the Indian speech tāla, and that there grew on them as there grows at the tops of the date palm trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool."—Arrian, Indica, viii., tr. by McCrindle.

c. 1380.—"... There is another tree of a different species, which ... gives all the year round a white liquor, pleasant to drink, which tree is called tāri."—Fr. Jordanus, 16.

[1554.—"There is in Gujarat a tree of the palm-tribe, called tāri agadji (millet tree). From its branches cups are suspended, and when the cut end of a branch is placed into one of these vessels, a sweet liquid, something of the nature of arrack, flows out in a continuous stream ... and presently changes into a most wonderful wine."—Travels of Sidi Ali Reis, trans. A. Vambury, p. 29.]

[1690-10. — "Tarree." See under SURA.]

1611.—"Palmiti Wine, which they call Taddy."—N. Douton, in Purchas, i. 298.

[1614.—"A sort of wine that distilith out of the Palmetto trees, called Tadie."—Foster, Letters, iii. 4.]
TODDY-BIRD, s. We do not know for certain what bird is meant by this name in the quotation. The nest would seem to point to the Baya, or Weaver-bird (Plocenus Baya, Blyth): but the size alleged is absurd; it is probably a blunder. [Another bird, the Artamus fuscus, is, according to Balfour (Ocul. s.v.) called the toddy shrike.]

TODDY-CAT, s. This name is in S. India applied to the Paradoxurus Musanga, Jerdon: [the P. niger, the Indian Palm-Civet of Blanford (Mammalia, 106).] It infests houses, especially where there is a ceiling of cloth (see CHUTT). Its name is given for its fondness, real or supposed, for palm-juice.

TOKO, s. Slang for 'a thrashing.' The word is imper. of Hind. tokad, 'to censure, blame,' and has been converted into a noun on the analogy of bunnaw and other words of the same kind.

TOLA, s. An Indian weight (chiefly of gold or silver), not of extreme antiquity. Hind. tola, Skt. tulā, 'a balance,' tul, 'to lift up, to weigh.' The Hindu scale is 8 rattis (see BUTTEE) = 1 māsha, 12 māshas = 1 tola. Thus the tola was equal to 96 rattis. The proper weight of the ratti, which was the old Indian unit of weight, has been determined by Mr. E. Thomas as 1.75 grains, and the medieval tanga which was the prototype of the rupee was of 100 rattis weight. "But the factitious ratti of the Muslims was merely an aliquot part—\( \frac{1}{5} \) of the comparatively recent tola, and \( \frac{1}{6} \) of the newly devised rupee." By the Regulation VII. of 1833, putting the British India coinage on its present footing (see under SEER), the tola weighing 180 grs., which is also the weight of the rupee, is established by the same Regulation, as the unit of the system of weights, 80 tolas = 1 ser, 40 setas = 1 Maund.

TOMAUN, s. A Mongol word, signifying 10,000, and constantly used in the histories of the Mongol dynasties for a division of an army theoretically consisting of that number. But its modern application is to a Persian money, at the present time worth about 7s. 6d. [In 1899 the exchange was about 53 crans to the £; 10 crans = 1 tumān.] Till recently it was only a money of account, representing 10,000 dinars; the latter also having been in Persia for centuries only a money of account, constantly degenerating in value. The tomaun in Fryer's time (1677) is reckoned by him.
as equal to £3, 6s. 8d. P. della Valle's estimate 60 years earlier would give about £4, 10s. 0d., and is perhaps loose and too high. Sir T. Herbert's valuation (5 x 13s. 8d.) is the same as Fryer's. In the first and third of the following quotations we have the word in the Tartar military sense, for a division of 10,000 men:

1298. "You see when a Tartar prince goes forth to war, he takes with him, say, 100,000 horse... they call the corps of 100,000 men a Tar; that of 10,000 they call a Toman."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 54.

c. 1340. "Ces deux portions réunies formaient un total de 800 tomans, dont chacun vaut 10,000 dinars courants, et le dinar 6 dirhems."—Shikabuddin, Masalak-ul Aqdar, in Not et Ests. xiii. 194.

c. 1547.—"I was informed... that when the Khan assembled his troops, and called the array of his forces together, there were with him 100 divisions of horse, each composed of 10,000 men, the chief of whom was called Amir Tuman, or lord of 10,000."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 299-300.

A form of the Tartar word seems to have passed into Russian:

c. 1559.—"One thousand in the language of the people is called Tisaitzu: likewise ten thousand in a single word Toma: twenty thousand Dwutoma: thirty thousand Titma."—Herberstein, Della Moscova, Ramusio, iii. 158.

c. 1590. In the Sarkdr of Kandahar "eighteen dinare make a tuman, and each tuman is equivalent to 800 daims. The tuman of Khurasan is equal in value to 30 rupees and the tuman of Ira;k to 40."—Ain, ed. Jarratt, ii. 893-94.

1619. "L'ambasciadore Italiano... ordinò che dovesse a tutti un toman, cioè dici zecchini per uno."—P. della Valle, ii. 22.

c. 1630.—"But how miserable so ever it seems to others, the Persian King makes many happy harvests; filling every yeare his in satiate coffers with above 350,000 Tomans (a Toman is five markes sterlin)."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 225.

[c. 1665.—In Persia "the abazi is worth 4 shalsh, and the toman 50 abasis or 200 shalsh."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 24.]

1677.—"... Receipt of Custom (at Gomboon) for which he pays the King yearly Twenty-two thousand Thumands, every Thumand making Three pound and a Noble in our Accoint, Half which we have a Right to."—Fryer, 222.

1711.—"Camels, Houses, &c., are generally sold by the Tomand, which is 200 Shaschees or 50 Abaschees; and they usually reckon their Estates that way; such a man is worth so many Tomands, as we reckon by Pounds in England."—Lockyer, 229.

[1858.—"Girwur Singh, Tomandar came up with a detachment of the special police."—Sleeman, Journey through Oude, ii. 17.]

TOM-TOB, s. An alloy of copper and zinc, i.e. a particular modification of brass, formerly imported from Indo-Chinese countries. Port. tambaca, from Malay tambilaga and tambilaga, 'copper,' which is again from Skt. tamraka and tāmra.

1602.—"Their drummes are huge pannes made of a metall called Tombeage, which makes a most hellish sound."—Scott, Discourse of Iawa, in Purchas, i. 180.

1690.—"This Tombars is a kind of Metal, whose scarcity renders it more valuable than Gold. . . . Tis thought to be a kind of natural Compound of Gold, Silver, and Brass, and in some places the mixture is very Rich, as at Borneo, and the Molucces, in others more alloyed, as at Siam."—Ovington, 510.

1759.—"The Productions of this Country (Siam) are prodigious quantities of Grain, Cotton, Benjamin... and Tambanch."—In Dalrymple, i. 119.

TOM-TOM, s. Tamtam, a native drum. The word comes from India, and is chiefly used there. Forbes (Rast-Mald, ii. 401) [ed. 1878, p. 665] says the thing is so called because used by criers who beat it tām-tām, 'place by place,' i.e. first at one place, then at another. But it is rather an onomatopoeia, not belonging to any language in particular. In Ceylon it takes the form tamāttama, in Tel. tappa, in Tam. tambattam; in Malay it is ton- ton, all with the same meaning. [When badminton was introduced at Satāra natives called it Tamtam phal khet, tam-tam meaning 'battle-dore,' and the shuttlecock looked like a flower (phāl). Tommy Atkins promptly turned this into "Tom Foot" (Calcutta Rev. xcvii. 346).] In French the word tamtam is used, not for a drum of any kind, but for a Chinese gong (q.v.). M. Littré, however, in the Supplement to his Dict., remarks that this use is erroneous.

1693. "It is ordered that to-morrow morning the Counalty Justices do cause the Tom Tom to bee beat through all the Streets of the Black Town. . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 208.

1711.—"Their small Pipes, and Tom Toms, instead of Harmony made the Discord the greater."—Lockyer, 235.

1755.—In the Calcutta Mayor's expenses we find:

"Tom Tom, R. 1 1 0."—In Long, 58.

1784.—"You will give strict orders to the Zemindars to furnish Oil and Musheaul, and Tom Toms and Pikemen, &c., according to custom."—Ibid. 981.
1770.—"... An instrument of brass which the Turks to add to their military music, and which is called a tamm" (!).—Abbe Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 30.

1778.—"An harsh kind of music from a tom-tom or drum, accompanied by a loud rustic pipe, sounds from different parties throughout the throng..."—Munro, Narrative, 78.

1804.—"I request that they may be hanged; and let the cause of their punishment be published in the bazaar by beat of tom-tom."—Wellingston, i. 186.

1824.—"The Maharrats in my vicinity kept up such a confounded noise with the tamtams, cymbals, and pipes, that to sleep was impossible."—Sally, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iv.

1836.—For the use of the word by Dickens, see under GUM-GUM.

1852.—"The first musical instruments were without doubt percussive sticks, calabashes, tommets."—Herbert Spencer, First Principles, 366.

1878.—"The tom-tom is ubiquitous. It knows no rest. It is content with depriving man of his. It wlects by reference to the... In Madras this is the name of the tones through the grateful dreams which sheer into exhaustion... It reverberates its dull unmeaning monotonies through the streets of the Black Town, to the admiration and astonishment of the Tawny-ketches."—Madras Courier, April 26.

TONGÁ, s. A kind of light and small two-wheeled vehicle, Hind. tāngā, [Skt. tamanga, 'a platform']. The word has become familiar of late years, owing to the use of the tonga in a modified form on the roads leading up to Simla, Darjeeling, and other hill-stations. [Tavernier speaks of a carriage of this kind, but does not use the word:

[c. 1665.—"They have also, for travelling, small, very light, carriages which contain two persons; but usually one travels alone... to which they harness a pair of oxen only. These carriages, which are provided, like ours, with curtains and cushions, are not slung..."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 44.]

1874.—"The villages in this part of the country are usually superior to those in Poonah or Sholapur, and the people appear to be in good circumstances... The custom too, which is common, of driving light Tongas drawn by ponies or oxen points to the same conclusion."—Settlement Report of Nadir.

1879.—"A tongha dāk has at last been started between Rajoie and Dehra. The first tongha took only 54 hours from Rajoie to Saharanpore."—Pioneer Mail.

1880.—"In the (Times) of the 19th of April we are told that 'Syed Mahomed Padshah has repulsed the attack on his fort instigated by certain mooalhs of tonga dāk.' Is the relentless Tonga a region of country or a religious organization...? Is the original telegram appears to have contemplated a full stop after 'certain mooalhs.' Then can one independent sentence about the tonga dāk working admirably between Peahawur and Jellalabad, but the sub-editor of the Times interpreting the message referred to, made sense of it in the way we have seen.associating the ominous mystery with the mooalhs, and helping out the other sentence with some explanatory ideas of his own."—Pioneer Mail, June 10.

TONICATCHY, TUNNYKETCH. s. In Madras this is the name of the domestic water-carrier, who is generally a woman, and acts as a kind of under-housemaid. It is a corr. of Tamil tannir-kāssī, tannikkārtisi, an abbreviation of tannir-kāsatti, 'water-woman.'

c. 1780.—"Voudriez-vous me permettre de faire ce trajet avec mes gênes et mes bagages, qui ne consistent qu'en deux malles, quatre caisses de vin, deux ballots de toiles, et deux femmes, dont l'une est ma cuisinière, et l'autre, ma tannie kartejo ou porteuse d'eau."—Haufler, i. 242.

1792.—"The Armenian... now mounts a bit of blood... and... dashes the mud about through the streets of the Black Town, to the admiration and astonishment of the Tawny-ketches."—Madras Courier, April 26.

TONJON, and vulg. TOMJOHN, s. A sort of sedan or portable chair. It is (at least in the Bengal Presidency) carried like a palankin by a single pole and four bearers, whereas a jompson (q.v.), for use in a hilly country, has two poles like a European sedan, each pair of bearers bearing it by a stick between the poles, to which the latter are slung. We cannot tell what the origin of this word is, nor explain the etymology given by Williamson below, unless it is intended for thamjāng, which might mean 'support-thigh.' Mr. Platts gives as forms in Hind. tānjhām and thājān. The word is perhaps adopted from some trans-gangetic language. A rude contrivance of this kind in Malabar is described by Col. Welsh under the name of a 'Tellicherry chair' (ii. 40).

C. 1804.—"I had a tonjon, or open palanquin, in which I rode."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 283.

1810.—"About Dacca, Chittagong, Tipperah, and other mountainous parts, a very light kind of conveyance is in use, called a taum-jan, i.e. 'a support to the feet.'"—Williamson, V. M. i. 322-23.

"Some of the party at the tents sent a tonjon, or open chair, carried like a palankeen, to meet me."—Maria Turney, 168.

1827.—"In accordance with Lady D'Oyly's earnest wish I go out every morning in her tonjin."—Diary of Mrs. Fenton, 100.

1829.—"I had been conveyed to the hill in Hanson's tonjin, which differs only from a palanquin in being like the body of a gig with a head to it."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 88.

1832.—"... I never seat myself in the palankeen or thonjaan without a feeling bordering on self-reproach..."—Mrs. Meer Hasan Ali, Observations, i. 320.

1839.—"He reined up his ragged horse, facing me, and dancing about till I had passed; then he dashed past me at full gallop, wheeled round, and charged my tonjon, bending down to his saddlesbow, pretending to throw a lance, showing his teeth, and uttering a loud quack!"—Letters from Madras, 290.

1849.—"We proceeded to Nawabgunge, the minister riding out with me, for some miles, to take leave, as I sat in my tonjohn."—Steenman, Journey through Oudh, i. 2.

TOOLSY, s. The holy Basil of the Hindus (Ocimum sanctum, L.), Skt. tulasi or tulasi, frequently planted in a vase upon a pedestal of masonry in the vicinity of Hindu temples or dwellings. Sometimes the ashes of deceased relatives are preserved in these domestic shrines. The practice is alluded to by Fr. Odoric as in use at Tana, near Bombay (see Cathay, i. 59, c. 1322); and it is accurately described by the later ecclesiastical quoted below. See also Ward's Hindoos, ii. 203. The plant has also a kind of sanctity in the Greek Church, and a character for sanitary value at least on the shores of the Mediterranean generally.

C. 1650.—"They who bear the tulasi round the neck... they are Vaishnavas, and sanctify the world."—Bhakta Mal, in H. H. Wilson's Works, i. 41.

1672.—"Almost all the Hindus adore a plant like our Basico gentile, but of more pungent odour... Every one before his house has a little altar, girt with a wall half an ell high, in the middle of which they erect certain pedestals like little towers, and in those the shrub is grown. They recite their prayers daily before it, with repeated prostrations, sprinklings of water, &c. There are also many of these maintained at the bathing-places, and in the courts of the pagodas."—P. Vincenzo Marte, 300.

1872.—"They plaster Cow-dung before their Doors; and so keep themselves clean, having a little plot or two built up a Foot Square of Mud, where they plant Cattam, or (by them called) Tulise, which they worship every Morning, and tend with Diligence."—Fryer, 199.

1842.—"Veneram a planta chamada Tulosse, por dizerem 6 do pateo do Deosse, e por isso é commum no pateo de suas casas, e todas as manheis lhe vao tributar veneração."—Ananas Maritimos, iii. 453.

1872.—"At the head of the ghat, on either side, is a sacred tulasi plant... placed on a high pedestal of masonry."—Govinda Samanta, i. 18.

The following illustrates the esteem attached to Toolsy in S. Europe:

1885.—"I have frequently realised how much prized the basil is in Greece for its mystic properties. The herb, which they say grew on Christ's grave, is almost worshipped in the Eastern Church. On St. Basil's day women take sprigs of this plant to be blessed in church. On returning home they cast some on the floor of the house, to secure luck for the ensuing year. They eat a little with their household, and no sickness, they maintain, will attack them for a year. Another bit they put in their cupboard, and firmly believe that their embroideries and silk garnment will be free from the visitation of rats, mice, and moths, for the same period."—J. T. Bent, The Cyclades, p. 328.

TOOMONGONG, s. A Malay title, especially known as borne by one of the chiefs of Johor, from whom the Island of Singapore was purchased. The Sultans of Johor are the representatives of the old Mahommedan dynasty of Malacca, which took refuge in Johor, and the adjoining islands (including Bintang especially), when expelled by Albuquerque in 1511, whilst the Tunanggun was a minister who had in Peshawa fashion appropriated the power of the Sultan, with hereditary tenure: and this chief now lives, we believe, at Singapore. Crawfurd says: "The word is most probably Javanese; and in Java is the title of a class of nobles, not of an office" (Malay Dict. s.v.)

1774.—"Paid a visit to the Sultan... and Pangaram Toomongong..."—Diary... of J. Herbert, in Forest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, ii. 488.

[1830.—"This (Bospa), however, is rather a title of office than of mere rank, as those governors are sometimes Tunung-gungs, An'g'bedia, and of still inferior rank."—Raffles, Java, 2nd ed. i. 299.]

1884.—"Singapore had previously been purchased from two Malay chiefs; the Sultan and Tunamong of Johore. The former, when Sir Stamford Raffles entered into the arrangement with them, was the titular sovereign, whilst the latter, who held an hereditary office, was the real ruler."—Cusenaygh, Remains of an Indian Official, 273.

TOON, TOON-WOOD, s. The tree and timber of the Cedrela Toona, Roxb. N.O. Malvaceae. Hind. tun, tân, Skt. tunna. The timber is like a poor mahogany, and it is commonly used for furniture and fine joiner's work in many parts of India. It is identified by Bentham with the Red Cedar of N.S. Wales and Queensland (Cedrela australis, F. Mueller). See Brandis, Forest Flora, 73. A sp. of the same genus (C. sinensis) is called in Chinese ch'un, which looks like the same word.

[1798.—The tree first described by Sir W. Jones, As. Res. iv. 288.]

1810.—"The too, or country mahogany, which comes from Bengal. . . ."—Maria Graham, 101.

1837.—"Roselliini informs us that there is an Egyptian harp at Florence, of which the wood is what is commonly called E. Indian mahogany (Athkamnum, July 22, 1837). This may be the Cedrela Toona."—Royle's Hindu Medicine, 30.

TOORBKEY, s. A Turkî horse, i.e. from Turkestan. Marco Polo uses what is practically the same word for a horse from the Turcoman horse-breeders of Asia Minor.

1298.—". . . the Turcomans . . . dwell among mountains and downs where they find good pasture, for their occupation is cattle-keeping. Excellent horses, known as Timurs, are reared in their country. . . ."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 2.

[1590.—"The fourth class (Turki) are horses imported from Turan; though strong and well formed, they do not come up to the preceding (Arabs, Persian, Mijannas)."—Arv, i. 234.]

[1663.—"If they are found to be Turkî horses, that is from Turkistan or Tartary, and of a proper size and adequate strength, they are branded on the thigh with the King's mark. . . ."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 294.]

1678.—"Four horses bought for the Company—

1782.—"Wanted one or two Tanyans (see TANGUN) rising six years old. Wanted also a Bay Toorkey, or Bay Tazz (see TAZEE) Horse for a Buggy. . . ."—India Gazette, Feb. 9.

"To be disposed of at Ghyretty, . . . a Buggy, almost new . . . a pair of uncommonly beautiful spotted Toorkays."—Ibid. March 2.

TOOTNAGU, s. Port. tutenaga. This word appears to have two different applications. a. A Chinese alloy of copper, zinc, and nickel, sometimes called 'white copper' (i.e. peh-tung of the Chinese). The finest qualities are alleged to contain arsenic. The best comes from Yunnan, and Mr. Joubert of the Garnier Expedition, came to the conclusion that it was produced by a direct mixture of the ores in the furnace (Voyage d'Exploration, ii. 160). b. It is used in Indian trade in the same loose way that speller is used, for either zinc or peuter (peh-yuen, or 'white lead' of the Chinese). The base of the word is no doubt the Pers. tattiya, Skt. tuttha, an oxide of zinc, generally in India applied to blue vitriol or sulphate of copper, but the formation of the word is obscure. Possibly the last syllable is merely an adjective affix, in which way ndik is used in Persian. Or it may be ndga in the sense of lead, which is one of the senses given by Shakespeare. In one of the quotations given below, tutenage is confounded with caln (see GALAY). Moodeen Sheriff gives as synonyms for zinc, Tam. tuntadgam [tutindaam], Tel. tutindaam [tuntindamu], Mahr. and Guz. tuti-ndga. Sir G. Stannum is curiously wrong in supposing (as his mode of writing seems to imply) that tutenage is a Chinese word. [The word has been finally corrupted in * St. Julien, at P. Champion, Industries Anciennes et Modernes de l'Empire Chinois, 1880, p. 75. Wells Williams says: "The peh-tung argentum, or white copper of the Chinese, is an alloy of copper 60%, zinc 35%, nickel 1%, and iron 5%, and occasionally a little silver; and these proportions are nearly those of German silver."—Middle Kingdom, ed. 1888, ii. 19.

TOOTHAGUE. 933  TOPAZ, TOPASS.

England into 'tooth and egg' metal, as in a quotation below.

1685.—"4500 Pikals (see PEGUL) of Tin-tenague (for Tinutenage) or Spelter."—In Valentine, v. 629.

1644.—"That which they export (from Cochinn to Orissa) is pepper, although it is prohibited, and all the drugs of the south, with Callaym (see CALAY), Tutenague, wares of China and Portugal; jewelled ornaments; but much less nowadays, for the reasons already stated...."—Bocarros, M.S. f. 316.

1675.—"... from thence with Dollars to China for Sugar, Tea, Porcelain, Lac- cored Ware, Quicksilver, Tuthinag, and Copper. ..."—Fryer, 86.

[1675-7.—"... supposing yo\(^{2}\) Hon\(^{2}\) may intend to send yr. Sugar, Sugar-candy, and Tutenag for Persia..."— Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 125.]

[... "In the list of commodities brought from the East Indies, 1678, I find among the drugs, tinctal (see TINCALL) and Toothanage set down. Enquire also what these are..."—Letter of Sir T. Browne, May 29, in N. & Q. 2 ser. v. 520.]

1727.—"Most of the Spunge in China had pernicious Qualities because the Sub- terraneous Grounds were stored with Minerals, as Copper, Quicksilver, Alum, Toothanag, &c."—A. Hamilton, ii. 222; [ed. 1744, ii. 222, for "Spunge" reading "Springs"].

1750.—"A sort of Cash made of Tooth- nague is the only Currency of the Country."—Some Ac. of Cochinn China, by Mr. Robert Kirrop, in Dalmynple, Or. Rep. i. 245.

[1757.—Speaking of the freemen enrolled at Nottingham in 1757, Bailey (Annals of Nottinghamshire, iii. 1286) mentions as one of them William Tutin, buckle-maker, and then goes on to say: "It was a son of this latter person who was the inventor of that beautiful composite white metal, the introduction of which created such a change in numerous articles of ordinary table service in England. This metal, in honour of the inventor, was called Tutinile, but which word, by one of the most absurd perversions of language ever known, became transferred into 'Tooth and Egg' the name by which it was almost uniformly recognised in the shops."—Quoted in 2 ser. N. & Q. x. 144.]

1780.—"At Quedah, there is a trade for callin (see CALAY) or tutenan to export to different parts of the Indies."—Dunn, New Directory, 5th ed. 338.

1797.—"Tutenan is, properly speaking, zinc, extracted from a rich ore or calamine; the ore is powdered and mixed with charcoal dust, and placed in earthen jars over a slow fire, by means of which the metal rises in form of vapour, in a common distilling apparatus, and afterwards is condensed in water."—Stanton's Act. of Lord Macartney's Embassy, 4to ed. ii. 540.

TOPAZ, TOPASS, &c., s. A name used in the 17th and 18th centuries for dark-skinned or half-caste claimants of Portuguese descent, and Christian profession. Its application is generally, though not universally, to soldiers of this class, and it is possible that it was originally a corruption of Pers. (from Turkish) top-chi, 'a gunner.' It may be a slight support to this derivation that Italians were employed to cast guns for the Zamorin at Calicut from a very early date in the 17th century, and are frequently mentioned in the annals of Correa between 1503 and 1510. Various other etymologies have however been given. That given by Orme below (and put forward doubtfully by Wilson) from topa^, 'a hat,' has a good deal of plausibility, and even if the former etymology be the true origin, it is probable that this one was often in the minds of those using the term, as its true connotation. It may have some corroboration not only in the fact that Europeans are to this day often spoken of by natives (with a shade of disparagement) as Topowalas (q.v.) or 'Hat-men,' but also in the pride commonly taken by all persons claiming European blood in wearing a hat; indeed Fra Paolino tells us that this class call themselves gente de chapeo (see also the quotation below from Ovington). Possibly however this was merely a misrendering of topaz from the assumed etymology. The same Fra Paolino, with his usual fertility in error, propounds in another passage that topaz is a corruption of do-bhadiya, 'two-tongued' (in fact is another form of Dubash, q.v.), viz. using Portuguese and a debased vernacular (pp. 60 and 144). [The Madras Gloss. assumes Mal. topdsh to be a corruption of dubash.] The Topaz on board ship is the sweeper, who is at sea frequently of this class.

1602.—"The 12th ditto we saw to seaward another Champagne (Sampen) wherein were 20 men, Mesticos (see MUSTEES) and Topouas."—Van Spilbergen's Voyage, p. 34, pub. 1648.

[1672.—"Toepasses." See under MADRAS.]

1673.—"To the Fort then belonged 800 English, and 400 Topasses, or Portugal Firemen."—Frey, 66. In his glossarial Index he gives "Topasses, Musketeers."

1680.—"It is resolved and ordered to entertain about 100 Topasses, or Black Portuguese, into pay."—In Wheeler, i. 121.

1686.—"It is resolved, as soon as English soldiers can be provided sufficient for the garrison, that all Topasses be disbanded, and no more entertained, since there is little dependence on them."—In digit, 189.

1690.—"A Report spread abroad, that a Rich Moor Ship belonging to one AW descended from portuguese maidens, taken by Batmen, that is, in their (the Moors) Dialect, Europeans."—Orington, 411.

1706.—"Topasse, qui sont des gens de pais qu'on sibele et qu'on habile a la Francois, lesquels ont esté instruits dans la Religion Catholique par quelques uns de ceux Missionnaires."—Ludier, 45-46.

1711.—"The Garrison consists of about 250 Soldiers, at 91 Fanshams, or 11. 2s. 9d. per Month, and 200 Topasses, or black Mungrel Portuguese, at 50, or 51 Fanshams per Month."—Lockyer, 14.

1727.—"Some Portuguese are called Topasses...will be served by none but Portuguese Priests, because they indulge them more and their Villany."—A. Hamilton, [ed. 1744, i. 526].

1745.—"Les Portugais et les autres Catholiques qu'on nomme Mustiquees (see MUSTEES) et Topasses, également comme les naturels du Pays y viennent sans distinction pour assister aux Divins mystères."—Nerbert, ii. 81.

1747.—"The officers upon coming in report their People in general behaved very well, and could not do more than they did with such a handful of men against the Force the Enemy had, being as they believe at least to be one thousand Europeans, besides Topasses, Coiffes (see CAFFER), and Seapoy's (see SEPOT), altogether about Two Thousand (2000)."—M.S. Commons, at Ft. St. David, March 1. (In India Office).

1749.—"600 effective Europeans would not have cost more than that Crowded of useless Topasses and Peons of which the Major Part of our Military has of late been composed."—In A Letter to a Proprietor of the E.I. Co. p. 57.

"The Topasses of which the major Part of the Garrison consisted, every one that knows Madras knows it to be a black, degenerate, wretched Race of the antient Portuguese, as proud and bigotted as their Ancestors, lazy, idle, and vitious withal, and most Part a weak and feeble in Body as base in Mind, not one in ten possessed of any of the necessary Requisites of a Soldier."—Ibid. App. p. 108.

1756.—"... in this plight, from half an hour after eleven till near two in the morning, I sustained the weight of a heavy man, with his knees on my back, and the pressure of his whole body on my head; a Dutch sergeant, who had taken his seat upon my left shoulder, and a Topass bearing on my right."—Holwell's Narr. of the Black Hole, [ed. 1758, p. 19].

1758.—"There is a distinction said to be made by you... which, in our opinion, does no way square with rules of justice and equity, and that is the exclusion of Portuguese topasses, and other Christian natives, from any share of the money granted by the Nawab."—Court's Letter, in Long, 138.

1785.—"Topasses, black foot soldiers, descended from Portuguese marrying natives, called topasses because they wear hats."—Carraccioo's Cive, iv. 544. The same explanation in Orme, i. 90.

1787.—"... Asserted the mixture of Moormen, Rajahpoos, Gentoes, and Malbars in the same corps is extremely benefical... I have also recommended the corps of Topasses or descendants of Europeans, who retain the characteristic qualities of their progenitors."—Col. Fullerton's View of English Interests in India, 222.

1791.—"Topasses are the sons of Europeans and black women, or low Portuguese, who are trained to arms."—Munro, Narr. 321.

1817.—"Topasses, or persons whom we may denominate Indo-Portuguese, either the mixed produce of Portuguese and Indian parents, or converts to the Portuguese, from the Indian, faith."—J. Mill, Hist. iii. 19.

TOPE.

a. This word is used in three quite distinct senses, from distinct origins.

a. Hind. top, 'a cannon.' This is Turkish top, adopted into Persian and Hindustani. We cannot trace it further. [Mr. Platts regards T. tob, top, as meaning originally 'a round mass,' from Skt. stupa, for which see below.]

b. A grove or orchard, and in Upper India especially a mango-orchard. The word is in universal use by the English, but is quite unknown to the natives of Upper India. It is in fact Tam. *topp, Tel. *topy, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tam. *towy, 'to collect,'] and must have been carried to Bengal by foreigners at an early period of European traffic. But Wilson is curiously mistaken in supposing it to be in common use in Hindustan by natives. The word used by them is bogh.

c. An ancient Buddhist monument in the form of a solid dome. The word tōp is in local use in the N.W. Punjab, where ancient monuments of this kind occur, and appears to come from Skt. stupa through the Pali or TOPE-KHANA. 935 TOPEE WALA.

Prakrit ṭhūpo. According to Sir H. Elliot (i. 505), Stupa in Icelandic signifies 'a Tower.' We cannot find it in Clesby. The word was first introduced to European knowledge by Mr. Elphinstone in his account of the Tope of Manikyala in the Rawul Pindi district.

[1887.—"Tope." See under TOPE-KHANA.]

[1884.—"The big gun near the Central Museum of Lahor called the Zam-Zamah or Bhanjianvati top, seems to have held much the same place with the Sikhs as the Malik-i-Maidan held in Bijapur."—Bombay Gazetteer, xxiii. 642.]

b.— 1673.—"... flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Cocoes, Guineaas."—Fryer, 40.
"The Country is Sandy; yet plentiful in Provisions; in all places, Tops of Trees."—Ibid. 41.

1747.—"The Topes and Walks of Trees in and about the Bounds will furnish them with firewood to burn, and Clay for Bricks is almost everywhere."—Report of a Council of War at Ft. St. David, in Conns. of May 5, MS. in India Office.

1754.—"A multitude of People set to the work finished in a few days an entrenchment, with a stout mud wall, at a place called Faquire's Tope, or the grove of the Faquire."—Orme, i. 278.

1799.—"Upon looking at the Tope as I came in just now, it appeared to me, that when you get possession of the bank of the Nullah, you have the Tope as a matter of course."—Wellingtom, Des. i. 28.

1809.—"... behind that a rich country, covered with rice fields and topes."—Ld. Valentinis, i. 557.

1814.—"It is a general practice when a plantation of mango trees is made, to dig a well on one side of it. The well and the tope are married, a ceremony at which all the village attends, and large sums are often expended."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 56.

[1839.—"Tope is an expression used for a mound or barrow as far west as Peshawer, ..."—Elphinstone, Caubul, 2nd ed. i. 108.]

TOPEE-WALA. s. A hat, Hind. topi. This is sometimes referred to Port. topo, 'the top' (also tope, 'a top-knot,' and topete, a 'toupee'), which is probably identical with English and Dutch top, L. German topp, Fr. topet, &c. But there is also a simpler Hind. word top, for a helmet or hat, and the quotation from the Roteiro Vocabulary seems to show that the word existed in India when the Portuguese first arrived. With the usual tendency to specialize foreign words, we find this word becomes specialized in application to the sola hat.

[1498.—In the vocabulary ("Este he a linguagem de Catric") we have: "barrete (i.e. a cap): tupy."—Roteiro, 118.]

The following expression again, in the same work, seems to be Portuguese, and to refer to some mode in which the women's hair was dressed: "Trazem em a molegra covered with rice fields and tope."—Ibid. 52.

1849.—"Our good friend Sol came down in right earnest on the waste, and there is need of many a fold of twisted muslin round the white topi, to keep off his importunacy."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 2.

1883.—"Topee, a solar helmet."—Wills, Modern Persia, 268.

TOPEE-WALA. s. Hind. topiwala, 'one who wears a hat,' generally a European, or one claiming to be so. Formerly by Englishmen it was habitually applied to the dark descendants of the Portuguese. R. Drummond says that in his time (before 1808) Topewala and Puggawala were used in Guzerat and the Mahrratta country for 'Europeans' and 'natives.' [The S. Indian form is Topikar.] The author of the Persian Life of Hydar' Nâk (Or. Tr. Fund, by Miles) calls 1687.—"The Topchi. These are Gunners, called so from the word Tope, which in Turkish signifies a Cannon, and are in number about 1200, distributed in 52 Chambers; their Quarters are at Tophana, or the place of Guns in the Suburbs of Constantinople."—Rycart's Present State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 94.

1726.—"Isfandar Chan, chief of the Artillery (called the Daroger (see DAROGA) of the Topcaanna)."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 276.

1765.—"He and his troops knew that by the treachery of the Tope Khonnah Droger (see DAROGA), the cannon were loaded with powder only."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c. i. 96.

Europeans Kalah-posh, i.e. 'hat-wearers' (p. 88).

1803. — "The descendants of the Portuguese ... unfortunately the ideas of Christianity are so imperfect that the only mode they hit upon of displaying their faith is by wearing hats and breeches." — Sydney Smith, Works, 3d. ed. iii. 5.

[1828. — 'It was now evident we should have to encounter the Topiwallahs.' — Pandurang Hwi, ed. 1878, i. 71.]

1874. — "... you will see that he will not be able to protect us. All Topiwallahs ... are brothers to each other. The magistrates and the judge will always decide in favour of their white brethren." — Govinda Samanta, ii. 211.

TORCULL, s. This word occurs only in Castanheda. It is the Malayalam tiru-koyil, [Tam. tiru, Skt. ṛtu, 'holy' koyil, 'temple']. See i. 253, 254; also the English Trans. of 1862, f. 151. In fact, in the 1st ed. of the 1st book of Castanheda turcoll occurs where pagode is found in subsequent editions. [Tricalore in S. Arcot is in Tam. Tirukkovilir, with the same meaning.]

TOSHACONNA, s. P.—H. tosha-khada. The repository of articles received as presents, or intended to be given as presents, attached to a government-office, or great man's establishment. The tosha-khada is a special department attached to the Foreign Secretariat of the Government of India.

[1616. — "Now indeed the atashkonnac was become a right stage."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 300.]

[1742. — "... the Treasury, Jewels, toshah-khanna ... that belonged to the Emperor."—Fraser, H. of Nadir Shah, 1783.]

1799. — "After the capture of Seringapatam, and before the country was given over to the Raja, some brass swamies (q.v.), which were in the toshakhanah were given to the brahmins of different pagodas, by order of Macleod and the General. The prize-agents require payment for them." — Wellington, i. 56.

[1885. — "When money is presented to the Viceroy, he always 'remits' it, but when presents of jewels, arms, stuffs, horses, or other things of value are given him, they are accepted, and are immediately handed over to the tosh khana or (Government Treasury). ..."—Lady Dufferin, Viceroyal Life, 75.]

TOSTDAUN, s. Military Hind. tosdan for a cartouch-box. The word appears to be properly Pers. toshaddn, 'provision-holder,' a wallet.

[1841. — "This last was, however, merely 'tos-đan tes awax'—a cartouch-box report — as our sepoys oddly phrase a vague rumour."—Society in India, ii. 233.]

TOTY, s. Tam. totti, Canar. totiga, from Tam. tondi, 'to dig,' properly a low-caste labourer in S. India, and a low-caste man who in villages receives certain allowances for acting as messenger, &c., for the community, like the goray of N. India.

1780. — "Il y a dans chaque village un homme de service, appelé Totti, qui est chargé des impositions publiques." — Lettr. Edif. xiii. 371.

[1888. — "The name Toty being considered objectionable, the same officers in the new arrangements are called Talaiers (see TALAIAR) when assigned to Police, and Vetians when employed in Revenue duties." — Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 211.]

TOUCAN, s. This name is very generally misapplied by Europeans to the various species of Hornbill, formerly all styled Buceros, but now subdivided into various genera. Jerdon says: "They (the hornbills) are, indeed, popularly called Toucans throughout India; and this appears to be their name in some of the Malayan isles; the word signifying 'a worker,' from the noise they make." This would imply that the term did originally belong to a species of hornbill, and not to the S. American Bophosphorus or Zygodactyle. Tukang is really in Malay a 'craftsman or artificer'; but the dictionaries show no application to the bird. We have here, in fact, a remarkable instance of the coincidences which often justly perplex etymologists, or would perplex them if it were not so much their habit to seize on one solution and despise the others. Not only is tukang in Malay 'an artificer,' but, as Willoughby tells us, the Spaniards called the real S. American toucan 'carpintero' from the noise he makes. And yet there seems no doubt that Toucan is a Brazilian name for a Brazilian bird. See the quotations, and especially Thévet's, with its date.

The Toucan is described by Oviedo (c. 1535), but he mentions only the name by which "the Christians" called it,—in Ramusio's Italian Picuto (?Beccudo; Sommario, in Ramusio, iii. f. 60). [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) gives only the Brazilian derivation.]
The question is still further discussed, without any very definite result, save that it is probably an imitation of the cry of the bird, in N. d. Q. 9 ser. vii. 486; viii. 22, 67, 85, 171, 250.]

1556.—“Sur la côte de la marine, la plus fréquente marchandise est le plumage d’un oiseau, qu'ils appellent en leur langue Toncan, lequel descroisent sommairement puis qu'il vient à propos. C'est oiseau est de la grandeur d'un pigeon. . . . Au reste c'est oiseau est merveilleusement difforme et monstrueux, ayant le bec plus gros et plus long qu'a le reste du corps.”—*Les Singularités de la France Antarctique, autriment nommée Amérique,... Par T. André Thevet, Natif d'Angoulême, Paris, 1558, f. 91.

See also (1599) Aldrovandus, Ornitholog. lib. xii. cap. 19, where the word is given toucanam.

Here is an example of misapplication to the Hornbill, though the latter name is also given:

1885.—“Scopah (in N. Canara) is the only region in which I have met with the toucan or great hornbill. . . . I saw the comical looking head with its huge aquiline beak, regarding me through a fork in the branch; and I account it one of the best shots I ever made, when I sent a ball through the head just at its junction with the handsome orange-coloured helmet which surmounts it. Down came the toucan with outspread wings, dead apparently; but when my peon Manoel raised him by the thick muscular neck, he fastened his great claws on his hand, and made the wood resound with a succession of roars more like a bull than a bird.”—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, &c. pp. 37-38.

TOWLEEA, s. Hind. *tauliyet, 'a towel.' This is a corruption, however, not of the English form, but rather of the Port. toilha (Panjab N. & Q., 1885, ii. 117).

TRAGA, s. [Molesworth gives “S. trgda, Guz. trgdu”; trgda does not appear in Monier-Williams's Skt. Dict., and Wilson queries the word as doubtful. Dr. Grierson writes: “I cannot trace its origin back to Skt. One is tempted to connect it with the Skt. root tr., or td, ‘to protect,’ but the termination gā presents difficulties which I cannot get over. One would expect it to be derived from some Skt. word like trka, but no such word exists.”] The extreme form of dhurna (q.v.) among the Rajputs and connected tribes, in which the complainant puts himself, or some member of his family, to torture or death, as a mode for bringing vengeance on the oppressor. The tone adopted by some persons and papers at the time of the death of the great Charles Gordon, tended to imply their view that his death was a kind of traga intended to bring vengeance on those who had sacrificed him. [For a case in Greece, see Pausania, X. i. 6. Another name for this self-sacrifice is Chandik, which is perhaps Skt. *taṇḍa, 'passionate' (see Malcolm, Cent. India, 2nd ed. ii. 137). Also compare the jhāhar of the Rajputs (Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 74). And for Kār, see As. Res. iv. 357 seqq.]

1808.—A case of traga is recorded in Sir Jasper Nicoll’s Journal, at the capture of Gawilgarh, by Sir A. Wellesley. See note to Wellington, ed. 1837, ii. 387.

1813.—“Every attempt to levy an assessment is succeeded by the Traka, a most horrid mode of murdering themselves and each other.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 91; [2nd ed. i. 378; and see i. 244].

1819.—For an affecting story of Traga, see Macmorro, in Bo. Lit. Soc. Trans. i. 281.

TRAGA, s. A kind of boat used in the Persian Gulf and adjoining seas. All attempts to connect it with any Indian or Persian word have been unsuccessful. It has been supposed to be connected with the Port. trnkgdor, a sort of flat-bottomed coasting vessel with a high stern, and with trnquart, a herring-boat used in the English Channel. Smyth (Sailor’s Word-book, s.v.) has: “Tranka or Trankies, a large boat of the Gulf of Persia.” See N. d. Q. 8 ser. vii. 167, 376.

[1554.—“He sent certain spies who went in Terraquimus dressed as fishermen who caught fish inside the straits.”—Couto, Dec. VI. Bk. x. ch. 20.]

[c. 1750.—“... he remained some years in obscurity, till an Arab trankey being driven in there by stress of weather, he made himself known to his countrymen. . . .”—Grose, 1st ed. 25.]

TRANQUEBAR, n.p. A seaport of S. India, which was in the possession of the Danes till 1807, when it was taken by England. It was restored to the Danes in 1814, and purchased from them, along with Serampore, in 1845.
The true name is said to be Tarangam-badī, ‘Sea-Town’ or ‘Wave-Town’;
so the Madras Gloss; but in the Man.
(ii. 216) it is interpreted ‘Street of the Telegu people.’

1610.—‘The members of the Company have petitioned me, that inasmuch as they do much service to

TRAVANCORE, n.p. The name of a village south of Trevandrum, from which the ruling dynasty of the kingdom which is known by the name has been called. The true name is said to be Thiruvithikōtu, shortened to Thiruviniōnkōtu. [The Madras Gloss gives Thiruvitiţkūr, Thiru, Skt. ērī, ‘the godness of prosperity,’ vīzhū, ‘to reside,’ kūr, ‘part.’

1614.—‘As to the money due from the Raja of Travancor...’—Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 270.)

1553.—‘And at the place called Tra-vancor, where this Kingdom of Coulam terminates, there begins another Kingdom, taking its name from this very Travancor, the king of which our people call the Rey Grande, because he is greater in his dominion, and in the state which he keeps, than those other princes of Malabar; and he is subject to the King of Narisinga.’—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1609.—‘The said Governor has written to me that most of the kings adjacent to our State, whom he advised of the coming of the rebels, had sent replies in a good spirit, with expressions of friendship, and with promises not to admit the rebels into their ports, all but him of Travancor, from whom no answer had yet come.’—King of Spain’s Letter, in Livros das Monções, p. 257.

TRIBENY, n.p. Skt. tri-veni, ‘threefold braid’; a name which properly belongs to Prayāga (Allahā-bad), where the three holy rivers, Ganges, Junna, and (unseen) Sarasvatī are considered to unite. But local requirements have instituted another Tribeni in the Ganges Delta, by stowing the name of Junna and Sarasvatī on two streams connected with the Hugli. The Bengal Tribeni gives name to a village, which is a place of great sanctity, and to which the melas or religious fairs attract many visitors.

1802.—‘... if I refused to stay there he would certainly stop me again at Tripppany some miles further up the River.’— Hedga, Diary, Oct. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 38].

1705.—‘... pendant la Lune de Mars
... il arrive la Fête de Triptiagn, c’est un Dieu enfermé dans une manière de petite Mosquée, qui est dans le milieu d’une tres-grande pleine ... au bord du Gange.’— Luiller, 69.

1753.—‘Au-dessous de Nudia, à Tripini, dont le nom signifie trois eaux, le Gange fait encore sortir du même côté un canal, qui par sa rentrée, forme une seconde ile renfermée dans la première.’—D’Aville, 64.

TRICHIES, s. The familiar name of the cheroots made at Trichinopoly; long, and rudely made, with a straw inserted at the end for the mouth. They are (or were) cheap and coarse, but much liked by those used to them. Mr. C. P. Brown, referring to his etymology of Trichi-noptoly under the succeeding article, derives the word cheroot from the form of the name which he assigns.
But this, like his etymology of the place-name, is entirely wrong (see CHEROOT). Some excellent practical scholars seem to be entirely without the etymological sense.

1876.—‘Between whiles we smoked, generally Manillas, now supplanted by foul Dindiguls and fetid Trichies.’—Burton, Ind. Rev. ed. i. 1.

TRICHINOPOLY, n.p. A district and once famous rock-fort of S. India.
The etymology and proper form of the name has been the subject of much difference. Mr. C. P. Brown gives the true name as Chiruta-palla, ‘Little-Town.’ But this may be safely rejected as mere guess, inconsistent with facts. The earliest occurrence of the name on an inscription is (about 1530) as Tiru-tēilla-pallī, apparently ‘Holy-rock-town.’ In the Travāram the place is said to be mentioned under the name of Sirapalli. Some derive it from Tri-sira-puram, 'Three-head-town,' with allusion to a 'three-headed demon.' [The Madras Gloss gives Tirukkindiyapalli, tiru, 'holy:', shina, 'the plant cissampelas pareira, L. palis, 'village.']

1677.—"Trichachapalli."—A. Bossing, in Valentijn's (Ceylon), 300.

1741.—"The Maratas concluded the campaign by putting this whole Peninsula under contribution as far as C. Cumerim, attacking, conquering, and retaining the city of Tirux-erapalli, capital of Madura, and taking prisoner the Nabab who governed it."—Report of the Fort. Viceroy, in Bozajo das Possessas, &c., Documentos, ed. 1833, iii. 19.

1753.—"Ces embouchures sont en grand nombre, yà la division de ce fleuve en differens bras ou canaux, à remonter jusques à Tirinhapalli, et à la pâgode de Shirrangham."—D'Anville, 115.

1761.—"After the battle Mahomed Ali Khan, son of the late nabob, fled to Truchinapalli, a place of great strength."—Complete Hist. of the War in India, 1761, p. 3.

TRINCOMALEE, n.p. A well-known harbour on the N.E. coast of Ceylon. The proper name is doubtful. It is alleged to be Tirukko-ndtha-malai, or Tanaranga-malai. The last ('Sea-Hill') seems conceived to fit our modern pronunciation, but not the older forms. It is perhaps Tri-kona-malai, for 'Three-peak Hill.' There is a shrine of Siva on the hill, called Tirukoneswara; [so the Madras Man. (ii. 216)].

1553.—"And then along the coast towards the north, above Baticaloa, there is the kingdom of Triquinamale."—Barros, II. ii. cap. 1.

1602.—"This Prince having departed, made sail, and was driven by the winds unknowing whither he went. In a few days he came in sight of a desert island (being that of Celion), where he made the land at a haven called Prastur, between Triquilmalai and the point of Jafanapadam."—Couto, V. i. 5.

1672.—"Triquinemale hath a surpassingly fine harbour, as may be seen from the draught thereof, yea one of the best and largest in all Ceylon, and better sheltered from the winds than the harbours of Belliganne, Gale, or Colombo."—Baldaeus, 413.

1675.—"The Cinghalees themselves oppose this, saying that they emigrated from another country . . . that some thousand years ago, a Prince of great piety, driven out of the land of Tanansary, . . . came to land near the Hill of Tricomemale with 1800 or 2000 men . . ."—Ryklof van Goens, in Valentijn (Ceylon), 210.

1685.—"Triquinimale . . ."—Ribeyro, Fr. Tr. 6.

1726.—"Trinkemale, properly Tricoemmale" (i.e. Trimenmale).—Valentijn (Ceylon), 19.

1727.—"Trinkemale . . ."—Ibid. 103.

1727.—". . . that vigilant Dutchman was soon after them with his Fleet, and forced them to fight disadvantageously in Tranxamalaya Bay, wherein the French lost one half of their Fleet, being either sunk or burnt."—A. Hamilton, i. 343, [ed. 1744].

1761.—"We arrived at Trincomale in Ceylone (which is one of the finest, if not ye best and most capacious Harbours in ye World) the first of November, and employed that and part of the ensuing Month in preparing our Ships for ye next Campaign."—MS. Letter of James Kennel, Jan. 31.

TRIPANG, s. The sea-slug. This is the Malay name, tripan, têripang. See SWALLOW, and BECHE-DE-MER.

TRIPLICANE, n.p. A suburb of Fort St. George; the part where the palace of the 'Nabob of the Carnatic' is. It has been explained, questionably, as Tiru-valli-ket, 'sacred-creepers-tank.' Seshagiri Sastri gives it as Tiru-alli-kêni, 'sacred lily- (Nymphaea rubra) tank,' [and so the Madras Gloss, giving the word as Tiruvalikkêni.]

1674.—"There is an absolute necessity to go on fortifying this place in the best manner we can, our enemies at sea and land being within less than musket shot, and better fortified in their camp at Trivilcane than we are here."—Fr. St. Geo. Comma. Feb. 2. In Notes and Extz., Madras, 1871, No. I. p. 28.

1679.—"The Didwan (Dewan) from Conjevaram, who pretends to have come from Court, having sent word from Treplicane that unless the Governor would come to the garden by the river side to receive the Phrymaud he would carry it back to Court again, answer is returned that it hath not been accustomned for the Governors to go out to receive a bare Phrymaud except there come therewith a Serpow (see SEERPFAW) or a Tasheriff " (see TASHERHFF).—Do., do., Dec. 2. Ibid. 1873, No. III. p. 40.

1682.—"Triblicane, Treblcane Tivetry."—Diary Fr. St. Geo. ed. Pringle, i. 63; iii. 154.]

TRIVANDRUM, n.p. The modern capital of the State now known as Travancore (q.v.). Properly Tiru(v)ananta-puram, 'Sacred Vishnu-Town.'
TRUMPÁK. n.p. This is the name by which the site of the native suburb of the city of Ormus on the famous island of that name is known. The real name is shown by Lt. Stiffe's account of that island (Geogr. Mag. i. 13) to have been Túrūn-bāgh, 'Garden of Tūrūn,' and it was properly the palace of the old Kings, of whom more than one bore the name of Tūrūn or Tūrūn Shāh.

1607. — "When the people of the city saw that they were so surrounded, that from no direction could water be brought, which was what they felt most of all, the principal Moors collected together and went to the king desiring him earnestly to provide a guard for the pools of Tūrūmbaque, which were at the head of the island, lest the Portuguese should obtain possession of them. . . ." — Comment. of Albuquerque, E.T. by Birch, i. 175.

"Meanwhile the Captain-Major ordered Afonso Lopes de Costa and João da Nova, and Manuel Teles with his people to proceed along the water's edge, whilst he with all the rest of the force would follow, and come to a place called Tūrūmbaque, which is on the water's edge, in which there were some palm-trees, and wells of brackish water, which supplied the people of the city with drink when the water-boats were not arriving, as sometimes happened owing to contrary wind." — Correa, i. 830.

1610. — "The island has no fresh water. . . only in Tūrūmbaque, which is a piece of white salt clay, at the extremity of the island, there is a well of fresh water, of which the King and the Wazir take advantage, to water the gardens which they have there, and which produce perfectly everything which is planted." — Teixeira, Rel. de los Reyes de Hormuz, 115.

1692. — "Behind the hills, to the S.S.W. and W.S.W. there is another part of the island, lying over against the anchorage that we have mentioned, and which includes the place called Tūrūmbaque . . . here one sees the ancient pleasure-house of the old Kings of Ormus, with a few small trees, and sundry date-palms. There are also here two great wells of water, called after the name of the place, 'The Wells of Tūrūmbaque': which water the most of the island and the freshest in the whole island." — Nieuhof, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 86.

TUAN, s. Malay tuan and tuwan, 'lord, master.' The word is used in the English and Dutch settlements of the Archipelago exactly as sahib is in India. [An early Chinese form of the word is referred to under SUMATRÁ.]

1653. — "Dom Paulo da Gama, who was a worthy son of his father in his zeal to do the King good service . . . equipped a good fleet, of which the King of Ugentana (see UJUNGTANAH) had presently notice, who in all speed set forth his own, consisting of 30 lanzharas, with a large force on board, and in command of which he put a valiant Moor called Túrūm-bāgh, to whom the King gave orders that as soon as our forces had quitted the fortress (of Malacca) not leaving enough people to defend it, he should attack the town of the Queleys (see KLINING) and burn and destroy as much as he could." — Correa, iii. 486.

1553. — "For where this word Baja is used, derived from the kingly title, it attaches to a person on whom the King bestows the title, almost as among us that of Count, whilst the style Túam is like our Dom; only the latter of the two is put before the person's proper name, whilst the former is put after it, as we see in the names of these two Javanese, Vtimuti Baja, and Túam Colacar." — Barros, II. vi. 3.

1893. — "the coolly talked over the affairs of the Tuan Inspector (English gentleman) to a crowd of natives." — W. B. Worsfold, A Visit to Java, 145.]

TUCKÁVEE. s. Money advanced to a ryot by his superior to enable him to carry on his cultivation, and recoverable with his quota of revenue. It is Ar.—H. tak∂t∂, from Ar. ātari, 'strength,' thus literally 'a reinforcement.'

1800. — "A great many of them, who have now been forced to work as labourers, would have thankfully received tacaγγy, to be repaid, by instalments, in the course of two or three years." — Buchanan, Mynore, ii. 188.

1890. — "When the Sirkar disposed of lands which reverted to it . . . it sold them almost always for a naazranaa (see NUZZER-ANA). It sometimes gave them gratis, but it never paid money, and seldom or ever advanced takávi to the tenant or owner. — Minutes of Sir T. Munro, i. 71. These words are not in Munro's spelling. The Editor has reformed the orthography.

TUCKED. s. An official reminder. Ar.—H. takávi, 'emphasis, injunction, and verb taktii karnd, 'to enjoin stringently, to insist.'

1862.—"I can hardly describe to you my life — work all day, English and Persian, scores of appeals and session cases, and a continual irritation of tukkeys and offensive remarks ... these take away all the enjoyment of doing one's duty, and make work a slavery."—Letter from Col. J. R. Becker, in (unpublished) Memoir, p. 28.

TUCKLAH. s. Pers. takya, literally 'a pillow or cushion'; but commonly used in the sense of a hut or hermitage occupied by a fakir or holy man.

[1800.—"He declared ... that two of the people charged ... had been at his tucklah."—Wellington, Desp. i. 78.]

[1847.—"In the centre of the wood was a Tajir's Taklah (sic) or Place of Prayer, situated on a little mound."—Mrs. MacKenzie, Life in the Mission, &c. ii. 47.]

TULWAUR. s. Domestic Hind. tamlet, being a corruption of tumbler.

TUMBLED. s. Domestic Hind.

TUMLET. s. A town, and anciently a sea-port and seat of Buddhist learning on the west of the Hoogly near its mouth, formerly called Tamralipti or -lpta. It occurs in the Mahâbhârata and many other Sanskrit words. "In the Dasa Kumdra and Vrihat Katha, collections of tales written in the 9th and 12th centuries, it is always mentioned as a great port of Bengal, and the seat of an active and flourishing commerce with the countries and islands of the Bay of Bengal, and the Indian Ocean" (Prof. H. 1879.—In going down the Hooghly:

"Before daybreak overlook the Ganges at Bannagur, met the Arrival 7 days out from Bullasore, and at night passed the Lilly at Tumbosee."—Pt. St. Geo. (Council on Tour). In Notes & Exts. No. II. p. 69.

1888.—"January 2. — We fell down below Tumbosee River.

"January 3. — We anchored at the Channel Trees, and lay here 4th and 5th for want of a gale to carry us over to Kodgeria."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 175.

1726. — "Tambuli and Bandia are two Portuguese villages, where they have their churches, and salt business."—Valentinj, v. 159.

[1753.—"Tomball." See under KEDGE-BEE.]

TUMTUM, s. A dog-cart. We do not know the origin. [It is almost certainly a corr. of English tandem, the slang use of which in the sense of a conveyance (according to the Stanf. Dict.) dates from 1807. Even now English-speaking natives often speak of a dog-cart with a single horse as a tandem.]

1886.—"We had only 3 coss to go, and we should have met a pair of tumtums which would have taken us on."—Trensljan, The Dak Bungalow, 384.

[1889.—"A G.B.T. cart once married a bathing-machine, and they called the child Tum-tum."—R. Kipling, The City of Dreadful Night, 74.]

TUNCA, TUNCAW, &c., s. P.—H. tankhwot, pron. tankha. Properly an assignment on the revenue of a particular locality in favour of an individual; but in its most ordinary modern sense it is merely a word for the wages of a monthly servant. For a full account of the special older uses of the word see Wilson. In the second quotation the use is obscure; perhaps it means the villages on which assignments had been granted.

1758.—"Roydoolub . . . has taken the discharge of the tuncaws and the arrears of the Naba's army upon himself."—Orme, iii. [ii. 361].

1760.—"You have been under the necessity of writing to Mr. Holwell (who was sent to collect in the tuncars). . . . The low men that are employed in the tuncars are not to be depended on."—The Nawab to the Prst. and Council of Ft. Wm., in Long, 233.

1778.—"These rescripts are called tuncas, and entitle the holder to receive to the amount from the treasuries . . . as the revenues come in."—Orme, ii. 276.

[1823.—"The Grassiah or Rajpoot chiefs . . . were satisfied with a fixed and known tanka, or tribute from certain territories, on which they had a real or pretended claim."—Malcolm, Cent. India, 2nd. ed. i. 385.

[1851.—"The Sikh detachments . . . used to be paid by tunkhwâh, or assignments of the provincial collectors of revenue."—Edwards, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 19.]

TURA, s. Or. Turk. tûra. This word is used in the Autobiography of Baber, and in other Mahommedan military narratives of the 16th century. It is admitted by the translators of Baber that it is rendered by them quite conjecturally, and we cannot but think that they have missed the truth. The explanation of tûra which they quote from Meninski is "reticulatus," and combining this with the manner in which the quotations show this tûra to have been employed, we cannot but think that the meaning which best suits is 'a gabion.' Sir H. Elliot, in referring to the first passage from Baber, adopts the reading tâbra, and says: "Tâbras are nose-bags, but . . . Badââni makes the meaning plain, by saying that they were filled with earth (Tâbrak-i-Baddaâni, f. 136). . . . The sacks used by Sher Shâh as temporary fortifications on his march towards Râjputâna were tâbras" (Elliot, vi. 469). It is evident, however, that Baber's tâbras were no tóbras, whilst a reference to the passage (Elliot, iv. 406) regarding Sher Shâh shows that the use of bags filled with sand on that occasion was regarded as a new contrivance. The tâbra of Badââni may therefore probably be a misreading; whilst the use of gabions implies necessarily that they would be filled with earth.

1526. — (At the Battle of Panipat) "I directed that, according to the custom of Rûm, the gun-carriages should be connected together with twisted bull-hides as with chains. Between every two gun-carriages were 6 or 7 tâbras (or breastworks). The matchlockmen stood behind these guns and târas, and discharged their matchlocks. . . . It was settled that as Panipat was a considerable city, it would cover one of our flanks by its buildings and houses while we might fortify our front by târas. . . ."—Baber, p. 304.
TURBAN.

1528.—(At the siege of Chanderi) "overseers and pioneers were appointed to construct works on which the guns were to be planted. All the men of the army were directed to prepare turas and scaling-ladders, and to serve the turas which are used in attacking forts. . . ."—Ibid. p. 376.

The editor's note at the former passage is: "The meaning (viz. 'breastwork') assigned to Tur here, and in another place is merely conjectural, founded on Petis de la Croix's explanation, and on the meaning given by Meninski to Tur, viz. rectilatums. The Turas may have been formed by the branches of trees, interwoven like basket-work . . . or they may have been covered defences from arrows and missiles. . . ."

Again: "These Turas, so often mentioned, appear to have been a sort of testudo, under cover of which the assailants advanced, and sometimes breached the wall. . . ."

TURBACA, n.p. This word is applied both in Mahratti and in Telugu to the Mahommedans (Turks). [The usual form in the inscriptions is Turushka (see Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 189).] Like this is Tur'ik (see TAROUI), which the Burmese now apply to the Chinese.

TURBAN, s. Some have supposed this well-known English word to be a corruption of the P. — H. sirbnd, 'head-wrap,' as in the following:

1727.—"I bought a few seerbunds and sanamos there (at Cuttack) to know the difference of the prices."—A. Hamilton, i. 394 (see PIECE-GOODS).

This, however, is quite inconsistent with the history of the word. Wedgewood's suggestion that the word may be derived from Fr. turbin, 'a whelk,' is equally to be rejected. It is really a corruption of one which, though it seems to be out of use in modern Turkish, was evidently used by the Turks when Europe first became familiar with the Ottomans and their ways. This is set forth in the quotation below from Zedler's Lexicon, which is corroborated by those from Rycant and from Galland, &c. The proper word was apparently dulband. Some modern Persian dictionaries give the only meaning of this as 'a sash,' but Meninski explains it as 'a cloth of fine white muslin; a wrapper for the head'; and Vullers also gives it this meaning, as well as that of a 'sash or belt.'* In doing so he quotes Shakespear's Dict., and marks the use as 'Hindustani-Persian.' But a merely Hindustani use of a Persian word could hardly have become habitual in Turkey in the 15th and 16th centuries. The use of dulband for a turban was probably genuine Persian, adopted by the Turks. Its etymology is apparently from Arab. dul, 'solvere,' admitting of application to either a girdle or a head-wrap. From the Turks it passed in the forms Tulipant, Tolliban, Turbant, &c., into European languages. And we believe that the flower tulip also has its name from its resemblance to the old Ottoman turban, [a view accepted by Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v. tulip, turban).]*

1487.—". . . tele bambagne assai che loro chiamano turbanti; tele assai colla saida, che lor chiamano sece (sash). . . ."—Letter on presents from the Sultan to L. de' Medici, in Rovac's Lorenzo, ed. 1825, ii. 371-72.

c. 1490.—"Estradits sont gens comme Genoites: vestus, à pied et à cheval, comme les Turcs, sauf la teste, où ils ne portent ceste toile qu'ils appellent tolliban, et sont durs gens, et eousent dehors tout l'an et leurs chevaux."—Ph. de Commynes, Liv. VIII. ch. viii. ed. Dupont (1849), ii. 456. Thus given in Danett's translation (1566): —"These Estradits are soldiers like to the Turks Ianizaries, and attired both on foot and on horseback like to the Turks, save that they weare not upon their head such a great royle of linnen as the Turkes do called (sic) Tolliban."—p. 325.

1588.—"In this canoes was the King's Secretarie, who had on his head a piece of died linen cloth folded vp like unto a Turkes Tulliban."—Cavendish, ibid. iv. 337.

c. 1610.—". . . un gros turban blanc à la Turque."—Pyard de Laval, i. 98; [Hak. Soc. i. 132 and 165].

1611.—Coggrave's French Dict. has: "Tolliban: m. A Turbunt or Turkish hat. "Tolepan, as Turbant." "Turbant: m. A Turbant; a Turkish hat, of white and fine linen wrought into a rundle; broad at the bottom to enclose the head, and lessening, for ornament, towards the top."

1615.—". . . se un Cristiano fosse trovato con turbante bianco in capo, sarebbe perciò costretto o a ringare o a morire. Questo turbante poi lo portano Turchi, di varie forme."—P. della Valle, i. 96.

1615.—"The Sultan of Socotra ... his clothes are Surat Stuffs, after the Arab manner ... a very good Turbant, but bare footed."—Sir T. Roe, [Hak. Soc. i. 32].

"Their Attire is after the Turkish fashion, Turbants only excepted, instead whereof they have a kind of Capp, rowled about with a black Turbant."—De Montfort, 5.

1650.—"Some indeed have sashes of silke and gold, tulipanted about their heads. ..."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 128.

"His way was made by 30 gallant young gentlemen vested in crimson saten; their Tulipants were of silke and silver wreathe'd about with cheynos of gold."—Ibid. p. 139.

1671.—"On the head they wear great Turbanes (Tulbande) which they touch with the hand when they say salamb to any one."—Baldenius (Germ. version), 33.

"Trois Tulbangis venoient de front apres luy, et ils poroient chacun un beau turban orné et enrichy d'aigrette."—Journ. d'Ant. Galland, i. 189.

1673.—"The mixture of Castes or Tribes of all India are distinguished by the different Modes of binding their Turbants."—Fryer, 115.

1674.—"El Tanadar de un golpo cortó las repetidas bueltas del turbante a un Tureo, y la cabeza asta la mitad, de que cayó muerte."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Port. ii. 179-180.

"Turbant, a Turkish hat," &c.—Glosographia, or a Dictionary interpreting the Hard Words of whatsoever language, now used in our refined English Tongue, &c., the 4th ed., by T. E., of the Inner Temple, Esq. In the Savoy, 1674.

1676.—"Mahomed Altiey returning into Persia out of India ... presented Cha-Seet the second with a Coco-nut about the bigness of an Austrich-egg ... there was taken out of it a Turbant that had 60 cubits of calicuit in length to make it, the coath being so fine that you could hardly feel it."—Tavernier, E.T. p. 127; [ed. Ball, ii. 7].

1687.—"In a detail of the high officers of the Sultan's Court we find: ..."—Senl. The Tulbentar Aga, he that makes up his Turbant."

A little below another personage (apparently) is called Tulban-oghzani ('The Turban Page')—Ricaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 14.

1711.—"Their common Dress is a piece of biew Callicio, wrap'd in a Rale round their Heads for a Turbant."—Lockyer, 67.

1745.—"The Turks hold the Sultan's Turban in honour to such a degree that they hardly dare touch it ... but he himself has, among the servants of his pry chamber, one whose special duty it is to adjust his Turban, or head-tire, and who is thence called Turkbantar or Dulbentar Aga, or Dulbendar Aga, also called by some Dulbend Oghzani (Oghzlan), or Page of the Turbant."—Zeller, Universal Lexicon, s.v.

c. 1760.—"They (the Sepoys) are chiefly armed in the country manner, with sword and target, and wear the Indian dress, the turbant, the cabay (Cabaya) or vest, and long drawers."—Grose, i. 39.

1843.—"The mutiny of Vellore was caused by a slight shown to the Mahomedan turbant; the mutiny of Bangalore by disrespect said to have been shown to a Mahomedan place of worship."—Macwuly, Speech on Gates of Somuwa.

TURKEY, s. This fowl is called in Hindustani pera, very possibly an indication that it came to India, perhaps first to the Spanish settlements in the Archipelago, across the Pacific, as the red pepper known as Chilli did. In Tamil the bird is called van-bhori, 'great fowl.' Our European names of it involve a complication of mistakes and confusions. We name it as if it came from the Levant. But the name turkey would appear to have been originally applied to another of the Paroindae, the guinea-fowl, Meleagris of the ancients. Minshew's explanations (quoted below) show strange confusions between the two birds. The French coq d'Inde or Dindon points only ambiguously to India, but the German Calecutische Hahn and the Dutch Kalkoen (from Calicuit) are specific in error as indicating the origin of the Turkey in the East. This misnomer may have arisen from the nearly simultaneous discovery of America and of the Cape route to Calicuit, by Spain and Portugal respectively. It may also have been connected with the fact that Malabar produced domestic fowls of extraordinary size. Of these Ibn Batuta (quoted below) makes quaint mention. Zeller's great German Lexicon of Universal Knowledge, a work published as late as 1745, says that these birds (turkeys) were called Calecutische and Indische because they were brought by the Portuguese from the Malabar coast. Dr. Caldwell cites a curious disproof of the antiquity of certain Tamil verses from their containing a simile of which the turkey forms the subject. And native scholars, instead of admitting the anachronism, have boldly maintained that the turkey had always been found in India (Dravidian Gramm. 2nd ed. p. 137). Padre Paolino was apparently of the same opinion, for whilst explaining that the etymology of Calicut is "Castle of the Fowls" he asserts that Turkeys (Galli d'India) came originally from India; being herein, as he often is, positive and wrong. In 1615 we find W. Edwards, the E.I. Co.'s agent at Ajmir, writing to send the Mogul "three or four Turkey cocks and hens, for he hath three cocks but no hens" (Colonial Paper, E. i. c. 388). Here, however, the ambiguity between the real turkey and the guinea-fowl may possibly arise. In Egypt the bird is called Dik-Rüm, 'fowl of Rüm' (i.e. of Turkey), probably a rendering of the English term.

c. 1347.—"The first time in my life that I saw a China cock was in the city of Kaulam. I had at first taken it for an ostrich, and I was looking at it with great wonder, when the owner said to me, 'Pooh! there are cocks in China much bigger than that!' and when I got there I found that he had said nothing more than the truth."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 267.

c. 1550.—"One is a species of peacock that has been brought to Europe, and commonly called the Indian fowl."—Giorlamo Benzoni, 148.

1627.—"Turk Cock, or cocke of India, avis iva dicta, quod ex Africa, et ut nonulli volunt alii, ex India cel Arabia ad nos allata sit. B. Inbiscit hacn. T. Indianisch hun. Calcuttisch hun... H. Le croy que cet osseau nous est venu de l'Amerique."—De la Boulaye-le-Gous, ed. 1657, p. 259.

1750-52.—"Some Germans call the turkeys Calcutta hens; for this reason I looked about for them here, and to the best of my remembrance I was told they were foreign."—Olof Toreen, 169-200. We do not know whether the mistake of Calcutta for Calicut belongs to the original author or to the translator—probably to the proverbial traditore.

TURNEE, TUNNEE, s. An English supercargo, Sea-Hind., and probably a corruption of attorney. (Roebuck).

TURPAUL, s. Sea-Hind. A tarpaulin (ibid.). [The word (tarp'di) has now come into common native use.]

TUSSAH, TUSSE, s. A kind of inferior silk, the tissues of which are now commonly exported to England. Anglo-Indians generally regard the termination of this word in r as a vulgarism, like the use of solar for sola (q.v.); but it is in fact correct. For though it is written by Milburn (1813) tuhka, and tusshe (ii. 158, 244), we find it in the Ain-i-Akbari as tasar, and in Dr. Buchanan as tasar (see below). The term is supposed to be adopted from Skt. tasar (as cited below in the Linnean Transactions of 1804 by Dr. Roxburgh) see also Allen, Mon. on Silk Cloths of Assam, 1899; Yusuf Ali, Silk Fabrics of N. W. P., 1900.] The first mention of tasar in English reports is said to be that by Michael Atkinson of Jangipur, as cited below in the Linnean Transactions of 1804 by Dr. Roxburgh, see Official Report on Sericulture in India, by J. Geoghegan, Calcutta, 1872, [and the elaborate article in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iii. 96 seqq.].

1796.—"... I send you herewith for Dr. Roxburgh a specimen of Bughy Tusseh silk. There are none of the Palma Christi species of Tusseh to be had here. ... I have heard that there is another variation of the Tusseh silk-worm in the hills near Baghlipoor."—Letter of M. Atkinson, as above, in Linn. Trans., 1804, p. 41.

1802.—"They (the insects) are found in such abundance over many parts of Bengal and the adjoining provinces as to have afforded to the natives, from time immemorial, an abundant supply of a most durable, coarse, dark-coloured silk, commonly called Tusseh silk, which is woven into a cloth called Tusseh dudhies, much worn by Brahmins and other sects of Hindoos."—Roxburgh, Ibid. p. 84.

c. 1809.—"The chief use to which the tree (Terminalia elastica, or Aan) is however applied, is to rear the Tusar silk."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 157 seqq.

[1817.—"A thick cloth, called tusuru, is made from the web of the gosse insect in the district of Vyerboomees."—Ward, Hindoos, 2d ed. i. 85.]

1876.—"The work of the Tusar silk-weavers has so fallen off that the Calcutta merchant no longer do business with them."—Sur. Rev., 14 Oct., p. 486.

TUTICORIN, n.p. A sea-port of Tinnevelly, and long the seat of pearl-fishery, in Tamil Tutukkudi, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tamil taṭtu, 'to scatter,' kudi, 'habitation']. According to Fra Paolino the name is Tutakodi, 'a place where nets are washed,' but he is not to be trusted. Another etymology alleged is from turu, 'a bush.' See Bp. Caldwell below.

1544.—"At this time the King of Cape Comorin, who calls himself the Great King (see TRAVANCORE), went to war with a neighbour of his who was king of the places beyond the Cape, called Manapad and Tutucurry, inhabited by the Christians that were made there by Miguel Vaz, Viceroy General of India at the time."—Corrals, iv. 408.

1610.—"And the said Captain and Auditor shall go into residence every three years, and to him shall pertain all the temporal government, without any intermeddling therein of the members of the Company ... nor shall the said members (religious) compel any of the Christians to remain in the island unless it is their voluntary choice to do so, and such as wish it may live at Tutucorin."—King's Letter, in L. d. Monyp, 386.

1644.—"The other direction in which the residents of Cochim usually go for their trading purchases is to Tutucorin, on the Fishery Coast (Costa da Pescaria), which gets that name from the pearl which is fished there."—Bourne, MS.

TYPHOON. s. A tornado or cyclone-wind; a sudden storm, a 'norwester' (q.v.). Sir John Barrow (see Autobiog. 57) ridicules 'learned antiquarians' for fancying that the Chinese took typhoon from the Egyptian Typhon, the word being, according to him, simply the Chinese syllables, ta-fung, 'Great Wind.' His ridicule is misplaced. With a monosyllabic language like the Chinese (as we have remarked elsewhere) you may construct a plausible etymology, to meet the requirements of the sound alone, from anything and for anything. And as there is no evidence that the word is in Chinese use at all, it would perhaps be as fair a suggestion to derive it from the English 'tough 'un.' Mr. Giles, who seems to think that the balance of evidence is in favour of this (Barrow's) etymology, admits a serious objection to be that the Chinese have special names for the typhoon, and rarely, if ever, speak of it vaguely as a 'great wind.' The fact is that very few words of the class used by seafaring and trading people, even when they refer to Chinese objects, are directly taken from the Chinese language. E.g. Mandarín, pagoda, chop, cooly, tulipanque;—none of these are Chinese. And the probability is that Vasco and his followers got the tufão, which our sailors made into touffon and then into typhoon, as they got the monção which our sailors made into monsoon, direct from the Arab pilots.

The Arabic word is tufân, which is used habitually in India for a sudden and violent storm. Lane defines it as meaning 'an overpowering rain, . . . Noah's flood,' etc. And there can be little doubt of its identity with the Greek τυφών or τυφώ. [But Burton (Ar. Nights, iii. 257) alleges that it is pure Arabic, and comes from the root ταύ, 'going round.'] This word τυφών (the etymologists say, from τυφω, 'I raise smoke') was applied to a demon-giant or Titan, and either directly from the etym. meaning or from the name of the Titan (as in India a whirlwind is called 'a Devil or Pisachee') to a 'waterspout,' and thence to analogous stormy phenomena. 'Waterspout' seems evidently the meaning of τυφών in the Meteorologica of Aristotle (πυήνα μέν οὖν τυφών . . . κ.τ.λ. iii. 1; the passage is exceedingly difficult to render clearly); and also in the quotation which we give from Aulus Gellius. The word may have come to the Arabs either in maritime intercourse, or through the translations of Aristotle. It occurs (al-tufân) several times in the Koran; thus in sura, vii. 134, for a flood or storm, one of the plagues of Egypt, and in a. xxix. 14 for the Deluge.

Dr. F. Hirth, again (Journ. R. Geog. Soc. i. 260), advocates the quasi-Chinese origin of the word. Dr. Hirth has found the word Tai (and also with the addition of fung, 'wind') to be really applied to a certain class of cyclonic winds, in a Chinese work on Formosa, which is a re-issue of a book originally published in 1694. Dr. Hirth thinks tai as here used (which is not the Chinese word ta or tai, 'great,' and is expressed by a different character) to be a local Formosan term; and is of opinion that the combination t'ai-fung is "a sound so near that of typhoon as almost to exclude all other conjectures, if we consider that the writers using the term in European languages were travellers distinctly applying it to storms encountered in that part of the China Sea." Dr. Hirth also refers to F. Mendes Pinto and the passages (quoted below) in which he says tufão is the Chinese name for such storms. Dr. Hirth's paper is certainly worthy of much more attention than the scornful assertion of Sir John Barrow, but it does not induce us to change our view as to the origin of typhoon.

Observe that the Port. tufão distinctly represents tāfān and not tāi-fung, and the oldest English form 'tuffon' does the same, whilst it is not by any means unquestionable that these Portuguese and English forms were first applied in the China Sea, and not in the Indian Ocean. Observe also Lord Bacon’s use of the word typhoses in his Latin below; also that tāfān is an Arabic word, at least as old as the Koran, and closely allied in sound and meaning to tupfān, whilst it is habitually used for a storm in Hindustani. This is shown by the quotations below (1810-1836); and Platts defines tāfān as “a violent storm of wind and rain, a tempest, a typhoon; a flood, deluge, inundation, the universal deluge” etc.; also tāfānī, “stormy, tempestuous . . . boisterous, quarrelsome, violent, noisy, riotous.”

Little importance is to be attached to Pinto’s linguistic remarks such as that quoted, or even to the like dropt by Couto. We apprehend that Pinto made exactly the same mistake that Sir John Barrow did; and we need not wonder at it, when so many of our countrymen in India have supposed hackery to be a Hindustani word, and when we find even the learned H. H. Wilson assuming tope (in the sense of ‘grove’) to be in native Hindustani use. Many instances of such mistakes might be quoted. It is just possible, though not we think very probable, that some contact with the Formosan term may have influenced the modification of the old English form tuffon into typhon. It is much more likely to have been influenced by the analogies of monsoon, simoom; and it is quite possible that the Formosan mariners took up their (unexplained) t'ai-fung from the Dutch or Portuguese.

On the origin of the Ar. word the late Prof. Robertson-Smith forwarded the following note:

“The question of the origin of Tāfān appears to be somewhat tangled.

*Tufōr, 'whirlwind, waterspout,’ connected with τυφός seems pure Greek; the combination in Baal-Zephon, Exod. xiv. 2, and Saphn, the northern one, in Joel, ii. 20, suggested by Hitzig, appears to break down, for there is no proof of any Egyptian name for Set corresponding to Typhon."

“On the other hand Tāfān, the deluge, is plainly borrowed from the Aramaic. Tāfān, for Noah’s flood, is both Jewish, Aramaic, and Syriac, and this form is not borrowed from the Greek, but comes from a true Semitic root tāf ‘to overflow.’

“But again, the sense of whirlwind is not recognised in classic Arabic. Even Döry in his dictionary of later Arabic only cites a modern French-Arabic dictionary (Bochor’s) for the sense, Tourbillon, trombe. Bistani in the Mobib states that the word does not have this sense, though he is pretty full in giving modern as well as old words and senses. In Arabic the root tāf means ‘to go round,’ and a combination of this idea with the sense of sudden disaster might conceivably have given the new meaning to the word. On the other hand it seems simpler to regard this sense as a late loan from some modern form of tupfān, tupha, or tifone. But in order finally to settle the matter one wants examples of this sense of tāfān.”

“Sometimes claimed as a Chinese word meaning ‘a great wind’ . . . but this seems to be a late mystification. In old authors the forms are tufon, tufoun, tiphon, &c.—Arab. tāfān, a hurricane, storm. Gk. tupfōn, better tupfōs, a whirlwind. The close accidental coincidence of these words in sense and form is very remarkable, as Whitney notes.”]

1540.—“Now having . . . continued our Navigation within this Bay of Cauchina-Aiiss ... upon the day of the nativity of our Lady, being the eight of September, the fear that we were in of the new Moon, during which there oftentimes happens in this Climate such a terrible storm of wind and rain, as it is not possible for ships to withstand it, which by the Chinese is named Tufan” (o qual tormento os Chines chamando tufo).—Pinto (orig. cap. I.) in Cogan, p. 80.

“... in the height of forty and one degrees, there arose so terrible a Southwind, called by the Chinese Tufan (u tempo do Sul, a q Chines chamando tufo).” — Ibid. (cap. lixii.), in Cogan, p. 97.

1567.—"I went aboarde a shippe of Bengal, at which time it was the yeere of TYPHOON, concerning which TYPHOON ye are to understand that in the East Indies often times, there are not storms so in other countreys; but every 10 or 12 yeeres there are such tempestes and storms that it is a thing incredible... neither do they know certainly what yeere they will come."—Master Caesar Fredericks, in Hakl. ii. 370 [369].

1575.—"But when we approach'd unto it (Cyprus), a Hurricane arose suddenly, and blew so fiercely upon us, that it wound our great Sail round about our main Mast... These Winds arise from a Wind that is called by the Greeks TYPHON; and Pliny calleth it Vortex and Vortex; but as dangerous as they are, as they arise suddenly, so quickly are they laid again also."—Ravwolff's Travels, in Ray's Collection, ed. 1705, p. 320. Here the traveller seems to intimate (though we are not certain) that Typhon was then applied in the Levant to such winds; in any case it was exactly the façade of India.

1602.—"This Junk seeking to make the port, consults with the most renowned Storms such as the natives call TUFFO, a thing so overpowering and terrible, and bringing such violence, such earthquake as it were, that it appears as if all the spirits of the infernal world had got into the waves and seas, driving them in a whirl till their fury seems to raise a scud of flame, whilst in the space of one turning of the sand-glass the wind shall veer round to every point of the compass, seeming to blow more furiously from each in succession.

"Such is this phenomenon that the very birds of heaven, by some natural instinct, know of its coming 8 days beforehand, and are seen to take their nests down from the trees-tops and hide them in crevices of rock. Eight days before, however, blue clouds are also seen to float so low as almost to graze men's heads, whilst in these days the seas seem beaten down as it were, and of a deep blue colour. And before the storm breaks forth, the sky exhibits a token well-known to all, a great object which seamen call the Ox-Eye (Olho de Boi) all of different colours, but so gloomy and appalling that it strikes fear in all who see it. And as the Bow of Heaven, when it appears, is the token of fair weather, and calm, so this seems to portend the Wrath of God, as we may well call such a storm. ... "—C. Couto, V. viii. 12.

1626.—"Francis Fernandez writeth, that in the way from Malacca to Japan they are encountered with great storms which they call TUFFONS, that blow foure and twentie hours, beginning from the North to the East, and so about the Compass."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1626.

1628.—"TUFFONS are a particular kind of violent Storms blowing on the Coast of Tonquin... it comes on fierce and blows very violent, at N.E. twelve hours more or less... When the Wind begins to abate it dies away suddenly, and falling flat calm it continues so an Hour, more or less; then the Wind comes round about to the S.W. and it blows and rains as fierce from hence, as it did before at N.E. and as long."—Dampier, ii. 36. 1836.—"A most terrific toofaan . . . came on that seemed likely to tear the very trees up by the roots."—John Shipps, ii. 285.

"I thanked him, and enquired how this toofaan or storm had arisen."—Pandurang Hari, [ed. 1873, i. 50].

1836. — "A hurricane has blown ever since gunfire; clouds of dust are borne along upon the rushing wind; not a drop of rain; nothing is to be seen but the whirling clouds of the toofaan. The old peepul-tree moans, and the wind roars in it as if the storm would tear it up by the roots."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 58.

1840. — "Slavers throwing overboard the Dead and Dying. Typhoon coming on. "‘Aloft all hands, strike the topmast and bray.'

Yon angry setting sun, and fierce-edge clouds Declare the Typhoon’s coming &c. (Fallacies of Hope)." J. M. W. Turner, in the R.A. Catalogue.

Mr. Ruskin appears to have had no doubt as to the etymology of Typhoon, for the rain-cloud from this picture is engraved in Modern Painters, vol. iv. as "The Looks of Typhoon." See Mr. Hamerton’s Life of Turner, pp. 288, 291, 343.

Punch parodied Turner in the following imaginary entry from the R.A. Catalogue:

"54.—A Typhoon bursting in a Simoon over the Whirlpool of Maelstrom, Norway, with a ship on fire, an eclipse and the effect of a lunar rainbow.”

1853.—". . . pointing as he spoke to a dark dirty line which was becoming more and more visible in the horizon: ‘By Jove, yes! ’ cried Stanton, ‘that’s a typhoon coming up, sure enough.’”—Oakfield, i. 122.

1859.—"The weather was sultry and unsettled, and my Jemadar, Ramdeen Teawary . . . opined that we ought to make ready for the coming tufhan or tempest. . . . A darkness that might be felt, and that no lamp could illumine, shrouded our camp. The wind roared and yelled. It was a hurricane.”—Lit.-Obs. Lexicon, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 62.

Compare the next quotation, from the same writer, with that given above from Coutot respecting the Olho de Boi:

1885. — "The district was subject to cyclonic storms of incredible violence, fortunately lasting for a very short time, but which often caused much destruction. These storms were heralded by the appearance above the horizon of clouds known to the natives by the name of ‘lady’s eyebrows,’ so called from their being curved in a narrow black-arched wisp, and these most surely foretold the approach of the tornado.”

UJUNGTANAH, n.p. This is the Malay name (nearly answering to 'Land’s End,' from Ujung, 'point or promontory,' and tanah, 'land') of the extreme end of the Malay Peninsula terminating in what the maps call Pt. Romania. In Godinho de Eредia’s Declaracins de Malaca the term is applied to the whole Peninsula, but owing to the interchangeable use of a, UMBRELLA.

This word is of course not Indian or Anglo-Indian, but the thing is very prominent in India, and some interest attaches to the history of the word and thing in Europe. We shall collect here a few quotations bearing upon this. The knowledge and use of this serviceable instrument seems to have gone through extraordinary eclipses. It is frequent as an accompaniment of royalty in the Nineveh sculptures; it was in general Indian use in the time of Alexander; it occurs in old Indian inscriptions, on Greek vases, and in Greek and Latin literature; it was in use at the court of Byzantium, and at that of the Great Khan in Mongolia, in medieval Venice, and more recently in the semi-savage courts of Madagascar and Ashantee. Yet it was evidently a strange object, needing particular description, to John Marignoli (c. 1350), Ruy Clavijo (c. 1404), Barbossa (1516), John de Barros (1553), and Minshiu (1617). When Eastern monarchs show their state abroad;
Britain in winter only knows its aid
To guard from chilly showers the walking maid."—Gay, Trivia, i.

1860.—"Advertisement posted at the door of one of the Sections of the British Association meeting at Edinburgh.

"The gentleman, who carried away a brown silk umbrella from the — Section yesterday, may have the cover belonging to it, which is of no further use to the Owner, by applying to the Porter at the Royal Hotel."—(From Personal Recollection.)—It is a curious parallel to the advertisement above from the Female Tatter.

UPAS, s. This word is now, like Juggernaut, chiefly used in English as a customary metaphor, and to indicate some institution that the speaker wishes to condemn in a compendious manner. The word upas is Javanese for poison; [Mr. Scott writes: "The Malay word upas, means simply 'poison.' It is Javanese îupas, Sundanese ïupas, Balinese îupas, 'poison.' It commonly refers to vegetable poison, because such are more common. In the Lampong language îupas means 'sickness.'] It became familiar in Europe in connection with exaggerated and fabulous stories regarding the extraordinary and deadly character of a tree in Java, alleged to be so called. There are several trees in the Malay Islands producing deadly poisons, but the particular tree to which such stories were attached is one which has in the last century been described under the name of Antiaris toxicara, from the name given to the poison by the Javanese proper, viz. Antjar, or Anchar (the name of the tree all over Java), whilst it is known to the Malays and people of Western Java as Upas, and in Celebes and the Philippine Islands as Ipo or Hipo.
[According to Mr. Scott “the Malay name for the ‘poison-tree,’ or any poison-tree, is pohon upas, pohon upas, represented in English by bohon-upas. The names of two poison-trees, the Javanese anchar (Malay also anchar) and chetik, appear occasionally in English books... The Sundanese name for the poison tree is bulu ongo.”] It was the poison commonly used by the natives of Celebes and other islands for poisoning the small bamboo darts which they used (and in some islands still use) to shoot from the blow-tube (see SUMPITAN, SABBATANHE).

The story of some deadly poison in these islands is very old, and we find it in the Travels of Friar Odoric, accompanied by the mention of the disgusting antidote which was believed to be efficacious, a genuine Malay belief, and told by a variety of later and independent writers, such as Nieuhof, Saar, Tavernier, Cleyer, and Kaempfer.

The subject of this poison came especially to the notice of the Dutch in connection with its use to poison the arrows just alluded to, and some interesting particulars are given on the subject by Bontius, from whom a quotation is given below, with others. There is a notice of the poison in De Bry, in Sir T. Herbert (whenceever he borrowed it), and in somewhat later authors about the middle of the 17th century. In March 1666 the subject came before the young Royal Society, and among a long list of subjects for inquiry in the East occur two questions pertaining to this matter.

The illustrious Rumphius in his Herbarium Amboinense goes into a good deal of detail on the subject, but the tree does not grow in Amboyna where he wrote, and his account thus contains some ill-founded statements, which afterwards lent themselves to the fabulous history of which we shall have to speak presently. Rumphius however procured from Macassar specimens of the plant, and it was he who first gave the native name (Ipo, the Macassar form) and assigned a scientific name, Arbor toxicaria.* Passing over with simple mention the notices in the appendix to John Ray’s Hist. Plantarum, and in Valentijn (from both of which extracts will be found below), we come to the curious compound of the loose statements of former writers magnified, of the popular stories current among Europeans in the Dutch colonies, and of pure romantic invention, which first appeared in 1783, in the London Magazine. The professed author of this account was one Foersch, who had served as a junior surgeon in the Dutch East Indies.* This person describes the tree, called bohon-upas, as situated “about 27 leagues† from Batavia, 14 from Soura Karta, the seat of the Emperor, and between 18 and 20 leagues from Tinkjoe” (probably for Tjukjoe, i.e. Djokko-Karta), “the present residence of the Sultan of Java.” Within a radius of 15 to 18 miles round the tree no human creature, no living thing could exist. Condemned malefactors were employed to fetch the poison; they were protected by special arrangements, yet not more than 1 in 10 of them survived the adventure. Foersch also describes executions by means of the Upas poison, which he says he witnessed at Soura Karta in February 1776.

The whole paper is a very clever piece of sensational romance, and has impressed itself indelibly, it would seem, on the English language; for to it is undoubtedly due the adoption of that standing metaphor to which we have alluded at the beginning of this article. This effect may, however, have been due not so much directly to the article in the London Magazine as to the adoption of the fable by the famous ancestor of a man still more famous, Erasmus Darwin, in his poem of the Loves of the Plants. In that work not only is the essence of Foersch’s story embodied in the verse, but the story itself is quoted at length in the notes. It is said that Darwin was warned of the worthlessness of the narrative, but was unwilling to rob his poem of so sensational an episode.

Nothing appears to be known of Foersch except that there was really a person of that name in the medical service in Java at the time indicated. In our article ANACONDA we have adduced some curious particulars of analogy between the Anaconda-myth and the Upas-myth, and intimated a suspicion that the same hand may have had to do with the spinning of both yarns.

The extraordinary éclat produced by the Foerschian fables led to the appointment of a committee of the Batavian Society to investigate the true facts, whose report was published in 1789. This we have not yet been able to see, for the report is not contained in the regular series of the Transactions of that Society; nor have we found a refutation of the fables by M. Charles Coquebert referred to by Leschenault in the paper which we are about to mention. The poison tree was observed in Java by Deschamps, naturalist with the expedition of D'Entrecasteaux, and is the subject of a notice by him in the Annales de Voyages, vol. i., which goes into little detail, but appears to be correct as far as it goes, except in the statement that the Anchar was confined to Eastern Java. But the first thorough identification of the plant, and scientific account of the facts was that of M. Leschenault de la Tour. This French savant, when about to join a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, was recommended by Jussieu to take up the investigation of the Upas. On first enquiring at Batavia and Samarang, M. Leschenault heard only fables akin to Foersch's romance, and it was at Sura Karta that he first got genuine information, which eventually enabled him to describe the tree from actual examination.

The tree of which he took his specimens was more than 100 ft. in height, with a girth of 18 ft. at the base. A Javanese who climbed it to procure the flowers had to make cuts in the stem in order to mount. After ascending some 25 feet the man felt so ill that he had to come down, and for some days he continued to suffer from nausea, vomiting, and vertigo. But another man climbed to the top of the tree without suffering at all. On another occasion Leschenault, having had a tree of 4 feet girth cut down, walked among its broken branches, and had face and hands besprinkled with the gum-resin, yet neither did he suffer; he adds, however, that he had washed immediately after. Lizards and insects were numerous on the trunk, and birds perched upon the branches. M. Leschenault gives details of the preparation of the poison as practised by the natives, and also particulars of its action, on which experiment was made in Paris with the material which he brought to Europe. He gave it the scientific name by which it continues to be known, viz. Antheris toxicaria (N.O. Artocarpae).* M. Leschenault also drew the attention of Dr. Horsfield, who had been engaged in the botanical exploration of Java some years before the British occupation, and continued it during that period, to the subject of the Upas, and he published a paper on it in the Batavian Transactions for 1813 (vol. vii.). His account seems entirely in accordance with that of Leschenault, but is more detailed and complete, with the result of numerous observations and experiments of his own.

He saw the Antheris first in the Province of Poegar, on his way to Banyuwanbang. In Blambangan (eastern extremity of Java) he visited four or five trees; he afterwards found a very tall specimen growing at Passaruwang, on the borders of Malang, and again several young trees in the forests of Japara, and one near Onarang. In all these cases, scattered over the length of Java, the people knew the tree as anchar.

Full articles on the subject are to be found (by Mr. J. J. Bennet) in Horsfield's Plantae Jamavenicae Rariorae, 1838-52, pp. 52 seqq., together with a figure of a flowering branch pl. xiii.; and in Blume's Kumphia (Brussels, 1836), pp. 46 seqq., and pls. xxii., xxiii.; to both of which works we have been much indebted for guidance. Blume gives a drawing, for the truth of which he vouches, of a tall specimen of the trees. These he describes as "reata, artuas, et a ceteris segregatlas,"—solitary

* Leschenault also gives the description of another and still more powerful poison, used in a similar way to that of the Antheris, viz. the tiende, called sometimes Upas Rojo, the plant producing which is a Styraxle, and a creeper. Though, as we have said, the name Upas is generic, and is applied to this, it is not the Upas of English metaphor, and we are not concerned with it here. Both kinds are produced and prepared in Java. The Upa (a form of Upas) of Macassar is the Antheris; the Upa of the Borneo Dayaks is the Tiende.
and eminent, on account of their great longevity, (possibly on account of their being spared by the axe?), but not for any such reason as the fables allege. There is no lack of adjoining vegetation; the spreading branches are clothed abundantly with parasitical plants, and numerous birds and squirrels frequent them. The stem throws out ‘wings’ or buttsnesses (see Horsfield in the Bat. Trans., and Blume’s Pl.) like many of the forest trees of Further India. Blume refers, in connection with the origin of the prevalent fables, to the real existence of exhalations of carbonic acid gas in the volcanic tracts of Java, dangerous to animal life and producing sterility around, according to the prevalent fables, the description of the Gumo Up or Poison Valley on the frontier of the Pekalongan and Banyumas provinces.

We may observe, however, that, if we remember rightly, the exaggerations of Mr. Loudoun have been exposed and ridiculed by Dr. Junghuhn, the author of “Java.” And if the Foersch legend be compared with some of the particulars alleged by several of the older writers, e.g. Camell (in Ray), Valentijn, Spielman, Kaemper, and Runphius, it will be seen that the basis for a great part of that putida commendatio, as Blume calls it, is to be found in them.

George Colman the Younger founded on the Foerschian Upas-myth, a kind of melodramas, called the Law of Java, first acted at Covent Garden May 11, 1822. We give some quotations below.*

Lindley, in his Vegetable Kingdom, in a short notice of Antiaris toxiconra, says that, though the accounts are greatly exaggerated, yet the facts are notable enough. He says cloth made from the tough fibre is so acrid as to verify the Shrift of Nessus. My friend Gen. Maclagan, noticing Lindley’s remark to me, adds: “Do you remember in our High School days (at Edinburgh) a grand Diorama called The Upas Tree? It showed a large wild valley, with a single tree in the middle, and illustrated the safety of approach on the windward side, and the desolation it dealt on the other.”

c. 1330.—“En queste isole sono molte cose maravigliose e strane. Onde alcuni aboriri li sono . . . che fanno veleno possimo . . . Quelli uomini sono quasi tutti corsali, e quando vanno a battaglia portano ciascuno uno canna in mano, di lunghezza d’un braccio e pongono in capo de la canna uno ago di ferro tossicato in quel veleno, e sopiano nella canna ’l ago sola e percutetelo con un qua vole, di recentemente quelli ch’è percorso muore. Ma egli hanno la tina piene di sterco d’uomo e una iscodella di sterco guarisce l’uomo da queste cotali punture.”—Storia di Frate Odorigo, from Palatina MS., in Cathay, etc., App., p. xlix.

c. 1630.—“And (in Makasser) which is no lesse infernall, the men use long poles or truncks (cud Semptians—see SUMPITAN), out of which they can (and use it) blow a little pricking quill, which if it draw the last drop of blood from any part of the body, it makes him (though the strongest man living) die immediately; some venom operate in an hour, others in a moment, the vynes and body (by the virulence of the poison) corrupting and rotting presently, to any man’s terror and amazement, and fear to live where such abominations predominate.”—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 329.

c. 1631.—“I will now conclude; but I first must say something of the poison used by the King of Makasser in the Island of Celebes to envenom those little arrows which they shoot through blowing-tubes, a poison so deadly that it causes death more rapidly than a dagger. For one wounded ever so lightly, be it but a scratch bringing blood, or a prick in the heel, immediately begins to nod like a drunken man, and falls dead to the ground. And within half an hour of death this putrescent poison so corrupts the flesh that it can be plucked from the bones like so much muco. And what seems still more marvellous, if a man (e.g.) be scratched in the thigh, or higher in the body, by another point which is not poisoned, and the still warm blood as it flows down to the feet be merely touched by one of these poisoned little arrows, swift as wind the pestilent influence ascends to the wound, and with the same swiftness and other effects snatches the man from among the living.

"Mit solchem Gift schmieren die Bandanese ihre lange Pfeife, die Sie von grosen Bügen, einer Masse von 30, 40, und 50 Tagen sein, in Bandas aber tählen Ihre Weber grosen Schaden damit. Denn Sie sich auf die Bäume setzten, und kleine Fischgerüth damit schlurmierten, und durch ein gehöhlert Rührlein, von einem Baum, auf unser Volk schoessen, mit grosen machtigen Schäden."—Sarr, Ost-Indische Fünfzehl-Jahrghe Kriege-Dienste . . . 1672, pp. 49-47.

1667.—"Enquiries for Suratt, and other parts of the East Indies." 19. Whether it be true, that the only Antidote hitherto known, against the famous and fatal macasser-poison, is human ordure, taken inwardly! And what substance that poison is made of?"—Phil. Trans. vol. ii. Anno 1667 (Proceedings for March 11, 1666, i.e. N.S. 1667), d. 417. 1682.—"The especial weapons of the Makassar soldiers, which they use against their enemies, are certain pointed arrowlets about a foot in length. At the forefoot end these are fitted with a sharp and pointed fish-tooth, and the butt with a knob of spongy wood.

The points of these arrows, long before they are to be used, are dipped in poison and then dried.

"This poison is a sap that drips from the bark of the branches of a certain tree, like resin, from pine-trees.

"The tree grows on the Island Makasser, in the interior, and on three or four islands of the Bugissee (see Bugis), round about Makasser. It is about the height of the chest, and has leaves very similar.

"The fresh sap of this tree is a very deadly poison; indeed its virulence is incurable.

"The arrowlets prepared with this poison are not, by the Makassar soldiers, shot with a bow, but blown from certain blow-pipes (mit zekere spaten gespald); just as here, in the country, people shoot birds by blowing round pellets of clay.

"They can with these in still weather hit their mark at a distance of 4 rods.

"They say the Makassers themselves know no remedy against this poison . . . for the poison presses swiftly into the blood and vital spirits, and causes a violent inflammation. They hold (however) that the surest remedy for this poison is . . . " (and so on, repeating the antidote already mentioned).—Joan Nieuhoff's Zee en Land Reize, &c., pp. 217-218.

1831.—"Arbor Toxicaria, Ipo.

I have never yet met with any poison more horrible and hateful, produced by any vegetable growth, than that which is derived from this lacticssent tree.

Moreover beneath this tree, and in its whole circumference to the distance of a stone-oast, no plant, no shrub, or herbage will grow; the soil beneath it is barren, blackened, and burnt as it were . . . and the atmosphere about it is so polluted and poisoned that the birds which alight upon its branches become giddy and fall dead . . . all things perish which are touched by its emanations, so in much that every animal abounds and makes away from it, and even the birds eschew flying by it.

"No man dares to approach the tree without having his arms, feet, and head wrapped round with linen . . . for death seems to have planted his foot and his throne beside this tree. . . ." (He then tells of a venomous basilisk with two feet in front and fiery eyes, a crest, and a horn, that dwelt under this tree).

"The Malays call it Ceysa Upas, but in Macassar and the rest of Celebes it is called Ipo.

"It grows in desert places, and amid bare hills, and is easily discerned from afar, there being no other tree near it."

—Rumphius, Herbarium Amboicense, ii. 263-268.

1885.—"I cannot omit to set forth here an account of the poisoned missiles of the Kingdom of Macassar, which the natives of that kingdom have used against our soldiers, bringing them to sudden death. It is extracted from the Journal of the illustrious and gallant admiral, H. Cornelius Spilsman.

The natives of the kingdom in question possess a singular art of shooting arrows by blowing through canes, and wounding with these, insomuch that even the skin be cut slightly scratched, the wound die in a twinctling."

(Then the old story of the only antidote).

The account follows extracted from the Journal.

"There are but few among the Macassars and Bugis who possess the real knowledge needful for selecting the poison, so as to distinguish between what is worthless and what is highest quality. . . . From the princes (or Raja's) I have understood that the soil in which the trees affording the poison grow, for a great space round about produces no grass or any other vegetable growth, and that the poison is properly a water or liquid, flowing from a bush or cut made in the bark of those trees, coozing out as it does the resin plants that afford milky juice . . . When the liquid is being drawn from the wounded tree, no one should carelessly approach it so as to let the liquid touch his hands, for by such contact all the joints become stiffened and contracted. For this reason the collectors make use of long bamboos, armed with sharp iron points. With these they stab the tree with great force, and so get the sap to flow into the canes, in which it speedly hardens."—Dn. Corn. Spielman.

1783.—"The following description of the BOHON UPAS, or POISON TREE, which grows in the island of Java, and renders it unwholesome by its noxious vapours, has been procured for the London Magazine, from Mr. Haydinger, who was employed to translate it from the original Dutch, by the author, Mr. Foerch, who, we are informed, is at present abroad, in the capacity of surgeon on board an English vessel. ..."

... "In the year 1774, I was stationed at Batavia, as a surgeon, in the service of the Dutch East India Company. During my residence there I received several different accounts of the Bohon UPAS, and the violent effects of their poison. They all then seemed incredible to me, but raised my curiosity in so high a degree, that I resolved to investigate this subject thoroughly. ... I had procured a recommendation from an old Malayian priest to another priest, who lives on the nearest habitable spot to the tree, which is about fifteen or sixteen miles distant. The letter proved of great service to me on my undertaking, as that priest is employed by the Emperor to reside there, in order to prepare for eternity the souls of those whose fate is different from the rest of us, and whose only hope is to be sentenced to approach the tree, and to procure the poison. ... Male factors, who, for their crimes, are sentenced to die, are the only persons to fetch the poison; and this is the only chance they have of saving their lives. ... They are then provided with a silver or tortoise-shell box, in which they are to put the poisonous gum, and are properly instructed how to proceed, while they are upon their dangerous expedition. Among other particulars, they are always told to attend to the direction of the winds; as they are to go towards the tree before the wind, so that the effluvia from the tree are always blown from them. ... They are afterwards sent to the temple of the old priest, to which place they are commonly attended by their friends and relations. Here they generally remain some days, in expectation of a favourable breeze. During that time the ecclesiastic prepares them for their future fate by prayers and admonitions. When the hour of their departure arrives the priest puts them on a long Having hastily picked up some vague information regarding the Oopas, he carried it to Europe, where his notes were arranged, doubtless by a different hand, in such a form as by their plausibility and appearance of truth, to be generally credited. But though the account just mentioned has been demonstrated to be an extravagant forgery, the existence of a tree in Java, from whose sap a poison is prepared, equal in fatality, when thrown into the circulation, to the strongest animal poisons hitherto known, is a fact.”—Horsfield, in *Bekerman Trans., vol. vii. art. x, pp. 2-4.

1868.—"The Church of Ireland offers to us, indeed, a great question, but even that question is but one of a group of questions. There is the Church of Ireland, there is the land of Ireland, there is the education of Ireland to be considered, and all the branches on the same trunk, and that trunk is the Tree of what is called Protestant ascendancy. . . . We therefore aim at the destruction of that system of ascendancy, which, though it has been crippled and curtailed by former measures, yet still must be allowed to exist; it is still there like a tall tree of noxious growth, lifting its head to heaven, and darkening and poisoning the land as far as its shadow can extend; it is still there, gentlemen, and now at length the day has come when, as we hope, the axe has been laid to the root of that tree, and it nods and quivers from its top to its base. . . ."—Mr. Gladstone’s Speech at Wigan, Oct. 23.

In this quotation the orator indicates the Upsa tree without naming it. The name was supplied by some commentators referring to this indication at a later date:

1873.—"It was perfectly certain that a man who possessed a great deal of imagination might, if he stayed out sufficiently long at night, staring at a small star, persuade himself next morning that he had seen a great comet; and it was equally certain that such a man, if he stared long enough at a bush, might persuade himself that he had seen a branch of the Upsa Tree."

In the centre of a tea estate, not far off from a missionary station, there was a large parasol tree, which had long been a nuisance to the proprietor, who had to cut it down. A whole branch and trunk were removed, but the Upsa tree was left standing there, the villagers saying that it was too dangerous to cut it down.

and burned, they were considered disposed of: but next morning the whole of his labourers awoke, to their intense alarm, afflicted with a painful eruption. . . . It was then remembered that the smoke of the burning branches had been blown by the wind through the village. . . ." [Mr. Bent (Southern Arabia, 72, 89) tells a similar story about the collection of frankincense, and suggests that it was based on the custom of employing slaves in this work, and on an interpretation of the name Hadrimaut, said to mean ‘valley of death.’]

UPPER ROGER, s. This happy example of the Hobson-Jobson dialect occurs in a letter dated 1755, from Capt. Jackson at Syrian in Burma, which is given in Dalrymple’s Oriental Repertory, i. 192. It is a corruption of the Skt. yama-raja, ‘young King,’ the Caesar or Heir-Apparent, a title borrowed from ancient India by most of the Indo-Chinese monarchies, and which we generally render in Siam as the ‘Second King.’

URZ, URZEE, and vulgarly Urzee, s. P.—H. ‘arz and ‘arzi, from Ar. ‘arz, the latter a word having an extraordinary variety of uses even for Arabic. A petition or humble representation either oral or in writing; the technical term for a request from an inferior to a superior; ‘a petition’ as one of Sir Walter Scott’s characters calls it. A more elaborate form is ‘arz-ddsh, ‘memorializing.’ This is used in a very barbarous form of Hobson-Jobson below.

VARELLA, s. This is a term constantly applied by the old Portuguese writers to the pagodas of Indo-China and China. Of its origin we have no positive evidence. The most probable etymology is that it is the Malay bārahād or brathād, [in Wilkinson's Dict. bērēhala], 'an idol.' An idol temple is rūnah-bārahād, 'a house of idols,' but bārahād alone may have been used elliptically by the Malays or misunderstood by the Portuguese. We have an analogy in the double use of pagoda for temple and idol.

1555.—"Their temples are very large edifices, richly wrought, which they call Valera, and which cost a great deal..."—Account of China in a Jesuit's Letter appended to Fr. Alvares H. of Ethiopia, translated by Mr. Major in his Intro. to Mendoza, Hak. Soc. i. xlviii.

1580.—"Gran quantità se ne consuma ancora in quel Regno nelle lor Varelle, che sono gli suoi' pagodi, de' quali ve n'è gran quantità di grandi e di piccole, e sono alcune menopane, fatta a mano, a giusa d' un pan di zuccaro, e alcune d' esse alte quasi campanile di S. Marco di Venetia... si consuma in queste istesse varelle anco gran quantità di oro di foglia..."—Ces. Federici, in Ramunno, iii. 395; [in Hakl. ii. 368.]

VEDAS. The Sacred Books of the Brahmans, Veda being 'knowledge.' Of these books there are nominally four, viz. the Rig, Yajur, Sāma and Atharva Vedas.

The earliest direct intimation of knowledge of the existence of the Vedas appears to be in the book called De Tribus Impostoribus, said to have been printed in 1588, in which they are mentioned. Possibly this know-

* Compare this vivid description with a modern notice of the same pagoda:

1855.—"This meridian range... 700 miles from its origin in the Naga hills, in the sea hard by Negrais, its last bluff crowned by the golden Pagoda of Modain, gleaming far to seaward, a Burmese Sunnil."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 272. There is a small view of it in this work.

† So wrote A. B. I cannot find the book in the B. Museum Library.—P. [A bibliographical account of this book will be found in "Le Traité des Trois Imposteurs, et précisée d'une notice philologique et bibliographique par Philomene Junior (i.e. Brunel), Paris and Brussels, 1867. Also see 7 Ser. N. d. Q. viii, 440 seq.; 9 Ser. IX. 53. The passage about the Vedas seems to be the following: Et Sectari iorum, ut et Vedae et Brahmancorum ante MCCO retro secula obstant collectaneas, ut de Sinensis et aliavim dicam, cui in angulis Europae hic delitescias, itae neglegies, negotia quam bene vides ipsis. ledge came through the Arabs. Though thus we do not trace back any direct allusion to the Vedas in European books, beyond the year 1600 or thereabouts, there seems good reason to believe that the Jesuit missionaries had information on the subject at a much earlier date. St. Francis Xavier had frequent discussions with Brahman, and one went so far as to communicate to him the mantra “Om frivolly unandmah.” In 1559 a learned Brahman at Goa was converted by Father Belchior Carneyro, and baptized by the name of Manuel. He afterwards (with the Viceroy’s sanction!) went by night and robbed a Brahman on the mainland who had collected many MSS., and presented the spoil to the Fathers, with great satisfaction to himself and them (Souza, Orient. Con-quiste, i. 151-2).

It is probable that the information concerning the Hindu religion and sacred books which was attained even in Europe by the end of the 16th century was greater than is commonly supposed, and greater than what we find in print would warrant us to assume. A quotation from San Roman below illustrates this in a general way. And in a constitution of Gregory XV. dated January 31, 1623, there is mention of rites called Hateres and Tandit, which doubtless represent the Vedic names Atareya and Tandiva (see Norbert, i. 39). Lucena’s allusion below to the “four parts” of Hindu doctrine must have reference to the Vedas, and his information must have come from reports and letters, as he never was in India. In course of time, however, what had been known seems to have been forgotten, and even Halhed (1776) could write about ‘Beids of the Shaster!’ (see Code, p. xiii.). This shows that though he speaks also of the ‘Four Beids’ (p. xxxi.) he had no precise knowledge.

In several of the earlier quotations of the word it will be seen that the form used is Vedam or Veidam. This is the Tamil form. And it became prevalent during the 18th century in France from Voltaire’s having connected. Et quid non miraculorum superasset ad convincendos orbis incolam, si mundum ex Scorpiones ovo conditum et progenitum terram-que Tauro capit impositam, et rerum prima fundamenta ex prioribus III. Vedae libros constarent, nisi invidus aliquis Deorum filius habe III. prima volumina furatus essest!] stustituted himself the advocate of a Sanskrit Poem, called by him P’Keur Vedum, and which had its origin in S. India. This was in reality an imitation of an Indian Purana, composed by some missionary in the 17th century (probably by R. de Nobili), to introduce Christian doctrines; but Voltaire supposed it to be really an ancient Indian book. Its real character was first explained by Sonnerat (see the Essay by F. W. Ellis, in As. Res. xi.). The first information regarding the real Vedas was given by Colebrooke in 1805 (As. Res. viii.). Orme and some authors of the 18th and early part of the 19th century write Bed, which represents the N. Indian vernacular form Bed. Both forms, Bed and Vedam, are known to Fleury, as we see below.

c. 1590.—“The Brahmans. These have properly six duties. 1. The study of the Bedes.”—Ayer, by Gladwin, ii. 395; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 115].

“Philologists are constantly engaged in translating Hindi, Greek, Arabic, and Persian books. . . . Haji Ibrahim of Sarhind translated into Persian the Acharan (i.e. Atharva Veda) which, according to the Hindus is one of the four divine books.”—Ibid. by Blochmann, i. 104-105.

1600.—“. . . Consta esta doutrina de quatro partes . . .”—Lucena V. de P. Franc. Xavier, 95.

1602.—“These books are divided into bodies, limbs, and joints; and their foundations are certain books which they call Vedas, which are divided into four parts.”—Couto, V. vi. 3.

1603.—“Tienen muchos libros, de mucha costa y escritura, todos llenos de auguras y supersticiones, y de mil fabulas ridiculas que son sus evangelios. . . . Todo esto es tan sin fundamento, que algunos libros han llegado a Portugal, que se han trazado de la India, y han venido algunos logros que se convirtieron a la Fe.”—San Roman, Hist. de la India Oriental, 47.

1651.—“The Vedam, or the Heathen’s book of the Law, hath brought great Esteem unto this Tribe (the Brahmes).”—Regosens, S. c. 1667.

“They say then that God, whom they call Adhar, that is to say, Immovable or Immutable, hath sent them four Books which they call Beths, a word signifying Science, because they pretend that in these Books all Sciences are comprehended. The first of these Books is called Atenas.- (Atharba-)

1672.—"Commanda primieramente il Veda (che a tutto il fondamento della loro fede) l'adoratione degli Idoli."—P. Vincenzo, 313.

"Diciate vii Thiell ihre Veda oder Gesetzbuch der genannt Roggo Veda, Sadura Veda, Sama Veda, und Taravana Veda . . . . "—Baldeau, 566.

1689.—"Il reste maintenant à examiner sur quelles preuves les Siamois ajoutent foi à leur Bail, les Indiens à leur Beth ou Veda, les Musulmans à leur Alcoran."—Fleury, in Lett. Edit. xxv. 65.

1726.—"Above all it would be a matter of general utility to the Coast that some more chaplains should be maintained there for the sole purpose of studying the Sanskrit tongue [de Sanskritis taud], the head and mother tongue of most eastern languages, and once for all to make a translation of the Vedam, or Lawbook of the Heathen (which is followed not only by the Heathen on this Coast, but also in the main part, in Ceylon, Malabar, Bengal, Surat, and other neighbouring Kingdoms), and thereby to give such preachers further facilities for the more powerful conviction of the Heathen here and elsewhere, on their own ground, and for the disclosure of many mysteries and other matters, with which we are now unacquainted. This Lawbook of the Heathen, called the Vedam, had in the very old times 4 parts, though one of these is now lost. . . . These parts were named Roggo Veda, Sadura or Insouvre Veda, Sama Veda, and Taravana or Adderawana Veda."—Valentijs, Keurlijke Beschryving van Charomandeel, in his East Indies, v. pp. 72-73.

1746.—"Je commence à douter si nous n'avions point été trompés par ceux qui nous avaient donné l'explication de ces cérémonies qu'ils nous avaient assurés être très-conformes à leur Veda, c'est à dire au Livre de leur loi."—Norbert, iii. 132.

c. 1760. "Vedam—s.m. Hist. Superst. C'est un livre pour qui les Brahmes ou Nations idolâtres de l'Indostan ont la plus grande vénération . . . en effet, on assure que le Vedam est écrit dans une langue beaucoup plus ancienne que le Sankrit, qui est la langue savante, connue des brames. Le mot Vedam signifie science."—Encyclopédie, xxx. 32. This information was taken from a letter by Père Calmette, S.J. (see Lett. Edit.), who anticipated Max Müller's chronological study of Vedic literature, in his statement that some parts of the Vedas are at least 500 years later than others.

1765.—"If we compare the great purity and chaste manners of the Shahtah (Shaster), with the great absurdities and impurities of the Vediam, we need not hesitate to pronounce the latter a corruption of the former."—J. E. Houtwell, Interesting Hist. Events, &c., 2nd ed. 4. 12. This gentleman also talks of the Brahmas and the Vediams in the same line without a notion that the word was the same (see ibid. Pt. ii. 15, 1677).

c. 1770.—"The Bramin, bursting into tears, promised to pardon him on condition that he should swear never to translate the Bedas or sacred volumes. . . . From the Ganges to the Indus the Vedam is universally received as the book that contains the principles of religion."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 41-42.

c. 1774.—"Si crede poi come infallibile che dai quattro suddette Bed, che in Malabar chiamano Vedam, Bramah medesimo ne retirasse sei Sutrah, cioè scienze."—Della Tombe, 102.

1777.—"The word Véd, or Véd, signifies Knowledge or Science. The sacred writings of the Hindoos are so distinguished, of which there are four books."—C. Wilkins, in his Histoire des Indes, 298.

1778.—"The natives of Bengal derive their religion from a Code called the Shahtah, which they assert to be the genuine scripture of Bramah, in preference to the Vedam."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 5.

1778.—"E'en indien Brahman, geboren auf der Flur, Der nichts, gelesen als den Veda der Natur."—Rückert, Weiheit der Brahmenen, i. 1.

1782.—". . . pour les rendre (les Pourana) plus authentiques, ils ajoutèrent qu'ils étaient tirés du Vedam; ce que n'était pas facile à vérifier, puisque depuis très longtemps les Védams ne sont plus connus."—Sonnerat, ii. 21.

1789.—"Then Edmund begg'd his Rev'rend Master T'instruct him in the Holy Shahtah. No sooner does the Scholar ask, Than Gooniahm begins the task, Without a book he glibly reads Four of his own invented Bedas."—Simpkin the Second, 145.

1791.—"Toute verité . . . est renfermée dans les quatre beths."—St. Pierre, Chasseur Indienne.

1794-97.—". . . or Hindoo Vedas taught."—Pursuits of Literature, 6th ed. 389.

VEDDAS, n.p. An aboriginal—or at least a forest—people of Ceylon. The word is said to mean 'hunters,' [Tam. vedu, 'hunting'].

1675.—"The Weddas (who call themselves Beddas) are all original inhabitants from old time, whose descent no one is able to tell."—Rykhof van Geuns, in Valentijs, Ceylon, 208.

1881.—"In this Land are many of these wild men they call Veddahs, dwelling near no other Inhabitants. They speak the Chingalaye Language. They kill Deer, and dry the Flesh over the Fire . . . their Food being only Flesh. They are very expert with their Bows. . . . They have no Towns nor Houses, only live by the waters under a Tree."—Knox, 61-62.

1770.—"The Bedas who were settled in the northern part of the island (Ceylon)
VELLARD, s. This is a word apparently peculiar to the Island of Bombay, used in the sense which the quotation shows. We have failed to get any elucidation of it from local experience; but there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of the Port. vallado, 'a mound or embankment.' [It is generally known as 'Hornby's Vellard,' after the Governor of that name; but it seems to have been built about 1752, some 20 years before Hornby's time (see Douglas, Bombay and W. India, i. 140.).]

1809. — "At the foot of the little hill of Sion is a causeway or vellard, which was built by Mr. Duncan, the present Governor, across a small arm of the sea, which separates Bombay from Salsette. ... The vellard was begun a.d. 1797, and finished in 1805, at an expense of 50,575 rupees." — Maria Graham, 8.

VELLORE, n.p. A town, and formerly a famous fortress in the district of N. Arcot, 80 m. W. of Madras. It often figures in the wars of the 18th century, but is best known in Europe for the mutiny of the Sepoys there in 1806. The etym. of the name Vellur is unknown to us. Fra Paolino gives it as Velur, 'the Town of the Lance'; and Col. Branfill as 'Vellur, from Vel, a benefit, benefaction.' [Cox-Stuart (Man. N. Arcot, ii. 417) and the writer of the Madras Gloss. agree in deriving it from Tam. vel, 'the babool tree, Acacia arabica,' and âr, 'village.]

VENDU-MASTER, s. We know this word only from the notifications which we quote. It was probably taken from the name of some Portuguese office of the same kind. [In the quotation given below from Owen it seems that the word was in familiar use at Johanna, and the context shows that his duty was somewhat like that of the chowdry, as he provided fowls, cattle, fruit, &c., for the expedition.]

1781. — From an advertisement in the India Gazette of May 17th it appears to have been a euphemism for Auctioneer; [also see Busted, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 3rd ed. p. 109].

"Mr. Donald ... begs leave to acquaint them that the Vendo business will in future be carried on by Robert Donald, and W. Williams." — India Gazette, July 28.

1793. — "The Governor-General is pleased to notify that Mr. Williamson as the Company's Vendo Master is to have the superintendence and management of all Sales at the Presidency." — In Seton-Kerr, ii. 99. At pp. 107, 114, also are notifications of sales by 'G. Williamson, Vendo Master.'

[1823. — "One of the chiefs, a crafty old rogue, commonly known by the name of 'Lord Rodney,' ... acted as captain of the port, interpreter, Vendo-Master and master of the ceremonies. ..." — Owen, Narrative of Voyages to explore the shores of Africa, &c., i. 179.]

VENETIAN, s. This is sometimes in books of the 18th and preceding century used for Sequins. See under CHICK.

1542. — "At the bottom of the cargo [cic], among the ballast, she carried 4 big gun-tiros, and others of smaller size, and 60,000 venetians in gold, which were destined for Caja Calar, in order that with this money he should in all speed provide necessaries for the fleet which was coming." — Corea, iv. 250.

1675. — Fryer gives among coins and weights at Goa:

"The Venetian ... 18 Tangeos, 30 Rees" — p. 206.

1752. — "At this juncture a gold mohur is found to be worth 14 Arcot Rupees, and a Venetian 44 Arcot Rupees." — In Long, p. 32.

VERANDA, s. An open pillared gallery round a house. This is one of the very perplexing words for which at least two origins may be maintained, on grounds equally plausible. Besides these two, which we shall immediately mention, a third has sometimes been alleged, which is thus put forward by a well-known French scholar:

"Ce mot (veranda) n'est lui-même qu'une transcription inexacte du Persan bardmađa, parchal, terrasse, balcon." — C. Defrémery, in Revue Critique, 1869, 1st Sem. p. 64.

Plausible as this is, it may be rejected. Is it not, however, possible that bardmađa, the literal meaning of which is 'coming forward, projecting,' may be a Persian 'striving after meaning,' in explanation of the foreign word which they may have borrowed?

Williams, again, in his Skt. Dict. (1872) gives 'veranda ... a veranda, a portico ...'. Moreover Beames in his Comparative Grammar of Modern Aryan Languages, gives Sansk. barasa, 'portico,' Bengali bardađa, Hind. varanda, adding: "Most of our wiseacre literateurs (qu. littérateurs?) in Hindustan now-a-days consider this word to be derived from Pers. bardmadah, and write it accordingly. It is, however, good Sanskrit” (i. 153).
Fortunately we have in Bishop Caldwell a proof that comparative grammar does not preclude good manners. Mr. Beames was evidently in entire ignorance of the facts which render the origin of the Anglo-Indian word so curiously ambitious; but we shall not call him the “wise-acre grammarians.”
Varanda, with the meaning in question, does not, it may be observed, belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works.*

Littre also gives as follows (1874): “ETYM. Varandah, mot rapporté de l’Inde par les Anglais, est la simple dégénérescence, dans les langues modernes de l’Inde, du Sansc. veranda, colonnaide, de var, couvrir.”

That the word as used in England and in France was brought by the English from India need not be doubted. But either in the same sense, or in one closely analogous, it appears to have existed, quite indedependently, in Portuguese and Spanish; and the manner in which it occurs without explanation in the very earliest narrative of the adventure of the Portuguese in India, as quoted below, seems almost to preclude the possibility of their having learned it in that country for the first time; whilst its occurrence in F. de Alcala can leave no doubt on the subject.

1605. — In Pedro de Alcala’s Spanish-Arabic Vocabulary we have:

“Varandas — ṭārubq.
Varandas assí ẓaryaba, ẓaryab.”

* This last remark is due to A. B.

Interpreting these Arabic words, with the assistance of Prof. Robertson Smith, we find that ṭārubq is, according to Dony (Suppl. I.
430), darbas, itself taken from darabxta (parquet), a stair-rolling, fireguard, balcony, &c.; whilst ẓaryaba stands for ṣarjáb, a variant (Abû W., p. 735, i.) of the comticed,’ such as a window,—a balcony, a balustrade.”

VERDURE, s. This word appears to have been used in the 18th century for vegetables, adapted from the Port. verduras.

1759.—Among minor items of revenue from duties in Calcutta we find:

RS. A. P.

"Verdure, fish pots, firewood 216 10. 6." —In Long, 35.

VERGE, s. A term used in 8. India for rice lands. It is the Port. Várnea, Varzía, Vargem, which Vieyra defines as 'a plain field, or a piece of level ground, that is sowed and cultivated.'

[1749.—"... as well as vargem, lands haortas" (see OART).—Treaty, in Logus, Malabar, iii. 48.

[1772.—"The estates and verges not yet assessed must be taxed at 10 per cent."—Govt. Order, ibid. i. 421.]

VETTYVEE, s. This is the name generally used by the French for the fragrant grass which we call cuscus (q.v.). The word is Tamil vettier, [from vettu, 'digging,' vet, 'root'].

1800.—"Europeans cool their apartments by means of wattled tatts (see TATTY) made of straw or grass, and sometimes of the roots of the wattie waeroo, which, when wetted, exhales a pleasant but faint smell."—Breyne's Travels, p. 11.

VIDANA, s. In Ceylon, the title of a village head man. "The person who conveys the orders of Government to the people" (Clough, s.v. vidán). It is apparently from the Skt. vadana, "... the act of speaking... the mouth, face, countenance... the front, point," &c. In Javanese wodana (or wadoña, in Jav. pronunciation) is "the face, front, van; a chief of high rank: a Javanesian title" (Crawford, s.v.). The Javanesian title is, we imagine, now only traditional; the Ceylonese one has followed the usual downward track of high titles; we can hardly doubt the common Sanskrit origin of both (see Athenaenum, April 1, 1882, p. 413, and May 13, ibid. p. 602). The derivation given by Alwis is probably not inconsistent with this.

1881.—"The Dissauvas (see DISSAVE) by these Courti vidani their officers do oppress and squeeze the people, by laying Mulcts upon them. In Fice this officer is the Dissauva's chief Substitute, who orders and manages all affairs incumbent upon his master."—Knox, 61.

1796.—"Vidanes, the overseers of villages, who are charged to see that no inhabitant suffers any injury, and that the Land is sown betimes. ..."—Valentijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 11.

1756.—"Under each (chief) were placed different subordinate headmen, called Vidánam-Aratchies and Vidáns. The last is derived from the word (vidána), 'commanding,' or 'ordering,' and means, as Clough (p. 647) defines it, the person who conveys the orders of the Government to the People."—J. de Alwis, in Ceylon Journal, 2, p. 287.
VIHARA, WIHARE, &c., a. In Ceylon a Buddhist temple. Skt. vihāra, a Buddhist convent, originally the hall where the monks met, and thence extended to the buildings generally of such an institution, and to the shrine which was attached to them, much as minister has come from monasterium. Though there are now no Buddhist vihāras in India Proper, the former wide diffusion of such establishments has left its trace in the names of many noted places: e.g. Bihār, and the great province which takes its name; Kuch Behār; the Viha water-works at Bombay; and most probably the City of Bokhāra itself. [Numerous ruins of such buildings have been unearthed in N. India, as, for instance, that at Sarnāth near Benares, of which an account is given by Gen. Cunningham (Arch. Rep. i. 121). An early use of the word (probably in the sense of a monastery) is found in the Mathura Jain inscription of the 2nd century, A.D. in the reign of Huvishka (ibid. iii. 33.).]

1861.—"The first and highest order of priests are the Tirināra, who are the priests of the Buddhist God. Their temples are styled Vihāras.... These.... only live in the Viha, and enjoy great Revenues."—Knorr, Ceylon, 74.

1821.—"The Malwattas and Asigirie wiharases... are the two heads of the Boudhaical establishment in Ceylon."—Davy, An Account of the Interior of Ceylon, 369.

1877.—"Twice a month, when the rules of the order are read, a monk who had broken them is to confess his crime; if it be slight, some slight penance is laid upon him, to sweep the court-yard of the wihāra, sprinkle the dust round the sacred bo-tree."—Khoys Darida, Buddhiam, 169.

VISS, s. A weight used in S. India and in Burma; Tam. visai, 'division,' Skt. rihta, 'distributed.' In Madras it was $\frac{1}{3}$ of a Madras maund, and = 31b. 2 oz. avoidance. The old scale ran, 10 pagoda weights = 1 pollam, 40 pollame = 1 viss, 8 viss = 1 maund (of 25lbs.), 20 maunds = 1 candy. In Burma the viss = 100 tikals = 3lbs. 5 oz.

Viss is used in Burma by foreigners, but the Burmese call the weight perktha, probably a corruption of visai.

* [The first part of this word is theru, Skt. thavāra. Hardy (R. Monachum, p. 11) says the superior priests were called tèreṇaṇas, from Pali therun, 'an elder."

1554.—"The bear (see BAHAR) of Pegu contains 120 bicas; each bica weighs 40 ounces; the bica contains 100 ticals; the tical weighs 81 viharas."—A. Nune, 35.

1568.—"This Ganza goeth by weight of Byzze... and commonly a Byzze of Ganza is worth (after our accord) half a ducat."—Cesar Frederike, in Hakh. ii. 367.

1626.—"In anno 1622 the Myne was shut up... the comming of the Mogull's Embassadour to this King's Court, with his peremptory demand of a Byzze of the fairest diamonds, caused the cessation."—Purbas, Pilgrimage, 1003.

[1727.—"Visce." See under TICAL.
[1807.—"Visay." See under GARCE.
[1855.—"The King last year purchased 800,000 viss of lead, at 5 tikals (see TICAL) for 100 viss, and sold it at twenty tikals."—Pate, Mission to Aria, 256.

VIZIER, WUZEER, s. Ar.—H. wazir, 'a minister,' and usually the principal minister, under a (Mahomedan) prince. [In the Koran (cap. xx. 30) Moses says: 'Give a wazir of my family, Harūn (Aaron) my brother.' In the Ain we have a distinction drawn between the Vakil, or prime minister, and the Vazir, or minister of finance (ed. Blochmann, i. 527.) In India the Nawāb of Oudh was long known as the Nawāb Wazir, the founder of the quasi-independent dynasty having been Sa'adat 'Ali Khan, who became Sūladār of Oudh, c. 1732, and was also Wazir of the Empire, a title which became hereditary in his family. The title of Nawāb Wazir merged in that of pūdshah, or King, assumed by Ghāzi-ud-din Haidar in 1820, and up to his death still borne or claimed by the ex-King Wajid 'Ali Shāh, under surveillance in Calcutta. As most titles degenerate, Wazir has in Spain become alguazil, 'a constable,' in Port. alvazi, 'an alderman.'

[1612.—"Jeffer Basha Vizier and Viceroy of the Province."—Dunwara, Letters, i. 173.]

1614.—"Il primo vissir, sopra ogni altro, che era allora Nasuh basū, genero del Gran Signore, venne ultimo di tutti, con grandissima e ben adorna cavalcata, enfin della quale andava egli solo con molta gravità."—P. della Valle (from Constantinople), i. 49.

[WACADASH, s. Japanese wa-ka-\(\text{-}\)dazhi, 'a short sword.' [1613.—"The Captain Chinese is fallen at square with his new wife and hath given her his wacadash biding her cut off her little finger."—Paster, Letters, i. 18."

"His wacadash or little cattan."
—Ibid., ii. 20.

[1888.—"There is also the wakimashi, or dirk of about nine and a half inches, with which harikari was committed."—Chamberlain, Things Japanae, 3rd ed. 377.]

WALE, s. A horse imported from N. South Wales, or Australia in general.

1866.—"Well, young shaver, have you seen the horses! How is the Waler's off foreleg!"—Trevelyan, Dust Bungalow, 229.

1873.—"For sale, a brown Waler gelding," &c. —Madras Mail, June 25.

WALL, s. Two distinct words are occasionally written in the same way.

(a). Ar. wal. A Mahomedan title corresponding to Governor; ["the term still in use for the Governor-General of a Province as opposed to the Muhajiz, or district-governor. In E.
Arabia the Wali is the Civil Governor as opposed to the Amir or Military Commandant. Under the Caliphate the Wali acted also as Prefect of Police (the Indian Faujdar —see FOUJDAH), who is now called Zabit." (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 238)].
It became familiar some years ago in connection with Kandahar. It stands properly for a governor of the highest class, in the Turkish system superior to a Pasha. Thus, to the common people in Egypt, the Khedive is still the Wali.

1298.—"Whenever he knew of anyone who had a pretty daughter, certain ruffians of his would go to the father and say: 'What say you? Here is this pretty daughter of yours; give her in marriage to the Ballo Achmath' (for they call him the Balio, or, as we should say, 'the Viceregent')."— Marco Polo, i. 402.

1498.—"... e mandou hum homem quem se chama Bale, o qual he como alqueida."
—Rotario de V. da Gama, 54.

1727.—"As I was one morning walking in the Streets, I met accidentally the Governor of the City (Muscat), by them called the Waly."—A. Hamilton, i. 70; [ed. 1744, i.
71.]

[1753.—In Georgia. "Wal, a viceroy descended immediately from the sovereigns of the country over which he presides."—Han-key, iii. 28.]

b. Ar. wali. This is much used in some Mahomedan countries (e.g.
Egypt and Syria) for a saint, and by a transfer for the shrine of such a saint. ["This would be a separate building like our family tomb and probably domed. Europeans usually call it a little Wali"; or, as they write it, 'Wely'; the contained for the container; the 'Santon' for the 'Santon's tomb!'" (Burton, Ar. Nights,
i. 97).] See under PEER.

[c. 1590.—"The ascetics who are their repositories of learning, they style Wali, whose teaching they implicitly follow."— Ed. ed. Jarrett, ii. 119.]

1869.—"Quant au titre de pir (see PEER)
... il signifie proprement veilllard, mais il est pris dans cette circonstance pour désigner une dignité spirituelle équivalente à celle des Gour Hindu... Beaucoup de ces pirs sont à leur mort vênehres comme sainte; de là le mot pir est synonyme de Wali, et signifie Saint aussi bien que ce dernier mot."—Garcín de Tassú, Rel. Mus. dans l'Inde, 23.

WALLA, s. This is a popular abridgment of Competition-walla, under which will be found remarks on the termination walla, and illustrations of its use.

WANDEROO, s. In Ceylon a large kind of monkey, originally described under this name by Knox (Presbyotes urinus). The name is, however, the generic Singhalese word for 'a monkey' (wanderu, vandura), and the same with the Hind. bandar, Skt. vānara. Remarks on the disputed identity of Knox's wanderoo, and the different species to which the name has been applied, popularly, or by naturalists, will be found in Emerson Tennent, i. 129-130.

1861.—"Monkeys... Some so large as our Eneish Spaniel Dogs, of a darkish gray colour, and black faces, with great white beards round from ear to ear, which makes them show just like old men. There is another sort just of the same bigness, but differ in colour, being milk white both in body and face, having great beards like the others... both these sorts do but little mischief... This sort they call in their language Wanderow."—Knox, Hist. Rel. of the I. of Ceylon, 26.

[1803.—"The wanderow is remarkable for its great white beard, which stretches quite from ear to ear across its black face, while the body is of a dark grey."—Percival,
Acc. of the I. of Ceylon, 290.]

1810.—"I saw one of the large baboons, called here Wanderoos, on the top of a coconut tree, where he was gathering nuts.
..."—Maria Graham, 87.
WANGHEE, WHANGEE.

The trade name for a slender yellow bamboo with beautifully regular and short joints, imported from Japan. We cannot give the origin of the term with any conviction. The two following suggestions may embrace or indicate the origin. (1). Rumphius mentions a kind of bamboo called by him Arundinarbor fera, the native name of which is Bulu swangy (see in vol. iv. cap. vii. et seqq.). As buluh is Malay for bamboo, we presume that swangi is also Malay, but we do not know its meaning. (2). Our friend Professor Terrien de la Couperie notes: "In the Kang-hi tze-tien, 118, 119, the Huang-tchou is described as follows: 'A species of bamboo, very hard, with the joints close together; the skin is as white as snow; the larger kind can be used for boats, and the smaller used for pipes, &c.' See also Wells Williams, Syllabic Dict. of the Chinese Lang. p. 251.

WEAVER-BIRD. See BAYA.

WEST-COAST, n.p. This expression in Dutch India means the west coast of Sumatra. This seems also to have been the recognised meaning of the term at Madras in former days. See SLAVE.

WHAMPOA, n.p. In former days the anchorage of European ships in the river of Canton, some distance below that city. [The name is pronounced Wongpo (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 631).]

WHISTLING TEAL. This in Jerdon is given as Dendrocycla Avesuree of Sykes. Latin names given to birds and beasts might at least fulfill one object of Latin names, in being intelligible and pronounceable by foreign nations. We have seldom met with a more barbarous combination of impossible words than this. A numerous flock of these whistlers is sometimes seen in Bengal sitting in a tree, a curious habit for ducks.

WHITE ANTS. See ANTS, WHITE.

WHITE JACKET. The old custom in the hot weather, in the family or at bachelor parties, was to wear this at dinner; and one or more dozens of white jackets were a regular item in an Indian outfit. They are now, we believe, altogether, and for many years obsolete. [They certainly came again into common use some 20 years ago.] But though one reads under every generation of British India that they had gone out of use, they did actually survive to the middle of the last century, for I can remember a white-jacket dinner in Fort William in 1849. [The late Mr. Bridgman of Gorakhpur, whose recollection of India dated from the earlier part of the last century told me that in his younger days the rule at Calcutta was that the guest always arrived at his host's house in the full evening-dress of the time, on which his host meeting him at the door expressed his regret that he had not chosen a cooler dress; on which the guest's Bearer always, as if by accident, appeared from round the corner with a nankeen jacket, which was then and there put on. But it would have been opposed to etiquette for the guest to appear in such a dress without express invitation.]

1803.—"It was formerly the fashion for gentlemen to dress in white jackets on all occasions, which were well suited to the country, but being thought too much an undress for public occasions, they are now laid aside for English cloth."—Id. Valentia, i. 240.

[c. 1848.—"... a white jacket being evening dress for a dinner-party. ..."—Berncastle, Voyage to China, including a Visit to the Bombay Pres. i. 93.]

WINTER, s. This term is constantly applied by the old writers to the rainy season, a usage now quite unknown to Anglo-Indians. It may have originated in the fact that winter is in many parts of the Mediterranean coast so frequently a season of rain, whilst rain is rare in summer. Compare the fact that Shidā in Arabic is indifferently 'winter,' or 'rain'; the winter season being the rainy season. Shidā is the same word that appears in Canticles ii. 11: "The winter (shidā) is past, the rain is over and gone."

1513.—"And so they set out, and they arrived at Surat (Chittur) in May, when the winter had already begun, so they went into winter-quarters (pelo que envernadão), and in September, when the winter was over, they went to Goa in two foists and other vessels, and in one of these was the ganda (rhinoceros), the sight of which made a great commotion when landed at Goa. ..."—Correa, ii. 373.

1583.—"R. ... In what time of the year does this disease (morzi, Mort-de-chien) mostly occur?" "O. ... It occurs mostly in June and July, which is the winter-time in this country."—Garcia, i. 769.

c. 1567.—"De Beseneger a Goa sono d'estate otto giornate di viaggio; ma noi li facessimo di mezo l'inverno, il mese di Luglio."—Cecare Federici, in Rawusius, iii. 389.

1583.—"Il sereno in questo paese è il Maggio, Giugno, Luglio e Agosto, e il resto dell'anno è stato. Ma bene è da notare che qui la stagione non si può chiamar sereno rispetto al freddo, che non vi regna mai, ma solo per cagione de' venti, e delle grandi piogge."—Gasparo Balbi, l. 67s.

1584.—"Note that the City of Goa is the principal place of all the Oriental India, and the winter thus beginneth the 15 of May, with very great rain."—Barre, in Hati, ii. 418.

[1592.—See under PENANG.]

1610.—"The Winter hoere beginneth about the first of June and endureth till the twentieth of September, but not with continuous raines as at Goa, but for some six or seven daies every change and full, with much wind, thunder and raines."—Place, in Furfus, i. 423.

1648.—"... des Galiottes (qui sortent tous les ans pour faire la guerre aux Malabares ... et cela est enuiron la May-Septembre, lors que leur huyer est passe. ..."—Mocquet, 347.

1665.—"L'Hyver se sait sentir. Il commence en Juin per quantité de pluies et de tonnerres."—Thesaeus, v. 311.

1768.—"... In Winter (when they rarely stir) they have a Mammee, or Wax Cloth to throw over it. ..."—Fryer, 410.

1691.—"In ord Occidentali, quae Malabarorum est, hyemae æ mensae Aprilii in Septemberem usque dominatur: in littore vero Orientali, quod Hollandiae est usque Choromandiæ, Oram Coromandelias vocant trans illos montes, in Issidem latitudinis gradibus, contrarii planè modi a Septembris
WOOD-APPLE, s. [According to the Madras Gloss. also known as Curd Fruit, Monkey Fruit, and Elephant Apple, because it is like an elephant's skin.] A wild fruit of the N.O. Aurantiacceae growing in all the drier parts of India (Feronia elephantum, Correa). It is somewhat like the bel (see Bael) but with a still harder shell, and possesses some of its medicinal virtue. In the native pharmacopoeia it is sometimes substituted (Wooden Sheriff, Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 324 seqq.). Buchanan-Hamilton calls it the Kot-bel (Kathbel), (Eastern India, ii. 787).

1875. — "Once upon a time it was announced that the Pudishsh was about to be seen through a certain remote village of Upper India. And the village heads gathered in paneházat to consider what offering they could present on such an unexampled occasion. Two products only of the village lands were deemed fit to serve as nazrá. One was the cùstard-apple, the other was the wood-apple ... a wild fruit with a very hard shelly rind, something like a large lemon but with a small citron comforted into wood. After many pros and cons, the custard-apple carried the day, and the village elders accordingly, when the king appeared, made salám, and presented a large basket of custard-apples. His Majesty did not accept the offering graciously, but with much abusive language at being stopped to receive such trash, pelted the simpletons with their offering, till the whole basketful had been squashed upon their venerable heads. They retired, abashed indeed, but devoutly thanking heaven that the offering had not been of wood-apples!" — Some Unscientific Notes on the History of Plants (by H. Y.) in Geog. Mag., 1875, pp. 49-50. The story was heard many years ago from Major William Yule, for whom see under tobacco.

WOOD-OIL, or GURJUN OIL, s. Beng.—H. garjan. A thin balsam oil drawn from a certain forest tree (N.O. Dipterocarpaceae) Dipterocarpus turbinatus, Gaertn., and from several other species of Dipt., which are among the finest trees of Transgangetic India. Trees of this N.O. abound also in the Malay Archipelago, whilst almost unknown in other parts of the world. The celebrated Borneo camphor is the product of one such tree, and the saulwood of India of another. Much wood-oil is exported from the Burmese provinces, the Malay Peninsula, and Siam. It is much used in the East as a natural varnish and preservative of timber; and in Indian hospitals it is employed as a substitute for copaiva, and as a remedy for leprosy (Hunbury & Flückiger, Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 167 seqq.). The first mention we know of is c. 1759 in Dalrymple's Or. Repertory in a list of Burma products (i. 109).

WOOLOCK, OOLOCK, s. [Platts in his Hind. Dict. gives uláq, ulák, as Turkish, meaning 'a kind of small boat.' Mr. Grierson (Bihar Peasant Life, 42), among the larger kinds of boats, gives ulánk, "which has a long narrow bows overhanging the water in front." Both he and Mr. Grant (Rural Life in Bengal, 25) give drawings of this boat, and the latter writes: 'First we have the bulky Oolák, or baggage boat of Bengal, sometimes as gigantic as the Putejé, see Patello, and used for much the same purposes. This last-named vessel is a clinker-built boat—that is having the planks overlapping each other, like those in a London wherry; whereas in the round smooth-sided oolak and most country boats, they are laid edge to edge, and fastened with iron clamps, having the appearance of being stitched.'] [1683.—" . . . 10 Ulocks for Souldiers, etc."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 76.

[1760.—"20 Hoolucks 6 Oars at 28 Rs. per month."—In Long, 227.]

1764. — "Then the Manjees went after him in a woollock to look after him."—Ibid. 388.

1781. — "The same day will be sold a twenty-yeard Woollock-built Budgerow . . . ."—India Gazette, April 14.

1790.—"We saw not less than 200 large boats at the different quays, which on an average might be reckoned each at 60 tons burthen, all provided with good roofs, and masted after the country manner. They seemed much better constructed than the unwieldy wullocks of Bengal."—Synes, 4th, 253.
WOON, s. Burm. wun, ‘a governor or officer of administration’; literally ‘a burden,’ hence presumably the ‘Bearer of the Burden.’ Of this there are various well-known compounds, e.g.:

Woon-gwee, i.e. ‘Wun-gwe’ or Great Minister, a member of the High Council of State or Cabinet, called the Hiot-dau (see LOTTO).

Woon-douk, i.e. Wun-dauk, lit. ‘the prop of the Wun’; a sort of Adlatus, or Minister of an inferior class. We have recently seen a Burmese envoy to the French Government designated as ‘M. Woondouk.’

Atwen-wun, Minister of the Interior (of the Court) or Household.

Myo-wun, Provincial Governor (May-woon of Symes).

Ye-wun, ‘Water-Governor,’ formerly Deputy of the Myo-wun of the Pr. of Pegu (Ray-woon of Symes).

Akkuk-wun, Collector of Customs (Akaawoon of Symes).

WOODY-MAJOR, s. The title of a native adjutant in regiments of Indian Irregular Cavalry. Both the rationale of the compound title, and the etymology of wardi, are obscure. Platts gives Hind. wardi or urdi, ‘uniform of a soldier, badge or dress of office,’ as the first part of the compound, with a questionable Skt. etymology, viruda, ‘crying, proclaiming, a panegyric.’ But there is also Ar. wird, ‘a flight of birds,’ and then also ‘a troop or squadron,’ which is perhaps as probable. [Others, again, as many military titles have come from S. India, connect it with Can. varadi, ‘news, an order.’] [1784.—‘... We made the wurdee wollah acquainted with the circumstance. ...

Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 323.]

[1861.—‘The senior Rassalad (native captain) and the Woordie Major (native adjutant) ... reported that the sepoys were trying to tamper with his men.’
Caw-Browne, Punjab and Delhi, i. 120.]

WOOTZ, s. This is an odd name which has attached itself to books in the so-called ‘natural steel’ of S. India, made especially in Salem, and in some parts of Mysore. It is prepared from small bits of malleable iron (made from magnetic ore) which are packed in crucibles with pieces of a particular wood (Cassia auriculata), and covered with leaves and clay. The word first appears in a paper read before the Royal Society, June 11, 1785, called: “Experiments and observations to investigate the nature of a kind of Steel, manufactured at Bombay, and there called Wootz ... by George Pearson, M.D.” This paper is quoted below.

The word has never since been recognised as the name of a kind of steel in any language, and it would seem to have originated in some clerical error, or misreading, very possibly for wook, representing the Canarese ukku (pron. wukku) ‘steel.’ Another suggestion has been made by Dr. Edward Balfour. He states that uchcha and nitcha (Hind. uchcha-nitcha, in reality for ‘high’ and ‘low’) are used in Canarese speaking districts to denote superior and inferior descriptions of an article, and supposes that wootz may have been a misunderstanding of uchcha, ‘of superior quality.’ The former suggestion seems to us preferable. [The Madras Gloss. gives as local names of steel, Can. ukku, Tel. ukku, Tam. and Malay. urukku, and derives wootz from Skt. ucca, whence comes H. uchch.]

The article was no doubt the famous ‘Indian Steel,’ the oinoso ἴδιες καὶ σβέυμα of the Periplus, the material of the Indian swords celebrated in many an Arabic poem, the altitudes of old Spanish, the hundwini of the Persian traders, ondanie of Marco Polo, the iron exported by the Portuguese in the 16th century from Baticalá (see BATACUL) in Canara and other parts (see Correa passim). In a letter of the King to the Goa Government in 1591 he animadverts on the great amount of iron and steel permitted to be exported from Chaul, for sale on the African coast and to the Turks in the Red Sea (Archiv. Port. Orient., Fasc. 3, 318).

1785.—‘Dr. Scott, of Bombay, in a letter to the President, acquainted him that he had sent over specimens of a substance known by the name of Wootz; which is considered to be a kind of steel, and is in high esteem among the Indians.’
Phil. Trans. for 1795, Pt. ii. p. 922.

[1814.—See an account of wootz, in Heyne’s Tracts, 362 seqq.]

1841.—‘The cakes of steel are called Wootz; they differ materially in quality, according to the nature of the ore, but are generally very good steel, and are sent into Persia and Turkey. ... It may be considered self-evident that the figure or pattern (of Damascus steel) so long sought after exists in the cakes of Wootz, and only requires to be produced by the action of diluted acids ... it is therefore highly probable that the ancient blades (of Demascus) were made of this steel."—Wilkins-son, Engines of War, pp. 203-206.
1864. — "Damascus was long celebrated for the manufacture of its sword blades, which it has been conjectured were made from the woods of India."—Percy's Metal-lurgy, Iron and Steel, 880.

WRITER, s.
(a) The rank and style of the junior grade of covenanted civil servants of the E.I. Company. Technically it has been obsolete since the abolition of the old grades in 1833. The term no doubt originally described the duty of these young men; they were the clerks of the factories.

(b) A copying clerk in an office, native or European.

1678.—"The whole Mass of the Company's Servants may be comprehended in these Classes, viz., Merchants, Factors, and Writers."—Fryer, 84.

[1675-6.—See under FACTOR.]
1679.—"There are some of the Writers who by their lives are not a little scanda-ulous."—Letter from a Chaplain, in Wheeler,
i. 64.
1683. — "Mr. Richard More, one that came out a Writer on ye Herbert, left this World for a better. Ye Lord prepare us all to follow him!"—Hedges, Diary, Aug.
22.; [Hak. Soc. i. 105.]
1747.—"82. Mr. Robert Clive, Writer in the Service, being of a Martial Disposition, and having acted as a Volunteer in our late Engagements, We have Granted him an Ensign's Commission, upon his Aplication for the same."—Letter from the Council at Ft. St. David to the Honble.
Court of Directors, dd. 2d. May, 1747 (MS. in India Office).
1755. — "As we are sensible that our junior servants of the rank of Writers at Bengal are not upon the whole on so good a footing as elsewhere, we do hereby direct that the future appointments to a Writer for salary, diet money, and all allowances whatever, be 400 Rupees per annum, which mark of our favour and attention, properly attended to, must prevent their reflections on what we shall further order in regard to them as having any other object or foundation than their particular interest and happiness."—Court's Letter, March 3, in Long, 159. (The 'further order' is the prohibition of palankins, &c.—see PALAN-KEEN.)

1760. — "It was in the station of a covenanted servant and writer, to the East India Company, that in the month of March, 1760, I embarked."—Grose, i. 1.
1762. — "We are well assured that one great reason of the Writers neglecting the Company's business is engaging too soon in trade. . . . We therefore positively order that none of the Writers on your establishment have the benefit or liberty of Dusticks (see DUSTUCK) until the times of their respective writings are expired, and they commence Factors, with this exception.
1765. — "Having obtained the appointment of a Writer in the East India Company's service at Bombay, I embarked with 14 other passengers . . . before I had attained my sixteenth year."—Forbes, Or.
Mem. i. 5; [2nd ed. i. 1].
1769. — "The Writers of Madras are exceedingly proud, and have the knack of forgetting their old acquaintances."—Ibid.
Teignmouth, Mem. i. 20.
1778. — "In the first place all the persons who go abroad in the Company's civil service, enter as clerks in the counting-house, and are called by a name to correspond with it, Writers. In that condition they are obliged to serve five years."— Burke, Speech on Hastings' Impeachment,

b.
1764.—"Resolutions and orders.—That no Mooneehee, Linguist, Banian (see BAN-YAN), or Writer be allowed to any officer except the Commander-in-Chief and the commanders of detachments. . . ."—Lt.
1880. — "Following him are the krânees (see CRANNY), or writers, on salaries varying, according to their duties and abilities, from five to thirty rupees."— Grant, Rural L. in Bengal, 139-9.

WUG, s. We give this Belûch word for loot on the high authority quoted.
[On this Mr. M. L. Dames writes:
"This is not, strictly speaking, a Balochi word, but Sindhi, in the form wág or wág. The Balochi word is bag, but I cannot say for certain whether it is borrowed from Sindhi by Balochi, or vice verâd. The meaning, however, is not loot, but 'a herd of camels.' It is probable that on the occasion referred to the loot consisted of a herd of camels, and this would easily give rise to the idea that the word meant loot. It is one of the commonest forms of plunder in those regions, and I have often heard Balochis, when narrating their raids, describe how they had carried off a 'bag.'"]

1845.—"In one hunt after wug, as the Baloochees call plunder, 200 of that beautiful regiment, the 2nd Europeans, marched incessantly for 15 hours over such ground as I suppose the world cannot match for ravines, except in places where it is impossible to march at all."—Letter of Sir C.
Napier, in Life, iii. 298.
XERAFINE, XERAFIM, &c., s.
The word in this form represents a silver coin formerly current at Goa and several other Eastern ports, in value somewhat less than 1d. 6d. It varied in Portuguese currency from 300 to 360 reis. But in this case as in so many others the term is a corruption applied to a degenerated value. The original is the Arabic ashrafi (see ASHRAFI) (or sharifi, noble—compare the medieval coin so called), which was applied properly to the gold dinar, but was also in India, and still is occasionally by natives, applied to the gold mohur. Ashrafi for a gold dinar (value in gold about 11s. 6d.) occurs frequently in the '1001 Nights' as Dozy states, and he gives various other quotations of the word in different forms (pp. 353-354; [Burton, Ar. Nights, x. 160, 376]). Aigrifin, the name of a coin once known in France, is according to Littre also a corruption of ashrafi.

1498.—"And (the King of Calicut) said that they should tell the Captain that if he wished to go he must give him 600 zarifes, and that soon, and that this was the custom of that country, and of those who came thither."—Rotario de V. da G. 79.

1510.—"When a new Sultan succeeds to the throne, one of his lords, who are called Amirra (Ameer), says to him: 'Lord, I have been for so long a time your slave, give me Damascus, and I will give you 100,000 or 200,000 teraphim of gold.'"—Varrhaven.

1513.—"Every Mamaleuke, great or little, has for his pay six zaraphi per month."—Ibid. 13.

"Our captain sent for the superior of the said mosque, to whom he said: that he should show him the body of Nabi—this Nabi means the Prophet Mahomet—that he would give him 3000 seraphim of gold."—Ibid. 29. This one eccentric traveller gives thus three different forms.

1523.—"And by certain information of persons who knew the facts . . . Antonio de Saldanha . . . agreed with the said King Turuxa (Turan Shah), . . . that the said King . . . should pay to the King Our lord 10,000 xerfims more yearly . . . in all 25,000 xerfims."—Tombo da India, Subsidios, 79. This is the gold mohur.

1540.—"This year there was such a famine in Choromandel, that it left nearly the whole land depopulated, and the mortality, and people ate their fellow men. Such a thing never was heard of on that Coast, where formerly there was such an abundance of rice, that in the port of Negapatam I have often seen more than 700 sail take cargoes amounting to more than 20,000 moinos (the moino = 22.39 bushels) of rice. . . . This year of famine the Portuguese of the town of St. Thomé did much good to the people, helping them with quantities of rice and millet, and coco-nuts and jagra (see JAGGERY), which they imported in their vessels from other parts, and sold in retail to the people at far lower prices than they could have got if they wished it; and some rich people caused quantities of rice to be boiled in public houses, and gave it boiled down in the water to the people to drink, all for the love of God. . . . This famine lasted a whole year, and it spread to other parts, but was not so bad as in Choromandel. The King of Bim氘ar, who was sovereign of that territory, heard of the humanity and benevolence of the Portuguese to the people of the country, and he was greatly pleased thereat, and sent an ola (see OLLAH) of thanks to the residents of S. Thomé. And this same year there was such a scarcity of provisions in the harbours of the Straits, that in Aden a load (furdo) of rice fetched forty xerfims, each worth a cruzado. . . ."—Correia, iv. 131-132.

1558.—"The chief and most common money (at Goa) is called Pardanae (Pardao) Xeraphim. It is of silver, but of small value. They strike it at Goa, and it is marked on one side with the image of St. Sebastian, on the other with 3 or 4 arrows in a sheaf. It is worth 3 testoonos or 500 Reys (Beau) of Portugal, more or less."—Lisoaes, from French ed. 71; [Hak. Soc. i. 241, and compare i. 190; and see another version of the same passage under PAR-DAO].

1610.—"Inprimis of Serafinas Eberi, which be ten Rupias (Repuce) a piece, there are sixtie Leckes (Lack)."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 217. Here the gold mohur is meant.

c. 1610.—"Les pieces d'or sont chérens a vingt-cinq sols piece."—Peyrat de Larv, ii. 40; [Hak. Soc. ii. 99, reading cherafins].

1653.—"Monsieures courtois de Goa.
"Sequin de Venise . . . 24 tangues (Tanga) . . .
"Abassia de Perse . . . 3 tangues.
"Pardaux (Pardao) . . . 5 tangues.
"Scherephi . . . 6 tangues.
"Roupies (Repuce) du Mogol . . . 6 tangues.
"Tangue . . . 20 bousserengu . . .
"(Badgroom).

De la Boullaye-le-Gros, 1657, 380.
c. 1675. — "Coins . . . of Rajapore. Imaginary Coins. The Pagod (Pagoda) is 33 Rupees. 45 Juttals (see JEETUL) is one Pagod. 10 and 8 Larees (Larin) is 1 Pagod. Zeraphins 24, 1 Old Dollar.

"Coins and weights of Bombelm. 3 Zeraphins = 1 Zaphrin. 80 Rupees (Baas) = 1 Laree. 1 Pice = 10 Rupees. The Rupees are imaginary.

"Coins and weights in Goa . . . The Crucado of gold, 12 Zeraphins. The Zeraphin, 5 Tanguis. The Tongo (Tanga), 5 Vinteens. The Vintein, 15 Barrooks (Budgroom), whereof 75 make a Tanga. And 80 Rupees make a Tongo."—Fryer, 206.

1690. dw. 2 ar.

The Gold St. Thomas . . . 2 3/4
The Silv. Sharaphenes . . . 7 4/3

Table of Coins, in Ovington.

1727.—"Their Soldiers Pay (at Goa) is very small and ill paid. They have but six Sharaphenes per Month, and two Suits of Guitls, shag or chequered, in a Year . . . and a Sharaphen is worth about sixteen Pence half Penny Ster."—A. Hamilton, i. 249; [ed. 1744, i. 252].

1760.—"You shall coin Gold and silver of equal weight and fineness with the Ashrefees (Ashraffees) and Rupees of Moorsheadabad, in the name of Calcutta."—Nurub's Percanah for Establ. of a Mint in Calcutta, in Long, 227.

C. 1844.—"Sahibs now are very different from what they once were. When I was a young man with an officer in the camp of Late Lek Sahib (Lord Lake) the sahibs would give an Ashraf (Ashraffees), when now they think twice before taking out a rupee."

—Personal Reminiscences of an old Khansama's Conversation. Here the gold mohur is meant.

XERCANSO, n.p. This is a curious example of the manner in which the Portuguese historians represent Mahomedan names. Xercansor does really very fairly represent phonetically the name of Sher Khan Sur, the famous rival and displacer of Humayun, under the title of Sher Shah.

C. 1538.—"But the King of Bengal, seeing himself very powerful in the kingdom of the Patans, seized the king and took his kingdom from him . . . and made Governor of the kingdom a great lord, a vassal of his, called Cotoxa, and then levying everything in good order, returned to Bengal. The administrator Cotoxa took the field with a great army, having with him a Patan Captain called Xercansor, a valiant cavalier, much esteemed by all."—Correa, ii. 719.

The kingdom of the Patans appears to be Behar, where various Afghan chiefs tried to establish themselves after the conquest of Delhi by Baber. It would take more search than it is worth to elucidate the story as told by Correa, but see Elliot, iv. 333.

Cotoxa (Koto sha) appears to be Kub Khan of the Mahomedan historian there.

Another curious example of Portuguese nomenclature is that given to the first Mahomedan king of Malacca by Barros, Xaquem Durzad (II. vi. 1), by Albuquerque Xaqundarzda (Comm. Pt. III. ch. 17). This name is rendered by Lessin's ponderous lore into Skt. Sakunadhara, "d. h. Besitzer kraftiger Besinnungen" (or "Possessor, of strong recollections)."—Ind. Alt. iv. 546), whereas it is simply the Portuguese way of writing Sikander Shah! [So Linschoten (Hak. Soc. ii. 183) writes Xatamnas for Shah Tamaiz.] For other examples, see Godavasam, Idalcan.

YABOO, s. Pers. yabā, which is perhaps a corruption of Ar. yabūb, defined by Johnson as 'a swift and long horse.' A nag such as we call 'a galloway,' a large pony or small hardy horse; the term in India is generally applied to a very useful class of animals brought from Afghanistan.

[c. 1590. — "The fifth class (yabū horses) are bred in this country, but fall short in strength and size. Their performances also are mostly bad. They are the offspring of Turki horses with an inferior breed."—Ait, ed. Blockmann, i. 234.]

1754.—"There are in the highland country of Kandahar and Cabul a small kind of horses called Yabous, which are very serviceable."—Hannay, Travels, ii. 367.

[1831.—"A very strong and useful breed of ponies, called Yaboos, is however reared, especially about Bemuan. They are used to carry baggage, and can bear a great load, but do not stand a long continuance of hard work so well as mules."—Elphinstone, Caudul, ed. 1842, i. 189.]

YAK, s. The Tibetan ox (Bos grunniens, L., Poepaghus of Gray), belonging to the Bisontine group of Bosinae. It is spoken of in Bogle's Journal under the odd name of the "cow-tailed cow," which is a literal sort of translation of the Hind. name chatori gdo, chadoris (see COWRY), having been usually called "cow-tails" in the 18th century. (The usual native name for the beast in N. India is surag'do, which comes from Skt. surabhī, 'pleasing'.) The name yak does not appear in Buffon, who calls it the 'Tartarian cow,' nor is it found in the 3rd ed. of Pennant's H. of Quad-rupeds (1793), though there is a fair account of the animal as Bos grunniens of Lin., and a poor engraving. Although the word occurs in Della Penna's account of Tibet, written in 1730, as quoted below, its first appearance in print was, as far as we can ascertain, in Turner's Mission to Tibet. It is the Tib. gyak, Jäschke's Dict. gyag. The animal is mentioned twice, though in a confused and inaccurate manner, by Aslian; and somewhat more correctly by Cosmas. Both have got the same fable about it. It is in medieval times described by Rubruk. The domestic yak is in Tibet the ordinary beast of burden, and is much ridden. Its hair is woven into tents, and spun into ropes; its milk a staple of diet, and its dung of fuel. The wild yak is a magnificent animal, standing sometimes 18 hands high, and weighing 1600 to 1800 lbs., and multiplies to an astonishing extent on the high plateaux of Tibet. The use of the tame yak extends from the highlands of Khokand to Kuku-khotan or Kwei-hwaching, near the great northern bend of the Yellow River.

c. A.D. 250. — "The Indians (at times) carry as presents to their King tame tigers, trained panthers, four-horned oryxes, and cattle of two different races, one kind of great swiftness, and another kind that are terribly wild, that kind of cattle from (the tails of) which they make fly-flaps." — Aslian, de Animalibus, xv. cap. 14.

Again:

"There is in India a grass-eating animal, which is double the size of the horse, and which has a very bushy tail very black in colour.† The hairs of the tail are finer than human hair, and the Indian women set great store by its possession. . . . When it perceives that it is on the point of being caught, it hides its tail in some thicket . . . and thinks that since its tail is not seen, it will not be regarded as of any value, for it knows that the tail is the great object of fancy." — Ibid. xvi. 11.

c. 545. — "This Wild Ox is a great beast of India, and from it is got the thing called Tupha, with which officers in the field adorn their horses and pennons. They tell of this beast that if its tail catches in a tree he will not budge but stands stock-still, being horribly vexed at losing a single hair of its tail; so the natives come and cut his tail off; and then when he has lost it altogether, he makes his escape." — Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. Transl. in Cathey, &c., p. clixiv.

[c. 1590. — In a list of things imported from the northern mountains "into Oudh, we have "the tails of the Kudas cow." — Ain. ed. Jarrett, ii. 172; and see 290.]

1730. — "Dopo di che per circa 40 giorni di camimo non si trova più abitazioni di case, ma solo alcune tende con quantità di mandre di yak, ossiamo bovi pelosi, pecore, cavalli. . . ." — Fratelli della Provincia di Bili, Breve Notizia del Tibet (published by Klaproth in Jour. As. 2d. ser. p. 17.

1783. — "... on the opposite side saw several of the black chowry-tailed cattle. . . . This very singular and curious animal deserves a particular description. . . . The Yak of Tartary, called Noor Goy in Hindostan. . . ." — Turner's Embassy (publ. 1800), 185-6. [Sir H. Yule identifies Noor Goy with Ch'udor Gai; but, as will be seen above, the H. name is surghada.

In the publication at the latter date appears the excellent plate after Stubbs, called "the Yak of Tartary," still the standard representation of the animal. [Also see Turner's paper (1794) in the As. Res.. London reprint of 1798, iv. 365 seq.]

Though the two following quotations from Abbé Huc do not contain the word yak, they are pictures by that clever artist which we can hardly omit to reproduce:

1851. — "Les boeufs à longs poils étaient de véritables caricatures; impossible de figurer rien de plus drôle; ils marchaient les jambes écartées, et portaient péniblement un énorme système de stalactites, qui leur pendiaient sous le ventre jusqu'à terre. Ces pauvres bêtes étaient si informes et tellement recouvertes de glaçons qu'il semblait qu'on les eût mis confine dans du sucre candi." — Huc et Gabet, Souvenirs d'un Voyage, &c. ii. 201; [ E.T. ii. 108].

"Au moment où nous passâmes le Mourou Oussou sur la glace, un spectacle assez bizarre s'offrit à nos yeux. Déjà nous avions remarqué de loin . . . des objets informes et noirâtres rangés en file en travers de ce grand fleuve . . . Ce fut seulement quand nous fûmes plus près, que nous pûmes reconnaître plus de 50 beaufs sauvages incrustés dans la glace. Ils avaient voulu, sans doute, traverser le fleuve à la nage, au moment de la concrétion des eaux, et ils s'étaient trouvés pris par les glaçons sans avoir la force de s'en débarrasser et de continuer leur route. Leur belle tête, surmontée de grandes cornes, était encore à découvrir; mais la reste du corps était pris dans la glace, qui était si transparente qu'on pouvait distinguer facilement la position de ces imprudentes bêtes; on est dit qu'elles étaient encore à nager. Les aigles et les corbeaux leur avaient arraché les yeux." — Ibid. ii. 219; [ E.T. ii. 119 seq. and for a further account of the animal see ii. 51].
YAM, s. This general name in English of the large edible tuber Irisocorea seems to be a corruption of the name used in the W. Indies at the time of the discovery. [Mr. Platt (9 ser. N. & Q. v. 226 seq.) suggests that the original form was nyam or nyami, in the sense of 'food,' nyami meaning 'to eat' in the Fulah language of Senegal. The cannibal Nyam-Nyama, of whom Miss Kingsley gives an account (Travels in W. Africa, 330 seq.) appear to take their name from the same word.]

1600.—"There are great store of Inammas growing in Guinea, in great fields."—Purchas, ii. 957.

1613.—"... Moreover it produces great abundance of Inammas, or large subterranean tubers, of which there are many kinds, like the camotoles of America, and these Inammas boiled or roasted serve in place of bread."—Godinho de Eredia, 19.

1764.—"'Tis known the Yam will never to bigness swell." Grainger, Bk. i.

Z

ZABITA, s. Hind. from Ar. zabita. An exact rule, a canon, but in the following it seems to be used for a tariff of assessment:

1799.—"I have established the Zabeta for the shops in the Fort as fixed by Macleod. It is to be paid annually."—Wellington, i. 49.

ZAMORIN, s. The title for many centuries of the Hindu sovereign of Calicut and the country round. The word is Malayal. Sámâtirî, Sâmâri, Tâmâtirî, Tâmâri, a tadbhava (or vernacular modification) of Skt. Sâmûndrî, 'the Sea-King.' (See also Wilson, Mackenzie MSS. i. xcvi.) [Mr. Logan (Malabar, iii. Gloss. a.v.) suggests that the title Samudri is a translation of the Râja's ancient Malayal. title of Kunmalakkom, i.e. 'King (kon) of the hills (kunnu) and waves (ala).’ The name has recently become familiar in reference to the curious custom by which the Zamorin was attacked by one of the candidates for his throne (see the account by A. Hamilton (ed. 1744, i. 309 seq. Pinkerton, viii. 374) quoted by Mr. Frazer (Golden Bough, 2nd ed. ii. 14 seq.).]

1343.—"The sultan is a Kâfr called the Sâmâri. ... When the time of our departure for China came, the sultan, the Sâmâri equipped for us one of the 13 junkis which were lying in the port of Calicut."— Ibn Battuta, iv. 89-94.

1442.—"I saw a man with his body naked like the rest of the Hindus. The sovereign of this city (Calicut) bears the title of Sâmâri. When he dies it is his sister's son who succeeds him."—Abdurrazik, in India in the XNth Cent. 17.

1498.—"First Calicut whither we went. ... The King whom they call Camollim (for Çamorim) can muster 100,000 men for war, with the contingents that he receives, his own authority extending to very few."—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama.

1510.—"Now I will speak of the King here in Calicut, because he is the most important King of all those before mentioned, and is called Samury, which in the Persian language means God on earth."—Verthesio, 134. The traveller confounds the word with tambrás, which does mean 'Lord.' [Forbes (see below) makes the same mistake.]

1516.—"This city of Calicut is very large. ... This King became greater and more powerful than all the others: he took the name of Zomodir, which is a point of honour above all other Kings."—Barros, 103.

1552.—"Sammaro." See under CELE-BES.

1553.—"The most powerful Prince of this Malabar was the King of Calicut, who for excellence was called Samarí, which among them is as among us the title Emperor."—Barros, i. iv. 7.

[1554.—Speaking of the Moluccas, Camarrão, which in their language means Admiral.—Casallada, Bk. vi. ch. 66.]

1572.—"I wrote him a letter to tell him ... that, please God, in a short time the imperial fleet would come from Egypt to the Sâmâri, and deliver the country from the hands of the infidels."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 88. [Vembrey, who in his translation betrays a remarkable ignorance of Indian geography, speaks (p. 24) of "Samiri, the ruler of Calicut, by which he means Calicut."]

1583.—"And when the King of Calicut (who has for title Samorim or Emperor) besieged Cochin. ..."—Garcia, f. 58b.

By Burton:

"When near that splendid couch took place the guest and others further off, prompt glance and keen the Samorin cast on folk whose garb and gest were like to nothing he had ever seen."
1616.—Under this year there is a note of a Letter from Undercooon-Cheete the Great Samorin or K. of Calicut to K. James.—Sainsbury, i. 462.

1673.—"Indeed it is pleasantly situated under trees, and it is the Holy See of their Zanzibar or Pope."—Fryer, 52.

1781.—"Their (the Christians') hereditary privileges were respected by the Zamarin himself."—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

1785.—A letter of Tippoo's applies the term to a tribe or class, speaking of '2000 Samories'; who are these!—Select Letters, 274.

1787.—"The Zamarin is the only ancient sovereign in the South of India."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 59.

1810.—"On our way we saw one of the Zamarin's houses, but he was absent at a more favoured residence of Paniany."—Maria Graham, 110.

1814.—"The King of Calicut was, in the Malabar language, called Samory, or Zamarin, that is to say, God on the earth."—Forbes, Or. Misc. 2nd ed. i. 268. See quotation above from Varthema.

... nor did the conqueror (Hyder Ali) take any notice of the Zamorin's complaints and supplications. The unfortunate prince, after fasting three days, and finding all remonstrance vain, set fire to his palace, and was burned, with some of his women and their brahmins."—Ibid. iv. 267-8; [2nd ed. ii. 477]. This was a case of Tragedy.

1900.—"The Zamarin of Calicut who succeeded to the gadi (Guddy) three months ago, has died."—Pioneer Mail, April 13.

ZANZIBAR, n.p. This name was originally general, and applied widely to the East African coast, at least south of the River Jub, and as far as the Arab traffic extended. But it was also specifically applied to the island on which the Sultan of Zanzibar now lives (and to which we now generally restrict the name); and this was the case at least since the 15th century, as we see from the Roteiro. The Pers. Zangi-bār, 'Region of the Blacks,' was known to the ancients in the form Zingi (Ptolemy, i. 17, 9; iv. 7, 11) and Zingium. The Arab softening of the g made the name into Zanjibdr, and this the Portuguese made into Zanzibar.

c. 545.—"And those who navigate the Indian Sea are aware that Zingium, as it is called, lies beyond the country where the income grows, which is called Barbary."—Commas, in Cathay, &c., clxvii.

c. 940.—"The land of the Zanj begins at the channel issuing from the Upper Nilo" (by this the Jubb seems meant) "and extends to the country of Sofala and of the Wawk."—Maq'adi, Praties d'Or, iii. 7.

c. 1190.—Alexander having eaten what was pretended to be the head of a black captive says:

"A few pages later we have "Isles of Pombe, Zanzibar, Monfia, Comoro," showing apparently that a difference had grown up, at least among the Portuguese, distinguishing Zanguebar the continental region from Zanzibar the Island.

ZEBU, s. This whimsical name, applied in zoological books, English as well as French, to the humped domestic ox (or Brahminy bull) of India, was taken by Buffon from the exhibitors of such a beast at a French fair, who perhaps invented the word, but who told him the beast had been brought from Africa, where it was called by that name. We have been able to discover no justification for this in African dialects, though our friend Mr. R. Cust has kindly made search, and sought information from other philologists on our account. Zebu passes, however, with most people as an Indian word; thus Webster's Dictionary, says "Zebu, the native Indian name." The only word at all like it that we can discover is zobo (q.v.) or zhobo, applied in the semi-Tibetan regions of the Himalaya to a useful hybrid, called in Ladak by the slightly modified form dsomo. In Jäschke's Tibetan Dict. we find "Ze-ba . . . l. hump of a camel, zebu, etc." This is curious, but, we should think, only one of those coincidences which we have had so often to notice.

Isidore Geoffroy de St. Hilaire, in his work Aclimation et Domestication des Animaux Utiles, considers the ox and the zebu to be two distinct species. Both are figured on the Assyrian monuments, and both on those of ancient Egypt. The humped ox also exists in Southern Persia, as Marco Polo mentions. Still, the great naturalist to whose work we have referred is hardly justified in the statement quoted below, that the "zebu" is common to "almost the whole of Asia" with a great part of Africa. [Mr. Blanford writes: "The origin of Bos indicus (sometimes called zebu) by European naturalists) is unknown, but it was in all probability tropical or sub-tropical, and was regarded by Blyth as probably African. No ancestral form has been discovered among Indian fossil bovines, which . . . comprise species allied to the gaur and buffalo." (Mammalia, 483 seq.).]

c. 1772.—"We have seen this small hunched ox alive . . . It was shown at the fair in Paris in 1752 (sic, but a transcript from the French edition of 1837 gives 1772) under the name of Zebu; which we have adopted to describe the animal by, for it is a particular breed of the ox, and not a species of the buffalo."—Buffon’s Nat. Hist., É.T. 1807, viii. 19, 20; see also p. 33.

1861.—"Nous savons donc positivement qu’à une époque où l’occident était encore couvert de forêts, l’orient, déjà civilisé, possédait déjà le boeuf et le Zebu; et par conséquent c'est de l’orient que ces animaux sont sortis, pour devenir, l’un (le boeuf) cosmopolite, l’autre commun à presque toute l’Asie et à une grande partie de l’Afrique."—Geoffroy St. Hilaire (work above referred to, 4th ed. 1861).

ZEDOARY, and ZERUMBET, ss. These are two aromatic roots, once famous in pharmacy and often coupled together. The former is often mentioned in medieval literature. The former is Arabic jadadr, the latter Pers. zarambād. There seems some doubt about the scientific discrimination of the two. Mooden Sheriff says that Zedoary (Curcuma zedoaria) is sold in most bazaars under the name of anbāhdī, whilst jadadr, or shadār, is the bazaar name of roots of varieties of non-poisonous aconites. There has been considerable confusion in the nomenclature of these drugs [see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 655, 670]. Dr. Royle, in his most interesting discourse on the Antiquity of Hindo Medicine (p. 77), transcribes the following prescription of the physician Ācītus, in which the name of Zedoary first occurs, along with many other Indian drugs:

c. A.D. 540.—"Zador (i.e. zedoaria), galangae, ligustici, seselis, cardamom, piperis longi, piperis albi, cinnamonum, cinigberis, seminis Smyrniit, caraphylli, phylli, stachys, myrobolanum, phu, costi, scordii, silphi vel laseraptii, rhei barbarici, poseonaci; aliæ etiam arboreus nucia viscum et paltiri semen, itemque saxifragum sc osamin adunt; ex his singula stateres duos commisceto. . . ."

In the preceding extracts the De prefixed to Calcutta is Pers. der. 'village,' or 'township,' a common term in the language of Indian Revenue administration. An 'Explanation of Terms' furnished by W. Hastings to the Fort William Council in 1759 thus explains the word:

"Dee—the ancient limits of any village or parish. Thus, 'Dee Calcutta' means only that part which was originally inhabited."—(In Long, p. 176.)

ZEMINDAR, s. Pers. zamin-ddr, 'landholder.' One holding land on which he pays revenue to the Government direct, and not to any intermediate superior. In Bengal Proper the zemindars hold generally considerable tracts, on a permanent settlement of the amount to be paid to Government. In the N.W. Provinces there are often a great many zemindars in a village, holding by a common settlement, periodically renewable. In the N.W. Provinces the rustic pronunciation of the word zamin-ddr is hardly distinguishable from the ordinary Anglo-Indian pronunciation of jamindar (see JEMADAR), and the form given to zamin-ddr in early English records shows that this pronunciation prevailed in Bengal more than two centuries ago.

ZENANA, s. Pers. zanana, from zan, 'woman'; the apartments of a house in which the women of the family are sequestered. This Mahomedan custom has been largely adopted by the Hindus of Bengal and the Mahrattas. Zanana is also used for the women of the family themselves. The growth of the admirable Zanana Missions has of late years made this word more familiar in England. But we have heard of more than one instance in which the objects of this Christian enterprise have been taken to be an amiable aboriginal tribe—"the Zananae."

ZEND, ZENDAVESTA, s. Zend is the name which has been commonly applied, for more than a hundred years to that dialect of the ancient Iranian (or Persian) language in which the Avesta or Sacred Books of Zoroastrianism or the old Persian religion are written. The application of the name in this way was quite erroneous, as the word Zend when used alone in the Parsi books indicates a 'commentary or explanation,' and is in fact applied only to some Pahlavi translation, commentary, or gloss. If the name Zend were now to be used as the designation of any language it would more justly apply to the Pahlavi itself. At the same time Hang thinks it probable that the term Zand was originally applied to a commentary written in the same language as the Avesta itself, for in the Pahlavi translations of the Yasna, a part of the Avesta, where the scriptures are mentioned, Avesta and Zend are coupled together, as of equal authority, which could hardly have been the case if by Zend the translator meant his own work. No name for the language of the ancient scriptures has been found in the Parsi books; and Avesta itself has been adopted by scholars in speaking of the language. The fragments of these scriptures are written in two dialects of the Eastern Iranian, one, the more ancient, in which the Gathas or hymns are written; and a 1liter one which was for many centuries the spoken and written language of Bactria.

The word Zand, in Haug's view, may be referred to the root zua, 'to know'; Skt. jna, Gr. γις, Lat. gno (as in agnosco, cognosco), so that its meaning is 'knowledge.' Prof. J. Oppert, on the other hand, identifies it with old Pers. zanada, 'prayer.'

Zendavesta is the name which has been by Europeans popularly applied to the books just spoken of as the Avesta. The term is undoubtedly an inversion, as, according to Haug, “the Pahlavi books always style them Avistak va Zand (Avesta and Zend)” t.s. the Law with its traditional and authoritative explanation. Abastak, in the sense of law, occurs in the funeral inscription of Darius at Behistun; and this seems now the most generally accepted origin of the term in its application to the Parsi sacred books. (This is not, however, the explanation given by Haug.) Thus, ‘Avesta and Zend’ signify together ‘The Law and the Commentary.’

The Avesta was originally much more extensive than the texts which now exist, which are only fragments. The Parsi tradition is that there were twenty-one books called Nasks, the greater part of which were burnt by Alexander in his conquest of Persia; possibly true, as we know that Alexander did burn the palace at Persepolis. The collection of fragments which remains, and is known as the Zend-avesta, is divided, in its usual form, into two parts. I. The Avesta properly so called, containing (a) the waste, a collection of religious laws and of mythical tales; (b) the Vispered, a collection of litanies for the sacrifice; and (c) the Yasna, composed of similar litanies and of 8 hymns or Gathas in an old dialect. II. The Khorda, or small, Avesta, composed of short prayers for recitation by the faithful at certain moments of the day, month, or year, and in presence of the different elements, with which certain other hymns and fragments are usually included.

The term Zendavesta, though used, as we see below, by Lord in 1630, first became familiar in Europe through the labours of Anquetil du Perron, and his publication of 1771. [The Zend-Avesta has now been translated in Sacred Books of the East, by J. Darmesteter, L. H. Mills; Pahlavi Texts, by E. W. West.]

ZILLAH. a. This word is properly
Ar. (in Indian pron.) zila, 'a rib, thence 'a side,' a district. It is the technical name for the administrative districts into which British India is divided, each of which has in the older provinces a Collector, or Collector and Magistrate combined, a Sessions Judge, &c., and in the newer provinces, such as the Punjab and B. Burma, a Deputy Commissioner.

ZINGARI, n.p. This is of course not Anglo-Indian, but the name applied in various countries of Europe, and in various modifications, zingari, zingari, singait, zingari, zigan, &c., to the gypsies.

Various suggestions as to its derivation have been made on the supposition that it is of Indian origin. Borrow has explained the word as 'a person of mixture blood,' deriving it from the Skt. sankara, 'made up.' It is true that varna sankara is used for an admixture of castes and races (e.g. in Bhdagavat Gita, i. 41, &c.), but it is not the name of any caste, nor within people to whom such an opprobrious epithet had been applied be likely to carry it with them to distant lands.
A writer in the Saturday Review once suggested the Pers. zingar, 'a saddler.'
Not at all probable. In Sleeman's ZIRBAD.

Ramassena or Vocabulary of the peculiar Language used by the Thugs (Calcutta, 1836), p. 85, we find:

"Chingaroes, a class of Multani Thugs, sometimes called Nauls, of the Mussulman faith. They proceed on their expeditions in the character of Brinjaras, with cows and bullocks laden with merchandise, which they expose for sale at their encampments, and thereby attract their victims. They use the rope of their bullocks instead of the roomat in strangling. They are an ancient tribe of Thugs, and take their wives and children on their expeditions."

[These are the Chăngars of whom Mr. Ibbeton (Panjab Ethnog. 306) gives an account. A full description of them has been given by Dr. G. W. Leitner (A Sketch of the Chängars and of their Dialect, Lahore, 1880), in which he shows reason to doubt any connection between them and the Zingari.] De Goeje (Contributions to the Hist. of the Gypsies) regards that people as the Indian Zoț (i.e. Jatt of Sind). He suggests as possible origins of the name first shikrī (see SHIKARÉE), and then Pers. changi, 'harper,' from which a plural changān actually occurs in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. 730, note 22. [These are the Al-Jink, male dancers (see Burton, Ar. Nights, viii. 15).]

If the name is to be derived from India, the term in Sleeman's Vocabulary seems a more probable origin than the others mentioned here. But is it not more likely that zingari, like Gipsy and Bohemian, would be a name given ab extra on their appearing in the West, and not carried with them from Asia?

ZIRBAD, n.p. Pers. zīr-bād, 'below the wind,' i.e. leeward. This is a phrase derived from nautical use, and applied to the countries eastward of India. It appears to be adopted with reference to the S.W. Monsoon. Thus by the extracts from the Mohit or 'Ocean' of Sidi 'Ali Kapudān (1554), translated by Joseph V. Hammer in the Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, we find that one chapter (unfortunately not given) treats "Of the Indian Islands above and below the wind." The islands "above the wind" were probably Ceylon, the Maldives, Socotra, &c., but we find no extract with precise indication of them. We find however indicated as the "tracts situated below the wind" Malacca, Sumatra, Tenasserim, Bengal, Martaban, Pegu. The phrase is one which naturally acquires a specific meaning among sea-faring folk, of which we have an instance in the Windward and Leeward Islands of the W. Indies. But probably it was adopted from the Malays, who make use of the same nomenclature, as the quotations show.

1442.—"The inhabitants of the sea coasts arrive here (at Ormuz) from the countries of Tchin, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zirbad."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in the XVIth Cent. 6.

1553.—"Before the foundation of Malaca, in this Cingapura... met all the navigators of the seas to the West of India... and of those to the East of it, which last embrace the regions of Siam, China, Champa, Camboja, and the many thousand islands that lie in that Orient. And these two quarters the natives of the land distinguish as Dybananguim (di-bā-bāng-ānīg) and Atas Anguium (ātās-āngīnīg) which are as much as to say 'below the winds' and 'above the winds,' below being West and above East."—Barros, Dec. II. Liv. vi. cap. i. In this passage De Barros goes unusually astray, for the use of the Malay expressions which he quotes, bāsā-āngīn (or di-bābāk) 'below the wind,' and ātās (or di-ātās) āngīn, 'above the wind,' is just the reverse of his explanation, the former meaning the east, and the latter the west (see below).

1726.—"The Malays are also commonly called Orang di Bawah Angin, or 'people beneath the wind,' otherwise Easterlings, as those of the West, and particularly the Arabs, are called Orang Atas Angin, or 'people above the wind,' and known as Westerlings."—Valentijn, v. 310.

1856.—"There is a peculiar idiom of the Malay language, connected with the monsoons... The Malays call all countries west of their own 'countries above the wind,' and their own and all countries east of it 'countries below the wind.'... The origin of the phrase admits of no explanation, unless it have reference to the most important of the two monsoons, the western, that which brought to the Malayan countries the traders of India."—Crawford's Desc. Dict. 288.

ZOBO, ZHUBO, DSOMO, &c., s. Names used in the semi-Tibetan tracts of the Himalaya for hybrids between the yak bull and the ordinary hill cow, much used in transport and agriculture. See quotation under ZEBU. The following are the connected Tibetan terms, according to Jaeschke's Dict. (p. 483): "mdzo, a mongrel bred of yak bull and common cow; bri-mdzo, a mongrel bred of common bull and yak cow; mdzopo, a male; mdzo-mo, a female animal of the kind, both valued as domestic cattle." [Writing of the Lower Himalayas, Mr. Atkinson says: "When the sire is a yak and the dam a hill cow, the hybrid is called jubu; when the parentage is reversed, the produce is called garjo. The jubu is found more valuable than the other hybrid or than either of the pure stocks" (Himalayan Gazetteer, ii. 38). Also see Ains, ed. Jarrett, ii. 350.]

1298. — "There are wild cattle in that country almost as big as elephants, splendid creatures, covered everywhere but in the back with a very fine hair a good four palms long. They are partly black, partly white, and really wonderfully fine creatures, and the hair or wool is extremely fine and white, finer and whiter than silk. Messer Marco brought some to Venice as a great curiosity, and so it was reckoned by those who saw it. There are also plenty of them tame, which have been caught young. They also cross these with the common cow, and the cattle from this cross are wonderful beasts, and better for work than other animals. These the people use commonly for burden and general work, and in the plough as well; and at the latter they do twice as much work as any other cattle, being such very strong beasts." — Marco Polo, Bk. 1, ch. 57.

1854. — "The Zabo, or cross between the yak and the hill-cow (much resembling the English cow) is but rarely seen in these mountains (Sikkim), though common in the N.W. Himalayas." — Hooker's Himal. Journals, 2d ed. i. 203.

[1871. — "The plough in Lahoul . . . is worked by a pair of dzoos (hybrids between the cow and yak)." — Harcourt, Him. Dits of Kooloo, Lahoul, and Spiti, 180.]

[1875. — "Ploughing is done chiefly with the hybrid of the yak bull and the common cow; this they call zo if male and somo if female." — Drew, Jummao and Kashmir, 216.]

ZOUAVE. s. This modern French term is applied to certain regiments of light infantry in a quasi-Oriental costume, recruited originally in Algeria, and from various races, but now only consisting of Frenchmen. The name Zouaou, Zouaucas was, according to Littre, that of a Kabyle tribe of the Jurjura which furnished the first soldiers so called.

[ZUBT, ZUBTEE, adj. and s. of which the corrupted forms are JUBTEE, JUPTEE. Ar. zub, lit. 'keeping, guarding,' but more generally in India, in the sense of 'seizure, confiscation.' In the Ains it is used in the sense which is still in use in the N.W.P., 'cash rents on the more valuable crops, such as sugar-cane, tobacco, etc., in those districts where rents in kind are generally paid.'

[c. 1590. — "Of these Pargannahs, 138 pay revenue in cash from crops charged at special rates (in orig. zubti)." — Ains, ed. Jarrett, ii. 153.]

[1813. — "Zub . . . restraint, confiscation, sequestration. Zubty. Relating to restraint or confiscation; what has been confiscated . . . Lands resumed by Jaffer Khan which had been appropriated in Jaghirc (see JAGHEER)." — Glossary to Fifth Report.]

[1851. — "You put down one hundred rupees. If the water of your land does not come . . . then my money shall be confiscated to the Sahib. If it does then your money shall be mupt (confiscated)." — Edwardes, A Tour on the Punjab Frontier, i. 278.]

ZUMBOORUCK, s. Ar. Turk. Pers. zambarak (spelt zambarak), a small gun or swivel usually carried on a camel, and mounted on a saddle — a falconet. [See a drawing in R. Kipling's Beast and Man in India, 255.] It was, however, before the use of gunpowder came in, the name applied sometimes to a cross-bow, and sometimes to the quarrel or bolt shot from such a weapon. The word is in form a Turkish diminutive from Ar. zam-bar, 'a hornet'; much as 'muaket' comes from mosquetta. Quatremère thinks the name was given from the twang of the cross-bow at the moment of discharge (see H. des Mongols, 286-6; see also Dozy, Suppl. s.v.). This older meaning is the subject of our first quotation:

1848. — "Les écrivains arabes qui ont traité des guerres des croisades, donnent à l'arbalette, telle que l'employait les chrétiens, le nom de sembourek. Le premier fois qu'ils en font mention, c'est en parlant du siège de Tyr par Saladin en 1187 . . . Suivant l'histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie, le sembourek était une flèche de l'épaissure du pouce, de la longueur d'une coudée, qui avait quatre faces . . . il traversait quelquefois au même coup deux hommes placés l'un derrière l'autre. ... Les musulmans paraissent n'avoir fait usage qu'assez tard du zambourak. Djemal-Eddin est, à ma connaissance, le premier écrivain arabe qui, sous la date 643 (1245 de J.C.), cite cette arme comme servant aux guerriers de l'Islamisme; c'est à propos du siège d'Ascalon par le sultan d'Égypte. ... Mais bientôt l'usage du zambourak devint commun en Orient, et dans la suite des Turk ottomans entrèrent dans leurs armées un corps de soldats appelés zambourakdjias. Maintenant ... ce mot a tout à fait changé d'acception, et l'on donne en Perse le nom de zambourak à une petite pièce d'artillerie légère."

1707.—"Prince Bedâr Bakht ... was killed by a cannon-ball, and many of his followers also fell. ... His younger brother Wâljah was killed by a ball from a zambourak."—Khaqân Khâqân, in Elliot, vii. 398.

o. 1784.—"Mirza Nadjâf Khan, who was preceded by some zamboraks, ordered that kind of artillery to stand in the middle of the water and to fire on the eminence."—Seir Mutaghârân, iii. 250.

1825.—"The reign of Futeh Allee Shah has been far from remarkable for its military splendour. ... He has rarely been exposed to danger in action, but, early in his reign ... he appeared in the field, ... till at last one or two shots from zambouraks dropping among them, he fell from his horse in a swoon of terror. ..."—J. B. Fraser, Journey into Khurasân in 1821-22, pp. 197-8.

[1829.—"He had no cannon; but was furnished with a description of ordnance, or swivels, called zambourak, which were mounted on camels; and which, though useful in action, could make no impression on the slightest walls. ..."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 419.]

1846.—"So hot was the fire of cannon, musquetry, and zambouraks, kept up by the Khalsa troops, that it seemed for some moments impossible that the entrenchments could be won under it."—Sir Hugh Gough's despatch on the Battle of Sobraon, dd. Feb 13.

"... The flank in question (at Sobraon) was mainly guarded by a line of two hundred zambouraks, or falconets; but it derived some support from a salient battery, and from the heavy guns retained on the opposite bank of the river."—Channing's H. of the Sikhs, 322.
