NOTES, MEMORANDA AND LETTERS EXCHANGED AND AGREEMENTS SIGNED BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENTS OF INDIA AND CHINA
1954–1959

WHITE PAPER

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
CONTENTS

SECTION I

Border Issues

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
<th>Document Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>1. Note of the Chinese Government (Hoti), 17 July 1954</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>2. Note of the Chinese Government (Hoti), 13 August 1954</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>3. Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 27 August 1954</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>4. Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 28 June 1955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>5. Note of the Chinese Government (Hoti), 11 July 1955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>6. Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 18 July 1955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>7. Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 18 August 1955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>8. Note of the Chinese Government (Hoti), 26 September 1955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>9. Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 5 November 1955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>10. Note of the Indian Government (Damzan), 5 November 1955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11</td>
<td>11. Note of the Indian Government (Nilang), 2 May 1956</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12</td>
<td>12. Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 7 June 1956</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13</td>
<td>13. Note of the Chinese Government (Hoti), 8 June 1956</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14</td>
<td>14. Note of the Chinese Government (Hoti), 26 July 1956</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15</td>
<td>15. Note Verbale of the Indian Government (Shipki), 8 September 1956</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16</td>
<td>16. Aide Memoire of the Indian Government (Shipki), 24 September 1956</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17</td>
<td>17. Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 3 October 1956</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18</td>
<td>18. Note Verbale of the Indian Government (Khurnak), 2 July 1958</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19</td>
<td>19. Note of the Chinese Government (Hoti), 2 August 1958</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

219 EA—1
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Document Title</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>20.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 8 August 1958</td>
<td></td>
<td>24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>22.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government (Aksai Chin), 1 November 1958</td>
<td></td>
<td>28</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Aksai Chin), 8 November 1958</td>
<td></td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 10 December 1958</td>
<td></td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Lohit Frontier Division), 17 January 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government (Migyitun), 23 June 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>27.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Migyitun), 26 June 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>28.</td>
<td>Informal Note of the Indian Government (survey operations), 24 July 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Spanggur), 30 July 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government (Spanggur), 6 August 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Khinzemane), 11 August 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Spanggur), 13 August 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government (Migyitun), 27 August 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>43</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Longju), 28 August 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Chinese Maps

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Document Title</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>35.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 21 August 1958</td>
<td></td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>36.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 3 November 1958</td>
<td></td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>37.</td>
<td>Letter from Prime Minister of India to Premier Chou En-lai, 14 December 1958</td>
<td></td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38.</td>
<td>Letter from Premier Chou En-lai to Prime Minister of India, 23 January 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39.</td>
<td>Letter from Prime Minister of India to Premier Chou En-lai, 22 March 1959</td>
<td></td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

( ii )
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>41.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>43.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>45.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>46.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>47.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>48.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>49.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>50.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>51.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>52.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>54.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>55.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>56.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>57.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>59.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>60.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
SECTION II

Agreements

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>Agreement between India and China on trade and intercourse between Tibet region of China and India, 29 April 1954</td>
<td>98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>Trade Agreement between India and China, 14 October 1954 and subsequent letters amending and extending its validity</td>
<td>108</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Note given by the Counsellor of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, 17 July 1954

According to a report received from the Tibet Region of China, over thirty Indian troops armed with rifles crossed the Niti Pass on 29 June 1954, and intruded into Wu-Je of the Ali Area of the Tibet Region of China. (Wu-Je is about one day's journey from the Niti Pass). The above happening is not in conformity with the principles of non-aggression and friendly co-existence between China and India, and the spirit of the Joint Communique issued recently by the Prime Ministers of China and India. It is hoped that the Government of India would promptly investigate the matter, and order the immediate withdrawal of the Indian troops in question from the above-mentioned territory of the Tibet Region of China. We shall appreciate it if you will let us know at the earliest opportunity the results of steps which you are to take in the above matter.
Regarding the intrusion into Wu-Je in the Ali Area of the Tibet Region of China by the Indian troops the question of which I raised with you on 17 of July, I am to inform you that further investigations reveal that they were a unit of 33 persons attached to the local garrison in U.P., India. The unit was under the command of an officer called Nathauje (according to Chinese pronunciation) who was a deputy commander of the troops stationing at Kanman (Chinese pronunciation). Together with the officer, there was a local official named Sopit Singh (Chinese pronunciation) of Chinal tribe in U.P., who was also a district magistrate of Walzan japur (Chinese pronunciation) district. Besides, there were a doctor, radio-operators and soldiers. They were putting up in 17 tents.

The above situation, as I spoke to you last time, is not in conformity with the principles of non-aggression and friendly co-existence between China and India and the spirit of the joint communique issued recently by the Prime Ministers of China and India. It is hoped that the Government of India will adopt necessary measures as to order the immediate withdrawal of the Indian troops in question from the territory of the Tibet Region of China. It will also be much appreciated if you would let us know the results of the steps you may take in this matter.
Note given to the Chinese Counsellor in India, 27 August 1954

We have made thorough enquiries regarding the allegation made by the Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy on 17th July and repeated again on 13th August about a report that a unit of 33 Indians attached to the local garrison in U.P. (India) had intruded into the Tibet region of China. As previously mentioned to the Chinese Counsellor, our further investigations have confirmed that the allegation is entirely incorrect. A party of our Border Security Force is encamped in the Hoti Plain which is south-east of Niti Pass and is in Indian territory. None of our troops or personnel have crossed north of the Niti Pass, as verbally mentioned by the Chinese Counsellor.

2. On the other hand, we have received reports that some of the Tibetan officials tried to cross into our territory in Hoti Plain and it is requested that such entry without proper documents is not in conformity with the Agreement signed between India and China regarding Trade and intercourse between India and the Tibet region of China, nor in conformity with the principles of non-aggression and friendly co-existence between China and India and the spirit of the joint communiqué issued recently by the Prime Ministers of India and China. It is hoped that the Government of China will instruct the local authorities in Tibet not to cross into Indian territory as we have instructed our authorities not to cross into Tibetan territory.
We have regretfully to refer again to the report which we conveyed to the Chinese Embassy last year (27 August 1954) that Tibetan officials attempted to enter in our territory in the Hoti Plain. We have now received a report that a party of Chinese are camping at Hoti with 5 tents and 20 horses and that they have entered our territory without proper documents.

2. We had mentioned earlier and would like to repeat once again that such entry without proper documents is not in conformity with the Agreement signed between India and China on the subject of trade and border relations between India and the Tibet region of China. We would request that instructions be issued immediately to these personnel to withdraw across the border over the Tunjun La and to refrain from entering Indian territory unless they are in possession of proper documents. We would like to emphasise that such violation of our territory is not in conformity with the principles of non-aggression and friendly co-existence between China and India nor in the spirit of the joint communique issued last year by the Prime Ministers of India and China. We ourselves have issued a strict injunction to all our personnel not to cross into the territory of the Tibet region of China and would be grateful if the Chinese authorities will issue similar instructions to their own personnel and to the local authorities in Tibet not to enter Indian territory.
Note given by the Chinese Counsellor in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 11 July 1955

1. On 29 June 1954, a batch of more than 30 Indian soldiers crossed into Wu-Je of the Tibet Region of China. Only after our repeated representations to the Ministry did the Indian troops withdraw from the place on 19 September 1954.

2. According to recent reports from authorities concerned in the Tibet Region of China, another batch of more than 30 Indian soldiers crossed into Wu-Je of the Tibet Region of China on 25 June 1955 and engaged in constructing fortifications at places very close to our garrison forces stationing there. On the basis of the Five Principles, we would request the Indian Government to order the prompt withdrawal of the said troops from the Chinese territory so as to avoid any possible accident.

3. As regards the representation made by Mr. S. K. Roy on 28 June 1955 in connection with the alleged crossing of the border of Chinese personnel and their camping at the Hoti Plain, it may be recalled that last year when we made the request that the Indian troops be withdrawn from Wu-Je, you also mentioned that our officials in the Tibet Region had attempted to cross into Hoti. In this regard we wish to point out that the Chinese Government has times and again instructed the personnel of the frontier garrison not to move a single step beyond the Chinese border. Our investigations have confirmed that in the course of the last year and the current one there never has been any case of Chinese personnel crossing the border in the vicinity of the Niti Pass.
Informal Note given to the Chinese Counsellor in India, 18 July 1955

With reference to the informal note handed over by the Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy, New Delhi, on 11 July 1955, to Shri T. N. Kaul, it is pointed out that the statement in para. 1 regarding the withdrawal of Indian troops said to be at Wu-Je does not correctly indicate the position. The troops mentioned were not in the Tibet region of China but at Bara Hoti, on the Hoti Plain in India which is south of the Tunjun La. The movement of the troops had no connection with the Chinese representations. They withdrew in September 1954, because the outpost maintained at Bara Hoti is only a seasonal post.

2. We would also like to emphasise that the same remarks apply to the Indian troops now said to be at Wu-Je. We are not aware of the exact location of Wu-Je, though the Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy mentioned that it was 12 kilometres north of the Tunjun La, but we are quite confident that our troops have not, under any circumstances, crossed the border into the Tibet region of China. The only party of Indian troops in the area is the party camping in the Hoti Plain. We understand that a party of Chinese troops are camping close by in Indian territory, about whose presence a representation was made by Mr. S. K. Roy to the Chinese Counsellor on 28 June 1955. Since the Chinese troops are within Indian territory, we would again request the Chinese Government, in furtherance of the five principles, to order their prompt withdrawal from Indian territory so as to avoid any possible further misunderstanding.
Note given to the Chinese Counsellor in India, 18 August 1955

With reference to the informal note handed over to the Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi on the 18th July 1955, by Shri T. N. Kaul, we regret to point out that we have received a report that the Sarji, a Tibetan official, with the Chinese troops at Bara Hoti on the Hoti Plain in India has realised grazing tax from Indian herdsmen grazing goats in the area. This is a new development which we would request the Chinese authorities to stop forthwith.
Note given by the Counsellor of China to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi on 26 September 1955

The informal note handed over to me by Mr. S. K. Roy, Deputy Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs on 18 August 1955 has been duly transmitted to our Government.

2. Our repeated investigations made in Wu-Je area of the Tibet Region have proved that no Chinese personnel has ever crossed the border. On the contrary, it was the Indian troops that intruded into Wu-Je which has always belonged to Dabatsing of the Tibet Region within the Chinese boundary.

3. According to reports from quarters concerned, the Indian troops are still stationing at Wu-Je, and are incessantly carrying out reconnaissance activities on the Chinese Garrison. Hence the situation is rather serious.

4. In order to avoid any possible accident, it is hoped that the Government of India would continue to investigate into this case of border-crossing and take effective measures to prevent its further development.

5. Since no Chinese personnel has crossed the border, there could not have been such situation as stated in your informal note of 18 August 1955.

23 September 1955.
The position as set out in the informal note handed over to Shri T. N. Kaul by Mr. Kang, Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy on the 26th September 1955, shows that there is clearly a misunderstanding of the position. We are quite definite that our personnel have at no time intruded into the Wu-Je area of the Tibet region of China but have throughout remained at Bara Hoti which is 2 miles south of the Tunjun La.

2. We regret to say that Chinese troops came south of the Tunjun La and were camping at Bara Hoti alongside our troops. We would like to repeat that we are most anxious to avoid any possible incident and we, therefore, suggest that strict instructions should be issued that no personnel from the Tibet region of China should cross into India without due permission from us.

3. We would also like to repeat our earlier assertion that we have issued strict instructions to all our personnel that they are not to cross the border into the Tibet region of China without due permission from the authorities. We are quite sure that our personnel have not entered the Wu-Je area of the Tibet region of China because they have never crossed the Tunjun La, the border pass, and Wu-Je was stated by Mr. Kang to be 12 kilometres north of this Pass.
Note given to the Chinese Counsellor in India, 5 November 1955

On 15th September as our detachment from Hoti Plain in India was approaching Damzan, which is 10 miles south of the Niti Pass and in Indian territory, they were stopped by 20 Chinese soldiers who were trespassing on Indian territory. These soldiers sent a message to our detachment that it could not go via Damzan unless it got permission from the Chinese authorities at Gartok. Our detachment insisted on going via Damzan and told them that they were passing through Indian territory. They made it clear that if the Chinese party used force to stop our detachment from going through Indian territory they would be responsible for the consequences. The situation was such as might have led to a serious clash between Indian and Chinese soldiers but for the great restraint exercised by our detachment. The Chinese soldiers did not try to stop our detachment but wanted to remain on the Indian territory at Damzan without due and proper permission from us.

We must point out that Damzan is clearly within Indian territory. It is situated at longitude 79°51'—latitude 30°49' and is 10 miles south of the Niti Pass which has been recognised by the Sino-Indian Agreement of 29th April 1954 as the border pass between the two countries in this region. The unauthorised presence of Chinese soldiers at Damzan in Indian territory therefore amounts to trespass and their action in trying to stop our detachment from going through Damzan is a violation of the Five Principles.

We have already asked that strict instructions should be issued to the Chinese authorities in the Tibet region of China that their personnel and the local authorities in Tibet should not enter Indian territory without first obtaining permission from the authorities concerned in India. We would earnestly repeat this request and point out that such action is not in conformity with principles of non-aggression and friendly co-existence accepted by India and China and that incidents such as these may well have grave consequences. We would also request that action should be taken against the offenders.
We have learnt with surprise and regret from the Commander of our Border Security Force at Nilang that 12 Chinese soldiers including one officer equipped with tommy and sten guns and telescopes were seen half a mile east of Nilang at 12-30 hours on 28th April. Nilang and the area right up to Tsang Chokla pass is clearly within Indian territory and has always been in our possession. We have, therefore, instructed the Officer Commanding our Border Security Forces in Nilang to inform the Chinese Officer to leave Indian territory immediately.

2. We assume that the movement of the Chinese troops into our territory is due to ignorance and would request that the Chinese troops and their officer should be instructed to withdraw immediately beyond Tsang Chokla pass and warned not to violate Indian territory in future. If, however, it is under instructions from higher authorities we wish to lodge a protest against this clear violation of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 29th April 1954 and the Five Principles which were signed jointly by Premier Chou En-lai and Prime Minister Nehru the same year. We wish to point out that failure of immediate withdrawal of the Chinese troops beyond Tsang Chokla may lead to serious incidents which would mar the friendly relations between India and China. This we wish to avoid and hope that the Chinese Government shares our wish and will issue immediate instructions for the withdrawal of their troops beyond Tsang Chokla into Chinese territory.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Chinese Charge d'Affaires in India, 7 June 1956

A number of informal notes have been exchanged between the Ministry of External Affairs and the Chinese Embassy on the subject of Bara Hoti and Wu-Je of the Tibet region of China. We have throughout maintained that Chinese personnel have crossed the Tunjun La from the Tibet region of China and entered the territory of the Indian Union, whereas the Chinese Embassy have maintained that our personnel have entered the Wu-Je area of the Tibet region of China.

2. A copy of the last note handed over to Mr. Kang, Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy on 5th November 1955 is attached. From this it will be seen that the main point has been the position of the areas in question with relation to the Tunjun La, our contention being that Bara Hoti is two miles south of the Tunjun La whereas Chinese Embassy have held that Wu-Je is 12 kilometres north of this Pass.

3. The present position is that our personnel are now encamped at Bara Hoti south of the Tunjun La, and we have received a report that a party of 20 or 30 Chinese troops are preparing to cross the Tunjun La from the Tibet region of China into India. We have instructed our personnel not to permit this party to cross over and camp at Bara Hoti and we would be grateful if the Chinese Embassy could have instructions issued immediately that the party should not cross the Tunjun La into Indian territory.

4. As we have already stated on several occasions our personnel have strict instructions not to enter the Tibet region of China without permission from the authorities concerned. They have assured us that they have never crossed the Tunjun La. Now that they are encamped on the Indian side of the Tunjun La we trust that the position will be clarified and no attempt will be made by Chinese personnel to cross over this Pass from the Tibet region of China into India. Any unfortunate incident in this connection would do nothing but harm to the friendly and cordial relations prevailing between our two countries.
Concerning the question of Wu-Je, representations were made on September 26, 1955 by Mr. Kang Mao-Cho, Counsellor of the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in the Republic of India, to Mr. T. N. Kaul, Joint Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and on November 5 of the same year, India's views on the same question were set forth by Mr. S. K. Roy, Deputy Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India to Mr. Fu Hao, Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy in India.

Now that the Wu-Je area has already become passable, if the Governments of China and India should again send their respective troops into that area as they did in 1955, a situation similar to that of 1955 will inevitably recur, in which the troops of the two countries confront each other. The Chinese Government cannot but be concerned about this, and it is presumed that the Indian Government shares the same feeling.

The Chinese Government has made a study of data concerning this part of the Tibet Region of China adjacent to India and it has been proved that the Wu-Je area has always been under the jurisdiction of Daba Dzong of the Tibet Region of China. This area is within Chinese territory.

In his talk on November 5, 1955 with Mr. Fu Hao, Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy in India, Mr. S. K. Roy, Deputy Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India referred to Tunjun La as the border pass. However, according to historical records of this part of the Tibet Region of China adjacent to Indian territory, Tunjun La is proven to be within Chinese territory. There is no historical record showing Tunjun La to be a border pass between China and India.

The Ministry of External Affairs of India more than once expressed to the Chinese Embassy in India the desire to know the opinion of the Chinese Government regarding the joint investigation into the question of Wu-Je. The Chinese Government is of the opinion that, with a view to settling the question of Wu-Je, a joint investigation by representatives of the Chinese and Indian Governments will be useful. The Chinese Government is willing to continue consultations with the Indian Government with regard to the method in such a joint investigation.

The Chinese Government wishes further to suggest that, pending the settlement of the Wu-Je question by the two Governments through normal diplomatic channels, both Governments should refrain from sending troops into the Wu-Je area so as to avoid a situation in which the troops of the two countries confront each other, and to maintain the normal state of affairs along the Sino-Indian border.

China and India are the first countries to initiate the five principles of peaceful co-existence. We should abide by these principles and ideals which we ourselves have initiated. The Chinese Government considers that, so long as the two Governments keep to a friendly and fair attitude, the question of Wu-Je will undoubtedly be settled satisfactorily through the clarification of historical facts by means of investigation and study.
Note given by the Foreign Office of China to the Counsellor of India, 26 July 1956

On June 8, 1956, Mr. Chen Chia-kang, then Assistant Foreign Minister of China, handed over to Mr. Bahadur Singh, Counsellor of the Indian Embassy in China, a memorandum in which it was stated that the Chinese Government was willing to undertake a joint investigation with the Indian Government to settle the question of Wu-Je (Hoti) and that the Chinese Government further suggested that pending the settlement of the Wu-je question by the two Governments through normal diplomatic channels, both Governments should refrain from sending troops into the Wu-je area.

On June 13, 1956, Mr. R. K. Nehru, Indian Ambassador to China, indicated to Mr. Chi Peng-fei, Vice-Foreign Minister of China, that the Indian Government had agreed to a joint investigation by China and India into the Wu-je question. The Chinese Government is pleased with this, and will continue to consult with the Indian Government on the concrete matters relating to the joint investigation.

However, in connection with the Chinese Government's suggestion that, pending the settlement of the Wu-je question by the two Governments through normal diplomatic channels, both Governments should refrain from sending troops into the Wu-je area, no reply has yet been received from the Indian Government. With a view to facilitating the settlement of the Wu-je question through friendly consultation between the Chinese and the Indian Governments, this year the Chinese Government has not sent its frontier garrisons into the Wu-je area. In the meantime, however, the Chinese Government has received a report that Indian troops have crossed the border and entered the Wu-je area as they did last year. This is disquieting. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will take necessary measures to effect the speedy withdrawal of Indian troops from the Wu-je area so as to create a favourable atmosphere and condition for a smooth settlement of the Wu-je question between China and India.

In his talk with Mr. Chi Peng-fei, Chinese Vice-Foreign Minister, Mr. R. K. Nehru, Indian Ambassador to China, also raised the question of the terms of the joint investigation of the Wu-je question. Ambassador R. K. Nehru was of the opinion that the joint investigation should be based on the contents of an informal talk in 1955 between Mr. Kang Mao-chao, former Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy in India, and Mr. T. N. Kaul, Joint Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India. Ambassador R. K. Nehru said that, as he understood it, both Mr. Kang and Mr. Kaul had agreed in their talk that Tunjun La was the border pass between China and India, and that therefore the aim of the joint investigation should be limited to finding out on the spot whether Wu-je or Bara Hoti was the north or to the south of Tunjun La. Ambassador Nehru further added that if it was to the north of Tunjun La, it was in Chinese territory, and if it was to the south of Tunjun La, it was in Indian territory.

In the memorandum handed over on June 8, 1956 by Mr. Chen Chia-kang, then Assistant Foreign Minister of China, to Mr. Bahadur Singh, Counsellor of the Indian Embassy in China, it has been clearly pointed out that according to historical records of this part of the Tibet Region of China adjacent to Indian territory, Tunjun La is proven to be within Chinese territory and there is no historical record showing Tunjun La to be a border pass between China and India. Hence any disputation about Wu-je being in Chinese territory cannot be based on the ground that Wu-je is to the south of Tunjun La.

When Counsellor Kang Mao-chao in the above-mentioned informal talk with Mr. Kaul, Joint Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India, in 1955 referred to Wu-je as situated 12 kilometres to the northeast of Tunjan La, he was in fact not so clear about the geographical position of Wu-je in relation to Tunjun La. His above remark thus gave rise to some misunderstanding, but even then it cannot change the actual geographical position of Wu-je, i.e. it is within Chinese territory.

The Chinese Government maintains that Wu-je is within Chinese territory. Nevertheless, in the spirit of friendly cooperation, the Chinese Government is still willing to make joint efforts with the Indian Government to iron out the difference of views of the two Governments regarding the jurisdiction over Wu-je. The Chinese Government is convinced that, provided both sides refrain from sending troops into the Wu-je area and undertake a joint investigation on the basis of historical records in a matter-of-fact way, it should not be difficult to settle the Wu-je question satisfactorily.
Note Verbale given to the Chinese Charge d'Affaires in India, 8 September 1956

The Government of India have received a report that on the 1st September 1956, a party of about 10 Chinese Army personnel entered and took up positions about 2 furlongs from Hupsong Khad on the Indian side of Shipki La Pass. The party withdrew after the Officer-in-Charge of the Indian Border Police pointed out to the Captain in command of the Chinese Military Personnel that the Indian territory extends up to the Shipki La Pass.

2. The crossing of the Shipki La Pass by the Chinese Army Personnel without visaed Passports violates the Sino-Indian Agreement of April 29, 1954, in which the Shipki La Pass has been recognised as the border between India and the Tibet Region of China at that place. The Government of India presume that the Chinese Army Personnel crossed into Indian territory by mistake and not deliberately.

3. The Government of India would, however, request the Chinese Government to issue strict instructions to their authorities concerned that no unauthorised persons should cross into Indian territory in this manner in future, as otherwise there is danger of breach of peace. They would also request that action be taken against the offenders in the present case and the Government of India be informed of the action taken.
Aide memoire given to the Chinese Charge d'Affaires in India, 24 September 1956

Since the handing over of the last informal Note to Charge d'Affaires Fu Hao on the 8th September, the Government of India have received two reports of serious situations that recently developed between the Chinese and Indian border patrols in the region of Shipki La Pass on the Indo-Tibetan border.

2. The first of these occurred on the 10th September, when a party of Indian border police on its way to the Shipki La Pass sighted a party of Chinese Military personnel on the Indian side of the frontier. The Chinese party was commanded by a Captain and consisted of at least ten persons. The Indian patrol signalled the Chinese party to withdraw, but the latter did not do so. Thereupon, on the Indian patrol trying to advance, the Chinese personnel threw stones at it and threatened to use their grenades.

3. Towards the evening, the Indian party approached and held conversations with the Chinese. During this conversation, the Chinese Commander intimated that he had “received instructions from the Tibetan Government that the border extended up to Hupsang Khad and that Indian personnel should accordingly not advance beyond Hupsang Khad”. The Indian Patrol Commander pointed out that the border was in fact situated at the Shipki La Pass and suggested that the Chinese should accordingly withdraw.

4. However, it does not appear that the Chinese troops withdrew, as the following morning (11th September) they were again soon on the ridge above the roadway on the Indian side of the Pass. The position remained the same on the 12th September.

5. The Chinese Government will no doubt agree that in throwing stones and threatening to use hand grenades, the Chinese patrol offered such provocation as could easily have resulted in serious and regrettable incidents. However, a development even more likely to cause an ugly situation was soon to follow.

6. On the 20th September at about 4.45 a.m., a party of 27 Indian Border Security Force came face to face with a party of 20 Chinese troops and officers two miles on the Indian side of the Shipki La Pass. The Indian Commanding Officer asked the Chinese Officer to withdraw his troops. The Chinese Officer replied that he had received no further communication from his Government. He added that meanwhile his instructions were clear, namely, to patrol right up to Hupsang Khad, and in carrying these out he was prepared to face the consequences. He concluded that if the Indian party went beyond Hupsang Khad he “would oppose it with arms”.

7. The Government of India are pained and surprised at this conduct of the Chinese Commanding Officer. It is not difficult to visualise that the natural and direct result of such attitudes, if continued in, may be one of clash of arms.
8. In view of the fact that Shipki La is clearly the border and is acknowledged as such in the Sino-Indian Agreement of 29th April 1954, the Government of India consider any crossing of this border pass by armed personnel as aggression which they will resist. Government of India have ordered their Border Security Force not to take any action for the present in repulsing this aggression and to await instructions which they hope the Central People’s Government will issue immediately. Government of India have however directed their Border Security Force on no account to retire from their position or to permit Chinese personnel to go beyond where they are even if this involves a clash.

Government of India attach great importance to this matter and request immediate action by the Chinese Government. Otherwise there might be an unfortunate clash on our border which will have undesirable results.
Note given to the Chinese Charge d’Affaires in India, 3 October 1956

A number of conversations have been held in both New Delhi and Peking during the last 12 months in connection with the ownership of the territory of Barahoti and Wu-Je.

2. The last such conversation was at Peking on the 26th July 1956, when the WAICHIAOPU handed over an informal note to the Indian Embassy Counsellor, Mr. Bahadur Singh.

3. Previous to this, there seemed to have been agreement between the Governments of India and China in regard to the location of the Indo-Tibetan border in this area at the Tunjun-La Pass. On the basis of this location the factual point requiring ascertainment was merely whether the territory of Barahoti/Wu-Je was situated to the north of this Pass (and was therefore Chinese) or to the south of it (and was therefore Indian).

4. From the last conversation and informal note, however, the Government of India has observed with surprise the appearance of what seems to be a change in the Chinese view of the position of this Pass in relation to the border, on the ground that the understanding and statements by its Counsellor, Mr. Kang, at New Delhi, on the geographical position of Wu-Je in relation to Tunjun-La, was not correct.

5. While the Government of India are confident that having regard to the friendly relations of the two countries, the difference that has consequently arisen can be resolved in a peaceful and friendly manner, they feel that it would be helpful to make the actual situation clear so that there may be an agreed basis for settlement.

6. This is as follows:

(a) The district of Garhwal, in which Barahoti is situated, is, and has always been, a part of India;

(b) The historical evidence to support this goes back for many centuries;

(c) By possession and usage also Barahoti is, and has always been, part of India and Tunjun-La is, and has always been, the Border Pass;

(d) The precise latitude/longitude of this Pass is $30^\circ-53^\prime$ latitude north, $79^\circ-59^\prime$ longitude east.

This may assist identification of the Pass, and avoid danger of confusion with any other Pass.

1A copy was given to the Foreign Office of China on 5 October 1956.
7. The Government of India feel that proper understanding of the actual situation is a basic preliminary to any joint investigation. It is for this reason that the Government of India have again considered it necessary to elucidate the position, for it is only on the basis of a solid foundation such as this, that any joint Sino-Indian inspection survey party can be expected to arrive at correct conclusions as to the ownership of adjoining territory.

8. In view, however, of the mutual desire of the Governments of India and China to settle this problem peacefully and avoid any kind of clash, the Government of India agree that it would assist towards the expedition of a friendly settlement if both Governments refrain from sending troops into this area. As desired by the Government of China, the Government of India will accordingly issue the necessary orders, on the understanding that the Government of China will do likewise.
Note Verbale handed by the Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Counsellor in India, 2 July 1958

The Government of India have received information that troops of the Government of the People's Republic of China crossed into Indian territory and visited the Khurnak Fort (longitude 79°-00 E and latitude 33°-47' N) which lies within the Indian frontiers of the Ladakh region of Kashmir and occupied it.

It will be recalled that a conference of the representatives of the Kashmir State of India and the Tibet Region of China was held in 1924 regarding the boundary in this area. Unfortunately, the conference came to no agreed conclusions. It may, however, be mentioned that even during these discussions, the jurisdiction of India over the Khurnak Fort was never disputed. Discussions took place in regard to the international boundary which was further north of the Fort. No claim has ever been affirmed that the Fort formed part of the Tibet Region of China.

The Government of India are concerned at the report of the violation of the Indian frontier. They would not like to believe that unilateral action has been taken by the Government of the People's Republic of China with whom their relations are of the friendliest, to enforce alleged territorial claims in the region.

For the information of the Chinese Government, it may be mentioned that the Government of India propose to send a reconnaissance party to the area with clear instructions that the party will remain within the Indian side of the frontier.
Note handed by the Chinese Counsellor in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 2 August 1958

Since 8th July 1958, more than twenty Indian personnel entered into Wu-Je of the Tibet Region of China, bringing with them wireless communication apparatus, arms, etc. They said they were sent there by the Government of India to keep watch over the place. It is obvious that they are officials sent by the Indian Government. It is attempted to change the existing situation of Wu-Je and to create new dispute that, at a time when negotiations on the question of the ownership of Wu-Je are being held between China and India, the Indian side should have taken such an action. The Chinese Government cannot but lodge a protest and demands that the above-mentioned Indian personnel withdraw immediately from China's territory Wu-Je.
Note handed to the Chinese Counsellor in India by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 8 August 1958

With reference to the informal note handed over personally by Mr. Fu Hao, Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi to Shri B. K. Acharya, Director of the Eastern Division of the Ministry of External Affairs on the 2nd August 1958, the Government of India would like to state that it is a fact that a team of civilian revenue officials consisting of 21 persons sent by the Government of Uttar Pradesh have been camping in Barahoti in Indian territory since 8th July 1958 in connection with normal revenue settlement operations.

2. In this connection, the Government of India would recall that during the recent series of talks between the two Governments at Delhi on Barahoti, the Foreign Secretary on behalf of the Government of India suggested to His Excellency the Chinese Ambassador at the very first meeting held on the 19th April 1958, that during the pendency of negotiations the civil authorities on either side should not try to exercise control or possession over the Barahoti area. He pointed out that any such attempt to exercise control by civil authorities would only lead to counter-attempts to exercise similar control by the other side and that this is a situation, which, in the interest of friendship between India and China and also in the interest of satisfactory progress of the negotiations, should be avoided.

3. Subsequently, Mr. Fu Hao informed Shri B. K. Acharya that in the view of the Government of the People's Republic of China, it is unnecessary to consider such an interim agreement. Shri Acharya then informed Mr. Fu Hao that as the Indian proposal was not acceptable to the Chinese side, the Government of India will have no option but to continue to send their own civil authorities to the area.

4. It has already been explained to Mr. Fu Hao that both sides have claimed jurisdiction over Barahoti and both sides in the past have been sending officials to Barahoti. While the Government of India were and are of the view that during the pendency of the negotiations neither side should send civil officials to the area, they cannot agree to only one side sending their civil officials to Barahoti. In the present case, the Government of the People's Republic of China did not accept the proposal of the Government of India in this regard and actually sent their civil officials to the area on the 29th June. The Government of India, therefore, had no option but to instruct the Government of Uttar Pradesh to send their civil officials also to the area.

5. As, in the view of the Government of India, Barahoti is within Indian territory, it was not obligatory on the Government of India to inform the Government of the People's Republic of China regarding the movement of their civil officials in their own territory.
view of the friendly relations existing between the two Governments, however, the Government of India have kept the Government of the People's Republic of China informed about the visit of civilian officials to Barahoti during this summer. The Government of India, therefore, are of the view that the Government of the People's Republic of China can have no legitimate cause for protest against the action taken, particularly in view of the fact that the sending of Indian officials to any part of Indian territory is an internal domestic matter.

6. As regards Mr. Fu Hao's allegation that civilian officials have carried arms with them, the information of Government of India is that the Indian team of revenue officials is not carrying with it any arms like rifles and revolvers normally carried by members of the armed forces. Whether any weapons like shotguns have been carried for purposes of protection against wild animals is being enquired into. Government of India would be glad to receive information from the Embassy of the People's Republic of China as to whether the Chinese officials at Barahoti are carrying any arms with them or not.

7. The facts stated above furnish no support for the suggestion in the Chinese note that the Government of India are "attempting to change the existing situation of Wu-Je and to create a new dispute". The Government of India, therefore, emphatically repudiate the suggestion.
The attention of the Government of India has recently been drawn to the fact that a motor road has been constructed by the Government of the People's Republic of China across the eastern part of the Ladakh region of the Jammu and Kashmir State, which is part of India. This road seems to form part of the Chinese road known as Yehcheng-Gartok road or Sinkiang-Tibet highway, the completion of which was announced in September, 1957. The road enters Indian territory just east of Sarigh Jilgnang, runs north-west to Amtogar and striking the western bank of the Amtogar lake runs north-west through Yangpa, Khitai Dawan and Haji Langar which are all in indisputable Indian territory. Near the Amtogar lake several branch tracks have also been made motorable.

2. The India-China boundary in the Ladakh sector as in others is traditionally well-known and follows well marked geographical features. The territory which the road traverses has been part of the Ladakh region of India for centuries and the "old established frontiers" have been accepted by the Chinese in a Treaty of 1842 as the international boundary. In an official communication, a Chinese member of the Boundary Commission of 1847-49 accepted the boundary as "sufficiently and distinctly fixed so that it will be best to adhere to this ancient arrangement and it will prove far more convenient to abstain from any additional measures for fixing them". Accordingly, Indian survey parties have visited the region since the nineteenth century. Travellers to the area have referred to it as part of Ladakh, and Atlases like the Johnston's Atlas of India, edition 1894, and maps published by the Survey of India show it unmistakably as part of Ladakh.

3. In view of the position indicated in para. 2 above, it is a matter of surprise and regret that the Chinese Government should have constructed a road through indisputably Indian territory without first obtaining the permission of the Government of India and without even informing the Government of India.

4. The Government of India would like to point out that Chinese personnel, including officials and workers engaged in constructing and maintaining the road, as well as Chinese travellers traversing this road have been contravening Article V of the Agreement between the People's Republic of China and India on Trade and Intercourse with Tibet concluded in 1954. According to this Article "for travelling across the border, the High Contracting Parties agree that diplomatic personnel, officials and nationals of the two countries shall hold passports issued by their own respective countries and visaed by the Other Party" except as provided in the subsequent paragraphs of the Article relating to traders, pilgrims and muleteers. No applications for visas from Chinese personnel working on the road or from Chinese travellers traversing this road have ever been received by the Government of India.

5. As the Chinese Government are aware, the Government of India are anxious to settle these petty frontier disputes so that the friendly relations between the two countries may not suffer. The Government of India would therefore be glad for an early reply from the Tibetan Government.

6. In this connection the Government of India would also like to draw the attention of the Chinese Government to another fact. An Indian party consisting of three Military Officers and four soldiers together with one Guide, one porter, six pony-owners and thirtyfour ponies, were out on a normal patrol in this area near Shinglung in Indian territory. This patrol had been given strict instructions not to cross the border into Chinese territory. Since the end of August, however, no news of their whereabouts has been received in spite of search by air. Since there are now Chinese personnel in this part of Indian territory the Government of India would be grateful for any information that the Chinese Government may have about the party and for any assistance that they may find it possible to give to the party to return to their headquarters.
Memorandum given by the Foreign Office of China to the Counsellor of India, 3 November 1958

According to the report of the Chinese local authorities in Sinkiang, Frontier Guards of the Chinese liberation army stationed in the south western part of Sinkiang discovered in succession on September 8 and 12, 1958 two groups of Indian armed personnel at Tahungliutan and Kezrekirekan on the Sinkiang-Tibet road on Chinese territory. These personnel had clearly intruded into Chinese territory to conduct unlawful surveying activities within Chinese borders. They were therefore detained by the Chinese Frontier Guards. The two groups of personnel consisted of 3 Indian officers and 4 soldiers and 8 employees. They carried with them 3 sten guns, one rifle, one pistol and radio sets, instruments for surveying and photographing and horses.

In addition since September this year Chinese Frontier Guards have more than once discovered Indian aircraft penetrating deep into the air space over south western part of Sinkiang of China to carry on reconnaissance and even circled low over Chinese garrisons.

The above-mentioned unlawful intrusions of Indian armed personnel and aircraft into Chinese territory and territorial air to conduct reconnoitring and surveying activities are inconsistent with Sino-Indian friendly relations and the five principles of peaceful co-existence initiated jointly by the two countries. The Chinese Government expresses deep regret at these happenings. The Chinese Government requests the Government of India to guarantee that no similar incidents will occur in the future.

As for the detained Indian armed personnel the Chinese Government in the spirit of Sino-Indian friendship has already ordered the military authorities concerned to deport them from Chinese territory through the Karakoram Pass on 22nd October.

Peking;
1 November, 1958.
Government of India have seen the note of the Chinese Government of November 1. As the Chinese Government are aware the Government of India had spoken to the Chinese Ambassador at New Delhi as early as the 18th October about the area which is referred to in the Chinese note. It was specifically mentioned to the Ambassador that an Indian party of 15 including 3 Military Officers were out on a normal patrol in this area but had been missing since the end of August. It is now clear that the Chinese Government also claim this area as their territory. The question whether the particular area is in Indian or Chinese territory is a matter in dispute which has to be dealt with separately. The Government of India propose to do so and reply later in detail to the Chinese note of November 1. Meantime the Government of India express their surprise and regret that although the Indian patrol party had been arrested for nearly 5 weeks no information was given to the Government of India and even then it was mentioned to the Counsellor of the Embassy only casually that the arrested persons had been sent across to India on the 22nd October. The Government of India had expected that in view of the friendly relations between the two countries intimation would have been given to them immediately after the apprehension of the patrol party and that arrangements would have been made in mutual consultation about the handing over of the party. The action of the Chinese Government in sending the party across the frontier without previous notice exposed the party to grave risks of life particularly in this season and it was only providential that the party could be rescued.
During the recent talks at Delhi on Barahoti between Chinese and Indian Delegations, it was proposed by the Indian side that the civil authorities of either country should not attempt to exercise jurisdiction over the Barahoti area until the dispute is finally settled. As this suggestion was not acceptable to the Chinese side, the Director of the Eastern Division informed the Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy at Delhi that if the Chinese Government sent their civil officials to Barahoti this year, the Indian side would also have to do likewise. The Chinese officials entered Barahoti on the 29th June 1958. The Government of India, therefore, had no option but to instruct the Uttar Pradesh Government to send their civil officials also to the area. These Indian officials reached Barahoti on the 8th July.

2. On the 2nd August, the Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy handed over to the Director of the Eastern Division an official note protesting against the presence of the Indian Revenue Party at Barahoti and alleging that they were carrying arms. On the 8th August, the Director of the Eastern Division handed over to Counsellor Fu Hao an informal note in reply to the Chinese protest. In this note it was stated that the Indian Revenue Party was not carrying with it any arms like rifles or revolvers normally carried by the members of the Armed Forces. The Director, however, undertook to enquire whether any shot guns for purposes of hunting and protection against wild animals had been taken. The results of the enquiry were intimated to Counsellor Yeh Cheng-Chang on the 18th August and he was informed that only three shot guns had been carried for protection against wild animals, but even these guns had since been withdrawn.

3. The Indian Revenue Party left Barahoti on the 9th September. The Government of India have received information that immediately after the departure of the Indian Party, a Chinese Party carrying with them arms and ammunition entered the Barahoti area and camped there. They have been further informed that on the 26th September this Chinese Party was reinforced by another 25 fully armed military personnel.

4. The Government of India would, therefore, draw the attention of the Government of the People's Republic of China to the subsisting agreement on the question of sending troops or armed personnel into the Barahoti area. As early as August, 1955, Shri S. K. Roy of the Ministry of External Affairs had proposed to Counsellor Kang that the Barahoti area should be "neutralised" and that neither side should send officials or Army detachments to the area pending the conclusion of the joint efforts of the two Governments to find a solution of the Barahoti question. No reply to this proposal was received from the Chinese Government in 1955. In June 1956, the Assistant Foreign Minister of China handed over to the Indian Counsellor in Peking a memorandum suggesting, inter alia, that "both sides might refrain from sending troops into the Wu-Je area". In their aides memoires handed over to the Chinese Government both at Delhi and in Peking in October 1956, the Government of India agreed that both Governments should refrain from sending troops into the area. In February 1957, the Chinese Government confirmed that they would not send troops to the Hoti area "this year". Accordingly, the Government of India also instructed that their forces should not be sent to Barahoti during the year. No forces were, therefore, sent by either side during 1957.

5. At the beginning of the Delhi talks on Barahoti between Chinese and Indian delegations, on the 19th April, the Foreign Secretary to the Government of India proposed that "as last year neither side will send their forces to this particular area in asserting its right or supposed right while the matter is in dispute". On the Chinese side, the Ambassador accepted the proposal and said "I agree with the suggestion which Mr. Dutt has just made, viz., before the Wu-Je question is solved, both sides will not send troops there".

6. Subsequently, on the 8th August, Counsellor Fu Hao informed the Director of the Eastern Division that the Chinese interpretation of the agreement not to send any troops was that no person actually carrying arms should be sent to the area by either side. He also assured the Director that the Chinese Government had been faithful to their agreement and did not propose to send such armed personnel to Barahoti.

7. In view of this agreement between the two Governments not to send any armed personnel into the Barahoti area, the Government of India are surprised to receive the reports referred to in para. 3 of this note about the entry of armed Chinese personnel into the Barahoti area. The Director of the Eastern Division in the Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India, therefore, spoke to Mr. Yeh Cheng-Chang, Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi, on the matter on the 23rd October. He also mentioned that the Government of India had received information to the effect that the Chinese party had taken to Barahoti considerable building materials like lime, beam, timber etc. which seemed to indicate that the Chinese intended to construct permanent or semi-permanent structures in Barahoti. The Director pointed out that if the information was correct, then the action of the Chinese Government would amount to bringing about a change in the existing situation during the pendency of talks between the two Governments and mentioned that such unilateral action by either party was undesirable and contrary to the frank and friendly spirit of the talks.

8. Counsellor Yeh promised to have enquiries made and to let the Director know as soon as he obtained definite information on the subject. As no reply has yet been received from the Chinese Embassy, the present unofficial note is being handed over with the request that early confirmation on the points raised may be obtained from the Chinese Government by the Embassy and communicated to the Government of India.
9. There is also another information which has recently been received by the Government of India. There are two places called Lapthal (latitude 30°-44' N: longitude 80°-8'E) and Sangcha Malla (latitude 30°-47' N: longitude 80°-11'E) which are both on the Indian side of the Balcha Dhura Pass (latitude 30°-40' N: longitude 80°-12'E) which is considered as traditional boundary between India and China. These places have never before been claimed either by the Government of China or by the local authorities in the Tibet region of China. The Government of India have been maintaining Indian check-posts at these two places for several years. Due to climatic conditions these check-posts retire further south at the end of the summer months. The Government of India have been informed that when the check-posts retired as usual in October this year, Chinese personnel entered into Indian territory and established out-posts at both the places.

10. The Government of India trust that the information that they have received is incorrect and would request the Chinese Embassy to confirm the position immediately. In case the information is found to be correct, the Government of India would request the Government of the People's Republic of China to withdraw all personnel from Lapthal and Sangcha Malla. They would also request the Government of China to withdraw all armed personnel from the Barahoti area forthwith in pursuance of the subsisting agreement between the two Governments.
Informal note given by the Ministry of External Affairs to the Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy in India, 17 January 1959

Information has been received by the Government of India that a detachment of Chinese troops, consisting of one officer and approximately 50 men, crossed into Lohit Frontier Division of the North-East Frontier Agency of India on the 27th/28th September, 1958. The party camped inside the Indian border at a point approximately 28°-15'N: 97°-15'E and later left towards Tazung Dam which lies in Burma. It may also be mentioned that previously a smaller party had come into Dichu Valley in the same area in October 1957. This party started from Dolong and came as far down as Walong in the Lohit river basin.

2. The area visited by these parties clearly lies within the Indian border. The Indian frontier with the Tibet region is well recognised and clearly demarcated and it is possible that the Chinese parties which were engaged on survey work crossed into Indian territory by mistake.

3. In view of friendly relations existing between China and India and in accordance with the Five Principles agreed to between them for regulation of their mutual relations, the Government of India would request the Government of the People's Republic of China to issue suitable instructions to ensure that such transgressions into Indian territory do not recur in future.

New Delhi;
January 16, 1959.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China present their compliments to the Embassy of India in China and have the honour to state the following regarding the Indian troops’ intrusion and occupation of Migyitun, Samgar Sanpo and other places in the Tibetan region of China and their collusion with the Tibetan rebel bandits.

According to well-founded report received by the Chinese Government, the Migyitun area in the south eastern part of the Tibetan region of China was intruded, shelled (and) occupied by over 200 Indian troops. These Indian troops, equipped with radio stations and weapons of various types, were building military work around Migyitun. What is particularly serious, they even went to the length of entering into collusion with the Tibetan rebel bandits to carry out illegal activities.

At the same time the Chinese Government received the report that the area of Samgar Sanpo north east of Migyitun, and nearby Molo and Gyala, which are likewise part of the territory of the Tibetan region of China, were also intruded and occupied by Indian troops. The Indian troops who intruded into and occupied this area numbered several hundreds and they also entered into collusion with the local Tibetan rebel bandits to carry out illegal activities.

The Chinese Government must point out solemnly that the above-mentioned Migyitun, Samgar Sanpo and other places are indisputably territories always belonging to China. And the brazen intrusion and occupation of Chinese territory by batches of Indian troops numbering hundreds and their unscrupulous collusion with the traitorous Tibetan rebel bandits entrenched in those places in carrying out illegal activities hostile to the People’s Republic of China, constitute grave encroachments on China’s sovereignty and flagrant interference in China’s internal affairs and are completely against the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence jointly initiated by China and India and Sino-Indian friendly and good neighbourly relations. The Chinese Government solemnly express to the Indian Government the hope that the Indian Government may order immediate withdrawal from the above-mentioned places of all Indian armed forces intruding into and occupying Chinese territories so as to prevent further complications and aggravation of the situation. In view of Sino-Indian friendly relations, it is the belief of the Chinese Government that the Indian Government will appreciate the grave situation created by the above said illegal actions taken by the Indian troops and will adopt at once effective corresponding measures.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs would appreciate very much if the Embassy should speedily communicate the above to the Indian Government and give an early reply.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note of the Government of India, 26 June 1959

The Embassy of India present their compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to state that they communicated to the Government of India the text of the Ministry's note of the 23rd June 1959 immediately on receipt. They are now instructed by the Government of India to transmit the following reply.

2. The Government of India received with surprise the allegations in the Ministry's note that Indian troops had violated territory in the Tibet region of China near Migyitun and shelled and occupied this place. The Government of India made immediate enquiries into these allegations and are satisfied that there is no truth in them. These allegations must have been based on wrong information received by the Government of the People's Republic of China.

3. The Government of India have scrupulously observed the traditional border between India and the Tibet region of China along the entire Indo Chinese frontier. This traditional international frontier coincides with the so-called MacMahon Line. According to this line Migyitun is within Chinese territory in Tibet and so are Samgu Sampo, Molo and Gyala. The Government of India emphatically repudiate any suggestion that their forces violated the international frontier and occupied these places which are admittedly part of Chinese territory. The Government of India regret that the Government of the People's Republic of China should have believed the allegations that their forces could in any way be in collusion with Tibetan rebels. The Chinese Government are aware of the circumstances in which a large number of people from Tibet have sought refuge in Indian territory. The Government of India while giving refuge to these people in accordance with accepted international usage, made it clear to them that they could not use Indian territory for hostile action against China. The refugees were disarmed as soon as they entered Indian territory and those who wished to stay in India were moved south away from the frontier. The Government of India have scrupulously enforced these measures and there could be no question of their encouraging, far less acting in collusion with the refugees in violating Chinese territory. The Government of India have no information about any rebel activities in this area, and if there are any, they are in no way responsible for them.

4. The nearest outpost which the Government of India have in this area is at Long Ju. This is south of Migyitun and within the Indian side of the traditional international border. There is another outpost at Tamadem which is some miles south of Samga Sampo. Tamadem is locally recognised as the limit of the Indian territory. Both these outposts were established peacefully and there was no question of shelling or using force in establishing these outposts. The Government of India have respected and will always respect the traditional international frontier between India and the Tibet region of China, which, as stated above, coincides with the so-called Mac-Mahon Line. The Government of India agree that if by error the forces of one side are in occupation of any territory on the other side of the frontier, the error should be rectified by the party concerned.

5. The Government of India place great value on the maintenance of friendly and good neighbourly relations with China and stand firmly by the Five Principles of co-existence or Panch Sheel. They can only believe that the note of the Chinese Government must be based on wrong information received by them. The Government of India have already asked the officers in charge of their outposts in this area to place themselves in friendly contact with the Chinese officers on the other side and will be grateful if similar instructions are issued by the Chinese Government to the officers on their side of the frontier.

6. The Embassy of India renews to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Informal Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Chinese Counsellor in India, 24 July 1959

In accordance with our usual practice, survey operations will be carried out in the North-East frontier regions during the months of November 1959 to February 1960. Such survey involves both aerial as well as ground operations. Strict precautions will be observed so that pilots confine themselves to the Indian borders. Since the aircraft have to fly at a very high altitude, should by an error of judgment the boundary be transgressed, the Chinese Government may kindly raise no objection.

2. The Chinese authorities were good enough to inform the Government of India before conducting the survey of the Sino-Burmese and Indian borders in the winter of 1958 and the Government of India wish to do likewise.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs to the Counsellor of China in India, 30 July 1959

The Government of India have just received a report indicating the presence of a Chinese armed detachment in Indian territory in the region of Western Pangong Lake in the Ladakh area of the Jammu and Kashmir State.

On the 28th July at about 10-45 A.M. (IST) an Indian Police party engaged on reconnaissance within Indian territory came across a Chinese armed detachment of nearly 25 persons at a point approximately 33·39 N and 78·46 E. The Officer commanding of the Indian party along with five constables approached the Chinese party with a view to explain that the Chinese detachment had transgressed into Indian territory and that it should withdraw immediately beyond the international frontier. The Indian patrol party of six persons had still not reported to its headquarters by the evening of 29th July, 1959, and there is reason to believe that the Indian party has been taken into custody by the Chinese detachment. It is also reported that the Chinese detachment has established a camp at Spanggur 33·34 N and 78·48 E.

The places mentioned lie well within the Indian frontier as notified in official maps. In fact, on an earlier occasion, when information had been received of a Chinese patrol having visited Khurnak Fort, latitude 33·47 N longitude 79 E the Ministry had drawn attention of the Chinese Embassy to the violation of the Indian frontier in a note presented on the 2nd July 1958. In the same note, advance intimation of the intention of the Government of India to send a reconnaissance party to the Khurnak Fort had been conveyed to the Chinese Government.

The Government of India take a serious view of the violation of the Indian frontier and the establishment of a camp by the Chinese armed detachment on Indian territory. They also take serious exception to the Chinese action in arresting an Indian police party engaged on duties within the Indian frontier particularly after advance intimation had been given of their intention to send such a reconnaissance party. The Government of India lodge a strong protest against the violation of the Indian border and the arrest of the Indian party engaged in bonafide duties within Indian territory. The authorities of the Chinese People's Republic are requested to order immediate steps for the release of the six Indian police personnel so apprehended and the complete vacation of the Indian territory by the Chinese armed detachment. They are also requested to take necessary action to prevent repetition of similar incidents in future.
Note given by the Foreign Office of China to the Counsellor of India,
6 August 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and has the honour to acknowledge receipt of the late Note handed over on 30th July 1959 to Counsellor Yeh Cheng-Chang of the Chinese Embassy in India by Mr. K. L. Mehta of the Ministry of External Affairs of India and states in reply as follows:

According to reports received by the Chinese Government at 1300 hours Peking time on 28th July 1959, 6 Indian armed personnel were suddenly discovered to have intruded into Chinese territory without any permission from the Chinese authorities by Chinese frontier guard patrolling on Chinese soil west of Digra and south of Pangong Tso in the western part of the Tibetan region of China. In view of friendly relations between China and India the Chinese frontier guards thereupon advised in a friendly manner the above mentioned intruding Indian armed personnel to withdraw at once from Chinese territory. But the said Indian armed personnel did not heed to the above mentioned warning of the Chinese frontier guards and persisted in armed violation of the Chinese frontier. Under these circumstances the Chinese frontier guards in order to safeguard their territory against infiltration could not but deal with these as a case of unlawful intrusion and have the Indian personnel detained and disarmed.

The Chinese Government wishes to point out solemnly that the area intruded by the above mentioned Indian armed personnel is undoubtedly Chinese territory. The Chinese frontier guards stationed and patrolling in that area have not overstepped the Sino-Indian boundary line there. In its Note however the Government of India described the above mentioned area and Spanggur and Khurnak Fort to its east both within the Chinese borders as Indian territory and asserted that Chinese armed forces had violated the Indian frontier. The Chinese Government cannot but be greatly surprised and express its regret at these assertions which are inconsistent with the facts and of course it cannot accept the protest lodged by the Government of India.

The Chinese Government must point out that the unlawful intrusion of the above mentioned Indian armed personnel into Chinese territory is in serious contravention of Sino-Indian friendship and the five principles of peaceful co-existence. Regarding this the Chinese Government cannot but lodge a protest with the Government of India and demand that it immediately takes effective measures to prevent recurrence of similar incidents.

Out of friendly considerations the Chinese Government has instructed its frontier guards to deport the above mentioned Indian armed personnel who had unlawfully intruded into Chinese territory together with their weapons and other equipments at the original spot in the immediate future.

The Ministry of External Affairs of People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given to the Foreign Office of China by the Ambassador of India, 11 August 1959

On 7th August armed Chinese patrol strength approximately 200 committed violation of our border at Khinzemane longitude 91°46' E latitude 27°46' N. When encountered by our own patrol who requested the Chinese patrol to withdraw to their territory, our patrol was pushed back to the bridge at Drokung Samba longitude 91°47' E latitude 27°46' N. These places are admittedly within Indian territory and we have been in continuous possession of it. Traditionally as well as according to Treaty Map the boundary runs along Tntagla Ridge north of Mankha Chuthangmu valley and this position has been accepted in the past.

2. Our security forces have instructions to resist trespassers and to use minimum force necessary for this purpose if warning given by them remains unheeded. Request that if any Chinese troops are still within Indian territory, they should be immediately withdrawn as otherwise this may lead to avoidable clash.
Note given by the Embassy of India to the Foreign Office of China, 13 August 1959

The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China and with reference to their note presented on the 6th August, has the honour to state as follows:

2. The Government of India are surprised by the statement in the note that the area where the Indian personnel were apprehended is part of Chinese territory. This claim is unfounded. In fact the traditional international frontier in this sector follows well defined geographical features and has been clearly depicted and openly notified in Government of India maps. For convenience of reference the boundary is described below in detail:

"Between Lanak La (34° 24' N and 79° 34' E) and Chang La (32° 2' N and 79° 22' E) in the Ladakh region of the State of Jammu and Kashmir the international boundary follows the eastern and southern watershed of the Chang Chemmo and southern watershed of Chumesang and thence the southern bank of Chumesang and the eastern bank of Changlung Lungpa. Skirting the western extremity of the eastern half of Pangong Tso (called Yaerhmu in Chinese maps) the boundary thence follows the Ang watershed and cutting across Spanggur Tso, follows the northeastern and northern watershed of the Indus".

3. When the Chinese armed personnel intruded in this area in the region of the Khurnak Fort the Government of India lodged a protest with the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi in a note presented on 2nd July 1958. The Government of India's reconnaissance parties carry strict instructions not to cross over into Chinese territory. In this case the party apprehended was about 10 miles within Indian territory.

4. The Government of India express their satisfaction at the instructions issued for the release of the Indian party. They however reiterate their protest at the arrest of the party within Indian territory. Further, they are informed that the Chinese authorities have established a camp at Spanggur which also lies well within the Indian territory. The Government of India would ask for the immediate withdrawal of this party from Indian territory and urge that steps be taken against similar violation of the international border in future. Such incidents may result in an armed clash which would be contrary to the friendly relations subsisting between the two countries and the tradition of amity which has prevailed all along this frontier.

5. The Embassy of India avails itself of this opportunity to express to the Foreign Office of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Foreign Office of China to the Counsellor of India, 27 August 1959

According to an urgent report received by the Chinese Government from frontier guards in Tibet, around 0600 hours on 25th August 1959, a group of Indian armed troops intruded into Chinese territory south of Migyiton and suddenly opened fire on Chinese frontier guards stationed at Migyiton discharging dozens of rounds of machine-gun and rifle shots. After the Chinese frontier guards fired back in self-defence the above armed troops withdrew from that area.

The Chinese Government hereby lodges a serious protest with the Government of India against the above mentioned grave provocation by the Indian troops in openly violating Chinese territory and directing unwarranted armed attack on Chinese troops. In the interest of preserving peace and tranquility in the border areas of the two countries the Chinese Government strongly demands that the Government of India immediately adopts effective measures to prevent any renewal of violation of Chinese territory and armed provocation by Indian troops otherwise the Indian side must be held responsible for all the serious consequences arising therefrom.
Note given to the Foreign Office of China by the Indian Ambassador, 28 August 1959

The Government of India have recently brought to the notice of the Chinese Government a number of instances in which Chinese troops have violated the international frontier and trespassed into Indian territory. On the 11th August the Chinese Government were informed of a violation of the border at Khinzemane and on 13th August detailed information was provided about Chinese intrusion in the Spanggur region. No replies have been received so far to these notes.

2. Another serious instance of violation of the Indian border and unlawful trespass into Indian territory by Chinese forces has just been brought to the notice of the Government of India. On the 25th August a strong Chinese detachment crossed into Indian territory south of Migyitun on the NEFA border and fired without notice on an Indian forward picket. They arrested the entire picket which was twelve strong but eight Indian personnel somehow managed to escape. Thereafter the Chinese detachment outflanked the Indian outpost at Longju and opened fire on it from a distance of about 800 yards. Their object clearly was to overpower our outpost which was well within our territory about two miles south of the international border. There could be no doubt about the international frontier in this area and this is a case of deliberate aggression on Indian territory. The Government of India take very serious notice of this latest incident which, as we have said above, is one of a number in recent weeks.

3. The Government of India strongly protest against these repeated violations of Indian territory by Chinese armed forces. Until now Government have observed discreet reticence about these incidents although there is a good deal of concern among the Indian public and in Parliament about the security arrangements on India's northern frontier. The Government of India would urge once more that the Chinese authorities should issue immediate instructions to all their frontier forces not to violate Indian territory. The Government of India have issued instructions to their frontier posts to maintain their territorial integrity and use force on the trespassers if necessary. It occurs to them that all this show of force is entirely uncalled for. If the Chinese Government have any dispute about any point on the international frontier, it should be possible to resolve the dispute by negotiations between two friendly governments rather than by the unilateral application of force by one side against the other. The Government of India strongly urge the Chinese Government to adopt this peaceful approach. It is possible that the Central Government of China is not aware of the illegal activities of their forces in the region of the international frontier. The Government of India suggest that they should issue immediate instructions to all concerned against the use of force in assertion of supposed claims.
4. The Government of India are now informed that on the 26th August Chinese forces encircled the post at Longju and opened heavy fire on it. Our personnel had therefore to abandon the post. We have no exact information as to their whereabouts. This is a very serious matter which is bound to rouse popular feelings in India. The Government of India reiterate once more their emphatic protest against the enforcement of claims by the unilateral application of force. The question of Chinese claim to Indian frontier areas as indicated in official Chinese maps was dealt with in detail by the Prime Minister in his letter of the 22nd March 1959 to the Chinese Prime Minister. The Prime Minister agreed “that the position as it was before the recent disputes arose should be respected by both sides and neither side should try to take unilateral action in exercise of what it conceives to be its right. Further, if any possession has been secured recently, the position should be rectified”. The Prime Minister has not yet received any reply to this letter. The Government of India reiterate the suggestion and urge that the Chinese troops withdraw immediately from the area at Longju which they have forcibly occupied.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs to the Counsellor of China in India, 21 August 1958

The attention of the Government of India has been drawn to a map of China published on pages 20-21 of the "China Pictorial" magazine (No. 95—July 1958) in which the borders of China have been indicated by a thick brown line. Though this map is on a small scale, there are clear inaccuracies in it insofar as China's border with India is concerned. The border as depicted in the map includes as Chinese territory (i) four of the five Divisions of India's North East Frontier Agency; (ii) some areas in the north of the State of Uttar Pradesh; and (iii) large areas in eastern Ladakh which form part of the State of Jammu and Kashmir. It appears that the entire Tashi-gang area of Eastern Bhutan and a considerable slice of territory in north-west Bhutan have also been included as Chinese territory.

2. In the past, similar inaccurate maps have been published in China. The matter was referred to His Excellency Premier Chou En-lai by His Excellency the Prime Minister of India when the latter visited China in October 1954. His Excellency Chou En-lai had at that time replied that current Chinese maps were based on old maps and that the Government of the People's Republic of China had had no time to correct them. The Government of India recognised the force of this statement. Since, however, the present Government of the People's Republic of China has now been in office for so many years and new maps are being repeatedly printed and published in China, the Government of India would suggest that necessary corrections in the Chinese maps should not be delayed further. In this particular case, the map has been published in a magazine, which is printed in an official press and is distributed by an official agency.

3. The Government of India are, therefore, drawing the attention of the Government of the People's Republic of China again to this matter. They trust that the necessary corrections will be made soon. The northern boundary of India is clearly shown in the Political Map of India—3rd edition, 1956 (scale—one inch to seventy miles), which is freely available on sale. The Government of India will be happy to supply a copy of this map to the Government of the People's Republic of China.
Reference the memorandum of the Indian Government, dated August 21, 1958, on the rough sketch map showing "the development of railways and trunk roads in China during the First Five-Year Plan period" published in the "China Pictorial" (July issue, 1954), the Chinese Government wishes to make the following statement:

2. In the maps currently published in China, the boundary line between China and its neighbouring countries, including India, is drawn on the basis of maps published in China before the liberation. This was made clear to His Excellency Prime Minister Nehru by Prime Minister Chou En-lai, when the former visited China in October 1954. Premier Chou En-lai explained then to His Excellency Prime Minister Nehru that the reason why the boundary in Chinese maps is drawn according to old maps is that the Chinese Government has not yet undertaken a survey of China's boundary, nor consulted with the countries concerned, and that it will not make changes in the boundary on its own. The Chinese Government notes with satisfaction that the Indian Government recognises the force of Premier Chou En-lai's statement on this matter.

3. The Chinese Government believes that with the elapse of time, and after consultations with the various neighbouring countries and a survey of the border regions, a new way of drawing the boundary of China will be decided on in accordance with the results of the consultations and the survey.
Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China, 14 December 1958

NEW DELHI,
December 14, 1958.

HIS EXCELLENCY,
Mr. CHOU EN-LAI,
Prime Minister of the People's Republic of China,
Peking.

MY DEAR PRIME MINISTER,

I am writing to you after a long time. We have watched with great interest and admiration the progress made by the People's Government of China in recent years. In particular, we have been deeply interested in the remarkable advance in the yield of rice per hectare as well as in the total yield, as also in the great increase in production of pig iron and steel.

2. As we are faced with somewhat similar problems in our country in regard to rice production and steel manufacture, we would naturally like to benefit by the example of what China has done. For this purpose we decided to send two delegations to China, one consisting of farmers and agricultural specialists and the other of experts in iron and steel. Your Government was good enough to agree to this. It was pointed out however that the next season for rice sowing and cultivation would be in March-April next. We hope to send our farmers and agricultural experts then, if it suits the convenience of your Government. But we shall be sending our iron and steel experts to China fairly soon. I hope that they will learn much from the methods being now employed in China and we could then profit by their experience.

3. My purpose in troubling you with this letter, however, relates to another matter. This is in regard to the border between India and China. You will remember that when the Sino-Indian Agreement in regard to the Tibet region of China was concluded, various outstanding problems, including some relating to our border trade, were considered. A number of mountain passes were mentioned which should be used for purposes of travel between the two countries. No border questions were raised at that time and we were under the impression that there were no border disputes between our respective countries. In fact we thought that the Sino-Indian Agreement, which was happily concluded in 1954, had settled all outstanding problems between our two countries.

4. Somewhat later, my attention was drawn to some maps published in China. The maps I saw were not very accurate maps, but nevertheless the frontier as roughly drawn in these maps did not correspond with the actual frontier. In fact it ran right across the territory of India in several places. I was surprised to see this, as I had not been aware at any time previously that there was any frontier dispute between our two countries. No mention of this had been made in the course of the Sino-Indian talks which resulted in the Agreement of 1954.

5. Subsequently, in October 1954, I had the privilege of visiting your great country and the happiness to meet you and other leaders of the Chinese People's Republic. We had long talks and it was a pleasure to me to find that we had a great deal in common in our approach and that there was no dispute or problem affecting our relations. In the course of our talks I briefly mentioned to you that I had seen some maps recently published in China which gave a wrong borderline between the two countries. I presumed that this was by some error and told you at the time that so far as India was concerned we were not much worried about the matter because our boundaries were quite clear and were not a matter of argument. You were good enough to reply to me that these maps were really reproductions of old pre-liberation maps and that you had had no time to revise them. In view of the many and heavy pre-occupations of your Government, I could understand that this revision had not taken place till then. I expressed the hope that the borderline would be corrected before long.

6. Towards the end of 1956, you did us the honour of paying a visit to India and we had the pleasure of having you in our midst for many days. Part of this time you spent in visiting various parts of India. I had occasion to be with you both in Delhi and during some of your visits, notably to our great river valley project at Bhakra-Nangal. We had long talks and discussed many international issues which were then agitating people's minds and I was happy to know what your views were about them. In the course of these talks you referred to the Sino-Burmese border. You told me about the talks you had with U Nu at Peking and your desire to settle this problem with the Burmese Government. I had received the same information from U Nu who had told me of your wish to settle this problem to the satisfaction of both countries. It was in this connection that you mentioned to me the Sino-Indian border, and more especially the so-called MacMahon Line. This MacMahon Line covered a part of the Sino-Burmese border and a large part of the Chinese border with India. I remember your telling me that you did not approve of this border being called the MacMahon Line and I replied that I did not like that name either. But for facility of reference we referred to it as such.

7. You told me then that you had accepted this MacMahon Line border with Burma and, whatever might have happened long ago, in view of the friendly relations which existed between China and India, you proposed to recognise this border with India also. You added that you would like to consult the authorities of the Tibetan region of China and you proposed to do so.

8. Immediately after our talk, I had written a minute so that we might have a record of this talk for our personal and confidential use. I am giving below a quotation from this minute:

"Premier Chou referred to the MacMahon Line and again said that he had never heard of this before though of course the then Chinese Government had dealt with this matter and not accepted that line. He had gone into this matter in connection with the border dispute with Burma. Although he thought that this line, established by British Imperialists, was not fair, nevertheless, because it was an accomplished fact and because of the friendly relations which existed between China and the countries concerned, namely, India and Burma, the Chinese Government were of the opinion that they should give recognition to this MacMahon Line. They had, however, not consulted the Tibetan authorities about it yet. They proposed to do so."

9. I remember discussing this matter with you at some considerable length. You were good enough to make this point quite clear. I then mentioned that there were no disputes between us about our frontier, but there were certain very minor border problems which were pending settlement. We decided that these petty issues should be settled amicably by representatives of the two Governments meeting together on the basis of established practice and custom as well as water sheds. There was long delay in this meeting taking place, but ultimately a representative of the Chinese Government came to Delhi and discussed one of these petty issues for some time. Unfortunately no settlement about this matter was arrived at then and it was decided to continue the talks later. I was sorry that these talks had not resulted in a satisfactory agreement so far. The issue is a minor one and I wanted to remove by friendly settlement all matters that affected our two Governments and countries. I had thought then of writing to you on this subject, but I decided not to trouble you over such a petty matter.

10. A few months ago, our attention was drawn again to a map of China published in the magazine "China Pictorial", which indicated the border with India. This map was also not very clearly defined. But even the rough borderline appeared to us to be wrongly placed. This borderline went right across Indian territory. A large part of our North-East Frontier Agency as well as some other parts which are and have long been well recognised as parts of India and been administered by India in the same way as other parts of our country, were shown to be part of Chinese territory. A considerable region of our neighbour country, Bhutan, in the north-east was also shown as being on the Chinese side. A part of the North-East Frontier Agency which was clearly on the Indian side of what has been known as the MacMahon Line, was shown in this map as part of Chinese territory.

11. The magazine containing this map was widely distributed and questions were asked in our Parliament about this. I gave answers to the effect that these maps were merely reproductions of old ones and did not represent the actual facts of the situation.

12. We drew your Government's attention to this map some time ago this year. In a memorandum in reply to us, it has been stated by your Government that in the maps currently published in China, the boundary line between China and neighbouring countries including India, is drawn on the basis of maps published before the liberation. It has further been stated that the Chinese Government has not yet undertaken a survey of the Chinese boundary nor consulted with the countries concerned, and that it will not make changes in the boundary on its own.

13. I was puzzled by this reply because I thought that there was no major boundary dispute between China and India. There never has been such a dispute so far as we are concerned and in my talks with you in 1954 and subsequently, I had stated this. I could understand four years ago that the Chinese Government, being busy with major matters of national reconstruction, could not find time to revise old maps. But you will appreciate that nine years after the Chinese People’s Republic came into power, the continued issue of these incorrect maps is embarrassing to us as to others. There can be no question of these large parts of India being anything but India and there is no dispute about them. I do not know what kind of surveys can affect these well-known and fixed boundaries. I am sure that you will appreciate our difficulties in this matter.

14. I am venturing to write to you on this subject as I feel that any possibility of grave misunderstanding between our countries should be removed as soon as possible. I am anxious, as I am sure you are, that the firm basis of our friendship should not only be maintained but should be strengthened.

May I send you my warm regards and every good wish for the New Year.

Yours sincerely,
(Sd.) JAWAHARLAL NEHRU
Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

I have received your letter dated December 14, 1958, forwarded by Mr. Ambassador Parthasarathi.

Thank you for the credit you gave the achievements of our country in economic construction. It is true that, through the joint efforts of the entire Chinese people, our country made in industrial and agricultural production in 1958 an advance which we describe as a "great leap forward". However, as we started from a very poor economic foundation, our present level of development in production is still very low. It will take us a number of years more of hard work in order to bring about a relatively big change in the economic picture of our country.

Our government heartily welcomes the sending by the Indian Government of two delegations to study our agriculture and iron and steel industry respectively. And as I understand, another delegation has already arrived in China to study our water conservancy and irrigation work. We welcome them to our country and will be glad to provide them with every possible convenience. We also hope to learn from them Indian experience in the respective fields. The exchange of such specialized delegations and the interflow of experience will undoubtedly be helpful to the economic construction of our countries. We too have always taken a great interest in the progress of India's second five-year plan, and wish it success.

We note with pleasure that, in the past year, friendly cooperation between China and India has undergone further development. I would like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the Chinese Government, to express thanks to the Indian Government for its efforts at the 13th session of the United Nations General Assembly for restoring to China its rightful place in the United Nations. We are also grateful to the Indian Government for its support to our country on the question of Taiwan and the coastal islands.

In your letter you have taken much space to discuss the question of Sino-Indian boundary and thus enabled us to understand better the Indian Government's stand on the question. I would also like now to set forth the views and stand of the Chinese Government.

First of all, I wish to point out that the Sino-Indian boundary has never been formally delimited. Historically no treaty or agreement on the Sino-Indian boundary has ever been concluded between the Chinese central government and the Indian Government. So far as the actual situation is concerned, there are certain differences between the two sides over the border question. In the past few years, questions as to which side certain areas on the Sino-Indian border belong were on more than one occasion taken up between the Chinese and the Indian sides through diplomatic channels. The latest case concerns an area in the southern part of China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, which has always been under Chinese jurisdiction. Patrol duties have continually been carried out in that area by the border guards of the Chinese Government. And the Sinkiang-Tibet highway built by our country in 1956 runs through that area. Yet recently the Indian Government claimed that that area was Indian territory. All this shows that border disputes do exist between China and India.

It was true that the border question was not raised in 1954 when negotiations were being held between the Chinese and Indian sides for the Agreement on Trade and Intercourse between the Tibet Region of China and India. This was because conditions were not yet ripe for its settlement and the Chinese side, on its part, had had no time to study the question. The Chinese Government has always held that the existence of the border question absolutely should not affect the development of Sino-Indian friendly relations. We believe that, following proper preparations, this question which has been carried over from the past can certainly be settled reasonably on the basis of the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence through friendly talks. To this end, the Chinese Government has now proceeded to take certain steps in making preparations.

An important question concerning the Sino-Indian boundary is the question of the so-called MacMahon Line. I discussed this with Your Excellency as well as with Prime Minister U Nu. I would now like to explain again the Chinese Government's attitude. As you are aware, the "MacMahon Line" was a product of the British policy of aggression against the Tibet Region of China and aroused the great indignation of the Chinese people. Juridically, too, it cannot be considered legal. I have told you that it has never been recognized by the Chinese central government. Although related documents were signed by a representative of the local authorities of the Tibet Region of China, the Tibet local authorities were in fact dissatisfied with this unilaterally drawn line. And I have also told you formally about their dissatisfaction. On the other hand, one cannot, of course, fail to take cognizance of the great and encouraging changes: India and Burma, which are concerned in this line, have attained independence successively and become states friendly with China. In view of the various complex factors mentioned above, the Chinese Government, on the one hand finds it necessary to take a more or less realistic attitude towards the MacMahon Line and, on the other hand, cannot but act with prudence and needs time to deal with this matter. All this I have mentioned to you on more than one occasion. However, we believe that, on account of the friendly relations between China and India, a friendly settlement can eventually be found for this section of the boundary line.

Precisely because the boundary between the two countries is not yet formally delimited and some differences exist, it is unavoidable that there should be discrepancies between the boundary lines drawn on the respective maps of the two sides. On the maps currently published in our country, the Chinese boundaries are drawn in the way consistently followed in Chinese maps for the past several decades, if not longer. We do not hold that every portion of this boundary line is drawn on sufficient grounds. But it would be inappropriate for us to make changes without having made surveys and without having consulted the countries concerned. Furthermore, there would be difficulties in making such changes, because they would give rise to confusion among our people and bring censure on our government. As a matter of fact, our people have also expressed surprise at the way the Sino-Indian boundary, particularly its western section, is drawn on maps published in India. They have asked our government to take up this matter with the Indian Government. Yet we have not done so, but have explained to them the actual situation of the Sino-Indian boundary. With the settlement of the boundary question—which, as our government has repeatedly pointed out, requires surveys and mutual consultations—the problem of drawing the boundary on the maps will also be solved.

In recent years, there occurred between China and India some minor border incidents which are probably difficult to avoid pending the formal delimitation of the boundary. In order to avoid such incidents so far as possible before the boundary is formally delimited, our government would like to propose to the Indian Government that, as a provisional measure, the two sides temporarily maintain the status quo, that is to say, each side keep for the time being to the border areas at present under its jurisdiction and not go beyond them. For the differences between the two sides, naturally, a solution may be sought through consultations like those held on the Wu-Je (Hoti) question. As to the negotiations regarding Wu-Je, we also regret very much that no agreement has yet been reached, as we formerly thought a solution would not be difficult to achieve through negotiations and on-the-spot investigations. We still believe that this small question can be settled satisfactorily through the continued efforts of our two sides. The Chinese Government hopes that the above proposal about temporary maintenance of the present state of the boundary between the two sides will be approved of by the Indian Government.

I need not reiterate how highly the Chinese Government and people value Sino-Indian friendship. We will never allow any difference between our two countries to affect this friendship, and we believe that India shares the same views. I hope that this letter will help you get a better understanding of our government’s stand on the Sino-Indian boundary question.

With sincere regards,

(Sd.) CHOU EN-LAI,
Premier of the State Council of the People’s Republic of China.
NEW DELHI,
22nd March, 1959.

DEAR MR. PRIME MINISTER,

Many thanks for your letter of the 23rd January which I have read with the care and attention which it deserves.

2. I am grateful to you for the facilities which your Government accorded to our small delegation which visited China to study your water conservancy methods and programme. Two more delegations—one to study methods for improving agricultural yield and the other to study your iron and steel programme—will shortly be reaching China. I have no doubt that they will benefit from this opportunity of studying the remarkable progress which your country has achieved in these fields.

3. We were glad to receive Mr. Chang Han Fu in India and I do hope that his brief visit was enjoyable and enabled him to see something of our own efforts to develop our national resources. I entirely agree with you that such exchange of visits on both sides can be of great help in resolving the somewhat similar problems which face our respective countries in their endeavour to quicken the rate of our economic progress.

4. On receipt of your letter I have again examined the basis of the determination of the frontier between India and the Tibet Region of China. It is true that this frontier has not been demarcated on the ground in all the sectors but I am somewhat surprised to know that this frontier was not accepted at any time by the Government of China. The traditional frontier, as you may be aware, follows the geographical principle of watershed on the crest of the High Himalayan Range, but apart from this, in most parts, it has the sanction of specific international agreements between the then Governments of India and the Central Government of China. It may perhaps be useful if I draw your attention to some of these agreements:

(i) Sikkim.—The boundary of Sikkim, a protectorate of India, with the Tibet Region of China was defined in the Anglo-Chinese Convention 1890 and jointly demarcated on the ground in 1895.

this boundary was sufficiently and distinctly fixed. The area now claimed by China has always been depicted as part of India on official maps, has been surveyed by Indian officials and even a Chinese map of 1893 shows it as Indian territory.

(iii) The MacMahon Line.—As you are aware, the so-called MacMahon Line runs eastwards from the eastern borders of Bhutan and defines the boundary of China on the one hand and India and Burma on the other. Contrary to what has been reported to you, this line was, in fact, drawn at a Tripartite Conference held at Simla in 1913-1914 between the Plenipotentiaries of the Governments of China, Tibet and India. At the time of acceptance of the delineation of this frontier, Lünchen Shatra, the Tibetan Plenipotentiary, in letters exchanged, stated explicitly that he had received orders from Lhasa to agree to the boundary as marked on the map appended to the Convention. The line was drawn after full discussion and was confirmed subsequently by a formal exchange of letters; and there is nothing to indicate that the Tibetan authorities were in any way dissatisfied with the agreed boundary. Morever, although the Chinese Plenipotentiary at the Conference objected to the boundaries between Inner and Outer Tibet and between Tibet and China, there is no mention of any Chinese reservation in respect of the India-Tibet frontier either during the discussions or at the time of their initialling the Convention. This line has the incidental advantage of running along the crest of the High Himalayan Range which forms the natural dividing line between the Tibetan plateau in the north and the sub-montane region in the south. In our previous discussions and particularly during your visit to India in January 1957, we were gratified to note that you were prepared to accept this line as representing the frontier between China and India in this region and I hope that we shall reach an understanding on this basis.

5. Thus, in these three different sectors covering much the larger part of our boundary with China, there is sufficient authority based on geography, tradition as well as treaties for the boundary as shown in our published maps. The remaining sector from the tri-junction of the Nepal, India and Tibet boundary up to Ladakh is also traditional and follows well-defined geographical features. Here, too, the boundary runs along well-defined watersheds between the river systems in the south and the west on the one hand and north and east on the other. This delineation is confirmed by old revenue records and maps and by the exercise of Indian administrative authority up to the boundary line for decades.

6. As regards Barahoti (which you call Wu-Je), I agree with you that its rightful ownership should be settled by negotiation. During the talks held last year, we provided extensive documentary proofs that this area has been under Indian jurisdiction and lies well within our frontiers. An on-the-spot investigation could hardly throw any useful light until proofs to the contrary could be adduced. Nevertheless, we were agreeable to both sides agreeing not to send their civil and military officials to the area. Unfortunately, your delegation did not agree to our suggestion. I learn that a material change in the situation has since been effected by the despatch of Chinese civil and military detachments, equipped with arms, to camp in the area, after our own civil party had withdrawn at the beginning of last winter. If the reports that we have received about an armed Chinese party camping and erecting permanent structures in Hoti during winter are correct, it would seem that unilateral action, not in accordance with custom, was being taken in assertion of your claim to the disputed area.

7. I do hope that a study of the foregoing paragraphs will convince you that not only is the delineation of our frontier, as published in our maps, based on natural and geographical features but that it also coincides with tradition and over a large part is confirmed by international agreements. I need hardly add that independent India would be the last country to make any encroachments beyond its well-established frontiers. It was in the confidence that the general question of our common frontier was settled to the satisfaction of both sides that I declared publicly and in Parliament on several occasions that there is no room for doubt about our frontiers as shown in the published maps. We thought that our position was clearly understood and accepted by your Government. However, as unfortunately there is some difference of views between our two Governments in regard to the delineation of the frontier at some places, I agree that the position as it was before the recent disputes arose should be respected by both sides and that neither side should try to take unilateral action in exercise of what it conceives to be its right.
Further, if any possession has been secured recently, the position should be rectified.

8. You will appreciate that the continuing publication of Chinese maps showing considerable parts of Indian and Bhutanese territory as if they were in China is not in accordance with long established usage as well as treaties, and is a matter of great concern to us. As I said in my previous letter, we greatly value our friendship with China. Our two countries evolved the principles of Panch Sheel which has now found widespread acceptance among the other countries in the world. It would be most unfortunate if these frontier questions should now affect the friendly relations existing between our countries. I hope therefore that an early understanding in this matter will be reached.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) JAWAHARLAL NEHRU.
Note Verbale handed by the Ministry of External Affairs to the First Secretary of the Chinese Embassy in India on 17 December 1958.

The Government of India have received a number of reports of flights of foreign aircraft over Indian territory during October and November 1958. The details of these flights are given in the attached statement. As the planes in question were flying at a great height, it was not possible to establish their definite identity, but the direction of the flights clearly indicated that they were Chinese aircraft coming from the Tibet region of China.

2. In view of the friendly relations between India and China and the mutual dedication to the principles of Panch Sheel, the Government of India cannot but believe that such violations of the air space over India must be accidental.

3. The Government of India, however, earnestly hope that the Government of the People's Republic of China will take early steps to ensure that such violations do not recur in future.

Statement of unauthorised flight of Chinese Aircraft over Indian Territories

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Time of flight</th>
<th>Place</th>
<th>Direction of flight</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>29-10-58</td>
<td>10-30 a.m. to</td>
<td>Spiti Valley (Punjab)</td>
<td>Came from Western Tibet side and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>10-45 a.m.</td>
<td></td>
<td>Himachal Pradesh.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>returned towards Gartok (W. Tibet).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29-10-58</td>
<td>11-30 a.m.</td>
<td>Chini (Himachal Pradesh).</td>
<td>North and North East.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30-10-58</td>
<td>12-00 noon</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31-10-58</td>
<td>09-00 a.m.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1-11-58</td>
<td>09-30 a.m.</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

New Delhi,

16 December 1958.

58
Note of the Chinese Government given to the Counsellor of India, 12 January 1959.

The Government of the People's Republic of China has received the note verbale handed over by the Ministry of External Affairs of India to the Chinese Embassy in India on December 16, 1958. The Indian Government stated in the note verbale that flights of foreign aircraft over Indian territory occurred during October and November 1958, that it did not know the nationality of those aircraft but that it was of the opinion that they were Chinese aircraft coming from the Tibet Region of China judging from the direction of the flights.

Investigations have been carried out by the Chinese Government on the basis of the data regarding time and place provided by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in the annex to its note verbale, and it has been established that no flights of Chinese aircraft over Indian territory ever occurred at the specified times and places. As a matter of fact, no flight of Chinese aircraft took place over the western border area of the Tibet Region of China at the said times. The Chinese Government is devoted unswervingly to the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence and has on this basis made untiring efforts for the promotion of friendly relations between China and India. The Indian Government may rest assured that the Chinese Government definitely would not permit its aircraft to fly into the air space of its friendly neighbours without the consent of the government concerned.

At the same time, the Chinese Government would like to inform the Indian Government of the following facts: During 1958, particularly during October and November 1958, the Chinese Government repeatedly received reports to the effect that foreign aircraft intruding into Chinese air space were observed at Gargunsa, Gartok, Gyanima and other places in the western part of the Tibet Region of China. Some of these aircraft flew from the direction of India while others flew towards India. Foreign aircraft intruding into Chinese air space were also discovered in other parts of the Tibet Region of China, in the area of Yatung, Phari and Gyantse and in the vicinity of Chayul. The Chinese border troops were not able to identify the nationality of these planes; however, considering the direction of their flights and the fact that the places where they appeared are close to India, the Chinese Government, in the spirit of friendship and cooperation between China and India, would like to draw the attention of the Indian Government to the above-mentioned circumstances. If these are Indian planes, it is hoped that the Indian Government would take necessary measures to prevent recurrence of such incidents. If these are not Indian planes, it is also hoped that these incidents would arouse the common vigilance of the Indian Government as well as the Chinese Government.
Note given by the Foreign Office of China to the Counsellor of India, 10 July 1958.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China and has the honour to state as follows regarding the exigency of the stepped up subversive and disruptive activities against China's Tibetan region carried out by the U.S. and the Chiang Kai-Shek clique in collusion with fugitive reactionaries from Tibet using India's Kalimpong as a base.

Since the peaceful liberation of the Tibetan region of China, reactionaries who have fled from Tibet to the Kalimpong area have been carrying on subversive and disruptive activities against China's Tibetan region under the instigation and direction of the U.S. and the Chiang Kai-Shek clique and in collusion with local reactionaries in Kalimpong. On visit in India at the end of 1956 Premier Chou En-Lai called the attention of the Government of India and His Excellency the Prime Minister Nehru to this question. His Excellency the Prime Minister Nehru indicated at the time that if the Chinese Government could produce evidence in this regard, the Government of India would take action. Later, on 12th January 1958 Premier Chou En-Lai referred again to this question in an interview with Ambassador R. K. Nehru. On 22nd January 1958 the Ministry of Foreign Affairs delivered to the Indian Embassy in China samples of a reactionary propaganda leaflet sent to Tibet from Kalimpong, which it had collected.

According to reliable material available to the Chinese Government the American Chiang Kai-Shek clique and local special agents and Tibetan reactionaries operating in Kalimpong have recently stepped up their conspiratorial and disruptive activities against the Tibet region of China. Using Kalimpong as a base they are actively inciting and organising a handful of reactionaries hidden in Tibet for an armed revolt there in order to attain the traitorous aim of separating the Tibet region from the People's Republic of China. The Chinese Government would like hereby to convey to the Government of India certain information concerning the activities of the above said special agents and reactionaries in Kalimpong as follows:

(1) Chief among Tibetan reactionary elements who have fled China are Gyalodenju, Shakapa, Losangjanzan, Thubten Nobo, Alohrze and Lukaniona. In collusion with American-Chiang Kai-Shek clique and local special agents in Kalimpong they frequently hold meetings in Kalimpong and other Indian cities to plan disruptive activities against Tibet. Gyalodenju has been to the U.S. in 1951. At the instance of the U.S. Thubten Nobo made a special trip from the U.S. to India in the winter of 1956 to take part in the conspiratorial moves of the other Tibetan reactionaries.
(2) Under the manipulation of Gyalodenju and others, various reactionary organisations have been set up in Kalimpong under such names as "Tibetan Freedom League", "Kalimpong Tibetan Welfare Conference" and "Buddhist Association". These organisations are used for collecting intelligence from Tibet carrying out reactionary propaganda against Tibet and expanding the reactionary forces, etc.

(3) There is openly published in Kalimpong the "Tibetan Mirror" a reactionary newspaper hostile to the Chinese Government and people. The Tibetan reactionaries and the organisations under their control also printed various reactionary leaflets and other propaganda material and smuggled them into Tibet. Such newspapers and propaganda material spread vicious rumours and slanders against the Chinese Government, the Chinese Communist Party and the Chinese People's Liberation Army and fabricated all sorts of lies, moreover attempted to sow discord between the Han and the Tibetan nationalities of China, between the Chinese Central Government and the Tibetan local authorities as well as between Dalai Lama and Pan-chan Lama. Some of the propaganda material even openly called on the Tibetan people to rise up against the Chinese Government and advocated the separation of Tibet from China. Gyalodenju, Shakapa Losangjanzan and others wrote to the Lamas of the three big monasteries in Tibet to entice them to participate in their subversive activities.

(4) Taking advantage of the fact Kalimpong is situated near Tibet and that few formalities are required for travel across the India-China's Tibet region border, the Tibetan reactionaries and Americans, Chiang Kai-Shek clique and local special agents in Kalimpong have continuously dispatched agents and saboteurs to Tibet to contact the hidden reactionaries there. They smuggle weapons and ammunition into Tibet in preparation for armed revolt.

(5) The Chiang Kai-Shek clique has special agents and organisations in Kalimpong. Among the leading agents is one called Yeh Cheng-Yung. They also use Kalimpong as a base to collect intelligence from Tibet, smuggle arms and despatch agents into Tibet and incite riots in Tibet. They maintain a close contact with the Tibetan reactionaries in Kalimpong and provide Gyalodenju with important maps of Tibet for military use.

The conspiratorial and disruptive activities against the People's Republic of China carried out by the above-said Americans, Chiang Kai-Shek clique and local special agents and Tibetan reactionaries in Kalimpong cannot but enrage the Chinese Government and people and put them on the alert. The Chinese Government regards the criminal activities of the above-said reactionaries and special agents as a direct threat to China's territorial integrity and sovereignty and yet another malicious scheme of United States imperialists to create tension in Asia and Africa. It cannot be overlooked that in using Indian territory adjacent to China to perpetrate disruptive activities against the People's Republic of China, the American and Chiang Kai-Shek clique special agents have also the hideous object of damaging China-India friendship. In order to shatter the underhand schemes of United States imperialists, defend China's territorial integrity and sovereignty and safeguard China-India friendship, the Chinese Government hereby requests the Government of India to repress the subversive and disruptive activities against China's Tibetan region carried out in Kalimpong by American and Chiang Kai-Shek clique special agents, Tibetan reactionaries and local special agents. China and India are co-initiators of the five principles of peaceful co-existence, to uphold and propagate which the Government of India has made unremitting efforts. The Chinese Government is confident that the Government of India, pursuing a consistent policy of defending peace and opposing aggression, will accept its request and take effective measures.
Note sent by the Ministry of External Affairs to the Embassy of China in India, 2 August 1958.

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and, with reference to the Note handed over on July 10, 1958, by His Excellency Lo Kwe Po, Vice-Minister of the People's Republic of China, to Shri K. M. Kannampilly, Charge d'Affaires of the Embassy of India at Peking, has the honour to state as follows:

2. As the Government of the People's Republic of China are aware, the Government of India attach the highest importance to friendly relations between India and China. This friendship is traditional and was emphatically reaffirmed in the agreement which was entered upon by the two Governments in 1954. This agreement enunciated the famous five principles which the Government of India faithfully follow in their relationships with China as with all other countries. The Government of India recognise that the Tibetan region is part of the People's Republic of China.

3. The Government of India were therefore greatly surprised by the note which the Government of the People's Republic of China handed over to the Indian Charge d'Affaires at Peking on July 10. They regret to say that the statements contained in this note must have been based on a complete misunderstanding of facts. The Government of India have no evidence that the US Government and the Kuomintang regime are using Kalimpong as a base for disruptive activities against China's Tibetan region. The Government of India will never permit any portion of its territory to be used as a base of activities against any foreign Government, not to speak of the friendly Government of the People's Republic of China.

4. As the Government of the People's Republic of China must be aware, from time immemorial, there has been inter-communication between India and the Tibet region of China through passes on the northern frontier of India. In fact, for centuries the only feasible outlet for that region was through India. Movement of people between India and Tibet was free and easy. Most of the people living in the Tibet region of China (hereafter referred to as Tibetans) who enter India come here either as traders or pilgrims. This fact was recognized in the 1954 agreement between India and the People's Republic of China. Many Tibetans have been settled in north east India for years. The Government of India have made it clear to all Tibetans that they will be permitted to stay in India only if they carry on their vocations peacefully.

5. The Government of the People's Republic of China have mentioned six persons by name in their note as among those who are carrying on anti-Chinese activities on Indian territory. Some of these persons have already been warned that if their activities, political or other, are such as to have adverse effect on the relations between India and China, the Government of India will take the severest action against them. The Government of India have no definite evidence that these persons have been indulging in unfriendly activities. Even so, the Government of India propose to warn them again.

6. In their note, the Government of the People's Republic of China state that various reactionary organisations have been set up in Kalimpong under different names. Enquiries made by the Government of India reveal that no organisations or associations with the names mentioned in the note are functioning in Kalimpong. So far as the Government of India are aware there are two associations in Kalimpong of people who formerly lived in the Tibet Region of China namely, the Tibetan Association and the Indian Tibetan Association. The first named association has been in existence for about 25 years, the second was formed in September 1954. The aims and objects of both these associations are religious, cultural and social, such as promoting study of Buddhism or rendering medical aid to Tibetans, arranging their funeral rites etc. The Government of India are not aware that these two associations have been indulging in any undesirable activities such as those mentioned in the Chinese Government's note.

7. The Government of the People's Republic of China refer to a newspaper named the 'Tibetan Mirror'. There is no daily or weekly newspaper of that name published in Kalimpong. A monthly periodical called the 'Tibetan Mirror' is published there. The editor of this newspaper is not a Chinese but an Indian national. The Government of India have noted with displeasure that some of the articles published in this periodical are objectionable and calculated to affect the friendly relations between India and China. The law in India is, however, such that it is not easy to take executive or legal action against newspapers and periodicals of this character. There are other newspapers in India which severely criticise other friendly Governments. In fact, strong criticisms are voiced by some newspapers against the Government of India themselves. However, the Government of India are most anxious that an unimportant magazine like the 'Tibetan Mirror' should not adversely affect the relations between our two friendly countries and are directing their local officers to administer a severe warning to this periodical. If it continues to create mischief, the Government of India will take whatever other action is feasible.

8. The Government of the People's Republic of China have stated in their note that taking advantage of the liberal travel regulations across the border of India and the Tibet region of China near Kalimpong, weapons and ammunition have been smuggled into Tibet by Tibetan reactionaries, the Americans and followers of the Kuomintang regime. Both the Government of the People's Republic of China and the Government of India have got Customs Posts and Check Posts on this border. Officers of the Posts under the Government of India have got strict instructions to be particularly vigilant regarding the possible smuggling of articles like arms and ammunition which are contraband according to Indian law. No case of such smuggling of arms and ammunition has been detected by these Indian Check Posts in the locality.

9. The Government of the People's Republic of China have, in their note, referred to the photostat copy of a leaflet in Tibetan language handed over by them to the Indian Embassy at Peking. Though this leaflet was handed over on the 22nd January, 1958, the date of its publication given at the bottom is 17 December, 1956. This was the time when all manner of people from Tibet came to India in connection with Buddha Jayanti celebrations and the visit of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. At about this time the Prime Minister of India discussed the entire situation in the Tibet region of China and other relevant matters with His Excellency Premier Chou En-Lai. The Government of India did not, therefore, attach any great importance to the circulation of this particular leaflet in December, 1956. It is mentioned at the bottom of this leaflet that it was issued by the "Tibetan Welfare Association". It has already been stated earlier in this note that, according to Government of India's information, no association with this name is functioning in Kalimpong.

10. The Government of the People's Republic of China have stated that there are special agents of the Kuomintang regime in Kalimpong. Their note, however, mentions only one name, namely, Yeh Cheng-Yung. The Government of India have not been able to trace any such individual in Kalimpong and a preliminary examination of their records shows that no visa to enter India has been issued to any individual of that name. Even so, the Government of India are pursuing their enquiries and will communicate the results later to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China at New Delhi.

11. The Government of India reiterate their friendship for the people and the Government of the People's Republic of China. They have no doubt that the Chinese Government's note is based on misinformation and express the hope that, in the light of the facts now mentioned, the Government of the People's Republic of China will feel assured that India does not and will not permit any activities on its territory directed against the People's Republic of China and that the Government of India are determined to take action under the law of the country against those who indulge in any such illegal activities.

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India takes this opportunity of renewing to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Statement made by the Chinese Ambassador to the Foreign Secretary, 3 August 1958

Tibetan reactionary elements have recently set up in Kalimpong an organisation named "Committee for giving support to resistance against violence". The organisation is now engaged in a signature movement. At the end of July nearly all the Tibetan aristocrats in Kalimpong, rebels from Schedchuan and Sikang provinces, the Lamas and nearly all the members of the Tibetan Association and the Indian Tibetan Association put their signatures on a petition. Some of the signatories were compelled to give their signatures.

On the 29th July, fifteen aristocrats and rebels from Tibet held a meeting. The following are the names of some of the persons who were present:

1. Khan Chung Sagapa.
3. Sokhang Khen Chung.
5. Chiang Pa Tsin Liang.

They passed a resolution at that meeting a favour of sending an appeal to various countries in the world. The meeting decided to send out the appeal on the 18th June according to the Tibetan Calendar, which corresponds to 3rd August, i.e., today. It is stated that after the appeal has been sent, a demonstration will be organised. The main contents of the appeal are a request to the various countries to give assistance and support to the independence of Tibet. In the appeals there would be slanders against China and against the People's Liberation Army.
Statement by the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs of China to the Indian Ambassador, 22 March 1959

We have received a report from our Foreign Affairs Bureau in Lhasa that they were going to meet the Indian Consul General in Lhasa and convey to him following three points:—

1. The local Government in Tibet under instigation and support of the imperialists and foreign reactionary elements have torn up the agreement on the peaceful liberation of Tibet and begun armed revolt by attacking Government offices of the Central Government and the functionaries thereof and the Central Government troops. The Central Government of our country never permit such high treason of the local Government of Tibet and we are certain to put down this revolt. This is entirely an internal affair of China and we shall never permit interference from outside. Tibet is an integral part of China's territory and any intrigue aimed at splitting Tibet away from China is doomed to total failure.

2. We are willing to give protection to the functionaries of the Indian Consulate General at Lhasa and we hope that they will move into and live in the houses which we shall assign to them.

3. It is hoped that the Consul General of India in Lhasa will inform all Indian nationals in various parts of Tibet to abide by the Chinese laws and, as far as possible, to stay indoors where the revolt is taking place so that no accident may occur. Wherever we have our troops stationed we shall do our best to give protection to Indian nationals. It will be better for Indian nationals to move away from those centres where there are no Central Government troops.
Statement made by Foreign Secretary to the Chinese Ambassador, 26 April 1959

On the 3rd April the Foreign Secretary informed His Excellency the Ambassador that the Dalai Lama with a small party had entered Indian territory on the 31st March. The Dalai Lama had earlier sent a message to the Government of India asking for political asylum in India. The Government of India had, in accordance with international usage, allowed the Dalai Lama and his party to cross into Indian territory and stay in India. The Dalai Lama has since moved with his entourage to Mussoorie where necessary arrangements have been made by the Government of India for his residence.

2. During the last few days a considerable number of other Tibetans have also crossed into Indian territory and sought refuge here. The Government of India have issued strict instructions to disarm such of these persons as are armed.

3. When news was first received of Dalai Lama's entry into India, the Government of India considered it necessary to send a senior officer of the Ministry of External Affairs to the NEFA to meet him and take charge of all arrangements connected with his travel. This officer had the advantage of knowing the Dalai Lama personally, having served as Indian Consul General in Lhasa some years ago. Certain security precautions had to be taken. It was also essential to prevent the Dalai Lama from being troubled by a large number of press correspondents and other elements until after he had some rest and overcome the effects of the physical and mental strain which he had recently undergone. The Dalai Lama reached Mussoorie on April 21.

4. The Government of India have now seen recent reports of speeches delivered in the current session of the National People's Congress in Peking. They have read these reports with regret as they contain unbecoming and unjustified attacks on the Government of India and their officials and certain allegations which are patently untrue. Thus, it is stated that the Dalai Lama continues to be under duress and that the statements made by him are imposed on him by foreigners. Reference has also been made to so-called "Indian reactionaries" who are supposed to be "working in the footsteps of the British imperialists and have been harbouring expansionist ambitions towards Tibet". The Government of India are distressed to see these reports and to notice that a furious and unworthy campaign has been started in the press and the radio in Peking, the effect of which can only be to do incalculable damage to the friendly relations between India and China. The Government of India would like to state categorically that the statements made by the Dalai Lama are entirely his own and no official of theirs was in any way responsible for them. The Dalai Lama was allowed to enter India at his own request; he is acting entirely on his own and is free to return to his country any time he wishes to do so. If the Chinese Government want to satisfy themselves on this point, they are welcome to send their Ambassador in India or any other emissary to meet the Dalai Lama and necessary facilities will be given to the emissary to discuss with him and ascertain his wishes.

5. The Prime Minister met the Dalai Lama at Mussoorie on the 24 April and had a long talk with him. No member of the Dalai Lama's party was present at this interview. The Dalai Lama assured the Prime Minister that he left Lhasa of his own free will. It appeared to the Prime Minister that the Dalai Lama is still suffering from the after-effects of the great physical and mental strain which he had undergone and has not yet had time to think of his future course of action.

6. It is well-known that India has had long standing religious and cultural contacts with the people of Tibet and the people of India are interested in developments there. India has had and has no desire to interfere in internal happenings in Tibet. Because of old contacts, recent tragic events in Tibet have affected the people of India considerably, but it has been made clear by the Prime Minister that there is no question of any interference in the internal affairs of Tibet. As the Government of the People's Republic of China are no doubt aware, there is by law and Constitution complete freedom of expression of opinion in Parliament and the press and elsewhere in India. Opinions are often expressed in severe criticism of the Government of India's policies, as well as other opinions with which the Government are not in agreement.

7. The Prime Minister has declared in Parliament that the Dalai Lama will be accorded respectful treatment in India, but he is not expected to carry on any political activities from this country. The Government of India consider it most unfortunate that the fact of their having given asylum to the Dalai Lama, in exercise of their sovereignty and in accordance with well-known international usage, should have led responsible persons in China to make serious allegations which are unbecoming and entirely void of substance.
The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of the Republic of India, and hereby lodges the following serious protest with the Ministry regarding the occurrence in Bombay of Indians insulting the head of state of the People's Republic of China:

At about 4:40 on the afternoon of the 20th April, 1959, in Bombay there were about 80 Indians claiming themselves to be members of the Socialist Party, came to the Consulate General of the People's Republic of China at Bombay, demonstrated and shouted slogans in front of the Consulate-General and some of them made speeches. They branded China's putting down of the rebellion in her own territory, the Tibet Region, as imperialist action and made all sorts of slanders. What is more serious is that they pasted up a portrait of Mao Tse-tung, Chairman of the People's Republic of China, on the wall of the Chinese Consulate-General and carried out wanton insult by throwing tomatoes and rotten eggs at it. While these ruffians were insulting the portrait, the Indian policemen stood by without interfering with them, and pulled off the encircling spectators for the correspondents to take photographs of it. After the ruffians had left, the police officer once again allowed people to take photographs of the portrait and then tore it down and took it away.

Such an act of pasting up the portrait of the Chairman of the People's Republic of China on the wall of the Chinese Consulate-General and throwing tomatoes and rotten eggs at it is a huge insult to the head of state of the People's Republic of China and the respected and beloved leader of the Chinese people. And while the ruffians were insulting the portrait, the policemen of the Bombay local authorities not only did not interfere but pulled off the encircling spectators for correspondents to take photographs of it. After the ruffians had left, the police officer once again allowed people to take photographs of the portrait and then tore it down and took it away. It is evidently an act of connivance. For this the Chinese Government cannot but express its indignation and hereby lodges a serious protest. The Chinese Government requests that the Government of India speedily deals with the matter of insult to the head of state of the People's Republic of China and makes a speedy reply. Such a matter of huge insult to the head of state of the People's Republic of China is what the masses of the six hundred and fifty million Chinese people absolutely cannot tolerate, and it must be reasonably settled, otherwise the Chinese people cannot come to a stop with regard to the matter. In case the reply from the Indian Government is not satisfactory, the Embassy is instructed to make it clear that the Chinese Government will again raise this matter to the Indian Government, and the Chinese side will never come to a stop if without a satisfactory settlement of the matter, that is to say, never stop even for one hundred years.
Note of the Government of India, 30 April 1959

The Embassy of India, Peking, present their compliments to the Foreign Office of the Government of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the note No. M/129/59 presented to the Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India on April 27 by the Chinese Embassy, New Delhi, have the honour to state that investigations have been made into the facts relating to the incident referred to in the note. These facts, which are not wholly as stated in the note of the Embassy, are given below.

2. On the 20th April 1959, a demonstration was organised by the Socialist Party, Bombay Branch. About 75 persons went in procession from the headquarters of the party to the premises of the Chinese Consulate in Bombay. The processionists carried some placards and shouted slogans. A detachment of the Bombay Police accompanied the procession to prevent violence or any untoward incident. As the procession was otherwise peaceful, the police could not prohibit it altogether. Near the gate of the Consulate building, one of the processionists took out a bunch of memoranda and started distributing them. He also gave a number of these memoranda to some others in the procession for pasting them on the wall and the gate of the Consulate building. The police intervened to prevent this, but suddenly they noticed another person in the procession affixing something on the compound wall. They ran to intervene, but before they succeeded in reaching the particular spot, they found that a small picture of Chairman Mao Tse-tung had already been affixed and a few tomatoes and two eggs had been hurled at the picture. The police officers present stood in front of the picture to save it from further desecration and ordered one of their men to remove it. The picture was on the wall only for a minute or two and was removed by the police. A number of press photographers accompanied the procession and were taking photographs and it is possible that one of them managed to get a snapshot of the particular picture.

3. As a result of the full investigation made by them, the Government of India are satisfied that the police did not connive at the deplorable behaviour of some of the demonstrators. On the contrary, they intervened immediately the particular incident came to their notice and sought to stop further mischief. It is not a fact that the police cleared the way for photographers to take photographs of the picture of Chairman Mao Tse-tung. As the Chinese Government are probably aware, the Chinese Consulate is situated at one of the busiest traffic corners in Bombay. In fact, since the demonstrators were obstructing the traffic, the police endeavoured to clear the way and many of the demonstrators were pushed to the opposite side of the road.

4. The Chinese Government are, no doubt, aware that under the law in India processions cannot be banned so long as they are peaceful. Indeed in Indian cities processions and demonstrations are not unusual. Not unoften they are held even near the Parliament House and the processionists indulge in all manner of slogans against high personage in India. Incidents have occurred in the past when portraits of Mahatma Gandhi and the Prime Minister were taken out by irresponsible persons and treated in an insulting manner. Under the law and Constitution of India a great deal of latitude is allowed to the people so long as they do not indulge in actual violence.

5. The Government of India would like to point out that the particular procession in Bombay referred to in the Chinese Embassy's note was organised by a party called the Socialist Party which broke away some years ago from the major Socialist Party in India, namely the Praja Socialist Party. This splinter party consists of a small group of irresponsible persons who have no importance in the country and do not in any way reflect the standard of conduct followed by the major political parties in India. In fact it is the definite programme of this party to indulge in highly objectionable behaviour towards Government.

6. Whatever the circumstances and facts, the Government of India deeply regret that discourtesy was shown to a picture of Chairman Mao Tse-tung, the respected head of a State with which India has ties of friendship. The incident is undoubtedly deplorable, but as stated above, it is the act of a few persons and there was no question of connivance of the police or Government.

7. The Prime Minister has already expressed the deep regret of Government at this incident in his statement in the Lok Sabha on the 27th April.

8. The Government of India would like to add that while they can understand and appreciate the resentment of the Chinese Government at such an incident, they regret the language used in the Chinese Embassy's memorandum.
Statement made by the Chinese Ambassador to the Foreign Secretary, 16 May 1959

Since March 10, 1959 when the former Tibet Local Government and the Tibetan upper class reactionary clique unleashed armed rebellion, there have appeared deplorable abnormalities in the relations between China and India. This situation was caused by the Indian side, yet in his conversation on April 26, 1959 Mr. Dutt, Foreign Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India, shifted responsibility onto the Chinese side. This is what the Chinese Government absolutely cannot accept.

The Tibet Region is an inalienable part of China's territory. The quelling of the rebellion in the Tibet Region by the Chinese Government and following that, the conducting by it of democratic reforms which the Tibetan people have longed for, are entirely China's internal affairs, in which no foreign country has any right to interfere under whatever pretext or in whatever form. In Tibet, just as in other national minority areas in China, regional national autonomy shall be implemented as stipulated in the Constitution of the People's Republic of China. In this matter which is purely China's internal affairs, the Chinese Government has no obligation to give assurances to any foreign country, nor can it tolerate others under the pretext of a so-called different interpretation of autonomy, to obstruct the Chinese Government's exercise of its state sovereignty in the Tibet Region to make Tibet semi-independent or even to turn it into a sphere of influence of a foreign country or buffer zone.

The above-said is self-evident and undeniable. Nevertheless, there appeared in India, before and after the outbreak of the rebellion in Tibet, large quantities of words and deeds slandering China and interfering in China's internal affairs. Responsible persons of many Indian political parties, including the National Congress, and not a few Indian publications openly called Tibet a "country", slandered the Chinese Government's putting down the rebellion in Tibet as "practising banditry and imperialism", demanded that the Tibet question be submitted to the United Nations and even proposed the holding of a tripartite conference of India, China and Tibet to settle the Tibet question which can only be handled by the Chinese Government. Most of the political parties in India went so far as to form organisations in support of the Tibetan rebels. Groups of ruffians were allowed to make provocations and disturbances in front of the Chinese Embassy and Consulates-General in India, and there even occurred the grave incident of insulting the head of state of China. These words and deeds were in the nature of serious interference in China's internal affairs and sabotage of Sino-Indian friendship, and this cannot be altered by recourse to any pretext, whether "freedom of speech" or any other "freedoms", even less can the "feeling of kinship derived from long-established religious and cultural contacts with the Tibetan people" be a pretext for these words and deeds.
It is obvious that the Chinese people likewise have a “feeling of kinship derived from long-established religious and cultural contacts” towards the Indian people, but China has never used this as a pretext to interfere in India’s internal affairs, and will never do so.

The Indian Government has recognised the Tibet region as a part of China’s territory and has repeatedly declared that it has no desire to interfere in China’s internal affairs. This was worthy of welcome. Nevertheless, responsible members of the Indian Government, though they could not possibly be better acquainted with the situation in Tibet than the Chinese Government openly expressed doubts about documents published by China officially, refused to accept the Chinese Government’s account of the facts, and asserted that the basis of the rebellion in Tibet “must have been a strong feeling of nationalism” and that the upper strata reactionaries in Tibet were not solely responsible for the rebellion. They even charged that “agreement between Tibet and China on the autonomous status of Tibet and the assurances given to India had not been kept” by the Chinese Government, and described the Chinese Government’s putting down the rebellion in Tibet as “armed intervention” and as “oppressing and suppressing” the Tibetan people. The Indian Government announced that it had granted political asylum to the Dalai Lama in accordance with international practice and stated that the Dalai Lama was “not expected” to engage in any political activities in India. This would not have caused any dispute. But on April 18 and 22, two statements advocating “independence of Tibet” and directing wanton attacks on the Chinese Government were issued respectively in Tezpur and Mussoorie in the name of the Dalai Lama. What was particularly surprising, the so-called “statement of the Dalai Lama” of April 18 was not only distributed by an official of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs but also carried on official bulletins of Indian Embassies abroad. Such a line of action on the part of the Indian Government could hardly be considered conformable to well-known international practice. The Indian Government insisted that the Dalai Lama was entirely responsible for the two traitorous statements issued in his name. In that case, did not the impressive welcome extended to the Dalai Lama by the Indian Government and the talks Prime Minister Nehru himself held with him mean giving a welcome to a Chinese rebel and holding a meeting with him? All these statements and actions of the Indian Government, no matter what the subjective intentions might be, undoubtedly played an objective role of encouraging the Tibetan rebels.

The facts themselves have completely overthrown the allegation that there is no Indian interference in China’s internal affairs. The Chinese Government and people, having regard for the overall Sino-Indian friendship, for quite a long time exercised utmost forbearance in the hope that the words and deeds occurring in India interfering in China’s internal affairs and detrimental to Sino-Indian friendship would end. To the contrary, however, the words and deeds against China and interfering in China’s internal affairs coming from the Indian side went from bad to worse and developed to an intolerable extent. Only then did the Chinese people give the reply that was due, in order to safeguard their state sovereignty and oppose outside interference, and also to uphold the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence and Sino-Indian friendship. The Chinese people's reply is in the nature of reasoning and is well grounded on fact. All those who have the opportunity of reading a full report of the opinions of the Chinese people will arrive at this conclusion. It is unjustifiable that the Indian Government should have tried in various ways to defend the words and deeds of the Indian side interfering in China's internal affairs and impairing Sino-Indian friendship, while making charges against the proper reply of the Chinese people.

The Dalai Lama was abducted to India by the Tibetan rebels. A most strong proof of this is the three letters he wrote to General Tan Kuan-san, Acting Representative of the Central People's Government in Tibet, before he was abducted out of Lhasa. The so-called "statement of the Dalai Lama", which is full of loopholes, instead of being capable of making one believe that the Dalai Lama is now able to act on his own volition, precisely serves to show that he is still being surrounded and under control. The Chinese Government is greatly concerned about the situation of the Dalai Lama. It is, however, futile for the Chinese Government to send someone to see the Dalai Lama before he has freed himself from encirclement and control. It would be even more inappropriate for the Chinese Government to send someone to see the Dalai Lama, if, as alleged by the Indian Government, he was entirely responsible for the two statements betraying his motherland.

In its relations with India, China has consistently adhered to the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence and worked for the development of friendly co-operation between the two countries. China has always held that every thing must be done to safeguard the friendly relations between the two great Asian countries, China and India, from being impaired. In spite of the fact that the Indian side brought about this unpleasant argument between the two countries, and the Indian Government has failed to give a satisfactory reply on the Bombay incident of insulting the Head of State of China, the Chinese side is willing to stop its rebuff as soon as the Indian side stops its words and deeds against China and interfering in China's internal affairs. Prime Minister Nehru has now expressed the wish to end this argument and called on Indian newspapers to exercise restraint and wisdom, this is worthy of welcome. It is the hope of the Chinese Government that the dark clouds overcasting Sino-Indian relations for a time will speedily disperse and that, through the current trial, Sino-Indian friendship, which is of long standing and based on the Five Principles, will develop even better.

On the whole, India is a friend of China, this has been so in the past thousand and more years, and we believe will certainly continue to be so in one thousand, ten thousand years to come. The enemy of the Chinese people lies in the East—the U.S. imperialists have many military bases in Taiwan, in South Korea, Japan and in the Philippines which are all directed against China. China's main attention and policy of struggle are directed to the east, to the west Pacific region, to the vicious and aggressive U.S. imperialism, and not to India or any other country in the south-east Asia and south Asia. Although the Philippines, Thailand and Pakistan have joined the SEATO which is designed to oppose China, we have not treated those three countries as our principal enemy; our principal enemy is U.S. imperialism. India has not taken part in the Southeast Asia Treaty; it is not an opponent, but a friend to our country. China will not be so foolish as to antagonize the United States in the east and again to antagonize India in the West. The putting down of the rebellion and the carrying out of democratic reforms in Tibet will not in the least endanger India. You can wait and see. As the Chinese proverb goes "the strength of a horse is borne out by the distance travelled, and the heart of a person is seen with the lapse of time". You will ultimately see whether relations between the Tibet region of China and India are friendly or hostile by watching three, five, ten, twenty, a hundred......years. We cannot have two centres of attention, nor can we take friend for foe. This is our state policy. The quarrel between our two countries in the past few years, particularly in the last three months, is but an interlude in the course of thousands upon thousands of years of friendships between the two countries and does not warrant a big fuss on the part of the broad masses and the Government authorities of our countries. The principles, positions and distinctions between right and wrong as set forth in the foregoing paragraphs have to be set forth; otherwise the current difference between our countries cannot be resolved. But so far as the extent of the implication of those words is concerned, it is only temporary and local; that is to say, they refer only to a temporary difference between our two countries and concern solely the region of Tibet. Our Indian friends! What is your mind? Will you be agreeing to our thinking regarding the view that China can only concentrate its main attention eastward of China, but not south-westward of China, nor is it necessary for it to do so. Chairman Mao Tse-tung, the leader of our country, talked on many occasions with Mr. R. K. Nehru, former Indian Ambassador to China, who could well understand and appreciate it. We do not know whether the former Indian Ambassador conveyed this to the Indian authorities. Friends! It seems to us that you too cannot have two fronts. Is it not so? If it is, here lies the meeting point of our two sides. Will you please think it over? Allow me to take this opportunity to extend my best regards to Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru, the leader of India.
Statement of the Foreign Secretary to the Chinese Ambassador, 23 May 1959

The statement made by the Chinese Ambassador to the Foreign Secretary has been considered. The Foreign Secretary has been directed to make the following reply to the Chinese Ambassador:

(1) The Government of India have learned of this statement with regret and surprise. It is not only not in consonance with certain facts, but is also wholly out of keeping with diplomatic usage and the courtesies due to friendly countries. It is a matter of particular surprise and disappointment to them that a Government and people noted for their high culture and politeness should have committed this serious lapse and should have addressed the Government of India in a language which is discourteous and unbecoming even if it were addressed to a hostile country. Since it is addressed to a country which is referred to as friendly, this can only be considered as an act of forgetfulness.

(2) We have no desire to enter into a lengthy argument about facts or opinions, much less about the discourteous language used in the statement made on behalf of the Chinese Government. It has been the consistent practice of the Government of India to treat other countries with courtesy and friendliness, even though any country might express opinions opposed to theirs. With China they have endeavoured to maintain and develop friendly relations, and they propose to continue to do so in spite of the discourtesy shown to them by the Chinese Government. This is in consonance with India's past culture and background and Mahatma Gandhi's teachings.

(3) In so far as facts are concerned, the Prime Minister made a statement in the Lok Sabha on April 27, 1959, as well as on some subsequent occasions. Those statements give a correct narration of facts, and the Government of India stand by them. They can only regret that the People's Government of China is unable to accept these facts.

(4) The Government of India realise that the system of Government in China is different from that prevailing in India. It is the right of the Chinese people to have a Government of their choice, and no one else has a right to interfere; it is also the right of the Indian people to have a Government of their choice, and no one else has a right to interfere. In India, unlike China, the law recognises many parties, and gives protection to the expression of differing opinions. That is a right guaranteed by our Constitution and, contrary to the practice prevailing in China, the Government of India is often criticised and opposed by some sections of the Indian people. It is evident that this freedom of expression, free press and civil liberties in India are not fully appreciated by the Government of China, and hence misunderstandings arise. So far as the Parliament of India is concerned, it is a sovereign body, and each one of its 750 members has perfect freedom to express his or her opinion under the protection of the law, whether anyone likes it or not. The People's Government of China should understand that this is a sovereign Parliament of a sovereign country and it does not submit to any dictation from any outside authority.

(5) From the statement made on behalf of the People's Government of China, it appears that, according to them, the Panchsheel or the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence may or may not be applied according to convenience or circumstances. This is an approach with which the Government of India are not in agreement. They have proclaimed and adhered to these Principles as matters of basic policy and not of opportunism. They will continue to hold to these principles and endeavour to apply them according to their own thinking.

(6) The Government of India do not consider or treat any other country as an enemy country, howsoever much it may differ from it. It is their constant endeavour to develop friendly relations with all countries and try to remove tensions, bitterness and ill-will, while adhering to the policy they consider right. In particular, they have endeavoured to cultivate the friendship of the Chinese people and Government in spite of differences of opinion. They have avoided interference with China's internal affairs. They will continue this policy, but this must not be understood to mean that the Government of India will discard or vary any of their own policies under any pressure from outside.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Counsellor in India, 24 July 1959

The attention of the Government of India has been drawn to recent articles being circulated in the Tibet region of China, which contain false statements and are, therefore, likely to create grave misunderstanding between India and China.

2. The ‘Lhasa Daily’ in Tibetan language, on 23rd June, published an article entitled “Gyantse in the history of imperialist design in Tibet”. The article gives details of the invasion of Gyantse by British troops in 1904, and proceeds to state as follows:—

“The place immediately near to the British Imperial Cemetery is the cantonment of Indian Army stationed at Gyantse. The 1954 Agreement between India and China on trade and intercourse specified the withdrawal of the Indian troops from Gyantse. The people of Gyantse could clearly see that the legacy of British imperialism in Tibet was inherited by the Indian expansionist element. During the course of their stay at Gyantse, the Indian Army forcibly took foodgrains and fodder from the people of Gyantse. The people were forced to do corvee work for them, they had to provide supply transport, firewood, servants, etc., in return for nothing to the Indian army. The Indian troops were fond of riding military horses, and they rode rough shod the green fields of the people and thus destroying the autumn harvest. Officers and men of the Indian troops visited the traitor Phala and held parties and games of Majong. These evil deeds of the Indian army are very much resented by the people of Gyantse. And though the fire of their anger was burning in the stomach, there was no opportunity for the smoke to come out of the mouth”.

3. Similarly an article about Chumbi valley appeared on the 15th June which inter alia stated as follows:—

“According to Tsewang, formerly when they suffered from any ailment, they had not only to send a servant and a horse to fetch the doctor, but the fee charged by the doctor was exorbitantly high. The poor man was helpless to provide such luxury and so when a poor man fell ill, the inevitable was death.”

4. The extracts quoted above are factually and historically incorrect. They are obviously intended to damage the friendly relations between the people of India and the nationals of the People’s Republic of China. The Government of India emphatically protest against such articles being published in areas where the press is officially controlled and would request that steps be taken to stop such deliberately hostile propaganda against India.
Under Article 1(2) of the 1954 Agreement between India and China pertaining to the Tibet Region, the Government of the People's Republic of China agreed inter alia to the establishment of an Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse. Further, according to the letters exchanged in pursuance of this Agreement, the Government of India were permitted to retain the buildings and the right to lease land within the bounds of the existing Agencies.

2. Unfortunately, the entire Trade Agency buildings in Gyantse belonging to the Government of India were washed away with the loss of several lives including that of the Trade Agent in the unprecedented floods of July 1954. Ever since, the Government of India has been endeavouring to reconstruct the Trade Agency buildings for the proper functioning of our trade agency at Gyantse. But a variety of difficulties have been experienced locally and thus the commencement of the reconstruction of the Agency prevented.

3. The local authorities in the Tibet Region had informed us that no construction could be undertaken without their prior approval and scrutiny of plans. Though no such restriction except in terms of municipal bye-laws is placed in India, the prescription of prior scrutiny was accepted and plans of the new Trade Agency buildings were submitted to the Sub-Office of the Foreign Bureau in Gyantse in August 1958.

4. As stated above, the letters exchanged recognize the right of the Government of India to continue to lease and retain the buildings on the existing premises. Notwithstanding this fact, only towards the end of 1957 the Consul-General in Lhasa was informed that the existing lease which was valid up to 1971 could not be accepted by the Chinese authorities since it was concluded with the previous regime. Although our legal advice confirmed the continuing validity of the lease held by the Government of India, in deference to the wishes of the local authorities we agreed to execute a new lease deed with the owner of the land.

5. The Government of India engineer who visited Gyantse in connection with the plans for the new construction found that the floods in the adjacent river had already scoured a substantial part of the lease land. In the absence of any plans by the local authorities to control the channel of the river and prevent recurrence of damage through floods, the Government of India accepted the recommendation of the engineer and decided to construct protective embankments to ensure the future safety of the leased property. This decision was conveyed to the Foreign Bureau of Lhasa as well as to the Chinese Government through the Indian Embassy in Peking, and permission was sought for the leasing of some additional land considered necessary and the authorisation of the construction of the protective works.

6. In July 1958, the Indian Embassy in Peking were informed by the Government of China that there would be no objection, in principle, to the construction of the proposed protective embankments and that construction might be taken in hand without the detailed finalisation and the execution of the new lease-deed. However, when the Indian Consul-General in Lhasa broached the subject with the Chinese Foreign Bureau with a view to initiating preliminary construction work, he was verbally informed that it would not be possible to agree to the protective works lest they should endanger the safety of the bridge and do damage to the portion of the Gyantse village which lay further down-stream.

7. In view of this reservation, an Indian engineer was again instructed to proceed to Gyantse to explain on the spot that the proposed protective works were in no way likely either to endanger the bridge or to damage the property in the village. Although detailed explanations were furnished to the two representatives and an engineer of the Chinese Foreign Bureau in Gyantse, no agreement was forthcoming.

8. After a lapse of another two months, the Chinese Foreign Bureau informed the Consul-General in Lhasa that they could not agree to the plan of the protective works and sought modification of the plan if immediate construction was to be taken in hand. Notwithstanding the fact that the plan which had been earlier explained was not only economical but, according to our engineers, in no way likely to damage other properties, the Government of India instructed their engineers to prepare revised plans. This second set of plans has now been finalised. They envisage only a protective wall along the leased land, do away with the necessity of spurs and additional land and are not calculated to deflect the course of the river in any way. The blue prints of the revised plan have now been transmitted for presentation through the Consul-General in Lhasa.

9. Ever since the destruction of the Indian property in Gyantse the officers and staff of the Trade Agency have been living in the most unsatisfactory and unhygienic conditions. There are inadequate office and residential buildings inevitably causing great hardship to the staff of the Agency. In the climatic conditions of Gyantse, which lies at a height of 14,000 feet, inadequate housing facilities inevitably cause great hardship to our staff.

10. The Government of India are most anxious that the construction of the new Trade Agency building and the protective works should commence in May 1959 and urge that the Government of the People's Republic of China should give the necessary instructions to authorise the immediate construction of the buildings and the protective works. Further, to facilitate construction, it is also urged that the local authorities may be instructed to give help in procuring timber, stones and bricks and in making available the necessary transport for construction work. If a further technical discussion of the blue prints of the protective works is considered essential, the Government of India are prepared to depute an engineer to meet his duly authorised counterpart from the Chinese side at the beginning of April either in Gyantse or in Lhasa to enable a final decision being taken on the spot.

11. Commensurate with the friendly relations existing between India and China, it is imperative that the representatives of the two countries should be given the necessary housing facilities for their functioning and the full discharge of their duties to promote understanding, trade and cultural contact between their two peoples. As far as the Government of India are aware, no serious difficulties have arisen in finding satisfactory housing and office accommodation for the Chinese diplomatic, consular and trade missions in India. The Government of India trust that such difficulties as are listed above in the case of the Gyantse Trade Agency will be removed and particularly the necessary construction of protective embankments and the commencement of building of the Agency during the coming working season authorised.
Aide Memoire given to the Embassy of China in India, 23 March 1959

The Indian Trade Agency building at Gyantse in the Tibet region of China was washed away during the unprecedented floods of 1954. The question of reconstruction of the Trade Agency and the necessary river embankment to protect the property from similar floods has been taken up from time to time with the officials of the People's Republic of China. A full statement of the case with a request for necessary authorisation for the construction of the protective works and help in the construction is being presented to the Embassy separately.

Pending the construction of the new premises, it is necessary to give some immediate relief for improvement of office accommodation and housing facilities of the Trade Agent and his staff. At present the Agency has been accommodated in a small rented building insufficient in space and unsuitable for healthy habitation. From time to time attempts have been made locally by the Indian Trade Agent to hire additional accommodation and the matter has been brought to the attention of the sub-office of the Foreign Bureau in Gyantse. So far there is no appreciable improvement and in the meanwhile the Trade Agent and his staff are experiencing great difficulty particularly in the hard climatic conditions of Gyantse.

While construction of the new Agency will inevitably take some time, the Government of India strongly urge the Government of the People's Republic of China to instruct their local authority to help the Trade Agent immediately in hiring additional accommodation to meet the reasonable requirements of the Trade Agency. The Government of India are informed that with the co-operation of the local authorities it should be possible to get on lease suitable premises locally.
Letter from the Consul-General of India in Lhasa to the Foreign Bureau in Tibet, 13 May 1959

On the 27th April 1958, I discussed with you the question of Ladakhi Lamas and Muslims of Jammu and Kashmir origin. You stated then that there were some Lamas from Ladakh but no one was in possession of any visaed documents. You enquired about the manner and the dates of arrival of certain other Indian Muslim nationals from Kashmir. I have looked into the position which appears to be as follows:

Ladakhi Lamas and Muslims of Jammu and Kashmir origin have traditionally come to Tibet without any restriction or formality. Most of these people had been residing in the Tibet region of China for some time before the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 was concluded.

The former local Government of Tibet always treated the Muslims of Kashmir origin as foreigners and as distinct from their own nationals. These Kashmiri Muslims never declared themselves as Tibetan or deliberately renounced their Indian nationality. In fact these Kashmiris selected their own headman who is called Khachi Ponpo, literally meaning Kashmiri Officer. The former local Government had no hand in the selection of this officer; nor was the Khachi Ponpo treated as an official of the Tibetan Government or paid any remuneration by them. Khachi Ponpo, with the help of a few representatives of the community, settled the disputes between the Kashmiri Muslims. The Tibetan Government was only brought into the picture in case of a dispute between a Kashmiri Muslim and a Tibetan but any fine imposed on the Kashmiri Muslim used to be returned to the Khachi Ponpo. The position of the Kashmiri Muslims was similar to that of Nepalis trading in Tibet. In both categories the menfolk paid no taxes to the former local Government nor did they enjoy the right to own immovable property in Tibet. These people came and resided in Tibet only for the purpose of pursuing their trade and commerce.

Similarly a large number of the Kashmiri Lamas had come to Tibet prior to this agreement and were visiting monasteries to pursue their theological studies. The Lamas who came to Tibet after the conclusion of the 1954 Agreement were here on legitimate pilgrimage and permits should have been issued by the authorities of the Tibet region of China. Pilgrims from India, under the Agreement, are not required to hold any Government of India travel document.

The Agreement of 1954 does not specify any procedure in respect of the nationals of one country who had been residing in the other country prior to the Agreement. Thus it was for the Government of such country to prescribe the procedure to regularise the stay in their country of the nationals of the other country. To the knowledge of the Government of India, no notification or declaration was made by the local authorities in the Tibet region of China requiring the persons of Indian origin residing in the Tibet region to obtain registration or traders certificates if they were not actually travelling across the border.

In fact, however, some of these people had registered themselves with the Indian Consulate-General long before the recent disturbances. It may be stated that in accordance with the laws and practice of India it is not obligatory for Indian nationals staying in foreign countries to register themselves with Indian Missions or Consulates in those countries. They are expected to fall in line with the practice prescribed for foreigners and would of course obtain an Indian nationality certificate if it was required by the local regulations. The position therefore is that these Lamas and Muslims have their origin in Jammu and Kashmir State in India, and, notwithstanding their long residence in Tibet or even marriage with Tibetans, they do not cease to be Indian nationals. Since no law or regulation has been announced and enforced previously by the local authorities of Tibet region of China, we do not agree with the contention that absence of travel documents deprives them of their Indian nationality. Some of these persons, it is now understood, applied recently as Indian nationals and the seizure of their application forms would amount to interfering in their legitimate claims to be treated distinctly as Indians.

In view of the facts explained above, the Government of India urge that Ladakhi and Kashmiri Muslims and other Indians living in Lhasa and Shigatse should be treated as Indian nationals and their registration recorded accordingly.

It may be mentioned here that the Government of India do not regard the Chinese in India as Indian nationals merely on the ground of their long residence in India unless they have formally obtained naturalisation certificates according to the Indian laws after renouncing their former nationality.
Informal Note given by the Government of India to the Chinese Counsellor in India, 8 July 1959

Apart from the Embassy, the Chinese Government have Consulates General in Bombay and Calcutta and, by virtue of the 1954 Agreement, a Trade Agency in Kalimpong. All these Chinese Posts in India enjoy full facilities for hiring of suitable accommodation for the offices and their residential staff. Chinese officers and members of the staff have freedom of movement without even intimation to the Government of India. They are allowed, after registration, to keep personal arms with them. They enjoy freedom of meeting whom they wish, freedom to distribute official bulletins, move in official transport and function without restrictions in India. Further full facilities are allowed for couriers to carry official mail from and to Chinese Mission and Posts in India.

2. Similarly Chinese nationals, other than officials, are permitted freedom of movement, facilities to take up employment, own property, ply their transport and indulge in trade between India and Tibet region as well as maintain shops and undertake petty commerce in India.

3. In contrast to these facilities for the Chinese officials and their nationals, Indian Posts in the Tibet region and Indian nationals have faced, particularly in recent months, innumerable difficulties and disabilities in the pursuit of their official normal functions. The following are only some examples of such difficulties reported to the Government of India.

(a) Difficulties of accommodation for our Consulate General and Trade Agencies.

(i) Gyantse.—The question of reconstruction of the Trade Agency was mentioned by the Prime Minister in Parliament and by the Foreign Secretary to the Ambassador. The construction work is now starting but full helpful co-operation is not forthcoming from the local officials. Apparently the labourers working on the site are being harassed. In the last week of June and first week of July there was firing practice over our site. No permission for the hiring of private trucks or import of our own trucks or provision of transport from the local authorities has yet been forthcoming.

(ii) Gartok.—The lease deed has been agreed to but the actual construction deferred pending arrival of our Trade Agent. The Trade Agent's arrival has been delayed because he is being diverted at Chinese request through Lipuleh Pass. Initial construction must start immediately and we, therefore, wish the engineering personnel to enter the Tibet region and commence construction before the loss of this season.

(iii) Lhasa.—The Consulate General in Lhasa is also short of accommodation and has been wanting additional office and residential accommodation.
(b) Restrictions on movements.

By order of Military Control Commission freedom of movement is not being permitted to our Trade Agents even in the vicinity where the Trade Agencies are located. For example the I. T. A. Yatung was not permitted to go to Rinchengang, only six miles from Yatung, where he wished to meet the Indian Trade Agent, Gyantse, and his wife, who were returning to their post from Gangtok. Similarly a junior official of the Trade Agency, who desired to return to Gangtok on short leave, was not permitted to do so.

(c) Repair and maintenance work.

The lease of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung requires that "Only with the Lessor's advance consent being reported to local organ of the People's Republic of China, the Lessee may carry out construction or reconstruction on the said lands in addition to the already existing buildings." This provision is being interpreted to place difficulties and create delays even in carrying out simple repairs, and white-washing of the buildings where there is no proposal to vary the plinth area of existing buildings. It is not understood what purpose is served by placing such restrictions and unnecessarily making the carrying out of simple repairs to our property so difficult.

(d) Registration of arms.

Originally there was no licensing system for possession of arms in Tibet. Officials and traders kept some personal arms for sport or self-protection purposes. Recently orders were issued for the presentation and registration of arms and we instructed our officials and nationals to fall in line with this order. It was, however, noticed that when the sporting rifle and two revolvers of our Consul General in Lhasa were taken in for registration at Yatung, not only were the arms not returned but no receipts were given that they were held in official custody. Similarly when the Indian nationals presented their arms for registration, no receipts were given to their owners.

4. Indian traders and nationals have similarly been suffering considerable difficulties.—Some irresponsible elements have indulged in propaganda that Indian traders purported to exploit the Tibetans. In fact these trading arrangements under the express authority of the 1954 Agreement, preserve the traditional pattern and are to the mutual advantage of Indian and Chinese people.

Indian traders and pilgrims have recently been checked when proceeding or returning from their legitimate business or pilgrimage. In one case in Yatung a trader's shop was locked and the owner denied access to his possessions. Two other shop-keepers were threatened in Phari but no redress was given by local authorities. An Indian pilgrim to Kailash was harassed because he carried some medicines for himself. Two cobblers from Shingatse have been held up in Yatung for the last 3 weeks and prevented from returning to India. It is also reported that traders are not being permitted to travel between Yatung and Gyantse which are recognised marts under the Agreement.
5. Indian nationals in the Tibet region of China.—The Government of India have already drawn attention in Delhi and through the Consulate General Lhasa to obtain protection for Indian nationals residing in the Tibet region of China. We specially bring to the notice of the Chinese authorities the case of Indians of Ladakhi origin who were trading or residing in Lhasa prior to 1954 Agreement was concluded. It is requested that impediments in their registering with the Consulate General or leaving the Tibet region if they so wish should not be placed.

We have also repeatedly drawn attention through the Consulate General to the case of the family of Shri Shahabir Dival which has been under arrest since 5th of April, 1959. No reason for their arrest has been given and despite request no steps taken to set them free. Similarly, Tromo Geshe Rimpoche of Donkar Monastery, an Indian protected person, is understood to be still held by the Chinese authorities.

Government of India are anxious that the provisions of the 1954 Agreement should be strictly and mutually respected and therefore draw the attention of the Embassy to these difficulties which have been placed at the local level in the Tibet region of China. Just as full facilities and adequate help and protection are afforded to the Chinese officials and Chinese nationals in India, it is hoped that legitimate help and courtesy and support from the authorities will be given to Indian officials and Indian nationals who are serving, working in or visiting the Tibet region of China.
Your letter of 13th May 1959 duly received. In your letter you have referred to Kachis who for generations, have lived in Lhasa, Shigatse and other places and have long become Chinese nationals, as Indian nationals; and you described the well-known facts that they had, at all times, been subjected to the jurisdiction of the local Government of Tibet of our country as: the former local Government of Tibet of China always treated the Muslims of Kashmir as foreigners. These assertions are opposed to the historical facts and I cannot agree with them.

As everybody knows, among the inhabitants in Tibet of our country, there are a number of people of Islamic faith. Besides the Huis from such provinces as Yunan and Szechuan, these are some whom we call Kachis. Although their forefathers were from Kashmir, yet as early as the 17th century, during the time of the 5th Dalai Lama, their forefathers had already chosen the Chinese nationality and had thus become a component part of the Tibetan people of China. In a report submitted to the former local Government by their headman during the time of the 13th Dalai Lama there is such a passage which serves as a powerful evidence: “at the time of the 5th Dalai Lama, we, the subjects, had chosen him to be our own King, and, in return, he the King, also loved us as his own subjects. And it was such a great gracious kindness he bestowed on us, by allotting to us land for maintenance”. Thereafter, from generation to generation, they had, at all times, been under the administration of the local Government. The final decision on the selection of headmen they elect and their appointments had to be obtained from the local Government. With the exception of some minor disputes, which were allowed to be settled by themselves under the guidance of their headmen, as was the case with the Huis also, all their civil and criminal cases, irrespective of a dispute between Kachis and Tibetans or between Kachis themselves, had to be referred to former local Government for judgments. And it was by no means like what Mr. Chhibber had alleged, that “the Tibetan Government was only brought into the picture, in case of a dispute between a Kashmiri Muslim and a Tibetan” to say nothing about that “the position of the Kashmiri Muslim was similar to that of Nepalese trading in Tibet” as asserted by Mr. Chhibber. In addition they are entitled to the right of purchase of immovable property, and they also had the obligations of doing Corvee for the former local Government and of serving the military service, etc. All these facts fully prove that they are Tibetan people of China.

After the peaceful liberation of Tibet, there has been no change in their being Tibetan people of China. All those who went to India for trade or to Mecca for pilgrimage and who account for more than 80 per cent. of their total households, had, in accordance with the unified stipulations of our country, approached our Bureau for traders certificates to India or for passports to Mecca. And all their passports were issued with transit visas or entry visas by the successive Consuls-General of India in Lhasa (Indian Consul-General, Lhasa, Mr. Chhibber). This is a fact which demonstrates that the Indian Government have long recognised them as the nationals of the People's Republic of China. Can there be any room left for doubts?

However one could not help feel surprised that Mr. Chhibber should have raised with us the problem that they are Indian nationals, at a time when our troops had put down the rebellion unleashed by the former local Government and the reactionaries of the upper strata in Tibet. As mentioned above, there has never been any question with regard to them as Chinese nationals. To my knowledge, only after the talks between Mr. Chhibber and the "headman" of these Kachis, in April of this year, did such things happen, that that "headman" taking advantage of a prayer meeting announced to all the Kachis that they all must fill revised "applications" for registration as citizens of India, which were distributed by the Consulate-General of India. I am of the view that this occurrence is not fortuitous. This is unfriendly act of instigating the Chinese people to break with China by means of external forces. Therefore we consider it to be highly improper and an act of interference in the internal affairs of our country, that Mr. Chhibber, without obtaining any consent from our Bureau whatsoever, went so far as to utilise the former official of the former local Government (the so-called "Kachi Ponpo") to carry out the activities, among our people, instigating them to break off with their mother-land, after we openly ordered the dissolution of the former local Government and after the dismissal of all its former officials. We regret this and hope that these activities are stopped forthwith.
Informal Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, India, to the Chinese Counsellor in India, 24 July 1959

Some time ago the Embassy was requested to ensure that appropriate arrangements are made for the Government of India's couriers proceeding from Gangtok to the various Posts in Central Tibet. Recent reports indicate that no assurance regarding the safety of the transmission of Government bags has been forthcoming. It is understood that the local authorities have been pressing the postal couriers such as in Kangma and Samada near Gyantse to obtain prior permits for their travel in connection with the carriage of Indian bags. The requisite applications have been submitted some time ago but no permits have been issued. Pending assurance of the safety of the official bags and the mail courier, the bag service has been suspended. Unless the mail service is resumed, it is not unlikely that the Trade Agency will not be able to meet even its day to day requirements. Immediate instructions are solicited to guarantee the safety of these Dakwalas and the official bags from Yatung to Gyantse and Gyantse to Lhasa in both directions to permit resumption of the normal mail service, as provided under the 1954 Agreement.

In the conversation on the 3rd June, a special request was made for facilities for Shri Bhupendra Singh who was proceeding to Lhasa to be given privileges as a diplomatic courier. Shri Bhupendra Singh carries a diplomatic passport and a laissez-passer. Even though prior intimation was given and official Chinese visa has been granted, Shri Bhupendra Singh has been held up in Yatung for the last several weeks because no official transport has been provided for his onward journey to Lhasa. As in the case of the normal dak service, it is of the utmost importance that Shri Bhupendra Singh should reach Lhasa within the next few days. Immediate instructions are solicited so that necessary transport and security arrangements can be made from Yatung to Lhasa.
1. Article 1 of the Agreement between India and China on Trade and Intercourse between Tibet Region of China and India provides for the establishment of Indian Trade Agencies at Yatung, Gyantse and Gartok and Chinese Trade Agencies at New Delhi, Calcutta and Kalimpong. In terms of this article and the letters exchanged between the two Governments the Trade Agencies of both Parties are guaranteed the same status and the same treatment. They are also guaranteed privileges and immunities for couriers, mail bags and communications in code.

2. The Government of India have to state with regret that during the past few months our Trade Posts at Yatung and Gyantse are being subjected to a variety of difficulties with the result that they cannot function in the way envisaged in the Sino-Indian Agreement. This has also affected the life and normal trade activities of Indian nationals at these posts. Some of these difficulties have already been brought to the attention of the Chinese authorities. In March the Foreign Secretary to the Government of India presented two notes to the Chinese Ambassador in New Delhi seeking the assistance and co-operation of the Chinese authorities in the reconstruction of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse and, until the new premises are ready, in obtaining additional accommodation for the housing of the Trade Agency officials. Other difficulties experienced by the Trade Agencies have also been informally brought to the attention of the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi and the Chinese Foreign Bureau in Tibet.

3. The Government of India would like to draw attention in particular to the following difficulties which have been brought to their notice:

   (i) Gyantse.—The lease of the temporary accommodation occupied by the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse expired in April and it has not been possible to renew it since the owner is apparently held in custody. We are now informed that pressure is being brought to bear on the owner against the renewal of the lease. A short while ago one member of the staff who had temporarily moved to the Agency site was forcibly made to vacate his accommodation. Thus, far from assisting the Agency in obtaining suitable rented accommodation as earlier requested by the Government of India, difficulties are being placed in the way of the Agency staff continuing to occupy the accommodation which they already have.

   (ii) The Trade Agency is also experiencing difficulties in the use of the official car. Recently the local driver who had been in the service of the Agency for a long time was questioned by the authorities. In order to be on the safe side, the driver, who had already passed the prescribed driving test in Lhasa, applied for a second test. Apparently, pending consideration of his second application, the official car of the Trade Agency was stopped on the 12th July and the driver was taken into custody. Despite the efforts of the Trade Agent, even the official car was not immediately released.

(iii) Difficulties are also being experienced in the carriage of official mails between Yatung and Lhasa. A diplomatic courier was sent with special advance notice to the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi, but he has been held up in Yatung since June 30 for want of travel facilities. The requests of the Trade Agent in Gyantse for the issue of necessary permits to the normal dakwalas particularly in places like Kangma and Sanda near Gyantse have not been considered. In the absence of any assurance of the safety of our official mails, communications with the posts has been suspended. The mail for the Consulate-General in Lhasa has been held up for weeks in Gyantse. The extent of the hardship caused as a result may be judged from the fact that even tinned milk intended for the small child of the Consul-General in Lhasa was not forwarded despite a special request from the Trade Agency, Gyantse. Obviously our posts cannot function under such difficulties.

(iv) It appears that for inexplicable reasons delays are caused in transmission of telegrams from Gyantse through the Chinese Commercial Telegraph Office there.

(v) Reconstruction of Trade Agency, Gyantse.—The Agreement specifically provides for the Indian Trade Agencies continuing to hold on lease the lands within the Agency compound walls at Yatung and Gyantse. Notwithstanding this, it was after nearly two years that Chinese authorities had agreed in principle to permit the reconstruction of the Trade Agency. Despite the assurances of Chinese co-operation, all manner of difficulties have been created about commencement of the preliminary work. For several days, target practice and rifle shooting took place over the site of the Trade Agency apparently with a view to frighten the labour engaged on the construction. More recently the local authorities have ordered labourers under threat of arrest to stop working on the site. Similarly, owners of horse carts have been instructed not to lift bricks to the Trade Agency site and dealers supplying Arca (mortar) have been prohibited from making deliveries to the Agency. Despite previous promise no transport has been provided locally to help in the construction work. Meanwhile, apart from one jeep, no permit for the import of necessary transport from India for the construction work has been forthcoming.

(vi) Protective works at Gyantse.—Chinese authorities both in Lhasa and Gyantse had agreed in principle to the construction of protective works on the Agency site on our assurance that these would not damage the bridge and the highway further down the stream. Despite this assurance, the authorities summarily started to demolish a spur along the Indian property and ordered the complete stoppage of essential protective works which are intended to prevent further damage to the land of the Trade Agency.

4. The attention of the Chinese Government has already been drawn through the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi to the severe restrictions which have been placed on the movement of Indian officials as well as the Indian traders engaged in bona fide trade. The Indian Trade Agent for Western Tibet who was provided by the Chinese authorities with a visa for the Niti Pass, was required at the last minute to divert his route through Lepuleh pass. This caused him needless expense and inconvenience and prevented him from reaching his post in time.

5. A large number of Indian nationals including Muslims and some Lamas from Jammu and Kashmir State have been residing in Lhasa and the Shigatse area from before the conclusion of the 1954 Agreement. These persons were not required to carry any Indian passports in the past and do not therefore possess any. No adverse inference should be drawn against them on this ground. They are however anxious to retain their Indian nationality. According to the information of the Government of India, they are not being permitted by the Chinese authorities to contact the Consul-General of India at Lhasa and pressure is being brought to bear on them to declare themselves as Chinese nationals.

6. The Government of India have also noticed with concern the persistent propaganda in official organs in the Tibet region describing Indians as imperialists, who have inherited the British traditions and continue to exploit the Tibetans. Such propaganda is deliberately intended to create hostile feelings against India and Indian Posts in Tibet and are bound to come in the way of their normal functioning.

7. The Government of India take a serious view of the facts mentioned in the previous paragraphs. They are deeply concerned at the generally unhelpful and unfriendly attitude of the local authorities towards Indian officials and Indian nationals in the Tibet region of China. It is obvious that the Trade Agencies cannot discharge their normal functions unless customary privileges and immunities for themselves and for their couriers, mailbags and communications are fully guaranteed. They must also have suitable accommodation locally so that they can function with dignity and self-respect. So far as the Government of India are concerned, they have given in the past and continue to give the fullest facilities and privileges to the Chinese Trade Agencies in India in accordance with Article I of the 1954 Agreement. Unfortunately, repeated representations for reciprocal facilities to the Indian Trade Agencies in the Tibet region of China have produced no results. The Government of India have, therefore, begun to entertain serious doubts as to whether the Chinese Government really wish the Indian Trade Agencies in the Tibet region to continue to function. Not only are the facilities laid down in the 1954 Agreement not provided for them.
but even the normal courtesies given to foreign representatives and missions are being denied. From this it would appear that the Chinese Government do not wish these Trade Agencies to continue to function. For their functioning depends on full facilities and courtesies being provided to them by the Chinese authorities. The Government of India would like to have a clear and early answer conveying the wishes of the Chinese Government in regard to this, as the continued functioning of the Trade Agencies in China and India on a reciprocal basis will depend on that answer.
Note given to the Foreign Office of China, 19 August 1959

The Government of Bhutan have requested the Government of India who are responsible for the external relations of Bhutan to bring the following to the notice of the Chinese authorities with a request for immediate action.

2. There are eight villages within the Tibet region of China, over which Bhutan has been exercising administrative jurisdiction for more than 300 years. They are Khangri, Tarchen, Tsekhor, Diraphu, Dzung Tuphu, Jangche, Chakip and Kocha around Mount Kailash. Tarchen 80° 20' E and 30° 55' N is the administrative centre of these enclaves. They were not subject to Tibetan law nor did they pay any Tibetan taxes.

3. Recently the local Chinese authorities have seized all arms, ammunition and ponies belonging to the Bhutan officers who were in charge of these enclaves at village Tarchen. No reasons have been given for this seizure. The Government of Bhutan consider this action on the part of the local Chinese authorities as a violation of the traditional Bhutanese right and authority. The Government of India would urge that immediate instruction should be issued by the Government of the People's Republic of China for the return of the articles and the animals and for ensuring respect in the future by the local authorities for Bhutan's jurisdiction over these villages.
Note given to the Foreign Office of China, 20 August 1959

The system of Bhutan couriers crossing through Tibetan territory has been prevalent traditionally for a long time. No regulations were prescribed requiring permission or possession of any special kind of papers. Chinese authorities should notify if they wish to adopt a new procedure but meanwhile the traditional privilege of Bhutan's official couriers being permitted to use this route should be allowed to continue.

The Government of India who are responsible for the external relations of Bhutan protest against the arrest and ill-treatment of Bhutan's couriers and against restrictions being placed without notice on Bhutan nationals. In particular we protest against Bhutan couriers being prevented from approaching the Indian Trade Agency.
AGREEMENT

Between

THE REPUBLIC OF INDIA AND THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA ON TRADE AND INTERCOURSE

Between

TIBET REGION OF CHINA AND INDIA

Being desirous of promoting trade and cultural intercourse between Tibet Region of China and India and of facilitating pilgrimage and travel by the peoples of China and India.

Have resolved to enter into the present Agreement based on the following principles:

(1) mutual respect for each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty,
(2) mutual non-aggression,
(3) mutual non-interference in each other's internal affairs,
(4) equality and mutual benefit, and
(5) peaceful co-existence.

And for this purpose have appointed as their respective Plenipotentiaries:

The Government of the Republic of India, H.E. Nedyam Raghavan, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of India accredited to the People's Republic of China; the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, H.E. Chang Han-fu, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Central People's Government, who, having examined each other's credentials and finding them in good and due form, have agreed upon the following:—

Article I

The High Contracting Parties mutually agree to establish Trade Agencies:

(1) The Government of India agrees that the Government of China may establish Trade Agencies at New Delhi, Calcutta and Kalimpong.
(2) The Government of China agrees that the Government of India may establish Trade Agencies at Yatung, Gyantse and Gartok.
The Trade Agencies of both Parties shall be accorded the same status and same treatment. The Trade Agents of both Parties shall enjoy freedom from arrest while exercising their functions, and shall enjoy in respect of themselves, their wives and children who are dependent on them for livelihood freedom from search.

The Trade Agencies of both Parties shall enjoy the privileges and immunities for couriers, mail-bags and communications in code.

Article II

The High Contracting Parties agree that traders of both countries known to be customarily and specifically engaged in trade between Tibet Region of China and India may trade at the following places:

1. The Government of China agrees to specify (1) Yatung, (2) Gyzantse and (3) Phari as markets for trade. The Government of India agrees that trade may be carried on in India, including places like (1) Kalimpong, (2) Siliguri and (3) Calcutta, according to customary practice.

2. The Government of China agrees to specify (1) Gartok, (2) Pulanchung (Taklaokot), (3) Gyanima-Kharga, (4) Gyanima-Chakra, (5) Rampura, (6) Dongbra, (7) Puling-Sumdo, (8) Nabra, (9) Shantse and (10) Tashigong as markets for trade; the Government of India agrees that in future, when in accordance with the development and need of trade between the Ari District of Tibet Region of China and India, it has become necessary to specify markets for trade in the corresponding district in India adjacent to the Ari District of Tibet Region of China, it will be prepared to consider on the basis of equality and reciprocity to do so.

Article III

The High Contracting Parties agree that pilgrimage by religious believers of the two countries shall be carried on in accordance with the following provisions:

1. Pilgrims from India of Lamaist, Hindu and Buddhist faiths may visit Kang Rimpoch (Kailas) and Mavam Tso (Manasarovar) in Tibet Region of China in accordance with custom.

2. Pilgrims from Tibet Region of China of Lamaist and Buddhist faiths may visit Banaras, Sarnath, Gaya and Sanchi in India in accordance with custom.

3. Pilgrims customarily visiting Lhasa may continue to do so in accordance with custom.

Article IV

Traders and pilgrims of both countries may travel by the following passes and route:

Also, the customary route leading to Tashigong along the valley of the Shangatsangpu (Indus) River may continue to be traversed in accordance with custom.
For travelling across the border, the High Contracting Parties agree that diplomatic personnel, officials and nationals of the two countries shall hold passports issued by their own respective countries and visaed by the other Party except as provided in Paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 4 of this Article.

(1) Traders of both countries known to be customarily and specifically engaged in trade between Tibet Region of China and India, their wives and children who are dependent on them for livelihood and their attendants will be allowed entry for purposes of trade into India or Tibet Region of China, as the case may be, in accordance with custom on the production of certificates duly issued by the local government of their own country or by its duly authorised agents and examined by the border checkpoints of the other Party.

(2) Inhabitants of the border districts of the two countries who cross the border to carry on petty trade or to visit friends and relatives may proceed to the border districts of the other Party as they have customarily done heretofore and need not be restricted to the passes and route specified in Article IV above and shall not be required to hold passports, visas or permits.

(3) Porters and mule-team drivers of the two countries who cross the border to perform necessary transportation services need not hold passports issued by their own country, but shall only hold certificates good for a definite period of time (three months, half a year or one year) duly issued by the local government of their own country or by its duly authorised agents and produce them for registration at the border checkpoints of the other Party.

(4) Pilgrims of both countries need not carry documents of certification but shall register at the border checkpoints of the other Party and receive a permit for pilgrimage.

(5) Notwithstanding the provisions of the foregoing paragraphs of this Article, either Government may refuse entry to any particular person.

(6) Persons who enter the territory of the other Party in accordance with the foregoing paragraphs of this Article may stay within its territory only after complying with the procedures specified by the other Party.

Article VI

The present Agreement shall come into effect upon ratification by both Governments and shall remain in force for eight (8) years. Extension of the present Agreement may be negotiated by the two Parties if either Party requests for it six (6) months prior to the expiry of the Agreement and the request is agreed to by the other Party.
Done in duplicate in Peking on the twentyninth day of April, 1954, in the Hindi, Chinese and English languages, all texts being equally valid.

(Sd.) NEDYAM RAGHAVAN, Plenipotentiary of the Government of the Republic of India.

NOTES EXCHANGED

NOTE

Peking, April 29, 1954

YOUR EXCELLENCY MR. VICE-ForeIGN MINISTER,

In the course of our discussions regarding the Agreement on Trade and Intercourse Between Tibet Region of China and India, which has been happily concluded today, the Delegation of the Government of the Republic of India and the Delegation of the Government of the People's Republic of China agreed that certain matters be regulated by an exchange of notes. In pursuance of this understanding, it is hereby agreed between the two Governments as follows:

(1) The Government of India will be pleased to withdraw completely within six (6) months from date of exchange of the present notes the military escorts now stationed at Yatung and Gyantse in Tibet Region of China. The Government of China will render facilities and assistance in such withdrawal.

(2) The Government of India will be pleased to hand over to the Government of China at a reasonable price the postal, telegraph and public telephone services together with their equipment operated by the Government of India in Tibet Region of China. The concrete measures in this regard will be decided upon through further negotiations between the Indian Embassy in China and the Foreign Ministry of China, which shall start immediately after the exchange of the present notes.

(3) The Government of India will be pleased to hand over to the Government of China at a reasonable price the twelve (12) rest houses of the Government of India in Tibet Region of China. The concrete measures in this regard will be decided upon through further negotiations between the Indian Embassy in China and the Foreign Ministry of China, which shall start immediately after the exchange of the present notes. The Government of China agrees that they shall continue as rest houses.

(4) The Government of China agrees that all buildings within the compound walls of the Trade Agencies of the Government of India at Yatung and Gyantse in Tibet Region of China may be retained by the Government of India. The Government of India may continue to lease the land within its Agency compound walls from the Chinese side. And the Government of India agrees that the Trade Agencies of the Government of China at Kalimpong and Calcutta may lease lands from the Indian side for the use of the Agencies and construct buildings thereon. The Government of China will render every possible assistance for housing the Indian Trade Agency at Gartok. The Government of India will also render every possible assistance for housing the Chinese Trade Agency at New Delhi.

(5) The Government of India will be pleased to return to the Government of China all lands used or occupied by the Government of India other than the lands within its Trade Agency compound walls at Yatung.

If there are godowns and buildings of the Government of India on the above-mentioned lands used or occupied and to be returned by the Government of India and if Indian traders have stores, godowns or buildings on the above-mentioned lands so that there is a need to continue leasing lands, the Government of China agrees to sign contracts with the Government of India or Indian traders, as the case may be, for leasing to them those parts of the land occupied by the said godowns, buildings or stores and pertaining thereto.

(6) The Trade Agents of both Parties may, in accordance with the laws and regulations of the local governments, have access to their nationals involved in civil or criminal cases.

(7) The Trade Agents and traders of both countries may hire employees in the locality.

(8) The hospitals of the Indian Trade Agencies at Gyantse and Yatung will continue to serve personnel of the Indian Trade Agencies.

(9) Each Government shall protect the person and property of the traders and pilgrims of the other country.

(10) The Government of China agrees, so far as possible, to construct rest houses for the use of pilgrims along the route from Pulanchung (Taklakot) to Kang Rimpoche (Kailas) and Mavam Tso (Manasarovar); and the Government of India agrees to place all possible facilities in India at the disposal of pilgrims.

(11) Traders and pilgrims of both countries shall have the facility of hiring means of transportation at normal and reasonable rates.

(12) The three Trade Agencies of each Party may function throughout the year.

(13) Traders of each country may rent buildings and godowns in accordance with local regulations in places under the jurisdiction of the other Party.

(14) Traders of both countries may carry on normal trade in accordance with local regulations at places as provided in Article II of the Agreement.

(15) Disputes between traders of both countries over debts and claims shall be handled in accordance with local laws and regulations.

On behalf of the Government of the Republic of India I hereby agree that the present Note along with Your Excellency's reply shall become an agreement between our two Governments which shall come into force upon the exchange of the present Notes.

I avail myself of this opportunity to express to Your Excellency Mr. Vice-Foreign Minister, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Sd.) N. RAGHAVAN,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the Republic of India.

His Excellency Mr. Chang Han-fu,
Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs,
Central People’s Government,
People’s Republic of China.
NOTE

Peking, April 29, 1954

YOUR EXCELLENCY MR. AMBASSADOR,

I have the honour to receive your note dated April 29, 1954, which reads:

‘* * * * * * * *
* * * * * * * *
* * * * * * * *
* * * * * * * *’

On behalf of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, I hereby agree to Your Excellency's note, and your note along with the present note in reply shall become an agreement between our two Governments, which shall come into force upon the exchange of the present notes.

I avail myself of this opportunity to express to Your Excellency, Mr. Ambassador, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Sd.) CHANG HAN-FU,
Vice-Minister,
Ministry of Foreign Affairs.
People's Republic of China.

H. E. NEDYAM RAGHAVAN,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary,
Republic of India.
NOTES REGARDING RATIFICATION

Peking, August 17, 1954

EXCELLENCY,

I have the honour to state that:

WHEREAS an agreement between the Government of the Republic of India and the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China on trade and intercourse between Tibet region of China and India was signed at Peking on the 29th day of April, 1954, by the respective plenipotentiaries of the two Governments, namely,

For the Government of the Republic of India.
His Excellency Nedyam Raghavan, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of India,
For the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China.
His Excellency Chang Han-fu,
Which Agreement is reproduced, word for word, in the Annexure hereto,

AND WHEREAS the Government of the Republic of India has ratified this Agreement on the 3rd June, 1954.

I request you to convey information of the said ratification to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to you, Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration.

NEDYAM RAGHAVAN,
Ambassador of the Republic of India.

His Excellency Mr. Chou En-lai,
Minister for Foreign Affairs,
Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, Peking.
No. M/680/54

August 17, 1954

EXCELLENCY,

I have the honour to inform you that the Agreement between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India on Trade and Intercourse between Tibet Region of China and India, which was signed at Peking on the 29th of April, 1954, by Chang Han-fu, Vice-Minister, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, for the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, and Nedyam Raghavan, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the Republic of India to the People's Republic of China, for the Government of the Republic of India, was subsequently ratified on the 3rd of June, 1954, by the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China.

I hereby request you to convey information of the said ratification to the Government of India.

The Agreement is reproduced, word for word, in the annexure hereto.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to you, Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Sd.) YUAN CHUNG-HSIEN,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the People's Republic of China.

His Excellency Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Minister for External Affairs,
Government of the Republic of India,
New Delhi.
Trade Agreement between the Republic of India and the People's Republic of China, 14 October 1954

The Government of the Republic of India and the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, animated by the common desire to develop trade between the two countries and to strengthen further the friendship that already exists between the Governments and the peoples of India and China have, on the basis of equality and mutual benefit, reached agreements as follows:—

Article I

The two contracting parties being desirous of adopting all appropriate measures for the expansion of trade between the two countries agree to give the fullest consideration to all suggestions for the promotion of such trade.

Article II

The two contracting parties agree that all commercial transactions between the two countries shall be carried out in accordance with the Import, Export and Foreign Exchange Regulations in force from time to time in their respective countries.

Article III

The two contracting parties agree to accord, subject to the laws and regulations of the two countries for the time being in force, facilities for the import and export of the commodities mentioned in the attached Schedules "A" and "B".

Article IV

The present Agreement will not preclude the two contracting parties from facilitating trade in commodities not mentioned in the attached Schedules "A" and "B".

Article V

The Trade between the Republic of India and the Tibet Region of the People's Republic of China will be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Agreement between the Republic of India and the People's Republic of China on Trade and Intercourse between India and the Tibet Region of China signed in Peking on the 29th April 1954.

Article VI

The Government of the Republic of India agree that on request by the Government of the People's Republic of China, they will subject to the regulations in force, accord reasonable facilities for the entry into the Port of Calcutta and subsequent movement to the Tibet Region of the People's Republic of China, of such commercial goods as cannot be obtained in India. These facilities will be accorded only to goods of Chinese origin.

Article VII

All commercial and non-commercial payments between the Republic of India and the People's Republic of China may be effected in Indian rupees or in pounds sterling as may be mutually convenient. For the purpose of facilitating such payments, the People's Bank of China will open one or more account(s) with one or more commercial bank(s) in India authorised to deal in Foreign Exchange to be called account(s) “A”. In addition, the People's Bank of China will, if necessary, open another account with the Reserve Bank of India to be called account “B”. All payments between the two countries will be made through account(s) “A”. Account “B” will be used only for replenishing the balance(s) in Account(s) “A” whenever necessary. Payments to be made by residents of India to residents of the People's Republic of China will be effected by crediting the amounts of such payments to the above-mentioned account(s) “A”. Payments to be made to residents of India by residents of the People's Republic of China will be effected by debiting the said account(s) “A”. The account(s) “A” will be replenished as and when necessary by one of the following methods, namely:—

(i) by transfer of funds from another account “A” of the People's Bank of China with another commercial bank, or from account “B” with the Reserve Bank of India;

(ii) by sale of sterling to the bank concerned. Account “B” will be replenished by either sale of sterling to the Reserve Bank of India or by transfer of funds from account(s) “A”.

2. Article VII of this Agreement covers the following payments:—

(i) Payments for the commodities imported or exported under the present Agreement;

(ii) Payments connected with commercial transactions and covering insurance, freight (in case of shipments of goods by the ships of either country) port charges, storage and forwarding expenses and bunkering;

(iii) Payments for distribution of films, for incomes and expenses of cultural performances and other exhibitions;

(iv) Payments of expenses on account of tours of delegations of commercial, cultural, social or official nature;

(v) Payments for the maintenance of the Embassy, Consulates and Trade Agencies of the Republic of India in China and for the maintenance of the Embassy, Consulates and Trade Agencies of the People's Republic of China in India;

(vi) Other non-commercial payments on which agreement is reached between the Reserve Bank of India and the People's Bank of China.

3. Any balances on the credit side of the account(s) “A” or Account “B” maintained by the People's Bank of China will be convertible on demand into sterling at any time at the usual Banks’ selling rate for sterling as fixed from time to time by the Indian Exchange Banks’ Association. The above mentioned balances will be convertible into sterling even after the expiry of this Agreement.

4. Payments for Border Trade between the Republic of India and of the People's Republic of China, however, will be settled according to the customary practice.

Article VIII

The two contracting parties agree to consult with each other on questions that may arise in the course of the implementation of the present Agreement.

Article IX

This Agreement will come into force from the date of its signature and will remain valid for a period of two years.

This Agreement can be extended or renewed by negotiation between the two contracting parties to be commenced three months prior to its expiry.

Done in duplicate in New Delhi on the fourteenth Day of October 1954, in the Hindi, Chinese and English languages, all texts being equally authentic.

(Sd.) KUNG YUAN, (Sd.) H. V. R. IENGAR, China.
SCHEDULE A

Goods available for Export from China to India

1. Cereals—
   (1) Rice.
   (2) Cereals other than rice.
   (3) Green Beans.
   (4) Soyabeans—green and black.

3. Minerals—
   (1) Antimony, Crude and Regulus.
   (2) Gypsum.
   (3) Graphite.
   (4) Fluorspar.
   (5) Sulphur.
   (6) Realgar (Munsell).
   (7) Orpiment.
   (8) Borax.
   (9) Naphthalene Refined.
   (10) Clay.
   (11) Arsenolite (Arsenic Oxide).

4. Silk and Silk piecegoods—
   (1) White and Yellow Raw Silk, Steam Filature.
   (2) Spun Silk.
   (3) Tussah Silk (Wild Silk).
   (4) Douppion Silk.
   (5) Silk piecegoods.
   (6) Fuji Silk piecegoods.
   (7) Tussah Silk piecegoods.
5. Animal Products—

(1) Wool.
(2) Skins and Hides.
(3) Duck Feathers, Goose Feathers.
(4) Woollen Yarn.
(5) White Wax.
(6) Honey.

6. Paper and Stationery—

(1) Newsprint.
(2) Mechanical Pulp free printing paper.
(3) Packing paper.
(4) Stencil paper.
(5) Blotting paper.
(6) Fountain pen.
(7) Pencil.
(8) Ink.
(9) Printing Ink.
(10) Numbering Machine.

7. Chemicals—

(1) Dinitrochloro-Benzene.
(2) Sodium Phosphate.
(3) Carbolic Acid (Phenol).
(4) Potassium Carbonate.
(5) Mono-chloro-benzene.
(6) 666 Insecticide.
(7) Bleaching Powder.

8. Oils—

(1) Tung Oil (Wood Oil).
(2) Cinnamon Oil.
(3) Peppermint Oil.

9. Miscellaneous—

(1) Camphor.
(2) Cassia Lignea.
(3) Musk.
(4) Nutgall.
(5) Aniseed star (star anise).
(6) Menthol Crystal.
(7) Appricot Kernel.
(8) Galangal.
(9) Resin.
(10) Vegetable Medicinal substances.
(11) Hair net.
(12) Fluorescent tubes.
(13) Paint.
(14) Bicycles.
(15) Sports goods.
(16) Porcelain.
(17) Glass and glassware.
(18) Printed matter and books.
(19) Canned goods.
(20) Torch lights.
(21) Vacuum flash.
(22) Buttons.
(23) Lacquer ware.
(24) Fire crackers.
(25) Hosiery needles.
(26) Stitching needles.
(27) Fish and sea products.
(28) Dried fruits.
(29) Vegetables and vegetable products.
(30) Garlic.
(31) Vermicelli.
(32) Chinese films (exposed).
SCHEDULE B

PART I

Goods available for Export from India to China, including Tibet

Food Products and Tobacco—

(1) Grams, Rice and Pulses.

(2) Spices including chillies and pepper.

(3) Tobacco unmanufactured.

Raw materials and articles mainly unmanufactured

Ores and Concentrates—

(1) Chrome Ore.

(2) Kyanite Ore.

(3) Manganese Ore.

(4) Tin and Zinc Concentrates.

Oils, Vegetable—

Groundnut Oil.

Oils, Essential—

(1) Lemon grass oil.

(2) Sandalwood oil.

Textile fibres—

(1) Cotton raw.

(2) Wool raw.

Wood and Timber—

Sandal wood.

Hides and skins—

Raw goat skins and sheep skins of heavier variety and hides and skins tanned.

Miscellaneous—

(1) Myrobalan and Myrobalan extracts.

(2) Paraffin wax.

(3) Art Shellac.

Articles mainly manufactured

Chemicals, Chemical Products and drugs and medicines—

(1) Chemicals (Bichromates), Calcium Chloride, Chromic acid, Glycerine, Magnesium Chloride, Magnesium Sulphate, Naphthalene, Potassium Bromide, Potassium Nitrate, Sodium Bromide, Sodium Sulphide, Sodium Sulphite.
(2) Drugs, medicines and medicinal herbs.
(3) Processed dyes.
(4) Shark Liver Oil.

Instruments, apparatus and appliances—

(1) Clinical Thermometers.
(2) Electric lamps.
(3) Electric insulating materials.
(4) Electro-medical apparatus.
(5) Mathematical instruments.
(6) Surgical instruments.
(7) X-Ray equipment.
(8) Telephone.
(9) Electric Fans.

Machinery—

(1) Ball and Roller bearings.
(2) Generators.
(3) Motors.
(4) Textile Machinery including Spindles, ring frames, carding engines, looms and finishing machinery.
(5) Boilers.

Metal Manufactures—

(1) Aluminium, brass and copper wares.
(2) Iron and Steel manufactures excluding containers.
(3) Non-ferrous metal products.

Textiles—

(1) Cotton piecegoods and cotton manufactures.
(2) Cotton twist and yarn.
(3) Flax manufactures.
(4) Sisal ropes and twine.
(5) Jute manufactures.

Vehicles—

(1) Bicycles.
(2) Motor Cars.
Miscellaneous—
(1) Indian films exposed.
(2) Light engineering goods: centrifugal pumps, G.I. buckets, hurricane lanterns, sewing machines.
(3) Plastic manufactures.
(4) Shellac.
(5) Mica.
(6) Asbestos cement sheets.
(7) Cement.
(8) Hume pipes.
(9) Builders’ hardware.
(10) Tyres and tubes.
(11) Belting for machinery.
(12) Paper.
(13) Bituminous composition.
(14) Agricultural implements.
(15) Disinfectants.

PART II

Goods available for Export from India to the Tibet Region of China

Food Products and Tobacco—
(1) Confectionery.
(2) Hydrogenated Oil.
(3) Tinned fruits and vegetables.
(4) Cigarettes.

Raw materials and articles mainly unmanufactured

Oils, Vegetable—
(1) Castor Oil.
(2) Kardiseed Oil.
(3) Linseed Oil.
(4) Mustard Oil.
(5) Nigerseed Oil.
(6) Rapeseed Oil.

Textiles—
Apparel.

Miscellaneous—
Gums other than gum arabic.

Articles mainly manufactured

Instruments, apparatus and appliances—
(1) Accumulators.
(2) Electric wires and cables.
(3) Scientific instruments.
(4) Transmission line equipment.
(5) Wireless instruments.

Machinery—
Control and transmission gear.

Metal manufactures—
(1) Bolts and nuts.
(2) Enamelware.
(3) Wood screws.

Stationery including paper—
Paper and Stationery.

Vehicles—
(1) Trucks.
(2) Carriages and carts.
(3) Wheels and shafts for carts.

Miscellaneous—
(1) Candles.
(2) Clocks.
(3) Coral manufactured.
(4) Matches.
(5) Soaps and washing powders.
(6) Toilet requisites.
(7) Lard.
(8) Pork.
(9) Sugar.
(10) Rain coats.
(11) Rubber shoes.
(12) Reinforcement steel bars.
(13) Galvanized iron wire.
(14) Barbed wire.
(15) Steel plates and sheets.
(16) Road Rollers.
(17) Gasoline, Kerosene, Diesel and Engine Oils.
(18) Galvanized iron sheets, plain and corrugated.
(19) Leather and leather goods.
(20) Safety razor blades.
(21) Biscuits.
(22) Rubber manufactures other than tyres and tubes.
(23) Sheet glass and glassware.
(24) Sports goods.
LETTERS
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
MINISTRY OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY

New Delhi, 14th October, 1954.

Dear Mr. Kung,

In the course of the discussions that have led to the conclusion of the Trade Agreement between the Government of the Republic of India and the Government of the People's Republic of China, it was agreed that the intentions of the two Governments regarding Article VI and the procedure for its implementation should be placed on record by an exchange of letters.

2. On the basis of equality and mutual benefit, both Governments desire to maintain and develop the existing customary trade between India and the Tibet Region of the People's Republic of China.

3. The Government of the Republic of India appreciate that the Tibet Region of the People's Republic of China may need certain commercial goods that cannot be obtained in India and are, therefore, willing to give reasonable facilities for the clearance of such goods through Calcutta for movement to the Tibet Region of the People's Republic of China, provided the goods are of Chinese origin.

4. It is agreed that the following broad lines of procedure may be adopted for the clearance and movement of the goods mentioned in the preceding paragraphs:

(i) With a view to facilitating clearance and transport, the Government of the People's Republic of China will give advance intimation to the Government of India of such goods to be transported to the Tibet Region of the People's Republic of China, in order to ascertain with reference to the availability of such goods in India, whether clearance and movement facilities can be accorded. Matters pertaining to the transportation of such goods will be discussed and settled between the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi and the Government of India.

(ii) The goods agreed to be cleared shall, on import, be entered at the Custom House in the Port of Calcutta.

(iii) Subject to the Indian Customs Regulations, and on a deposit being made as required by the Customs Authorities, the goods will be cleared under Customs seal for onward despatch to the Tibet Region of the People's Republic of China by the agreed routes.

(iv) The goods will be produced with the Customs seals intact before the Land Customs Officer at the point of final exit. and cleared for export to the Tibet Region of the People's Republic of China.

(v) The Land Customs Officer will, if the goods are received with seals intact, clear the goods and grant a certificate to that effect.

(vi) On presentation of such certificate to the Customs Authorities at the Port of Calcutta, the deposit shall be returned with such deductions for incidental charges as may be mutually agreed upon.

5. This letter and your confirmation will be treated by both Governments as forming part of the Agreement.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) H. V. R. IENGAR.

His Excellency Mr. Kung Yuan,
Vice-Minister for Foreign Trade and Leader of the Chinese Trade Delegation,
New Delhi.
New Delhi, 14th October 1954.

SHRI IENGAR,

I have today received with thanks your letter dated the 14th October 1954, which reads as follows:

"..............."

I agree to the contents stated in your aforesaid letter on behalf of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China. Your letter and this confirmation will be treated as forming part of the Agreement.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) KUNG YUAN.

Shri H. V. R. Iengar,
Secretary to the Government of India,
Ministry of Commerce and Industry,
New Delhi.
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

MINISTRY OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY

New Delhi, 14th October, 1954.

DEAR MR. KUNG,

During the course of the negotiations which have led to the conclusion of the present Trade Agreement between India and China, both the Delegations recognised that the problems concerning inspection, surveys, shipping, insurance and travel by businessmen should be considered and solved in a practical manner so that the objectives of the Agreement are better achieved and trade relations between the two countries further strengthened. These problems relate to questions of detail rather than of principle and the two Delegations have accordingly agreed to defer the discussion on these matters to a later date. It is hoped that in these subsequent discussions our two Governments will be able to arrive at constructive solutions that will help to encourage and stimulate the smooth flow of trade between our two countries.

2. In the meanwhile, the trade between the two countries will continue to be conducted on such basis as may be agreed upon between the importers and exporters concerned.

3. This letter and your confirmation will be treated by both Governments as forming part of the Agreement.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) H. V. R. IENGAR.

His Excellency Mr. Kung Yuan,
Vice-Minister for Foreign Trade and Leader of the Chinese Trade Delegation,
New Delhi.
New Delhi, 14th October 1954.

'SHRI IENGAR,

I have today received with thanks your letter dated the 14th October 1954, which reads as follows: —

" ...................

I agree to the contents stated in your aforesaid letter on behalf of the Central People’s Government of the People’s Republic of China. Your letter and this confirmation will be treated as forming part of the Agreement.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) KUNG YUAN.

'Shri H. V. R. Iengar,
'Secretary to the Government of India,
'Ministry of Commerce and Industry,
'New Delhi.
Letters exchanged at New Delhi on 25 May 1957, extending the Trade Agreement between India and the People’s Republic of China for a further period ending 31 December 1958.

EMBASSY OF THE PEOPLE’S REPUBLIC OF CHINA IN INDIA,
NEW DELHI.

May 25, 1957.

Dear Mr. Ranganathan,

I have the honour to refer to the recent discussions regarding promotion of trade between the People’s Republic of China and India when it was agreed that the trade relations between our two countries will continue to be regulated by the terms and conditions embodied in the Trade Agreement concluded on the 14th October 1954 for a further period ending 31st December 1958, subject to the substitution of Article VII of the old Agreement by the following Article:

“All commercial and non-commercial payments between the People’s Republic of China and the Republic of India may be effected in Indian rupees. For the purpose of facilitating such payments, the People’s Bank of China and/or other commercial banks in China will open one or more account(s) with one or more commercial bank(s) in India authorised to deal in foreign exchange. In addition, the People’s Bank of China will open another account with the Reserve Bank of India. All payments between the two countries will be made through the account(s) maintained with the commercial bank(s). Payments to be made by residents of India to residents of the People’s Republic of China will be effected by crediting the amounts of such payments to the above mentioned account(s) with the commercial bank(s) in India. Payments to be made to residents of India by residents of the People’s Republic of China will be effected by debiting the said account(s) with the commercial bank(s) in India. The account(s) with the commercial bank(s) in India will be replenished as and when necessary by one of the following methods, namely:—

(i) by transfer of funds from another account(s) of the People’s Bank of China or the commercial bank(s) in China with another commercial bank(s) in India, or

(ii) by transfer of funds from the account of the People’s Bank of China with the Reserve Bank of India, or

(iii) by sale of sterling to the bank concerned.

The account of the People’s Bank of China with the Reserve Bank of India will be replenished either by sale of sterling to the Reserve Bank of India or by transfer of funds from the account(s) of the People’s Bank of China or the commercial bank(s) in China with the commercial bank(s) in India.
2. Article VII of this Agreement covers the following payments:—

(i) Payments for the commodities imported or exported under the present Agreement;

(ii) Payments connected with commercial transaction and covering insurance, freight (in case of shipments of goods by the ships of either country), port charges, storage and forwarding expenses and bunkering;

(iii) Payments for distribution of films, for incomes and expenses of cultural performances and other exhibitions;

(iv) Payments of expenses on account of tours of delegations of commercial, cultural, social or official nature;

(v) Payments for the maintenance of the Embassy, Consulates and Trade Agencies of the People's Republic of China in India and for the maintenance of the Embassy, Consulates and Trade Agencies of the Republic of India in China;

(vi) Other non-commercial payments on which agreement is reached between the Reserve Bank of India and the People's Bank of China.

3. Any balance in the Rupee account maintained by the People's Bank of China with the Reserve Bank of India will be convertible on demand into sterling at the usual Banks selling rate for sterling as fixed from time to time by the Indian Exchange Banks' Association. The above-mentioned balance will also be convertible into sterling after the expiry of this Agreement.

4. Payments for Border Trade between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India, however, will be settled according to the customary practice.

The new Article VII will come into force with effect from the 1st July 1957.

I shall be glad if you will please confirm that the above correctly sets out the understanding reached between us.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) PAN TZU-LI,

Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the People's Republic of China to India.

Shri S. Ranganathan, I.C.S.,
Secretary to the Government of India,
Ministry of Commerce and Industry,
New Delhi.
New Delhi, 25th May, 1957.

Dear Mr. Pan Tzu-Li,

I write to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated May 25, 1957, which reads as follows:

"""

I confirm that the foregoing correctly sets out the understanding reached between us.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) S. RANGANATHAN,
Secretary to the Government of India

H.E. Mr. Pan Tzu-Li,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the People’s Republic of China in India,
New Delhi
DEAR MR. TU,

In the course of discussions which we had recently regarding further development of trade between the People's Republic of China and India, it was agreed that the Government of the People's Republic of China will encourage the State Trading Corporations of China to establish and strengthen contacts to the extent practicable with the State Trading Corporation of India in those commodities which are handled by the State Trading Corporation of India.

I shall be grateful if you would kindly confirm that the foregoing correctly sets out the understanding reached between us.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) K. B. LALL,
Joint Secretary to the Government of India.

Mr. Tu Yu-Yun,
Counsellor for Commercial Affairs,
Embassy of the People's Republic of China,
New Delhi.
DEAR MR. LALL,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of today's date which reads as follows:—

"..............."

I confirm that the foregoing correctly sets out the understanding reached between us.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) TU YU-YUN,
Counsellor for Commercial Affairs,
Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India.

Shri K. B. Lall,
Joint Secretary to the Government of India, Ministry of Commerce and Industry, New Delhi.
Letters extending the Indo-Chinese Trade Agreement up to 31 December 1959

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
MINISTRY OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY

New Delhi, 25th May, 1959.

Jyaistha 4, 1881 (S)

Dear Mr. Tu,

With reference to Article IX of the Trade Agreement between the Republic of India and the People’s Republic of China concluded on the 14th October, 1954 and the recent discussions regarding the promotion of trade between the two countries, I have the honour to say that the two contracting parties have agreed that the present Trade Agreement as modified by the letters exchanged on the 25th May, 1957, shall remain valid up to the 31st December, 1959.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) K. B. LALL,
Additional Secretary to the Government of India.

Mr. Tu Yu-Yun,
Counsellor for Commercial Affairs,
Embassy of the People’s Republic of China,
New Delhi.
DEAR MR. LALL,

With reference to Article IX of the Trade Agreement between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India concluded on the 14th October, 1954 and the recent discussions regarding the promotion of trade between the two countries, I have the honour to say that the two contracting parties have agreed that the present Trade Agreement as modified by the letters exchanged on the 25th May, 1957, shall remain valid up to the 31st December, 1959.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) TU YU-YUN,
Counsellor for Commercial Affairs.

Mr. K. B. Lall, I.C.S.
Additional Secretary to the Government of India,
Ministry of Commerce and Industry,
New Delhi.
NOTES, MEMORANDA AND LETTERS EXCHANGED BETWEEN
THE GOVERNMENTS OF INDIA AND CHINA

SEPTEMBER—NOVEMBER 1959

AND

A NOTE ON THE HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF THE HIMALAYAN FRONTIER OF INDIA

WHITE PAPER No. II

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
NOTES, MEMORANDA AND LETTERS EXCHANGED BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENTS OF INDIA AND CHINA

SEPTEMBER—NOVEMBER 1959

AND

A NOTE ON THE HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF THE HIMALAYAN FRONTIER OF INDIA

WHITE PAPER No. II

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
On 7th September 1959, the Prime Minister presented to Parliament a White Paper containing the notes, memoranda and letters exchanged and the Agreement signed between the Government of India and the Government of People's Republic of China between April 1954 and August 1959. This White Paper contains the subsequent notes, memoranda and letters exchanged between the two Governments up to 4th November 1959 and six earlier notes and memoranda which had not been included in the first volume of the White Paper. This volume also contains a note on the historical background of the Himalayan frontier of India and a map showing the Sino-Indian boundary.

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS,
NEW DELHI.
4 November, 1959
CONTENTS

Border issues and incidents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Number</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government (Shatze and Khinzemane), I September 1959</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government (Longju and Tamaden), I September 1959</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Longju), 3 September 1959</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government (Hoti), 7 September 1959</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Khinzemane and Longju), 10 September 1959</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Hoti), 13 September 1959</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government (Kongka Pass), 22 October 1959</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Kongka Pass), 23 October 1959</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government (Kongka Pass), 25 October 1959</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government (Chang Chenmo Valley), 4 November 1959</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Sino-Indian boundary disputes

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Number</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>11</td>
<td>Letter from the Prime Minister of China to the Prime Minister of India, 8 September 1959</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12</td>
<td>Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China, 26 September 1959</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Territorial air space

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Number</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>13</td>
<td>Note Verbale of the Indian Government, 24 July 1959</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 7 September 1959</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 14 September 1959</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 16 September 1959</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Indian Government, 29 September 1959</td>
<td>57</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Territorial waters

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Number</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>18</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 7 September 1959</td>
<td>58</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 13 September 1959</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 20 October 1959</td>
<td>61</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Complaint about alleged intrusion into Chinese Embassy

22. Note of the Chinese Government, 5 September 1959
23. Note of the Indian Government, 19 September 1959

Propaganda activities of Chinese Mission in India

25. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 23 October 1959

Treatment of Indian representatives and nationals in Tibet

27. Memorandum of the Indian Government, 11 July 1959
29. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 21 August 1959
31. Note of the Indian Government, 29 August 1959
32. Note of the Chinese Government, 11 September 1959
33. Note of the Indian Government, 17 September 1959
34. Note of the Indian Government, 24 September 1959
35. Note of the Indian Government, 24 September 1959
36. Note of the Indian Government, 26 October 1959
37. Note of the Indian Government, 26 October 1959
38. Note of the Indian Government, 26 October 1959
39. Note of the Indian Government, 29 October 1959
40. Memorandum of the Indian Government, 30 October 1959

APPENDICES

1. A note on the historical background of the Himalayan frontier of India
2. Map of India showing the Sino-Indian boundary
Note given to the Ambassador of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 1 September 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to reply to the Embassy's Note of August 11 as follows:

According to reports received by the Chinese Government, at 07:00 hours on August 7, seven Indian armed personnel were suddenly discovered to have intruded into Chinese territory at Shatze by Chinese frontier guards patrolling there on Chinese soil. At 10:30 hours on the same day, more than 10 Indian armed personnel again intruded into the above-mentioned place. In order to safeguard their territory against violation, the Chinese frontier guards promptly advised them to withdraw from Chinese territory. The Indian armed personnel thereupon left the above place. But starting from August 9, Indian armed personnel again unlawfully intruded many times into Shatze and Khinzemane, both within Chinese territory. On August 14, when Chinese frontier guards patrolled to Khinzemane, they repeatedly warned the Indian armed personnel who had unlawfully intruded there to withdraw from Chinese territory. These Indian armed personnel, however, did not heed the solemn warnings of the Chinese frontier guards; they not only failed to withdraw from Chinese territory promptly, but even camped there and deployed forces to control the surrounding important positions to prevent the Chinese frontier guards from entering, in an attempt to seize by force the above-said Chinese territory.

In addition, the Chinese Government has learnt that on June 28, 1959, more than 10 Indian armed personnel unlawfully intruded into Chinese territory at the Kechilang pasture-ground, west of Shatze, and peremptorily set up so-called Sino-Indian boundary marks at Latze Pass which is within Chinese territory.

The Chinese Government wishes to point out solemnly that the above-mentioned places are undoubtedly parts of Chinese territory. The stationing and patrolling by Chinese frontier guards on their own soil by no means involve so-called violation of the Indian border. The Chinese Government expresses great surprise and regret at the allegations made in the Indian Government's Note that the above-mentioned places belong to India, that the boundary runs along Thangia Ridge north of Namkha Chuthangmu Valley, and that Chinese troops in this area violated the Indian border. The Chinese Government absolutely cannot agree to these allegations which are totally inconsistent with the facts.

The Chinese Government must also point out that the unlawful intrusion into Chinese territory by the above-mentioned Indian armed personnel, their arbitrary setting up of boundary marks within Chinese territory, and especially their brazen camping and stationing on Chinese territory in defiance of the repeated warnings served by the Chinese frontier guards, in an attempt to seize Chinese territory indefinitely, constitute serious encroachments upon China's sovereignty and territorial integrity, violations of the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence and direct threat to the peace of this area. Regarding this, the Chinese Government hereby lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government and, in view of the grave nature of the situation, demands that the Indian Government immediately order the above-mentioned Indian armed personnel who have intruded to withdraw from Chinese territory, and adopt effective measures to seriously ensure against the occurrence of similar incidents in the future.

The Chinese Government, out of considerations for the friendly relationship between the two countries, has been trying its best to avoid any armed clashes. However, it cannot but point out with regret that, after the above-mentioned intrusion of Chinese territory by Indian armed personnel, the Indian Government, in its Note dated August 11, arbitrarily described the place within Chinese territory which has been intruded into by the Indian armed personnel as belonging to India, and declared in a threatening and provocative tone that the Indian security forces had instructions not to scruple using force to prevent Chinese troops from entering this place. The Chinese Government must point out that this decision of the Indian Government has already created an extremely dangerous situation in this area. Should the Indian Government fail to change this decision at once, to have the Indian armed forces promptly withdraw from Chinese territory which they have seized unlawfully, responsibility for all the serious consequences arising therefrom will necessarily rest with the Indian Government.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given to the Ambassador of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 1 September 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China and has the honour to state, on instructions, once again the following regarding Indian armed forces' unlawful violation of Chinese territory at Longju in the Migyitun area and Tamaden and their armed provocation against Chinese troops in the Migyitun area:

1. According to verified investigation conducted by the Chinese Government, it is confirmed without any doubt that the armed clash between Chinese and Indian troops which occurred on August 25, 1959 in the southern part of Migyitun in the Tibet Region of China was solely caused by Indian troops' unlawful intrusion into the Migyitun area and their unwarranted provocative attack on Chinese troops. The facts pointed out in the Note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs handed over to the Embassy on August 27 were true and established. The Indian troops must bear full responsibility for this serious border incident. The actual fact was as follows: Around 06:00 hours on August 25, when Chinese troops were patrolling in the southern part of Migyitun, a group of Indian troops which had intruded into that area suddenly opened fire on the Chinese troops without giving any warning, discharging dozens of rounds of machine-gun and rifle shots. Only after the Chinese troops under compulsion fired back in self defence, did the Indian troops withdraw from the area of clash. The Chinese troops then neither arrested any Indian soldiers, nor out-flanked any out-post of the Indian troops at Longju. But in the morning of the next day, that is, August 26, the Indian troops at the Longju out-post went further in carrying out new provocations, once again launching a violent attack on the Chinese troops in Migyitun, discharging as many as several hundreds of rounds of rifle, sten-gun and light and heavy machine-gun shots. On the same day, Indian aircraft many times violated China's air space over this area. At the time the Chinese troops merely held their own posts; they did not strike back against the Indian troops' provocation, not to speak of so-called encircling Indian troops' outpost at Longju. The Indian troops stationing at Longju withdrew subsequently on their own accord. Thus it can be seen that the Chinese troops acted entirely in self defence and to preserve China's territorial integrity, and throughout the incidents demonstrated the greatest toleration and self-restraint. Nevertheless, in its Note handed over to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on August 27 by the Indian Embassy in China, the Indian Government groundlessly accused Chinese troops of violating Indian border, opening fire first on the Indian troops, out-flanking and encircling the Indian post at Longju and even arresting twelve Indian soldiers, etc., etc. These in no way correspond to the facts. The Chinese Government categorically rejects the allegation made in the Embassy's Note that the Chinese troops carried out deliberate aggression on India as well as the Indian Government's unwarranted protest, and once again lodges its serious protest with the Indian Government against the violation of the above-mentioned Chinese territory and repeated armed provocations by the Indian troops.

2. Although the Chinese troops did not cross for a single step into Longju during the incidents on August 25 and 26, it must, however, be pointed out that Longju is indisputably part of Chinese territory, and that the invasion and occupation of that place and the setting up of outposts there by the Indian troops constitute a grave violation of China's territorial integrity. The Indian Government's claim that Longju be Indian territory as made in the Notes of the Indian Embassy in China of June 27 and August 27 is entirely groundless; the Chinese Government absolutely cannot agree to this claim.

Longju is part of the Migyitun area and has all along been under the jurisdiction of the Tibet Region of China. After the peaceful liberation of Tibet, the Chinese People's Liberation Army for long stationed units there, and Chinese authorities took various administrative measures locally, including the issuance of agricultural loans. It was only not long ago that the place was unlawfully invaded and occupied by Indian troops taking advantage of an interval resulting from the shift of Chinese troops.

As the Indian Government is aware, the Chinese Government has pointed out that no section of the Sino-Indian boundary has ever been formally delimited; the boundary between the two countries is yet to be settled through surveys and discussions between the two sides. The Chinese Government has also repeatedly pointed out that the so-called traditional boundary between India and the eastern part of the Tibet Region of China as referred to by the Indian Government, i.e., the so-called McMahon Line, was set forth in the past by the British imperialists unilaterally and has never been accepted by the Chinese Government; it of course cannot be regarded as legal. Nevertheless, even by documents and maps related to this so-called traditional boundary as set forth by the British, Longju is unquestionably within Chinese territory. It can thus be seen that the Indian Government's claim that Longju belongs to India is devoid of any ground no matter viewed from what aspect.

In Premier Chou En-lai's letter to Prime Minister Nehru dated January 23, 1959, the Chinese Government, in order to avoid any border incidents so far as possible pending the formal delimitation of the boundary between the two countries, proposed to the Indian Government that, as a provisional measure, each side temporarily maintain the status quo of the border areas under its administration and not go beyond them. To this proposal Prime Minister Nehru expressed his agreement in his reply dated March 22, 1959. Yet the Indian Government claimed Longju to be Indian territory and occupied it by troops. This was an attempt to change the status quo of Longju by force. The Chinese Government cannot but lodge a strong protest against this.

Now that the Indian troops have withdrawn from Longju of their own accord, the Chinese Government emphatically urges the Indian Government to adopt measures at once to prevent Indian troops from committing any new violation against Longju. Otherwise the Indian side must bear full responsibility for all the serious consequences arising therefrom. The Chinese Government must also point out that some remnant Tibetan rebel bandits are still using areas under Indian administration as bases to carry out harassment against Migyitun, Longju and other places. The Chinese Government asks the Indian Government to take effective measures also to put a stop to this.

3. In its Note dated June 27, 1959, the Indian Government also claimed Tamaden which is east of Migyitun to be Indian territory. After investigations, the Chinese Government is in possession of reliable materials which prove that that place likewise has long been Chinese territory, and even by the so-called traditional boundary, i.e., the so-called MacMahon Line as set forth in the past by the British, the place is located to the north of that Line. The Chinese Government asks the Indian Government to order the Indian troops now still occupying the place to withdraw immediately and completely.

It is clear from the above that the fact is not, as alleged in the Indian Government's Notes, that Chinese troops have repeatedly violated Indian territory or that the Chinese Government has been asserting its territorial claims by force; quite contrary, it is the Indian troops that have repeatedly violated Chinese territory and the Indian Government that has been asserting its illegitimate territorial claims by force. In its Notes, the Indian Government more than once said that it had instructed its frontier troops to use force against Chinese troops. This action not only constitutes a deliberate intimidation against China but has already led to serious consequences. The Chinese Government deems that the recent unwarranted provocations by Indian troops in Migyitun and Longju were by no means fortuitous, but were precisely the inevitable results of the Indian Government's above instructions.

The Chinese Government, in the spirit of the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence and Sino-Indian friendship, has always adhered to the attitude of seeking a settlement of the question of boundary between China and India through diplomatic channels. At the same time, the Chinese Government wishes to reiterate: No violation of Chinese territory will be tolerated. All areas that have been invaded and occupied must be evacuated. Any armed provocation will certainly meet with Chinese frontier guard's firm rebuff.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note dated 3 September 1959, given by the Counsellor of India to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China on 5 September 1959

The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to communicate the following Note from the Government of India:

The Government of India have seen the note from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China dated 27th August, 1959 on the incident south of Migyitun. The statements in the Chinese Government's Note are not in accordance with facts. The Government of India have now received first hand accounts of the incident from members of the detachment at Longju who had to leave the outpost under Chinese fire. These reports confirm our previous information that the Chinese deliberately fired on our forward picket killing one person on the spot and seriously wounding another. Later the Chinese detachment opened fire on the main outpost at Longju at 03.00 on 26th August and over-ran the surrounding area. Our personnel had to fire back in self defence. The Government of India emphatically protest against this unprovoked firing on a static post within Indian territory. They are always ready to discuss border disputes with the Government of the People's Republic of China but such discussions can be fruitful only if both sides agree to maintain the status quo and one side does not use force in the assertion of its supposed claim. The Government of India are therefore unable to accept the Chinese Government's protest. They request that the territory occupied by the Chinese troops should be vacated immediately so that the Indian frontier outpost at Longju can be re-established. The Government of India will hold the Chinese responsible for the death of the Indian frontier guard. A further communication will follow as soon as the extent of Indian casualties has been ascertained.

The Embassy of India avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given to the Counsellor of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 7 September 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and has the honour to state as follows on the Indian Government's dispatch of personnel into the Wu-je area:

According to reports received by the Government of the People's Republic of China from the local authorities, since June 1959 more than 20 Indian official personnel equipped with radio sets have entered China's Wu-je area and camped there, and carried out illegal examination and registration of Chinese travelling about in that area.

It must be pointed out that the above-mentioned actions of the Indian official personnel are obviously deliberate attempts to change the status quo of the Wu-je area and constitute an infringement on China's sovereignty and territorial integrity. The Chinese Government, therefore, cannot but lodge a protest with the Indian Government. The Chinese Government asks the Indian Government to immediately order those personnel to withdraw from the place and adopt effective measures to prevent the occurrence of similar incidents in the future.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to convey the following from the Government of India:

The Government of India have seen the two Notes which were received by the Indian Embassy in Peking from the Chinese Government, one relating to the India-China boundary in the neighbourhood of Khinzemane and the other relating to the boundary in the Migytin area. The Government of India would like to emphasize once more that the so-called McMahon Line definitely represents the boundary between India and the Tibet Region of China from the eastern border of Bhutan up to Burma and they stand firmly by it. The circumstances in which the McMahon Line was fixed as the boundary are given in detail in para. 4 of the Prime Minister's letter of the 22nd March 1959 to Premier Chou En-lai. This line is by and large in accordance with the geographical features in that area and also with long-established usage. The McMahon Line however departs from well-recognized geographical features at a few places. For example, the international boundary departs from the watershed near Tsari in order to include in Tibet the pilgrimage route of Tsari Nyingpa which is used every year by a large number of Tibetans. Similarly, the village of Migytin was included in Tibet in view of the fact that the Tibetans attached considerable importance to this village. The Government of India are prepared to discuss the exact alignment of the McMahon Line at places where it departs from the geographical features marking the international boundary. It would have been helpful if some indication had been given by the Chinese Government of where they think the exact boundary should be demarcated on the ground in the area of Migytin. In this context the Government of India cannot but express their regret once more that large areas of Indian territory should continue to be shown in official maps as part of China. It is most extraordinary that the Government of the People's Republic of China should not have found time during the last ten years to withdraw these faulty maps. The continued circulation of these maps is a standing threat to India's integrity and evidence of unfriendliness towards India. Obviously no discussion of the India-China border in any sector can proceed on the basis of maps which have no relation to reality. The position of the Government of India has been clarified in the Prime Minister's letter of the 22nd March 1959 to Premier Chou En-lai.

2. In regard to the specific dispute raised by the Chinese Government about Khinzemane, the Government of India would like to point out that the boundary line in the particular area follows the crest of the highest mountain range. Khinzemane is south of this range and is obviously part of Indian territory. Reference has been made in the Chinese Government's Note to the alleged Chinese territory of "Kechilang" west of "Shatze". The Government of India are unable to identify either of these places in their maps. There is however a pasture known as the Droksar pastures which is owned... by the Indian village of Lumpo. The villages of Le and Timmod within Chinese territory on the other side of the Thangla ridge have been allowed to utilise these grazing pastures and for this privilege the Tibetan village of Le is paying rent in kind to the Indian village of Lumpo. In any case it is not uncommon for border villages on one side to use by mutual agreement pastures lying on the other side of the international boundary and the exercise of this privilege cannot be regarded as evidence in support of a territorial claim.

3. As regards the position at Longju as stated above the McMahon Line runs immediately south of the village of Migyitun which is in Chinese territory. The Government of India cannot accept the position that Longju is part of Migyitun. In fact it is entirely distinct from Migyitun. The Government of India are also surprised to learn that the Chinese authorities had exercised any administrative jurisdiction over Longju at any time in the past. Obviously the Chinese Government have received wrong reports on the point. It is not a fact that our detachment first fired on Chinese troops. Our definite instruction was that the Indian personnel should use force only in self-defence and we have no reason to think that they did not carry out this instruction. The instruction to the Indian patrol to resist trespassers could never be interpreted to mean that any person found on our territory was immediately to be fired at. Our personnel were to resist pressure brought to bear on them to vacate their position. The fate of all our personnel is not known even now but we are satisfied from the reports of those who have returned to base camp that the Chinese encircled and used overpowering force on the detachment at Longju and Indian personnel had to withdraw under this pressure.

The Government of India have investigated the complaint of intrusion of Indian planes into Chinese territory. The facts are that when the Indian post at Longju was surrounded and attacked by a superior Chinese force some planes were despatched to drop supplies to the post. Later, after the post had been overrun and contact with our personnel had been lost, planes were despatched to find the whereabouts of the personnel. We are satisfied that our planes kept entirely on our side of the international border.

4. The Government of India are examining once more the exact alignment of the boundary in the Tamaden area. They would like to assure the Chinese Government that if Tamaden is found not to be within Indian territory the Indian post will be withdrawn from there.

5. However, the Government of India are prepared to discuss with the Chinese Government the exact alignment of the so-called McMahon Line at Khinzemane, the Longju area and the Tamaden area. They request that the status quo should be maintained at all these places and that the Chinese personnel should not alter the present position by crossing the Thangla ridge and trying to occupy any territory south of the ridge. Similarly pending examination of the position at Tamaden force should not be used on the Indian post there. As far as Longju is concerned the Government of India would be prepared not to send their personnel back to the area provided that the Chinese would also withdraw their forces. This would mean that neither side would have their personnel at Longju.
6. The Government of India attach the highest importance to peaceful co-existence and the continuance of Sino-Indian friendship. They are convinced that if this principle had been acted upon the Chinese authorities would not have sought to send armed personnel into Indian territory. The Chinese Government have stated in their notes that no violation of Chinese territory will be tolerated. The Government of India have not the remotest wish to trespass into other people's territory. Equally they cannot possibly withdraw under intimidation from areas which are part of India and will have to prevent illegal intrusion by foreign forces into their territory. There is no truth at all in the allegation that rebel Tibetan elements are operating from Indian territory. In no circumstances will the Government of India allow any foreign elements to operate against a friendly Government from their soil. More than 13,000 Tibetans have crossed into Indian territory during the last five months. They were disarmed immediately they crossed the international boundary. Those who refused to part with their arms were pushed back from Indian territory.

7. Should the Chinese Government accept the proposal for a discussion of the exact delimitation of the border at the places mentioned above the Government of India would like to know what procedure they would wish to follow. The Government of India agree pending further discussions the position as stated above should not be altered by either side.

The Embassy of India takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Counsellor of India to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 13 September 1959

The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to transmit the following reply from the Government of India in reply to the Note handed over to Mr. K. M. Kannampilly, Counsellor of the Indian Embassy, by the Deputy Director of the Asian Division of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, on 7th September 1959:

The Government of India have seen the Note presented by the Chinese Foreign Office to the Embassy of India in Peking on the 7th September 1959 regarding Barahoti which the Chinese Government call Wu-je. The Government of India have to say with regret that they are surprised by the contents of this Note. As the Government of India have consistently maintained, Barahoti, which lies south of the major watershed in the area, is part of Indian territory. Full discussions took place on the subject in the meetings held in Delhi in April-May 1958 between the Indian and the Chinese delegations. In the course of these discussions, the Foreign Secretary to the Government of India proposed that without prejudice to their respective claims both sides should refrain from sending armed personnel to the disputed area. The Foreign Secretary further suggested that pending settlement of the dispute neither country should exercise civil jurisdiction over this territory or send its civil personnel. The Chinese delegation was agreeable to the suggestion not to send armed parties to the disputed area, but they refused to agree to the proposal that neither side should endeavour to exercise civil jurisdiction over this area.

2. In the absence of agreement, the Government of India informed the Chinese delegation that India too would continue to send its civil administrative personnel to the territory. It would be unreasonable to expect that the Government should unilaterally refrain from sending their civil administrative personnel to an area which in their view is part of Indian territory. In the circumstances, the Government of India cannot accept the contention of the Chinese Government that this action of theirs constituted an infringement of Chinese sovereignty and territorial integrity. By the same reasoning the Government of India could bring the same charge against the Chinese Government who sent officials of the Tibetan region of China to Barahoti and sought to exercise civil jurisdiction over this area.

3. The Government of India would take this opportunity to invite the attention of the Government of the People's Republic of China to the Note which was presented by the Ministry of External Affairs to the Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy on the 10th December 1958 and to earlier conversations with the Chinese Embassy on the subject. It was mentioned to the Chinese Counsellor that according to information of the Government of India the Chinese Government had sent a large armed party to the area in September 1958, apparently in an effort to change the status quo of the area. No written reply to the Indian Note was received but the Counsellor of the Indian Embassy in Peking was verbally informed that no armed personnel have been sent to Wu-je in September 1958. Although reports subsequently received by the Government of India confirmed their earlier information they agreed to the suggestion of the Chinese Government not to send any armed personnel to Barahoti during the 1959 season. Accordingly the Indian Revenue Party sent this year to Barahoti did not carry any arms even for self protection.

4. The Government of India was also informed that the Chinese Government despatched a party to Barahoti during the winter of 1958-59 after the Indian civil party had withdrawn. This was unusual and contrary to the traditional practice and the Government of India could regard this action only as an attempt to establish effective control over the area unilaterally. For their own part, the Government of India have scrupulously adhered to the interim agreement reached in the 1958 discussions at Delhi not to send any armed personnel to Barahoti.

5. It is unfortunate that the discussions which took place in Delhi in 1958 have not been resumed till now. The Government of India are of the view that the dispute relating to Barahoti (Wu-je) should be settled peacefully and in mutual discussions. They would once more suggest that pending a settlement of the dispute neither of the two Governments should send its civil administrative personnel to Barahoti or change the status quo in any other manner. If the Government of China are not agreeable to this suggestion the Government of India will continue as in previous years to send its civil personnel to exercise jurisdiction over an area which the Government of India have always considered as part of Indian territory. Such personnel however will not carry any arms. The Government of India will be glad if similar instructions are given to the Chinese personnel if any in the area.

The Embassy of India takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China, the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given to the Ambassador of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 22 October 1959

The Chinese Government has received an urgent report from its frontier guards in Sinkiang to the effect that in the afternoon of 20th October 1959 three men of the Indian armed forces carrying arms unlawfully intruded into Chinese territory south of the Kongka Pass. The Chinese frontier guards promptly advised them to leave Chinese territory immediately but were met with their refusal whereupon the Chinese frontier guards could not but disarm them and put them under detention. At noon on 21st October a large number of Indian troops again intruded into Chinese territory in the same area and carried out provocations with superior force against the Chinese frontier guards patrolling there at the time. In disregard of the advice of the Chinese frontier guards for them to withdraw from Chinese territory they twice unwarrantedly opened fire on the Chinese frontier guards and attempted to seize the Chinese frontier guards' horses by force. The Chinese frontier guards still tried their best to avoid a clash and did not fire back. The Indian troops however behaving even worse, subsequently opened heavy fire on the Chinese frontier guards and launched armed attack. Under these conditions the Chinese frontier guards were compelled to fire back in self-defence. It was only after this that the Indian troops left the place of the incident.

The Chinese Government hereby lodges a serious protest against the above-mentioned serious provocation by a large number of Indian troops deliberately violating Chinese frontiers and launching unwarranted armed attack on the Chinese frontier guards and asks the Government of India to adopt measures at once to prevent the recurrence of violation of Chinese frontiers and provocation against Chinese frontier guards by Indian troops. The Chinese Government reserves the right to express itself further on this matter after receiving more detailed reports from the Chinese frontier guards.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Ambassador of China in India, 23 October 1959

The Government of India have seen the memorandum which the Chinese Government handed to the Indian Ambassador in Peking on the 22nd October. They are greatly surprised by the narration of events in this memorandum, which, according to their information, is not in accordance with the facts. The Government of India received information on the 21st October that an Indian police party had been subjected to sudden and aggressive firing by Chinese forces in the region of Kong Ka Pass about 16 miles from Tsogtsalu in Ladakh. As a result of this, the Indian police party suffered severe casualties. As this was a matter of very grave consequence and a repetition for the second time of a wholly unjustified attack by Chinese forces on Indian personnel, the Government of India waited for fuller details to be received by them before this was taken up with the Chinese Government. The reports thus far received by the Government of India entirely contradict the statements in the Chinese Government's memorandum. The facts are as follows:

2. On the 20th October, two members of an Indian Police Party went out on patrol duty in Indian territory in the neighbourhood of Kong Ka Pass in Ladakh. When they failed to return in the evening, a party was sent out in search of the missing persons. This search proved unavailing. On the following morning another party under the direction of a senior officer, went out to continue the search. It appears that this party was surprised by sudden fire from a Chinese armed force entrenched on a hill-top which used automatic weapons and hand grenades. Apparently, the Indian personnel fired back in self-defence, but were overwhelmed by the strategic situation and the superior strength and fire power of the Chinese troops. According to the latest report, as many as seventeen persons belonging to the Indian party, including the officer-in-charge, have lost their lives and some others have suffered severe injuries.

3. The Government of India strongly protest against this intrusion by Chinese troops into an area which is part of Indian territory. This area is about 40 to 50 miles west of the traditional Sino-Indian frontier which has been shown in official Indian maps. In connection with an earlier incident involving the arrest by the Chinese forces of another Indian party in the Chusul area in July this year, the Government of India described in detail the traditional frontier for the greater part of Ladakh in a note presented by the Embassy of India in Peking to the Chinese Foreign Office on the 13th August 1959. No answer has yet been received by the Government of India to this note. It was hoped that further confusion about the traditional frontier in the area would not arise. Instead, the Chinese authorities have entirely ignored this traditional frontier and our note on the subject and have come into Indian territory in considerable strength during the last few months. They have further fired at our police party and caused the death of a considerable number of persons belonging to this party.

4. The Government of India have had no troops in this area. Police parties have, however, discharged their normal functions of patrol duty and previously they have patrolled this entire area without hindrance. It is clear that Chinese troops have in recent months moved into this part of Indian territory.

5. The Chinese memorandum admits the arrest of Indian personnel. The suggestion that two or three Indian policemen challenged the large Chinese forces is, on the face of it, not credible. The arrest of Indian personnel on Indian territory by Chinese authorities was highly objectionable and the subsequent unprovoked fire on the Indian search party can only be construed as a deliberate and unprovoked attack by Chinese forces.

6. On these facts, the Government of India do not accept the protest contained in the Chinese Government's memorandum of October 22. The Government of India reserve the right to claim adequate compensation from the Chinese Government when the precise extent of the losses is known. The Chinese authorities have no right to arrest or detain Indian personnel who should immediately be released. Further, the Government of India ask the Chinese authorities to withdraw their forces from this area and to prevent their illegal entry into Indian territory and interference with Indian personnel.
Note given to the Ambassador of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 25 October 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the incident of Indian troops' intrusion into Chinese territory and armed provocation against Chinese troops at a place south of the Kongka Pass, has the honour to say that the Chinese Government has received the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs handed to Ambassador Pan Tzu-li on 23rd October and seen the communique issued by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs. The Chinese Government deems it necessary to state as follows:

The presentation of this incident in the Note and communique of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs is completely contrary to the facts. The Chinese Government absolutely cannot agree to the allegation of the Indian Government that Chinese troops intruded into Indian territory and attacked the Indian troops. The account of the outbreak and development of this extremely serious border clash given in the memorandum of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs handed to the Indian Ambassador to China on 22nd October is strictly based on facts. It clearly shows that this incident was a result of Indian troops' deliberate violation of Chinese frontiers and armed provocation against the Chinese frontier guards. The Indian side must be held fully responsible for this incident. The Chinese Government, therefore, categorically rejects the protest of the Indian Government and reiterates the serious protest and demand made in the memorandum of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs dated 22nd October.

The place where the Indian troops launched armed provocation is indisputably Chinese territory. The Kongka Pass near place of the incident is a border pass according to the Sino-Indian customary line between China's Sinkiang and Tibet regions on the one hand and Ladakh on the other. The places to the south, north and east of the Kongka Pass have always been Chinese territory, respective-ly under the jurisdiction of the Chinese local authorities in Tibet and Sinkiang. Since the liberation of Sinkiang and Tibet, frontier guards of the Chinese People's liberation army have all along sta- tioned and have been carrying out routine patrol in this area up to the Kongka Pass. The above-said customary line between China and Ladakh is clearly marked on maps published in China. In his letter to Prime Minister Nehru on 8th September 1959 Premier Chou En-lai further made a clear explanation about this section of the traditional boundary line. Even back at the time when Indian armed personnel, in September 1958 and July 1959, twice unlawfully intruded into Chinese territory to the east of the above-said customary boundary and were arrested by Chinese frontier guards, the Chinese Govern-ment already solemnly pointed out to the Indian Government that where those Indian armed personnel intruded was undoubtedly within Chinese territory. The Indian Government, however up to now still claims the area to the east of the Kongka Pass up to the Lanak Pass to be Indian territory and, in total disregard of the fact, suggests that Indian troops have in the past been patrolling this entire area without hindrance. All this proves that it is the Indian Government that utterly pays no heed to the previous statements of the Chinese Government concerning this section of the boundary and ignores the Sino-Indian traditional customary boundary; but not the Chinese Government that pays no heed to the Notes of the Indian Government. The fact is thus perfectly clear. In the incident of October 20th and 21st, it was not Chinese frontier guards that violated Indian territory but precisely Indian troops that violated Chinese territory, thus breaching once again the long-existing status quo of the border between the two countries.

Although the Indian troops deliberately violated the Chinese frontiers, the Chinese frontier guards, with a view to maintaining the tranquillity of the border, consistently, took a reasonable attitude of trying their best to avoid a clash. With regard to the three Indian armed personnel who unlawfully crossed the customary boundary and intruded into Chinese territory on 20th October it was only because they persisted in ignoring advice and refusing to leave Chinese territory that the Chinese frontier guards could not but disarm them and put them under detention. Yet on 21st October, Indian troops, more than 70 in number, again intruded into Chinese territory. The Indian troops not only disregarded the advice given by the Chinese frontier guards for them to withdraw, but even encircled and came with superior forces upon the Chinese frontier guard patrol, tried to seize their horses and opened fire. Even under these circumstances, the Chinese frontier guards still exercised the utmost self-restraint and did not fire back. They only gesticulated for the Indian troops to stop firing and withdraw. But the Indian troops paid no heed at all, continued to press forward and then opened heavy fire and launched armed attack on the Chinese frontier guards. Only then were the Chinese frontier guards compelled to fire back in self-defence. It is clear from the above-mentioned facts that it was the Indian troops, and not the Chinese frontier guards, who gave rise to this serious clash. Responsibility for all the serious consequences arising therefrom must rest with the Indian troops and can in no way be placed on the Chinese frontier guards.

According to further reports received by the Chinese Government, the clash on 21st October lasted about two hours, resulting in casualties on both sides. The Chinese frontier guards, apart from capturing seven Indian soldiers during the clash, found on the spot the corpses of 9 Indian soldiers. The captured Indian soldiers are now still under detention, and the corpses have been properly buried.

After the occurrence of the above-said incident of violation of Chinese frontiers and armed provocation against Chinese frontier guards by Indian troops, the Chinese Government promptly handed a memorandum to the Indian Ambassador to China, hoping to secure a peaceful and reasonable settlement as soon as possible through diplomatic channels. However, before the Chinese Government received the reply from the Indian Government, the Indian Government had made public the incident in a one-sided version which distorts the facts and even issued an official communiqué on it. The Chinese Government could not but feel extreme regret at this action which could only create an unfavourable atmosphere making it difficult for the two countries to solve the dispute cool-headedly; it consequently had to make public the truth of the matter to ensure a correct understanding of the facts.

In order to avoid the recurrence of similar grave incidents so as to maintain the tranquillity of the border, the Chinese Government once again asks the Indian Government to take immediate measures to prevent the violation of Chinese frontiers and provocation against Chinese frontier guards by Indian troops.

The Chinese frontier guards are under the strict standing orders to refrain from crossing for one step the Sino-Indian traditional customary boundary line, and to use peaceful means so far possible to advise those Indian military personnel who may have crossed into Chinese territory by mistake to withdraw immediately; but any violation of China's territory is absolutely impermissible and any armed provocation must be firmly rebuffed.

The Chinese Government is prepared to release and send out of China the ten Indian military personnel captured on October 20th and 21st. It is also prepared at any time to let the Indian side take back the bodies of the 9 Indian soldiers already found. The concrete method for this can be decided upon separately through consultations between the two sides.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note which the Chinese Vice-Minister handed to the Indian Ambassador in Peking on October 25. The Government of India have also seen the statement issued by the Chinese Foreign Ministry at Peking on October 26. They have to state with regret that the account of the incidents given in the Chinese Government's note to the Indian Ambassador, and repeated in greater detail in the statement published by the Chinese Foreign Office, is completely at variance with facts and is a travesty of truth. The Government of India have enquired into this matter fully and have received a detailed account of the events of October 20 and 21 from the officer who was second-in-command of the Indian police party when it was attacked by Chinese forces and who later returned to the nearest Indian outpost. The account of the officer is appended to this note. The gallant officer who was in command of the party lost his life during the clash.

2. The Government of India not only reject the factual account given by the Chinese Government of this incident, but also repudiate certain assumptions underlying it. The suggestion made that the Indian police party armed with rifles only and in a disadvantageous position would attack a heavily armed Chinese force strongly entrenched on a hill top above them and equipped with mortar and hand-grenades, cannot be accepted by any reasonable person. All the circumstances concerning this incident as well as the detailed information that we possess contradict the version which has been supplied by the Chinese Government.

3. The attached note about the tragic incident in the Chang Chenmo Valley which gives a first-hand account by a responsible officer, clearly indicates that at no time on the 20th or 21st October did the Indian personnel take any aggressive attitude. While they were engaged on patrol duty, they were suddenly subjected to ruthless attack by Chinese forces with rifles, mortar and hand-grenades. One contingent of the attacking force was apparently entrenched on a hill top and the other was across the Chang Chenmo river on the right. Although the Indian party fired in self-defence, they had no chance against the superior strength of the Chinese force which was aided by its strategic situation and the superior arms that it possessed. The Chinese Government have not stated the exact casualties suffered by the attacking Chinese force, but have indicated that their casualties were much less than those of the Indian party. The Government of India entirely disagree with the extraordinary conclusion drawn by the Chinese Government from the heavy casualties suffered by the Indian personnel that the Indian party had taken the offensive. The obvious conclusion would be the opposite of this and would indicate that the Chinese forces were the attacking party as they were entrenched on a hill top and used mortars and hand-grenades.

4. The incident has to be viewed also in the context of other events preceding it, as well as of the correspondence that has taken place between the Government of India and the Chinese Government. The Indian frontier, throughout its long extent, has been well known as a traditional frontier and has been shown with precision in official maps published by the Survey of India. There has been no doubt about this frontier. Repeatedly during the past few years, the Prime Minister of India has declared firmly and clearly what this frontier is. The Government of the People's Republic of China said nothing about this frontier for a number of years. When their attention was drawn to some vague Chinese maps appearing in magazines and showing large areas, without any precision, as part of the Chinese State, objection was taken to these by the Government of India. The answer given was that these maps were old maps produced by the previous regime in China and the present Government of China had been too busy with other activities to consider a revision of these maps. That answer itself indicated that the Chinese Government had no serious doubt about the correctness of the Indian maps, except perhaps for some minor disputes. As has been previously brought to the notice of the Chinese Government, the Premier of the People's Republic of China himself stated to the Prime Minister of India that the Chinese Government was prepared to accept the north eastern frontier of India which has been referred to as the McMahon Line. No question of the frontier of the Tibet region with Ladakh was ever raised during all these years, although the Chinese Government must have known very well, both from Indian maps and statements made on behalf of India as well as from the facts of the situation, where this frontier is. The Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 purported to deal with all outstanding issues between India and the Tibet region of China inherited from the British days. But neither during the long and detailed discussions preceding the Agreement nor in the Agreement itself was any mention made by the Chinese Government of their claim to such large areas of Indian territory. It was only in the letter addressed by Premier Chou En-lai to the Prime Minister of India dated 8th September 1959 that for the first time the Chinese Government laid claim to the territories vaguely included in their maps. This statement was at variance with the previous statements on the subject of the Chinese maps. It is to be observed that at no time up till now has any precise statement been made by the Chinese Government as to where, according to them, their frontier is. Even their own maps give completely different and varying frontiers.

5. So far as the Government of India are concerned, their position has been clear and precise from the beginning and, indeed, for a long period of years and there has been no doubt about it. That position was described in detail in paragraphs 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 of the Indian Prime Minister's letter of September 26 to Premier Chou En-lai. In this letter, the Prime Minister of India has given the historical background of the traditional Sino-Indian boundary and the basis of its delineation in different sectors in official Indian maps. Indeed, any person with a knowledge of history not only of recent events, but of the past hundreds of years and more, would appreciate that this traditional and historical frontier of India, has been associated with India's culture and tradition for the last two thousand years or so, and has been an intimate part of India's life and thought.

6. The Government of India, therefore, reject and repudiate the assumptions underlying the note of the Chinese Government in regard to this long frontier. They reiterate that the area where the clash took place is not only a part of Indian territory but is well within it. They cannot accept the statement made by the Chinese Government that the entire area, including the places east, south and north of Kongka pass "has always been Chinese territory and under the respective jurisdiction of the local authorities of Sinkiang and Tibet region". This statement is contrary to history and facts. The maps published by the Survey of India since 1867-68 have been showing the boundary between Ladakh on the one hand, and Sinkiang and the Tibet region on the other, as in the present-day official maps published by the Survey of India. From the Karakoram Pass this boundary proceeds north-east via the Qara Tagh Pass and then follows the Kuen Lun range from a point 15 miles north of Haji Langar to Peak 21250 (Survey of India map) which lies east of Longitude 80 east. This line constitutes the watershed between the Indus system in India and the Khotan system in China. From point 21250 the boundary runs south down to Lanak La along the western watershed of streams flowing into lakes in the Chinese territory. The boundary further south from Lanak La to Chang La has been described in the note presented by the Indian Embassy in Peking to the Chinese Foreign Office on the 13th August 1959. As stated in that note, the international boundary follows the eastern and southern watershed of Chang Chenmo and the southern watershed of Chumesang and thence the southern bank of Chumesang and the eastern bank of Changlung Lungpa. Skirting the western extremity of the eastern half of Pangong Tso (which is called Yaerhmu in Chinese maps), the boundary then follows the Ang watershed and cutting across Spanggur Tso, follows the north-eastern and northern watershed of the Indus.

7. It will thus be seen that the international boundary has been shown for nearly a century in official Indian maps as it is today. In fact, detailed surveys of the area were undertaken from 1867-68, and the boundary as shown in our maps is not only in accordance with tradition and custom but is also based on the result of these surveys. The area on the Indian side of this boundary was surveyed by Hayward, Shaw and Cayley in 1868, Bower in 1891 and Aurel Stein in 1900. Drew, who was Governor of Ladakh under the Maharaja of Kashmir, officially inspected the area up to its northern border in 1871 and the maps appended to his book on 'Jammu and Kashmir Territories, 1875', as also the maps attached to the Gazetters of Jammu and Kashmir published from 1890 onwards and the Imperial Gazetter of India of 1908, show the boundary more or less similar to the frontier shown in official Indian maps today. It is the Chinese maps of the area which have shown different lines at different times. An official Chinese map of 1893 shows the Aksai Chin area as in India. The New Atlas of China published by Shun Pao, 1935, shows a great part of the Chang Chenmo region in India. In fact the place where the recent clash took place is in Indian territory according to this map. This map and the subsequent Chinese maps until 1951 showed the international boundary as running 30 to 60 miles east of and parallel to Shyok river. It is only in 1951 that a few Chinese maps took the boundary within 10 to 30 miles east of and parallel to the Shyok river. Most of the Chinese maps as late as 1954, and one as late as 1956, depict the boundary in the Pangong lake as cutting the western extremity of the eastern half of Pangong Tso called Yaerhmu in Chinese maps. The few Chinese maps of 1951 referred to above show the line as cutting the western half of Pangong lake at its bend and thus include the Spanggur area and a part of Pangong area in Tibet.

8. It is true that the Government of India did not open any border outposts right along the traditional frontier. This was because the area was inhabited very sparsely, if at all, and they had no reason to anticipate any aggressive intention on the part of the Chinese Government. They were therefore content with sending regular police patrol parties to these areas in previous years. The Government of India cannot accept the statement in the press note issued by the Chinese Government on the 26th October that "the frontier guards of the Chinese People's Liberation Army have all along been stationed and patrolled this entire area." Indian survey and reconnaissance parties, which went from Leh to Lanak La in 1954 and 1956, did not come across any evidence of Chinese occupation. For the first time in 1957 signs of intrusion by outsiders were noticed at Shinglung and some places further north. Obviously, such intrusion must have occurred in these places for the first time in 1957. Other Indian reconnaissance parties went as far as Karakoram Pass without coming across any Chinese personnel. No Indian reconnaissance party was sent to the area in Aksai Chin where the Chinese authorities had built a new road. No adverse conclusion can however be drawn from the mere fact that the Chinese had constructed this road. This was done without the knowledge of the Government of India. As early as 1899, the then Government of India communicated to the authorities in Peking the international boundary in this area, which then was more or less as it is today. And as stated above, official Indian maps have shown the Aksai Chin area as part of India for nearly a century. This area is extremely difficult of access from inhabited areas in western and southern Ladakh, and the Government of India had no reason to suspect that the Government of China, with whom they had friendly relations, would trespass into the area and construct a road.

9. No answer has been received yet by the Government of India to the long and detailed letter of the Prime Minister of India to Premier Chou En-lai of September 26, 1959. Regardless of the facts stated in this letter, the forces of the Chinese Government have not only committed further aggression, but have attacked an Indian police party engaged in its normal patrol duty. This was the second armed attack on an Indian party, the previous one taking place at Longju, where Chinese forces crossed the Indian frontier forcibly. These facts, taken together with a continuance of aggressive attitudes in various parts of the frontier and the type of propaganda that is being conducted on behalf of the Chinese Government are reminiscent of the activities of the old imperialist powers against whom both India and China struggled in the past. It is a matter of deep regret that the Chinese Government, which has so often condemned imperialism, should act in a manner which is so contrary to their own assertions. It is a matter of even greater regret that the Five Principles as well as the Declaration of the Bandung Conference should thus be flouted by the Chinese Government.
10. The Government of India are surprised at the complaint in the Chinese Government's note about the publication of an official Indian communique on this incident. The Government of India would not have been justified in keeping the Indian people in the dark about such a serious incident. The Chinese Government must be aware not only of the strong feelings in India on the question of Indian frontiers, but also, and more especially, about this incident. As a matter of fact, the Government of India published their communique only after they found from the Chinese Government's note handed to the Indian Ambassador on October 25, that the account given in that note was at complete variance with the facts.

11. The Government of India do not propose to discuss in detail other matters referred to in the statement issued by the Chinese Foreign Office on the 26th October. They repudiate emphatically the allegation that the Indian forces have violated the status quo in several places on the Sino-Indian frontier or that they have occupied any place inside Chinese territory. The facts about the frontier have been given in detail in the Indian Prime Minister's letter of September 26. Paragraphs 12 to 16 of that letter deal with the traditional frontier in the north-east, which is sometimes referred to as the McMahon Line. It will be seen from these paragraphs that the Chinese claim to any territory south of this line is entirely baseless. Any trespass into this area by Chinese personnel would amount to deliberate violation of the territory of India.

12. The Government of India have always been willing to respect the traditional frontier between India and China and have indeed done so. They cannot, however, recognise any boundary in the Ladakh region or elsewhere, which includes in China areas on the Indian side of the traditional frontier. For a long period of years this frontier has been peaceful. Trouble and conflict have arisen there recently because the Chinese forces, having advanced up to the frontier in many places, committed aggression by crossing it at some places.

13. The Chinese Government have rightly stressed the importance of maintaining the status quo. An essential prerequisite to the maintenance of the status quo is that neither side should seek to extend its occupation in assertion of a supposed right in disregard of the traditional frontier, and that, in any event, there should be no resort to force except as a last resort in self-defence. The deplorable incident, which has resulted in such heavy casualties to the Indian personnel, would have been avoided if the Chinese force had paid regard to this basic fact.

14. It is recognised the world over that India stands for peace and is entirely opposed to the use of warlike methods for the settlement of international disputes. Even in their struggle for independence, the Indian people adhered to peaceful methods. In regard to the Government and people of China, India's attitude has always been friendly. This was not only in consonance with India's well known policy, but was due to the desire of the people and the Government of India that it was essential in the interests of India and China as well as of peace in Asia and the world, that these two great countries of Asia should have friendly relations, even though they might differ in their internal structure of Government. To that end, the Government of India have laboured through these years. It is a matter, therefore, of great sorrow to them that their hopes have been belied, and a situation created which endangers the peaceful and friendly relations which have existed and which, they hoped, would continue to exist, between these two great countries.

15. It is a matter of special regret to the Government of India that at a time when the world appears at last to be moving towards a peaceful settlement of the grave problems which have afflicted it during the last twelve years and when the two great nations, the Soviet Union and the United States of America, are striving to their utmost ability to put an end to the cold war, there should be this relapse into violence and aggression on the frontiers of India. The countries of Asia have ardently advocated peace and have played not an insignificant part in the work for peace. At this critical moment in the history of the world, it would have been fitting for all the nations of Asia not only to stand for peace, but to further it by their own attitudes and activities.

16. In accordance with her firm policy, India will continue to endeavour to resolve all disputes by peaceful methods. But where aggression takes place, the people of India inevitably have to resist by all means available to them. The independence and integrity of India are what the Indian people laboured for during their long struggle for freedom, and they cannot permit any injury to or infringement of them. The Government of India, therefore, trust that the Chinese Government will remove their forces from Indian territory and seek to resolve minor frontier disputes by peaceful methods.

17. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity of renewing to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Annexure to the Note of the Indian Government (Chang Chenmo Valley), 4 November 1959

ACCOUNT RECEIVED FROM THE SECOND-IN-COMMAND OF THE INDIAN POLICE PATROL PARTY

On the 19th October, the party reached Hot Springs and established a temporary camp there. Before proceeding further north the next morning (20th) the officer in charge, Karam Singh, sent two police constables and a porter on reconnaissance towards the east. Neither the constables nor the porter returned to the camp at the appointed time. A small patrol party was therefore sent out in the evening in search of the missing persons but it returned at 11 o’clock at night without being able to find any of the missing personnel.

On the 21st morning, the officer in charge decided to go out himself in search of the missing persons as it was possible that they had lost their way in these trackless hills. Accompanied by Tyagi, who was his second in command, some members of his staff and some police constables making a total of about 20, the officer in charge left the camp at about 10 o’clock in the morning on ponies. He left instruction for the rest of the party to follow behind on foot.

At six miles east of Hot Springs, at a place overlooked by a hill to the left, Karam Singh noticed some hoof-prints. So he halted and waited for the main party to come up. When the main party arrived, he and Tyagi decided that the main party under Tyagi should halt at that place whilst Karam Singh with a small party would follow the tracks to find if there were any intruders in the vicinity.

Karam Singh passed by this hill feature to the left without noticing anything unusual and went out of sight of the main party. A little later, Tyagi went forward to see how far Karam Singh’s party had gone, but he could not find them apparently because Karam Singh’s party had by then gone down the river bed. At this time, suddenly, fire was opened on Tyagi’s party by Chinese force which was entrenched on the hill feature. Karam Singh’s party was also simultaneously fired upon by another Chinese party entrenched on the other side of the river as well as by the party on the hill-top. The attackers fired with mortars and automatic weapons.

Subjected to this attack, members of both Karam Singh’s party and Tyagi’s party tried to take cover and fire back, but they were in a very disadvantageous position having no proper cover and, therefore, their firing was not effective. The Chinese on the hill-top effectively stopped Tyagi’s party from going to the aid of Karam Singh’s party which was being attacked from both sides.

After some time, the Chinese who were apparently in some strength on the other side of the Chang Chenmo river and some of whom were mounted on horses, advanced forward and overwhelmed Karam Singh’s party with automatic fire and mortar. They moved further forward to attack Tyagi’s party, which then had no other alternative but to retreat. Karam Singh’s party was, therefore decimated either by killing or by capture except for a few survivors who escaped along the river bed and over the high hills in the dark.
At night, Tyagi's party made an attempt to go forward to recover the dead and the injured, but the Chinese were still in position on the hill feature and maintained that position even on the 22nd. Tyagi then withdrew his entire force to Tsogstsalu.

17 persons including Karam Singh were missing after the clash. Out of these, five including the officer in charge and the Jamadar were seen by the survivors to have been killed by Chinese fire.
DEAR MR. PRIME MINISTER,

I have carefully read Your Excellency's letter dated March 22, 1959. I find from your letter that there is a fundamental difference between the positions of our two Governments on the Sino-Indian boundary question. This has made me somewhat surprised and also made it necessary for me to take a longer period of time to consider how to reply to your letter.

The Sino-Indian boundary question is a complicated question left over by history. In tackling this question, one cannot but, first of all, take into account the historical background of British aggression on China when India was under British rule. From the early days, Britain harboured aggressive ambition towards China's Tibet region. It continuously instigated Tibet to separate from China, in an attempt to put under its control a nominally independent Tibet. When this design failed, it applied all sorts of pressures on China, intending to make Tibet a British sphere of influence while allowing China to maintain so-called suzerainty over Tibet. In the meantime, using India as its base, Britain conducted extensive territorial expansion into China's Tibet region, and even the Sinkiang region. All this constitutes the fundamental reason for the long-term disputes over and non-settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question.

China and India are both countries which were long subjected to imperialist aggression. This common experience should have naturally caused China and India to hold an identical view of the above-said historical background and to adopt an attitude of mutual sympathy, mutual understanding and fairness and reasonableness in dealing with the boundary question. The Chinese Government originally thought the Indian Government would take such an attitude. Unexpectedly, to the Chinese Government, however, the Indian Government demanded that the Chinese Government give formal recognition to the situation created by the application of the British policy of aggression against China's Tibet region as the foundation for the settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question. What is more serious, the Indian Government has applied all sorts of pressures on the Chinese Government, not even scrupling the use of force to support this demand. At this the Chinese Government cannot but feel a deep regret.

The Chinese Government has consistently held that an over-all settlement of the boundary question should be sought by both sides, taking into account the historical background and existing actualities and adhering to the Five Principles, through friendly negotiations conducted in a well-prepared way step by step. Pending this, as a provisional measure, the two sides should maintain the long-existing status quo of the border, and not seek to change it by unilateral action, even less by force. As to some of the disputes, provisional agreements concerning isolated places could be reached through negotiations to ensure the tranquillity of the border areas and uphold the friendship of the two countries. This is exactly the basic idea expressed in my January 23, 1959 letter to you. The Chinese Government still considers this to be the way that should be followed by our two countries in settling the boundary question. Judging from Your Excellency’s letter of March 22, 1959, it seems you are not completely against this principle.

I would like now to further explain the position of the Chinese Government in connection with the questions raised in Your Excellency’s letter and in conjunction with the recent situation along the Sino-Indian border.

1. In my letter to Your Excellency dated January 23, 1959, I pointed out that the Sino-Indian boundary has never been formally delimited. In your letter of March 22, 1959, Your Excellency expressed disagreement to this and tried energetically to prove that most parts of the Sino-Indian boundary had the sanction of specific international agreements between the past Government of India and the Central Government of China. In order to prove that the Sino-Indian boundary has never been formally delimited, I would like to furnish the following facts:

(i) Concerning the boundary separating China’s Sinkiang and Tibet regions from Ladakh.

In 1842, a peace treaty was indeed concluded between the local authorities of China’s Tibet and the Kashmir authorities. However, the then Chinese Central Government did not send anybody to participate in the conclusion of this treaty, nor did it ratify the treaty afterwards. Moreover, this treaty only mentioned in general terms that Ladakh and Tibet would each abide by its borders, and did not make any specific provisions or explanations regarding the location of this section of the boundary. It is clear that this treaty cannot be used to prove that this section of the boundary has been formally delimited by the two sides, even less can it be used as the foundation to ask the Chinese Government to accept the unilateral claim of the Indian Government regarding this section of the boundary. As to the Chinese Government official’s statement made in 1847 to the British representative that this section of the boundary was clear, it can only show that the then Chinese Government had its own clear view regarding this section of the boundary and cannot be taken as the proof that the boundary between the two sides had already been formally delimited. As a matter of fact, down to 1899, the British Government still proposed to formally delimit this section of the boundary with the Chinese Government, but the Chinese Government did not agree. Your Excellency also said on August 28 this year in India’s Lok Sabha: “This was the boundary of the old Kashmir State with Tibet and Chinese Turkestan. Nobody had marked it.” It can thus be seen that this section of the boundary has never been delimited. Between China and Ladakh, however, there does exist a customary line derived from historical traditions, and Chinese maps have always drawn the boundary between China and Ladakh in accordance with this line. The marking of this section of the boundary on the map of “Punjab, Western Himalaya and Adjoining Parts of Tibet” compiled by the British John Walker by order of the Court of Directors of East India Company (which was attached to the British Major Alexander Cunningham's book "Ladakh" published in 1854) corresponded fairly close to the Chinese maps. Later British and Indian maps included large tracts of Chinese territory into Ladakh. This was without any legal grounds, nor in conformity with the actual situation of administration by each side all the time.

(ii) Concerning the section of the boundary between the Ari Area of China's Tibet and India.

It can be seen from your letter that you also agree that this section of the boundary has not been formally delimited by the two countries. Not only so, there have in fact been historical disputes between the two sides over the right to many places in this area. For example, the area of Sang and Tsunghsa, southwest of Tsaparang Dzong in Tibet, which had always belonged to China, was thirty to forty years back gradually invaded and occupied by the British. The local authorities of China's Tibet took up this matter several times with Britain, without any results. It has thus become an outstanding issue left over by history.

(iii) Concerning the Sino-Indian boundary east of Bhutan.

The Indian Government insists that this section of the boundary has long been clearly delimited, citing as its grounds that the so-called McMahon Line was jointly delineated by the representatives of the Chinese Government, the Tibet local authorities and the British Government at the 1913-1914 Simla Conference. As I have repeatedly made clear to Your Excellency the Simla Conference was an important step taken by Britains in its design to detach Tibet from China. At the Conference were discussed the so-called boundary between Outer and Inner Tibet and that between Tibet and the rest of China. Contrary to what was said in your letter, the so-called McMahon Line was never discussed at the Simla Conference, but was determined by the British representative and the representative of the Tibet local authorities behind the back of the representative of the Chinese Central Government through an exchange of secret notes at Delhi on March 24, 1914, that is, prior to the signing of the Simla treaty. This line was later marked on the map attached to the Simla treaty as part of the boundary between Tibet and the rest of China. The so-called McMahon Line was a product of the British policy of aggression against the Tibet Region of China and has never been recognised by any Chinese Central Government and is therefore decidedly illegal. As to the Simla treaty, it was not formally signed by the representative of the then Chinese Central Government, and this is explicitly noted in the treaty. For quite a long time after the exchange of secret notes between Britain and the Tibet local authorities, Britain dared not make public the related documents, nor change the traditional way of drawing this section of the boundary on maps. This illegal line aroused the great indignation of the Chinese people. The Tibet local authorities themselves later also expressed their dissatisfaction with this line, and, following the independence of India in 1947, cabled Your Excellency asking India to return all the territory of the Tibet region of China south of this illegal line. This piece of territory corresponds in size to the Chekiang Province of China and is as big as ninety thousand square kilometres. Mr. Prime Minister, how could China agree to accept under coercion such an illegal line which would have it relinquish its rights and disgrace itself by selling out its territory—and such a large piece of territory as that? The delineation of the Sino-Indian boundary east of Bhutan in all traditional Chinese maps is a true reflection of the actual situation of the customary boundary before the appearance of the so-called McMahon Line. Both the map of "Tibet and Adjacent Countries" published by the Indian Survey in 1917 and the map attached to the 1929 edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica drew this section of the boundary in the same way as the Chinese maps. And it was only in the period around the peaceful liberation of China's Tibet region in 1951 that Indian troops advanced on a large scale into the area south of the so-called McMahon Line. Therefore, the assertion that this section of the boundary has long been clearly delimited is obviously untenable.

In Your Excellency's letter, you also referred to the boundary between China and Sikkim. Like the boundary between China and Bhutan, this question does not fall within the scope of our present discussion. I would like, however, to take this opportunity to make clear once again that China is willing to live together in friendship with Sikkim and Bhutan, without committing aggression against each other, and has always respected the proper relations between them and India.

It can be seen from the above that the way the Sino-Indian boundary has always been drawn in maps published in China is not without grounds and that at first British and Indian maps also drew the Sino-Indian boundary roughly in the same way as the Chinese maps. As a matter of fact, it was not Chinese maps, but British and Indian maps that later unilaterally altered the way the Sino-Indian boundary was drawn. Nevertheless, since China and India have not delimited their mutual boundary through friendly negotiations and joint surveys, China has not asked India to revise its maps. In 1954, I explained to Your Excellency for the same reason that it would be inappropriate for the Chinese Government to revise the old map right now. Some people in India, however, are raising a big uproar about the maps published in China, attempting to create a pressure of public opinion to force China to accept India's unilateral claims concerning the Sino-Indian boundary. Needless to say, this is neither wise nor worthy.

2. As stated above, the Chinese Government has all along adhered to a clear-cut policy on the Sino-Indian border question: on the one hand it affirms the fact that the entire Sino-Indian boundary has not been delimited, while on the other, it also faces reality, and taking specially into consideration the friendly relationship between China and India actively seeks for a settlement fair and reasonable to both sides, and never tries unilaterally to change the long-existing state of the border between the two countries pending the settlement of the boundary question.

Regarding the eastern section of the Sino-Indian boundary, as I have stated above, the Chinese Government absolutely does not recognise the so-called McMahon Line, but Chinese troops have never crossed that line. This is for the sake of maintaining amity along the border to facilitate negotiations and settlement of the boundary question, and in no way implies that the Chinese Government has recognised that line. In view of the fact that my former explanation of this point to Your Excellency is obviously misunderstood in Your Excellency's latest two letters to me, I have deemed it necessary once again to make the above explanation clearly.

Regarding the western section of the Sino-Indian boundary, China has strictly abided by the traditional customary line and, with regard to Indian troops' repeated intrusions into or occupation of Chinese territory, the Chinese Government, acting always in a friendly manner, has dealt with each case in way befitting it. For example, regarding the invasion of Wu-je by Indian troops and administrative personnel, the Chinese Government has tried its best to seek a settlement of the question with the Indian Government through negotiations and to avoid a clash. Regarding the Indian troops who invaded the southwestern part of China's Sinkiang and the area of Lake Pankong in the Tibet Region of China, the Chinese frontier guards, after disarming them according to international practice, adopted an attitude of reasoning, asking them to leave Chinese territory and returning to them their arms. Regarding the Indian troops successive invasion and occupation of the areas of Shipki Pass, Parigas, Sang, Thungscha, Puling-sumbo, Chuva, Chuje; Sangcha and Lapthal, the Chinese Government, after discovering these happenings, invariably conducted thorough and detailed investigations rather than laying charges against the Indian Government immediately and temperamentally. These measures prove that the Chinese Government is exerting its greatest effort to uphold Sino-Indian friendship.

Despite the above-mentioned border incidents caused wholly by the trespassing of Indian troops, until the beginning of this year, the atmosphere along the Sino-Indian border had on the whole been fairly good. The fact that no armed clashes had ever occurred along the 2,000 or so kilometres of the Sino-Indian boundary, which is wholly undelimited, is in itself a powerful proof that, given a friendly and reasonable attitude on both sides, amity can be maintained in the border areas and tension rules out pending the delimitation of the boundary between the two countries.

3. Since the outbreak of the rebellion in Tibet, however, the border situation has become increasingly tense owing to reasons for which the Chinese side cannot be held responsible. Immediately after the fleeting of a large number of Tibetan rebels into India, Indian troops started pressing forward steadily across the eastern section of the Sino-Indian boundary. Changing unilaterally the long-existing state of the border between the two countries, they not only everstepped the so-called McMahon Line as indicated in the map attached to the secret notes exchanged between Britain and the Tibet local authorities, but also exceeded the boundary drawn in current Indian maps which is alleged to represent the so-called McMahon Line, but which in many places actually cuts even deeper into Chinese territory than the McMahon Line. Indian troops invaded and occupied Longju, intruded into Yashar, and are still in occupation of Shatze, Khinzemane and Tamaden—all of which are Chinese territory—shielding armed Tibetan rebel bandits in this area.
Indian aircraft have also time and again violated China's territorial air near the Sino-Indian border. What is specially regrettable is that, not long ago, the Indian troops unlawfully occupying Longju launched armed attacks on the Chinese frontier guards stationing at Migyitun, leaving no room for the Chinese frontier guards but fire back in self-defence. This was the first instance of armed clash along the Sino-Indian border. It can be seen from the above that the tense situation recently arising on the Sino-Indian border was all caused by trespassing and provocations by Indian troops, and that for this the Indian side should be held fully responsible. Nevertheless, the Indian Government has directed all sorts of groundless charges against the Chinese Government, clamouring that China has committed aggression against India and describing the Chinese frontier guards' act of self-defence in the Migyitun areas as armed provocation. Many political figures and propaganda organs in India have seized the occasion to make a great deal of anti-Chinese utterances, some even openly advocating provocative actions of an even larger scale such as bombarding Chinese territory. Thus a second anti-Chinese campaign has been launched in India in six months' time. The fact that India does not recognise the undelimited state of the Sino-Indian boundary and steps up bringing pressure to bear on China militarily, diplomatically and through public opinion cannot but make one suspect that it is the attempt of India to impose upon China its one-sided claims on the boundary question. It must be pointed out that this attempt will never succeed and such action cannot possibly yield any results other than impairing the friendship of the two countries, further complicating the boundary question and making it more difficult to settle.

4. The friendly relations between China and India are based on the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence. The Chinese Government has consistently held that all differences between our two countries must and certainly can be resolved through peaceful consultations and should not be allowed to affect the friendly relationship between the two countries. China looks upon its southwestern border as a border of peace and friendship. I can assure Your Excellency that it is merely for the purpose of preventing remnant armed Tibetan rebels from crossing the border back and forth to carry out harassing activities that the Chinese Government has in recent months dispatched guard units to be stationed in the south-eastern part of the Tibet Region of China. This is obviously in the interest of ensuring the tranquillity of the border and will in no way constitute a threat to India. Your Excellency is one of the initiators of the Five Principles and has made significant contributions to the consolidation and development of Sino-Indian friendship and constantly stressed the importance of this friendship. This has deeply impressed the Chinese Government and people. I have therefore given Your Excellency a systematic explanation of the whole picture of the Sino-Indian boundary. I hope that Your Excellency and the Indian Government will in accordance with the Chinese Government's request, immediately adopt measures to withdraw the trespassing Indian troops and administrative personnel and restore the long existing state of the boundary between the two countries. Through this, the temporary tension on the Sino-Indian border would be eased at once and the dark clouds hanging over the relations between our two countries would be speedily dispelled, setting at ease our friends who are concerned for Sino-Indian friendly relations and dealing a blow to those who are sowing discord in the Sino-Indian relations and creating tension.

With cordial regards,

(Sd.) CHOU’ EN-LAI,
Premier of the State
Council of the People’s
Republic of China.
NEW DELHI, the 26th September, 1959.

DEAR MR. PRIME MINISTER,

I have received your letter of September 8, 1959. I must say that I was greatly surprised and distressed to read it. You and I discussed the India-China border, and particularly the eastern sector, in 1954 in Peking and in 1956-57 in India. As you know, the boundary in the eastern sector is loosely referred to as the McMahon Line. I do not like this description, but for convenience I propose to refer to it as such. When I discussed this with you, I thought that we were confronted with the problem of reaching an agreement on where exactly the so-called McMahon Line in the eastern sector of the boundary lay. Even when I received your letter of January 23, 1959, I had no idea that the People’s Republic of China would lay claim to about 40,000 square miles of what in our view has been indisputably Indian territory for decades and in some sectors for over a century. In your latest letter you have sought to make out a claim to large tracts of Indian territory and have even suggested that the independent Government of India are seeking to reap a benefit from the British aggression against China. Our Parliament and our people deeply resent this allegation. The struggle of the Indian people against any form of imperialism both at home and abroad is known and recognised all over the world and we had thought that China also appreciated and recognised our struggle. It is true that the British occupied and ruled the Indian sub-continent against the wishes of the Indian people. The boundaries of India were however, settled for centuries by history, geography, custom and tradition. Nowhere indeed has India’s dislike of imperialist policies been more clearly shown than in her attitude towards Tibet. The Government of India voluntarily renounced all the extra-territorial rights enjoyed by Britain in Tibet before 1947 and recognised by Treaty that Tibet is a region of China. In the course of the long talks that we had during your last visit to India, you had told me that Tibet had been and was a part of China but that it was an autonomous region.

2. You have suggested in your letter that the Government of India have applied all sorts of pressure on the Chinese Government, including the use of force, to make the Chinese Government accept the Indian demand. This is the reverse of what the Government of India did. We did not release to the public the information which we had about the various border intrusions into our territory by Chinese personnel since 1954, the construction of a road across Indian territory in Ladakh, and the arrest of our personnel in the Aksai Chin area in 1958 and their detention. We did not give publicity to this in the hope that peaceful solutions of the disputes could be found by agreement by the two countries without public excitement on both sides. In fact our failure to do so has now resulted in sharp but legitimate criticism of the Government both in Parliament and in the press in our country. Far from using force, we sought a peaceful settlement of the disputes. You must be aware of the prolonged negotiations between the Indian and Chinese representatives over Bara Hoti in 1958 and of the notes exchanged between our two Governments on the other disputes. I need hardly tell you that there is great resentment in India at the action of your troops in overpowering our outpost in Longju on our side of the McMahon Line, and although you have up till now not withdrawn your troops we have not sought to reoccupy the post.

3. You have referred to the maintenance of the long existing status quo on the border. The Government of India have always been in favour of it. It is the Chinese Government who have violated it repeatedly in recent years. I can refer, for example, to the construction of a 100-mile road across what has traditionally been Indian territory in the Aksai Chin area, the entry of Chinese survey parties in the Lohit Frontier Division in 1957, the establishment of a camp at Spanggur in 1959, the despatch of armed personnel to Bara Hoti in 1958 and stationing them there in winter against customary practice and last, but not least, the use of force in Longju.

4. It is true that the Sino-Indian boundary has not been formally delimited along its entire length. Indeed the terrain of the Sino-Indian border in many places makes such physical demarcation on the ground impossible. But the entire length of the border has been either defined by treaty or recognised by custom or by both and until now the Chinese Government have not protested against the exercise of jurisdiction by the Government of India upto the customary border. You have yourself acknowledged the fact that no armed clash ever occurred along our border until the beginning of this year. All Chinese Governments have respected the Indian border. The fact that previous Chinese Governments were weak is no answer. Not even a protest was registered in accordance with established state practice in this regard, as was done in the case of Burma between 1906 and 1937.

5. Concerning the boundary between Tibet and Ladakh, it is incorrect to say that the then Chinese Central Government did not send anybody to participate in the conclusion of the treaty between Tibet and Kashmir in 1842. The treaty was signed by the representatives of both the Dalai Lama and the Emperor of China. Kalon Sokon, one of the signatories, though by birth a Tibetan, had Chinese rank. Even the Tibetan version of the treaty makes it clear that China was a party to it. Thus, it asserts that “there will never be on any account in future till the world lasts, any deviation even by the hair's breadth and any breach in the alliance, friendship and unity between the King of the world Siri Khalsa Sahib and Siri Maharaj Sahib Raja-i-Rajagan Raja Sahib Bahadur, and the Khagan of China and the Lama Guru Sahib of Lhasa.”

6. It is true that the 1842 treaty referred merely to the “old established frontiers”. This was because these frontiers were well-known and did not require any formal delimitation. Even the treaty of 1684 between Ladakh and Tibet stated that “the boundaries fixed in the beginning, when Skyid-Ida-ngeema-gon gave a kingdom to each of his three sons, shall still be maintained.” References in the Ladakhi chronicles of the 17th century indicate that the boundary was well-established. Cunningham, whom Your Excellency has referred to with approval, toured the area in 1846. He stated in 1854 that the eastern boundary of Ladakh “is well-defined by piles of stones, which were set up after the last expulsion of the Sokpo or Mongol hordes in A.D. 1687 when the Ladakhis received considerable assistance from Kashmir.” (Ladakh, 1854, page 261). Thus it is clear that for nearly two centuries the boundary between Ladakh and Tibet was well-known and recognized by both sides. There was a constant flow of trade between Ladakh and Tibet during these centuries as provided for by these treaties, and no boundary conflicts ever arose.

7. It has been stated in your letter that China never ratified the 1842 treaty. That China recognised the treaty is clear from the fact that the Chinese official in 1847 informed the British Government: “Respecting the frontiers I beg to remark that the borders of those territories have been sufficiently and distinctly fixed, so that it will be best to adhere to this ancient arrangement and it will prove far more convenient to abstain from any additional measures for fixing them.” There was no suggestion that the Chinese Government regarded the treaty as invalid. It is also clear from the statement quoted that not merely was the boundary known, but the boundary was distinctly and sufficiently fixed and there was no divergence of opinion as to where it lay.

8. Further evidence of Chinese acceptance of the 1842 treaty is provided by the fact that the other provisions of the treaty regarding exchange of goods and presents were in operation right up to 1946 without any hindrance from the Chinese Government.

9. It is incorrect to say that down to 1899 the British Government proposed formally to delimit this section of the boundary but that the Chinese Government did not agree. No proposals were made between 1847 and 1899 for any such formal delimitation. The proposal made in 1899 by the British Government referred not to the eastern frontier of Ladakh with Tibet but to the northern frontier of Ladakh and Kashmir with Sinkiang. It was stated in that context that the northern boundary ran along the Kuen Lun range to a point east of 80° east longitude, where it met the eastern boundary of Ladakh. This signified beyond doubt that the whole of Aksai Chin area lay in Indian territory. The Government of China did not object to this proposal.

10. So Ladakh, Tibet and China had all accepted that the frontier between Ladakh and Tibet was the customary boundary. You have stated that the boundary as shown in the Chinese maps follows, more or less, that shown in the map of “Punjab, Western Himalaya and adjoining parts of Tibet” compiled by Walker and attached to Cunningham’s book published in 1854. Walker’s Map states in the Compilation Index that the document used for this sector is the “Map of Ladakh and Nari Khorsum by Capt. H. Strachey.” Now, Strachey toured only a part of Ladakh in 1847-48. He knew little or nothing about Aksai Chin, having never visited the area, and drew the boundary where he thought the main water-parting, which was the natural and old established frontier in this area, lay. Thereafter a number of exploration and survey parties were sent by the Government of India to this region. These parties ascertained the customary frontier on the basis of natural features and such local evidence as was available. Johnson visited the area in 1865 and Frederick Drew, an Englishman in the employ of the Maharaja of Kashmir as Governor of Ladakh, in 1866. Other survey parties in the nineteenth century were those of Hayward, Shaw and Cayley in 1868. Carey in 1885—87, Hamilton Bower in 1891, Littledale in 1895, Welby and Malcolm in 1896, Deasy and Pike in 1896, and Aurel Stein in 1900. Accurate maps of the whole Ladakh area thus became possible only from 1865, after the afore-mentioned surveys had ascertained the exact lie of the watershed; and it is significant that most of the maps since that date show the customary boundary in accordance with the line shown by us in our map rather than that claimed by China. The later Map of Turkestan of Walker himself published in 1867-68, Drew's map attached to this book Jammu & Kashmir Territories (1875), Johnston's Atlas (1882), and maps attached to the Gazetteers of Kashmir published from 1890 onwards all showed boundary lines more or less similar to our present frontier. Even official Chinese maps of the late nineteenth century showed a boundary approximating to our line. It is only in official Chinese maps of the twentieth century that the Chinese Government included large parts of our territory. On the other hand, The New Atlas and Commercial Gazette of China, published in Shanghai sometime after 1917 by the North China Daily News and Herald on the basis of authoritative surveys, shows a boundary in the north-west similar to our alignment and a boundary in the north-east which approximates to what later became known as the McMahon Line. I may add that the Chinese maps do not follow even Walker's Map of 1854 where it does not support the assertion made on behalf of China. Thus Walker shows the areas north of Demchok and north of Pangong in India but recent Chinese maps have not followed Walker's map in regard to these areas.

11. You have referred to the sector of the boundary between what is known as the Ari area of Tibet and India. We are told that Ari, which is an abbreviated form of Ngari Khorsum, is southwestern Tibet. This is the sector of the boundary between the Punjab, Himachal Pradesh and Uttar Pradesh in India and the Tibet region. You have stated that the boundary in this sector has never been formally delimited. In fact, there should be little doubt about the boundary in this sector. Article IV of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement specifies six passes in this area. There was discussion of these passes between the Chinese and Indian representatives before the Agreement was concluded. Your original draft contained the following: "The Chinese Government agrees to open the following passes." On behalf of India Mr. Kaul then said that these were Indian passes. After some discussion both sides agreed on the following text: "Traders and pilgrims of both countries may travel by the following passes". Your Vice-Foreign Minister remarked in that context. "This was the fifth concession on our part". This was recognition of the passes as border passes. In fact the Government of India have always been in control of the Indian ends of the passes.
12. I am particularly surprised by your statement that “the so-called McMahon Line was a product of the British policy of aggression against the Tibet Region of China”. You further state that the agreement in regard to the frontier between India and Tibet was concluded between the British representative and the representative of the Tibet local authorities and that it has never been recognized by any Chinese Central Government. From this you draw the conclusion that the agreement is illegal. The facts, however, are otherwise. The arrangements for the Simla Conference were made with the full knowledge and consent of the Government of China. The Foreign Minister of China wrote to the British representative on the 7th August 1913 that the Chinese plenipotentiary would proceed to India “to open negotiations for a treaty jointly” with the Tibetan and British plenipotentiaries. It is clear from the proceedings of the conference that not only did the Chinese representative fully participate in the conference but that the Tibetan representative took part in the discussions on an equal footing with the Chinese and the then British Indian representatives. Not only were the frontiers of India with Tibet discussed at the conference, but also the boundaries between Inner Tibet and China, and Inner Tibet and Outer Tibet. At no stage, either then or subsequently, did the Chinese Government object to the discussions on the boundary between India and Tibet at the conference. In the circumstances the agreement which resulted from the conference in regard to the McMahon Line boundary between India and Tibet must, in accordance with accepted international practice, be regarded as binding on both China and Tibet. In fact this was not the first occasion when Tibet concluded an agreement with other countries. In 1856 Tibet concluded an agreement on its own with Nepal. The Convention signed by Britain and Tibet in 1904 was negotiated by the British and Tibetan representatives with the assistance of the Chinese Amban in Tibet.

13. You have stated that for a long time after the exchange of so-called secret notes between Britain and Tibet Britain did not dare to make public the related documents. You have also contended that the McMahon Line “was later marked on the map attached to the Simla Treaty”. I am afraid I cannot agree either with your facts or your conclusion. The Chinese representative at the Simla Conference was fully aware of the McMahon Line boundary between India and Tibet. This particular line was discussed between the Tibetan and British Indian representatives, but when the draft convention emerging from the conference was presented on the 22nd April 1914 for signature by the British Indian, Tibetan and Chinese representatives it had attached to it a map showing the McMahon Line boundary as well as the boundaries between Inner Tibet and China, and Inner Tibet and Outer Tibet. Later, the Chinese Foreign Office in a memorandum, dated the 25th April 1914 listed a number of objections to the boundaries between Inner Tibet and Outer Tibet and Inner Tibet and China. It did not raise any objection to the boundary between Tibet and India as shown in the map attached to the tripartite Simla Convention. Thereafter, on the 27th April, the Chinese representative initialled both the convention and the map without any objection. Subsequently, in their memorandum, dated the 13th June 1914, the Chinese made fresh proposals regarding the boundaries of Inner Tibet and Outer Tibet. It is significant that no mention was at all made in this memorandum of the boundary between Tibet and India. Almost five years later, on the 30th May 1919, the Government of China again suggested some modifications of the Simla Convention with a view to reaching a final settlement. These modifications related only to the boundaries between Inner Tibet and China and Inner Tibet and Outer Tibet. No reference at all was made to the boundary between Tibet and India (McMahon Line). Looking into the old papers, we find that the British Government withheld the publication of the Simla Convention for several years in the hope that there would be an agreement about the status and boundary of Inner Tibet. The Simla Convention was published in the 1929 edition of Aitchison’s Treaties and the McMahon Line was shown in the official maps from 1937 onwards. These maps were circulated widely but neither then nor subsequently was any objection raised by the Chinese authorities.

14. I entirely disagree with the inference drawn by you from the exchange of two communications between the Tibetan Bureau in Lhasa and the new Government of India in 1947. The facts are that our Mission in Lhasa forwarded to us a telegram, dated the 16th October 1947 from the Tibetan Bureau. The telegram asked for the return of alleged Tibetan territories on boundaries of India and Tibet “such as Sayul and Walong and in direction of Pemakoe, Lonag, Lopa, Mon, Bhutan, Sikkim, Darjeeling and others on this side of river Ganges and Lowo, Ladakh etc. upto boundary of Yarkhim.” It will be seen that the areas claimed by Tibet had not been defined. If they were to be taken literally, the Tibetan boundary would come down to the line of the river Ganges. The Government of India could not possibly have entertained such a fantastic claim. If they had the faintest idea that this telegram would be made the basis of a subsequent claim to large areas of Indian territory, they would of course have immediately and unequivocally rejected the claim. Not having had such an impression, they sent a reply to the following effect: “The Government of India would be glad to have an assurance that it is the intention of the Tibetan Government to continue relations on the existing basis until new agreements are reached on matters that either party may wish to take up. This is the procedure adopted by all other countries with which India has inherited treaty relations from His Majesty’s Government”. It would be unfair to deduce from this reply that India undertook to negotiate fresh agreements with Tibet on the frontier question. When the British relinquished power and India attained freedom on the 15th August 1947, the new Government of India inherited the treaty obligations of undivided India. They wished to assure all countries with which the British Government of undivided India had treaties and agreements that the new Government to India would abide by the obligations arising from them. All that the Government of India intended to do in the telegram mentioned in Your Excellency’s letter was to convey an assurance to that effect to the Tibetan authorities. There could be no question, so far as India was concerned, of reopening old treaties with Tibet with a view to entertaining, even for purposes of discussion, claims to large areas of Indian territory.
15. It is wrong to say that the frontier east of Bhutan as shown on Chinese maps is the traditional frontier. On the contrary, it is the McMahon Line which correctly represents the customary boundary in this area. The water-parting formed by the crest of the Himalayas is the natural frontier which was accepted for centuries as the boundary by the peoples on both sides. The tribes inhabiting the area south of the McMahon Line—the Monbas, Akas, Dafis, Miris, Abors, and Mishmis—are of the same ethnic stock as the other hill tribes of Assam and have no kinship with the Tibetans. The Tibetans themselves regard these tribes with contempt and group them all together as "Lopas". It is true that the boundary of two adjacent countries is not determined by the ethnic affiliations of the people living in these countries. Some sort of cultural intercourse between the peoples living on both sides of the frontier is also not uncommon. All the same it is significant that the tribes mentioned above have not been affected in the slightest degree by any Tibetan influence, cultural, political or other, and this can only be due to the fact that the Tibetan authorities have not exercised jurisdiction at any time in this area. On the other hand, Indian administration gradually moved up to these areas. Agreements were signed with the Akas in 1844 and 1888, the Abors in 1862-63 and 1866, and with the Monbas in 1844 and 1853, extending the authority of the Government of India over them. It was the British Government's policy generally to leave the tribes more or less to look after themselves and not seek to establish any detailed administration of these areas such as was to be found in the rest of British Indian territory. All the same British Political Officers visited these areas for settling disputes and such like purposes. Finally, the Sadiya Frontier Tract, approximately 10,000 square miles in area, was formed in 1912, and the Balipara Frontier Tract also comprising about 10,000 square miles, was formed in 1913, i.e., before the Simla Conference met. The Atlas of the Chinese Empire, published in London by the Chinese Inland Mission in 1906, shows as the frontier in this area an alignment which is almost identical with what was settled at Simla in 1914. The area was extensively surveyed in 1911-13. The Lohit area was surveyed by the Mishmi Mission in 1911-12, the Dibhang Valley was surveyed in 1912-13, and the Abor area in 1913. Captain Bailey carried out extensive surveys of the southern limits of Tibetan jurisdiction in the whole area in 1913-14. It was on the basis of all this detailed information that the boundary was settled between India and Tibet in 1914. It is clear, therefore, that the McMahon Line was not an arbitrary imposition on a weak Tibet by the Government of India. It formalized the natural, traditional, ethnic and administrative boundary in the area.

16. Your Excellency has referred to a map published by the Survey of India in 1917 and a map in the 1929 edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. The Survey of India map shows the line claimed by China but on the same sheet, in the index map, the McMahon Line is also shown. The reason for this is that the British Indian Government were reluctant to issue new maps of India showing only the McMahon Line in the hope that China would accept the Simla Convention as a whole. As for the map in the 1929 edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, it is true that in the eastern sector it shows roughly the line now claimed by China. But the same map shows the whole of Aksai Chin as part of Ladakh. It would therefore be unfair to quote the authority of the Encyclopaedia Britannica in support of the Chinese claim in one sector of the boundary and to reject it in respect of the other. In fact, if maps published privately in other countries are to be cited as evidence, we can refer to a large number of such maps in our support. For example, the map of Asie Meridionale published by Andriveau-Coujon in Paris in 1876 and the map of Asia Orientale published by the same firm in 1881 show the whole tribal area as outside Tibet. The Atlas of the Chinese Empire published by the China Inland Mission in 1906 shows a boundary which approximates to the McMahon Line. The British War Office Map of the Chinese Empire published in October 1907 shows almost the entire tribal territory in India. The map in Sir Francis Younghusband's volume India and Tibet published in London in 1910 shows the Tribal area in India; and so does the map in Sir Charles Bell's book Tibet Past and Present (Oxford 1924).

17. It is not clear to us what exactly is the implication of your statement that the boundaries of Sikkim and Bhutan do not fall within the scope of the present discussion. In fact, Chinese maps show sizeable areas of Bhutan as part of Tibet. Under treaty relationships with Bhutan, the Government of India are the only competent authority to take up with other Governments matters concerning Bhutan's external relations, and in fact we have taken up with your Government a number of matters on behalf of the Bhutan Government. The rectification of errors in Chinese maps regarding the boundary of Bhutan with Tibet is therefore a matter which has to be discussed along with the boundary of India with the Tibet region of China in the same sector. As regards Sikkim, the Chinese Government recognised as far back as 1890 that the Government of India "has direct and exclusive control over the internal administration and foreign relations of that State". This Convention of 1890 also defined the boundary between Sikkim and Tibet; and the boundary was later, in 1895, demarcated. There is thus no dispute regarding the boundary of Sikkim with the Tibet region.

18. You have stated that the Sino-Indian boundary is about 2,000 kilometres in length, is wholly undelimited, and that it is not Chinese maps but British and Indian maps that have been unilaterally altering the Sino-Indian boundary. In fact, the Sino-Indian boundary (apart from the boundary of Sikkim and Bhutan with Tibet) extends over 3,520 kilometres. It is wrong to say that this long boundary is wholly undelimited. The frontier east of Bhutan has been explicitly delineated on the 1914 treaty map. The frontier of Himachal Pradesh and Uttar Pradesh has been clarified by implication by the mention of six passes in the 1954 Agreement. As for the charge that British and Indian maps have been unilaterally altering the boundary, the fact is that early British maps showed the boundary roughly where the British thought the water-parting was at the time. Later, as more topographical as well as local information about the water-parting was obtained, the boundary was shown with greater precision on the subsequent maps. The discrepancies between the earlier and later maps are also explained in part by the fact that British cartographers as a rule showed in their maps the administrative boundaries irrespective of the actual alignment of the frontier. Therefore, as administration was gradually extended in the frontier areas, corresponding changes were made in the boundaries on the later maps. Thus the map of India published by the Survey of India in 1895 (1"=128 miles) showed the unadministered areas of northern Burma and north-eastern India up to what subsequently came to be known as the McMahon Line by a light orange colour wash as distinct from the deeper colours used for the rest of the Indian territory. The Memorandum on Native States in India published by the Government of India in 1909 has a map in Volume II showing this whole tribal area as part of India. The fact is that the present frontiers of India have always been the historic frontiers but administration in the British period was only gradually extended up to these frontiers. Shortly after India attained independence in 1947 the Government of India decided, as a matter of policy, to bring these frontier areas under more direct administrative control to enable them to share in the benefits of a welfare state subject to the protection of their distinct social and cultural patterns. It is not true to say that it was only after the recent Tibetan crisis and the entry into India of a large number of Tibetans that Indian troops started advancing steadily in the North-East Frontier Agency. In fact administrative personnel, civil and police, had been functioning in these areas right up to the McMahon frontier for several years before the recent disturbances broke out in Tibet. However, we did not have any military force anywhere in the border areas. There was only an armed constabulary in support of the civil personnel and even the frontier posts were manned by this constabulary. It was only when our outpost at Longju was overpowered by superior Chinese military force and our personnel elsewhere along the frontier were being intimidated by Chinese forces that we decided to place the responsibility for the protection of the frontier on our army.

19. It should be clear from what has been stated in previous paragraphs that it is the Chinese maps that have altered the boundary alignments through the years to include large areas of Indian territory in China. It should also be stated that Chinese maps published even after 1949 have not adhered to any definite frontier. Different maps show different alignments in the same sector.

20. I am sorry to have to say that it is the Chinese Government who have been trying unilaterally to change the long-existing state of the border. There is no other explanation for the presence of Chinese personnel in Bara Hoti and of Chinese troops in the Aksai Chin area, Khurnak Fort, Mandal, Spanggar, Khinzemane and Longju, and for Chinese intrusions in the Spiti area, Shipki pass, the Nilang-Jadhang area, Sangcha, Lapthal, and the Dichu Valley. Nor is it correct to say that Chinese troops have never crossed the McMahon Line. Both Khinzemane and Longju are south of this line.

21. The Government of India emphatically repudiate the allegation that in recent times they have “invaded and occupied” a number of places in the middle sector of the boundary. In fact it is the Chinese forces which have made persistent efforts in recent times to come into and occupy indisputably Indian territory. Details of intrusions and attempted intrusions by Chinese forces have been given in the attached note. These intrusions have been particularly marked in the Spanggur area, where Chinese forces have been pushing forward in an aggressive manner during the last year or two in disregard of the traditional frontier. The Chinese have only recently established a new camp near the western extremity of the Spanggur lake at a point which even according to some official Chinese maps is in Indian territory. It is not for us to comment on the reports of large-scale movements of Chinese forces in the Tibetan frontier areas. We hope that these moves do not signify a new policy of actively probing into Indian territory along the whole length of the Sino-Indian frontier.

22. Reports have reached us that some Chinese officers in Tibet have repeatedly proclaimed that the Chinese authorities will before long take possession of Sikkim, Bhutan, Ladakh and our North-East Frontier Agency. I do not know what authority they had to make these remarks but I would like to draw Your Excellency's attention to them as these remarks have naturally added to the tension on the frontier.

23. Your Excellency has spoken of Indian parties having trespassed into Chinese territory. Nowhere have our personnel done so. Even if they had done so through an error of judgment at any point in the barren wastes of some far-flung frontier region, we would have expected that a friendly Government would promptly bring it to our notice for remedial action. Instead, last year when an Indian party was engaged on routine administrative patrol near Haji Langar in Ladakh, your forces arrested them and did not inform us of the arrest until we had enquired of you almost five weeks later. In the meantime our personnel were subjected to threats, harsh treatment and severe interrogation. Surely this is not the manner in which the personnel of a friendly Government should have been treated.

24. The charge that India has been shielding armed Tibetan rebels in the frontier areas in the north-east is wholly unfounded and we firmly reject it. On the contrary, our personnel disarmed the Tibetan rebels as soon as they crossed the frontier into Indian territory and insisted on their moving well away from the frontier areas. The few who showed disinclination to do so were told that they would not get asylum in India and made to leave our territory finally.

25. There is no truth in the allegation that Indian aircraft have repeatedly violated Chinese territorial air in this area. We have issued definite instruction to all our aircraft to avoid trespass into Chinese air space and we are assured that this instruction has been carefully observed. You will appreciate, however, that aircraft engaged in supply dropping missions to a frontier outpost may accidentally cross the international frontier or appear to do so even though it has not actually crossed the frontier. Our anxiety to respect the Chinese territorial air space would be clear from the fact that when in July last the officer in charge of our outpost at Longju fell seriously ill we informed your Government that we would be para-dropping a doctor. The object of our giving the information to your Government was to ensure that you would not misunderstand it if by error of judgment our aircraft should cross into Chinese territory in flying over a frontier outpost. For the same reason we also gave you information in advance that survey operations would be carried out from the air on our side of the border during the months from November 1959 to February 1960. Incidentally, the information that we gave you about Longju would disprove any suggestion that we had surreptitiously started an outpost on Chinese territory. Had we done so, we would not have given its location to your Government.

26. I have looked into the allegation that the boundary drawn on Indian maps includes in many places even more territory than the McMahon Line, but have been unable to discover any basis for it. If you have in mind the Sino-Indian frontier shown in the Indian maps in the Migyitun area which differs slightly from the boundary shown in the Treaty map, the position can be easily explained. As settled between the British and the Chinese representatives at the time of the Simla Conference, the boundary was to follow the natural features, but a reservation was made that Migyitun (and a few other places) would be within Tibetan territory. This was done in order to leave within Tibet the two sacred lakes of Tsari Sarpa and Tso Karpo which were places of pilgrimage for Tibetans and the village of Migyitun from which the pilgrimage started. At the time of the Simla Convention, the exact topographical features in this area were not known. Later, after the topography of the area had been definitely ascertained, the actual boundary followed the geographical features except where a departure was necessary to leave Migyitun within Tibetan territory. The actual boundary as shown in the Indian maps, therefore, merely gave effect to the treaty map in the area based on definite topography. This was in accordance with established international practice.

27. I entirely disagree with your view that the tense situation that has arisen on the border has been caused by Indian trespassing and provocation. In fact, as the attached note will show, it is the Chinese who have trespassed into Indian territory across the traditional border at a number of places in recent years. You have mentioned that we in India have staged a second so-called anti-Chinese campaign. This, if I may say so, is the reverse of the actual position. Despite the regrettable happenings on the frontier of our two countries, we in India have conducted ourselves with great restraint and moderation. At a number of places your forces assumed a threatening attitude; at others they actually came into our territory. Such incidents concerning as they did the integrity of India, were very serious, but in our anxiety not to create feelings against your Government we deliberately avoided giving publicity to them. Questions in Parliament had, however, to be answered and the facts could not be withheld. When the facts thus became known, the reaction both in Parliament and among the public was one of dismay and great resentment. There was criticism of our Government both in Parliament and the press for our failure to give publicity to these developments at an earlier stage. Under the Indian Constitution Parliament is supreme. India has also a free press and the Government could not restrain public criticism. In the circumstances, to allege that the Government of India built up pressure on China in any manner is a complete misreading of the facts of the situation. It is also based on complete misunderstanding of the constitutional procedures under which the Government, Parliament and the press function in India. Needless to say, such an allegation is entirely baseless.

28. I have stated before and wish to affirm once again that the Government of India attach great importance to the maintenance of friendly relations with China. They have hitherto sought to conduct their relations with China, as with other countries, in the spirit of Panch Sheel. This indeed had always been India's policy even before the five principles were enunciated. It is therefore all the more a matter of regret and surprise to us that China should now have put forth claims to large areas of Indian territory inhabited by hundreds of thousands of Indian nationals, which have been under the administrative jurisdiction of India for many years. No Government could possibly discuss the future of such large areas which are an integral part of their territory. We however recognise that the India-China frontier which extends over more than 3,500 kilometres has not been demarcated on the ground and disputes may therefore arise at some places along the traditional frontier as to whether these places lie on the Indian or the Tibetan side of this traditional frontier. We agree therefore that the border disputes which have already arisen should be amicably and peacefully settled. We also agree that until a settlement has been reached the status quo should be maintained. In the meantime both sides should respect the traditional frontier and neither party should seek to alter the status quo in any manner. Further, if any party has trespassed into the other's territory across the traditional frontier, it should immediately withdraw to its side of the frontier. So far as the Government of India are concerned, at no places at present have they any personnel, civil, police or military, on the Tibetan side of the traditional frontier. There was only one outpost, that at Tamaden, established some months ago, which, subsequent enquiries showed, was somewhat north of the McMahon Line. In keeping with our earlier promise we have already withdrawn it to a point south of the Line. There can therefore be no question of withdrawing any Indian personnel at any other place. We would now request that in the same spirit your Government should withdraw their personnel from a number of posts which you have opened in recent months at Spanggur, Mandal and one or two other places in eastern Ladakh. Similarly, your forces should also withdraw from Longju which they forcibly occupied on the 26th August and which they still continue to occupy. No discussions can be fruitful unless the posts on the Indian side of the traditional frontier now held by the Chinese forces are first evacuated by them and further threats and intimidations immediately cease.

29. Mr. Prime Minister, I regret that I have had to write to you at this length and in such detail. But I must frankly say that your letter of the 8th September has come as a great shock to us. India was one of the first countries to extend recognition to the People’s Republic of China and for the last ten years we have consistently sought to maintain and strengthen our friendship with your country. When our two countries signed the 1954 Agreement in regard to the Tibet region I hoped that the main problems which history had bequeathed to us in the relations between India and China had been peacefully and finally settled. Five years later, you have now brought forward, with all insistence, a problem which dwarfs in importance all that we have discussed in recent years and, I thought, settled. I appreciate your statement that China looks upon her south-western border as a border of peace and friendship. This hope and this promise could be fulfilled only if China would not bring within the scope of what should essentially be a border dispute, claims to thousands of square miles of territory which have been and are integral part of the territory of India.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,
(Sd.) JAWAHARLAL NEHRU.
Annexure to letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China, 26 September 1959

A NOTE ON THE BORDER DISPUTES

A. Aksai Chin

As shown in the text of the letter, Aksai Chin is a part of Ladakh. The Chinese Government have now admitted that in 1956 they built a highway from Tibet to Sinkiang, running for about a hundred miles through this territory. In September 1957, it was announced that this road had been completed. The next year Indian personnel carrying out routine patrol duties were arrested near Haji Langar in north-east Aksai Chin, taken to Suget Karol and detained for five weeks. The leader of the Indian patrol was placed in solitary confinement, and all documents were seized. When the Government of India protested at the serious and continuous occupation of our territory which road-building implied, and enquired whether the Chinese authorities had any knowledge of the Indian patrol, they admitted that they had detained the Indian party. Later the party was released at the Karakoram pass.

B. The Pangong area

The customary boundary between Ladakh and Tibet in this region lies from Lanak La (34° 24' North and 79° 34' East) along the eastern and southern watershed of the Chang Chenmo and the southern watershed of the Chumesang, and then along the southern bank of the Chumesang and the eastern bank of the Changlung Lungpa. Skirting the western extremity of the eastern half of Pangong Tso, the boundary thereafter follows the Ang watershed and cutting across Spanggur Tso, follows the north-eastern and northern watershed of the Indus. In recent years Chinese armed personnel have crossed this border in several places, fanned out and occupied Indian territory illegally. In July 1958 the Government of India protested against the Chinese occupation of Khurnak Fort, about 1½ miles within the Indian frontier. This fort has from time immemorial been within Ladakh, and has never been the subject of dispute. Even at a conference on certain pasture grounds in this area, attended by the representatives of Tibet and Kashmir and a British Commissioner in 1924, the jurisdiction of India over this fort was not disputed. However, there has been no reply as yet to the note of the Government of India.

In July 1959 it was learnt that a Chinese armed detachment had entered Indian territory in the Spanggur area south of the Pangong Lake, and had established a camp at Spanggur. When an Indian police party on its way to Khurnak approached them, it was overpowered. The Government of India protested, but the Chinese Government in their reply asserted that this was Chinese territory. This statement is contradicted even by the boundary alignment in this sector shown on Chinese maps, for example, the Map of the Administrative Areas of the Chinese Republic (1948), in which the boundary cuts across the eastern extremity of the Spanggur Lake. Spanggur stands on the western edge of the lake. Though the Government of India would have been justified in dislodging this Chinese camp, they have refrained from doing so in the hope that the Chinese would themselves withdraw.

C. Demchok

Demchok, or Parigas, is another area which India is supposed to have "invaded and occupied". This is part of the Hanle region in south-eastern Ladakh. Ladakhi chronicles of the 17th century and accounts of travellers of the 18th and 19th centuries all state that Demchok was a part of Ladakh. The Kailash range, which is the eastern watershed of the Indus, lies east of Demchok. Strachey, who visited this area in 1847, confirmed this position, and Walker, on the authority of Strachey, showed the boundary in this region as running east of Demchok village. The pasture grounds between Demchok and the Kailash range have been used by Indian villagers for a long time past. All revenue records of this country prove that taxes were collected in this area by the Jammu and Kashmir Government, and a checkpost has been maintained in this area for several decades.

D. The Spiti area

Premier Chou En-lai's letter alleges Indian "invasion" of Chauva and Chu-je, i.e., the Spiti area in the Punjab State. The Spiti valley is, however, traditional Indian territory. The frontier in this area is the major watershed between the Pare Chu and the Spiti systems. As far back as 1879 the "Map of Hundes or Ngari Khorsum and Monyol" issued by the Trigonometrical Survey of India showed the boundary along this watershed. In 1956 a Chinese survey party visited this area and sought to place boundary stones on Indian territory, and in 1957 a Chinese patrol party was noticed there. The Government of India drew the attention of the Chinese Government to these violations of Indian territory. The Chinese authorities neither denied the charge nor claimed this territory to be a part of Tibet. They did not appear even to have an exact knowledge of this terrain, for they asked India for details of latitude and longitude. A wall map of the People's Republic of China published in November 1953 (Ya Kuang Publishing Society) shows this area within India. To speak of Indian aggression in this area is, therefore, to say the least, astonishing.

E. Shipki pass

Shipki pass is the first of the six border passes mentioned in the 1954 agreement. This has always been the limit of Indian territory. All old maps indicated this as the border pass. The Government of India have constructed a road up to this point and have been maintaining it for many years; and in 1954 the words "Hindustan-Tibet" were engraved on a rock flanking the pass on the left. In the summer of 1956 a Chinese patrol was found on the Indian side of the pass and well within Indian territory. On being asked to withdraw the Chinese personnel threw stones and threatened to use hand grenades. The commander of the Chinese patrol contended that he had received instructions to patrol the area up to Hupsang Khud and if the Indian party went beyond Hupsang Khud he "would oppose it with arms". Hupsang Khud is four miles from Shipki pass on the Indian side. Indian protests to the Government of China against this incursion remain unanswered.
F. The Nilang-Jadhang area

Premier Chou En-lai states that there have been historical disputes regarding many places in the sector of the boundary between Ladakh and Nepal, and gives as an example the area of Sang and Tsungsha, south-west of Tsaparang Dzong in Tibet. In fact this is the only area in regard to which the Chinese authorities have raised a dispute. Sang is Jadhang village, Tsungsha is Nilang village and Tsaparang Dzong is the district headquarters in this part of Tibet. The Chinese Premier accuses India of having invaded and occupied Puling-Sumdo, that is Pulam Sumda, a village in the Nilang-Jadhang area.

It is not true that this area had always belonged to China and that the British occupied it only thirty to forty years ago. By the middle of the seventeenth century Nilang formed part of Bushahr state (now in Himachal Pradesh of India). A copper-plate inscription of 1667 A.D. records a treaty of mutual defence between Bushahr and Tehri and the cession to Tehri of Nilang. So clearly Nilang was then in India. Documents of the 18th century show that Tehri was administering the area. The inhabitants of this area are Garhwali by stock and not Tibetan.

In 1804 Nepalese troops are said to have destroyed Nilang village but in 1850 the Tehri Durbar re-established the village of Nilang and a hamlet named Jadhang, further north. In 1914 the Tibetans tried to set up a boundary pillar at Gum Gum Nala south of Nilang, and four years later the Tehri Durbar in its turn erected three boundary pillars at the border pass of Tsangchok La.

In 1926 a boundary commission consisting of Tibetan, Tehri and British representatives met at Nilang. Considerable evidence was produced by the Tehri Government in their own favour. It included ownership rights in land, proof of construction of roads and buildings and collection of land revenues for centuries. The only evidence the Tibetans could produce was that their agents had occasionally collected a tax levied on trade with Tibet. The territory continued under the administration of the Tehri Durbar and, after the merger of Tehri State in Uttar Pradesh (India) in 1948, under the administration of the Government of Uttar Pradesh. Since 1951 no taxes at all have been paid by these villagers to Tibetans, as they have discontinued the practice of visiting Tibet for trade.

The area of Nilang-Jadhang is situated south of the main watershed in this region, along which the six border passes mentioned in the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement are situated. In April 1956 it was found that some armed Chinese personnel had intruded into this area without securing the permission of the Indian authorities. A protest was lodged by the Government of India on 2nd May 1956, but till now there has been no reply to this protest from the Chinese Government.

G. Bara Hoti

Bara Hoti, which the Chinese call Wu-je and accuse the Government of India of having occupied, is a small area (about 1½ square miles) in the State of Uttar Pradesh (India). The area lies between the main watershed of the Sutlej and the Alaknanda, which is the boundary in this sector, and the highest range of the Himalayas further south. Revenue records and other official documents of the 19th century establish that the watershed is the traditional frontier between India and Tibet in this region. It has been shown in Indian maps since 1850, when maps of this region based on surveys were first drawn. Even Chinese maps up to 1958 show the watershed as the frontier. Bara Hoti which is south of the watershed must, therefore, be regarded as within India. Till 1954 neither the Tibetans nor the Chinese seriously challenged this position, but since then Chinese personnel have persistently visited this area. There was a conference in Delhi to consider this question in April-May 1958. The Indian representatives proposed that pending a settlement of the dispute no armed personnel should be sent to the area. The Chinese Government agreed to this, but rejected the further proposal that neither side should send civilian personnel to the area. The Government of India, therefore, have continued to send civilian personnel to the area to exercise their long-established civil jurisdiction in this area. Bara Hoti has for centuries been under a patwari, and officials of Garhwal district have been touring it regularly. To describe the continuation of this administration as “aggression” is therefore, a distortion of facts. The accusation is more applicable to the Chinese Government, who sent not merely civilian officials but an armed party to the area in 1958 in contravention of the agreement at the Delhi conference. The Government of India have scrupulously adhered to the interim agreement not to send armed personnel and have not allowed even the revenue officials to carry arms for self-protection. Furthermore, the Chinese personnel stayed at Bara Hoti in 1958 for part of the winter also, contrary to normal practice.

India’s proposal at the conference that even civilian personnel should not be sent to the area shows the extent to which she was willing to go in the interest of a peaceful settlement. The only major argument that the Chinese side brought forward was that certain Tibetan agents called Sarjis came occasionally to this area to collect imposts. These men, however, were not regular officials of the Chinese Government but merely promoters of trade who came to declare Indo-Tibetan trade open and to inspect the cattle which was coming from or going to Tibet to see if it was diseased. They collected taxes only from Tibetans who had come down to trade and not from local villagers. And even against these visits of the Tibetan Sarjis, the Government of India had always been making repeated protests.

Indeed, it was revealed at the conference at Delhi in 1958 that the Chinese did not even know what area they meant by Wu-je. They therefore, pressed for a local enquiry as that would enable them to know what area they were claiming.

Two other places south-east of Bara Hoti also mentioned in Premier Chou En-lai’s letter as “invaded and occupied” by India are Sangcha or Sangcha Malla, and Lapthal. They are situated in Almora District in Uttar Pradesh, on the Indian side of the Balcha Dhura pass. This pass is located on the water-parting which is the traditional boundary in this area between India and Tibet. This is confirmed by Edwin Atkinson in his volume The Himalayan Districts of North-Western Provinces of India (1886). Sancha Malla is two miles south of the border and Lapthal six miles south. No Chinese map has ever shown these places within Tibet, and they have never before been claimed by either Tibet or China. It was only in October 1958, when the Indian check-posts retired as usual because of the onset of winter, that Chinese personnel entered Indian territory and established outposts at these two places. A protest of the Government of India on 10th December 1958 has elicited no reply.

H. Yasher, Khinzemane and Shatze

Premier Chou En-lai alleges that Indian troops intruded into Yasher and are still in occupation of Shatze and Khinzemane. The Government of India are aware of no such place or area as Yasher. Judging from its location on the small-scale maps recently published in Chinese newspapers, it is presumably a small area north-east of height 15721 in the Simla Convention Map. Here the boundary runs due north and the territory that is marked as Yasher is inside India. Indian personnel, in this area have been given strict orders not to cross the boundary and they have scrupulously observed these orders. If the village Lung is being referred to as Yasher, then it can be categorically stated that Indian troops have never occupied it.

Khinzemane is south of the Thangla range which forms the international boundary in this area. In fact Chinese troops intruded into Khinzemane and tried to overawe Indian personnel there. Khinzemane and the Drokasar pastures near it in the North East Frontier Agency of India have for years belonged to the Indian village of Lumpo. The villages of Le and Timang in Tibet have been allowed to use these pastures on payment for pasture rights to the Indian village of Lumpo. There is no record of the Tibetan authorities ever having exercised jurisdiction in the region south of the Thangla range. As for Shatze, it is south of Khinzemane and well within Indian territory.

I. Longju and Migyitun

Premier Chou En-lai says that Indian troops have not only overstepped the McMahon Line as indicated in the map attached to the notes exchanged between Britain and Tibet, but have also advanced across the boundary drawn on current Indian maps, and these maps are alleged in many places to cut even deeper into Chinese territory than the McMahon Line. It is alleged that Indian troops “invaded and occupied” Longju and launched armed attacks on Chinese frontier guards stationed at Migyitun, leaving no option to the Chinese frontier guards but to fire back in self-defence.

It has been stated in the text of the letter that the representation of the McMahon Line on Indian maps strictly conforms to the line shown in the Simla Convention Map. Indian troops have not crossed the boundary as drawn on current Indian maps. The Indo-Tibetan boundary drawn at the Simla Conference departed from the watershed in the Subansiri area in order to leave in Tibet the sacred lakes of Tso Karpo and Tsari Tsarpa, the village of Migyitun to which Tibetans attach importance as the starting point of the twelve-year pilgrimage, the route from Migyitun to the lakes, and another shorter pilgrimage route known as Tsari Nyingpa. The boundary alignment on current Indian maps carefully leaves these territories in Tibet. The international boundary here runs just south of the village of Migyitun. Longju which is entirely distinct from Migyitun lies 1½ miles further south of the border. It cannot be a part of Migyitun, which was a decaying village of twelve huts in 1913 and had further deteriorated to six huts and a monastic inn in 1935. The lands attached to Migyitun village were few and extended to a very short distance from the village.

Until Chinese troops recently trespassed into Longju no administrative control was ever exercised over this village by the Tibetan authorities. The detachment of Indian armed constabulary was instructed only to resist trespassers and to use force only in self-defence. It was the Chinese who first fired at the Indian forward picket and later overwhelmed by force the Indian outpost at Longju. This deliberate attack in superior numbers on an Indian outpost could have no justification at all. However, even though Longju is undoubtedly Indian territory, the Government of India are prepared to discuss with the Chinese Government the exact alignment of the McMahon Line in the Longju area. The Government of India have also offered not to send their personnel back to Longju provided that the Chinese Government also would withdraw their forces. The Chinese Government have not so far replied to this offer.
Note Verbale given to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 24 July 1959

The Officer-in-Charge of the Indian check-post at Longju near the international border in the Subansiri frontier division of NEFA is seriously ill. It is essential to send immediate medical relief to save his life. The location of the post is: GRID reference: MJ 7924 Longitude 93.32 East Latitude 23.37 North.

The Government of India propose to paradrop a doctor at the post. Depending on weather, the paradropping operation may take place on 24th afternoon or one of subsequent days. The aircraft has been instructed to take all care not to cross into the Chinese territory but the Chinese Government are being informed should there be any error of judgment. The Government of India would appreciate if immediate warning is issued to the neighbouring Chinese posts of this operation.
Note given to the Counsellor of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 7 September 1959

Recently, Indian aircraft have incessantly intruded into China's air space above the Tibet Region and the south-western part of Sinkiang, circling and carrying out reconnoitering activities within Chinese territory. The main facts are as follows:

1. From 10-45 to 11-00 hours on July 14, 1959, a double-engined Indian aircraft intruded into China's air space above Chekchar, in the eastern part of Tibet, and the area to its southwest.

2. At 10-00 hours on July 14, 1959, an Indian jet plane intruded into China's air space above the Amtogar area, in south-western part of Sinkiang.

3. From 12-36 to 12-44 hours on July 15, 1959, an Indian transport aircraft intruded into China’s air space above Tsona Dzong, in the eastern part of Tibet.

4. At 10-25 hours on July 22, 14-25 hours on July 29, and 10-50 hours on August 3, 1959, each time a double-engined Indian aircraft intruded into China’s air space above Sunggu, Sama and other places in the Tsayu (Rima) area.

5. From 10-16 to 11-10 hours on August 22, 1959, a double-engined Indian aircraft intruded into China’s air space above Migyitun, Checkchar, Raorang and other places, in the eastern part of Tibet.

6. From 11-20 to 11-30 hours, at 16-30 hours, and from 22-00 to 22-15 hours on August 26, 1959, each time a double-engined Indian aircraft intruded into China’s air space above the Migyitun area.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government against these serious incidents of Indian aircraft repeatedly violating China's territorial air and endangering peace in the border areas.
Note given by the Counsellor of India to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 14 September 1959

The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to transmit the following from the Government of India:

The Government of India have seen the memorandum handed over to the Indian Embassy in Peking on September 7th, 1959 by the Deputy Director of the Asian Division on the alleged violation of Chinese territorial air by Indian planes. The Government of India have had enquiries made into the six instances mentioned in the memorandum. They are satisfied that in not a single case did any Indian plane trespass into Chinese territory. They have already repudiated more than once the allegations about the violation of Chinese air space by Indian planes which were engaged in a supply dropping mission to the encircled outpost at Longju.

The Embassy of India takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given to the Embassy of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 16 September 1959

From 14-00 to 14-30 hours on August 30, 1959, a double-engined Indian aircraft intruded into China's air space above the Migyitun area in the southeastern part of Tibet; and at 12-57 hours on September 2, 1959, a double-engined Indian aircraft again intruded into China's air space above the Lake Pangong area in the western part of Tibet. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China lodges a second serious protest with the Indian Government against these serious provocations of Indian aircraft repeatedly violating China's territorial air and endangering peace in the border areas.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of India in China to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 29 September 1959

Careful investigations have been made regarding the alleged violation of Chinese air space mentioned in the Note presented by the Chinese Foreign Office to the First Secretary of the Indian Embassy on the 16th September 1959.

No Indian aircraft either civil or military was within the neighbourhood of the Chinese frontier on the dates mentioned in the Chinese memorandum. It may, however, be mentioned that an aircraft of Aeroflot on its Delhi-Tashkent service may have been passing over the Lake Pangong area at about 08-00 IST on the 2nd September 1959.

There is no question of Indian aircraft endangering peace in the border areas. Indian aircraft engaged on their normal duties in Indian territory have strict instructions not to cross the international frontier, and the Government of India are satisfied that the allegations in the Chinese Government's Note are unfounded.
Note given to the Counsellor of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 7 September 1959

According to the report of the Naval Command of the Chinese People's Liberation Army, on August 9, 1959, the Indian LST Magar on its way to Hongkong, instead of taking the international route south-east of Hongkong and east of the Tankan Islands, unlawfully intruded into China's territorial sea from the direction south-west of the Wansan Islands outside the mouth of the Pearl River in Kwangtung, China, and sailed through the waterway west of the Chiapeng and Tankan islands of China. When the Chinese coast guard units discovered the Indian LST Magar intruding into China's territorial sea, they twice signalled at 06-11 hours of that day, warning the LST to leave Chinese territorial sea. The Indian LST, however, did not pay any attention and forcibly passed through. On account of the following circumstances, the Chinese Government cannot deem this incident of violating China's sovereignty over its territorial sea by the Indian LST Magar as fortuitous:

1. In July 1958, when the Indian cruiser Mysore was on its way for a friendly visit to Shanghai, China, it also unlawfully intruded into China's territorial sea on July 14, sailing through the waterway west of the Chiapeng and Tankan Islands. At the time, the Chinese coast guard units signalled four times, yet the cruiser did not pay any heed. The Chinese Government out of goodwill regarded that incident as one of the nature of incursion by mistake, and therefore did not raise the matter with the Indian Government. Now, however, the Indian LST Magar again intruded into China's territorial sea instead of taking the international route always followed by ships of other countries, paying no heed to the warnings served by the Chinese coast guard units. This can hardly be explained away again on the excuse of incursion by mistake.

2. In recent months, Indian troops have repeatedly intruded into the south-eastern part of the Tibet Region of China and occupied Chinese territory at Tamaden and Shatze, and even carried out armed provocations against the Chinese troops in the Migyitun area. At the same time, Indian aircraft also continually intruded into China's territorial air above this part of the Region. Thus, the Chinese Government cannot but consider the intrusion into China's territorial sea by the Indian LST Magar as a part of India's planned military provocations against China from the ground, air and sea.

In view of the above, the Chinese Government cannot but take a serious view of the incident of intrusion into China's territorial sea by the Indian LST Magar. The Chinese Government asks the Indian Government to take effective measures to ensure against similar incidents in the future.
The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to transmit the following reply from the Government of India in reply to the memorandum handed over to Mr. M. K. Kannampilly, Counsellor of the Indian Embassy, Peking, on the 7th September 1959 by the Deputy Director of the Asian Division of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs:

The Government of India have seen the memorandum given to the Indian Embassy, Peking, by the Chinese Government on September 7th, 1959. They have investigated the complaint in the memorandum about the violation of Chinese territorial waters by the Indian Navy ship Magar. I.N.S. Magar was on its way to Japan to bring back some stores for the Government of India. It is not yet back home, but we have received a signal from Magar to say that the route which it took in approaching Hongkong passes west of Chipang and Tankan Islands. This route is an internationally recognised approach to the Hongkong port and is mentioned as such in the China Sea pilot, Volume I, page 454. There was no previous information that the Chinese Government had placed any restriction on the use of this channel. The Government of India have ascertained that on no occasion was the I.N.S. Magar challenged by the Chinese coast guard as alleged by the Chinese Government. On the 7th August, while the ship was passing 30 miles off the coast of Hainan island it sighted a ship showing no lights and challenged it. The latter answered back saying that it was a Chinese warship but did not disclose its name. I.N.S. Magar gave the international call sign and no further questions were asked. No other incident took place during the passage of the ship through the aforementioned channel or elsewhere. There was therefore no question of I.N.S. Magar forcibly passing through the channel. However the Government of India have issued instructions to I.N.S. Magar to avoid using this channel on the return voyage and to keep well clear of the Chinese territorial waters.

2. The Government of India are surprised to see the complaint about the alleged violation of Chinese territorial sea by I.N.S. Mysore. As the Chinese Government are aware, Mysore was on a goodwill mission to China and the Government of India are satisfied on enquiry that at no time did the ship receive any signal from the Chinese coast guard as stated in the memorandum of the Government of China. It is regrettable that the Chinese Government should have brought forward an allegation against Mysore which was on a goodwill visit to their country, more than a year after the conclusion of the visit. It is still more regrettable that the Chinese Government should have connected the use of the channel in good faith by I.N.S. Magar with a goodwill visit paid to China by I.N.S. Mysore thereby to build up a case of violation of Chinese sovereignty over its territorial waters by two successive Indian ships.

3. As the Government of India have stated in their previous notes, there is no truth in the Chinese allegation of intrusion into Chinese territory by Indian troops on the North East Frontier Agency border or of armed provocations against the Chinese troops in the Migyitun area. Similarly, our planes were on a supply-dropping mission to the Indian outpost at Longju which was encircled by Chinese forces. The planes had strict instructions to keep within Indian territory and the Government of India are assured that the instructions were observed.

4. The Government of India deplore the attempt in the Chinese memorandum to connect the innocent passage of an Indian ship off the coast of Hongkong with the use of Indian air space by Indian planes hundreds of miles away. The suggestion is unworthy and the Government of India cannot accept it.

The Embassy of India takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China, the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given to the Counsellor of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 20 October 1959

According to the report of the Naval Command of the Chinese People's Liberation Army I.N.S. Magar which intruded into China's territorial sea on 9th August 1959 again made intrusion into China's territorial sea on 16th September on its way from Hongkong to Singapore. At 11-35 and 15-10 hours on 16th September the ship made unlawful intrusions 5.5 nautical miles deep into China's territorial sea east of the Chiapeng and Tankan Islands at the point 22.8 minutes 22 seconds N, 114.24 minutes 30 seconds E and 21.48 minutes 37 seconds N, 114.18 minutes 9 seconds E. The Chinese coast guard unit issued light and flag signals 15 times warning the ship to leave Chinese territorial sea yet it did not pay any attention or heed.

The Chinese Government must point out once again that the intrusions of Chinese territorial sea by I.N.S. Magar on 9th August 1959 and by I.N.S. Mysore on 14th July 1958 in disregard of the repeated warnings of the Chinese coast guard unit were wholly indisputable facts. Yet the Government of India in its reply note dated 13th September 1959 denied these facts and even cited the so-called China Sea Pilot published by the British Admiralty before the liberation of China as the basis for asserting that the waterway west of the Chiapeng and Tankan Islands is "an internationally recognised approach to the Hongkong Port". The Chinese Government cannot but express its surprise and regret at such an allegation which ignores the facts that China has already freed itself from the imperialist bondage and become a completely independent Sovereign State and although the Government of India indicated in its note that it had issued instructions to I.N.S. Magar to avoid using this channel on the return voyage and to keep well clear of the Chinese territorial sea the ship again intruded into Chinese territorial sea at another place on 16th September. This can only show that the Government of India have not taken any effective measures to stop its naval ships from unfriendly acts of repeated violation of China's sovereignty over its territorial sea. In view of this the Chinese Government cannot but make a protest and once again asks the Government of India to guarantee against similar incidents.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 29 October 1959

The Government of India have seen the Chinese Government's memorandum of the 20th October, 1959, regarding the visit of I.N.S. Magar to Hongkong on her return voyage from Japan. They can only express their surprise and regret that the Chinese Government should have chosen to send yet another protest against the passage of an Indian ship which, as the Chinese Government had been informed beforehand, was engaged on an innocent supply carrying mission.

The Chinese Government are aware that the Hongkong harbour lies within two miles of the Chinese main land. It is not possible for any ship to approach Hongkong without coming within 12 miles from the Chinese main land or one of the Chinese islands lying off the coast of South China. In view of the objection raised by the Chinese Government in their earlier memorandum of 7th September, 1959, the Government of India had issued strict instruction to I.N.S. Magar to approach and leave Hongkong harbour not through the south-western approach but the western approach channel, although this meant the ship's following a somewhat circuitous course.

It is correct that in the first position mentioned in the Chinese note the ship was within 6.8 miles from the nearest Chinese island of Tankan Shan in the Lima Chuntao group, but as already stated, no ship could leave Hongkong harbour without coming within the 12 miles limit imposed by China. Further, the Government of India are advised that at the second position, the ship was beyond the 12 miles limit from the island of Erh Chou in the same island group. The Government of India are informed by the officer commanding that the ship was never challenged by light and flag signals as stated in the Chinese Government's memorandum.

The Government of India would like to point out that although the China Sea Pilot has been compiled by the British Admiralty, it is generally recognised and internationally used as an aid to navigation for the use of mariners. In this case since the ship was visiting the British Port of Hongkong, this publication had to be relied on for a correct channel of exit from the port. The Government of India have no knowledge of any official Chinese publication for the guidance of ships sailing in the neighbourhood of Chinese territorial waters; and they cannot, therefore, understand the reference to "imperialist bondage" in this context.

Previous intimation had been given to the Chinese Government that the I.N.S. Magar was carrying a consignment of stores to India from Japan. In the geographical situation of Hongkong, it was impossible for any ship to call at that port without coming within the 12 miles from the nearest Chinese islands off the coast. The Government of India are, therefore, surprised that the Chinese Government should have regarded the innocent passage of the ship as an unfriendly act and, in the circumstances stated above, there should be no question of violation of the Chinese sovereignty over its territorial waters.
On the morning of August 26, 1959 an Indian policeman, without giving prior notice to the Chinese Embassy and obtaining its permission, went on a bicycle into the courtyard of the residence of the Chinese Ambassador Mr. Pan Tzu-li, which is situated at No. 28 Prithviraj Road, New Delhi, and found Mr. Shediling, an Indian gardener employed by the Embassy, for a talk. On the morning of August 27, an Indian policeman and an officer again made an intrusion into the backyard of the Ambassador’s residence, and on the afternoon of the same day, another Indian plain-clothed policeman once again intruded on a bicycle into the backyard of the residence, talked with Mr. Shediling and left together with him.

The Embassy deems it necessary to point out to the Ministry of External Affairs of India that, for whatever purpose the Indian policemen might think it necessary to enter the Ambassador’s residence, the three successive arbitrary intrusions into the residence by them constitute a serious encroachment upon the privileges of the Chinese diplomatic envoy. Regarding this, the Embassy lodges a protest with the Ministry of External Affairs, and demands that the Government of India immediately adopt effective measures to guarantee against recurrence of any similar incidents in the future.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 19 September 1959

The Government of India have investigated the facts mentioned in the Chinese Embassy’s note of the 7th September, 1959 regarding the visit of Indian Policemen into the compound of the residence of the Chinese Ambassador at 28, Prithviraj Road.

The Police authorities of the nearby Police Station at Tuglak Road had received a complaint relating to the disappearance of a lady named Shrimati Sakuntala. It was alleged that Siri Ram (not Mr. Shediling as referred to in the Chinese Embassy’s note), was in some way implicated in the matter. A police official visited the servant’s quarters on the 26th afternoon with a view to contact Siri Ram to investigate the complaint. Since, he was not available, another official proceeded to the servants’ quarters to contact him on the following day. As a result, Siri Ram went to the Police Station to make a statement in this connection. No further visit was made by any police official to the Ambassador’s residence. The Police official had only proceeded to the servants’ quarters in pursuance of a complaint completely unrelated to the functioning of the Embassy or the nature of duties assigned to Siri Ram at the Ambassador’s residence.

The Government of India regret that the Police Officer had visited the servants’ quarters without seeking the permission of the Ambassador. This was, however, done through an erroneous impression that since the servants’ quarters were inhabited only by Indian nationals and the complaint was unrelated to Embassy’s work, there would be no objection to the visit. The Police Officials concerned regretted their unintentional lapse. Fresh instructions have been issued that no Police Official will enter the premises of the Embassy or the Ambassador’s residence without the formal permission of the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Counsellor of China in India, 24 September 1959

The Government of India have already had occasion to point out to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China that they cannot permit a diplomatic mission accredited to the Government of India to publish or circulate any material critical of the Government of India's policies or Ministers of the Government in India. The only exception which is made as a matter of courtesy is in respect of official statements of the Government of the country which is represented by the Mission. This was made clear to the Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy at New Delhi on the 3rd June 1959 with reference to the article entitled "Revolution in Tibet and Nehru's philosophy", which had appeared in the Peking Review of the 6th May 1959, and reprinted subsequently in China Today.

2. The attention of the Government of India has now been drawn to issues No. 39 and 41 of China Today published by the Embassy of the People's Republic of China at New Delhi. In these bulletins, the Embassy have not only reproduced the texts of speeches made by Premier Chou En-lai and the Foreign Minister Marshal Chen Yi and the resolution passed by the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress but have also reprinted articles which appeared in the People's Daily on the 12th and 16th September and so-called factual data on the Sino-Indian boundary question.

3. While the Government of India raise no objection to the publication in India of official statements of the Chinese Government, even though they are critical of the Government of India, they cannot but express their surprise and regret that despite the previous warning, the Embassy should again have published articles critical of the Indian Prime Minister and the Government of India's policy. The Indian Embassy in Peking has scrupulously avoided reprinting any articles from Indian newspapers of speeches of Indian political leaders other than Government spokesmen, which are critical of the People's Republic of China and her policies, in the official bulletins issued by the Embassy's information services.

4. The Government of India ask once again that the Embassy should refrain from publishing in its bulletin any material of whatever kind critical of India's policies unless they are official statements by the Government of China.
Memorandum given to the Counsellor of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 23 October 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China have received the verbal note handed over by Mr. Mehta, Deputy Secretary of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, to Counsellor Yeh Chen-Chang of the Chinese Embassy in India on 24th September, 1959 and have the honour to reply as follows:

The Chinese Government holds that the news bulletin issued by the Chinese Embassy in India has been consistently publicizing China’s foreign policy of peace and China’s achievements in various fields of construction, the purpose being to enhance the Government of India’s and people’s understanding of China and thereby promote the friendly relations between the two countries. The Chinese Government wishes to point out with satisfaction that throughout the years the news bulletin of the Chinese Embassy in India have played a very good role in this regard.

In accordance with the above-mentioned consistent policy followed in the issuance of the news bulletin, this publication of the Chinese Embassy in India carried some articles and material concerning the Tibet question and the Sino-Indian boundary question. The following articles and material: the article “The Revolution in Tibet and Nehru’s Philosophy” by the Editorial Department of Renmin Ribao 6th May 1959, the editorial “The truth about the Sino-Indian boundary question” of the Renmin Ribao 12th September, the editorial “Our Expectations” of the Renmin Ribao 16th September and the material on the Sino-Indian boundary question published by the Hsinhua News Agency 16th September referred to by the Government of India like other material concerning these two questions carried by the news bulletin of the Chinese Embassy correctly related the historical background and the current actual position of the two questions and were of help in enhancing the understanding of the truth of the situation and the stand and viewpoint of the Chinese Government and people on these questions by the Government of India and people. It was entirely proper and necessary for the bulletin to carry the above-mentioned articles and materials which were transmitted by Chinese State News Agency. The Chinese Government cannot see how the carrying of these articles and materials by the Embassy bulletin can in any way adversely affect Sino-Indian friendship and thus be subjected to censure.

The Chinese Government notes with regret that contrary to the news bulletins issued by the Chinese Embassy in India the news bulletins issued by many Indian Embassies in Foreign countries failed to pay full attention to the maintenance of Sino-Indian friendship and strictly abide by the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries. The news bulletins of many Indian Embassies abroad widely carried the several so-called statements of the Dalai Lama. The news bulletins of the Indian Embassy in Indonesia, Afghanistan and the U.A.R. further carried ill-intentioned commentaries of some Indian newspapers on the so-called statements of the Dalai Lama. The news bulletin of the Indian Embassy in Afghanistan even carried an article on the Tibet question written by British Labour Party leader Bevan. What is particularly surprising and regrettable is that the news bulletins of the Indian Embassy in Burma entirely took, on the Tibet question, an attitude of hostility towards China and interfering in China's internal affairs. The following are some of the contents and headings carried in the bulletins of that Embassy:

Number 68 (20th April) carrying the so-called “statement of the Dalai Lama” under the heading “Dalai Lama sought sanctuary in India voluntarily and not under duress, China dishonoured 17 Point Agreement on Tibetan Autonomy.”

Number 71 (23rd April) carrying the so-called “second statement of the Dalai Lama” under the heading “Chinese news agency circulates pure bunk.”

Number 72 (24th April) carrying a so-called Indian political observer's commentary on the statement of Panchen; under the heading “Panchen Lama only echoes his master’s voice. Peking throws India-China friendship in jeopardy.”

The Chinese Embassies in the above countries returned the news bulletins issued by the above-mentioned Indian Embassies abroad which carried the so-called “statements of the Dalai Lama” and ill-intentioned commentaries and pointed out in the covering letter that such action was far from consistent with the Five Principles and Sino-Indian friendship. Chinese Ambassador to India Pan Tzu-Li in his written statement to Foreign Secretary Dutt of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs on 16th May 1959 also pointed out that it was very difficult to consider this line of action of the Government of India as in conformity with well-known international practice. The Government of India have failed to give a satisfactory reply, but on the contrary raised untoward censure against the news bulletin of the Chinese Embassy in India. The Chinese Government cannot but express its deep regret.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note presented by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China on the 23rd October, 1959, to the Embassy of India in Peking. The Government of India have to state with regret that they cannot accept the Chinese Government's note as a satisfactory reply to the Indian note of the 24th September, 1959.

2. As the Government of India have stated in their earlier note, according to international usage and diplomatic courtesy, a foreign mission is not entitled to publish in its bulletins any statement or comment which is critical of the official policies and declarations of the government to which the mission is accredited. The only exception which some governments permit is the inclusion in the official bulletin statements of government leaders and official press notes issued by the government of the country which the mission represents. This usage is expected to be observed by all missions but in case a particular mission offends against this usage and violates this courtesy, the receiving government is entitled to draw the attention of the offending mission to this lapse and ask it to desist from the circulation of the objectionable material. It is for the Government of India to decide whether a foreign mission accredited to them has overstepped the limits of diplomatic courtesy and international usage in a matter of this kind and they must state that they cannot accept the judgment of the Government of the People's Republic of China. The Government of India must, therefore, ask once more that the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in Delhi and other Chinese posts in India, should desist from publishing in their official bulletins any material other than official statements of the Chinese Government, which is critical of the official statements, policy and actions of the Government of India.

3. As the Chinese Government must be aware, the Embassy of India in Peking and other Indian posts in China scrupulously observe the correct international usage in this regard. They have never included in their bulletins any comments or quotations from the press or other unofficial sources which are critical of the Chinese Government.

4. The Government of India cannot accept the complaint of the Chinese Government that they have transgressed the limit of accepted international usage or diplomatic courtesy in the bulletins published by Indian missions in some other countries. In any case, it is not for the Government of the People's Republic of China to decide whether Indian official news bulletins in a third country have exceeded the limits of propriety. The Government of India are not aware of any complaint against any Indian mission from the governments of other countries. The Government of India are not, therefore, called upon to explain to the Chinese Government contents of Indian news bulletins published by Indian missions in other countries. For the same reason they did not wish to refer to the attempts made by several Chinese diplomatic missions to create prejudice against India in some foreign countries by wide and organised circulation of Hsinhua news releases and other comments widely critical of India. They would, however, like to state, with reference to the inclusion of the Dalai Lama's statement in the news bulletins of some Indian missions abroad, that the Government of China had made baseless allegations in regard to the responsibility of the Indian Government for the events in Tibet. The Chinese Government had alleged, without any basis whatsoever, that the Dalai Lama was under duress in India and that Indian officials were in some unexplained way responsible for Dalai Lama's first statement on Indian soil. The publication of the Dalai Lama's statement enabled opinion in other countries to decide whether it was a spontaneous statement or a statement made under duress or instigation. The Government of India, of course, did not and do not take any responsibility for any of the statements of the Dalai Lama.

5. The Government of India would also like to point out that they allow a far greater latitude to the Chinese missions in India in regard to the publication of their bulletins and the discharge of their functions generally than is permitted to the Indian representatives in China. For example, only recently the Foreign Bureau in Yatung objected to, and returned to the Indian Trade Agent, a bulletin distributed by the Indian Trade Agency. It merely contained reproduction of the statements of the Prime Minister of India; it scrupulously avoided inclusion of unofficial comments in India critical of or in disagreement with Chinese policy or actions. The Chinese authorities' action in objecting to the circulation of the bulletin can be contrasted with the right which they claim to circulate in India, without any restriction, unofficial and miscellaneous statements critical of the Government of India.

6. The Government of India wish to make it clear that they fully reserve the right to object to the circulation of any material within India, which is critical of the Government of India, by Chinese missions, either direct or indirect, and to take appropriate action to enforce compliance with what they consider to be correct international usage and diplomatic courtesy in this regard.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ambassador of India to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 11 July 1959

Reports have been received from the Indian Consulate-General and Trade Agencies in the Tibet Region of China that since the recent disturbances there various difficulties have been placed in the functioning of the posts and in the legitimate activities of Indian traders, pilgrims and nationals. Two of these difficulties are of a nature which require urgent attention.

The first relates to the status of Indian nationals in Tibet. As is well-known, Indian nationals particularly Lamas and Muslim traders from Ladakh have been resident in the Tibet region from before the conclusion of the 1954 Sino-Tibetan Agreement. Preceding that Agreement, travel between Ladakh and Tibet was free. Travellers between the two regions were not then required to possess travel papers or identity certificates. Indian Lamas and traders (now resident in Tibet) thus arrived in the Tibet region without travel papers. Although they have been earning their livelihood in Tibet or been attached to monasteries for years, they have traditionally been treated as foreigners. It is known that between four to six hundred lamas who travelled as pilgrims before and after the 1954 Agreement were studying in Tibetan monasteries. Until the recent disturbances local regulations of the region did not require them to register or hold special identity certificates. It now seems that the local authorities in Tibet have raised questions about the national status of these Indian residents in the Tibet region. In view of the circumstances in which these persons arrived and lived in the Tibet region, the Government of India request the People's Republic of China either to maintain the position which existed prior to the present regulations, namely, to allow these Indian nationals to be in the Tibet region without travel papers (passports), or if all foreign nationals are now compulsorily required to possess passports to inform the Government of India definitely on the point so that arrangements could be made to issue passports to Indian nationals resident in Tibet region who hold no passports. If passports are now required, the Government of India would trust that no impediments would be placed in Indian residents obtaining visas or registering with their Consulate-General.

2. The second difficulty relates to the reconstruction of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse. While permission has been accorded to the Government of India for the reconstruction of the Trade Agency at Gyantse, there appears to be a lack of helpful co-operation on the part of the local authorities and the work of construction is being impeded. In the last fortnight on two occasions the construction site has been used for firing practice, much to the alarm of the labourers.

In addition, the local authorities have not been helpful in providing the transport required for the construction. In 1957-58 they were requested to accord permission to the use of two trucks and a jeep by the engineering staff to facilitate construction of the building. In according permission to the use of the Agency jeep by the engineering staff they desired that the two trucks required for the carriage of stores might either be hired from private owners or from the local Transport Department. Now the local Foreign Bureau is not agreeable to the exclusive use of the jeep by the engineering staff, and as for the trucks, they have stated that none is available owing to other pressing needs. As trucks are no longer available on hire, the Government of India request that permission be given for the plying of a jeep with trailer under the authority of the Trade Agent, but with the principal purpose of helping the engineering staff in the construction work. As for trucks it is requested either the Transport Department should meet the requirement or the Government of India permitted to import their own trucks from India for the purpose of construction.

The Government of India would appreciate to receive the helpful co-operation of the authorities concerned for the speedy construction of the Trade Agency building at Gyantse.
Memorandum given by the Ambassador of India to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 14 August 1959

The Government of India have received further reports of difficulties that are being encountered by its representatives and nationals in the Tibet Region of China. The following is a summary of these reports:

The reconstruction of Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse and protective works remain at standstill. Meanwhile, Chinese authorities are insisting on demolition of spurs and have constructed a spur from the opposite bank diverting the main current towards the site on which the Trade Agency stands. In the absence of any protection, the embankment will be further scoured.

Because of restriction imposed on movements and the absence of guarantees for safety of the official bags, the courier service remains suspended. Bags and mail are accumulating in every post.

Recently in Gyantse the local bureau suggested that non-Tibetan class IV servants who had come on traders' certificates should go back to India and return with duly visaed passports. The Indian Trade Agent has proposed but without reply so far, the issue of passports to them locally. If this staff has to go back to India there will be unnecessary dislocation caused by delay in their return to Gyantse.

The Consul-General in Lhasa reports that members of the staff are shadowed even when they go for normal shopping and other purposes.

No reply has yet been received to the representation regarding Kashmiri Moslems. Meanwhile, it is reported that one Kashmiri Moslem who refused to attend a meeting on the 6th August was arrested and two to three hundred of his compatriots went in protest to the Foreign Bureau. About fifty to sixty Kashmiri Moslems who later endeavoured to come to the Indian Consulate were prevented by the Chinese guards at the point of weapons.

It is reported that five cobbler who are Indian nationals are held up in Gyantse and two cobbler and two Sikkimese drivers in Yatung are similarly awaiting permission to return to India.

Trade is declining and restrictions on movement of Indian traders continue.

The Government of India have to point out with regret that instead of improvements as a result of representations the restrictions continue and in fact have increased. The Government of India would urge once more that the same facilities be granted to its posts and nationals in the Tibet Regions as are enjoyed by the Chinese trade posts and nationals in India.
Memorandum given to the Embassy of India by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 21 August 1959

In 1953 the Embassy of India proposed to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs that the staff members of the Embassy be allowed to assume the duty of temporary diplomatic courier and requested the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to grant them permission to hold diplomatic passports because as temporary couriers they frequently came across difficulties on their way from China to India. Taking into account the friendly relations between China and India and the difficulties on the Indian side, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs agreed as an exceptional case that the staff members of the Embassy may carry diplomatic passports when assuming the duty of diplomatic courier.

But later, the Embassy extended the personnel assuming temporary courier duty to the staff members of the Consulate General in Shanghai and recently the staff members of the Consulate General of India in Lhasa also held diplomatic passports on courier duty. This is not in line with the spirit of the original agreement between the two parties. In order to give considerations to the convenience on the Indian side, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs agrees not to change for the time being the practice of the staff members of Consulate General acting as temporary couriers. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs, however, put forward two requests as follows:

1. There must be a fixed number of staff members who assume the duty of temporary courier. And with a view to facilitating the arrangements for the visas of the courier the Embassy is requested to give the Ministry of Foreign Affairs a copy of the name list of those staff members who often assume the duty of temporary courier, including name, date of birth and passport number.

2. When the staff members of the Consulate General of India in Lhasa assume the courier duty, it is not necessary for them to hold diplomatic passports, because there the border between China and India is closely adjoined. With service passport and the certificate for temporary couriers endorsed by the Foreign Affairs Bureau, the bags will be exempted from examination.
Memorandum given by the Ambassador of India to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 25 August 1959

The Government of India wish to draw the attention of the Government of the People’s Republic of China to certain new regulations issued in the Tibet Region of China which have caused great hardship to Indian traders by altering the customary practice in the trade between the Tibet Region and India.

For a long time past and until this year commercial transactions between Indian traders and Tibetans inside the Tibet Region used to be settled in Indian or Tibetan currency. The pattern of trade was such that the value of exports from India generally exceeded the value of imports from Tibet, and the balance of payments in favour of Indian traders was settled by return to India of trade accumulations either in

(a) Indian currency, or
(b) Tibetan coins, or
(c) Chinese silver dollars.

It may be mentioned that in recent years Chinese authorities had been giving permits for the export of Chinese silver dollars, and Indian traders used to bring their accumulated reserves with them into India. The Government of India also permitted the import of the silver dollars into India. The above was the most common method of adjusting the favourable balance of trade which India had with the Tibet Region.

In July this year, an official notification dated 15th July, 1959 was issued in the Tibet Region declaring Chinese paper currency as legal tender and standard money in the Tibet Region. Following this notification, executive measures were taken by the local Chinese authorities to devalue the Tibetan currency in terms of the Chinese currency. This has adversely affected the value of the Indian currency.

Further, Indian traders were directed to exchange accumulations of Tibetan coins and currency held by them with Chinese currency at the new rate fixed for the latter. Reports from Yatung show that the local authorities have fixed the value of Tibetan coins in terms of Chinese paper currency in such a manner that the present value of one rupee is 25 Sangs whereas formerly the rate used to vary between 6 to 7 Sangs for a rupee. As an immediate result of this measure the value of Tibetan currency already acquired by Indian traders in the course of normal trading operations has depreciated by 75 per cent in terms of rupees. It is reported that the Chinese authorities at Yatung called all Indians on the 10th of August and directed that they should exchange all Tibetan coins and currency in their possession by the 11th of August at the exchange rate of one Chinese silver dollar to 75 Sangs. At this meeting, the Indian traders expressed their willingness to abide by the new regulations in future, but requested that they should be allowed to return to India their accumulated stock of Tibetan Sangs under previous terms. Their request was turned down by the local Chinese authorities. The Indian traders have represented that they should be permitted to take back into India the accumulated Tibetan coins, or exchange them into Indian rupees at the previous rate. This request seems to be fair because the traders supplied goods to Tibet at the previous value of Tibetan Sangs and not at the new reduced value.

A report from Phari says that on the 13th of August Chinese authorities confiscated Tibetan currency valued at Rs. 7,000/- (at the new rate of exchange) from Indian traders. The Indian traders were informed that these notes were forged in Kalimpong. There is absolutely no truth in this allegation. Moreover, no receipts were given for the currency which was confiscated. The Indian traders in Phari have registered their protest with the local authorities.

The Government of India wish to recall that the two Agreements signed between the Republic of India and the People's Republic of China in 1954 provide for the maintenance and development of border trade between the Tibet Region of China and India. It is true that the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 does not include any specific provisions as regards the currency in which trade is to be transacted or the manner in which the balance of payments between the two countries is to be adjusted. At the same time, this Agreement provides for the continuance of the customary trade between India and the Tibet Region of China and specifically provides for certain facilities to that end. Article VII of the Trade Agreement between the Republic of India and the People's Republic of China signed on the 14th October 1954 as amended by the exchange of letters in May 1957 provides as follows:

Para I—All commercial and non-commercial payments between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India may be effected in Indian rupees.

Para IV—Payments for Border Trade between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India will be settled according to the customary practice.

While the amended Article VII on the Trade Agreement lays down a detailed procedure for the purpose of facilitating payments between the two countries on account of commercial and non-commercial transactions (Para I) no specific procedure was laid down for the adjustment of the transactions in respect of border trade between the two countries. These latter were to be settled according to customary practice (Para IV). As stated above, the customary practice was for the balance, which was generally in favour of the Indian traders, to be adjusted in Chinese silver dollars, Tibetan coins or Indian rupees, Indian rupees being a medium of payment in Tibet. Also the customary practice was to permit the Indian traders to take back to India accumulated reserves of Chinese silver dollars. Since the Indian traders had no previous intimation of the new orders relating to currency in the Tibet Region, the Government of India would request that the Indian traders be permitted to take with them the present accumulated reserves of Tibetan coins or Chinese silver dollars.

If the Chinese authorities are not willing to recognise the customary practice, the question can be considered later of how payments for Indo-Tibetan trade should be settled in future. Pending discussion between the two Governments on these and other related matters, it is requested that the customary practice should be allowed to continue and that arbitrary measures, such as, for example, demands for the exchange of the currencies already held by the Indian traders should not be enforced.

There is also one other matter to which the Government of India would like to draw the attention of the Government of the People's Republic of China. A report has been received from the Indian Trade Agent at Gartok that Indian traders at Taklakot have represented to him that the Chinese authorities have imposed a new tax at the rate of Rs. 8 per maund on wool purchased by them and are insisting on payment being made in Chinese silver dollars which are not available in the market. On account of this exchange difficulty, wool purchased so far by the Indian traders is detained at Taklakot. The imposition of the new tax may raise similar difficulties of payment in other Trade Marts also.

The Government of India would request that payment for the new tax in Indian currency may be accepted in terms of Article VII of the Indo-Chinese Trade Agreement of 1954 which has been extended till the end of this year. Alternately, Chinese silver dollars may be made available to the Indian traders to enable them to carry on their customary trade guaranteed in the Agreements of 1954.
Note given by the Embassy of India to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 29 August 1959

The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Foreign Office of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to state as follows:

The Indian Trade Agent, Gartok, had to cross the border into Tibet through Lipulek Pass though he had already gone to Niti Pass with a visa from the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi. The change entailed a 21-days continuous journey and great expenditure. In insisting that the Trade Agent should enter Tibet through Lipulek, the Foreign Office of the People's Republic of China has said that transport and other facilities required by him were stationed at Taklakot.

Owing to the change in the point of entry the Trade Agent reached Taklakot several weeks after his schedule. But he was not able to proceed further as no mechanical or animal transport was provided for him. The latest information is that the Secretary of the local Foreign Bureau has told the Trade Agent that motor traffic is still unavailable and that the Trade Agent would be informed when it is available. The Secretary of the local Foreign Bureau also told the Trade Agent that he should proceed direct to Gargunsa without halting on the way. This would mean a continuous journey of about 250 miles over rough roads. It would also mean that though the Indian Trade Agent would pass through Gartok, he will not be permitted to visit or halt there.

Gartok is the headquarters of the Indian Trade Agent according to the 1954 Agreement. As such the restriction now sought to be imposed on the Trade Agents visiting and halting at Gartok is understandable and is not in keeping with the agreement between the two countries.

The Trade Agent is already behind schedule for reasons explained earlier. It is therefore urged that the local authorities may be clearly instructed to give all necessary facilities to him to travel and complete his tour on customary pattern visiting and halting at Gartok and other usual places to enable him to assist Indian traders.

The Embassy of India avails itself of the opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China and has the honour to acknowledge receipt of the note of the Government of India transmitted on 25th July 1959, the aide-memoire handed over on 14th August 1959 and the aide-memoire handed over to Chang Wen-Cheng, Director of the First Asian Department of the Ministry on 11th July 1959 by H. E. Ambassador G. Parthasarathi and to take note of the interview between H.E. the Indian Ambassador and Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs Chi Peng-Fei on 3rd August 1959. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China has also received the unofficial notes handed over by Mr. J. S. Mehta, Deputy Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India to Counsellor Yeh Cheng-Chang of the Chinese Embassy in India on 8th and 24th July, 1959. Except for individual specific cases to be checked and confirmed, necessary investigations have been conducted by the Chinese Government into the main question raised by the Government of India in the above-mentioned notes, aide-memoires and interviews regarding the various so-called difficulties encountered by the Indian Consular and Trade Organs and Indian nationals and pilgrims in Tibet in the past few months. According to the results of investigations conducted by the Chinese Government many things related by the Government of India are discordant with the facts, and its many demands are in contravention of the Sino-Indian Agreement on Trade and Intercourse between the Tibet region of China and India and, therefore, its various complaints against the Chinese local authorities in Tibet are unjustified. The Ministry hereby has the honour to give the principal facts of the questions raised by the Government of India and the views of the Chinese Government as follows.

1. Regarding the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse:

   (i) The Chinese local authorities in Tibet have always shown concern for and given assistance in the reconstruction of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse. After the destruction of the building of the Trade Agency by flood, the Tibetan local authorities rendered active assistance in regard to the Agency's request for renting land. For a period of time, however, the Agency delayed the choice of the land it would rent. Later the agency decided to rent the land at its original site and the local authorities agreed to this. Although the Agency has not up to now signed a new lease with the owner of the land, the local authorities gave approval for the Agency to proceed with the reconstruction work before the completion of the lease procedures.

   (ii) On the question of construction of protective works as asked for by the Agency, the Tibet local authorities have agreed in principle to their construction on condition that they do not affect present and future local public projects. Yet the protective works plan made by the Agency directly endangers the security of the bridge and highway nearby. For this reason the Tibet local authorities have more than once indicated their wish—the latest on 2nd June 1959 by the Office of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Gyantse—that the Agency could make suitable modifications in the plan. The Agency, however, not only did not heed this wish, but peremptorily started construction work without obtaining the concurrence of the local authorities. After their repeated advice for halting the work proved to be of no avail, the local authorities could not but come out to stop it and ask the Agency itself to pull down the parts already constructed.

(iii) On the question of transport facilities asked for by the Agency the Tibet local authorities have all along done their best to render assistance. The local authorities agreed that Agency could hire the truck it needed from private owners or local transportation organs. It should not be difficult to understand that it is practically unavoidable in the present concrete conditions in Tibet, if the Agency should for the present encounter certain difficulties in hiring trucks from private owners or transportation organs owing to other pressing local needs. The Chinese Government is, however, convinced that with the lapse of time, the situation will improve gradually. As to the Agency's request to import its own trucks, the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs already informed the Indian Embassy in 1957 that no foreigner-owned truck is allowed to carry on long-distance transportation over highways in Tibet.

(iv) It is found that a Chinese driver employed by the Agency was indeed detained by the local authorities. The reason was that the driver failed to pass the local driving tests and obtain a driving licence. Yet the Agency, ignoring the local traffic regulations and the repeated advice of the local authorities, insisted on the driver driving at will without licence. Under these circumstances the local authorities could not but detain the driver. But after admitting his error, he has been released. The Agency's truck was not withheld, however. It is not difficult to see from these simple facts that it is not the local authorities that created difficulties for the Agency, but the Agency that failed to respect the regulations laid down by the local authorities.

(v) It is satisfied that the units of the Chinese People's Liberation Army stationing in Gyantse have never carried out firing practice and shooting on the site of the Agency. They have conducted their regular practice on their own camp ground. The Chinese Government cannot but express its surprise and regret at the unreasonable intervention by the Government of India in raising objection to this and without any ground describing it as aimed at intimidating the workers hired by the Agency.

(vi) Regarding the present temporary accommodation of the Agency, the local authorities know nothing about the inability of the Agency to renew the lease. The Agency recently made a request to the local authorities for renting a certain number of houses in addition to the more than ten premises already rented. Owing to the present housing shortage in Gyantse, the local authorities are unable to give it any further assistance.
2. Regarding the repair and maintenance of the building of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung:

It is satisfied that the Yatung local authorities have never interfered with the repair and maintenance of the building of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung. The Agency, however, on more than one occasion when it built and reconstructed its premises, failed to report to the local authorities and obtain their approval as required by the lease contract. This has been brought to the Agency's attention by the local authorities. Recently the Agency formally informed the local authorities of its intention of expanding the library and constructing a table-tennis room, kitchen, bathroom, storage room and other buildings, and obtained approval for this. Obviously, the allegation of the Government of India that the Agency has encountered difficulties in the repair and maintenance of its building is not in conformity with the facts. It must be pointed out that the Agency has failed to respect the regulations laid down by the local authorities, not only in the construction and reconstruction of buildings, but also in other respects. For instance, according to the regulations laid down by the local authorities, the primary school attached to the Agency should confine its enrolment to children of the Indian staff members of the Agency and other Indian nationals, and should not enrol Chinese pupils. Yet the Agency has, in violation of the regulations, persisted in enrolling Chinese pupils. Again, the doctor specially serving the Agency has at the same time been taking outside patients. This is also not permitted by the local authorities.

3. Regarding the so-called "restrictions on movement":

The personnel of the Indian organs in Tibet have all along enjoyed normal freedom of movement in Tibet which has never been restricted by the Tibetan local authorities, nor has the Tibetan Military Control Commission up to now issued any order to this effect. But, as the Government of India are aware, Tibet is now in a period of military control, and sometimes the local authorities have to give necessary advice to the personnel of the Indian official organs in regard to their movement out of considerations for their safety. Out of these considerations, the local authorities suggest that the Indian Trade Agent in Yatung had better not go in person to Rinchengang to meet the Indian Trade Agent in Gyantse, but send a car to fetch him, because Rinchengang was quite far from Yatung city, and it was already past 17:00 hours. As regards the request of a junior official of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung to leave China, it was also for the sake of his safety that the local authorities suggested that he would not leave for the time being. As for the Chinese Government's request that the Indian Trade Agent in Gartok enter China by another route, the Chinese Government has explained more than once that this was merely to enable the local authorities to give him the protection and the facilities of a mobile wireless set, as requested by the Government of India. For years on end the local authorities have, under great material difficulties, provided the Indian Trade Agent in Gartok with such protection and communication facilities; this is yet another proof that Tibet local authorities take the attitude of rendering every possible assistance to the Indian organs in Tibet. It can be seen from the above cases that the Tibet local authorities, far from imposing any restrictions or difficulties on the normal movement of the personnel of the Indian organs in Tibet, have shown friendly concern for them. Yet this goodwill of the local authorities has been distorted by the Government of India as deliberate obstruction. The Chinese Government cannot but express its regret at this.

4. Regarding the question of Indian couriers and the carriage of mail:

(i) As stated above, at the present time there are actually transport difficulties in the Tibet region. In these circumstances, it should not be difficult to understand if the special diplomatic courier sent by the Government of India to Lhasa had to wait for a short time in Yatung. Nevertheless, the Tibet local authorities still tried their best to arrange means of transport for him so that he may safely arrive in Lhasa.

(ii) Regarding the carriage of the mail of the Indian organs in Tibet, the Government of India has up to now maintained the system of stationing Chinese Tibetan messengers along the Yatung-Gyantse road. This system contravenes the Sino-Indian Agreement and is also not in keeping with international usage. As early as in 1955, the Chinese Government asked the Government of India to abolish these messengers. Although the Government of India have indicated more than once their willingness, in accordance with the provisions of the Agreement, to despatch Indian couriers as soon as possible to replace this system, yet for four years the Government of India have delayed abolishing the Chinese Tibetan messengers and despatching Indian couriers under various untenable pretexts. Recently, the Tibet local authorities have suggested to the Indian Consulate-General more than once that if the Government of India had difficulties in the carriage of its mail bags, it could send them through the local post office. Yet this co-operative attitude of the local authorities was apparently not approved by the Government of India. The above facts cannot but make one suspect that the Government of India would rather maintain this illegal system of Chinese Tibetan messengers indefinitely and are seeking all sorts of pretexts for it. The Chinese Government holds that there is no justification at all for the Government of India to continue to maintain this system of Chinese Tibetan messengers, and hereby demands that the Government of India abolish it in the shortest time. If the Government of India, after abolishing the Chinese Tibetan messengers, should despatch normal Indian diplomatic couriers, the Chinese Government would be willing to provide transport facilities so far as possible; if the Government of India are not yet prepared for the time being to despatch couriers, they can send their mail-bags through the local post office. The refusal of the Government of India to trust the local postal service in Tibet and their arbitrary allegation that it is undependable are utterly groundless. The Chinese Government categorically rejects this insulting allegation.

5. It is surprising as well that the Government of India should have expressed dissatisfaction with the speed with which telegrams are transmitted by the Gyantse Telegraph Office. There is no need to point out that the Gyantse Telegraph Office does not discriminate against any one who sends telegrams.
6. Regarding Indian traders and pilgrims:

In accordance with the provisions of the Sino-Indian Agreement, the Tibet local authorities have always given due protection and facilities to law-abiding Indian traders and pilgrims in Tibet. It is, however, regrettable that not all Indian traders and pilgrims are law-abiding and observe the provisions of the Sino-Indian Agreement. To take some of the cases that the Government of India cited in their Notes. What was carried by the pilgrim to Kailas was not ordinary “medicines for himself” as alleged by the Government of India, but more than 10 bottles of strong poisons including arsenic, mercury and sulphur. According to the regulations of the Chinese Government, these contrabands should be confiscated. As to the two cobbler, they came to Shigatse, which was not a market for trade, without the permission of the local authorities. This was in the first place in contravention of the Sino-Indian Agreement. At the same time, the trader certificates held by the two men were overdue. The Chinese Government is by no means willing to see again and again such unpleasant happenings; it therefore hopes that the Government of India will urge the Indian traders and pilgrims in and proceeding to Tibet not to be engaged in unlawful activities.

At the same time, the Chinese Government wishes to point out that according to reports received by the Chinese local authorities in Tibet in recent months, Chinese traders going from Tibet to India for normal trade have been repeatedly subjected to unwarranted cross questioning, examination and harassment by the personnel of the Indian check-posts, and even been compelled to report to them the military situation in Tibet of China. The Indian officials have further spread among them all sorts of rumours, slandering Chinese domestic measures in the Tibet region and sowing discord in the relations between the Han and Tibetan peoples in China. The Chinese Government would like to draw the attention of the Government of India to such serious acts in violation of the Sino-Indian Agreement and the Five Principles.

7. Regarding the nationality of a part of the Tibetan Muslims:

There have been many contacts on this question between Director Yang Kung-Shu of the Tibet Bureau of Foreign Affairs and Mr. Chhibber, Consul General of India in Lhasa. The forefathers of these people migrated to and settled down in Tibet several hundred years ago and they have become part of the Tibetan people in China. There is ample evidence to show that the Tibetan local authorities at all times have treated them as Chinese Tibetans. They have never complained about their status and treatment as Chinese or applied for withdrawal from Chinese nationality. After the rebellion in Tibet was put down, however, the Government of India suddenly claimed that they are Indian nationals. What is particularly surprising, the Consulate General of India in Lhasa, without the concurrence of the Tibet local authorities, distributed on its own application forms for Indian nationality among those Muslims. This cannot but be regarded as a most unfriendly act. The Government of India claimed that they are Indian nationals, yet up to now it is unable to produce any adequate evidence or reasons. Although the Sino-Indian Agreement has been signed five years, yet they do not hold any related certificates as required of Indian nationals by the provisions of the Agreement. In spite of all this should the Government of India produce sufficient evidence and reasons for each case to prove that individual persons among them are indeed Indian nationals, the Chinese Government has no intention to refuse to examine their case individually.

8. Regarding Indian Lamas.

The Tibet local authorities have never regarded Indian lamas as Chinese. But it must be pointed out that, whether they came to Tibet before or after the conclusion of the Sino-Indian Agreement, these Indian Lamas still do not hold today, five years since the signing of the Agreement, the necessary certificates in accordance with the provisions of the Agreement. The same is true even of individual Indian personnel of the Consulate-General of India in Lhasa, who, though coming to Tibet after the conclusion of the Sino-Indian Agreement, also do not hold certificates. All these cannot but be regarded as in violation of the Agreement.

9. Regarding the family of Mrs. Shahabir and living Buddha Tromo Geshe:

(i) Both the Tibet Bureau of Foreign Affairs and the Chinese Embassy in India have told the Indian side that Mrs. Shahabir and her daughter and daughter-in-law are all Chinese. They were arrested on account of breaking the law, and are still under trial. This is a matter completely within the scope of China's sovereignty, into which the Government of India have no right to enquire. Yet the Government of India, disregarding the explanation of the situation given by the Chinese Government, once again asked the Chinese Government to set them free. The Chinese Government cannot but sternly reject this act of interfering in China's internal affairs by India.

(ii) In the course of putting down the rebellion in Tibet, the Chinese military authorities in the Tibet region arrested a number of foreigners who colluded with Tibetan rebels and participated in the rebellion. Living Buddha Tromo Geshe is one of them. The military authorities in Tibet will try and deal with these foreigners according to law. As these people are not ordinary criminals, the military authorities in Tibet have ruled that they are not to be visited by anybody.

10. Registration of arms:

According to orders of the Military Control Commission in Tibet, all arms held by foreigners in Tibet should be registered. In registering the arms of the personnel of Indian organs in Tibet, the Military Control Commission in Tibet discovered that not only Indian officials but some ordinary Indian staff members too have arms. This is against what the Chinese Government have previously explicitly informed the Government of India, that is, only Indian officials (excluding other staff members) of the Indian organs in Tibet may carry arms of self-defence. Nevertheless, the Military Control Commission has only taken into custody but not confiscated the arms of the ordinary Indian staff members, and has promised to return them when they leave China.

Those arms belonging to the Indian officials were returned immediately after registration on the spot. The sporting rifle left by Mr. Chhibber in Yatung was taken into custody because the Military Control Commission did not know then that it was his. After Mr. Chhibber raised the matter with the Tibetan Bureau of Foreign Affairs, the sporting rifle has been returned. As to the two revolvers, it was found that one belongs to a staff member of the Indian Trade Agency at Yatung, and was returned to him when he left China; the other belongs to an engineer attached to the Trade Agency at Yatung, and is temporarily kept in the custody of the Military Control Commission. Apart from these, the Military Control Commission does not know of any revolver left by Mr. Chhibber in Yatung.

Since the question of arms is being discussed, the Chinese Government would like to take this opportunity to draw the attention of the Government of India to the fact that in January this year an Indian Vice Consul in Lhasa asked in private somebody to sell a revolver and cartridges for him in Lhasa. Such an act is obviously, in violation of international usage and an abuse of Consular privileges.

11. Regarding so-called “anti-Indian propaganda”:

The Government of India assert in their notes that the official organs in the Tibetan region were consistently carrying out propaganda deliberately intended to create hostile feelings against India and Indian organs in Tibet. This is totally inconsistent with the fact. Whether now or in the past, no organ of the Chinese Government has ever conducted any “anti-Indian propaganda”. It is not difficult for any one with the slightest sense of justice to see from the public utterances of the officials of both sides in the past several months what a difference there is between the attitude taken by the two sides towards Sino-Indian relations. The utterances of not a few Indian responsible officials on the putting down of the rebellion in Tibet, a question within the scope of China’s internal affairs, in varying degrees interfered in the internal affairs of China. As to the publication in the Lhasa Daily (there is no Lhasa Daily in Lhasa; it should be Tibet Daily) of an article alleged to be hostile towards India referred to by Mr. J. S. Mehta of the Ministry of External Affairs of India on 24th July, the Government of India should be aware that according to the Constitution of the People’s Republic of China, the Chinese people enjoy full freedom of speech and have the right to express different kinds of views. The author of the article published in the Tibet Daily expressed his personal attitude towards the large quantity of words and deeds against China, interfering in China’s internal affairs and damaging Sino-Indian friendship, which had appeared in India in the past several months, or merely related to past facts, which can in no way be described as so-called propaganda deliberately hostile towards India. The Government of India, instead of checking in the least the large quantities of words and deeds against China, interfering in China’s internal affairs and damaging Sino-Indian friendship which appeared in India, have lodged an unwarranted “strong protest” in an attempt to interfere with the freedom of speech of the Chinese people. The Chinese Government rejects this unjustifiable protest.

From the facts set forth in the above paragraphs it is not difficult to draw the following conclusion:
The Chinese Government has been consistently implementing the 1954 Agreement on Trade and Intercourse between the Tibet region of China and India in accordance with the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence and in the spirit of Sino-Indian friendship. The Government of India's complaint that the privileges of the Indian organs in Tibet as laid down in the Agreement are not guaranteed is groundless. On the contrary, many actions and demands of the Indian organs in Tibet have violated or gone beyond the Sino-Indian Agreement and the relevant regulations of the Chinese Government. In individual cases, they even encroached on China's sovereign rights. Although some questions have been repeatedly pointed out by the Tibet local authorities and the hope for correction expressed, yet they have not won the sufficient attention of the Government of India. The Tibetan local authorities have always taken a friendly and co-operative attitude towards the Indian organs in Tibet. In spite of the great material difficulties in the Tibet region, and in the present period of military control in particular, the local authorities have still given the Indian organs in Tibet every possible assistance, facilities and solicitude within the scope of the provisions of the Agreement, and have given full protection and facilities of all law-abiding Indian traders and pilgrims. Such facilities as the Chinese Tibetan messenger system for long maintained by the Government of India and the mobile wireless sets and safety protection provided to the Indian Trade Agent in Gartok each year are unique even in international practice. Furthermore, the Indian organs in Tibet have all along maintained their radio stations which have not been recognised by the Chinese Government. In a word, the Tibet local authorities have done their best to satisfy all those demands made by the Government of India in the past which are proper and reasonable; while with regard to others which they are in no position or for the time being unable to meet owing to actual difficulties, they have always tried to find some substitute solution or acquainted the Indian side with the situation to gain its understanding. It is, however, regrettable that the Indian organs in Tibet often failed to adopt the same friendly and co-operative attitude. They do not pay enough respect to some of the advices and regulations of the local authorities, and sometime make excessive demands and even launched intolerable criticisms of a fault-finding and insulting nature against the Chinese telegraph and post offices. Being a consular organ, the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa has the obligation to urge the Indian traders and pilgrims to strictly abide by Chinese laws and regulations. But actual facts show that it often sides with and shields those Indian nationals who are not law-abiding, and speaks for them or supports them in making unreasonable demands to the Tibet local authorities.

True, it is unpleasant to refer to the above-mentioned questions. But since the Government of India have repeatedly made groundless complaints against China in disregard of the facts, the Chinese Government deems it necessary to give a detailed account of the facts and make clear its stand so as to distinguish between right and wrong and locate the responsibility. The Government of India, moreover, used most unfriendly language in their notes, saying that the continued functioning of the Trade Agencies in China and India on a reciprocal basis would depend on the Chinese Government.
answer. This is tantamount to placing the Chinese Government under coercion. The Chinese Government cannot but express its special regret at this.

In conclusion, the Chinese Government wishes to reiterate that it has always scrupulously abided by the Five Principles and the Sino-Indian Agreement, and that the Government of India have no reason to suspect the Chinese Government as taking an unfriendly and un-cooperative attitude towards Indian organs in Tibet. But the Chinese Government must point out at the same time that should the Indian organs in Tibet fail to strictly abide by the Five Principles and the Sino-Indian Agreement, to respect the laws and regulations of the Chinese local authorities in the Tibet region, and to cherish the desire of co-operating with the Tibet local authorities, this would certainly create difficulties for the implementation of the Sino-Indian Agreement and the enhancement of friendly relations between China and India. Through the present note, the Chinese Government hopes that the Government of India will understand the actual situation more correctly, thus contributing to better friendly co-operation between the two sides in the future.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Counsellor of India to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 17 September 1959

The Ambassador of India had left a Memorandum with the Director of the First Asian Division of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the 25th August 1959, regarding currency and exchange difficulties experienced by Indian traders in Tibet. Since then the Government of India have received further representations from Indian traders in Yatung, Gyantse and Phari. Under the existing position all Indian traders in the Tibet region stand to lose 75 per cent of their accumulated stock of Tibetan currency as a result of currency devaluation. At Gyantse and Phari the Chinese authorities issued their drafts to Indian traders in lieu of the Tibetan currency which worked out to 25 per cent of the face value of the Tibetan currency notes in terms of Chinese paper currency or Indian currency. The Indian traders were instructed that these drafts were to be converted between the 21st and 25th August.

2. Two Indian firms at Yatung who approached the Chinese authorities with Chinese paper currency received against sale of goods for issue of Indian rupee drafts were told that they should give an undertaking to import goods of equivalent value. It may be pointed out that such a demand that the traders should bring back goods of equivalent value before being granted bank drafts is contrary to the trading practice. It is also possible that owing to the increasing difficulties experienced, a number of Indian traders may be thinking of winding up their business and returning to India. It will cause serious difficulties therefore if such people are to be asked to give an undertaking to import goods before they are given bank draft facilities for the transfer of their assets. It is requested that the Chinese Government allow the repatriation of money representing sale proceeds of goods without any conditions.

3. Indian traders are much exercised about recovery of substantial amounts of trade debts from Tibetans as they are not permitted to visit even recognised marts at Phari and Gyantse, much less Shigatse and Lhasa. All these factors have made Indo-Tibetan trade increasingly difficult and are likely to render nugatory important clauses of the 1954 Agreement.

4. While the Government of India do not deny the sovereign right of the People's Republic of China to fix its currency value at any figure it chooses, they would like to bring to the notice of the Chinese Government once again the serious hardship imposed on Indian traders by the fixation of the exchange value of Tibetan currency at 25 per cent of its previous value. It is once again requested that the Government of China may give instructions to the local authorities in Tibet to accept exchange of the accumulated Tibetan currency held by Indian traders previous to the devaluation at the old rate and permit them to export Tibetan coins and Chinese silver dollars to India.
The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of People's Republic of China and has the honour to invite attention to the letter from the Director of Foreign Bureau in Lhasa addressed to the Consul General of India on 17th July 1959 and paragraphs 7 and 8 of the Chinese Government's note of the 11th September 1959 regarding the status of Indians resident in the Tibet region of China.

2. The Government of India cannot but express their surprise and regret at the unhelpful attitude adopted by the Chinese Government. They wish to clarify the position in the following paragraphs and trust that the Chinese Government will after reconsideration permit persons of Indian origin entitled to Indian citizenship to contact the Consulate General of India and return to India, should they so wish.

3. The right to Indian citizenship derives its sanction strictly from the provisions of the Indian Constitution and Indian Citizenship Act of 1955. The Government of India have neither the power nor the desire to claim as Indian nationals any person who does not qualify under the Indian laws as an Indian national.

4. According to Article V of the Indian Constitution, any person, who himself or either of whose parents was born in the territory of India, is ipso facto an Indian citizen without being required to apply for registration as an Indian national. Secondly, under Article VIII, those who or either of whose parents or any of whose grandparents were born in undivided India and are resident abroad are qualified for Indian nationality and such persons upon registration with any diplomatic or consular representatives of India in a foreign country are fully entitled to Indian citizenship. No time limit is prescribed within which persons must register themselves with an Indian Mission abroad. Persons of Indian origin falling in this category are eligible for registration as Indian citizens and cannot legally be excluded from the privileges of Indian nationality, unless such a person has expressly and voluntarily acquired a foreign nationality and thus in effect renounced his claim to Indian citizenship.

5. The persons of Indian origin residing in Tibet at the time of disturbances in March 1959 are qualified for Indian nationality either under Article V or VIII of the Indian Constitution and fall under one of the following categories:

   (i) Registered Indian nationals.—Persons holding Indian registration certificates, traders' certificates or other documents clearly establishing their nationality.

   According to our information, apart from the traders and Indian nationals in Yatung, Phari and Gyantse, twenty-eight such persons were registered with the Consulate General in Lhasa or hold such Indian registration certificates and are therefore, fully entitled to Indian protection.

   (ii) Ladakhi Lamas.—As is well-known, the Ladakhi Buddhists, who are followers of the Mahayana sect of the Buddhist faith have traditionally gone from Ladakh to the monasteries in Tibet for theological studies. No travel documents were prescribed for such movements before 1954, and even thereafter the responsibility for issuing the appropriate papers (pilgrim permits) rested with the authorities of the Tibet region of China. A substantial number of these Lamas was studying in the monasteries in Tibet long before the 1954 Agreement. These Ladakhi Lamas were born in Jammu & Kashmir State of India and are therefore ipso facto Indian nationals under Article V of the Indian Constitution. It was not necessary for them to register themselves with the Indian Consulate General in Lhasa in token of their Indian citizenship. As stated in the previous Note of the Government of India, no regulation had previously been prescribed requiring such persons, resident in Tibet prior to 1954, to register with the local authorities or to obtain any special kind of documents even if they were not actually travelling across the border.

(iii) Muslims of Kashmir origin.—According to the information available to the Government of India, one hundred twenty-nine families of Kashmiri Muslims involving about six hundred persons are residing in Lhasa-Shigatse area of the Tibet region of China. The names of these families will be found in the enclosure to this Note. Some of the persons who belong to these families are already registered with the Consulate General and fall under category (i) above. Others, prima facie, are potential Indian citizens with a right to register as such under Article VIII of the Indian Constitution. The Government of India agree that the Kashmiri Muslims who have been resident in Tibet since the 17th century and severed connections with Kashmir would not qualify for registration under Article VIII of the Constitution. But persons whose permanent domicile remained in the State of Jammu & Kashmir and who visited India from time to time and whose parents or one of whose grandparents were born in undivided India, are potential citizens of India. It is this group of persons, who have stated repeatedly to the Chinese authorities that they were Indian citizens. They have apparently submitted applications in writing for registration as Indian citizens and are entitled to claim the benefits of Indian nationality in accordance with the provisions laid down under the Constitution and the Citizenship Act.

The Chinese Government's contention as stated in the letter of the 17th July 1959 from the Foreign Bureau in Lhasa is that the Kashmiri Muslims were subject to the jurisdiction of Tibetan courts, that the selection of their leader was confirmed by the Dalai Lama, that they recognised the 5th Dalai Lama and further that they sometimes fought alongside Tibetan forces. Even if these assertions were accepted, they would not by themselves constitute conclusive evidence regarding their Chinese/Tibetan nationality. Under International Law, foreigners are subject to the jurisdiction of local courts and even the affairs of the foreigners may be supervised by the local authorities. It appears that those of the Kashmiri Muslims who rendered military service did so under compulsion and that the majority did not voluntarily accept such an obligation. The fact that some may have paid homage to the 5th Dalai Lama may be no more than a courtesy to the spiritual and temporal leader of the Tibet region of China. The Indian Government have no desire to claim as Indian citizens persons who had accepted adherence to the Dalai Lamas and have since severed their connections with India. But according to the Government of India's information, most of these persons do not fall in this category. The fact that some of the Kashmiri Muslims travelled on Chinese certificates does not necessarily mean that thereby they repudiated their claim to Indian nationality. It is possible that they accepted Tibetan or Chinese travel papers on some occasions for convenience. It may be mentioned that instances have occurred during the last few years in which Chinese check-posts harassed and placed difficulties in the way of Indian traders and nationals carrying Indian traders' and registration certificates when on their way from Tibet to India. In August 1956, the certificate of nationality of one Ghulam Rasul was actually retained by the Chinese check-post at Yatung. It may also be mentioned that notwithstanding any papers, which these Muslims may have carried for entry into India, they almost invariably travelled from India to Mecca on Haj as Indian nationals in special Indian pilgrim-ships and not as foreigners through normal shipping services.

On the other hand, historical evidence indicates that Kashmiri Muslims have throughout maintained their separate identity. They were exempted from poll-tax and compulsory levies or work which was prescribed for persons of Tibetan origin. Though they were tried by Tibetan courts, any fine levied on the Kashmiri Muslims were returned to the community in recognition of their status as foreign nationals. During the 1912 Sino-Tibetan conflict, the Kashmiri Muslims were actually provided with white flags to indicate that they were foreigners and neutral in the then prevailing conflict. That these people wished to maintain their connections with India is also evident from the fact that nearly one hundred boys of this community are studying in institutions in India.

The conclusion is obvious that this community of Muslims from Jammu & Kashmir State of India did not assimilate themselves with the Tibetan population and considered themselves as a distinct community of foreigners although they had resided in Central Tibet for a long time. Being primarily interested in their trade and somewhat indifferent to the political changes in Tibet, they continued to live in their traditional manner without taking the trouble of registering themselves as Indian citizens not suspecting at any time that there would be danger of their connection with their home-land being arbitrarily severed.

The Government of India have read with surprise the statement that Shri Chibber, the former Indian Consul General in Lhasa, instigated the Kashmiri Muslims to apply for Indian registration. The Government of India repudiate such a baseless charge against a responsible officer. The facts are that these Kashmiri Muslims are now anxious to exercise the right to Indian citizenship and have been trying persistently to make their claim accepted by the Chinese authorities, and that Consul General in pursuance of his duty, had made representations on their behalf to the Chinese authorities. In fact on 14th July, the persons sent a joint written representation to the Consul General of India drawing attention to their hardship and the pressure that was being put on them by Chinese local authorities to renounce their claim to Indian citizenship. The Chinese armed sentries at the gate of the Consulate General building have steadfastly barred entry of these persons into the premises of the Consulate General. On 14th July and 6th August, large groups were turned away by force. Indeed, the local authorities have apparently threatened and intimidated these persons on account of their persistent demand to be treated distinct from the Tibetan nationals Registration forms, which were voluntarily filled in by these persons, were actually confiscated by the Chinese local authorities. It is even alleged that important documents containing proof of their firm connections with India have been confiscated, by the local authorities and their leader intimidated for voicing the demand of his compatriots. No facilities have been given to the Consul General to meet members of the Indian community held in custody by Chinese authorities. Persons who have been anxious to seek the assistance of the Indian Consulate General have been denied any facility whatsoever.

The Government of India wish to re-affirm that it is not the intention of the Government of India to confer citizenship on persons who do not strictly qualify for this privilege or who have surrendered their claim of Indian citizenship. Such persons who have voluntarily accepted Chinese nationality and renounced their claim to Indian citizenship should by all means be treated as Chinese nationals. At the same time, the Government of People's Republic of China should give the right to these persons who consider themselves as Indian citizens and have all the attributes of Indian citizenship to contact the Consulate General of India, and if they so wish, to return to India. The denial of access to the Consul General can only lead to the suspicion that legitimate and voluntary claims of bona fide potential Indian citizens of Indian origin are being forcibly denied. In particular, the Government of India cannot understand how persons who had already been registered as Indian nationals before the recent disturbances broke out, or how Ladakhi Lamas who could have been in the monasteries only for limited periods should be prevented from exercising their right of protection by the Indian Consulate and for repatriation to their home-land.

While it is not possible to give names of all persons entitled to Indian citizenship as stated earlier, list of Heads of families of Muslims of Indian origin is appended to this Note. Similarly, a general enquiry has been addressed to the Foreign Bureau in Lhasa in respect of the Lamas of Ladakhi origin in Tibet. The names of some of the senior Lamas are given in a second list attached to this Note. A third list contains the names of Indian nationals who, according to information received, are apparently held in custody in the Tibet region of China. The only fair course in the spirit of friendly understanding between the two countries would be to scrutinise the claims of all such persons of Indian origin and permit them to exercise their option as Indian or Chinese nationals. The Government of India would request that this be done.

Even if some of these persons of Indian origin are found eligible both for Indian and Chinese nationality, in accordance with international usage, they should be given option of exercising their choice freely. As is well-known, a large number of persons of Chinese origin have been resident for decades, if not generations, in the various countries of South-East Asia without having actually accepted the nationality of the countries in which they reside. In the Agreement which has been concluded by the People's Republic of China with Republic of Indonesia, to take only one example, persons of Chinese origin have been given option to choose between Chinese nationality or the nationality of Indonesia. The Government of India seek no greater concession in respect of persons of Indian origin in the Tibet region of China than the application to them of a principle which the People's Republic of China have accepted in respect of persons of Chinese origin resident outside China.

The fate of Kashmiri Muslims, Ladakhi Lamas and other Indians in Tibet region of China aroused great concern in Parliament and among the people of India. A representation from the Kashmiri Muslims resident in India who have their relatives in Tibet has been received by the Prime Minister of India urging arrangements for the repatriation of their compatriots to their home-land. The Government of India can see no reason or advantage in compelling these persons to remain within Tibet against their own wish. In the spirit of friendship, the two Governments can readily settle the matter by both agreeing not to claim any person who does not qualify for citizenship under its respective laws and giving the option to all those who by domicile or birth are entitled to both nationalities to choose one of them.

The Government of India trust that in the light of the foregoing the Chinese Government will see their way to review the attitude so far adopted by them and in this confidence they take this opportunity of renewing to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Annexure I to the Note of the Indian Government,
24 September 1959

List of Heads of Families of Muslims of Indian Origin residing at Lhasa and other places of Tibet for trade purpose

1. Haji Karimullah Ishamo
2. Abdul Ghani
3. Fazlullah Masle
4. Abdul Ghani Chisti
5. Haji Tayab Jo
6. Abdul Qadar Naeq
7. Ghulam Rasool Ganaee
8. Mohd. Iqbal
9. Faizullah Sheikh
10. Mohd. Ishaq
11. Abdur Rahman
12. Ataullah
14. Ghulam Nabi
15. Khaja Sanaullah
16. Ghulam Rasool Sheik
17. Ahmedullah Ganaee
18. Habibullah Ganaee
19. Sanaullah
20. Mohd. Shaﬁ Malik
21. Ahmedullah Ganaee
22. Abdur Rahman Daot
23. Haji Abdul Qadar Masle
24. Habib Ullah Nangro
25. Mohd. Yahya Shakoli
26. Haji Abdul Qadar Ganaee
27. Karim Ullah
28. Haji Abdul Ghani Nan’cro
29. Mohd. Ishaq
30. Mohd. Hussain
31. Habib Ullah Khalo
32. Faiz Ullah
33. Abdullah Khalo
34. Haji Ghulam Hussain Ganaee
35. Habib Ullah
36. Haji Hussain Sheikh
37. Faiz Ullah Buzurg
38. Haji Habib Ullah Ganaee
39. Zaha Uddin Khazi
40. Ghulam Hussain Khazi
41. Vali Ullah
42. Abdullah Sheikh
43. Haji Habib Ullah Shamo
44. Haji Faiz Ullah Sheik
45. Vali Ullah
46. Abdullah Vani
47. Ahmed Ullah Vani
48. Rahmatullah Vani
49. Abdur Rahman
50. Mohd. Moosa Shakuli
51. Barkat Ullah Shakuli
52. Vahab Joe Zarif
53. Mohd. Ali Shakuli
54. Haji Abdul Qadir
55. Haji Ghulam Rasool Khalo
56. Ibrahim Ganaee
57. Mohd. Suleman Khazi
58. Nizam Uddin
59. Ibrahim Sheikh
60. Haji Noor Uddin
61. Ahmad Ullah Gona
62. Haji Abdur Rahman Gona
63. Karim Ullah Malik
64. Amir Uddin
65. Ghulam Nabi
66. Abdul Qadir Gona
67. Abdul Qadir
68. Faiz Ullah Khazi
69. Faiz Ullah
70. Ghulam Moheuddin
71. Mohd. Moosa
72. Mohd. Ishaq
73. Abdul Qadir Noon
74. Ghulam Mohd.
75. Ahmad Ullah Khazi
76. Mohd Ramzan Khalo
77. Abdur Rahman Sheikh
78. Abdullah Sheikh
79. Abdul Aziz
80. Akhwand Habib Ullah Naeq
81. Abdullah
82. Ghulam Qadir
83. Haji Ghulam Mohd.
84. Habib Ullah Vani
85. Mohd. Yahya
86. Habib Ullah Malik
87. Fakhr Uddin Syed
88. Haji Mohd. Ramzan
89. Abdullah
90. Akhwand Abdul Aziz
91. Noor Uddin Syed
92. Abdul Aziz Daot
93. Ghulam Nabi Khazi
94. Ahmad Ullah
95. Abdul Qadir
96. Haji Abdul Halim Loa
97. Ahmad Ullah
98. Abdul Ghani
99. Akhwand Ahmad Ullah
100. Vahab Jola
101. Qa Qa Rasool
102. Jamal Uddin
103. Abdul Ghaffoor
104. Faiz Ullah Loon
105. Mohd. Yusuf
106. Haji Abdul Qadir
107. Ibrahim Sheikh No. 2
108. Abdur Rahman
109. Karim Ullah
110. Ghulam Mohd.
111. Ghulam Hussain
112. Habib Ullah Daot
113. Haji Ghulam Mohheuddin
114. Azam Jola
115. Nizam Uddin
116. Haji Mohd. Ramzan
117. Abdul Vahed
118. Akhwand Faiz Ullah
119. Mohd. Jalil Gona
120. Mohd. Bashir Gona
121. Abdur Razzak
122. Habib Ullah
123. Akhwand Mohd. Ramzan
124. Ibrahim Malik
125. Zaka Ullah
126. Haji Mohd. Ramzan
127. Mohd. Ali
128. Abdul Qadir
129. Hameed Ullah
Annexure II to the Note of the Indian Government, 24 September 1959

LIST OF IMPORTANT LADAKHI LAMAS

1. Staksang Rimpoche—Head Lama of Hinus Gompa.
2. Gangon Rimpoche—Head Lama of Gangon Gompa.
3. Togdon Rimpoche, Kushok of Fiang Gompa, Ladakh.
4. Sharpakhampo Rimpoche—Head Lama of Theksey Gompa.
LIST OF INDIAN NATIONALS HELD IN CUSTODY IN THE TIBET REGION OF CHINA

1. Mrs. Shahabir Diyali, her daughter and daughter-in-law.
2. Trome Geshe Rimpoche of Sikkim from Dankar Monastery at Lhasa.

Ladakhi Lamas:
4. Lozang Thubstan Stokpa Stongkhorpa.
5. Zopa Bazgopa.
7. Gochhkapa Chungwa Tingmosgangpa.
8. Sonam Lingshetpa.
10. Lozang Chamba Tritspaa.
11. Lozang Giatso Zimgag Pishupa.
13. Todon Tabpa Tingmosgang.
15. Lonpo Fiangpa.
16. Stanzin Pishupa.
17. Ishey Dawa.
18. Lozang Rigdol.

Ladakhi Trader:
19. Foogyal.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 24 September 1959

An Indian pilgrim, Swami Brahmachari Atma Chaitanya while proceeding on a pilgrimage to Kailash and Manosarowar was held up and subjected to harassment by the Chinese authorities after reaching Taklakot on the 6th May, 1959.

He was harshly interrogated by four Chinese soldiers, his baggage searched, and some of his belongings confiscated. These included some homoeopathic medicines which he was accused of bringing with him with the intention of poisoning the people of Tibet. After being detained for five days he was allowed to proceed to Kailash and Mansarowar, after giving an assurance that he would return by the same route and not via the Niti valley as he had intended. On his return to Taklakot Swami Chaitanya was once again thoroughly searched by the Chinese officials, and was given a document to sign in which he was to confess that he had brought poison with him. This he naturally refused to do. The medicines were not given back to him and he was allowed to return home.

It may be mentioned that the incident occurred before the warning communicated by the Foreign Bureau to our Consul General on 20th August 1959 cautioning Indians not to proceed on pilgrimage this year in view of military operations being launched against rebels by the Chinese forces in Western Tibet.

The Government of India cannot but express its surprise at this incident, and hereby lodges a protest at the harassment of this Indian national who was proceeding on a bonafide pilgrimage in accordance with the provisions of the Sino-Indian Agreement. In order to avoid such incidents it is requested that the officials of the People's Republic of China posted along the pilgrim routes may kindly be appropriately instructed so that Indian nationals are not subjected to such treatment in the future.
The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note dated the 11th September, 1959 which was handed over by the Director of the Asian Department at Peking to the Ambassador of India in Peking. The Government of India notice with surprise and regret that the note of the Chinese Government does not appear to reveal a helpful attitude towards removing the difficulties of the Indian posts in the Tibet region of China and the disabilities of Indian nationals and traders. The Government of India cannot accept the contention that the requests contained in their earlier notes are in any way contrary to the letter and spirit of the 1954 Agreement. Indeed, these notes sought to ensure, in the spirit of friendly understanding which was embodied in this Agreement, that the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa and the Indian Trade Agencies in other parts of Tibet could function with dignity and effectiveness. The Government of India did not ask for their staff and other nationals any more rights and facilities than were being enjoyed by the Chinese posts and Chinese nationals generally in India. They were only anxious to continue the traditional pattern of trade and the exchange of pilgrims across the Sino-Indian border according to the Agreement of 1954.

2. The Government of India can only presume that the Chinese Government are still subject to some misunderstanding. In order therefore to clarify their position they intend to offer detailed comments on all the points made in the Chinese Government's Note. For the sake of convenience the present note deals with the points relating to the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse. Two other notes in regard to the difficulties of the other Indian official representations in the Tibet region of China and with the difficulties of Indian traders and pilgrims are being delivered separately.

3. The Government of India note the contention of the Chinese Government that the local authorities have been rendering due assistance to the Trade Agency in Gyantse. Facts, however, will speak for themselves. The following paragraphs describe the difficulties to which the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse have been subject and the generally unco-operative attitude of the local authorities in the Tibet region of China.

Reconstruction of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse

4. In 1943, the then Government of India concluded a lease valid upto 1.4.1971 with the owner of the property and the representative of the Tibetan Government for the housing of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse. Para 4 of the notes exchanged on the occasion of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 specifically provided that the Government of India might continue to lease the land within the Agency compound walls which was then being occupied by the Indian Agency. Subsequent to the floods of 1954 and the consequent loss of the buildings of the Trade Agency, the Indian Consul General in Lhasa confirmed to the Chinese Foreign Bureau in November, 1956 the Government of India's desire in the spirit of the Agreement to retain the land stipulated under the existing lease. In February 1957, he contacted the Foreign Bureau to convey the information that the Government of India wished to commence reconstruction of the Agency buildings on the old site during the following summers. He was then informed that necessary details might be discussed between the corresponding officials in Gyantse. In pursuance of this in March 1957 the site was visited by Mr. Kou of the sub-office of the Foreign Bureau at Gyantse, but later the Indian Trade Agent was informed that the area covered by the lease was too big for the requirements of the Trade Agency. The Trade Agent informed Mr. Kou that not only was the land necessary for the Agency's requirements, but the right to retain it was recognised in the notes exchanged. In fact nearly one-third of the original property had already been scoured away by the current of the river along the embankment. On this Mr. Kou merely promised to refer the matter to his Government. Considerable time elapsed before any final reply was received. In the meanwhile according to the Government of India's information the owner of the property was privately advised by the local authorities not to lease the entire area to the Indian Agency.

5. It was only in March 1958, when preparations for the reconstruction of the Agency were ready, that the Government of India were informed by the authorities in the Tibet region of China that they could not accept the validity of the lease signed in 1943 on the ground that the lease was signed during the British days and could not be recognised by the People's Republic of China. Not only is such a contention contrary to the International Law and State practice regarding the rights of a successor State but this objection was all the more extraordinary in view of the provisions in the 1954 Agreement and the subsequent notes and of the fact that no objection to the continuance of the Agency on this property had been raised any time earlier. But for the severe floods of 1954 the Government of India would have continued to retain effective control and possession of the leased property. The Government of India were fully convinced of the validity of the existing lease, but with a view to expediting the reconstruction of the Agency building and alleviating the difficulties of the Trade Agency staff, they agreed to execute a new lease-deed for the same property. It was only on the 19th May 1958 that the Chinese authorities conveyed their agreement in principle to the commencement of the reconstruction of the Agency on the understanding that a new lease-deed would be executed. The deed has not yet been executed nor has any substantial progress been made in the reconstruction of the Agency buildings. The Government of India have to say with regret that this is due mainly to the lack of co-operation from the local authorities of the Tibet region of China.

The protective Works

6. The history of the negotiations relating to the protective works has been briefly explained in the Government of India's Aide Memoire of 23rd March 1958. The necessity of such works was realised soon after the visit of the Indian engineer deputed to prepare plans for the reconstruction of the Agency building in 1957. The plans were formulated with the sole purpose of preventing further erosion of the property and affording protection to the new buildings to be constructed on the site. The Government of India readily agreed to the condition stipulated by the local authorities in May 1958 that management of the protective works should vest in the Chinese authorities after they had been erected by the Government of India. The Government of India also agreed to transfer these works which would cost several lakhs, free of charge, to the Chinese Government when the local authorities decided to extend the embankment along the river for the general protection of the Gyantse township. Indeed, had the local authorities been prepared to undertake the latter works immediately the Government of India would not be under the necessity of building any protective works themselves for the protection of the Agency property. In that event the designing and construction of the protective works would have been the sole responsibility of the local authorities.

7. In October 1958 the Indian Consul General at Lhasa was informed by the local Foreign Bureau that the protective works designed by the Indian engineer might damage the highway, the bridge and some lands further down-stream of the river. With a view to satisfying the Chinese authorities that no such danger was involved, a senior Indian engineer was specially sent to Gyantse in November 1958 to explain the designs on the spot to the corresponding local officials. But no permission for the commencement of the building was forthcoming. Nor was any modification of the plan suggested by the local officials but the Indian engineer was informed that higher authorities would have to be consulted before a final clearance could be granted. To avoid further delay revised plans were prepared by the Indian side. Although these would be more expensive, they would do away with the necessity of acquiring additional land along the river embankment beyond the limits of the leased property. These plans were submitted in Gyantse on 8th January, 1959, and to the Chinese Foreign Bureau in Lhasa by the Consul General of India on 29th March 1959. This was soon after the Foreign Secretary to the Government of India had presented an Aide Memoire to the Chinese Ambassador in New Delhi requesting that urgent facilities be provided for the reconstruction of the Trade Agency buildings during the 1959 season. On enquiry from the Director, Mr. Yang Kung Su, the Indian Consul General was informed at Lhasa on 27th April 1959 that if the plans did not affect in any way the bridge and the highway, the reconstruction of the Trade Agency might be commenced. On 22nd May, this was reiterated by the Director. The Director's statement as reported by the Indian Consul General is quoted below:

“So the position standing at present is that we have always agreed to this principle and we still agree to the principle that you may carry on construction of buildings before signing the lease-deed between your side and Phunkangs (the owner) and you can proceed with the construction of the embankment within your area as you said it will not damage the bridge and the highway”.

8. With a view to confirming this on the spot, the matter was taken up by the Indian Trade Agents in Gyantse itself. On 2nd June, Mr. Moo Yu Ting, Chief of Gyantse Foreign Bureau, reiterated that there was no objection to the commencement of the protective works provided they were within the agency boundary and would not affect the bridge and the highway and that the Government of India would agree to break the works at a future time, when the Chinese Government would undertake their own river taming works. No reservation regarding the actual plans or construction was stipulated on any of these occasions. It was in this situation—after permission had been given by the local authorities and Indian engineers had satisfied themselves that the proposed protective works within the boundary of the leased property were in no way likely to endanger the local highway and bridge further down-stream, that some preliminary stone-work for protecting the property was undertaken. The monsoon was approaching and the Indian engineer was anxious to ensure that during the rainy season there should not be any further damage to the Indian property by erosion. Considering the loss of nearly 10 acres since 1954 (representing one-third of the total area) this precaution was surely justified.

9. Thus, there is no basis for the suggestion contained in the Chinese note that the work was started in a peremptory fashion without the concurrence of the local authorities.

10. Later the Chinese authorities in Gyantse, without notice asked the Indian Trade Agent to stop the protective work, and the work was accordingly stopped. In September the local authorities themselves demolished the protective works which had been started by the Indian engineer. As a result an additional 5 feet of land along the river embankment included in the Indian lease-hold has been scoured away by the river this season. This proves that the advice of the Indian engineers about the necessity of the protective works along this embankment was sound.

11. It may also be recalled that with a view to removing the apprehensions of the Chinese authorities the Government of India conveyed an offer through their Consul General at Lhasa in June 1959 to send the Indian Chief Engineer to Gyantse from Delhi. The Chief Engineer could explain the nature of the revised plans and assure the Chinese authorities that no damage to their public highway would be caused by the proposed protective works. The Chief Engineer was also authorised to make necessary modification in the plans to satisfy the local technical authorities at Gyantse. In response to this offer, the Consul General was informed on 18th July that no useful purpose would be served by such a meeting between senior engineers on the spot. The conclusion is inescapable therefore that the local authorities were merely using technical objections with a view to delaying the reconstruction of the Trade Agency buildings. It should be clear from the narration given above that the Government of India have throughout tried their best to meet the requirements of the local authorities and that delay and difficulty in reconstruction is entirely due to lack of reciprocal co-operation from the other side.

Transport and supplies

12. As early as September, 1957 the Government of India had requested the permission of the Chinese authorities for the import of two trucks for bringing supplies and one jeep for the use of the engineering personnel engaged in the reconstruction of the Trade Agency. The Government of India were informed that while the import of jeep would be permitted, import of trucks into the Tibet region could not be permitted. They were told, however, that local assistance in providing trucks either officially or by hiring private owned vehicles would be given. Apparently all privately owned trucks have been confiscated after the present disturbances and trucks of the official Transport Department cannot be spared for the Indian Agency. In these circumstances the Government of India are constrained to point out that the suggestion earlier made by the Chinese Government has had no practical value and in effect an insuperable impediment has been placed in the way of the construction work of the Agency building.

13. While the Government of India cannot complain against Chinese laws preventing the use of foreign owned trucks over the highways of Tibet, they wish to point out that they had only sought permission to import trucks for specific use in the reconstruction of the Indian Agency buildings. Under international usage, foreign missions are permitted to import their own transport especially when transport is not readily available locally. Such a concession is enjoyed by foreign missions in India and could be claimed by the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi for the construction of their Embassy premises. However, if the Chinese authorities can ensure that Indian requirement would be met locally at economical rates either by private hire or through official agencies, the Government of India would not press their request.

In the past the attention of the Chinese Government has been drawn to other difficulties encountered in the reconstruction of the Agency. Explosives for blasting work are not locally available and no facilities were given for their import. Horse carts and labourers engaged by the Agency were diverted from the work apparently under instruction of the local authorities and bricks which were to be carried to the Agency sites are still lying in the fields for want of transport.

In November 1958 a request was made by the Indian Trade Agency for a permit to purchase timber from the Yatung area but no helpful response was forthcoming for a long time. Recently authorisation was given by the local authorities for obtaining timber from Yatung, but in actual practice the permission has proved of no avail. The price quoted by the Foreign Bureau Yatung for supply from the official factory was five times the cost of timber in the open market at Yatung. Later it was suggested by the local authorities that the Government of India should pay for the timber not in currency but in exchange for rice. Actually the total quantity of timber required (about 10,000—12,000 cubic feet) was readily available in the Yatung market but the Indian Agency was denied permission to acquire it. Surely this is an example of the lack of co-operation and deliberate difficulties created by the local officials.

Firing near the Agency premises

14. The Government of India are surprised at the repudiation of the report about firing practice over the Agency premises. The firing actually took place near the Agency offices and the staff premises which are nowhere near the camping ground of the Chinese Army. There were a number of incidents and these could hardly be part of ordinary firing practice:

(i) On 28th June at 9 A.M. IST 2 bullets were fired over the head of the Indian Assistant Engineer when he was counting bricks at the Agency site.
(ii) At 10 p.m. IST on 4th July 1959 firing practice took place near the residence of the Trade Agent.

(iii) On 18th July when two members of the staff were going to take delivery of the Agency car which had been kept in custody, two bullets were fired over their heads. Empty cartridges of the 7.9 m. service rifles and 5.9 mm. revolvers were collected from near the Agency premises and are in the possession of the Government of India. The Government of India do not wish to suggest that this firing was intended to intimidate the labourers working on the Agency premises. In fact, subsequent to the firing all work stopped as the labourers subsequently left their jobs.

15. After considerable effort work was resumed only recently but following a visit on 5th September by Mr. Yang of the Foreign Bureau and Chinese military engineer the local persons and workers asked to be relieved and the work again stopped.

Arrest of the driver of the car of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse

16. It is not easy to get drivers at Gyantse. The particular driver appointed by the Trade Agency had passed a driving test at Lhasa. He was in possession of a driving licence issued by the Chinese authorities and this licence was withdrawn when a private truck he was driving was requisitioned. Full particulars of the driver were furnished to the Chinese sub-office on the 25th June—the day he was appointed. Between then and the date of his arrest on 12th July, the Foreign Bureau were reminded twice (on 30th June and 10th July) to arrange for a driving test. In reply the Agency official was told that a driving licence would be issued after a test at Yatung. No mention was made by the Foreign Bureau that the driver should not drive the car pending the issue of a fresh licence. Yet the driver was summarily arrested and released only after one week. The local authorities have stated that this was the normal punishment for such offence and it is therefore not understood how the Chinese Government hold that the driver was released after admission of his error. If this was so, he could have been released the same day. Incidentally, no fresh test has yet been arranged for the driver even though 3 months have passed since the date of his arrest.

17. The note of the Chinese Government is silent about the detention of the car of the Indian Trade Agency by the local authorities. The detention of the official car of the Indian Agency was against all international usage and the Government of India repeat their protest against this unfriendly action. The treatment meted out to the Trade Agent himself when he endeavoured to secure the release of the car was far from courteous. Hearing of the detention of the car and the driver, the Indian Trade Agent went to the Military headquarters at 18.15 hours IST and asked for an interview with the Chief of the Foreign Bureau. No reply was forthcoming. In fact the sentry did not allow him to take the car away. This treatment was undoubtedly against the normal international practice relating to the privileges and courtesies to be shown to representatives of foreign countries.
18. The Chinese Government in their note have shown ignorance of the difficulties with regard to the temporary accommodation of the Trade Agent. In fact attention to these difficulties was drawn specifically in a note presented by the Foreign Secretary to the Chinese Ambassador at New Delhi on 23rd March 1959. No reply has yet been received to this note. The lease of the premises which the Trade Agent now occupies became due for renewal in April 1959. He has been endeavouring to secure its extension ever since but has not yet succeeded. It has been reported that confidential and indirect pressure has been brought to bear on the family of the owner of the property not to renew the lease of the premises. It is also reported that the premises of a member of the Indian staff was forcibly vacated when he had been temporarily deputed to stay in the Agency premises. A recent report indicates that on 1st October notice was given to two members of the staff of the Agency to vacate their residential premises in 2 or 3 days time. The Indian Trade Agent has informed the Foreign Bureau that this would only be possible if alternative accommodation were provided.

19. The Government of India remain deeply concerned at the present accommodation difficulties of the Trade Agent and his staff in Gyantse. These difficulties can be judged from the fact that eight rooms in one part of a private house held by the Agency on hire are utilised for the Agency offices and the dispensary, the residential accommodation of the Doctor and the Head Assistant and several of the junior personnel of the Agency. Only two small rooms are available for accommodation of the entire office and the official records. This is extremely inadequate. The house is surrounded by manure pits and cattle refuse and its entrance is next to an open community latrine. In a place situated at an altitude of over 13,000 ft. and subject to severe climatic conditions and living in a house with such unhygienic surroundings, it is not a matter of surprise that the members of the Agency are constantly suffering from ill health and disease.

20. According to the Government of India's information, additional accommodation to relieve this congestion is in fact available in Gyantse. But whenever efforts were made to take on lease some vacant premises, accommodation was denied to the Agency. Some time later the Chinese authorities themselves occupied the premises which had been denied to the Indian Trade Agency. The Government of India would once more urge the Chinese authorities to assist the Trade Agent to secure adequate accommodation for himself, his office and his staff. The present difficulties to which Indian staff are being subjected are in sharp contrast to the facilities in regard to accommodation and other things which are enjoyed by the Chinese posts in India.

21. As regards the reconstruction of the old premises, the Government of India will be prepared to exchange, in lieu of the land within their leasehold along the river bank, additional land of the corresponding area on the north and north-eastern side of the Agency site. The embankment side of the Trade Agency premises would be surrendered so that the Chinese authorities would be free to undertake the construction of protective works according to their own design for the safety of the bridge and public highway. Detailed proposals are now being worked out and will be communicated to the Chinese authorities separately. The new proposal can only be effective if the Chinese Government agree in principle to lease out an equal area of land on the other side of the Agency premises and to ensure that necessary facilities of access to the river for water etc., will be guaranteed to the Agency.

Conclusion

22. The difficulties of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse are real and have to be removed without delay if the Agency is to carry on its normal functions. It has been without proper accommodation for years and the living conditions of the Agency staff are deplorable. If the Agency premises are to be reconstructed, essential transport has to be provided for the carriage of materials and facilities provided for the purchase of timber and other building requirements. The Government of India would request the Government of China to issue appropriate instructions to the local authorities at Gyantse to give all required facilities and assistance to the Indian Trade Agent in accordance with and in the spirit of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 and the correspondence exchanged at that occasion.

23. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity of renewing to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 26 October 1959

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Government’s note presented to the Ambassador of India in Peking on the 11th September 1959. The following paragraphs deal with that note in so far as the difficulties of the Indian representatives at posts in Tibet other than Gyantse are concerned. Two separate notes are being simultaneously presented to the Embassy in regard to the difficulties in Gyantse and the difficulties of Indian traders and Indian nationals in general in the Tibet region of China.

The Trade Agency at Yatung

2. The lease of the Trade Agency in Yatung only prescribes that permission of the local authorities should be obtained in respect of the construction or reconstruction of the Agency premises. On no occasion has any construction involving extension of the plinth area been undertaken without due notice to the Foreign Bureau. At the same time the Government of India have to state with regret that whenever permission even for small alterations was sought, considerable time elapsed before it was granted. Requests for such minor alterations and repair works were submitted to the local Foreign Bureau on the 1st January, 6th March, 2nd, 8th and 15th April, 1959 but the approval of the Foreign Bureau was conveyed to these requests by Director Hung Fei only on the 11th July, 1959. On the 2nd April 1959 plans were submitted for rebuilding the quarters of the sweeper. These quarters had been demolished by the fall of a tree. Since the sweeper and his family had no shelter, a reminder was sent on the 15th April saying that presumably there would be no objection to the work of reconstruction being started. Since no objection was raised by the Foreign Bureau and no reply was received and since the poor family was in miserable plight, reconstruction was started on the 28th April. Thus, it would hardly be correct to say that no intimation was given to the local authorities or that their permission was not sought.

3. On the 23rd July 1958, the Head Assistant of the Trade Agency in Yatung was informed by Mr. Lu Ching Wu of the Foreign Bureau that unauthorised repairs had been undertaken by the Agency. The only works that had been undertaken were fixing glass panes, white-washing and minor repairs. Mr. Lu stated that even for such repairs prior permission had to be obtained. Objection was also taken to the restoration of a boundary wall which had fallen down and to the erection of a fence around a flower and kitchen garden in the agency compound after the melting of the winter snows. It is difficult to understand why even such ordinary maintenance work or minor improvements or restoration in the existing buildings should be subject to the prior approval of the local authorities. The Chinese posts in India are not subjected to such difficulties or interminable delay. In any case, if previous permission is insisted on by the local authorities, the Government of India would urge that expeditious clearance be given in respect of alterations or minor construction and that a more reasonable attitude be taken in respect of ordinary maintenance and repair works.

4. The primary school to which reference is made in the Chinese Government’s note was opened soon after the visit of the Indian Prime Minister to Yatung in 1958 with funds presented by the local Indian trading community. The school is located within the Agency premises and is intended exclusively for the benefit of the children of the staff working in the Trade Agency. The total number of such children is less than 25. It would seem extraordinary to prohibit the children of local staff of the Indian Agency from availing of the facilities of this elementary school. The children are of course free to attend a local school elsewhere if they so wish. Similarly, the Doctor and the dispensary attached to the Trade Agency are intended for the members of the Agency staff and their families. Local people from the neighbourhood however often come to the dispensary for treatment of minor ailments. This has been the practice for years. While no encouragement for the use of the Agency dispensary is given to the local people, the Government of India cannot understand why facilities of treatment should be denied to suffering people who choose to visit the dispensary on their own. Such an attitude seems strange and somewhat inhuman. However, the Government of India will abide by the wishes of the local authorities.

5. The Government of India would like to point out in this context that the school supported by the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong enrolls Indian children on its rolls and no objection has been taken to this by the Government. The Government of India can only attribute the hesitation of the Chinese Government to some unaccountable distrust of the elementary school maintained by the Indian Agency at Yatung. In such matters full reciprocity is desirable.

Local regulations

6. The Chinese Government in their note have referred to the Indian Agencies not respecting local regulations. In fact, except for ad hoc decisions which are conveyed verbally by the local officials in Tibet, no set of regulations for the guidance of foreign representatives in Tibet has been provided. A request for such codified regulations was addressed to the Foreign Bureau in Lhasa in November, 1956 and repeated in Peking in November, 1957. Whenever reminders were given, the reply was received by Indian officials that local laws were changing progressively and no codified regulations existed. It will be appreciated that in the circumstances it is not possible for the Indian posts in Tibet to know what local regulations they are expected to observe. The Government of India emphatically repudiate the allegation that Indian representatives deliberately flout local regulations.

Restrictions on movements and contacts

7. The Government of India appreciate that regulations which are imposed by the Government of China in the interest of public security have to be followed. At the same time, if Indian representatives have to discharge their normal functions they should have reasonable freedom of movement and other facilities. A few instances may be quoted in which such facilities were withheld for no apparent reason. Thus the Trade Agent, Yatung, was prevented from going in the Agency car to meet the Indian Trade Agent from Gyantse at Rinchengang. If it was safe for the Trade Agent, Gyantse, and his wife to travel to Yatung from Rinchengang, it is difficult to understand why there was any danger in the Trade Agent, Yatung, meeting them at the same place and driving back with them.

8. There are other similar instances of unreasonable and objectionable restrictions imposed on the movement of Indian officials. In February 1959 the Head Assistant of the Indian Agency at Yatung was refused permission to proceed to Rinchengang which is on a recognised route, to meet another official of the agency in Gyantse. In October 1958 the Trade Agent in Yatung was refused permission to accompany Mrs. Jigmie Dorji, the wife of the Prime Minister of Bhutan, on her way back to Gangtok. The last two incidents took place long before the recent disturbances and at that time no emergency security restrictions were in force.

9. In August 1959 the Consul General designate of India while on his way to Lhasa was held up for nearly two hours by the Chinese check-post at Chumbi despite his possessing diplomatic passport. Difficulties also arose in clearing his luggage even though all items had been declared in advance. On 8th August Shri S. K. Chakrabarti who was returning to India from Lhasa as a courier holding a diplomatic passport was stopped and harassed for a few hours for some unaccountable reason after he had cleared through Chumbi check-post and before he reached Champithang. As recently as 28th September, the Head Assistant at Yatung, despite a properly visaed official passport in his possession, on his way back from Gangtok to Yatung, was compelled to return to Nathula by the Chinese check-post soldiers at Champithang. The Indian Trade Agent at Yatung is not permitted to move beyond a mile of the Agency towards Chumbi and not even a yard on the road towards Lhasa. The Trade Agent in Gyantse is confined to an area approximately two miles on either side of the Agency. The movement of the Indian Consul General in Lhasa is restricted to the Lhasa township. The sentry guard posted outside the Consulate General prevents all people including even Indian nationals from having access to the Consulate. It may be added that Chinese nationals of the Tibet region are forbidden even to attend cinema shows and purely cultural performances in the Agency or Consulate General. Cinema shows attended mainly by Indians are frequently organised by the Chinese representatives in India in their own premises and, with permission in public places outside and no exception has ever been taken by the Government of India to attendance at these shows by Indian nationals. In India, complete freedom of movement and contact with Indian nationals has been allowed to the Chinese representatives. It is hardly necessary to point out that restrictions of the kind mentioned above are not in accordance with the spirit of mutual trust and friendship which is embodied in the 1954 Agreement.
The tour of the Indian Trade Agent in Western Tibet

10. The Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 envisages a permanent Trade Agency at Gartok in Western Tibet to assist Indian traders and pilgrims visiting the area. No suitable building is locally available on hire at Gartok and despite the efforts of the Government of India, it has not been possible till now to conclude a lease and commence the construction of the Trade Agency at that place. Pending availability of suitable accommodation, the Trade Agent therefore endeavours to discharge his functions by a tour lasting about four months during the summer season every year. It has been the traditional practice for decades for the Trade Agent to enter Tibet by the same pass through which he returned from Tibet at the end of the previous season. All his camping equipment is left at the nearest frontier check-posts and thereby the trouble of bringing the equipment down to the plains at the conclusion of every season is saved. The local authorities are clearly aware of the practice and knew that the Indian Trade Agent who had left Western Tibet by Niti pass in November 1958 would re-enter by the same pass in 1959. The Ministry of External Affairs had also forwarded his detailed itinerary for 1959 to the Chinese Embassy at New Delhi and specifically requested a visa for the Niti pass in a note dated the 18th May 1959. As a result the Trade Agent's passport duly visaed for the Niti pass was received from the Embassy on the 29th May 1959. If the Chinese authorities were unable to make the necessary security and communication arrangements beyond the Niti pass and wished the Trade Agent to follow a different route, it would have been expected that information to that effect would be given to the Government of India in time so that the Trade Agent could be asked to proceed through Lepulekh pass as subsequently desired by the Chinese authorities. Thereby considerable delay and great personal hardship to the Trade Agent could have been avoided. For want of timely intimation, the Trade Agent had to retrace his journey when he was already nearing the frontier at Niti pass and there was delay of one month in the schedule of his entry into Tibet.

11. Despite the Trade Agent's compliance with the last minute requirement of the Chinese authorities at great personal inconvenience and hardship he was surprised to find after he had arrived at Taklakot through the new route that he could not proceed further since no mechanical transport was available. He was therefore held up at Taklakot for six weeks. The Trade Agent was willing to avail of animal transport, but even this was not provided by the local Chinese authorities. In the 3rd week of August he was advised to proceed straight to Gargunsa while his destination in accordance with past practice, which must have been well known to the Chinese authorities, was Gartok. Gargunsa is an important Chinese military headquarters but is of little importance from the point of view of the work which the Trade Agent is supposed to do under the 1954 Agreement. Gartok is the most important market in Western Tibet and is also the administrative headquarters for that region. Finally, when transport was arranged by the Chinese authorities, the Indian Trade Agent and his staff had to perform the journey of more than a hundred miles from 5 in the morning till 8 in the evening on the back of an open truck. This lack of consideration for an official of a friendly country who had been sent to Western Tibet to discharge his normal functions in accordance with an international agreement could hardly be regarded as evidence of friendship or co-operation and the Government of India cannot but express their regret at this strange treatment to which their Trade Agent was subjected.

12. The Chinese Government have suggested in their note that the special facilities which they are called upon to provide for the Indian Trade Agent are unique and extraordinary. This suggestion is obviously misleading. As the Chinese Government must be aware, it had been the practice for the Indian Trade Agent in Western Tibet to take his own rifles for the protection of himself and his party during their long journeys across wild and uninhabited regions. He also used to carry his own wireless set in order to be able to keep in touch with the Government of India. In 1953 however, the Chinese authorities summarily seized the rifles and the wireless set which the then Trade Agent had been carrying and these were returned to him at the Indian border on his return journey. It was only when the Chinese authorities prohibited the Trade Agent from carrying any weapons in self-protection or any wireless set that the Government of India requested the local authorities to provide for security guard and a wireless unit for the Indian Trade Agent. It is of course well known that a regular system of postal communication or even of police protection is not available in that area. If now it is the contention of the Chinese Government that they have no responsibility for providing either escort or wireless facility for the Trade Agent, the Government of India would like to know whether they have any objection to the Government of India themselves arranging for these facilities for their Trade Agent. If the Chinese authorities would neither provide these facilities themselves nor permit the Trade Agent to make his own arrangements it need hardly be said that the Trade Agent would not be able to discharge his functions and to that extent the corresponding provision in the 1954 Agreement would be rendered nugatory.

13. The Government of India are anxious to sign the lease for a plot of land for the construction of the Trade Agency in Gartok. They are gratified that the lease has now been all but completed. Information has however been received recently that the local authorities in the Tibet region have been insisting that the rent for the leased property will have to be paid in Yuans. This is contrary not merely to the customary practice but to the specific provision in para. 2(v) of the letter of His Excellency the Ambassador of China in India dated the 25th May 1957 which amplified the Trade Agreement between China and India signed in October 1954.

Couriers and communications

14. The Chinese Government could not be unaware of the fact that since the disturbances in Tibet the Indian bag service for all the Indian posts in Tibet has remained suspended for months. In the circumstances a special courier permit was requested as early as the 3rd June 1959 for an Indian official Shri Bhupindra Singh to proceed as courier up to Lhasa. Despite this advance request he had to wait for 18 days at Yatung before any transport was provided for him. It is understood, however, that all this time there was official Chinese transport plying between Yatung and Lhasa. Somewhat earlier than this an Indian engineer who was proceeding to Gyantse in connection with the construction work of the Indian Agency premises there was held up for three weeks for lack of transport. Since officially-owned transport of the Government of India cannot be permitted to ply to Lhasa on courier duty and since private transport is not available on hire, the Indian posts have to rely entirely on the assistance of the local authorities in securing transport. On all occasions Indian couriers are required to sit at the back of trucks and make themselves as comfortable as they can. It appears from the manner in which requests for transport were ultimately complied with that the local authorities were completely indifferent to the requirements of the Government of India and the hardships which are imposed on their staff.

15. It is true that the Chinese authorities had asked the Government of India to discontinue the existing messenger system in 1955. It will be recalled, however, that the road for use of mechanical transport between Lhasa and Yatung was completed only in 1956. In 1957, a detailed scheme for a jeep courier system in replacement of the old messenger system was worked out by the Government of India and requests were made to the Chinese authorities in Lhasa first verbally and then in writing to agree to this arrangement. The Chinese authorities, however were not prepared to permit the Government of India to run their own jeeps even for the exclusive purpose of carrying official mails and bags to the Indian posts. It was only in these circumstances that the existing system had to be continued but this was done with the full knowledge and authorisation of the local authorities in Tibet. It may be observed that Article I of the Sino-Indian Agreement gives to both the sides the privileges of communication through couriers and despatch of mail bags containing official communications. Para. 7 of the notes exchanged at Peking at the time of conclusion of the Sino-Indian Agreement provides that the Trade Agent may hire employees locally. Thus the continuance of the messenger system with local personnel, pending the institution of modern courier system, is fully in consonance with and in no way contrary to the 1954 Agreement.

16. Nevertheless, in view of the objection of the Chinese Government the Government of India are agreeable in principle to start a courier system with Indian couriers which would use transport provided by the Chinese authorities. Such a system will be feasible only if suitable mechanical transport is made available by the Chinese authorities regularly and at reasonable rates. For the safety of bags it may also be necessary to provide transport for the exclusive use of the Indian couriers. Detailed arrangements involved in the system are now being worked out and will be communicated to the Chinese authorities shortly.

17. The attention of the Chinese Government has already been drawn to instances in which the bags of Indian Government were opened while they were handled by the local postal authorities. It will also be recalled that four cases of baby food for the infant child of the Consul General were handed over by the Trade Agent in Gyantse for onward despatch to Lhasa in April, 1959. They were kept for over a month in the sub-office of the Foreign Bureau and thereafter returned to the Trade Agent on the plea that no transport was available. Finally the food for the child was delivered to the previous Consul General through the local authorities in August, a few days before the Consul General left on transfer. The bags, urgent supplies, etc., which had accumulated for over 4 months at Yatung were transported by the special courier (Shri Bhupindra Singh) who proceeded to Lhasa in June this year.

With regard to the suggestion to use the local postal facilities, it may be stated that letter sent through the local post office have taken as much as a month between Yatung on the one hand and Phari and Gyantse on the other, when in fact the journey can be performed in one or two days. Ordinary letters from India to Lhasa through Tibetan postal channels have taken even longer. In contrast under the messenger system (which is dependent on animal transport) official bags only took four days from Gangtok to Gyantse.

18. It is also reported that telegrams for despatch are only accepted in Yatung and Gyantse on 3 days in the week; no telegrams are accepted in Lhasa on Monday and in all cases no telegrams can be sent except during certain fixed hours. On the 6th July, the Indian Trade Agency, Gyantse gave details to local authorities of three specific cases where telegrams were delayed in transmission or never delivered at all. A telegram from Delhi marked most immediate was despatched on 3rd, reached Gyantse on 4th and was actually delivered to the Agency on the 6th September.

19. While no reflection on the Chinese Postal Department is intended, it will be clear from the above instances that the normal post and telegraphs facilities are not sufficiently developed in the Tibet region. The Government of India are only interested in ensuring that official communications to and from them reach their posts in Tibet in safety and without delay.

20. The Government of India deplore the arbitrary action of the Chinese authorities in stopping the messenger system through which official communications had hitherto been maintained between India and the Indian trade posts and the Consulate General in Tibet. So far as the Government of India are aware, the system has never been misused and even though the messengers were local people, at no time could any exception be taken to their conduct. In accordance with international usage facilities must be given to a foreign representative to keep himself in touch with his Government. The facility of a bag service is well recognised and this was specifically provided in the 1954 Agreement. In fact, as the Chinese Government are aware Government of India have been very generous in giving courier permits to the Chinese representatives and as many as 38 Chinese couriers hold multi-entry Indian visas for movement between India and China. It is particularly regrettable, therefore, that before an alternative system with Indian couriers could be worked out, the Government of India should have been deprived by the Chinese Government of the facilities of communication with the Indian posts in Tibet. The bag service to the Indian posts in Gyantse and Lhasa has remained suspended since July. The difficulties of these posts for lack of suitable bag facilities can well be imagined.
21. The statement of the Chinese Government's note that the Government of India have been maintaining wireless sets in their agencies in Tibet in an unauthorised manner is hardly in consonance with facts. It will be recalled that as early as September 1955 the Chinese Government agreed in principle to the retention of the Indian wireless Links at Lhasa, Gartok and either Gyantse or Yatung on a reciprocal basis. Details were being worked out when suddenly, in September, 1957, the Chinese check-post at Yatung summarily seized some essential parts required for repairing the wireless set of the Trade Agency at Gyantse. This seizure was not even intimated to the Indian Trade Agent, Yatung and only later when enquiries were made by him was he informed of the detention of the equipment. This was justified by the local authorities on the ground that it was a prohibited item of import. The seized equipment has not yet been released. However, in March this year the Government of India made a comprehensive proposal to the Chinese Government for establishment of wireless sets on a reciprocal basis by Indian posts in China and Chinese posts in India. No agreement to these proposals has yet been received from the Chinese Government. In these circumstances, to say that wireless stations are being maintained by the Indian posts in an unauthorised manner does not present the facts of the situation correctly.

Conclusion

22. The Government of India find no pleasure in enumerating the facts given in the foregoing paragraphs. Facts have however to be stated clearly to contrast the treatment accorded by the Chinese authorities to Indian trade posts in Tibet with the facilities and privileges enjoyed by corresponding Chinese posts in India. The Government of India have to say with regret that repeated requests from their representatives in the Tibet region for the minimum facilities of transport, communication and accommodation have not been dealt with by the local authorities in the Tibet region with the sympathy and attention which are due to the representatives of a friendly country. They would also like to state that unless these facilities are forthcoming the Indian posts in Tibet cannot function with dignity and discharge the responsibilities intended for them under the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954.

23. The Government of India take the opportunity of renewing to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China, the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 26 October 1959

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note which was handed to the Ambassador of India in Peking by the Director of the Asian Department of the Chinese Foreign Office on the 11th September 1959. That note dealt with a variety of matters. The Government of India have dealt with some of them in two other notes. The present note is, therefore, confined only to the difficulties of Indian traders in particular, and Indian nationals in general, in the Tibet region of China.

2. As the Chinese Government must be aware, the 1954 Agreement between India and China envisaged that the traditional trade and religious connections between the Tibet region of China and India would continue to be maintained to the mutual advantage of the people on both sides. The Government of India are not unaware of the special difficulties which have arisen as a result of the recent disturbances in the Tibet region. It occurs to them, however, that some of the restrictions imposed by the local authorities in Tibet have hardly any relation to the security and other aspects of the recent disturbances. If these restriction continue, the arrangements contemplated in 1954 will completely break down.

Difficulties of Indian trades in Central Tibet

3. The traditional border trade between India and the Tibet region of China was based on a free exchange of goods and pre-supposed that no difficulties would be placed in the way of remittance of profits of Indian nationals engaged in this trade from Tibet to India. The Government of India have explained the difficulties which have arisen as a result of new currency measures introduced by the Chinese Government in a note presented by the Ambassador of India in Peking on the 25th August, 1959. The new measures introduced by the Chinese authorities make it extremely difficult to exchange goods according to the traditional pattern of trade. Indian traders are being subjected to great hardship by the restrictions imposed which have inevitably caused serious loss on goods which had been exchanged or sold prior to the devaluation. Moreover, they are being confronted with serious difficulties in the remittance of profits because payments are no longer being made in Indian rupees and the customary method of adjustment through export to India of either silver dollars or silver coins is being denied to them.
Obstacles are also being placed in the barter of goods taken by the Indian traders to Tibet with the goods which they used to receive traditionally from the Tibetans. The Government of India do not contest the right of the Chinese authorities to introduce such currency measures as they consider necessary in the interest of their country, but since these measures adversely affect the traditional pattern of trade envisaged in the 1954 Agreement, it is only fair that some method should be devised to save the Indian traders from the severe loss to which they are being put by the devaluation of the local currency. Further there should be some reasonable means for Indian traders to repatriate their earnings back to India.

4. It has been suggested that Indian traders could repatriate their earnings through drafts on the Bank of China in Calcutta by depositing Chinese currency with the local authorities. It should be realised, however, that small traders who are engaged in transactions in remote areas in the Tibet region particularly in Western Tibet would have serious practical difficulty both in obtaining and in cashing rupee drafts with the Bank of China in Calcutta. Moreover, it has been reported that Chinese authorities are insisting that before any rupee bank draft can be issued in favour of an Indian trader, he must enter into a bond for the import of specified goods of equivalent value in future. This condition, if it were to be fulfilled literally, would impose great hardship on the traders. Apart from the fact that this would interfere with the freedom of a trader to continue or not to continue his trade in future, a trader has compulsory obligations to meet in India to his suppliers, in addition to the personal expenses of himself and his family. It may be stated in this context that on many occasions in the past when Indian traders took goods to the Tibet region in fulfilment of earlier contracts, the Chinese authorities refused to accept them, thereby causing severe loss to them.

5. There are still other difficulties which are being experienced by Indian traders. On account of the restrictions imposed by the local authorities, Indian traders are not free to travel to recognised markets in Tibet. Unless the Indian traders receive permission to move to the recognised markets, they will be unable to dispose of the merchandise which they have taken this season to the Tibet region or to collect old debts. Some of the Tibetans to whom they had earlier supplied goods have now moved to Shigatse and Lhasa. The Indian traders are not able to contact these persons now. It is requested that in view of the circumstances arising out of the disturbances the traders should, as a special case, be allowed to go up to Lhasa and Shigatse to realise debts from their old customers. Further unless reasonable facilities are given to them to hire transport, a right embodied in the 1954 Agreement, they will be unable to carry on trade. The Government of India would request that the difficulties enumerated in this and the preceding paragraphs should be sympathetically examined by the Chinese authorities and remedial action taken without delay. Otherwise, the 1954 Agreement, insofar as it concerns the maintenance of the traditional trade between the two countries, will be rendered nugatory.

Difficulties of traders in Western Tibet

6. The Indian traders who visit Western Tibet are mostly petty traders who usually barter their goods for wool, salt, borax etc. In the hope that this traditional basis of exchange would continue these traders crossed into Tibet as usual, but by and large little trade or exchange of goods has been possible this year. It appears that a deliberate effort is being made to prevent the Tibetan suppliers of wool etc. from exchanging their produce with the Indian traders. The few Indian traders, who managed to purchase a small amount of wool, have been put to serious difficulties by the imposition of a new export tax on wool of the equivalent of Rs. 8
Indian traders have expressed their willingness to pay this new tax. In practice they are not finding it possible to do so, because while they are paid by the Tibetans as well as by the Chinese authorities in Indian rupees, they are required to pay the tax in Chinese silver dollars. Three months ago, a decree was issued by the Chinese authorities that Chinese paper currency would be legal tender in the Tibet region of China. It is all the more surprising, therefore, that local authorities should insist on payment of tax in silver dollars. Besides, silver dollars are not available in Western Tibet markets. Indian traders are, therefore, faced with an impossible situation and the Government of India cannot help feeling that these new requirements are meant to prevent export of wool and to disrupt the traditional pattern of border trade. The Government of India would repeat their earlier request that instructions should be issued by the Chinese Government to enable the Indian traders to carry on their traditional trade in wool and other commodities and to pay tax in a convenient medium, and also to repatriate their wares and legitimate profits to India.

7. The Government of India have recently received reports that the local authorities of Western Tibet, contrary to the customary practice, have imposed a ban on the export of sheep and goats to India. These animals were traditionally purchased by Indian traders not merely for the purpose of gathering wool but also for use as beasts of burden on the return journey to India. Further, petty Indian traders visiting Western Tibet traditionally left their unsold merchandise at the end of the season at the various trade marts and local authorities of the Tibet region have assisted them by ensuring the safe custody of the merchandise. The responsibilities of the Tibetan authorities have now been assumed by the Military Control Commission. The latter informed the traders towards the end of September 1959 that unsold merchandise should be taken back to India. This instruction was received by the traders at a time when many of the passes had already been blocked by snow. Basing themselves on the traditional practice, the traders had made no transport arrangements to repatriate their unsold merchandise and will, therefore, be compelled to leave it behind. It is feared that if no safety precautions are arranged by the local authorities, the traders will lose a substantial, if not the entire value of these goods. The Government of India would, therefore, request that at least for the season just attended, the customary practice should be observed by the Chinese authorities in Tibet, and necessary arrangements for the protection of the goods left behind should be made. Otherwise, thousands of small traders will be subjected to serious loss and suffering.

Difficulties of pilgrims and other Indian nationals

8. The Chinese Government have mentioned a number of specific cases in their note. The Government of India have examined all the points mentioned in the Chinese note. Full information regarding the complaint of an Indian pilgrim who was harassed on his way to Mansarovar has been given in a separate note presented to the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi on the 24th September 1959. The particular pilgrim was carrying a few ordinary homoeopathic medicines. To subject him to delay and harassment on the suspicion that he might be carrying poison was uncalled for. It should have occurred to the persons responsible for this harsh treatment that a pilgrim on this way to a sacred place could have no use for poison. In this as in other similar matters, the Chinese check-post official must have given free play to their imagination.

9. As early as April 1957 the Embassy of India presented to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking a list of the difficulties which were experienced by Indian pilgrims proceeding to Kailash and Mansarovar. There were no security arrangements on the way nor any arrangement for sanitation and hygiene. Paragraph 10 of the letters exchanged after the 1954 Agreement envisaged that the Chinese Government would construct rest houses for the use of pilgrims. The Government of India even offered to supply timber to assist in the expeditious construction of these rest houses, but this offer was not accepted by the local authorities. It appears that in 1958 one or two rest houses had been built, but by and large the old difficulties still continue. However, in accordance with the wishes of the Chinese Government, all intending Indian pilgrims have been warned not to undertake any pilgrimage this season. It is hoped that when conditions return to normal, the facilities which the Indian nationals have traditionally enjoyed of visit to the two places held sacred by them will be restored.

10. A separate note has already been presented to the Embassy on the 24th September, 1959, on the question of Indian nationals other than traders residing in Tibet. The Government of India seek no concession except that persons who are entitled to Indian nationality should be given option to exercise the right of Indian citizenship and return to India, if they so wish.

11. A reference has been made in the Chinese Government's note to the case of two cobblers. It was for the local authorities to prevent them from proceeding as far as Shigatse. The Government of India were certainly not aware of their movement. At all events, the fact that they had done so was no reason to subject them to delay and harassment on their return journey when they were merely anxious to go back to India.

12. With reference to the family of Shahbir and Tromo Geshe the Government of India seek only to obtain details of the specific charges which have been preferred against them. It may be recalled that paragraph 6 of the letters exchanged at the time of the conclusion of the Sino-Indian Agreement specifically provides for access to the representatives of both sides by their nationals involved in criminal or civil cases. International usage also requires that facts relating to the arrest and the nature of the charges against foreign nationals should be communicated on request to the representatives of the countries concerned. The Government of India would suggest once more that, if only on humanitarian grounds, the wife and children of Shahbir be permitted to return to India and join their husband and father, who is now residing in Kalimpong.

13. The Government of India are surprised at the allegation in the Chinese Government's note that false rumours were being spread by Indian nationals visiting Tibet. They have fully satisfied themselves that such an allegation is entirely unfounded. The allegation that Chinese nationals have been subjected to unwarranted questioning by the Indian border check-posts is equally unfounded. In the past whenever such a complaint was received, the Government of India had immediate investigations made into it but in the case was the charge found true. If specific complaints were brought to their notice, they will certainly examine them.

Registration of arms

14. The arms held by Indian nationals and representatives were imported or acquired at a time when there was no proper system of issuing fire arms' licences in Tibet. The Chinese Government must be aware that all Indian nationals including the junior personnel of the Indian posts have complied with the recent orders of the local authorities asking them to surrender their arms. The Government of India trust that satisfactory arrangements will be made for the protection of life and property as laid down in para 9 of the notes exchanged at the time of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954. It is extraordinary that at the time these arms were deposited the local authorities refused to issue receipts on the basis of which the owner could claim them back when returning to India. At the time when the Vice Consul endeavoured to sell his revolver, to which reference is made in the Chinese note, no system of licence or restriction on sale existed in the Tibet region of China.

Anti-Indian propaganda in Tibet

15. The Government of India are glad to be assured that the articles to which they had drawn attention in their note of 24th July, 1959, alleging that India was a successor to the British imperialism do not represent the official thinking of the People's Republic of China. Since, however, these articles were published in organs which are officially controlled, the Government of India could only conclude that such views did have official support. The Government of India wish to recall in this context the anti-Indian demonstration which was organised in Yatung on 1st May 1959 with official support and connivance, when India was denounced as 'Imperialists, blood-suckers, expansionists' etc. Posters with anti-Indian slogans were pasted by the Chinese officials such as Lu Ching Wu of the Foreign Bureau on the quarters occupied by the Indian Overseer and on the main gate outside the Indian Trade Agency. The Government of India take serious notice of official participation and encouragement of such direct anti-Indian propaganda. The Government of India are concerned to note that certain officials in the Tibet region of China have been suggesting openly that in due course China will 'liberate' Bhutan, Sikkim, Ladakh and other parts of India. They hope that such irresponsible and unfriendly propaganda will immediately be stopped and suitable action taken against the persons responsible for such suggestion.

16. The details given in the preceding paragraphs provide clear evidence of the harsh and unsympathetic treatment to which Indian traders and Indian nationals in general have been subjected in the Tibet region of China in recent months. Such treatment is not in accordance with the spirit of the 1954 Agreement and the notes on border trade and other connected matters which were exchanged at the time. Unless remedial measures are taken by authorities in the Tibet region of China, there is bound to be a complete disruption of the border trade. This will inevitably cause hardship to people on both sides of the border. If this happens, the responsibility has to be borne by the authorities responsible for the control of trade and other connected matters in the Tibet region. So far as the Government of India are concerned, they would undoubtedly deplore a breakdown of the traditional arrangements for trade in the border regions between the two countries. At the same time, they could not allow their nationals to proceed to the Tibet region without an assurance of protection and fair treatment. The Government of India do not seek any special privileges for their nationals or for their Trade Agents, but they will expect the Chinese authorities in Tibet, if these authorities are keen on continuance of the trade connections, to make it possible for Indian traders to carry on their business in fair conditions and in a friendly atmosphere.

Conclusion

17. It will be clear from what has been stated in this and the other two notes which have been presented simultaneously to the Embassy that the allegations in the Chinese Government's note of September 11 are unfounded. It is not the Government of India who have violated the spirit of the 1954 Agreement. The instances given in these notes will show that the facilities to which the personnel of the Indian posts and Indian nationals in general are entitled under the 1954 Agreement have been denied to them on many occasions. The Government of India repudiate the allegation that any attempt has been made by them to encroach on China's sovereignty. The Government of India which is jealous of its own sovereignty, could not encroach on the sovereignty of any other country or support any attempt to do so. The facts given in these notes disprove any such contention. The allegation contained in the Chinese Government's note that "many actions and demands of India organs have violated or gone beyond the Sino-Indian Agreement" is also without any basis whatsoever. The Government of India only ask for their officers and nationals treatment and facilities which are guaranteed by the 1954 Agreement and the correspondence exchanged on the occasion and are implicit in them. They are surprised to be accused of having used unfriendly language. Neither in this note nor in any of the earlier notes or memoranda, which have been delivered to the Chinese Government by or on behalf of the Government of India, has any expression been used which is not recognised by normal diplomatic usage. On the other hand the language used in some of the Chinese Government's notes and memoranda has exceeded the bounds of normal diplomatic courtesy. The Government of the People's Republic of China appear to have taken exception to the reference in the Government of India's earlier note about the functioning of Trade Agencies in India and China on a reciprocal basis. Reciprocity is inherent in the Sino-Indian Agreement and the Government of India would not expect any treatment for its official agencies or for the Indian nationals which they themselves would not be prepared to accord to the official organs of the Chinese Government and Chinese nationals in India. There can be no question of coercion in stating this fact. The Government of India would reiterate that both parties to the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 should observe the Agreement in letter and in spirit. On their part the Government of India have been seeking to do so ever since the Agreement was signed and even despite their unfortunate experience in recent months.

18. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity of renewing to the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 29 October 1959

The Government of India have already had several occasions in the last few months to draw the attention of the Chinese Government to the position of Indian nationals particularly Muslims from Kashmir and Lamas from Ladakh resident in the Lhasa and Shigatse areas of Tibet region of China. A comprehensive note on the subject was presented to the Chinese Embassy on the 24th September, 1959. It was then pointed out that under the Indian law these persons were entitled to Indian nationality. Even if it is argued that under the Chinese law these persons, by virtue of their residence in China, are entitled to Chinese nationality or are to be regarded as Chinese nationals, they should, according to international usage, be given the option to choose which of the two nationalities they would like to adopt and be permitted to leave Tibet and return to India if they so desire.

2. Recent reports indicate that despite the representations of the Government of India, consistent pressure is being brought on the Kashmiri Muslims to observe regulations which can only be obligatory for Chinese nationals, and to accept Chinese nationality against their own wishes. It is understood, for example, that the Kashmiri Muslims in Lhasa are being required to attend meetings which are held every day and sometime twice a day but which are obviously intended for the instruction of the Chinese nationals only. The Kashmiri Muslims have pointed out to the local authorities that since they have applied for registration as Indian nationals and since the question of their nationality and their future residence in the Tibet region is a matter under discussion between the Governments of India and the People's Republic of China, there should be no compulsion on them to attend such meetings. It is understood that on the 21st October about 15 Kashmiri Muslims were summoned by the local authorities and warned to attend the daily meetings. They were warned that failing compliance, they would be subjected to punishment. Similarly on the 22nd October 1959 at 19.00 hours IST, members of the Kashmiri Muslim community (both men and women) were summoned to a meeting and detained till 23.00 hours. They were individually interrogated and pressed to accept Chinese nationality. The members of the community re-affirmed their desire to be treated as Indian nationals and as a result at least one of their spokesmen was placed under house arrest. On the 23rd October at 08.30 hours IST, some Kashmiri Muslims were taken under guard to the Chinese area office and similarly harassed and pressed to accept Chinese nationality. They were warned that if they persisted in their refusal to accept Chinese nationality they would be imprisoned and put to difficulties and harassment. On the 24th October, at a meeting, similar efforts were made to persuade them to denounce their claim to Indian nationality and, on their refusal to do so, one couple was put under house arrest.

3. The Government of India protest strongly against the pressure and intimidation to which persons of Indian origin, who are entitled to Indian citizenship are being subjected in order to compel them to accept Chinese nationality against their wishes. The Government of India would again urge that the Chinese Government should desist from such pressure and allow these persons to exercise their option in favour of Indian nationality to which they are clearly entitled. These people have committed no crime; they wish merely to return to the country of their origin. Just as China has always claimed the same freedom for persons of Chinese origin living in South-East Asia regardless of how long they may have been away from China, the Government of People's Republic of China should allow persons of Indian origin living or residing in the Tibet region to exercise their choice of citizenship freely. The Government of India would, therefore, urge that those who have already been taken into custody should be released immediately and pressure on others to accept Chinese nationality should cease forthwith.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of India to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 30 October 1959

The Government of India have considered the memorandum presented by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of People's Republic of China to the Embassy of India on the 21st August 1959 regarding the arrangements for the carriage of diplomatic bags intended for the Embassy of India, Indian Consulates and the trade posts in People's Republic of China.

2. The Government of India would like to point out that it is a fundamental principle of international law and is recognised by international usage that diplomatic and consular missions should be able to communicate freely and in secrecy with their Home Government and with other posts in the same country. For this purpose, persons acting as couriers who carry official bags are given exemption from the local jurisdiction not only by the receiving State concerned but also by countries through which they may have to traverse while engaged in the performance of such duties. The Home Government or the Diplomatic Envoys concerned are unrestricted in the choice and number of their messengers. Further, according to the international practice, there is nothing to prevent non-diplomatic members of the staff being selected to act as couriers on a particular occasion. During the time such persons are designated as couriers and act as such, they do not perform their work as members of the non-diplomatic staff in the Embassy. They are, therefore, entitled to protection and immunity customarily accorded to a courier. They revert, however, to their normal functions and privileges when not engaged on courier duties.

3. Further, the Home Government are not only within their rights in designating such persons as couriers, but persons so designated have to be equipped with the most respected form of travel documents such as diplomatic passports to ensure special protection for the bags and documents. When a person who is normally a junior functionary, is performing the duty of a courier, it is only proper that he should hold similar documents to ensure the secrecy and safety of the official bag. It is regretted therefore that the Government of India cannot accept the contention in the memorandum of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs that it is in any way objectionable for non-diplomatic personnel to be chosen for courier duties.

4. The Government of India are gratified to note that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of People's Republic of China are agreeable to the Indian members of the staff of the Indian Embassy in Peking and the Consulate General in Shanghai acting as couriers and being accorded temporarily for the duration of the assignment the privileges normally allowed to a courier. The Government of India, however, fail to appreciate the reason for denying the same facility to the members of the staff of the Consulate General in Lhasa. In fact, because of the geographical situation of Lhasa, it is not practicable for the same courier who travels to Peking to carry special bags for the Consulate General in Lhasa or other posts in Tibet.
5. The Government of India trust that the Government of People's Republic of China will agree that, in accordance with international usage, the Government of India may continue to designate Indian nationals regardless of their permanent functions to perform duties as couriers to the Embassy of India in Peking, Consulates in Shanghai and Lhasa and the trade posts in Tibet and that further, such couriers may for the satisfactory performance of their responsibilities be given diplomatic passports for the duration of their assignment and afforded the usual protection and amenities to couriers under international usage.

6. The Government of India would like to mention that as many as 38 Chinese nationals hold diplomatic passports at present on which the Government of India have issued multiple entry visas because they have been designated as couriers by the Government of Chinese People's Republic.
APPENDIX I

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF THE HIMALAYAN FRONTIER OF INDIA

India’s northern frontier is a traditional one, in the sense that it has laid approximately where it now runs for nearly three thousand years. The areas along this frontier, which is nearly 2,500 miles long from the Kuen Lun mountains in the far north to the junction with Burma in the east, have always been a part of India. At times they were independent principalities, and in other periods they were incorporated in large empires like the Mauryan and the Gupta; but always the people and the rulers regarded themselves as Indians and remained within the Indian fold. Occasionally Tibetan rulers overran these areas; but these invasions were always exceptional and temporary, and never did these territories become part of Tibet. It is a long and continuous tradition that lies behind the present frontier of India.

This northern frontier of India is for much of its length the crest of the Himalayan ranges. The Himalayas have always dominated Indian life, just as they have dominated the Indian landscape. One of the earliest Sanskrit texts, though its exact date is uncertain—the Vishnu Purana—makes it clear that the Himalayas formed the frontier of India. It states that the country south of the Himalayas and north of ocean is called Bharat, and all born in it are called Bharatiyas or Indians.

uttaram yat samudrasya himadres caiva daksinam vargas tad (tam) bharatam nama bharati yatra santatih.

The earliest reference to the Himalayas is in the Rig Veda which was written about 1500 B.C. It states that the Himalayas symbolise all mountains (10th Mandala, 10th Adhyaya, Sukta 121.4). The Kena Upanishad, written sometime about 1000 B.C., speaks of Uma the daughter of the Himalayas—उमाहिमान्तौं. The legend is that Uma, the daughter of the Himalayas, revealed the mystic idealism of the Upanishads to the gods. This is an imaginative expression of the historical fact that the thought of the Upanishads was developed by the dwellers in the forests and fastnesses of the Himalayas. For centuries thereafter, the striving of the Indian spirit was directed towards these Himalayan fastnesses. Siva was the blue-necked, snow-crowned mountain god; Parvati was the spring-maiden daughter of the Himalayas; Ganga was her elder sister; and Meru, Vishnu’s mountain, was the pivot of the universe. The Himalayan shrines are still the goal of every Hindu pilgrim.

These references to the Himalayas continue down the centuries, and show that the inhabitants of India had a first-hand knowledge of this region. The Mahabharata, written sometime after 400 B.C., states that all the rulers of India took part in the war. The list of kingdoms may not establish the historical fact of their participation in the war, but it is adequate evidence of geographical knowledge.
It has even been held that the Pandavas—‘pale-face’—belonged to a yellow-tinted, Himalayan, non-Aryan tribe which practised polyandry. The Panancha-Sudani says that one branch of the Kuru lived in the trans-Himalayan region known as Uttara-Kuru. In the days of Aitareya Brahmana and the Mahabharata some of the Kuru were still living beyond the Himalayas. The unity of this whole Himalayan region during this period is shown by the statement in the Sabhaparva of the Mahabharata, that Arjuna, on one of his campaigns, returned from Pragjyotisha (Assam) to Uluka (in northern Punjab), through the inner, outer, and adjacent belts of the Himalayas. In fact, Pragjyotisha was a name transplanted from the eastern Punjab to Assam. Arjuna is also stated to have defeated the people living around lake Manasarowar. The Himalayas became a symbol of steadfastness and dignity. The Bhagavat Gita, describing the perfection of the Almighty, states that of immovable things he is the Himalaya—स्थावराणां हिमालय sthāvāranām himalaya. The Ramayana, probably of about the same date as the Mahabharata, compares the steadfastness of Rama to the Himalayas—स्थायियं हिमालिनिः शाहिर्येन himavaniva. It also says that king Amurtaraja founded the city of Pragjyotisha, and his grandson Viswamitra practised tapas upon the banks of the Kausiki, flowing through the Himalayas in the north-west part of the Pragjyotisha region.

After the period of the Epics, we are on firmer historical ground. It is highly probable that both Gautama the Buddha and Mahavira belonged to the Himalayan tribes. The empire of Chandragupta Maurya, towards the end of the 4th century B.C., comprised the whole of India north of the Narbada, as well as Afghanistan. Kautilya’s Arthasastra refers to the worship of mountains, and looks on the Himalayas as divine mountains. The distribution of Asoka’s inscriptions shows that his empire included Afghanistan, Baluchistan, Nepal, and the whole of India except Assam up to Mysore and Madras. Inscriptions have been found near Kalsi, in the northern part of Dehra Dun district, and at Lalitapatan in the Nepal valley. Further evidence of the inclusion of the Himalayan terrain in Asoka’s empire is provided by Rock Edict XIII, which refers to the Nabhapamitś of Nabhaka, probably identical with Na-pei-hra, referred to by the Chinese pilgrim Fa-Hien early in the 5th century A.D. as being located near Kapilavastu.

The next great development in Indian history was the establishment of the Kushan Empire in north-west India in the first century A.D. These rulers belonged to the Yueh-chi tribe of nomads in Central Asia. But they were neither Tibetans nor Chinese; the description we have of them is that of large pink-faced men, who came under Hindu and Buddhist influence. One of the later rulers was called Vasudeva, a Hindu name. In fact Kadphises II came into collision with the Chinese who were now for the first time entering into relations with Central and West Asia. Kadphises was defeated by the Chinese, but his successor Kanishka avenged this defeat; and a Chinese prince is reported to have lived in Kanishka’s court as a hostage. At its height the Kushan empire included the Central Asian provinces of Kashgar, Yarkand and Khotan, and extended to the borders of Parthia and Persia. But it was essentially an Indian empire, in that Indian influences percolated into these provinces, while Central Asian influences on India were superficial. The Kharoshti records discovered in what is now Chinese Turkestan bear traces of Indian names like Krishnasena and Indian titles like Devaputra. The Kharoshti script and the Prakrit language were introduced. Even the Sassanians of the third century A.D. regarded Bactriana as virtually an Indian kingdom and the Oxus as a river of the Buddhists and the Brahmins. Kanishka was a Buddhist, and Buddhist texts as well as a large number of other Kushan documents have been found in numerous places in Central Asia where Indian colonies had flourished. During the days of the Kushan empire, which straddled the mountains which now form India's northern boundary, India's political and cultural influence swept deep into China.

If, however, the Kushans were of foreign stock who became, if we may use the phrase, 'naturalised' Indians, the Guptas, who ruled the greater part of India from about 320 to 647 A.D., were of Indian stock. Samudragupta, the second of the line, thoroughly subdued the princes in the northern plains, and the boundary of his empire ran along the Himalayas. On his coins appears the figure of the goddess Haimavati. Kamarupa (Assam), Nepal, and Kartripura (Kumaon and Garhwal) are said to have been tributary kingdoms situated on the frontiers of his dominions. The literature of the period shows that the Himalayas were a part of India, and the people were familiar with it. Kalidasa in the Raghuvamsa says that Raghu conquered areas to the north of the Himalayas, from Hemakuta (Kailas) to Kamarupa, thereby suggesting that this Indian kingdom (which is now Assam) stretched even beyond the Himalayas. His Kumarasambhava opens with a verse in which the Himalayas are referred to as a measuring-rod spanning the whole land from the east to the western sea—a metaphor suggesting that the culture developed in the Himalayan regions could serve as the measuring-rod of the cultures of the world.

अष्टुत्तरस्य विष्णु देवता हिमालयः नाम नगाभिराजः। पूवानिरी तोवंतरी वगाशः रिख्त: पृथिब्य: इत्व मानदशः॥ asty uttarasyam disi devatatma himalayo nama nagadhirajah purvaparah toyanidhi vagahya sthitah prthivyav iva manadandah

The Himalayas are said by him to be the source of precious gems and medicinal herbs. His graphic descriptions of the Himalayan scenes read like those of one who has first-hand knowledge of this region. Another drama, written perhaps by a younger contemporary of Kalidasa, the Mudrarakshasa, states that the empire of Chandragupta II Vikramaditya extended from the Himalayas to the southern ocean.

The Gupta empire was finally destroyed by the Huna invaders from Central Asia, but their power was in turn broken by Yashodharman, king of Malwa, in about 530 A.D. The Mandasor pillar inscription says that his authority was acknowledged over the vast area bounded by the Himalayas in the north, the Mahendra mountains in the south, the Brahmaputra in the east and the ocean in the west. Harsha, who became king of Kanauj in 606 A.D., also established a vast empire in northern India. Banabhatta says that he exacted tribute from “an inaccessible land of snowy mountains”—obviously some Himalayan state. At the assembly he organized at Kanauj in honour of the Chinese pilgrim Hieun Tsang, one of the tributary kings present was the king of Kamarupa. Hieun Tsang has given an account of all the Indian kingdoms through which he passed. Immediately south of the Hindu Kush mountains was Kapisa, ruled by a Kshatriya king. East of the Sindhu, the first important state was Kashmir. It consisted not only of what is now Kashmir but also a considerable part of the Punjab. East of the Yamuna lay the kingdoms of Mo-li-pa-lo, Suvarnagotra, Nepal and Kamarupa. Mo-li-pa-lo is Mar-po, the actual name of Ladakh. Suvarnagotra was a state in the Himalayas which was said to be ruled by women.

After Harsha, a Tibetan king, Sron-btran-sgam-po, annexed Nepal, defeated the usurper who had occupied Harsha’s throne, and occupied Tirhut. But this Tibetan occupation of Indian territory was short-lived. In 731 Yasovarman, one of the later rulers of Kanauj, sent an embassy to China, probably to seek the assistance of the Emperor of China against his enemies in India. But nothing came of this mission, and Yasovarman was defeated by the king of Kashmir, Lalitaditya Muktapida.

Tibetan and Chinese influences, in fact, never gained a permanent footing on the Indian side of the Himalayas throughout the centuries of Hindu rule in India. The Himalayan regions often changed hands, but it was almost always between Indian rulers. Only once—and that too for a very short period—did a part of this territory come under Tibetan sway. Ladakh was an Indian state, and its kings traced their descent from the Sakya family. Spiti was ruled by Hindu rajas who bore the surname or suffix of Senas. In the possession of the Parasuram temple at Nirmand is a copper-plate deed, probably of the 7th century A.D., granted by Raja Samudra Sena. The Kulantapitha Mahatmya mentions two Rajas of Spiti by name, belonging to the 7th century. They too have the suffix of Sena. Garhwal seems to have been, in the later period, part of the kingdom of Brahmapura. The earliest dynasty of which records exist is that of the Katyuris. Hieun Tsang wrote that in Kamarupa (Assam) the chief ruler was a Hindu, Bhaskaravarman, who claimed to be a Kshatriya. That this kingdom was a large one which included most of what is now the North-East Frontier Agency is established by evidence derived from various sources. Ptolemy, the Egyptian geographer who wrote in the 2nd century A.D., describing “India beyond the Ganges”, refers to the Dobassa mountains, which are the eastern extremity of the Himalayas. In the Kalika Purana it is said that the Kamakhya temple (situated near what is now Gauhati) was in the centre of Kamarupa; and it is added in the Vishnu Purana that the kingdom extended round this temple in all directions for 100 yojana or about 450 miles. Even allowing for

---

1. It may be mentioned, as a matter of curiosity, that according to Tibetan medieval chronicles, the founder of the Tibetan royal dynasty was the son of an Indian king.
exaggeration, this would include the whole of present Assam, East Bengal and even Bhutan. This is borne out by Hieun Tsang, who estimated the territory of Kamarupa as being 10,000 li, or an area with a circumference of 1667 miles.

It was indeed, from the north-west and not from the north that India was successfully invaded. The Moslem conquest of India was really begun in the last quarter of the twelfth century by Mohammad Ghuri. For the next five hundred years, various Moslem rulers established their authority right up to the Himalayas. In fact, the northern boundary of India dwindled in significance, attention being centred more on the north-west. Two Moslem rulers tried to conquer Tibet and push their frontier beyond the Himalayas. In 1205, Muhammad bin Bakhtiyar crossed into Tibet via Assam with a large army. He is said to have reached “the open country of Tibbat”, but thereafter he was obliged to retreat, and on his way back was routed by the King of Kamarupa. In 1325, Muhammad Tughlak sent another expedition, but this one perished in the Himalayan passes. The disastrous results of these two efforts served to limit the territorial ambitions of Indian rulers to the Himalayas. To the Moguls, these mountains were a natural barrier imposed by God, to be watched carefully but not to be crossed. But they extended their authority up to them. Babar’s authority was that of a pioneer and, therefore, rootless; and the rule of Humayun, who for a time even lost his throne, was always weak. But Akbar had by 1576 consolidated Mogul authority in these Himalayan areas. Thevenot, a French traveller who visited India in 1666, wrote that the province of “Ayoud or Haoud” contained “the most northern countries that belong to the Great Mogul”. Ayoud and Haoud have been interpreted by Cunningham as corrupt forms of Himavat, which the Greeks called Emudos and Imaus. This seems the correct interpretation, and not that “Ayoud” is Oudh, for Thevenot mentions certain areas as being part of Ayoud which we know were not in Oudh. But even if the latter interpretation is accepted, it does not nullify the conclusion that the Mogul empire in this region extended up to the Himalayas, for the Ain-i-Akbari says that the northern boundary of Oudh province was the mountains. Military officers called faujdars were stationed all along the Himalayan border to keep the turbulent hill chiefs under control and to collect tribute from them.

More varied was the history in this period of the areas at the two extremities of the northern frontier—Kashmir and Assam. They were both parts of India, and there were clearly contacts between them. The Rajatarangini, the Kashmir chronicle of the 12th century, mentions that Samdhimat and Lalitaditya Muktapida visited Kamarupa. But the Moslem rulers did not find it as easy to subdue these two areas as they had found the rest of northern India. In 1586, Akbar annexed Kashmir, but Ladakh remained independent. In 1640, she went to war with Tibet and acquired the whole of Ngari Khorsum (south-western Tibet) including Mount Kailas and Lake Manasarowar. But a few years later, the fortunes of war swung the other way, and Ladakh was forced in 1664 to accept the suzerainty of the Mogul and seek his military assistance. Emperor Aurangzeb sent an Army which defeated the Tibetans, but when the Mogul army retired, the Tibetans returned and imposed terms on King Delegs Namgyal. He seems to have surrendered Spiti, which had by this time become part of Ladakh, but promptly received it back as part of the dowry on marrying the Tibetan commander's daughter. Ngari Khorsum was returned to Tibet, but the village of Minsar was retained. From about 1690, the gyalpos or chiefs of Ladakh began to pay tribute to the governors of Kashmir.

In Assam, the Hindu kings—the Varman, the Salastambha and the Pala dynasties—found themselves, from the eighth century onwards, under the pressure of the Ahoms, a branch of the Shan tribe. Finally, in 1228, the kingdom came under the rule of Chukupha, who is said to have been the first to assume for himself and his people the name of Ahom—"the peerless"—and to have given this name, now softened to Assam, to the country. The new rulers successfully resisted Muslem efforts to subdue them. In 1554, the Ahom ruler adopted the Hindu religion and changed his name, Chatamba, to Jaiyadhaja Singh. From then onwards, the Ahom kings always took Hindu names; and the Ahom Shans, adopting the language and customs as well as the religion of the conquered people, became absorbed in the Hindu fold. Aurangzeb sought to conquer Assam; but though the Ahom raja surrendered in 1662, he regained his territory four years later.

In the 18th century, European Powers entered the Indian political scene, but as they moved in from the sea-coasts, they did not at the beginning affect the northern frontier regions of India. Though the Mogul empire was disintegrating, central and northern India remained in Indian hands. The central sector of the Himalayan range was the boundary of the kingdom of Oudh, while west of it sprouted small kingdoms, whose only visitors were pilgrims to Hindu shrines and whose chief article of commerce was ice for the courts. In 1801, Wellesley first thrust British influence into Oudh, and it gradually increased and culminated in annexation by Dalhousie in 1856. In the early years of the 19th century, the Gurkhas of Nepal had occupied Garhwal and the neighbouring hill states, and turning their attention to the plains came into clash with the British. War dragged on for three years, from 1813 to 1816, till the Gurkhas were finally defeated; and by the Treaty of Sagauli, the Raja of Nepal recognized British sovereignty over these border areas. In the Punjab, Ranjit Singh had set up a strong Sikh kingdom. In 1818-19, he occupied Kashmir; and between 1834 and 1841, Ladakh was conquered by Gulab Singh of Jammu, then a feudatory of the Sikhs, and annexed to his kingdom. In 1841, one of Gulab Singh's generals invaded western Tibet. He was defeated and expelled, but when the Tibetans, with the aid of the Chinese, advanced to Leh, they were in their turn driven back. A peace treaty was signed in 1842. Four years later, Kashmir came under the suzerainty of the British. Gulab Singh was recognized as the Maharaja of the whole area, including Ladakh; but some months later, Spiti was taken over by the British in exchange for certain other territory, and added to Kulu district. The Punjab itself was finally annexed by the British in 1849.

Assam was annexed in 1838. But in the north, east and south, there were numerous tribes over whom the Ahom rulers had gradually lost control. The British policy was one of acquiring loose political control over these areas, with the minimum of interference compatible with the protection of these tribesmen and restraining them from raiding either Indian or Chinese territory. Administration had gradually to be pushed up into these regions, and the frontier between Assam and Tibet ascertained. This was not just a question of political division. The tribesmen in the north—the Monbas, Akas, Daflas, Miris, Abors and Mishmis—were ethnically different from the Tibetans. Towang inhabited by the Monbas had been part of India for centuries and Tibetan influence had grown in it only since the early years of the nineteenth century.

The leaders of the Aka tribes bound themselves in 1842 and 1844, in return for stipends, to maintain the peace. Over forty years later, in 1883, they raided a forest office, and a military expedition was despatched against them. They, however, only surrendered in 1888, and signed an Agreement under which their stipends were to be restored after a probation of two years. Thereafter, they kept the peace, and when Nevill visited the area in the winter of 1913-14, he found the rajas and people friendly. “The most excellent relations,” he reported, “were established with the Akas. I believe this friendliness will be permanent”. But less amenable from the start were the Daflas. Though they agreed informally in 1835, 1937 and 1852 to curb their raiding activities, they did not desist from attacking their fellow-tribesmen living on the plains. In 1874-75, the British sent a military force into the hills. There were no disturbances after that, but nor was there any cordiality towards the British. When Nevill’s mission visited the area in 1913, it was ill-received and he even opened fire on one occasion.

With the Miris and Abors, two tribes in close relation with each other, the British were at first on friendly terms. But there was a conflict in 1848 and a serious raid ten years later; and a British military expedition into the hills was turned back. A second expedition was sent the next year and the Abors overawed into submission. Three treaties were signed between November 1862 and January 1863, and a fourth in 1866, with various branches of the tribe. One curious feature of the agreements with the Abors was that the stipends were to be in kind, of articles such as hoes and salt which could be distributed among the whole community. It was in a sense a recognition of the democratic nature of the Abor system of government. In 1893 they attacked an outpost, and in consequence an expedition was sent. It was by no means a success. The Abors were never really subdued, and in March 1911, an Assistant Political Officer who ventured into the area was murdered. Once more an expedition was sent to punish the Abors and exact reparation, and advantage was taken of the occasion to ascertain the frontier with Tibet.

In the north-eastern corner of India lived the Mishmi tribes. The British concluded no written engagements with them, and despite numerous raids for long took no stricter measures than occasional blockades. In 1899, what Lord Curzon termed a “miniature army” was sent, but with little result. In 1910, it was learnt that the Chinese had occupied Rima in Tibet, entered the Delei valley in Mishmi country and planted their flag at Menilkrai also in Mishmi territory. The Assam Government, therefore, recommended that the Mishmis should be brought definitely under British control. A friendly Mission was sent in 1911, and as Tibetan settlements and influence were discovered round Walong, road-building was commenced and British administration carried into this area.

The British, therefore, took nearly seventy-five years to secure all the territory that had been formerly parts of Assam. But by 1912-13, the administration of this northern region of Assam had been established sufficiently to necessitate the formation of two large units, the Sadiya and Balipara Frontier Tracts. Sufficient information about the frontier had also been acquired to enable the definite delineation of the Assam-Tibet boundary. Throughout the tribal areas, whatever the difficulties of the British administrators, normally their problems were not complicated by the presence of Tibetan influence and control.

Indeed, this broad survey of the frontier areas from the earliest days down to modern times shows that India's present northern frontier is along its whole stretch the historic frontier. Few, if any, land frontiers in the world can claim as strong a sanction of long and unbroken tradition

Historical Division
Ministry of External Affairs.
2. The precise nature of the Chinese claim to Indian territory has not been stated by Chinese authorities and is not known to the Government of India. In the Chinese maps some parts of Indian territory have been shown as part of China. These areas are roughly indicated by standing lines in this map and the southern border of these areas as they appear in Chinese maps has been shown by a broken line.

2. The places on the traditional indo-Chinese border whose status have not been clearly marked in the map. So in the road built by China across Aksai Chin in Ladakh in North West India.
NOTES, MEMORANDA AND LETTERS EXCHANGED BETWEEN
THE GOVERNMENTS OF INDIA AND CHINA

NOVEMBER 1959—MARCH 1960

WHITE PAPER No. III

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
NOTES, MEMORANDA AND LETTERS EXCHANGED BETWEEN
THE GOVERNMENTS OF INDIA AND CHINA

NOVEMBER 1959—MARCH 1960

WHITE PAPER No. III

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS LIBRARY

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

L18/EA/62
On 16 November 1959, the Prime Minister presented to Parliament the Second White Paper containing the notes, memoranda and letters exchanged between the Government of India and the Government of the People's Republic of China since September 1959. This White Paper contains the notes, memoranda and letters exchanged between the two Governments since 4 November 1959. It also contains 3 earlier notes which had not been included in the previous White Paper.

Ministry of External Affairs,
New Delhi.
29 February, 1960.
CONTENTS

Border issues and incidents

1. Memorandum of the Chinese Government (Kongka Pass), 12 November 1959
2. Memorandum of the Chinese Government (Kongka Pass), 14 November 1959
3. Note of the Indian Government (Kongka Pass), 24 November 1959
4. Memorandum of the Chinese Government (Kongka Pass), 28 November 1959
5. Note of the Indian Government (Kongka Pass), 13 December 1959
6. Note of the Chinese Government (Kongka Pass), 5 February 1960
7. Letter from the Prime Minister of China to the Prime Minister of India, 7 November 1959
8. Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China, 16 November 1959
9. Letter from the Prime Minister of China to the Prime Minister of India, 17 December 1959
10. Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China, 21 December 1959
11. Note of the Chinese Government, 26 December 1959
12. Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China, 5 February 1960
14. Letter from the Prime Minister of China to the Prime Minister of India, 26 February 1960

Sino-Indian boundary disputes

15. Note of the Indian Government, 5 December 1959
17. Note of the Indian Government, 22 February 1960

Territorial air space

20. Note of the Chinese Government, 21 December 1959

Territorial waters

23. Note of the Indian Government, 5 December 1959
24. Note of the Chinese Government, 21 December 1959
Complaints of the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Document Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>19</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 6 November 1959</td>
<td>103</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 16 November 1959</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 27 November 1959</td>
<td>106</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>22</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 5 December 1959</td>
<td>107</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 17 December 1959</td>
<td>108</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Alleged Kuomintang propaganda in India

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Document Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>24</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 29 October 1959</td>
<td>109</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 5 December 1959</td>
<td>110</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Treatment of Indian representatives and nationals

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Document Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>26</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 29 October 1959</td>
<td>111</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>27</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 6 November 1959</td>
<td>112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>28</td>
<td>Letter given by the Consulate General of India to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Lhasa, 21 December 1959</td>
<td>114</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 22 December 1959</td>
<td>115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 31 December 1959</td>
<td>118</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 31 December 1959</td>
<td>120</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32</td>
<td>Note of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Lhasa, 25 January 1960</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Alleged restrictions on the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Document Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>33</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 27 January 1960</td>
<td>124</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 2 February 1960</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 19 February 1960</td>
<td>129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>36</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 27 February 1960</td>
<td>136</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Premises occupied by the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Document Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>37</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 18 December 1959</td>
<td>137</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 15 January 1960</td>
<td>139</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 6 February 1960</td>
<td>140</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 6 February 1960</td>
<td>142</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Addendum

Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China, 4 March 1960

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Document Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>41</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 27 October 1959</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 16 November 1959</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>43</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 15 January 1960</td>
<td>147</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Addendum

Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China, 4 March 1960

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Document Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>44</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 27 October 1959</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Memorandum given to the Indian Ambassador in Peking by the Chinese Vice-Minister Chang Han-fu, 12 November 1959

The Chinese Government has now received a report from the Sinkiang frontier guards that the Chinese frontier guards are prepared, at a time between November 13 and 15, and at a point on the track on the southern bank of the Changchenmo River and three hundred meters to the east of the Silung Barma River (approximately 78°59'30" E, 34°18'15" N), to deliver the three armed Indian personnel detained on October 20, the seven Indian soldiers captured on October 21 and the bodies of nine Indian soldiers to the personnel to be despatched by the Indian side for the taking over. The arms and ammunition of the Indian troops which were captured by the Chinese frontier guards will also be returned at the same time.

The Chinese Government agrees to the proposal made in the Indian Embassy's memorandum of October 27 that three Indian police officers, twenty Indian constables and twenty porters come, with twenty transport ponies and carrying a white flag, to take back the Indian captured personnel and the bodies of the Indian soldiers, and also agrees that they carry with them a small number of rifles for self-protection. In order that the handing-over may proceed smoothly, the representatives of the Chinese frontier guards are prepared to meet the representatives of the Indian side (no more than ten persons including the staff) at 11.00 hours Peking time on November 13 at the above-mentioned spot to consult first on the specific time and method for the handing-over. The representatives of the Chinese frontier guards will be led by Captain Liu Shao-tsi. If, for technical reasons, the representatives of the two sides should fail to meet at the above-mentioned appointed time, the time can be postponed to 11.00 hours Peking time on November 14, or to 11.00 hours on November 15. After the meeting between the representatives of the two sides, all the Indian captured personnel, bodies of Indian soldiers and arms and ammunition can be delivered to the Indian personnel who are to take them over on the same date.

It is requested that the above be transmitted to the Indian Government at once.
Memorandum given to the Indian Ambassador in Peking by Vice-Minister Chang Han-fu, 14 November 1959

The following are the main facts about the border incident of October 20 and 21 in the area south of Kongka Pass as admitted by the Deputy Commander of the Indian force Karam Singh and the other eight Indian soldiers, Mohd Khalil, Sonam Dorje, Rulia Ram, Sring Nalbu, Gur Bahadur, Abdul Majit, Rudar Ban, Shiv Diyal who were detained or captured in the incident. These main points fully confirm the account of this border incident given by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs in its memorandum of October 22, its note of October 24 and its statement of October 26.

1. The Indian military personnel involved belonged to the Indian Tibet Boundary Force under the Indian Ministry of Home Affairs. They were led by Commander S. P. Tyagi and Deputy Commander Karam Singh. They started from Leh towards the end of September for Tsogstsalu, Kiam and Shamal Lungpa to the northeast of Kongka Pass, to set up check-posts there, and arrived at Kiam on October 19. They had never been to the place before where the present clash occurred south of Kongka Pass.

2. On October 20, Mohd Khalil, Sonam Dorje and a guide called Chadan were sent from Kiam to the area south of Kongka Pass. Khalil and Dorje were each issued a rifle, 10 rounds and a field-glass. They admitted that they were sent for the purpose of reconnoitring the conditions of Chinese troops within Chinese territory. At 13.00 hours that afternoon, they were discovered by 3 patrolling Chinese frontier guards. The Chinese frontier guards shouted to them and waved to them to go away. The Indians failed to do so, and were then detained.

3. On October 21, Tyagi and Karam Singh took more than 60 Indian troops to the area south of Kongka Pass to search for the three missing armed Indian personnel. Before starting, Tyagi expressed he had a mind to fight against Chinese troops. The Indian military personnel carried with them four bren guns and about 50 rifles, as well as two or three sten guns and 25 hand grenades.

4. When the Indian military personnel approached a hill in the area south of Kongka Pass, they discovered six Chinese soldiers on the hill. Tyagi ordered Karam Singh to take 30 men with him to the back of the hill and himself proceeded in front with 30 men to surround and capture the Chinese soldiers. They saw one or two Chinese soldiers waving their hands for them to go away. Instead of going away, they pressed forward.

5. Then Indian soldier Ali Raza fired first. Another Indian soldier Manohar Lal caught a horse of the Chinese frontier guards. Thereafter, fire was exchanged.
6. The Chinese soldiers were equipped with no mortar and other artillery. They were armed with rifles, tommy guns, light machine guns and hand grenades.

7. The 9 Indian military personnel were killed while they were attacking uphill.

8. The detained and captured Indian military personnel admitted that they had been given good treatment by the Chinese officers and soldiers during their detention.
The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note which the Ministry handed to the Embassy on November 4, 1959, in regard to the incident in the Chang Chenmo Valley. A first-hand account of the incident, received from the second in command of the Indian police patrol party, was attached to that note. The Government of India have since received further accounts of the incident from the Indian personnel who had been captured by the Chinese forces on October 20 and 21 and released after several reminders on November 14. These accounts corroborate the earlier reports which had been given by the members of the Indian police patrol party who had returned to the base after the clash.

2. The Government of India would also like to refer to a constable named Makhan Lal who remains still unaccounted for. According to the statement of Shri Karam Singh, he and constable Rudra Man were made by the Chinese forces after the clash on October 21 to carry Makhan Lal, who had sustained injuries, for a distance of 2 miles. They were then made to leave behind Makhan Lal on a river bank. What happened subsequently to him is not known to any of the released personnel. The Government of India would like to have any further information which the Chinese authorities might have about Makhan Lal.

3. The Government of India are surprised and shocked to hear of the treatment to which the Indian prisoners were subjected by their captors. The prisoners were kept in torn tents in bitterly cold weather and without any bedding for four days. As a result of this, the leader of the party, Shri Karam Singh, and three constables were severely frost-bitten. One of the prisoners, Constable Abdul Majid, who had a bullet wound on his back, received no medical attention until the fourth day. Besides, the prisoners were subjected to continuous interrogation from the time of their arrest till the time of their release. They were asked under threats and pressure to make statements to the effect that the Indian party had gone forward knowingly into Chinese territory and that they had sent two constables and a porter the previous day to carry out espionage there. The Government of India have no knowledge of the statements which the prisoners are supposed to have made to the Chinese authorities, but, obviously, statements made under such circumstances cannot be regarded as voluntary.

4. The Government of India protest strongly against the deplorable treatment to which the Indian personnel were subjected while in Chinese custody. Under Article 17 of the Geneva Convention of August 12, 1949, relating to the treatment of prisoners of war, a prisoner of war is only bound to give his surname, first names and rank, date of birth and army regimental, personal or serial number, or failing this, equivalent information. No physical or mental torture, nor any other form of coercion, may be inflicted on prisoners of war to secure from them information of any kind whatever. Prisoners of war who refuse to answer may not be threatened, insulted or exposed to unpleasant or disadvantageous treatment of any kind. Whether or not the Geneva Convention applies to the Indian personnel taken prisoners by the Chinese forces on October 21, it is obvious that they should not have been subjected to treatment worse than to which prisoners of war are entitled. It is most regrettable that the Chinese authorities should have subjected the Indian prisoners to interrogation, threats and harsh treatment in order to compel them to make statements desired by their captors.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given to the Indian Ambassador in Peking by the Chinese Vice-Foreign Minister, 28 November 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China, and, with reference to the note delivered on November 24, 1959 to the Chinese Embassy in India by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, has the honour to reply as follows:

In its memorandum of October 22, its note of October 24 and its statement of October 26, the Chinese Government gave detailed and incontestably correct accounts of the border incident which occurred at the Kongka Pass on October 20 and 21, 1959. The facts admitted by the captured Indian military personnel are in agreement with the accounts given by the Chinese Government. On November 14, the Chinese Government handed over to the Indian Embassy in China a written material setting out the facts admitted by the captured Indian military personnel and drew the attention of the Indian Government to it. It is proved by the material that the report of the Second-in-Command of the Indian police patrol party attached to the Indian Government's note of November 4 is completely inconsistent with the facts.

Out of traditional Sino-Indian friendship and humanitarian considerations, the Chinese Government on the third day after the Kongka Pass incident already took the initiative in notifying the Indian Government that it was prepared to let the Indian side take back the captured Indian military personnel and the bodies of the Indian soldiers. The Chinese Government is gratified that they were handed over to the Indian side smoothly on November 14. However, the Chinese Government cannot but be surprised that, at a time when the Kongka Pass incident is drawing to a close and the two governments are actively exploring avenues to eliminate border clashes, the Indian Government should create a side issue by levelling a groundless charge and even lodging a protest against the Chinese Government on the pretext of so-called "deplorable treatment" of the captured Indian personnel. The Chinese Government categorically rejects this protest of the Indian Government.

Throughout the period of their custody, the Indian military personnel were given friendly and generous treatment by the Chinese frontier guards. The Kongka Pass area was difficult of access and hard to get supplies, yet the Chinese frontier guards did their utmost to look after them in various ways. A few of the captured Indian personnel got frost-bitten. That was because their own outfits were very thin. As soon as the Chinese frontier guards obtained supplies, they issued to them cotton-padded suits, felt boots, beddings and articles of daily use, and gave them necessary medical treatment. In respect of board and lodging, they were treated in no way inferior to the Chinese frontier guards themselves. They were quartered in warm underground rooms or in complete new tents. The assertion that they were kept in torn tents is a pure fabrication. The Indian Government's statement in its note that Abdul Majid had a bullet wound in his back and went without medical attention for four days is also inconsistent with the facts. Majid never indicated that he was wounded or ill. As a matter of fact, his movements showed that he was whole and sound. The captured Indian military personnel all expressed more than once during the period of their custody that they were well treated. When they were handed over to the Indian side to be taken back, they all expressed warm thanks.

It is normal that the Chinese frontier guards conducted necessary interrogation of the captured Indian personnel to make clear the facts about the armed Indian personnel’s trespass and provocation, as this was their duty. The captured Indian personnel were finally interrogated once again; this was only because there were important discrepancies between the report attached to the Indian Government’s note of November 4 received by the Chinese Government and the facts as told by the captured personnel, and it was necessary to check it up with them. It is also merely for this reason that their handing back was postponed several days. The interrogations of them by the Chinese frontier guards were always made in a free and unrestrained atmosphere; so-called pressure or threats was completely out of the question. The Indian Government’s allegation in its note that the Chinese frontier guards subjected the captured personnel to threats and pressure in the interrogations and gave them harsh treatment is an utterly unwarranted charge.

The Indian Government in its note expressed the hope of receiving any information which the Chinese side might have about an Indian military personnel who was unaccounted for. On November 13 when the representatives of the frontier guards of the two sides discussed on the border at the Kongka Pass the concrete steps of handing over the captured Indian military personnel and the bodies, the Indian representative also made the request that the Chinese frontier guards search for the body of that Indian military personnel for the Indian side. The Chinese representative agreed then to make a further search. The Chinese frontier guards made an active search at and about the spot of the incident but still found nothing. It could be affirmed that this Indian military personnel was not on Chinese territory. The following day, the Chinese representative informed the Indian representative of the result of the search, and expressed the hope that the Indian side might search on its own territory. The Indian representative agreed to this.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 13 December 1959

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note of the 28th November presented by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China to the Ambassador of India in Peking. The Government of India have now received full details from the released Indian police personnel as to the incident at Kongka Pass and the subsequent treatment to which the Indian personnel were subjected while in Chinese custody. These details confirm the account of the incident contained in the earlier notes. The statements of the released prisoners entirely contradict the assertion in the Chinese note that the Indian personnel were given friendly and generous treatment by the Chinese frontier guards. On the contrary the treatment which the Indian prisoners received was most harsh and inhuman and opposed to all canons of civilised behaviour. A text of the statement made by Shri Karam Singh, who was the leader of the Indian police party, is attached to this note. This statement is corroborated in substance by other members of the Indian party.

2. It will be seen from Shri Karam Singh's statement that the Indian prisoners were denied adequate food and shelter. It also appears that Shri Karam Singh was subjected to interrogation on 12 days for a total period of nearly 70 hours. Under threats and prolonged interrogation, he was made to subscribe to certain statements which his captors wanted him to make. He was further made to repeat similar statements on subsequent occasions so that these statements could be tape-recorded. Attempts were made by the Chinese frontier guards to re-enact the incident at Kongka Pass with the forced participation of the Indian prisoners with a view to taking photographs which could be used presumably as evidence in support of the Chinese version of the incident. Similarly, photographs of the prisoners arranged in various poses were taken presumably to show that the prisoners enjoyed certain facilities and amenities while in Chinese custody. The Government of India must state that no credence whatsoever can be given to any statement made by Shri Karam Singh or any other Indian prisoner in these circumstances. The certificates of good treatment which the prisoners might have given their captors at the time of release are equally valueless.

3. The Government of India are also surprised at the statement in the Chinese Government's note that Constable Abdul Majid was "whole and sound" and "never indicated that he was ill". In fact, Constable Abdul Majid received a bullet injury in the encounter and even now he has a splinter in his back. No medical attention was given to him for the first few days, and terrified at the treatment to which the arrested personnel were being subjected, he did not ask for medical care.

4. The note of the Chinese Government suggests that they are unaware of the whereabouts of Constable Makhan Lal, who still remains unaccounted for. It will be seen from the statement of Shri Karam Singh that Constable Makhan Lal had received an abdominal injury and was helped by him and Constable Rudra Man to walk a distance of nearly two miles. He was then left by the Chang Chenmo river in the custody of two Chinese soldiers as ordered by the Chinese escort. It is extraordinary that the Chinese authorities should now profess ignorance as to the whereabouts of Constable Makhan Lal. The Government of India would request that enquiry be made of the Chinese frontier guards once again as to the circumstances in which Constable Makhan Lal was left behind on the Chang Chenmo River on the 21st October and what happened to him subsequently.

5. The Government of India once again record their emphatic protest against the deplorable treatment to which the Indian personnel were subjected while in the custody of the Chinese soldiers. This treatment which the Indian personnel received was much worse than that to which even prisoners of war are entitled under the Geneva Convention of 12th August, 1949. It is obvious that the reports which the Chinese Government have received from their frontier guard, both about the incident and about the subsequent treatment of the Indian personnel, are entirely unrelated to facts. The Government of India would urge that adequate action be taken against the persons responsible for subjecting the helpless Indian prisoners to such inhuman treatment.

The Ministry of External Affairs take the opportunity of extending to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Statement of Shri Karam Singh

I reached Hot Springs on the 19th October, 1959. On the 20th morning, two parties of two constables each and the third of two constables and a porter were sent out to reconnoitre the area. Two parties returned but the third one, consisting of Constables Khalil and Sonam Dorje and Porter Chettan failed to do so. The same evening search parties were sent out to look for them but they returned without any success.

2. Next morning (21st October 1959), I decided to go out and search for the men myself. Shri Tyagi also accompanied me. We left with a party of about 20 men, including a section and some personnel of the ITB Force. We left instructions for the main party to follow on foot.

3. After I had gone about five miles to the east of Hot Springs, I noticed hoof marks which appeared to be those of the Chinese horses. We followed these hoof prints for a few hundred yards. We also observed the area through binoculars but we noticed nothing of special interest. After the main party had joined us, we advanced further into the plain which was over-looked by a hill. The hoof prints appeared to be running along the right of this hill. I, therefore, decided that I would, with about 20 men, follow them to find out whether there were any Chinese introducers in the vicinity. I told Tyagi to wait with the main party until I returned and to keep a look out for any signs of the Chinese; if he saw any, he was to demand the return of our missing members and to ask them to leave Indian territory.

4. I, along with Jemadar Rulia Ram, Head Constable Man Singh, Head Constable Babu Wadkar and Constables Abdul Majid, Gur Bahadur, etc., followed the hoof prints which went along a track skirting the hill on our left. As we did not apprehend any danger, we were not marching in any order but were moving in twos and threes. I was not even carrying a weapon. When I had covered about six to seven hundred yards, and had almost passed the hill on the left, one of my constables noticed some movement in front along a nullah and shouted "Chini, Chini". I looked at all sides but before I could spot anything in front, I noticed on my left a Chinese soldier on the hill shouting something and waving his hands upwards as if he was asking us to raise our hands and surrender. I shouted back at the top of my voice that it was our area. Instead of receiving any answer, we were fired upon both from the front as well as from the hill top. We were taken by complete surprise and so all the members of the party made for such cover as was available and returned the fire. Some retreated towards the hill on the right. Jemadar Rulia Ram, Constables Abdul Majid, Ali Raza, Gur Bahadur, Beg Raj and Norbu Lama ran with me and we took shelter behind a mound. Some of the others ran towards the hill on the left but were struck down with bullets and hand-grenades. Our firing was ineffective as we had inadequate cover and the Chinese were in a favourable position. After some time I ordered those who were near me to discontinue firing as their firing was having no effect and the ammunition was being wasted.

10
5. The Chinese continued to fire on us almost incessantly. We could also hear firing on the other side of the hill. Constable Ali Raza made a bid to get away in the afternoon and although he was fired upon, was able to escape. The Chinese used LMGs, rifles, tommy guns and hand-grenades. At about 5 P.M., firing from the front increased in intensity and a few bren-gun bursts were fired at us from our right and Constables Beg Raj and Norbu Lama were killed. Realising the overwhelming superiority in numbers of the Chinese soldiers and their fire power, I thought that it was futile to resist any further and, therefore, decided to surrender. We raised a white handkerchief after which the Chinese stopped firing and asked us to drop our weapons and advance towards them with our hands raised. I, accompanied by Jemadar Rulia Ram, Constables Abdul Majid and Gur Bahadur surrendered to the Chinese. Later, Constables Shiv Dayal, Rudra Man and Tsering Norbu, who were apparently lying concealed elsewhere, also surrendered and we were all herded together.

6. When we were being searched etc., I looked around and I thought there were about 30 Chinese soldiers in position on the hill. The soldiers that were on the side of the nullah were no longer visible to me. After our search, we were sent to Kongka Pass with an escort of 11 Chinese soldiers.

7. From the place of the encounter, five of us were made to carry the dead body of a Chinese soldier who had been killed. Constable Rudra Man and I were asked to help Constable Makhan Lal, who had been injured seriously in the abdomen. His condition was really very bad. We carried him for two miles, where the Chinese soldiers ordered us to leave him on the bank of the Chang Chenmo river. Two of the Chinese soldiers stayed back near Makhan Lal and nine escorted us to our destination. From this place, I and Constable Rudra Man were made to carry heavy loads. We were completely exhausted and were finding it extremely difficult to walk with this heavy load but we were repeatedly prodded by rifle butts to move on. We reached the Chinese Kongka La Post (above 16,000 ft.) at about 2 A.M. on the 22nd of October, 1959. We were all put together in a pit, 6 feet deep, 7 feet wide and 15 feet long, normally used for storing vegetables. It was covered with a tarpaulin which left several openings through which ice-cold breeze penetrated. We had to spend the night on the frozen ground without any covering. No water for drinking was provided nor were we permitted to ease ourselves during the night and the following day. The sentries adopted a menacing attitude.

8. On the morning of October 23rd, all of us were taken out of the pit for the first time and taken to a place about two miles towards Lanak La. We remained there the whole day and returned to the pit at night. We do not know why we were kept away from the camp that day. During the day, I was merely asked through an interpreter to write out the names of the captured persons but I expressed my inability to do so for want of spectacles. I told the Chinese officer to take down the names, which he did.

9. On the evening of 24th, I was again taken out in a truck to a distance of about one mile, where the dead bodies had been laid out and I was asked to identify them. As I could not identify all of them, I suggested that some Constables may be called to help me in identification. They brought me to the camp and asked me to select a couple of constables. We went back along with two constables—Shiv Dayal and Gur Bahadur—and identified the bodies. After this, we rejoined the others in the pit.
10. For the first 3/4 days, we were given only dry bread to eat. The intensity of the cold and our conditions of living were more than sufficient torture to demoralise us. By then I and 3 constables were suffering from frost bite and our repeated requests for medical attention and hot water were disregarded.

11. At about 4 A.M. on the 25th of October, 1959, I was called by two Chinese officers and taken for interrogation. I was removed to a tent about 50 yards away, where 5 Chinese officers, including an interpreter, interrogated me. One of them, at the very outset, threatened that I was a P.O.W. and that I could be shot dead any moment. He also warned me that they did not want any arguments or discussions. They asked me to write out my statement, to which I pleaded my inability as I did not have my spectacles with me. At first, they asked me to narrate the entire incident. As soon as I came to the point that firing was opened by the Chinese, their senior officer present became wild and shouted back that it was incorrect, and that I must confess that the Indians fired first. I refused to accept this despite repeated and constant threats that I would be shot dead. Ultimately, they made me say that I could not judge at that time as to who fired first.

12. They asked me to admit that Indian soldiers seized Chinese horses, which were standing near the foot of the hill towards Chang Chenmo river. As I was on the other side of the hill, I told them that I had not seen anybody taking away the horses. Despite this, it was recorded that my men had disclosed to me that some Indian constables had taken away the Chinese horses.

13. Utmost pressure was used to extort from me that Tyagi and I knew beforehand that the place, where the incident took place, was within Chinese territory. I told them that I could not make that statement because that place was miles within Indian territory but they continued to assert that it was Chinese territory and was in Chinese occupation. In this connection, it was finally recorded that “I have now come to know that the area, where the encounter had taken place, is under Chinese occupation”.

14. The Chinese wanted me to acknowledge that no member of the ITB force had ever visited that particular area. I told them that only in June this year, an ITB patrol had gone up to Kongka Pass and stayed there for a day or so. They wanted to know if I myself had ever visited Kongka La and when I said that I had not, after a considerable discussion, they recorded—“I and my men (who were prisoners with me), had never visited this area”. I insisted that they should also write that I camped several times at Hot Springs and had toured the adjoining areas, but they did not agree to include this.

15. As regards the objective of our patrol, they wanted me to admit that we intruded into their territory to attack and capture the Chinese as well as to establish a checkpost. I stated that we had no such intention. In any case, it was our territory and the question of intrusion into the Chinese territory did not arise. On this assertion, they threatened me, but I stuck to the position that we were in Indian territory and were looking out for the missing men. They then said that when fire was opened on us Tyagi and the main party were on the left of the hill and were advancing further in order to surround it. I told them that I could not see anything on the other side of the hill, and, therefore, there was hardly any point in obtaining a statement to this effect from me. As far as I remember, they finally recorded that though Tyagi did not tell me anything, it might be that it was his intention to send us from the right side and himself proceed on the left side in order to surround the hill and capture the Chinese.

16. The Chinese were emphatic that I should admit that they had gesticulated to us from the hill to go back. I told the senior Chinese officer, through the interpreter, that my party was advancing in small groups following the hoof marks and that the forward group with me had noticed some Chinese in front. Whereas it was quite correct that for a moment I noticed some gesticulations from a Chinese on the hill to my left, no time was given by the Chinese soldiers, to understand and to respond to the gesticulations.
In fact, I had, at the top of my voice, shouted that it was our area. The answer to this was firing from in front and the hill to the left and rear. The Chinese officer lost his temper on this and said I was a cunning liar and threatened to take out his pistol and shoot me. I tried to argue that if their intention was to ask us to go back then they should also have allowed the patrol party to return and not have captured them. I told them that, in fact, the Chinese soldier was gesturing to us to raise our hands and surrender and that is why I had shouted back that it was my area to which the reply was a hail of bullets. In the statement, the Chinese recorded that one of the Chinese soldiers on the hill had given a signal indicating that we should go back and not adopt a hostile attitude.

17. I was asked to admit that our action was against the spirit of ‘Panch Sheel’. I told them that it was they who had opened fire on us; it was they who had violated the principles. Ultimately, they recorded ‘that the incident was against the spirit of ‘Panch Sheel’’.

18. When they asked me my rank, I told them that I was a Deputy Superintendent of Police and was the Second-in-Command of the ITB Force.
Shri Tyagi was the Commander of the ITB Force. I had already decided to conceal the fact that I was the leader of the party to avoid interrogation about the police and Army dispositions and I had warned those captured with me to refer to me as the Deputy Commander. The total number of men in the party that had left Hot Springs in the morning was about 60 and this was recorded.

19. This interrogation lasted from 4 A.M. to about 4 P.M., with short breaks for meals, etc. By this time, I was almost frozen and mentally and physically exhausted because of cold, persistent interrogation, intimidation, threats and angry shoutings, and lack of sleep. In this condition I was compelled to sign the statement recorded by the Chinese. At the end of this interrogation, the Chinese then brought all the other captured personnel before me and read out the statement, sentence by sentence. I was asked to translate each sentence in Hindustani. All the captured personnel were asked to append their signatures on the back of the statement and several photographs were taken.

20. After this interrogation, I was separated and put in a tent where insufficient bedding was provided. The tent had a big opening at the top round the central pole to act as a chimney but as there was no fire in my tent, this hole made the tent unbearably cold.
21. My interrogation was continued in my tent on the 26th from 0730 hours to 1700 hours. I was also told that my interrogation would continue the next day and until it was concluded, I would not be provided with a proper bedding.

22. On this day I was made to sign the following statement, as far as I can remember:

“Tyagi returned after having a meeting with Mr. Sharma in New Delhi on the 22nd September, 1959. I returned from Srinagar on the 24th September, 1959. Tyagi informed me that a decision had been taken to establish checkposts at Tsogstsalu, Kayam (Hot Springs) and Shamul Lungpa. We left Leh for patrolling the border area and for establishing checkposts at these places. Tyagi left Leh on 27th September, 1959 while I started on the 29th September, 1959. Tyagi had about 40 men with him. Three constables accompanied me. I reached Phobrang on the 4th October. Tyagi arrived on the 5th of October, 1959. Tyagi started from Phobrang for Tsogstsalu on the 7th October. I left Phobrang on the 14th October and arrived at Tsogstsalu on the 16th October, 1959. A checkpost was established at Tsogstsalu however, I had to establish one at Shamul Lungpa. On 21st October, 1959, Tyagi took 60 men and reached the hill (battle field). When we were at a distance of about 400 yards from the hill, some Chinese were seen. Tyagi ordered me to take some men on the back side of the hill and to surround the Chinese and himself went in front. There were some 30 men with me and about the same number with Tyagi. We surrounded the hill. A Chinese was seen waving his hand so as to say “go away and do not adopt hostile attitude”. I have heard from my men that the Indian soldiers fired first. Some Indian soldiers took away the horses of the Chinese.”

23. I protested that as regards firing, none of my men had told me that Indians fired first but they rejected the plea and said that they had obtained confessions to that effect from other captured personnel. When requested to confront them with me, I was told that as I was a prisoner I had no such right. Similarly, I pointed out that the story of surrounding the hill etc. was also not correct but to no avail.

24. My interrogation started next day (27-10-59) at about 0800 hrs. and it lasted for about three hours. The entire period was devoted to ascertaining from me the details of the ITB organisation.

25. My interrogation was resumed at 0800 hrs. on the 28th October, 1959, in my tent by three Chinese, two of them were officers and the third an interpreter. The interrogation lasted 5 hours and was confined to ascertaining the details of the checkposts.

26. Information was also obtained from me in regard to the strength of the checkposts, arms and their functions and was duly noted down in their own language.
27. The same afternoon, all of us were taken to the Chang Chenmo river where the dead bodies had been laid out. We were asked to remove their uniforms and wrap a muslin cloth in accordance with Indian custom. At our request hot water was supplied to give a bath to the dead bodies. A number of photographs were taken while we were busy in this operation.

28. In the evening, they issued us the following items of clothing:

(i) Cotton-padded coat.
(ii) Cotton-padded pant.
(iii) Cotton-padded caps.
(iv) Namda Gum boots.

I did not take these because items offered to me did not fit. Either on this day or the next a doctor examined my feet which had swollen up and administered an injection. Photographs were taken.

29. On the 29th morning at about 0900 hrs. the interpreter came to my tent and delivered some sweets as a gesture of goodwill. After sometime, a new face together with the previous officers and the interpreter came to me. This time, two stenographers had also been brought to take down my statement. This officer introduced himself as Commander of the Tibetan area. His questions were confined to details regarding our check-posts and their strength. I repeated the details as given on the previous day. He also enquired about the strength of the army. The Chinese disclosed to me, for the first time, that the Foreign Ministries of both the countries were in correspondence with each other about us (captured persons). The interrogation lasted for about 2 hours. I was not made to sign any statement.

30. At about 1300 hours on the same day (29-10-59), I was taken out of my tent together with Constable Shiv Dayal and escorted by three Chinese soldiers to the scene of the incident in a truck. The new officer, who had examined me in the morning, occupied the front seat of the truck and four other officers sat with us in the rear. After reaching the place, I was made to stand, even though it caused me intense pain, near the base of the hill on the Hot Springs side and was ordered to point with my hand towards the hill and a photograph was taken, (as if I was pointing towards the Chinese who were on the top of the hill). I was then taken to the base of a small mound behind which we had taken shelter when fire was opened on us. Constable Shiv Dayal was asked to take a lying position about 50 paces away from me towards the hill. I was given a handkerchief and asked to wave it as if to give a signal to the men to open fire. A snap was then taken. Constable Shiv Dayal was then taken to the place where one of the killed ponies was lying and another photograph was taken together with the dead pony. Then, the senior officer drew a sketch of the hillock and the adjoining area showing positions of the Indian and the Chinese soldiers at the time of the encounter according to the Chinese version and got the same signed by me and Constable Shiv Dayal. Photographs were also taken of a few Chinese soldiers gesticulating from the hill. Late in the evening we returned to the camp.

31. My interrogation was resumed on October 30 morning at about 0800 hrs. and it lasted up to 1300 hrs. They questioned me again about the strength of each post. They also obtained my signature on a statement to the effect that the post at Hanley was established in June this year.

32. On November 1, interrogation started in the morning as usual. The senior officer had by then gone away. The other Chinese officers and the interpreter pursued the interrogation. I was asked how we could claim this area when we had never visited it. I told them that I had myself gone beyond Lingzi Thang with about 10 persons in 1957 and up to Shamul Lungpa in 1958 where we had established a checkpoint which remained there throughout the summer and was withdrawn during the winter. They asked me if we had set up any boundary pillar at Shamul Lungpa or Lingzi Thang and I told them that we had not done so because our boundaries extended hundreds of miles further. The interrogation lasted for about 5/6 hours. The following statement was briefly recorded and signed by me:

"In 1957, I visited Lingzi Thang with 10 men and stayed there for a few days. In 1958, I visited Shamul Lungpa, where we stayed for four months. On this occasion also there were about 10 men with me. We did not construct any huts at any place nor did we construct any boundary pillar at these places."

The Chinese said that Phobrang was our last post, and that we had no right to cross Marsimik La because the entire area beyond the pass was a part of Sinkiang and that this could be verified even from the older residents of Ladakh. I told them that our claims were based on authentic documents and, therefore, our maps were correct. They disposed of my argument by saying that our claims were based on demarcation by the British, who had usurped a lot of territory of Sinkiang and Tibet. They ridiculed our maps and said that these could be drawn by anybody while sitting at home. It was on this day that I was repeatedly asked about my maps and documents. I told them that I did not bring any such papers with me because I was well conversant with the area. The Chinese showed great anger during this discussion.

33. On the morning of November 2 at about 10.00 hrs., all the captured persons were brought to my tent. The interpreter then asked them in my presence whether it was a fact that all the dead had received bullet injuries in front which indicated that they were wounded while advancing towards the Chinese. To this, they replied in the affirmative. They said that they had wrapped up the bodies themselves and had actually seen the wounds. I was asked to attest their statement. I resisted, but was made to sign the following:

"All of our men had received wounds in the front during the battle which indicated that they were wounded while advancing towards the Chinese."

34. Afterwards those who had bathed the dead bodies disclosed to me at the first possible opportunity that in fact the injuries sustained by our men were on the front, back and sides and some had parts of their heads blown off.

35. The same afternoon we all were taken out in the sun and made to sit in a semi-circle. Two watermelons were cut and distributed amongst us and a photograph was taken.
36. On November 3, the Chinese asked me to sign the following statement:

“Chinese troops were armed with rifles, Tommy-guns, LMGs and hand-grenades only. No heavy artillery or mortars were used by them during the battle.”

I appended my signature as automatic weapons and hand-grenades had been used against my party and I was not aware whether any mortar had been used.

37. There was no further interrogation. In the afternoon we were taken out in the sun and given a lecture on the Sino-Indian friendship. On this occasion, I was pointed out to a new person dressed as a Chinese soldier. This person replied in the negative after looking at me. Later, this man was heard conversing in Ladakhi and remained at the camp throughout our stay there.

38. On the morning of November 4, interrogation started at about 08.00 hours. Only the interpreter examined me. He insisted that I should record in my own hand-writing the main points of the statement I had already signed. I pleaded I could not do so without my spectacles, but when he urged me again and again, I told him that as I was a prisoner they could force me to do anything, but it was not fair in view of their professed friendship for India. Ultimately, I scribbled down the following prepared statement which the interpreter had brought with him:

“On 20-10-59, two of our men missed. Tyagi took about 60 men with him. I accompanied him. When we were at a distance of about 400 yards from the battle field a few Chinese were seen. Tyagi ordered me to take some men on the back of the hill. He himself proceeded to the front. We surrounded the hill. I have heard from my men that Indian soldiers fired first. Some horses of the Chinese were taken away by Indian soldiers. I have nothing but to thank the Chinese officers and soldiers for the kind treatment that they had given us. Medical facilities were provided to us and we were neither beaten nor coerced.”

39. The same afternoon I was again interrogated by the Chinese officers and the interpreter. They brought a statement for my signature which included a sentence that on the 21st October, 1959, when we left our camp, Tyagi had disclosed that he was determined to fight the Chinese. I refused to sign it. They then took me down to a nullah threatening me on the way that they would dispose of me there. They threatened that I and my men were guilty of having killed their Second-in-Command and therefore, it would be quite legal for them to shoot me. When I did not yield, he compromised to change the wording “Tyagi might have had an idea to fight the Chinese”. It was extremely cold in the nullah. I was almost dying with pain in my feet and so I agreed to sign the amended statement which was as follows:

“On 20-10-59, two of our men missed. Tyagi took 60 men with him with heavy arms including four Bren-guns, four Sten-guns, about 50 rifles and hand-grenades. I also accompanied him. Tyagi might have had a mind to fight against the Chinese. We surrounded the hill where a few Chinese were seen. According to our men, Indian soldiers fired first. According to Shiv Dayal, Constable, it was Manohar Lal, Constable, who took away the Chinese horses."

40. After that I was taken back to my tent and I was given a quilt. But in spite of this quilt the cold in the tent, where I had been kept since October 25, was so intense that I requested that I should be sent to the pit and this was conceded.

41. Right from the 25th October, 1959, pressure was brought to bear on me daily to confirm that Constable Mohd Khalil and his companions had been sent to Chinese territory for spying and that our object was to establish a checkpost in Chinese territory. After the first two or three days, they dropped the question of the checkpost and said that I might confess to the espionage mission. I told them that this was not a fact but that the patrol had been sent out to ascertain whether there were any Chinese patrols on Indian territory. They told me that they had already obtained a confession to this effect from Constable Mohd Khalil and all that they needed from me was confirmation. I did not have to sign any statement to this effect.

42. On the same day, the Chinese officer, drew a sketch of the encounter on the same lines as was done by their senior officer on October 29th, but on a bigger scale. After completing the sketch, signatures of all of us were obtained. My photograph was taken as I was signing.

43. On the afternoon of November 5, I was again taken out for interrogation which lasted three hours. Particulars of my service after partition were ascertained. On this day, the interrogator addressed me as the famous man of Ladakh.

44. On November 6, they took us all to the Chang Chenmo river, I sat on the bank of it and the others were asked to stroll along the river in a leisurely manner. The escort was kept away and a movie picture was taken in order to show that we had freedom of movement.

45. On the morning of November 7, we were again taken to the bank of the river where a Chinese Officer using a Ladakhi interpreter and Constable Shiv Dayal as Hindi interpreter, gave a lecture on communism, condemning landlordism and capitalism. A rosy picture was painted of the communist regime. During the same lecture, it was prominently brought out that even now when India was a free country, the British and the Americans owned a number of industrial concerns and that there were still a number of Indian capitalists and landlords. The lecturer said that he hoped that India would get rid of these evils and prosper on the lines of China.

46. In the evening (November 7), I was taken out from the pit to a tent and informed that Constable Abdul Majid had confessed that the first shot was fired by Constable Ali Raza of our force. I refuted this and said that Constable Abdul Majid be called to state this in my presence. Consequently, Abdul Majid was summoned and when questioned in my presence, he said that what he had actually stated was that Constable Ali Raza had fired back long after the Chinese had opened fire. On this, the Chinese officer got enraged and threatened to thrash Abdul Majid. He lost his nerve and admitted that Ali Raza had fired first. I was then forced to sign the following statement:

“Constable Abdul Majid had stated that it was Constable Ali Raza who fired first. I believe that his statement is correct.”

Then Constable Shiv Dayal was brought before me and was asked to confirm his statement that the Chinese horses had been taken away by Constable Manohar Lal. Shiv Dayal insisted that he had not said so rather he had stated that he saw Constable Manohar Lal touching a Chinese horse. On this, the Hindi interpreter was sent for, who also confirmed the statement of Constable Shiv Dayal. Therefore I refused to sign the prepared statement in possession of the Chinese interpreter which was that according to Shiv Dayal, Constable Manohar Lal had taken away the Chinese horses. Instead, I signed a statement as follows:

“According to Constable Shiv Dayal, Manohar Lal, Constable of the ITB Force was seen touching a Chinese horse. I believe what he states is correct.”

47. Another lecture on Communist indoctrination was given on the morning of November 8.

48. At about 6 P.M., was segregated from my companions and taken to a tent nearly 50 yards away. They then disclosed to me that the Government of India in their note to the Chinese Government had admitted that I was the Officer Commanding of the ITB Force. As I had from the very beginning given myself out as the Deputy Commander, I tried to modify the statement by giving the following explanations:

(a) That I was a Deputy Superintendent of Police and so was Shri Tyagi. In his absence, I was always called as Officer Commanding.

(b) My promotion was due and it was possible that my Government may have promoted me since.

I was not made to sign any statement in this regard.

49. After this I was returned to the pit and Jem. Rulia Ram and Constable Shiv Dayal were taken to the tent for further interrogation about my exact designation. Jem. Rulia Ram on return informed me that the Chinese tried to argue with them that I was older than Tyagi in age and so how was it that Tyagi was senior in rank to me. They maintained that I was the second-in-command.

50. In the afternoon of November 9, we were informed that another senior officer had arrived and that we would be produced before him to make our statements.

51. It was either on November 9th or on the 10th morning that at about 08.00 hours the Chinese took away Jem. Rulia Ram, Constables Shiv Dayal, Abdul Majid and Mohd. Khalil informing them that they were to be released. In fact, they were not being released but were taken to the place of incident where a number of snaps and a cine film were taken to show that the Indian party had attacked the Chinese. They also took:
along the dead body of the Chinese soldier in a coffin and it was used during the filming.

52. At about 8 p.m. on November 10th, I was again taken out of the pit and escorted to a tent by two Chinese sentries who threatened to shoot me. Only one mattress was provided. My interrogation was immediately begun by one officer and an interpreter. They repeatedly threatened me to accept that I had sent the patrol into Chinese territory for spying but I refused to agree. They kept on interrogating me the whole night through; and as I was given insufficient bedding, I was in great agony from the cold and pain in my feet.

53. At about 0700 hours, I was compelled to write out the following myself:

“I and Tyagi started for patrolling of the border for establishing checkpost at Tsogtsalu, Hot Springs (Kayam) and Shamul Lungpa on 29th and 27th September, 1959. We established a checkpost at Tsogtsalu and arrived at Hot Springs where also we established a checkpost. On the morning of 20th, our two men missed. Tyagi took about 60 men, 4 Bren-guns, about 50 rifles, 4 sten-guns and hand-grenades. I accompanied him. Tyagi may have had a mind to fight against the Chinese. (They wanted me to write that Tyagi was determined to fight but I did not agree). I went to the back of the hill. We surrounded the Chinese. A Chinese was seen waving his hand so as to say “Go away; do not adopt hostile attitude”. According to Constable Abdul Majid it was Constable Ali Raza who fired first. According to Constable Shiv Dayal, Constable Manohar Lal was seen touching a Chinese horse. Chinese troops used only rifles, sten-guns, LMGs and hand-grenades during the fight. They did not use any heavy artillery or mortars. ITB Force knows that area north, south and east of Kongka Pass is a part of China. I and my men had never visited this area (battle field) before”.

54. The interrogation was continued till about 1100 hours when I was made to add the following paragraph to my statement:

“I and my men have been given good treatment by the Chinese Officer and soldiers. I will never do anything which is against the five principles of the Sino-Indian Agreement any more nor I will enter Chinese territory again.”

55. Before concluding, I was told that my statement would be tape-recorded sometime that day and that I must answer questions exactly as in the statement written out by me. I was feeling very depressed and did not refuse to comply.

56. In the evening at about 1600 hours, a new face, reported to be their senior officer, came into my tent together with the interpreter. He also brought a doctor along who dressed my frost-bitten feet and movie and still pictures were taken. After this, a tape recorder was brought in my tent and the following conversation was recorded:

Q: Give brief details of the incident?

A: On the morning of 20th, a few of our horses were found missing and we sent two Constables and a Coolie in search. They did not return. On the morning of 21st, Tyagi and I started for their search with about 60 men. We had four bren-guns, three or four sten-guns, about 50 rifles and hand-grenades.

Q: What was Tyagi’s intention?

A: He did not express his intention to me although inference could be drawn that he may have had an intention to fight.

Q: Who fired first?

A: According to Constable Abdul Majid, Constable Ali Raza fired first.

Q: Do you know some Chinese horses were taken away by the Indian soldier?

A: According to Constable Shiv Dayal, Constable Manohar Lal was seen touching a Chinese horse.

Q: Did the Chinese use any heavy artillery or mortar?

A: Chinese soldiers had rifles, tommy-guns, bren-guns and hand-grenades. No heavy artillery or mortars were used by them.

Q: Did you and your soldiers surround the Chinese soldiers?

A: Yes.

Q: What did the Chinese do when they were surrounded?

A: The Chinese soldier was seen waving his hand.

57. At this stage, I was told that further questioning would be done the next day.

58. On the night between November 11 and 12, all my companions were taken out one by one from the pit for tape-recording their statements. Before they were actually taken each one of them was properly tutored and warned that he must stick to the statement that had already been signed.

59. After my statement had been tape-recorded, I was returned to the pit on the 11th evening and proper bedding was provided.

60. There was nothing of particular interest the next day.

61. On November 13, at about 1500 hours, we were all taken out of the pit. All of us were given a small towel each, sweets and cigarettes in the presence of a senior officer. Both movie and still pictures were taken. Then we were taken to another tent where a meeting was held. A tape-recorder had been fixed in this tent. The senior officer said that we would be released the next day but before that he wanted to hear our ideas and views, especially about the incident. I was asked to speak first in Hindustani. When asked about the incident, I said “One cannot clap with one hand alone and there is no fight without mistakes on both sides. Both sides should be careful in future”.

62. After that Rulia Ram and Shiv Dayal spoke briefly. There was nothing of interest in Rulia Ram’s speech. Constable Shiv Dayal said, if the Chinese had not captured their men, this encounter would not have taken place as they had no plan to come in this direction. At this stage, as the Chinese felt that in my presence the men were not making statements to their liking. I was asked to go back to my pit and rest there. On the 13th evening, I was persuaded to accept the Namda boots which I did.

63. On the morning of November 14, we were woken up at 0400 hrs. and asked to get ready. A meal was served at 0430 hours. We were informed that we would be released at 10.00 hours, Peking time. We were taken in trucks to the place of handing over. The dead bodies and our arms and ammunition were also taken.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China to the Embassy of India in China, 5 February 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs on December 13, 1959, has the honour to reply as follows:

With regard to the Kongka Pass incident and the friendly and generous dealing with and treatment of the captured armed Indian personnel by the Chinese side after the incident, detailed accounts were given by the Chinese Government in its successive memoranda and notes delivered to the Indian Government. The Chinese Government thought that, with the related facts clarified and the matter itself a thing of the past, there was no reason for either side to stir up once again a dispute over this question. Unexpectedly to the Chinese Government, however, the Indian Government, following its note of November 24, 1959, handed over another note on December 13, 1959 attaching with it a statement of Karam Singh which distorts the facts in many respects, reiterated various groundless charges against the Chinese Government about the treatment of the captured armed Indian personnel, and published this note and statement. The Chinese Government cannot but deeply regret the fact that the friendly treatment given by the Chinese side to the captured armed Indian personnel should have been distorted to serve as material for anti-Chinese propaganda. Nevertheless, the Chinese Government still took a responsible attitude, and made repeated serious investigations into the related facts; it has received from the Frontier Guard Unit of the Chinese People's Liberation Army stationed at the Kongka Pass a “report on the intrusion and provocation by armed Indian personnel and handling of the captured armed Indian personnel.” In order to clarify the facts, this responsible report and the statements made by the armed Indian personnel during their capture are attached herewith, and reply is given to the Indian Government's note of December 13, 1959 as follows:

1. In its note, the Indian Government asserted on the basis of the statement of Karam Singh that the captured armed Indian personnel were subjected to “deplorable” and “inhuman” treatment during their custody. The Chinese Government absolutely cannot agree to this assertion. The unshakable facts are that the Chinese frontier guards, in line with the Chinese People's Liberation Army's tradition of giving magnanimous treatment to prisoners and in the interest of Sino-Indian friendship, made continuous efforts to overcome all sorts of difficulties and gave the captured armed Indian personnel such good treatment as was possible under the conditions then and there.

The Kongka Pass area not only has a severe climate but is also remotely situated and difficult of access so that it was extremely difficult to bring up supplies. All this is known to the Indian Government. Further, the occurrence of this incident was totally unexpected to the Chinese side. Therefore, it is entirely conceivable that the Chinese frontier guards stationed at the Kongka Pass should in the first few days have great difficulties in providing food, lodging and heating for the captured armed Indian personnel. Nevertheless, they still did their best to look after the captured armed Indian personnel. At the same time, the Chinese side brought up various supplies for them as quickly as possible from a distance of several hundred kilometers. As the clothing of the captured armed Indian personnel themselves was very thin, the Chinese frontier guards issued them cotton-padded suits, beddings, felt boots and articles of daily use as soon as the supplies arrived. With respect to lodging, since there were no houses at all in the locality, they were quartered in a comparatively warm underground room and new tents. They were given exactly the same food as that for the Chinese frontier guards, which was adequately and timely supplied. Medical treatment and care was given to those among them who were already frost-bitten at the time of their capture. The Chinese frontier guards also carefully preserved the bodies of the dead Indian personnel, and, in accordance with the custom of the Indians, bathed them with hot water and wrapped them up in white cloth. The responsible report of the Chinese frontier guards stationed at the Kongka Pass attached to this note contains a detailed account of the treatment received by the captured armed Indian personnel, which sufficiently explains the actual situation at the time. Although in his statement attached to the Indian Government's note of December 13, 1959 Karam Singh made all sorts of distortions and false colouring of the living conditions during the period of custody, they cannot stand up to the test of the facts and are themselves full of contradictions. For instance, except for the morning of the first day when they ate dry rations because there was no time for cooking, the captured armed Indian personnel always ate hot meals with the staple food made of fine grain. Again, after the Chinese frontier guards obtained supplies, they regularly issued the captured Indian personnel sugar, black tea, cigarettes and other articles of daily use; this was absolutely not, as Karam Singh asserted, done incidentally for the purpose of taking photos. Again, Karam Singh described the underground room as being very cold and horrible, yet he admitted that later he requested on his own accord to move back to this "ice-cold pit" and not stay in a tent such as the Chinese frontier guards lived in. If the treatment received by the captured armed Indian personnel had indeed been "deplorable" and "inhuman" as described by Karam Singh, it would have been incomprehensible how, after 23 days of custody, they could still be affirmed as being in sound health by the Indian representative at the time of handing over and how, during the period of custody, they could several times happily and of their own accord gather together to sing and dance. Just from these two extremely simple facts, one can judge that the assertion that the treatment which the captured armed Indian personnel received was "most harsh and inhuman and opposed to all canons of civilized behaviour" is totally untenable.

2. In its note, the Indian Government, in disregard of the facts, further describes the statements made by the captured armed Indian personnel to the Chinese frontier guards as forced confessions made under "threats and prolonged interrogation," and attempts by such an assertion to overthrow these statements completely. However, this attempt will not succeed. The Chinese People's Liberation Army has a tradition of treating prisoners magnanimously, and especially of refusing to get forced confession from prisoners. In this case of the captured armed Indian personnel, the Chinese frontier guards have also all along adopted a practical and objective attitude in checking up the facts with them, but never forced them to make any statement against their will, let alone subjecting them to pressure and threats. Although many such phrases as “threat to be shot dead,” “utmost pressure,” “persistent interrogation” were used in Karam Singh's statement attached to the note of the Indian Government as a pretext for overturning the statements made during their custody, it is not difficult to discern the following facts by comparing and analysing the responsible report of the Chinese frontier guards and the statements made by the armed Indian personnel during their capture, which are attached to the present note, and the latest statement of Karam Singh handed over by the Indian Government on December 13, 1959:

(1) Before the interrogation of the captured armed Indian personnel began on October 25, 1959, the Chinese side had already tried its best to satisfy their daily needs so far as local conditions at the time permitted and let them rest for three days. Afterwards, their living conditions were continuously improved. In the course of the interrogation, constant care was taken to give them food and necessary rest and keep them warm; and they had never been treated as prisoners. Even the latest statement of Karam Singh which distorts the facts in many ways cannot completely deny these facts. If the Chinese side had really wanted to subject the captured personnel to threats and get forced confessions from them, it is certain that it would have been absolutely impossible for them to receive such treatment. Karam Singh asserts that the Chinese frontier guards told him that he would not be provided with proper bedding until his interrogation concluded, refused to allow him to confront the other captured personnel, repeatedly threatened to shoot him, etc. But all this was entirely inconsistent with the fact. Moreover, Karam Singh himself goes on the admit that bedding was given him before long, and that he confronted the other captured personnel. It can be seen from this too that no credence can be given to these assertions of Karam Singh.

(2) During the first interrogation on October 25, 1959, Karam Singh already gave the basic facts of the entire Kongka Pass incident. Although at that time he was still evasive about one or two important points, such as the fact that the Indian armed forces fired first, yet on the following day he admitted that “some Indian soldiers took away a horse of the Chinese soldiers” and that “the Indian soldiers fired first.” Throughout subsequent interrogations, Karam Singh never tried to deny the facts he admitted during the above-mentioned two interrogations. If the Chinese side had subjected Karam Singh to various threats and pressure and he had put up firm resistance against such threats and pressure, it would have been impossible for preliminary interrogations to yield the above-mentioned result. The only logical explanation is that since both parties to the conversation had been participants and eye-witnesses of the clash, Karam Singh could not but frankly admit these facts. Moreover, although he harboured certain apprehensions at the beginning and made reservation on individual points, yet in the fact of the friendly attitude of the Chinese side, his apprehensions quickly vanished.

(3) The information given by Karam Singh and the other captured armed Indian personnel was indeed given of their own accord, and not under compulsion, this is also borne out by the following facts: firstly, they gave many facts which had been unknown to the Chinese side and which, therefore, it was utterly impossible for the Chinese side to force them to admit. For instance, on October 27, Karam Singh specifically described how Tyagi received instructions from his superior Mr. Sharma, Deputy Director of the Indian Ministry of Home Affairs in charge of border questions, to proceed to Shamul Lungpa and set up a check-post there, and then returned to Leh on September 24, 1959. Secondly, as for the facts which he firmly refused to admit, the Chinese side, though being in possession of reliable material, did not press him. For example, the Indian Government formally informed the Chinese Government that Karam Singh was Commander of the I.T.B.F., yet he only admitted himself to be Deputy Commander. Regarding such an important fact, the Chinese Government all along respected his own statement, and did not insist that he correct it.
It can thus be seen how incredible is the allegation that the statements of the captured armed Indian personnel were made under threat and coercion.

(4) The interrogation would have come to an end when the basic facts of the Kongka Pass incident had been established after the first few interrogations. But the Indian Government repeatedly issued statements and on November 4, 1959 delivered a note to the Chinese Government, putting forth an account of the clash, which was diametrically opposite to the incident as understood by the Chinese side. In view of this, the Chinese Government could not but adopt a responsible attitude, further made a detailed check up with the captured personnel and collected necessary evidence. It is obviously unacceptable to describe such interrogation and check up as “threats” and “prolonged interrogation”.

(5) Actually, the statement of Karam Singh attached to the Indian Government’s note cannot negate or reduce the soundness of the statements made by the captured armed Indian personnel to the Chinese frontier guards; on the contrary, it in a way further proves that what the latter statements gave were indeed the facts. The latest statement of Karam Singh, in an attempt to relieve the Indian side of its responsibility for the clash, tries hard to distort in various ways the course of the incident. Yet, in so doing, it has inevitably landed in an extremely ridiculous position, being full of inconsistencies and contradictions. Its evasive wording still cannot help revealing the following unshakable facts: On October 21, 1959, the whole party of armed Indian personnel, about sixty in number, led personally by its Commander and Deputy Commander, set out to look for three missing persons. When they found hoof prints of Chinese horses they immediately traced them without hesitation; on reaching the vicinity of the hill where the Chinese patrolmen were, they divided themselves into two parties and continued to advance along the two sides of the hill.
Karam Singh’s party “in twos and threes” (that is to say, in loose order for attack) “almost passed the hill”—that is, actually outflanked to the back of the Chinese patrolmen. At that time Chinese soldiers not only were discovered by them, but were the first to call out and wave hands to them.
As to the number of Chinese soldiers, although Karam Singh says that he “thought” there were about 30, actually he saw only 11. After shooting started, a number of armed Indian personnel kept advancing on the hill guarded by the Chinese patrol, and even got so close to the Chinese patrol that they could be struck down by hand-grenades. The Chinese patrol did not use mortars or other heavy weapons. The above points admitted not only refute the Indian Government's previous allegations that the Chinese frontier guards opened fire without warning, that they used mortars, that they, mounted on horses, advanced on the Indian troops, etc.; they are in full conformity with the statements made by the captured Indian personnel to the Chinese frontier guards. Judging by these facts alone, it is clear that the Kongka Pass clash was entirely started by the provocation made by the armed Indian personnel who, relying on their superior strength, encircled and advanced upon the Chinese patrol.

It can be seen from the above-mentioned facts that the allegations that the statements of the captured Indian personnel were entirely made under threats and pressure and that therefore "no credence whatsoever can be given to them," they are "valuless," etc., are groundless.

3. The Indian Government insisted in its note that Abdul Majid had a bullet wound and received no medical treatment. Nevertheless, the unshakable fact is that throughout the period of custody, Abdul Majid not only never asked for medical treatment, but moved about like a sound person. The Chinese Government cannot understand how he could still walk back to Indian territory without difficulty after being detained for 23 days, if he really had had a fairly serious wound.

4. As to the armed Indian personnel who is unaccounted for, the Chinese Government has repeatedly stated that Chinese frontier guards searched many times but failed to find this armed Indian personnel within Chinese territory. After receiving the Indian Government's note of December 13, 1959, Chinese frontier guards repeatedly made search but still could not find him.

In view of what has been stated in the above paragraphs, the Chinese Government must again reject the charge and protest made by the Indian Government in its note and categorically cannot accept its request for action against the Chinese personnel concerned. In order to help clarify the related facts, the Chinese Government encloses herewith, for the reference of the Indian Government, the responsible report on the intrusion and provocation by armed Indian personnel and the handling of captured armed Indian personnel submitted by the Chinese frontier guard unit stationed at the Kongka Pass and the statements made by the captured armed Indian personnel while they were on Chinese territory.

Before concluding this note, the Chinese Government would like to reiterate that it has never had the intention to argue endlessly with the Indian Government over the Kongka Pass incident. Its closest concern is only to prevent the recurrence of similar unfortunate incidents. Although the facts prove that responsibility for this incident does not in any way lie with the Chinese side, the Chinese Government and Chinese frontier guards have at no time had any ill-will against the Indian Government and Indian frontier guards. They hope that no such incident causing the loss of precious lives on both sides will recur. In view of this, the Chinese Government would like to express its eager desire that both sides would argue no more about the matter which has become a thing of the past, and that they, instead, actively devote all their energies to speedily consulting and agreeing on effective measures so as to ensure the tranquillity of the border between the two countries and consolidate friendship of the two countries.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
ANNEXURE I

(1) How the armed Indian reconnoitring personnel trespassed into our territory and were arrested.

At one o'clock p.m. on October 20, 1959, when three of our patrolmen were on routine patrol duty within our territory south of the Kongka Pass and east of the Silung Barma River, they found two armed Indian personnel carrying rifles and field-glasses and a civilian who had unlawfully crossed into our territory for reconnaissance. Our patrolmen immediately waved their hands and called on them to withdraw from Chinese territory. But the Indians refused. Thereupon, our patrol party, doing their best to avoid a clash, finally succeeded by peaceful means in urging them to put down their arms, took them back to the outpost, and put them under temporary detention.

(2) How the armed Indian troops intruded into our territory and brought about the clash.

In the morning of October 21, 1959, thirteen of our patrolmen, led by Second Lieutenant Tuan Hai-chen, as usual were on routine patrol duty within our territory south of the Kongka Pass and east of the Silung Barma River. When our patrol party came along the Changchenmo River to Height 5,100 within our territory (approximately 79° 2' 10" E., 34° 17' N.), about five kilometers short of the customary international boundary line, about sixty armed Indian personnel, partly mounted and partly on foot, suddenly appeared about 400 meters west of this hill and were penetrating into Chinese territory. As soon as they discovered this unusual act of trespassing, our patrolmen waved their hands and called on the armed Indian troops to withdraw from Chinese territory. Instead of heeding our advice, however, the armed Indian troops, relying on their overwhelming superiority in numbers, divided themselves into two parties of about 30 men each, proceeded in the southern and northern directions respectively to encircle the hill where our patrolmen were, and advanced towards the hill-top in loose order, while shouting loudly "Take these Chinese!" After being encircled by the armed Indian troops from all sides, our patrolmen still continued to wave their hands and called out for the armed Indian troops to withdraw and not to take hostilities. But the armed Indian troops kept pressing forward until their vanguard came within about 30 meters of our patrol party. At 13.09 hours local time, the armed Indian personnel fired the first shot. At that time, our patrol party once again gestured and called out, asking the Indians not to open fire. But the armed Indian personnel followed up by a second shot at 13.19 hours, and took away horses which our patrol party had left at the foot of the hill. At that time, still firmly obeying the order of refraining from shooting until it was finally absolutely necessary for self-defence, and exercising the utmost self-restraint, our patrol party again and again asked the armed Indian personnel to stop shooting. Especially, our deputy squad leader Comrade Wu Ching-kuo stood at the very fringe of the hill-top and waved his hands and called out energetically. But at 13.27 hours the armed Indian troops opened heavy fire on our patrol party. Being at the forefront, our deputy squad leader Comrade Wu Ching-kuo was hit and fell down. It was then 13.29 hours. It was under these circumstances when no room was left that our patrolmen returned fire in self-defence. The clash between the two sides lasted till about 15.17 hours, when the armed Indian troops started to retreat and return to Indian territory. At the two sides of Height 5,100, the scene of the clash, our patrol party captured seven armed Indian personnel, including Karam Singh, who claimed himself to be Deputy Commander of the Indo-Tibetan Boundary Force of India. After the clash, we made a careful inspection of the place of the armed clash and surrounding areas, collected the arms and ammunition left behind by the armed Indian troops, and found the bodies of nine armed Indian personnel.

(3) The treatment given to the captured armed Indian personnel.

To the nine officers and men of the armed Indian troops and the inhabitants of Ladakh who had acted as guide for the armed Indian troops, who were captured successively on October 20 and 21, 1959, we gave generous and friendly treatment, scrupulously adhering to the policy of our Army of treating well captured personnel. Although the number of the captured personnel was fairly great, our stock of supplies was limited, the Kongka Pass area was difficult of access and it was hard to bring up supplies, we still made the utmost efforts to take care of the captured Indian personnel, and at the same time, our higher authorities had supplies brought at top speed from Kashgar on October 28, 1959 to duly satisfy the daily needs of the captured armed Indian personnel.

The Kongka Pass area is over 5,000 meters above sea level, swept by bitter winds and capped by everlasting snows, and there was no house in the surrounding area. To protect the captured Indian personnel from the cold, we let them take a comparatively warm underground room. On October 24, when new tents arrived, we moved part of them into the newly erected tents so that they might not be so crowded. But two days later they said that the underground room was warmer, so at their request we let them move back to the underground room. From the first day they arrived here, we never stopped providing them with means of heating. The only kind of fuel available in the Kongka Pass area was grass roots, of which we had not stored many and which were hard to dig out. Nevertheless, we provided them all along with adequate quantities of grass roots.

Except for Karam Singh who had a cotton-padded jacket, the other captured Indian personnel upon capture had very thin outfits. On the very day when supplies arrived from Kashgar, we issued to each of the captured Indian personnel a brand-new set of cotton-padded suit, cotton-padded cap, quilt, mattress, and felt boots. As Karam Singh originally had a cotton-padded jacket and was further too portly to get a fitting cotton-padded suit and felt boots, we gave him a double issue of bedding instead. Later on we brought up from Kashgar the largest sized felt boots for him.

30
The captured Indian personnel were given exactly the same food as provided to our own men, and even a little better. Except for the first time when there was no time for cooking, and they ate dry rations, they were given three meals a day, with the staple food hot and made of fine grain and a certain amount of meat. In consideration for their habit, we issued them sugar and black tea quite often. In addition, we gave them cigarettes every day and brought them some fruits over a long distance.

Those of the captured Indian personnel who had fallen ill and had been frost-bitten were given all the medical care that was possible. When they were brought to the outpost, we noticed that three of them were frost-bitten in the feet as a result of the thinness of their shoes and socks among them Karam Singh's case was more serious. Our medical personnel tended to them at once and on some days looked after Karam Singh even twice or three times a day. A few who had caught a light cold were also given timely medical care. By the time they were sent back to India, except for Karam Singh who had not yet wholly recovered from his frost-bite, the rest of them were all whole and sound.

The captured Indian personnel were satisfied with the treatment they received here. They indicated that we took very good care of them. They led a very pleasant life, and on more than one occasion rose to sing and dance for joy without any restraint, and even proposed to hold a get-together party with the personnel of our side. It was only due to bad weather that this desire was not fulfilled.

(4) Interrogation of the captured armed Indian personnel.

In order to get a clear picture of all the facts of Indian armed force's intrusion and provocation, we conducted from October 25, 1959 in succession interrogations of Karam Singh and the other captured personnel one by one. In face of the facts, and because both sides were participants in this clash, all the captured Indian personnel concerned from the outset of the interrogation gave of their own accord the basic fact that the armed Indian troops intruded into the Kongka Pass area of China and, relying on their superior force, launched an armed attack on our patrol, thus bringing about the clash between the two sides. Of course, they were not all free from apprehensions for us at the beginning, especially Karam Singh. When we asked him on October 25 about the first shot fired by armed Indian personnel, he evaded by saying, "I don't know which side fired first." His attitude was most likely connected with the fact that he was one of the commanders of the ITBF of India. He was much afraid, lest we would look into his responsibility for this incident. But after we made clear to him the consistent policy of lenient treatment of prisoners followed by our Army, his apprehensions were greatly reduced. On October 26, Second Lieutenant Tuan Hai-chen pointed out to Singh that at the time Singh was situated on a mound south of Height 5,100, and the soldiers led by him, from among whom issued the first shot, were all on the slope in front of him, so he should have been able not only to see but also to hear clearly the shooting of the Indian soldiers. It was very easy to distinguish between the rifles used by the Chinese soldiers and those by the Indian soldiers by the sound of their firing, one being dull and the other sharp. And the sound of that shot was unmistakably that of an Indian rifle. Thereupon Karam Singh promptly admitted that "The Indian soldiers fired first." Later, another captured Indian soldier Abdul Majid explicitly gave the name of the Indian soldier who fired the first shot, and Karam Singh further confirmed this.

After the first few interrogations, the basic facts about the Indian armed force's intrusion and provocation were already confirmed. As we were going to conclude the interrogation, we received from higher authorities successive instructions for us to make detailed check-up with the captured Indian personnel on related facts with reference to the statements repeatedly made by the Indian Government and the Indian Government's note of November 4, 1959 and the report attached to it, because there were considerable discrepancies between the account of the incident given by the Indian Government and the facts known to our side. We immediately made a detailed check-up with the captured Indian personnel. The basic facts and details given by them once more confirmed that our understanding of the incident was correct, while the account of the clash given in the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs of November 4 and the attached report was inconsistent with the facts. As for the capacity of Karam Singh, although the Indian Government repeatedly stated that he was the Commander, yet Karam Singh himself and the other captured personnel insisted that he was Deputy Commander, so we had no way to confirm which statement was more consistent with the fact.

Most of the things admitted by the captured personnel were written out as statements, which were partly in their own handwriting and partly written on behalf of those who were illiterate by other captured personnel, but both categories were signed by themselves. In the case of Karam Singh, because his eye-sight was too weak for writing owing to his age, most of his statements were taken down by us in accordance with his own words and then checked and signed by him; however, two statements were written by himself with efforts. All the statements have been transmitted separately.

Throughout the interrogations, we maintained a calm and reasonable attitude and treated them with courtesy. We only put questions, and let the Indians answer entirely of their own accord. These captured personnel generally adopted a good attitude, were willing to tell us the facts of their own accord, and finally indicated on their own initiative that they would never again encroach upon Chinese territory in the future. Karam Singh also said: "I shall never do anything that is against the Five Principles and Sino-Indian friendship any more and I shall never intrude into Chinese territory once again."

(5) Disposal of the bodies of armed Indian personnel.

After the conclusion of the clash, we made a careful inspection of the area of the clash and discovered altogether the bodies of nine armed Indian personnel. After the identification of the dead bodies one by one by the captured Indian personnel, we registered their names and kept them properly. After receiving instructions from our superiors on October 24, 1959 for us to make preparations to release the captured personnel and hand over the bodies, we further wrapped up properly the bodies of armed Indian personnel in white cloth according to Indian custom, and before doing so, at the suggestion of Karam Singh, we washed each body with hot water.
The release and delivery.

In the morning of November 13, 1959, on instructions from our superiors we met the representative Tyagi and others of the Indian side at a place within Chinese territory on the southern bank of the Changchemno River, 300 meters to the east of the Silung Barma River, and the two sides consulted and made joint arrangements on the details of handing over the captured Indian personnel, the bodies, arms, ammunition and other articles. Tyagi, representative of the Indian side, mentioned that apart from the nine bodies of Indian soldiers, another Indian soldier might have died of serious wound somewhere near the battle-field and expressed the hope that we would search for him. He added that some magazines full of bullets had been buried near the battle-field, and expressed the hope that our side would permit an Indian soldier to search for them in the company of our personnel. Our representative said then that our side had made a careful inspection of the place of the clash and surrounding areas after the clash and only nine bodies of armed Indian personnel had been collected; however, since the Indian side had made the request, our side was willing to make a further search, and also agreed to help look for the magazines.

In the afternoon of the same day, we dispatched an appropriate number of personnel to make another careful search in the area of the clash, but still no trace of the Indian soldier said to be missing was found.

On November 14, 1959, the personnel of the two sides in charge of the handing-over met on time at the place of handing-over (78° 59' 30" E; 34° 18' 15" N) as agreed upon beforehand. The representative of our side, Captain Liu Shao-tsii, first of all told the Indian representative Tyagi about the resultless search made on the previous day, and expressed the hope that the Indian side would make search within Indian territory. The Indian representative agreed to this. Then we handed over to the Indian side all the captured Indian personnel, the bodies, arms, ammunition and other articles one by one as written in the lists. At the same time, the five magazines of bullets which were recovered by an Indian soldier in the bank of Changchemno River were also included into the list of articles being handed over. After checking and finding nothing wrong, the Indian representative signed receipts in the Chinese and English languages, acknowledging the receipt of all the captured Indian personnel, the bodies, arms, ammunition and other articles, and affirmed that the captured personnel were all in good health. The handing-over was completed smoothly at 14.30 hours, Peking Time, that afternoon.

The handing-over proceeded in a friendly atmosphere. The Indian representative Tyagi said that: "The Indian Government and I myself are very grateful to the Chinese people." On parting, the released Indian personnel also expressed repeatedly their gratitude to our side for the good treatment they had received. On parting Karam Singh even raised his arm and shouted aloud "Good bye, Chinese brothers!"
ANNEXURE II

Statements of Armed Indian Personnel Captured in Kongka Pass Incident of Intrusion and Armed Provocation by Armed Indian Forces on October 20 and 21, 1959.

CONTENTS

1. Statement of Karam Singh, October 25, 1959

On 20th October two of the I.T.B.F. soldiers missed. On 21st October, Tyagi, the Commander of the I.T.B.F., and I, the Deputy Commander of the I.T.B.F. led about 60 men, with light machineguns and other weapons, to go out for the search of the two missing men. We suspected very much, though without any evidence, that the two missing men were arrested by the Chinese. Therefore, we went towards the direction where the Chinese are. When we arrived at the vicinity of a hill, some of our men shouted that a few Chinese soldiers were on the top of the hill. Tyagi with his men about 30, approached the hill and spread his men along the foot of the hill. At the same time, he ordered me to go to the back of the hill with my men about 30, and to spread them along the foot of the hill on that side. I proceeded accordingly. When I with my men arrived at the back of the hill, the Chinese soldiers were surrounded. I saw six Chinese soldiers were on the top of the hill, some of them quickly disappeared. Some of them waved hands to our men, with an intention to show to our men not to approach to the Chinese. When I arrived at the back of the hill, our men formed a line along the foot of the hill, I stood at one end of the line. 10—15 of our men climbed towards the hill's top, and the others of our men stood. Later on, both sides changed fire, I did not know which side fired at first.

In 1957, I joined the I.T.B.F. For about more than two years, I patrolled many places, but I never arrived at the hill, which recently became a battlefield. And the men under my command also never reached this place. It was for the first time that I and my men reached the hill mentioned above. When I was captured, I found the hill and its vicinity were controlled by the Chinese troops.

What I have said are facts.

(Sd.) Karam Singh,
Deputy Commander,
I.T.B. Force,
At Chinese Check Post.

12 o'clock, Peking Time;
October 25, 1959.

We all agree to what Karam Singh has said above.

(Sd.) Abdul Majid.
(Sd.) Rulia Ram.
(Sd.) Gur Bahadur.
(Sd.) Sring Norbu.
(Sd.) Shiv Dayal.
(Sd.) Mohd. Khalil.
(Sd.) Rudraman.
(Sd.) Sonam Dorje.

Note:—The original statement is in the English language.
2. Statement of Karam Singh, October 26, 1959

On twenty-first October, Tyagi led about sixty men to cross the Karakoram Mountain, and arrived at an area. We discovered that there were six Chinese soldiers on a hill in this area. My Commander led about thirty men to approach to the front part of the hill, and he ordered me to lead the rest of the men, about thirty, to move to the back of the hill. The Indian soldiers very soon surrounded the Chinese soldiers, and approached to them. At the same time, some Indian soldiers took away the horses of the Chinese soldiers. In the course of time, the Chinese soldiers incessantly waved their hands, as much as to say, go away quickly, don't adopt military hostilities. They so continued for about half an hour. But the Indian soldiers made gestures to call the Chinese soldiers to surrender, and continued to approach to them. After a short time, the Indian soldiers fired first.

(Sd.) KARAM SINGH,
Deputy Commander,
At Chinese Check Post.

October 26, 1959.

NOTE:—The original statement is in the English language.
3. Statement of Karam Singh, October 27, 1959

Mr. Sharma, Deputy Director of the Ministry of Home Affairs, is in charge of the border question. S. P. Tyagi, the Commander of the I.T.B.F., is subordinate to and always in close connection with him. About on 24th September this year, Tyagi went back from New Delhi to Leh. On the same day, he imparted to me that a decision had been made, the purpose of which was to build small houses at Shamal Lungpa, to station some fifteen men there, and to patrol its surrounding areas. On the following two days, the I.T.B.F. started its way from Leh. We planned to reach Shamal Lungpa through Marsimik Pass, Tsogtsalu and Kiam (Hot Spring), and to build small houses at these places, except at Marsimik. Tyagi, arrived at Kiam on 18th October, and I the next day. The men both of us led were about sixty in total. On 20th October, two of our men and one coolie missed. A large number of our men were sent out for their search.

(Sd.) KARAM SINGH,
Deputy Commander,
At Chinese Check Post.

October 27, 1959.

NOTE.—The original statement is in the English language.
4. Statements of Rulia Ram, Sring Norbu, Gur Bahadur, Abdul Majid, Rudraman, Shiv Dayal and Karam Singh, November 1, 1959

The nine men dead were shot down when they were approaching the hilltop. The bullets ran into them from the front.

(Sd.) Sring Norbu.
(Sd.) Shiv Dayal.
(Sd.) Gur Bahadur.
(Sd.) Rulia Ram.
(Sd.) Rudraman.
(Sd.) Abdul Majid.

Shiv Nath was killed at a distance of two hundred yards from the Chinese, while the other two men, Narbu Lama and Beg Raj, were killed on a small hill seventy yards from the Chinese.

(Sd.) Rudraman.
(Sd.) Sring Norbu.
(Sd.) Shiv Dayal.
(Sd.) Gur Bahadur.
(Sd.) Rulia Ram.
(Sd.) Abdul Majid.

We were about sixty to sixty-five men. We saw nine or ten Chinese on the hill. We were greater in number than they. We encircled them.

(Sd.) Abdul Majid.
(Sd.) Rudraman.
(Sd.) Sring Norbu.
(Sd.) Shiv Dayal.
(Sd.) Gur Bahadur.
(Sd.) Rulia Ram.
(Sd.) Karam Singh.

When we came to an open place and discovered the Chinese soldiers, Tyagi immediately ordered us, “Disperse to the sides, charge up, encircle these Chinese soldiers and capture them”.

(Sd.) Rudraman.
(Sd.) Sring Norbu.
(Sd.) Shiv Dayal.
(Sd.) Gur Bahadur.
(Sd.) Rulia Ram.
(Sd.) Abdul Majid.
(Sd.) Karam Singh.
We saw that the Chinese soldiers carried and used bren guns, tommy guns, rifles and hand-grenades. The Chinese soldiers used no artillery and mortar; we neither saw nor heard these weapons.

(Sd.) RUDRAMAN.
(Sd.) SRING NORBU.
(Sd.) SHIV DAYAL.
(Sd.) GUR BAHADUR.
(Sd.) RULIA RAM.
(Sd.) ABDUL MAJID.
(Sd.) KARAM SINGH.

When we were approaching the hilltop, the Chinese soldiers waved their hands again and again, warning us not to approach them, but we kept advancing.

(Sd.) RUDRAMAN.
(Sd.) SRING NORBU.
(Sd.) SHIV DAYAL.
(Sd.) GUR BAHADUR.
(Sd.) RULIA RAM.
(Sd.) ABDUL MAJID.

Since we came here, we have been fed with what the Chinese eat and have been given as much as we can eat. We have been given very good clothing and beddings. A doctor has attended us carefully and given us medicine. Besides, we have been given cigarettes, soap, sweets, fruits and so on.

(Sd.) RUDRAMAN.
(Sd.) SRING NORBU.
(Sd.) GUR BAHADUR.
(Sd.) SHIV DAYAL.
(Sd.) RULIA RAM.
(Sd.) ABDUL MAJID.
(Sd.) KARAM SINGH.

Kongka Pass, China;
November 1, 1959.

NOTE:—This is a retranslation from the Chinese translation of the original statements which are in the Hindi language. The original statements are in Rulia Ram's handwriting, and each of them is followed by signatures.
5. Statement of Rulia Ram, November 1, 1959

1. On October 21, when Chinese soldiers were discovered on the hill-top, Shri Tyagi and Shri Karam Singh ordered us: “Surround these Chinese soldiers! Take them alive!”

2. Upon Shri Tyagi’s order, Karam Singh and I and other six or seven soldiers went up on a mound. We were then gathered together and I was close to Karam Singh. At that time we were only 70 yards away from the Chinese soldiers on the hill-top.

3. On October 21, I found the Chinese soldiers carrying rifles, automatic rifles, tommy guns and hand-grenades, and no other weapons. I neither saw nor heard the Chinese troops use artillery or mortar.

4. On 21, I saw nine Chinese soldiers only, while there were on our side about 70 soldiers. We encircled them with superior forces.

The above are all actual facts, for which I am wholly responsible.

(Sd.) RULIA RAM,
Warrant Officer,
3rd Grade of I.T.B.F.
At Chinese Check Post at Kongka Pass.

November 1, 1959.

Note:—The original statement is in the Hindi language, in Rulia Ram’s own handwriting.
6. Statement of Karam Singh, November 2, 1959

On 21st October the I.T.B. Force numbered about 60 under the command of S.P. Tyagi entered into an area which I and my men had never patrolled and has for a long time been controlled by China. As soon as a few Chinese soldiers had been discovered on the top of a mountain in this area, Tyagi took a part of the force to approach to its front part and ordered me to take the rest to go round to its back, so as to encircle the Chinese soldiers and capture them. The Chinese soldiers incessantly waved their hands as much as to say get out, do not adopt military hostilities. In despite of the friendly advice, the Indian soldiers continued to crawl towards the top of the mountain and fired first.

It goes entirely against the Sino-Indian friendship and the five principles that the I.T.B. Force intruded into the area controlled by the Chinese troops and attacked them with majority of men. I as Deputy Commander must bear a part of responsibility for the mistaken actions. I swear that I shall never intrude into the Chinese territory and adopt military hostilities against China once again.

Being very old, I cannot read and write easily without spectacles. Unfortunately, my spectacles were left in India. I cannot but request you the Chinese officers to dictate what I have admitted orally. I have personally and carefully checked all the affidavits thus made, without finding out any that is different from the original, naturally I have put my signature on every page of them. Please allow me to express my thanks for your assistance and I am willing to express my thanks for the good treatment you have given me. Now I must write the above lines though with great difficulty, otherwise I shall be uneasy.

(Sd.) KARAM SINGH,
Deputy Commander,
I.T.B. Force,
2nd Nov., 59.
At Kongka Check Post, China.

Note:—The original statement is in the English language, in Karam Singh's own handwriting.
My name is Mohd. Khalil. This is my statement.

I am thirty years old. I joined the police at Leh of Ladakh in 1955, and have been serving as a constable in the I.T.B. Force up to now. I started from Leh with Sahib Tyagi on September 28, 1959, and arrived at Kiam on October 19, 1959. After we arrived at Kiam, we did not know where the Chinese soldiers were stationed, and I was ordered to make a reconnaissance on them. At about eight o’clock in the morning of October 20, 1959, my superior Jamadar Karam Singh called me to a place 8 yards from his tent, and said to me, “Go to the gully in the south-east to reconnoitre what the Chinese soldiers are doing. If there are Chinese soldiers, report to me immediately after you have made the reconnaissance.” I asked the Jamadar for a telescope, with which I could see things a great distance away, so I brought a telescope with me. Together with me were Sonam Dorje and coolie Chadan. At about twelve o’clock, I came to a hill-top and observed the surroundings through the telescope, but found nothing. Consequently, I came to the side of a fountain in the gully (that was the place where armed clash took place on October 21, 1959). Again, I found nothing there. I drank water there and stayed there until about one o’clock. Then three Chinese soldiers came out from a gully in the east. They came towards us. They were probably patrolling. They gesticulated and shouted to us. But we did not understand what they were shouting. Then we laid down our arms. They took us to a Chinese post by the name of Kongka Pass. A few days later we received good food and clothing and other articles. We have not met difficulties of any sort. Nobody ill-treated us. It was my mistake to come within Chinese territory to make reconnaissance, and I shall never commit such a mistake again in future. This statement is made by me from my own mouth and written down at the Kongka Pass frontier post, China.

This statement is written down by Shiv Dayal for Mohd. Khalil, because Mohd. Khalil cannot write. All these remarks are made by Mohd. Khalil.

November 4, 1959 (Sd.) MOHD. KHALIL.

NOTE:—The original statement is in the Urdu language, in Shiv Dayal’s handwriting.
8. Statement of Karam Singh, November 9, 1959

I and Shri Tyagi started from Leh for patrolling the border area and setting up check-posts at Tsogstsalu, Kiam and Shamal Lungpa. Tyagi had about 40 men with him, I had 3 with me. Tyagi started on 27-9-59. I left on 29th. About 40 men had been called from check-posts at Phobrang. I arrived at Phobrang on 4-10-59. Tyagi arrived on 5th. Tyagi started for Tsogstsalu on 7-10-59 with about 40 men. I left Phobrang on 14th. A check-post was set up at Tsogstsalu. Tyagi arrived at Kiam on 18-10-59. I arrived there on 19th. A check-post was set up at Kiam. We had a programme to proceed to Shamal Lungpa. On 20-10-59 two constables Mohd. Khalil and Sonam Dorje missed along with a coolie. I suggested to Tyagi to send a small party to search for the missing men. But he said he would take a strong party lest there is a mishap. He had a mind to fight against the Chinese troops. He suspected that the missing men had been arrested by the Chinese troops.

Tyagi took about 60 men with him and ordered me to accompany him. Four bren guns and about 50 rifles were carried. Two or three sten guns and some 25 hand-grenades were also carried.

When we approached near a hill, some Chinese about 6 were seen. Tyagi ordered me to take some men with me to the back of the hill and himself proceeded in front to surround and to capture the Chinese. One or two Chinese were seen waving their hands as much as to say that you go away, while others took positions. The Indian soldiers fired first. According to Constable Abdul Majid, Const. Ali Raza fired first. Indian soldiers took away a Chinese horse. According to Const. Shiv Dayal, Manohar Lal Const. caught the horse. I believe statements of these constables are true. The Chinese soldiers were equipped with no mortar and other artillery. They were armed with rifles, tommy guns, hand-grenades and L.M.G. On most of the dead bodies of Indian soldiers the wounds are in front.

The areas east of, south of and north of the Kongka Pass are a part of China. I and my men had not visited the area where the battle occurred.

I shall never do anything that is against the Five Principles and Sino-Indian friendship any more and I shall never intrude into Chinese territory once again.

I wish that the border question between India and China should be decided amicably at the earliest.

I and my men have been given a good treatment by the Chinese officers and soldiers.

(Sd.) Karam Singh,
Deputy Commander, I.T.B. Force.
Kongka Pass, China.

NOTE:—The original statement is in the English language, in Karam Singh's own handwriting.

43
Letter from the Prime Minister of China to the Prime Minister of India,
7 November 1959

Peking, November 7, 1959

DEAR MR. PRIME MINISTER,

Your Excellency's letter dated September 26, 1959 has been received. It is most unfortunate that subsequently another unexpected border clash took place on October 21 within Chinese territory in the area south of the Kongka Pass. Regarding this clash, the Chinese and Indian Governments have already exchanged several notes, including the November 4 note of the Indian Government to the Chinese Government. Most regrettably, this note of the Indian Government not only disregards in many respects the basic facts of the question of boundary between the two countries and the truth of the border clash, but adopts an attitude which is extremely harmful to the friendly relations between the two countries. Obviously, it is in no way helpful to a settlement of the question to take such an attitude. Under the present circumstances, I consider the most important duty facing us is, first of all, to take effective steps speedily and without hesitation to earnestly improve the disquieting situation on the border between the two countries, and work for the complete elimination of the possibility of any border clash in the future.

As the Sino-Indian boundary has never been delimited, and it is very long and very far, or comparatively far, from the political centres of the two countries, I am afraid that, if no fully appropriate solution is worked out by the two governments, border clashes which both sides do not want to see may again occur in the future. And once such a clash takes place, even though a minor one, it will be made use of by people who are hostile to the friendship of our two countries to attain their ulterior objectives. There is a history of long-standing friendship but no conflict of fundamental interests between our two countries, and our governments are initiators of the Five Principles of peaceful coexistence. We have no reason to allow the tension on the border between our two countries to continue.

Your Excellency's letter of September 26 contains many viewpoints to which the Chinese Government cannot agree. Regarding these, I would like to state my views on another occasion. I am glad, however, that this letter reiterates that the Indian Government attaches great importance to the maintenance of friendly relations with China and agrees to the view consistently held by the Chinese Government that the border disputes which have already arisen should be settled amicably and peacefully, and that pending a settlement the status quo should be maintained and neither side should seek to alter the status quo by any means. In order to maintain effectively the status quo of the border between the two countries, to ensure the tranquillity of the border regions and to create a favourable atmosphere for a friendly settlement of the boundary question, the Chinese Government proposes that the armed forces of China and India each withdraw 20 kilometres at once from the so-called McMahon line in the east, and from the line up to which each side exercises actual control in the west, and that the two sides undertake to refrain from again sending their armed personnel to be stationed in and patrol the zones from which they have evacuated their armed forces, but still maintain civil administrative personnel and unarmed police there for the performance of administrative duties and maintenance of order. This proposal is in effect an extension of the Indian Government’s proposal contained in its note dated September 10 that neither side should send its armed personnel to Longju, to the entire border between China and India, and moreover a proposal to separate the troops of the two sides by as great a distance as 40 kilometres. If there is any need to increase this distance, the Chinese Government is also willing to give it consideration. In a word, both before and after the formal delimitation of the boundary between our two countries through negotiations, the Chinese Government is willing to do its utmost to create the most peaceful and most secure border zones between our two countries, so that our two countries will never again have apprehension or come to a clash on account of border issues. If this proposal of the Chinese Government is acceptable to the Indian Government, concrete measures for its implementation can be discussed and decided upon at once by the two Governments through diplomatic channels.

The Chinese Government has never had the intention of straining the border situation and the relations between the two countries. I believe that Your Excellency also wishes to see the present tension eased. I earnestly hope that, for the sake of the great, long-standing friendship of the more than 1,000 million people of our two countries, the Chinese and Indian Governments will make joint efforts and reach a speedy agreement on the above-said proposal.

The Chinese Government proposes that in order to discuss further the boundary question and other questions in the relations between the two countries, the Prime Ministers of the two countries hold talks in the immediate future.

Respected Mr. Prime Minister! The peoples of our two countries desire that we act promptly. I think we should meet their desire and not let those, who seek every chance to disrupt by all means the great friendship between China and India, attain their sinister objective. I await an early reply from Your Excellency.

I take this opportunity to express to you my cordial regards.

CHOU EN-LAI,
Premier of the State Council of the People’s Republic of China.
Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

I have received your letter of November 7, for which I thank you. We have also received a report from our Ambassador, Shri Parthasarathy, on the talk which you had with him the same day.

2. In the note which was handed over to your Ambassador in Delhi on November 4, we have given full details, supported by factual data, of the international boundary in Ladakh. We also attached to the note a first-hand account of the incident at Chang Chenmo Valley on October 21 which resulted in the death or capture of a large number of Indian personnel. Earlier, in my letter of September 26 to you, we gave you full facts in support of our statement in regard to the Sino-Indian border along its entire length. I have not had any reply yet to my letter of September 26 or any detailed reply to our subsequent note of November 4. I notice with regret that you have not taken any account of the facts as given by us in these two communications and have dismissed them with the remark that our note “disregards in many respects the basic facts of the question of the boundary between our two countries and the truth of the border clash”. I am wholly unable to agree with this observation. We should certainly explore all avenues to reduce the present tension between our two countries, but our efforts will not succeed if we ignore facts.

3. I should like to repeat what I have said in a previous communication, that this entire frontier was a peaceful one for a long time and there was no conflict or trouble there. It is only recently that conflicts and difficulties have arisen in regard to the frontier. These difficulties have not arisen because of any action that we have taken. The cause of the recent troubles is action taken from your side of the frontier.

4. We are anxious that there should be a clear understanding about this frontier and that such border disputes as there are between our two countries should be settled by peaceful methods. In the immediate present, we think it is important to avoid all border clashes so as to assure tranquillity in the border regions and thereby create an atmosphere favourable for friendly settlement. We agree, therefore, that the two Governments should come to an agreement without delay, which would eliminate risks of border clashes.

5. The Government of India have given close and careful consideration to your suggestions in this regard. But, before I proceed to discuss them, I must inform you of the resentment aroused in India by the delay which took place in the release of the Indian personnel whom your forces had captured in the Chang Chenmo Valley on October 20 and 21 after inflicting casualties on our police patrol party. You will recall that on October 24 we received your offer to hand over to us the captured personnel and the dead bodies of those who were killed during the clash. On October 26 our Ambassador in Peking informed your Government of our concern about the prisoners and our anxiety to receive them back as well as the dead bodies. We wished to know the time and place at which the transfer was to take place. In order to avoid delay we sent a forward party immediately to receive the prisoners and the dead bodies. This party waited at a place about five miles from the scene of the incident and, in spite of repeated reminders to your Government, no indication was given by your Government about the date and time of release until November 12. We are now relieved to know that the prisoners and the dead bodies were handed over to our forward party on November 14. In your talk with our Ambassador in Peking, you told him that the first-hand account of the incident which was attached to our note of November 4 was contradicted by the statements which the captured Indian personnel had made to you. We have since seen the official memorandum on the subject which your Vice-Minister handed to our Ambassador on November 14. We have not yet had any report from the released prisoners as to the course of events on October 20 and 21 and the circumstances in which they made their statements to their captors. It is clear from your letters that they have been subjected to repeated interrogation. Such interrogation of prisoners is deplorable.

6. In your letter, you have suggested that the armed forces of China and India should withdraw twenty kilometers from the lines which they occupy at present. This, in your view, would effectively prevent any border clashes. Before I discuss this suggestion further, I should like to state categorically that the Government of India had not posted any army personnel anywhere at or near the international border. Our border check-posts were manned by civil constabulary, equipped with light arms. The main purpose of these check-posts was to deal with traders or others going along the recognised routes and to prevent any undesirable or unauthorised check-posts were not intended for any aggressive purpose or for any persons crossing the border. This itself indicates that these border armed conflict. It was only after the recent unfortunate incidents that we asked our Army to take over responsibility for the protection of our border.

7. A proper understanding of the facts in regard to the Sino-Indian boundary is essential to the consideration of any proposal that is made for the avoidance of border clashes. The facts are that on our North-East frontier, the entire territory up to the border (which is referred to as the McMahon Line) has been for long years part of India. Our civil administration has been functioning there, and there are important civil divisional headquarters not far from the border. At no point, except at Longju, are Chinese forces in occupation of any area south of the Indian border. The boundary in this area passes over a terrain the height of which varies from 14,000 to 20,000 feet above sea-level. In this extremely difficult terrain, almost all our border check-posts are situated on high hill features. We do not know where the Chinese posts are, but I understand that at no point along the length of this sector are posts on the two sides situated within sight of each other. In view of the difficult mountainous terrain, even where the distance between two posts is short on the map or as the crow flies, the actual journey from one place to another might take several days.
8. In view of these facts, we think that there should not be the slightest risk of any border clash if each Government instructs its outposts not to send out patrols. It is only when armed patrols go out in these difficult mountainous areas that there is likelihood of clashes taking place. We have, in fact, instructed our border outposts not to send out any forward patrols for the present. It would be extremely difficult in practice to establish a new line of outposts in the rear, whether they are to be ten or twenty kilometers from the international boundary. The risk of border clashes will be completely eliminated if our suggestion is accepted by your Government.

9. Longju stands on a different footing altogether. As we have repeatedly stated earlier, we disagree with your statement that it is on your side of the so-called McMahon Line. We have no doubt that it is on our side. But whether it is on your side or ours, the facts are that your armed forces attacked and ousted our personnel from Longju, inflicting casualties on them, and forcibly occupied our outpost. We cannot, therefore, agree to any arrangement, even as an interim measure, which would keep your forcible possession intact. The proper course, which we have already suggested to you, would be for you to withdraw from Longju. We on our part will not re-occupy it. This suggestion, if accepted, will immediately result in a lowering of tension.

10. At no point on this border or elsewhere, have we taken over any post from you. In your talk with our Ambassador, you have stated that Khinzemane is north of the international boundary. I do not agree with this statement. As we have informed your Government previously, Khinzemane lies clearly south of this boundary and within our territory. It has throughout been in our possession.

11. I presume that your suggestion for a zone of withdrawal is intended also to apply to the Sino-Indian border in the middle areas, that is, where it touches our States of Uttar Pradesh, Himachal Pradesh and the Punjab. In these sectors also, there is no ambiguity about our border and at no point do the Chinese authorities occupy any area below the boundary. This would apply to the border of Sikkim also. If, therefore, we observe the precaution which I have mentioned above, all risk of border clashes will be eliminated in this sector of the frontier also.

12. I shall now deal with the international frontier in the Ladakh area of our State of Jammu and Kashmir. In my letter to you of September 26 and in our note of November 4, we have described in detail the international boundary in this sector, supported by factual data. Unfortunately, we do not yet know with any precision where the frontier line lies according to the claims of the Chinese Government. This is a matter for surmise based on small scale maps published in China. These maps themselves have not always been consistent, and different lines are sometimes indicated in them.

13. I regret I cannot accept the contention that you have been in occupation of the area up to the frontier line shown in your maps. On the contrary, the Government of India have exercised jurisdiction up to the frontier line specified by them. The nature of this possession has inevitably been different from that of an inhabited area. This area is uninhabited, mountainous territory of an altitude varying from 14,000 to 20,000 feet above sea-level, with the mountain peaks going up much higher.
of this, and because we did not expect any kind of aggression across our frontier, we did not think it necessary to establish check-posts right on the international boundary. But, as stated in my letter of September 26 and the note of November 4, we exercised jurisdiction over this area by sending regular patrols up to the international boundary. Certain police check-posts were established some distance from the boundary to control the trade routes, etc. Since this statement is controverted by you, it is obvious that there is complete disagreement between the two Governments even about the facts of possession. An agreement about the observance of the status quo would, therefore, be meaningless as the facts concerning the status quo are themselves disputed. As we are at present discussing a short term interim measure to avoid border clashes, it is essential that we do not get involved in interminable discussions on the status quo at this stage.

14. I suggest, therefore, that in the Ladakh area, both our Governments should agree on the following as an interim measure. The Government of India should withdraw all personnel to the west of the line which the Chinese Government have shown as the international boundary in their 1956 maps which, so far as we are aware, are their latest maps. Similarly, the Chinese Government should withdraw their personnel to the east of the international boundary which has been described by the Government of India in their earlier notes and correspondence and shown in their official maps. Since the two lines are separated by long distances, there should not be the slightest risk of border clashes between the forces on either side. The area is almost entirely uninhabited. It is thus not necessary to maintain administrative personnel in this area bounded by the two lines on the east and the west.

15. Mr. Prime Minister, I share Your Excellency's sentiments of friendship between our two countries. I have earnestly striven for this during the past ten years, but you will no doubt appreciate that mere expressions of friendship will not repair the breach that has already occurred. We have to face the realities of a situation, and the present situation is such that unless active efforts are made by the Governments of China and India, relations between our two countries are likely to grow worse. I am anxious that this should not happen as any such development will do incalculable harm not only to our two countries but also to the cause of world peace in general.

16. Your Excellency has been good enough to suggest that in order to discuss the boundary question and other outstanding issues between the two countries, the Prime Ministers of the two countries should hold talks in the immediate future. I welcome your suggestion and, as I have previously stated, I am always ready to meet and discuss with Your Excellency the outstanding differences between our countries and explore avenues of friendly settlement. It is our common desire that such a meeting should bear fruit. The nature of the discussion at our meeting should, therefore, be such that we do not lose ourselves in a forest of data. Our correspondence has shown that the issues involve a mass of historical data, maps etc. It is necessary, therefore, that some preliminary steps are taken and the foundation for our discussions laid. Unless this is done, there is danger of the meeting not leading to a successful result, which we so much desire, and disappointing the hopes of millions of people in our two countries.
17. While, therefore, I am ready to meet you at a suitable time and place, I feel that we should concentrate our immediate efforts on reaching interim understanding, which will help in easing the present tension and will prevent the situation getting worse. Thereafter, the necessary preliminary steps might be taken and the time and place of meeting, convenient and suitable to Your Excellency and to me, could be fixed. I need not assure Your Excellency of my earnest desire, as it is the desire of my people, to restore friendship between India and China on a firm basis.

With my expression of high regard.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU
Letter from the Prime Minister of China to the Prime Minister of India, 17 December 1959

Peking, December 17, 1959.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

Thank you for your letter of November 16, 1959. Although the Indian Government's opinions regarding the prevention of border clashes are still a certain distance away from the Chinese Government's proposal of November 7 and part of them obviously lack fairness, it is heartening that in your letter you have indicated the desire of trying to avoid all border clashes and to settle the boundary disputes between the two countries by peaceful methods.

The Chinese Government's proposal of November 7 for the withdrawal of the armed forces of the two countries 20 kilometers respectively along the entire border is aimed at thoroughly eliminating the risk of border clashes not wholly foreseeable, completely changing the present tense situation on the border where the two countries are facing each other in arms, and creating a favourable atmosphere of mutual confidence between the two countries. These aims are unattainable by other provisional measures. Furthermore, the adoption of this measure pending the delimitation of the boundary will in no way prejudice the advancing by each side of its claims when negotiations for the settlement of the boundary question take place. Therefore, the Chinese Government still earnestly hopes that we can reach agreement on such a measure for the sake of friendship between our two countries in the past and for hundreds of years to come. As to how far the armed forces of each country should withdraw, the Chinese Government is entirely willing to decide on a distance which will be deemed appropriate by both sides through consultation with the Indian Government.

Pending the above-mentioned agreement, the Chinese Government, in a conciliatory spirit and out of the desire to move toward the withdrawal of armed forces along the entire border, is prepared to agree first to reach a partial solution by applying the proposal you have made in your letter for the non-stationing of the armed forces of both sides at Longju to the other disputed places on the border as well. In the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian border, armed Indian personnel once occupied Longju and are now still in occupation of Khinzemane. In the western sector of the Sino-Indian border, armed Indian personnel are now in occupation of Shipki Pass, Parigas, Sang, Tsungsha, Puling-sumdo, Chuva, Chuje, Sangcha and Lapthal. Most of these places which definitely belong to China were occupied successively by armed Indian personnel after the signing of the 1954 Agreement on Trade and Intercourse. Between the Tibet Region of China and India in which China and India for the first time put forward the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence. Among them Puling-sumdo is one of the ten places which the Chinese Government agreed to open as markets for trade in the Aria area of the Tibet region of China as specified in Article II Section 2 of the 1954 Agreement. Now since the Indian Government holds a different opinion on the ownership of these places, the Chinese Government proposes that no armed personnel of either side be stationed at any of them.

Pending a further agreement between the two sides, the Chinese Government also welcomes the Indian Government’s proposal for the frontier outposts of the two sides to stop sending out patrols. The Chinese Government has, in fact, instructed the Chinese frontier guards to stop sending out patrols from all their outposts on the Sino-Indian border after the Kongka Pass incident. Now that the Indian side has also taken the same step, this is of course a happy progress in safeguarding the tranquility of the border between the two countries. But the Chinese Government would like to ask for clarification on one point, that is: The proposal to stop patrolling should apply to the entire Sino-Indian border, and no different measure should be adopted in the sector of the border between China and India’s Ladakh.

The Chinese Government is very much perplexed by the fact that Your Excellency put forward a separate proposal for the prevention of clashes in the sector of the border between China and India’s Ladakh. The Chinese Government deems it necessary to point out the following: (1) There is no reason to treat this sector of the border as a special case. The line up to which each side exercises actual control in this sector is very clear, just as it is in the other sectors of the Sino-Indian border. As a matter of fact, the Chinese map published in 1956, to which Your Excellency referred correctly shows the traditional boundary between the two countries in this sector. Except for the Parigas area by the Shangat-sangpu River, India has not occupied any Chinese territory east of this section of the traditional boundary. (2) This proposal of Your Excellency’s represents a big step backward from the principle agreed upon earlier by the two countries of maintaining for the time being the state actually existing on the border. To demand a great change in this state as a pre-condition for the elimination of border clashes is not to diminish but to widen the dispute. (3) Your Excellency’s proposal is unfair. Your Excellency proposes that in this sector Chinese personnel withdraw to the east of the boundary as shown on Indian maps and Indian personnel withdraw to the west of the boundary as shown on Chinese maps. This proposal may appear “equitable” to those who are ignorant about the truth. But even the most anti-Chinese part of the Indian press pointed out immediately that, under this proposal, India’s “concession” would only be theoretical, because, to begin with, the area concerned does not belong to India and India has no personnel there to withdraw, while China would have to withdraw from a territory of above 33,000 square kilometers, which has long belonged to it, its military personnel guarding the frontiers and its civil administrative personnel of the Hotien County, the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, and of Rudok Dzong in the Ari area of the Tibet Autonomous Region respectively. (4) This area has long been under Chinese jurisdiction and is of great importance to China. Since the Ching Dynasty, this area has been the traffic artery linking up the vast regions of Sinkiang and western Tibet. As far back as in the latter half of 1950, it was along the traditional route in this area that units of the Chinese People’s Liberation Army entered the Ari area of Tibet from Sinkiang to guard the frontiers. In the nine years since then, they have been making regular and busy use of this route to bring supplies.
route, the motor-road over 1,200 kilometers long from Yecheng in southwestern Sinkiang to Gartok in southwestern Tibet was built by Chinese frontier guard units together with more than 3,000 civilian builders working under extremely difficult natural conditions from March 1956 to October 1957, cutting across high mountains, throwing bridges and building culverts. For up to 8 or 9 years since the peaceful liberation of Sinkiang and Tibet when units of the Chinese People's Liberation Army began to be stationed in and patrol this area till September 1958 when the intrusion of the area by armed Indian personnel occurred, so many activities were carried out by the Chinese side in this area under its jurisdiction and yet the Indian side was utterly unaware of them. This is eloquent proof that this area has indeed always been under Chinese jurisdiction and not under Indian jurisdiction. Now the Indian Government asserts that this area has all along been under Indian jurisdiction. This is absolutely unconvincing.

If the Indian Government, after being acquainted with the above view points of the Chinese Government, should still insist that its demand in regard to this area is proper, then the Chinese Government would like to know whether the Indian Government is prepared to apply the same principle equally to the eastern sector of the border, that is to say, to require both the Chinese and Indian sides to withdraw all their personnel from the area between the so-called McMahon line and the eastern section of the Sino-Indian boundary as shown on Chinese maps (and on Indian maps too during a long period of time). The Chinese Government has not up to now made any demand in regard to the area south of the so-called McMahon line as a pre-condition or interim measure, and what I find difficult to understand is why the Indian Government should demand that the Chinese side withdraw one-sidedly from its western frontier area.

Your Excellency and the Indian Government have repeatedly referred to the historical data concerning the Sino-Indian boundary as produced by the Indian side. The Chinese side had meant to give its detailed reply to Your Excellency's letter of September 26 and the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs of November 4 in the forthcoming talks between the Prime Ministers of the two countries, and thought it more appropriate to do so. Since the talks between the two Prime Ministers have not yet taken place, however, the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs will give a reply in the near future. I do not wish to go here into the details of the matter. I would only point out again the simple fact that, according to objective history, the entire boundary between our two countries has indeed never been delimited, and it is impossible to deny this. I have noticed that the Indian side has, in its account of the boundary between the two countries, purposely left out many obvious basic facts. For example, it does not mention the fact that on the official maps compiled by the Survey of India in the past, up to the 1938 edition, the delineation of the eastern section of the Sino-Indian boundary still corresponded to that on Chinese maps while the western section of the Sino-Indian boundary was not drawn at all; even in its 1950, 1951 and 1952 editions published after the founding of the People's Republic of China, both the eastern and western sections of the Sino-Indian boundary, though incorrectly drawn, were clearly indicated as undelimited. The Chinese Government cannot see on what ground the Indian Government began suddenly in recent years to change the undelimited boundary in both the eastern and western sectors on its maps into delimited boundary. I have made a detailed study of the heap of data cited in Your Excellency's letter of September 26, still I cannot find any satisfactory answer.
The Chinese Government has pointed out many times that the boundary between China and India is very long and has never been delimited by the two Governments, that there are discrepancies between the maps of the two countries, and that therefore it is natural that the two countries should hold different opinions regarding the boundary. A reasonable settlement of this outstanding historical issue should not be difficult at all to achieve provided it is sought through friendly consultations. The People's Republic of China is a socialist country of the working people, where the exploiting classes and pro-imperialist forces who attempted to profit by outward expansion and provocations against other countries have long lost for good their footing for carrying out their activities. The People's Republic of China is consistently faithful to the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence; it absolutely does not allow itself to take an attitude of big-nation chauvinism towards other countries, let alone encroach one inch upon foreign territory. Further, China has such a vast expense of territory, more than half of which, moreover, is sparsely populated and will take great efforts to develop. It would be extremely ludicrous to think that such a country would still want to seek trouble in some desolate areas of a neighbouring country. Therefore, although there are some undelimited sections in the boundaries between China and some of its neighbouring countries in South Asia (whether they are big or small, friendly or unfriendly toward China), China has not taken and will never take advantage of this situation to make any change in the state actually existing on the border by resorting to unilateral action. China is moreover prepared, even after the settlement of the outstanding boundary issues, to work in unison and co-operation with all its neighbouring countries for the creation of a most peaceful, secure and friendly boundary. Your Excellency is aware that the so-called McMahon line in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian border has never been recognized by past Chinese Governments, nor by the Government of the People's Republic of China, yet the Government of the People's Republic of China has strictly abided by its statement of absolutely not allowing its armed personnel to cross this line in waiting for a friendly settlement of the boundary question. It is quite obvious that China, which has not even stepped into the vast area south of the so-called McMahon line which, not long ago, was still under the jurisdiction of the local government of the Tibet region of China (part of the area up to 1951), would of course not think of stepping on to Indian territory at any place along the western sector of the Sino-Indian border. The Chinese military and civil administrative personnel over there, just as in other areas along the border, are only stationed on and guarding their own territory. However, the Indian Government has not only taken an unreasonable attitude of refusing to discuss the eastern sector of the border, but also laid territorial claim to an area in the western sector of the border, which has never been under Indian rule. This has indeed greatly surprised the Chinese Government and people. In the interest of upholding Sino-Indian friendship, the Chinese Government has always exercised the utmost self-restraint in the hope of settling these disputes with the Indian Government through friendly negotiations. Even after armed Indian personnel intruded into Chinese territory and provoked successively the incidents in the areas south of Migyitun and south of the Kongka Pass, the Chinese Government still maintained a conciliatory spirit, avoided aggravation of the situation and dealt in a friendly manner with the armed Indian personnel captured in the Kongka Pass incident. Yet the Indian side, disregarding the objective facts, arbitrarily asserted that both incidents were provoked by China, that China maltreated the cap-lured Indian personnel, and even unscrupulously abused China as aggressor, imperialism, etc. I must say that both our people and Government feel extreme regret at such a serious state of affairs.

Your Excellency expressed welcome to my November 7 proposal for the holding of talks between the Prime Ministers of the two countries.
Here indeed lies the hope for a turn for the better in the relations between the two countries. Although there are differences of opinion between our two countries on the boundary question. I believe that this in no way hinders the holding of talks between the two Prime Ministers; on the contrary, it precisely requires its early realization so as to reach first some agreements of principles as a guidance to concrete discussions and settlement of the boundary question by the two sides. Without such a guidance, there is a danger that concrete discussions of the boundary question by the two sides may bog down in endless and fruitless debates. I therefore make the concrete proposal that the two Prime Ministers begin talks on December 26. If you wish to suggest any other date, I am also willing to give it consideration. As to the site of the talks, if you agree, any place in China can be chosen, because there are in China no activities hostile to Sino-Indian friendship and you will be welcomed and respected by our people as a distinguished guest of the Chinese Government. Should you find it inconvenient for you to hold talks in China, Rangoon can be fixed as the site of the talks, subject to the consent of the Burmese Government.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister! Both our countries are still very backward economically and culturally. We urgently need to engross ourselves in long-term peaceful construction at home so as to free ourselves step by step from the present state of backwardness. We have no need to create tension between our two friendly nations or between us and any other country, thus dissipating and diverting our people's attention from domestic matters. The peoples of our two countries and the overwhelming majority of the people of the world are inspired by the fact that the world situation is developing in a direction favourable to peace. But unfortunately there are still not a few influential groups in the world who obstinately oppose this trend; they are trying to poison the international atmosphere, continuing the cold war and creating tension to place barriers in the way of east-west talks; they are slandering the peace policy of the socialist countries and inciting discord between the Asian African countries and the socialist countries, so that they may profit thereby. At present, they are obviously exerting their utmost to sow discord between China and India. Under these circumstances, the speedy holding of talks between the two Prime Ministers is our unshirkable responsibility not only to our two peoples but also to world peace.

With high respects.

CHOU EN-LAI
Premier of the State Council of the People's Republic of China.
December 21, 1959.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

Thank you for your letter of December 17 the text of which our Ambassador in Peking has telegraphed to us. I deeply regret that you have not accepted the very reasonable proposals contained in my letter of 16th November. They were intended to secure an immediate lessening of tension along the Sino-Indian border by eliminating any risk of border clashes and to create the necessary atmosphere for a peaceful settlement of the border problem.

Your present letter once again reiterates claims to extensive areas which by history, by custom or by agreement have long been integral parts of India. I am particularly sorry to find that you have based your claim on recent intrusion by Chinese personnel into parts of Indian territory. It is these intrusions which have brought about the present situation and created apprehensions. You have not sent any reply to my letter of September 26 to you and our note of November 4 in which some salient facts bearing on the situation had been mentioned.

I only wish to say that I cannot accept your allegation that Indian forces have occupied any part of Chinese territory, or committed aggression at Kongka Pass or at Longju where our established check-post was attacked by Chinese troops.

Your letter also speaks of the 'friendly manner' in which Indian personnel who were captured in the Chang Chenmo valley were treated. Shri Karam Singh whom you returned to us has made his statement of the treatment that he and his colleagues received while they were prisoners in the custody of the Chinese border forces. This statement will show you the deplorable treatment to which the Indian prisoners were subjected by the Chinese forces.

Your Excellency has suggested that you and I should meet on December 26 so as to reach an agreement on the principles which are presumably to guide the officials on both sides in the discussion of details. As I informed you in my letter on November 16 and earlier, I am always ready to meet and discuss with your Excellency the outstanding differences between our countries and explore the avenues of settlement. How can we, Mr. Prime Minister, reach an agreement on principles when there is such complete disagreement about the facts? I would, therefore, prefer to wait for your promised reply to my letter of September 26 and our note of November 4, before we discuss what should be the next step. I wish to add that it is entirely impossible for me to proceed to Rangoon or any other place within the next few days.
I would not like to end this letter to you without referring to the sentiments which you have expressed in your last paragraph. I am in entire agreement with you that the principal concern of our two countries should be “with the programme of long-term peaceful construction to lift ourselves from our present state of backwardness”, to which you have referred. I equally agree with you that we should not be parties to the increasing of tension between our two countries or in the world. India has welcomed the fact that there is some lowering of world tensions and that “the world situation is developing in a direction favourable to peace”. It is for this last reason, even apart from the imperative need to improve the relations between our two countries, that in spite of all recent events I have continually stressed the need for a peaceful settlement of our problems.

With kind regards,

I am,

Yours sincerely,

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China to the Embassy of India in China, 26 December 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Peoples’ Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China and has the honour to make the following observations on the Sino-Indian boundary question, which the Embassy is requested to transmit to the Indian Government:

On September 8, 1959, Premier Chou En-lai wrote to Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, giving an over-all account of the historical background and the present actual situation of the Sino-Indian boundary question and the stand and policy of the Chinese Government. Afterwards Premier Chou En-lai and the Chinese Government received Prime Minister Nehru’s letter of September 26 and the Indian Ministry of External Affairs’ note of November 4. In the said letter and note, the Indian Government indicated that it could not agree to Premier Chou En-lai’s account of the facts regarding the boundary.

The Chinese Government is desirous at all times of maintaining friendship with the Indian Government and people, and, on the boundary question, of holding discussions with the Indian Government calmly and amicably and with an attitude which is fair both to itself and to others so as to seek a rapprochement of the views of the two sides. In view of the fact that the Sino-Indian boundary question is rather complex and that it would be extremely difficult to bring about a settlement through the exchange of letters, the Chinese Government has always maintained that face-to-face talks should be held speedily between the representatives of the Governments, first of all between the Prime Ministers of the two countries, so as more effectively to exchange views and reach agreement.
But since the talks between the two Prime Ministers are yet to be decided on through consultations between the two sides, and the Indian Government has moreover complained that the Chinese Government has given no reply to the parts of the above-mentioned letter and note concerning facts about the boundary, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China is instructed to make further observations on the major questions concerning the facts about the boundary, with reference to Premier Chou En-lai’s letter of September 8, Prime Minister Nehru’s letter of September 26

China and India are two peace-loving, big countries with a long history of mutual friendship and with many great common tasks both at present and in the future. Friendship between China and India is in the interests not only of the two peoples, but also of world peace, particularly of peace in Asia. The Chinese Government is therefore very reluctant to engage in arguments with the Indian Government over the boundary question.
Unfortunately, the Sino-Indian boundary has never been delimited. Britain left behind in this respect a heritage of certain diputes, and moreover the Indian Government has made a series of unacceptable charges against China, thereby rendering these arguments unavoidable. Because the Indian Government has put forth a mass of detailed data on the boundary question, the Chinese Government feels sorry that, though trying its best to be brief, it cannot but refer in this reply to various details so as to clarify the true picture of the historical situation and the views of the two sides.

58

For convenience' sake, in the following paragraphs the section of the boundary between China's Sinkiang and Tibet on the one hand and Ladakh on the other will be termed the western sector, the section of the boundary from the south-eastern end of the western sector to the converging point of China, India and Nepal the middle sector, and the section of the boundary east of Bhutan the eastern sector.

QUESTION I

Has The Sino-Indian Boundary Been Formally Delimited?

The reason for the present existence of certain disputes over the Sino-Indian boundary is that the two countries have never formerly delimited this boundary and that there is a divergence of views between the two countries regarding the boundary. According to the Indian maps, the boundary line in the western sector cuts deep into Chinese territory, including an area of over 33,000 square kilometers in India; the boundary line in the middle sector is relatively close to the delineation on the Chinese maps, but still a number of areas which have always belonged to China are included in India; and in the eastern sector, the whole boundary line is pushed northward, including in India an area of 90,000 square kilometers which originally belonged to China. The Chinese Government, therefore, consider it necessary to conduct friendly negotiations to bring about a reasonable settlement. The Indian Government, however, holds that the greater part of the Sino-Indian boundary line as shown on current Indian maps is defined by international agreements and therefore sees no reason to hold overall boundary negotiations. Thus, the negotiations themselves have run up against difficulties and there is the danger of the boundary disputes remaining deadlocked for a long time. The Chinese Government considers that to say that the greater part of the Sino-Indian boundary has been formally delimited by international agreements is totally inconsistent with the facts. The Chinese Government wishes to make the following explanations:

1. Concerning the western sector. The Indian Government holds that the boundary line it claims was fixed by a treaty concluded between the authorities of the Tibet region of China and the Kashmir authorities in 1842.

But firstly, this treaty merely mentioned that the boundary between Ladakh and Tibet would be maintained as it had been and that both sides would hold to their confines and refrain from encroaching on each other. The treaty contained no provision or hint whatsoever about the concrete location of the boundary. None of the arguments advanced by Prime Minister Nehru in his letter of September 26, 1959, to Premier Chou-En-lai to the effect that the location of the boundary has been long established can prove that the boundary line now claimed by the Indian Government is well-founded.
Secondly, the 1842 treaty was concluded between the authorities of the Tibet region of China and the Kashmir authorities, but the greatest part (about 80 per cent) of the area now disputed by the Indian Government is part of China's Sinkiang which was no party to the treaty. It is obviously inconceivable to hold that, judging by this treaty, vast areas of Sinkiang have ceased to belong to China but have become part of Ladakh. The British Government proposed in 1899 to delimit the boundary between Ladakh and Kashmir on the one hand and Sinkiang on the other, but nothing came of it. It is also inconceivable to hold that the territory of another country can be annexed by a unilateral proposal.

Thirdly, there are many indisputable positive evidences to show that the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary is not delimited. For instance, (a) Between 1921 and 1927, the British Indian Government made many representations to the authorities of China's Tibet region, asking to delimit the boundary between Ladakh and Tibet, but without any result. This is testified by many documents exchanged between the two sides at the time, and is also confirmed by Sir Arthur Lothian, the Briton who acted as the representative of India, in his letter to the London Times published on December 11, 1959. (b) According to data now available to the Chinese Government, no boundary line was drawn at all in the western sector of the Sino-Indian border on the official map published by the Survey of India as late as 1943. On the official Indian map of the 1950 edition, the present version of the boundary line was shown in a most equivocal way, but was still marked by the words "Boundary Undefined". It is only since 1954 that this undelimited sector of the boundary has suddenly become a delimited boundary. (c) Referring to this sector of the boundary in the Lok Sabha of India on August 28, 1959, Prime Minister Nehru declared that: "This was the boundary of the old Kashmir state with Tibet and Chinese Turkestan. Nobody had marked it". All the above-mentioned facts are absolutely incompatible with the allegation that this sector of the boundary was delimited long ago. It is unthinkable that the Indian Government which held that this sector of the boundary had explicitly been delimited in 1842 or 1899 would, between 1921 and 1927, still ask continually for negotiations to delimit it; that it would in 1943 still admit the absence of any determined boundary; that it would in 1950 still declare the mere existence of a boundary undefined; and that it would in 1959 still proclaim that nobody had marked the boundary.

(2) Concerning the middle sector. The Indian Government considers that the specification in Article IV of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement of six passes in this area as passages for traders and pilgrims of both countries indicates that the Chinese Government has already concurred in the Indian Government's opinion about this sector of the boundary. The Chinese Government holds that this allegation is untenable both factually and logically.

The question of the boundary between the two countries was not touched on at all in the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement or during its negotiations. The Chinese side's draft wording for Article IV of the Agreement was that "The Chinese Government agrees to open the following mountain passes in the Ari district of the Tibetan region of China for entry and exit by traders and pilgrims of both parties."
The Indian side disagreed with the Chinese draft; its own draft wording was that "Traders and pilgrims from India and western Tibet may travel by the routes traversing the following localities and passes." Later on the two sides agreed to change the wording into: "Traders and pilgrims of both countries may travel by the following passes and route." The concession made by the Chinese Government was only to adopt a wording which does not involve the ownership of these passes. Nobody can draw from this the conclusion that this sector of the boundary between the two countries has thus been fixed. On the contrary, the Chinese representative, Vice-Foreign Minister Chang Han-fu, in his talk with the Indian representative, Ambassador Mr. N. Raghavan, on April, 23, 1954 clearly stated that the Chinese side did not wish, in those negotiations, to touch on the boundary question. And Ambassador N. Raghavan agreed forthwith. The Chinese Government therefore maintains that there is no ground to say that this sector of the boundary has been delimited and that there is no need to conduct negotiations for its delimitation.

(3) Concerning the eastern sector. The Indian Government holds that the so-called McMahon Line is the product of the 1914 Simla Conference jointly attended by Britain, China and the Tibet region of China, and is therefore valid. The Chinese Government holds that the so-called McMahon Line is wholly illegal, and the Indian Government's assertion is utterly unacceptable to the Chinese Government.

Firstly, it is known to the world that the Simla Convention itself is void of legal validity. The Chinese representative Ivan Chen attending the Simla Conference not only refused to sign the Simla Convention, but acting under instructions from the Chinese Government formally declared at the Conference on July 3, 1914 that the Chinese Government would not recognize any treaty or similar document that might then or thereafter be signed between Britain and Tibet. Similar declarations were made in formal notes delivered to the British Government on July 3 and 7 the same year by Minister of the Chinese Government in Britain Lew Yuk-lin. All Chinese Governments since then persisted in this stand. Many dirty unequal treaties signed by the past Chinese Governments under imperialist oppression have already been proclaimed null and void. The Chinese Government feels perplexed why the Government of India, which has likewise won independence from under imperialist oppression, should insist that the Government of its friend China recognize an unequal treaty which the Chinese Government has not even signed.

Secondly, the Indian Government asserts that the boundary between India and the Tibet was discussed at the Simla Conference, that the Chinese Government never objected at the time or afterwards to the discussion of the boundary between India and Tibet at the Conference and that therefore the agreement which resulted from the Conference in regard to the McMahon Line boundary between India and Tibet must be regarded as binding on China. But this line of argument, from beginning to end, is inconsistent with the facts. As a matter of fact, the Simla Conference only discussed the boundary between the Tibet region and the rest of China and the boundary between so-called Outer and Inner Tibet, it never discussed the boundary between China and India. The so-called McMahon Line boundary between China and India was the result of the exchange of secret letters at Delhi on March 24, 1914 between the British representative and the representative of the then Tibet local authorities. It was in no way made known to China. It also means that it was never placed on the agenda of the Simla Conference. A section of the red line shown on the map attached to the Simla Convention corresponds with the so-called McMahon Line, but that red line was presented as the boundary between Tibet and the rest of China, and it was never stated that part of the red line was the boundary between China and India. Since the so-called question of Sino-Indian boundary never existed at the Simla Conference and in the Simla Convention, the Chinese Government naturally would not refer to this question or the question of the so-called McMahon Line in its memorandum and its suggestions for the revision of the Simla Convention. The Indian Government has pointed to the fact that the Chinese Government at the time did not raise any objection to the so-called McMahon Line. But this fact only shows that the Chinese Government was completely unaware of the existence of the question of the so-called McMahon Line, and can in no way prove that the Line was legal or was accepted by the Chinese Government. It can thus be seen that the so-called McMahon Line is more unsavoury and more unpresentable than the Simla Convention, and it is indeed all the more strange to assert that it is binding on the Chinese Government. The Chinese Government would like to ask the Indian Government whether, among all the proceedings of the Simla Conference, it can point to any particular date of the Conference or any particular article of the Convention when and where the Sino-Indian boundary question, and particularly the question of the so-called McMahon Line, was referred to.

In addition, it must also be pointed out that it is beyond doubt that Britain had no right to conduct separate negotiations with Tibet. Indeed, the Chinese Government made repeated statements to this effect; as to the British Government, it too was strictly bound by the 1907 agreement on Tibet concluded between it and the old Russian Government not to enter into negotiations with Tibet except through the intermediary of the Chinese Government. Therefore, judging by this treaty obligation alone which was undertaken by the British Government, the secret exchange of letters in 1914 between the British representative and the representative of the Tibet local authorities behind the back of the Chinese Government is void of any legal validity.

Thirdly, the assertion that China did not raise any objection to the so-called McMahon Line boundary between China and India is also inconsistent with the fact. It was during the most difficult period of China's War of Resistance to Japanese Aggression that the so-called McMahon Line gradually and unofficially appeared on Indian maps; and after 1943 the Tibet local authorities were under the firm control of British imperialism and their relations with the Chinese Central Government steadily deteriorated. Nevertheless, on learning that Britain had gradually encroached on Chinese territory south of the so-called McMahon Line, the Kuomintang Government four times protested by addressing notes to the British Embassy in China after the conclusion of the Anti-Japanese War, in July, September and November of 1946 and January of 1947. Since Britain shifted its responsibility onto India, the Kuomintang Government protested by note with the Indian Embassy in China in February 1947. Even up to November 18, 1949, Lo Chia-lun, Ambassador to India of the Chang Kai-shek clique which then still maintained diplomatic relations with the Indian Government, delivered a note to the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, repudiating the Simla Convention which the Indian Government held to be valid. The Government of the People’s Republic of China, since establishing diplomatic relations with the Government of India has repeatedly stated the fact that the Sino-Indian boundary has not been delimited. During Prime Minister Nehru’s visit in China in 1954, Premier Chou En-lai made it clear that the Sino-Indian boundary was yet to be delimited. Premier Chou also said that the reason why the delineation of old maps was followed in Chinese maps was that the Chinese Government had not yet undertaken a survey of China’s boundary, nor consulted with the countries concerned, and that it would not make changes in the delineation of the boundary on its own. This was reiterated in the memorandum delivered to the Indian Embassy in China by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs on November 3, 1958. Besides, even the local authorities of Tibet did not regard as reasonable the so-called McMahon Line, which was the product of underhand schemes; they repeatedly objected to this line and asked for the return of occupied Chinese territory south of the line. This fact is not denied even by the Indian Government.

Fourthly, not only the so-called McMahon Line boundary between China and India has never been recognized by the Chinese Government; its validity was for a long time questioned by the Indian and the British Governments. The so-called McMahon Line was not adopted on the official map “Tibet and Adjacent Countries” published by the Survey of India in 1938, nor on the map “India” in the sixth edition of the Oxford Advanced Atlas, 1940, compiled by John Bartholomew, cartographer to the King of Britain. Neither was the so-called McMahon Line followed in drawing the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary on the map “India 1945” attached to the 1951 3rd edition in English of “The Discovery of India”, written by Prime Minister Nehru himself and first published in 1946. Although the so-called McMahon Line was drawn on the official maps of India published by the Survey of India in 1950, 1951 and 1952, it was still marked as undemarcated. Up to 1958, on the map “China West and Tibet” in the Times Atlas of The World edited by John Bartholomew, cartographer to the King of Britain, the traditional Sino-Indian boundary line and the so-called McMahon Line were both drawn with the words “Disputed Area” marked between the lines. All these authoritative facts squarely refute the Indian Government’s argument that this sector of the boundary has been delimited. The Indian Government contends that Britain withheld the publication of the Simla Convention for years in the hope that there would be an agreement about the status and boundary of Inner Tibet. That this assertion cannot help the Indian Government out of its difficulties is already explained as above, the assertion moreover adds to its difficulties. What meaning can the Simla Convention have, when the British Government also admitted that no argument was reached on it? And since the Convention itself has not acquired validity, what can be said for the so-called Sino-Indian boundary line which was never proposed to the Chinese Government and which the British unilaterally meant to smuggle into this Convention? In fact, British officials who once held posts in India, though by no means pro-Chinese, also admit that the McMahon Line is legally untenable and actually ineffective. For instance, Henry Twynam, who was acting Governor of Assam, India, in 1939, testified in his letter to the London Times published on September 2, 1959, that this line “does not exist, and never has existed.”

From what has been said in the above the following incontestable conclusion can be drawn: The entire Sino-Indian boundary, whether in its western, middle, or eastern sector, has not been delimited. The 1842 Treaty, on which the Indian Government bases itself, did not define any boundary line for the western sector of the Sino-Indian border; and moreover, China’s Sinkiang region, which is most concerned with this sector of the boundary, was no party to this Treaty. The 1954 Agreement, on which the Indian Government bases itself, did not involve the middle or any other sector of the Sino-Indian boundary. The 1914 Convention, on which the Indian Government bases itself, is itself void of legal validity, and the Sino-Indian boundary was never discussed at the 1914 Conference. That the Sino-Indian boundary is yet to be delimited has been recognized by the Indian and British Governments over a long period of time, and is borne out by indisputable evidences. In order to achieve a reasonable settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary dispute satisfactory to both sides, there is no other way except the holding of friendly negotiations.

Question II

Where is the Traditional Customary Sino-Indian Boundary Line?

Although the Sino-Indian boundary has not been formally delimited, both sides acknowledge the existence of a traditional customary line, that is, the line formed by the extent of jurisdiction exercised historically by each side. The present question is that the two sides hold very different conceptions of the position of the traditional customary line. In drawing the boundary (mainly the eastern and western sectors) on its maps, the Indian Government has gone far beyond the extent of its original actual jurisdiction; it asserts that this is not only based on international treaties but is the traditional customary line itself. The Chinese Government holds that the delineations of the Sino-Indian boundary on current Indian maps, which differ greatly from those on Chinese maps, are not based on any international treaty, as stated above, and, what is more, are not based on tradition and custom.

(1) Concerning the western sector. The area of over 33,000 square kilometers now disputed by India has always belonged to China. This is conclusively borne out by Chinese official documents and records. Except for the very small area of Parigas which has been occupied by India in recent years, the remaining broad area has always been under the effective control of the Chinese Government. The major part of this area is under the jurisdiction of Hotien County of the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region of China, while the minor part under that of Rudok Dzong of the Tibetan Autonomous Region of China. Though sparsely populated, this area has all along been a place for pasturage and salt-mining for the Uighur and Kirghiz people living in the south-western border of Sinkiang and a part of the Tibetan people living in the north-western border of Tibet. Many places of this area are named in the Uighur language. For instance, Aksai Chin, which is part of Hotien County of Sinkiang means “the desert of white stones” in the Uighur language; while the Karakash River which flows through this area means “the river of the black jade” in the Uighur language.

This area is the only traffic artery linking Sinkiang and western Tibet because to its north-east lies the great Gobi of Sinkiang through which direct traffic with Tibet is practically impossible. Therefore, since the middle of the eighteenth century, the Government of the Ching Dynasty of China had established Karens (check-posts) to exercise jurisdiction over and patrol this area. In the decades from the founding of the Republic of China till the liberation of China, there were troops constantly guarding this area. After the liberation of Sinkiang in 1949, the Chinese People’s Liberation Army took over the guarding of the frontier in this area from Kuomintang troops. In the latter half of 1950, it was through this area that the Chinese Government dispatched the first units of the Chinese People’s Liberation Army to enter Tibet. In the nine years since then, the Chinese troops stationed in the Ari district have regularly and frequently brought up indispensable supplies from Sinkiang through this area. From March 1956 to October 1957, the Chinese Government built along the customary route a motor-road from Yehcheng of Sinkiang to Gartok of Tibet of a total length of 1,200 kilometers, of which a section of the 180 kilometers runs through this area, and over 3,000 civilian workers took part in its construction.

These unshakable facts should have been sufficient to prove beyond dispute that this area is Chinese territory.

The Indian Government asserts that this area “has been associated with India’s culture and tradition for the last two thousand years or so, and has been an intimate part of India’s life and thought.” But firstly the Indian Government fails to give any concrete facts to support its contention. On the contrary, Prime Minister Nehru said in the Rajya Sabha of India on September 10, 1959, that this area “has not been under any kind of administration”. On November 23, 1959, he said again in the Rajya Sabha of India: “During British rule, as far as I know, this area was neither inhabited by any people nor were there any outposts.” Though Prime Minister Nehru is in no position to judge correctly the conditions prevailing on the Chinese side, his words do prove authoritatively that India has never exercised control over this area.

Secondly, the Indian Government says that it has been sending regular patrols to this area, and that this is one way India exercises its jurisdiction. According to data available to the Chinese Government however, armed Indian personnel intruded only three times into this area to carry out reconnaissance, namely, in September 1958, July 1959 and October 1959, and on each occasion they were promptly detained and then sent out of China by Chinese frontier guards. Apart from these three intrusions, they have never been to this area. It is precisely for this reason that the Indian Government has been so unaware of the long-term activities of the Chinese personnel in this area that it declares that it was in 1957 that Chinese personnel first entered this area.

Thirdly, the Indian Government has referred to a number of maps to corroborate what it has claimed to be the traditional customary line. But the situation in this respect is not favourable to India's arguments either. Despite slight discrepancies at some places, the delineations of the western sector of the boundary on the maps published in China in the past one to two hundred years have in the main been consistent. The Indian Government says that the delineation of the western sector of the boundary on an official Chinese map published in 1893 approximates to that of the Indian maps. The Chinese Government does not know what map is referred to here and, consequently, is unable to comment on it. As to the Atlas published in 1917 by the British-owned paper, the North China daily News and Herald, it can only represent the British view but not the Chinese, and there is no need to discuss it here.

By contrast, there have been considerable contradictions and confusion in the delineations of the boundary on maps published in Britain and India in the past century and more. This is because, after occupying Kashmir, Britain actively tried to use it as a base for aggression against China's southern Sinkiang and north-western Tibet and, therefore, it continually made arbitrary changes in the traditional customary boundary line in the western sector and sent surveying parties to intrude into China for this purpose. Prime Minister Nehru says that "accurate" maps, that is, maps in agreement with the current Indian maps, became possible only from 1865 after surveys. But, even so, some reputed surveyors did not wish to misrepresent the facts at will. For instance, the delineations of the boundary on the "Sketch Map of Eastern Turkestan" of 1870 by G. W. Hayward and on the "Sketch Map of the Country North of India" of 1871 by Robert Shaw—both surveyors being referred to by Prime Minister Nehru in his letter of September 26—are close to the traditional customary line as shown on Chinese maps. In his article in the Journal Of The British Royal Geographical Society, Vol. XL, 1870, Hayward stated explicitly that the boundary ran along the main chain of the Karakoram mountain to the passes in Changchenmo, that is to say it is the Chinese maps, rather than the current Indian maps, that have correctly delineated this sector of the boundary. What is of special significance is the fact that no boundary line, let alone an "accurate" boundary line, was drawn at all for this sector on the official map compiled by the Survey of India as late as the 1943 edition. On its 1950 map, though the same colour for Kashmir was painted in the area disputed by India, still no boundary line was drawn, and there were marked the words "Boundary Undefined". This fact already been pointed out above.

Fourthly, the Indian Government says that the traditional customary line claimed by it possesses in addition, distinct geographical features, that is, it runs along the watershed. However, to begin with, the principle of watershed is not the sole or main international principle for the delimitation of boundaries. It is particularly impermissible to use the watershed as a pretext for seeking a boundary line within the territory of another country. Next, the traditional customary line claimed by the Indian Government, instead of separating the Hotien River system from the Indus River system, actually cuts across the Hotien River system. On the contrary, the traditional customary line as shown on Chinese maps truly reflects the geographical features of this area, that is, having no steep slopes in the north-south direction, the area is easily passable and therefore, naturally forms the only route linking Sinkiang and western Tibet. To the west, however, there lies between this region and Ladakh the towering Karakoram mountain range which is extremely difficult to pass through.
The Indian Government also admits that this area is extremely difficult of access from Ladakh.

It can thus be seen that judging by the actual administrative jurisdiction at all times or by the maps and geographical features referred to by India, the line claimed by India to be the traditional customary boundary line in the western sector is without any foundation; while the traditional customary line for which China stands is truly well-founded.

(2) Concerning the middle sector. The disputed areas involved here owing to difference of conception between the two sides regarding the traditional customary line—Chuva, Chuje, Shipki Pass, Sang, Tsungsha, Puling-Sumdo, Wuje, Sangcha and Lapthal—are all traditional Chinese territory. Except Sang and Tsungsha which were invaded and occupied by Britain earlier, they were all occupied or intruded into by India only after the signing of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement.

The local authorities of the Tibet region have kept up to now the land-conferring documents or land deeds concerning these places issued in the past few centuries. For example, the mandate issued in the name of the 7th Dalai Lama in the 18th century stated specifically that Wuje was within the territorial limits of Daba Dzong of Tibet. Furthermore, the local authorities of the Tibet region have all along been collecting taxes in these places and the census record and taxation papers of some of these places have been well preserved down to the present time.

Nearly all those who have lived long in these places are of the Tibetan nationality of China. Despite foreign occupation of their places of residence, they still did not wish to be separated from their motherland. For instance, after Sang and Tsungsha were occupied by Britain, the local population still considered themselves Chinese nationals, and no more than one occasion pledged their allegiance to the local government of the Tibet region of China in statements made to the local authorities of the Tibet region.

It must be pointed out in particular that among the above mentioned places, Puling-Sumdo is one of the ten places which the Chinese Government agreed to open as markets for trade in the Ari district of Tibet as specified in Article II, Section 2 of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954. It was opened together with the nine other markets in compliance with request made by Mr. N. Raghavan, representative of the Indian Government and Indian Ambassador, at the first meeting of the negotiations. Puling-Sumdo, however, was occupied by India soon after the signing of the 1954 Agreement.

The Indian Government claims that it has all along been exercising jurisdiction over the above-mentioned places. However, in the note annexed to Prime Minister Nehru’s letter of September 26, 1959, apart from some extremely strained arguments in connection with Sang and Tsungsha, there are no concrete facts whatever to show that jurisdiction has always been exercised over the seven other places.

The principle of watershed put forward by the Indian Government cannot be applied here either, as it does not conform with the jurisdiction actually exercised by each side.
The maps published by the two sides also show that it is China, not India, which has abided by the traditional customary line. The delineations of this sector of the boundary on past Chinese maps, though leaving a few very small pieces of Chinese territory outside of the Chinese boundary, on the whole reflected the correct traditional customary line. On the other hand, no boundary line was drawn for this sector on official Indian maps even as late as 1950, and only the words “Boundary Undefined” were marked.

(3) Concerning the eastern sector. The area between the so-called McMahon Line and the boundary line at the southern foot of the Himalayas as shown on Chinese maps has always belonged to China, and was until recently still under Chinese Jurisdiction. This is proved by a mass of facts.

As early as the middle of the seventeenth century, the local government of the Tibet region of China had begun to exercise jurisdiction over this area comprising Monyul, Loyul and Lower Tsayul. Take the Monyul area for example. In the middle of the seventeenth century, when the fifth Dalai Lama unified Tibet, he sent his disciple Mera Lama and tribal chief Namka Drukdha, Dinpon of Tsona, to the Monyul area to establish their rule there. By the beginning of the eighteenth century, the local government of the Tibet region had unified the whole of Monyul and divided the area gradually into 32 “tso” (a few named “din”). At Tawang the capital of Monyul, an administrative committee known as “Tawang Shidrel” and a non-permanent administrative conference of a higher level known as “Tawang Drudrel” were set up to direct the affairs of the whole area. The local government of the Tibet region used always to appoint the officials of the administrative organs at various levels in Monyul, collect taxes (mainly grain tax, twice a year) and exercise judicial authority in all parts of the area. Monyul was included in every census conducted in Tibet in the past and was not treated as an exceptional case. The religious economic and cultural life of the local people, the Monbas, has been deeply influenced by the Tibetan nationality; they believe in Lamaism, can speak the Tibetan language, and used Tibetan currency. It is from the Monyul area that the 6th Dalai Lama, Tsanyun Gyaltso, hailed, and his house there received for all generations the mandates conferred by successive regimes of the Tibet region.

In addition, it must be pointed out that even after the so-called McMahon Line was defined and made public, the local government of the Tibet region continued to exercise extensively and for a long period of time its jurisdiction over this area. For instance, the Tibetan administrative institutions in Monyul had been almost kept intact until 1951. In Loyul and Lower Tsayul, up to 1946, the administrative organs of “tso” and “din” were maintained quite extensively, and the people continued to pay taxes and render corvee to the Lhasa authorities.

Therefore, the allegations of the Indian Government that “the Tibetan authorities have not exercise jurisdiction at any time in this area,” that the local “tribes have not been affected in the slightest degree by any Tibetan influence, cultural, political or other,” and so on are incredible.
The Indian Government claims that it has always exercised jurisdiction over this area. However, in Prime Minister Nehru's own words, Indian administration had "gradually moved up" to this area; the tribes had generally been left "more or less to look after themselves" until around 1914; and British political officers only "visited these areas." And what did the British officers who had visited this area say? The Captain Bailey referred to by Prime Minister Nehru in his letter of September 26, 1959, who was specially sent by the British Indian Government in 1913 to south-eastern Tibet to conduct illegal exploration and survey for the purpose of defining the so-called McMahon Line, described the jurisdiction of the Tibet local government over the Monyul area at the time in his book "No Passport To Tibet" published in 1957; he further stated in his letter to the London Times published on September 7 this year that, "When we reached Tawang (i.e. capital of Monyul), we found a purely Tibetan administration in force." Even Christoph Von Furer-Haimendorf, then Special Officer of the Indian External Affairs Department in Subansiri, who was sent by the Indian Assam authorities in 1944, that is, thirty years after the so-called McMahon Line was defined, to explore this area, also testified in his book "Himalayan Barbary" published in 1955, that the frontier in this area was undefined and unsurveyed, and remained unadministered by the Indian authorities. It can thus be seen how untenable are the assertions that the area has belonged to India for tens and hundreds of years, that the current boundary has always been the historical boundary, etc., etc.

The Indian Government says that the British concluded a number of agreements with some of the local tribes between 1844 and 1888 and that these agreements are evidence of Indian jurisdiction. However, the 1853 agreement with the Monbas cited by Prime Minister Nehru, begins with the statement by the Monbas: "We...being deputed by the Daba Rajas to carry letters of friendship to the Agent. Governor-General, North-East Frontier, desiring that the former friendly relations which existed between the Government of India and our Lhasa Government... should be again resumed..." This passage proves exactly and indisputably that the Monbas belong to Tibet, not India, and that it was under the premise of recognizing them as belonging to Tibet that the Indian Government concluded the agreement with them. The Daba Rajas referred to here was the Regent of the local government of the Tibet region. As to the agreements with the Abors and the Akas cited, it can also be seen clearly from their texts that the areas of those tribes were not British territory. Some of the agreements even stated explicitly that British territory "extends of the foot of the hills (i.e. southern foot of the Himalayas)." And these peoples were not British subjects.

It can be seen from the above historical data provided by the Chinese and Indian sides respectively that this area always belonged to China, not to Britain or India.

This conclusion is further confirmed forcefully by the authoritative maps published in the two countries. The maps published in China as a rule include this area in Chinese territory, that is, marking the boundary line along the true traditional boundary at the southern foot of the Himalayas. According to material now available to the Chinese Government, the same delineation was followed on the official maps published by the Survey of India up to and including the 1938 edition. After 1938 and up to 1952, the Survey of India changed its delineation by marking the boundary in accordance with the so-called McMahon Line, but still using marking for undemarcated boundary. Since 1954, it has again changed the undemarcated boundary into demarcated boundary. By these successive changes, it shifted from its original position of recognizing this area as Chinese territory to that of claiming this area as India’s lawful territory at all times. Nevertheless, the delineation on current Indian maps has not been accepted internationally. As stated above, the Atlas edited by John Bartholomew, cartographer to the King of Britain, and published in 1958 still considered it a disputed area, while the delineation on the map “India 1945”, attached to Prime Minister Nehru’s book “The Discovery of India,” was still the same as that on Chinese maps.

In the face of these authoritative facts, the Atlas of the Chinese Empire published in London in 1906 by the China Inland Mission, a British church organization, to which the Indian Government referred, is obviously without significance.

It can be seen from what has been said in the above that the Chinese Government’s view of the traditional customary line is based on objective facts and confirmed by a mass of factual data in all its sectors, western, middle and eastern. On the other hand, the boundary line marked on Indian maps, with the exception of the middle sector which for the most part conforms to reality, does not represent at all the traditional customary line. The eastern and western sectors of this boundary line, it can in particular be seen beyond any shadow of doubt, are the product of the British policy of aggression and expansion in modern history.

It should not have been necessary to discuss the British policy of aggression and expansion in modern history, as the history of India itself, the history of India’s adjacent countries which had once been a part of British India or its dependency, the history of China, and, in particular, the history of China’s Tibet region bordering adjoining India, all bear witness to this policy. While embarking on armed aggression against Tibet and conspiring to cause Tibet to break away from China, Britain also nibbled at the frontiers of Tibet both on the maps and in deed, which resulted in this boundary line that was later inherited by India and is marked on current India maps. Of course, the great Indian people, who treasure peace, can in no way be held responsible for all the acts of aggression committed by Britain with India as its base. It is, however, surprising that the Indian Government should claim the boundary line which Britain unlawfully created through aggression against Tibet and which even includes areas to which British authority had not extended as the traditional customary boundary line, while perversely describing the true traditional customary boundary line pointed out by the Chinese Government on the basis of objective facts as laying claim to large tracts of Indian territory. How would the Indian Government feel, if it were in the position of the Chinese Government? If this assertion is maintained, the inevitable conclusion to be derived would be that the British colonialists were most fairminded while oppressed China was full of undisguised ambitions; that the powerful British imperialism was, for the past one hundred years and more, invariably upholding the traditional Sino-Indian boundary, while the weak China was ceaselessly encroaching upon British territory! The Chinese Government believes that no one would accept this conclusion.

QUESTION III

What is the Proper Way To Settle The Sino-Indian Boundary Dispute?

The Chinese Government, starting from the above-mentioned facts that the Sino-Indian boundary has never been formerly delimited and that there is difference of conception between the two sides regarding the boundary, has consistently held that an overall settlement of the boundary question between the two countries should be sought by the Chinese and Indian sides, taking into account the historical background and present actual situation, in accordance with the Five Principles and through friendly consultations; that pending this, as a provisional measure, the two sides should maintain the status quo of the border, and not seek to change it by unilateral action, let alone by force; and that as to some of the disputes partial and provisional agreements could be reached through negotiations.

The Indian Government disagrees with the Chinese Government’s statement that the boundary has not been delimited and an over-all settlement of the question should be sought through negotiations, and only acknowledges that certain minor, partial adjustments could be made. Yet the Indian Government agrees that the two sides should maintain the status quo of the border, avoid the use of force and settle the disputes through negotiations. Thus, although there are differences between the two sides, the tranquillity of the border and the friendship of the two countries could have been ensured. Contrary to the expectations of the Chinese Government, the Indian Government has time and again asserted that the Chinese Government had previously agreed that the boundary had been delimited and accepted the Indian Government’s claim regarding the boundary and that the Chinese Government changed its stand only recently. At the same time, the Indian Government has also made incorrect interpretations of the status quo of the border, repeatedly violated the status quo in actual deeds and even resorted to force, thus creating tension on the border. In these circumstances, the Indian Government has perversely charged that the Chinese Government should be held responsible for all this and said that China harboured ambitions of “aggression” and “expansion”. The above-mentioned attitude of the Indian Government has made the boundary question all the more difficult and complicated.

Therefore, the Chinese Government deems it necessary to clarify the following points:

1. Whether the Chinese Government has ever agreed that the boundary was delimited and accepted the Indian Government’s claim regarding the boundary and changed its stand afterwards.

The Indian Government has referred to the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954, holding that this Agreement has dealt with all the outstanding issues between India and the Tibet region, and that therefore the boundary question should be considered settled.
As a matter of fact, the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 is an agreement on trade and intercourse between the Tibet region of China and India and has nothing to do with the boundary question and no provision concerning the boundary can be found in any article of the Agreement. It may be recalled that at that time, the question which the two countries were most concerned about and which called for urgent solution was the establishment of normal relations between India and the Tibet region of China on a new basis. During the negotiations, neither side asked to discuss the boundary question; this was intended to avoid affecting the settlement of the most urgent question at the time. Both sides were clear on this point. At the very beginning of the negotiations, Premier Chou En-lai made it clear to the Indian Government Delegation that the task of the negotiations was “to settle those outstanding questions between the two countries which are ripe for settlement.” Afterwards, at the fourth meeting held on January 8, 1953 the two sides jointly defined the task of the negotiations as settling those outstanding questions between the two countries which were ripe for settlement in accordance with the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence. On April 23 of the same year, the Chinese representative further pointed out that the negotiations would not touch on the boundary question. The Indian representative agreed to this view of the Chinese side. There was, therefore, no fact whatever to show that the Chinese Government agreed to the Indian Government's conception of the boundary or that it would not bring up the boundary question for discussion afterwards.

The Indian Government has also referred to the talks between the two Prime Ministers in Peking in October 1954, expressing the view that Premier Chou En-lai’s remarks about Chinese maps implied that the Chinese Government would revise its maps in accordance with Indian maps, that is to say, the Chinese Government had accepted the Indian Government’s claim regarding the boundary.

The fact is that at that time Prime Minister Nehru took exception to the delineation of the Sino-Indian boundary line on Chinese maps and therefore Premier Chou En-lai explained that the delineation of the boundary on Chinese maps followed that of the old maps and that it would not be fitting for the Chinese Government, on its own, to change the delineation of the boundary before conducting surveys and consulting with the countries concerned. In particular, Premier Chou En-lai pointed out at the time that China has undelimited boundaries with India and some other south-western neighbouring countries. Prime Minister Nehru said, however, that he considered that no boundary question existed between China and India. It can be seen from this conversation that there was an obvious difference of views between the two sides regarding the boundary, and that Premier Chou En-lai clearly expressed his disagreement to any unilateral revision of maps.

The Indian Government has also referred to the talks between the two Prime Ministers held in India at the end of 1956, considering that Premier Chou En-lai’s remarks made at the time about the so-called McMahon Line implied that the Chinese Government recognized this line.

In fact, when Premier Chou En-lai referred to the so-called McMahon Line, he said that it was illegal and had never been recognized by the Chinese Government. He explained at the same time that despite this, in order to ensure the tranquillity of the border and out of consideration for the friendship of the two countries, Chinese military and administrative personnel would strictly refrain from crossing this line and expressed the hope that a proper way to settle the eastern sector of the boundary might be found at a later date. This statement of Premier Chou En-lai can by no means be interpreted as recognition of this line by the Chinese Government.

It can thus be seen that the Chinese Government has been consistent in its attitude that the boundary has not been delimited and is yet to be settled through negotiations between the two countries. The Indian Government's implication that the Chinese Government has changed its original stand does not accord with the facts.

(2) Whether the Chinese Government scrupulously respects the status quo of the border.

It is a principle agreed upon by both sides that pending an over-all settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question, the status quo of the border should be maintained.

The Chinese Government has faithfully abided by this principle. In the ten years since liberation, Chinese military and administrative personnel have been under orders not to go beyond the areas which have always been under Chinese jurisdiction, and even not to cross the so-called McMahon Line in the eastern sector.

The Indian Government's interpretation of the status quo of the border, however, is based not on the actual scope of jurisdiction of the two sides, but on the unilaterally fixed boundary line shown on Indian maps that includes large areas where Indian jurisdiction has never reached. Thus armed Indian personnel have repeatedly violated the status quo of the border and, step by step, extended the scope of its occupation by encroaching on Parigas, Chuva, Chuje, Shipki Pass, Puling-Sumdo, Sangcha and Lapthal, and intruded into Aksai Chin, Lake Pangong, Kongka Pass and Wujie. But the Indian Government describes all these actions as maintenance of the status quo. In the eastern sector, after the outbreak of the rebellion in Tibet in March this year, armed Indian personnel even overstepped the so-called McMahon Line, at one time occupied Longju and Tamaden, and is now still in occupation of Khinzemane, all of which are situated north of that Line.

Although the Indian side has occupied Puling-Sumdo, one of the Chinese markets specified in the 1954 Agreement and once occupied Tamaden which India itself admits to be Chinese territory, yet the Indian Government has all along denied having violated the status quo of the border. Moreover, basing itself on the boundary line shown on its own maps, the Indian Government accused China of violating the status quo of the border. To this the Chinese Government cannot agree.

(3) Whether the Chinese Government has earnestly avoided using force.

73
Recently, two armed clashes which neither side wished to see occurred in the Migyitun area and the Kongka Pass area. This was extremely unfortunate. But it is not China that should be held responsible for them. The Migyitun area incident of August 25 was caused by the action of the armed Indian personnel who had invaded and occupied Longju in advancing further to the southern vicinity of Migyitun and attacking a Chinese patrol. Armed Chinese personnel never attacked the outpost established illegally by India at Longju; on the contrary, it was the armed Indian personnel from the Longju outpost who opened fire on an even larger scale on the following day, but the Chinese troops stationed at Migyitun never returned fire. The allegation that Chinese troops drove armed Indian personnel out of their outpost at Longju by superior force is not true. Armed Chinese personnel entered Longju only on September 1, that is, the sixth day counting from August 27 when the armed Indian personnel withdrew.

The case of the Kongka Pass incident of October 21 is even more obvious. On the day after three armed Indian personnel were detained on their intrusion into Chinese territory more than 60 armed Indian personnel carrying light and heavy machine guns and other weapons intruded further into Chinese territory, and launched an armed attack on a Chinese patrol numbering 14 only and carrying light arms alone. Both before and after the Indian party opened fire, the Chinese patrol gave repeated warnings not to shoot. The Chinese deputy squad leader, Wu Ching-Kuo, waved his hands to the Indian personnel and called on them not to shoot, but this esteemed comrade was the first man to be hit and killed. Only after this was the Chinese patrol forced to return fire.

That China has consistently refused to use force is further borne out by the following facts:

(a) When a situation of the armed forces of the two sides facing each other first appeared on the Chinese territory of Wuje in 1955, the Chinese Government took the initiative in proposing that neither side should station troops in Wuje pending a settlement through negotiations.

(b) With regard to Chinese territories of Parigas, Chuva, Chuje, Shipki Pass, Sang, Tsungsha, Puling-Sumdo, Sangcha, Lapthal and Kinzemeane, which have been occupied by the Indian side, the Chinese Government has never tried compelling the armed Indian personnel to withdraw by force of arms. Even in regard to such an area as Tamaden, which the Indian Government itself admits to be Chinese territory, the Chinese Government also patiently waited for the Indian troops to withdraw of their own accord and did not resort to force.

(c) With regard to armed Indian personnel who intruded into the garrison areas of Chinese frontier outposts, the Chinese frontier guard units first of all invariably advised them to leave Chinese territory and it was only when they refused to listen to such advice were they disarmed and afterwards sent out of Chinese territory together with their arms.

(d) All the Chinese frontier guards are under strict orders absolutely to refrain from using their arms unless they are already subjected to armed attack.
(e) After the occurrence of the unfortunate Kongka Pass incident, the Chinese Government immediately ordered its troops guarding the Sino-Indian border to stop patrolling the entire border.

(f) In order completely and effectively to prevent any border clashes, the Chinese Government has recently proposed time and again that the armed personnel of the two sides on the border respectively withdraw 20 kilometers or some other appropriate distance.

The above-mentioned facts prove that the Chinese Government has adopted all possible measures to maintain the tranquillity of the border and to prevent the use of force and the occurrence of armed clashes.

After the Kongka Pass incident, the Indian Government also instructed its frontier guards to stop patrolling and indicated to the Chinese Government that in any event neither side should resort to force except as a last resort in self-defence. This is undoubtedly worthy of welcome. Prior to the occurrence of these two clashes, however, the Indian Government in its note dated August 11 this year had informed the Chinese Government to the effect that Indian frontier guards had instructions “to resist trespassers and to use minimum force necessary for this purpose if warning given by them remains unheeded.” The Indian Government’s note also stated that “if any Chinese troops are still within Indian territory, they should be immediately withdrawn as otherwise this may lead to avoidable clash.” Even after the occurrence of the first clash, the Indian frontier guards, according to the note sent by the Indian Government to China on August 27, 1959, still had instructions to “use force on the trespassers if necessary.” It must be pointed out that since there are divergences both between the two countries’ conceptions of the boundary and between their maps, and since the Indian Government regards large tracts of Chinese territory which have always been under Chinese jurisdiction as Indian territory, Chinese military and administrative personnel stationed on the soil of their own country would inevitably be called “trespassers” by the Indian side. In this way, Indian subordinates in carrying out these instructions, could use force more or less freely according to their own judgement. Obviously, it cannot be said that the occurrence of the two unfortunate border incidents was unrelated to such instructions:

(4) Whether China wants to engage in “aggression” and expansion.”

Centering around the Sino-Indian boundary question, there has recently appeared in India a great deal of anti-Chinese pronouncements, which in cold war language slander China as “imperialism,” “expanding into India” and “committing aggression.” The Chinese people cannot but feel deep regret at such malicious attacks against China, which simply fly in the face of facts.

The Chinese Government has noted that there is at present in India a rather prevalent observation that China has now grown strong and, like certain Chinese rulers in history or modern imperialists, would seek expansion abroad. Apart from those who are obviously hostile to China, the great majority of those who spread this observation probably do so because they lack an accurate understanding of New China. In these circumstances, the Chinese Government deems it useful to explain China’s stand once more to the Government and people of India.

Although the Chinese people have begun to score some achievements, China is still very backward economically and culturally and it will still take the Chinese people decades or even over a hundred years of arduous efforts to overcome such backwardness. But at no time in future will China become a threat to its neighbouring countries, just as China does not believe that India, after it has grown strong as China fervently hopes, would become a threat to China. To say that the growth of China’s population and industry would constitute a threat to its neighbours is utterly incomprehensible to the Chinese people. China’s social system is a socialist one under which political and economic powers are in the hands of the working people and the people and Government of socialist China have not, nor can they have, nor should they have, any intention of threatening others. Moreover, the following facts must be taken note of. Firstly, although China’s population has increased at a higher rate since liberation, yet the average annual rate of increase is only two per cent, while the average annual rate of increase in China’s grain output has reached 9.8 per cent, the highest annual rate of increase being 35 per cent. In the future, the per unit area grain output and agricultural labour productivity in China will still be greatly raised. Apart from that, China has a vast territory, more than half of which is sparsely populated and will take great efforts to develop. Therefore the Chinese people absolutely do not need to seize the territory of other countries to feed themselves. Secondly, although China’s industry has undergone some development, it still by far cannot satisfy the needs of the people at home. China is rich in natural resources and has a huge domestic market; its industry neither needs to grab raw materials from abroad nor needs to dump its products in foreign countries. Thirdly, the development of China’s industry and agriculture has led to a shortage, not surplus, of labour power in China. Therefore, China has no surplus population to send abroad.

In order to attain their great goals in peaceful construction, the Chinese people are in urgent need of a long-term peaceful international environment. Therefore, in conducting its foreign relations the Chinese Government has consistently pursued a policy of peace and is desirous of living in friendship with all countries, big and small, on the basis of the Five Principles. With regard to the outstanding issues between China and other countries, the Chinese Government has consistently stood for their fair and reasonable settlement by peaceful methods without resorting to force. It is not only impossible, improper and unnecessary for China to commit aggression against its neighbours, rather it is its earnest hope that they would all grow prosperous and strong rapidly. Because only thus can we altogether more effectively prevent imperialist war and aggression and maintain peace in this area; only thus can we better meet each other’s needs and help each other in construction work.

So far as the question of boundary is concerned, China absolutely does not want one inch of another country’s territory. There are undelimited boundaries between China and many of its neighbouring countries, but China has never taken, and will never take, advantage of this situation to make any changes in the actually existing state of affairs.
on the borders by unilateral action. Whether or not the boundary has been delimited, China is always prepared to work in close cooperation with its neighbours for the creation of the most peaceful, secure and friendly border zones so that there will be no mutual misgivings or clashes over the border questions.

With regard to Bhutan and Sikkim, some explanation may be given in passing. China has no other intentions than that of living with them in friendship without committing aggression against each other. Concerning the boundary between China and Bhutan, there is only a certain discrepancy between the delineation on the maps of the two sides in the sector south of the so-called McMahon Line. But it has always been tranquil along the border between the two countries. The boundary between China and Sikkim has long been formally delimited and there is neither any discrepancy between the maps nor any disputes in practice. All allegations that China wants to “encroach on” Bhutan and Sikkim, just like the allegations that China wants to commit aggression against India and other south-western neighbouring countries, are sheer nonsense.

The basic stand of the Chinese Government towards its neighbours has long been defined time and again and there should have been no need to deal with it at length. It is, however, unfortunate that recently, particularly since the putting down of the rebellion of the reactionary serf-owners in the Tibet region of China, India has in various ways distorted and attacked the Chinese attitude. In the interest of friendship of the two countries, the Chinese Government does not wish to answer attack with attack, but would rather assume that the Indian Government really has some misunderstandings about China’s intentions. It may be that, for certain reasons, the campaign against China would still continue. Even if unfortunately that should be the case, the Chinese Government absolutely refuses to think that the misunderstandings about China of those who harbour no ill-will would likewise continue for long. Because, if China were really committing aggression against and posing threat to India or any other country, ten thousand denials would not alter the fact; if it is otherwise, although ten thousand propaganda machines tell the whole world about China’s “aggression” and “threat,” they will only discredit the propagandists themselves. “The strength of a horse is known by the distance travelled, and the heart of a man is seen with the passage of time.” China’s peaceful and friendly attitude toward India will stand the test of time. The Chinese Government is convinced that, though the truth of a matter may be hidden for a while, it is impossible to hide it up for long.

(5) Where lies the key to the settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question?

There exist important differences between the Governments of China and India in their stand on the boundary question and there is still tension between the two countries on the border. But the Chinese Government has never had any doubt that the tension will eventually pass away and a reasonable settlement of the boundary question will be reached through friendly consultations.
The confidence of the Chinese Government is based on the following: There is friendship of thousands of years’ duration but no irreconcilable conflict between the two countries; both sides urgently need to devote themselves to long-term peaceful construction at home and are willing to work for the defence of world peace; and it is uncalled-for as well as unthinkable to go on arguing like this without end. On the boundary question, both sides have indicated their willingness to maintain the status quo of the border and to settle the boundary dispute by peaceful means. This shows that a basis exists for China and India to live together in friendship and that the boundary question could be settled in a reasonable way. Besides, looking at it the other way round, there is no alternative. It is impossible for the two sides to change the geographical reality of their being neighbours or to break off all contacts along the lengthy boundary line. It is particularly impossible to entertain the absurd idea that our two great friendly neighbours with a combined population of more than one thousand million might start a war over such temporary and local disputes. Therefore, a friendly settlement of the boundary disputes by peaceful means is the only logical answer.

What are the key questions which demand an urgent solution right now? The Chinese Government has the honour to present the following opinions to the Indian Government:

(a) The Chinese Government is of the opinion that no matter what views the two sides may hold about any specific matter concerning the boundary, there should no longer be any difference of opinion about the most basic fact known to the whole world, that is the entire boundary between the two countries has indeed never been delimited, and is therefore yet to be settled through negotiations. Recognition of this simple fact should not create any difficulties for either side, because it would neither impair the present interests of either side, nor in any way prevent both sides from making their own claims at the boundary negotiations. Once agreement is reached on this point, it could be said that the way has been opened to the settlement of the boundary question. Although up to now each side has persisted in its own views on the concrete disputes concerning the different sectors of the boundary, provided both sides attach importance to the fundamental interest of friendship of the two countries and adopt an unprejudiced attitude and one of mutual understanding and accommodation, it would not be difficult to settle these disputes. If India’s opinions prove to be more reasonable and more in the interest of friendship of the two countries, they should be accepted by China; if China’s opinions prove to be more reasonable and more in the interest of friendship of the two countries, they should be accepted by India. It is the hope of the Chinese Government that the forthcoming meeting between the Prime Ministers of the two countries will first of all reach agreement on some principles on the boundary question so as to provide guidance and basis for the future discussion and the working out of a solution by the two sides.

(b) Pending the formal delimitation of the boundary, the status quo of the border between the two countries must be effectively maintained and the tranquillity of the border ensured. For this purpose, the Chinese Government proposes that the armed forces of the two sides along the border respectively withdraw 20 kilometers or some other distance considered appropriate by the two sides, and that, as a step preliminary to this basic measure, the armed personnel of both sides stop patrolling along the entire border.

The Chinese Government believes that if agreement can be reached on the two points mentioned above, the situation on the Sino-Indian border will undergo an immediate change and the dark clouds hanging over the relations between the two countries will quickly vanish.

The Chinese Government earnestly hopes that the views it has set forth here at great length on the past, present, and future of the Sino-Indian boundary question would receive the most good-willed understanding of the Indian Government, thereby helping to bring about a settlement of this question satisfactory to both the sides and a turn for the better in the relations between the two countries. Although some arguing cannot be helped in order to make reply to unfair charges, the intention and aim of the Chinese Government is not to argue, but to bring arguing to an end.

China and India are two great countries each with its great past and future. Guided by the great ideal of the Five Principles of peaceful coexistence, the two countries have over the past few years joined hands and cooperated closely in defence of world peace. Today, history again issues a call to the peoples of the two countries asking them to make still greater contributions internationally to the cause of peace and human progress, while accomplishing tremendous changes at home. The task falling on the shoulders of the Chinese and Indian peoples of the present generation is both arduous and glorious. The Chinese Government wishes to reiterate here its ardent desire that the two countries stop quarrelling, quickly bring about a reasonable settlement of the boundary question, and on this basis consolidate and develop the great friendship of the two peoples in their common cause.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China,
5 February 1960

New Delhi, February 5, 1960

MY DEAR PRIME MINISTER,

My Government is sending you separately, through our Ambassador in Peking, a reply to the note of the Chinese Government which was handed to the Indian Embassy on the 26th December 1959.

I confess that I do not particularly like this long distance correspondence which consists of a reaffirmation of our respective views, and yet there is no escape from this when questions of far-reaching importance are raised between Governments and statements made which cannot be accepted.

You were good enough to suggest that we should meet to discuss these matters and, so far as we are concerned, it has been our consistent policy to welcome such meetings and informal approaches which sometimes lead to helpful results. But I found that the respective viewpoints of our two Governments, in regard to the matters under discussion, were so wide apart and opposed to each other that there was little ground left for useful talks. I suggested in my letter of November 16, 1959, certain preliminary steps which would have eased the situation and facilitated further discussions. Unfortunately you have not found yourself able to accept those proposals. I still hope that you will reconsider your decision in this matter.

In the latest note from the Government of the People's Republic of China, emphasis has been laid on our entire boundary never having been delimited. That is a statement which appears to us to be wholly incorrect, and we cannot accept it. On that basis there can be no negotiations.

It has pained me deeply that the relations between India and China which have in the past been so friendly and which we had endeavoured so much to strengthen, should have deteriorated rapidly and led to bitterness and resentment. That is a tragedy for both our countries as well as for the larger issues in the world. For my part, I have endeavoured and shall continue to endeavour to find a way to a peaceful settlement and for a restoration of friendly relations. But for the moment, I do not see any common ground between our respective viewpoints.

Nevertheless I think that we should make every effort to explore avenues which might lead to a peaceful settlement. Although any negotiations on the basis you have suggested are not possible, still I think it might be helpful for us to meet. I am afraid it is not possible for me to leave India during the next few months. The budget session of our Parliament is beginning on February 8 and this will require my presence here. I would, however, be glad if you could take the trouble to come to Delhi for this purpose at a time convenient to you and us. You will be our honoured guest when you come here. I would suggest that some time in the second half of March might be fixed for this meeting, if it is convenient to you.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

His Excellency Mr. Chou En-lai,
Prime Minister of the People's Republic of China,
Peking.
Note of the Government of India to the Chinese Government,
12 February 1960

The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to refer to the Chinese Government's Note handed on the 26th December, 1959, to the Embassy of India in Peking. In reply, the Embassy has been directed by the Government of India to state as follows:

2. The Government of India regret that the Chinese Government have not fully considered the various points raised in the Prime Minister of India's letter of September 26, 1959 to the Chinese Premier and in the Note handed by the Ministry of External Affairs to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China on November 4, 1959. The Government of China have merely reiterated their claims to vast areas of Indian territory and ignored the facts mentioned in the letter. It was the earnest hope of the Government of India that a proper appreciation of the facts and historical data presented by them in support of their stand regarding the boundary would pave the way for an amicable settlement by narrowing down the issues for discussion.
The Government of India have to state with regret, however, that the Government of China in their Note not only do not accept incontrovertible facts but disregard major frontier Agreements by untenable interpretation of their terms or by questioning their validity. Such an approach can hardly lead to an understanding which both countries desire.

3. The Government of China contend that the Sino-Indian boundary has not been formally delimited and in support of that contention allege that the boundary has not been determined by treaties and agreements.
The Government of India cannot accept this contention. The Sino-Indian boundary, based on custom and tradition, follows natural features, and for the major part this customary and traditional boundary is also confirmed by treaty and agreement. This boundary throughout has been fixed and well-known for centuries. According to international usage and practice a customary boundary which follows well-known and unchanging natural features like main watersheds stands defined and does not require further or formal definition. It is significant that until recently no Chinese Government ever challenged it, or protested against the exercise of the sovereign jurisdiction of India up to this traditional boundary. In view of all these facts, the Government of India cannot agree that negotiations have to be conducted to reach new agreements for fresh determination of the Sino-Indian boundary.

4. The Government of China have stated that the present controversy has arisen because "the Sino-Indian boundary has never been delimited, Britain left behind in this respect a heritage of certain disputes and moreover the Indian Government has made a series of unacceptable charges against China". The Government of India cannot accept either the assertions or the imputations contained in this statement. In fact the present controversy regarding the boundary and the tension on the border have arisen because the Chinese Government laid claims to extensive areas of Indian territory for the first time on September 8, 1959, and intruded into Indian territory, both before and afterwards, in furtherance of their claims. The Government of India are particularly surprised and shocked by this attitude and action of a neighbour whose friendship they have always cherished. Despite these unwelcome developments, the Government and the people of India have shown the utmost restraint. They have always been willing to explore the possibilities of a peaceful settlement. But an amicable settlement cannot be reached on the basis that a new agreement has to be negotiated to determine afresh the entire Sino-Indian boundary. Such a basis for negotiations would ignore past history, custom, tradition and international agreements and is, therefore, entirely unacceptable to the Government of India. The Government of India wish to state again that they are prepared to discuss specific disputes in regard to the location of particular places on the boundary, and to make minor frontier rectifications by agreement, where they may be considered necessary.

5. The following paragraphs give in brief the basic data in regard to the international boundary. They also deal with the arguments advanced by the Chinese Government in their Note of December 26, 1959.

6. Taking the Ladakh sector first, it is wrong to say, as the Chinese Government have done, that according to the Government of India the boundary of Ladakh was fixed by the Treaty of 1842. In fact the boundaries of Ladakh were fixed and well recognised from the 17th century onwards. The 1842 Treaty did not fix the boundary but merely confirmed it. That this traditional boundary lay where Indian maps are showing it is confirmed by those who visited this area in the 19th century. The Government of China have quoted unofficial maps published by Hayward in 1870 and Robert Shaw in 1871, as well as an article by Hayward, to prove their contention that the traditional eastern boundary of Ladakh lay where the Chinese maps are now showing it. Hayward, however, surveyed only the western extremity of Aksai Chin, and Shaw's route lay even further westwards. Their opinions, therefore, are not authoritative for eastern Aksai Chin. The latter area was surveyed by Johnson in 1865 and visited by the second Yarkand Mission in 1873. It is their reports, therefore, that are authoritative in regard to the eastern boundary of Ladakh, and their maps and accounts substantiate the traditional Indian alignment.

7. The Chinese Government assert that the 1842 Treaty was between Tibet and Kashmir whereas about 80 per cent of the area now claimed by them is part of Sinkiang. The Government of India are surprised at this contention. Prime Minister Nehru has already dealt with this point in his letter of September 26. The Treaty itself makes it clear that China was a party to it. The following quotation from the Treaty is relevant:

“Now that in the presence of God, the ill-feeling created by the war which had intervened, has been fully removed from the hearts. and no complaints now remain (on either side), there will never be on any account in future, till the world lasts, any deviation even by the hair's breadth and any breach in the alliance, friendship and unity between the King of the world Siri Khalsaji Sahib and Siri Maharaj Sahib Raja-i-Rajagan (Raja of Rajas) Raja Sahib Bahadur, and the Khagan (Emperor) of China and the Lama Guru Sahib..."
of Lhasa. We shall remain in possession of the limits of the boundaries of Ladakh and the neighbourhood subordinate to it, in accordance with the old custom, and there shall be no transgression and no interference (in the country) beyond the old established frontiers. We shall hold to our own respective frontiers.”

In fact, the treaty was concluded to terminate a war in which Tibet had appealed to China for assistance against Kashmir. The statement in the Chinese note that 80 per cent. of the area was part of Sinkiang in 1842 is unfounded. Even Chinese maps of the 18th and 19th centuries show clearly that Sinkiang never extended south of the Kuen Lun mountains.

8. The Chinese Government state that nothing came of the proposal in 1899 “to delimit the boundary”. This again shows a failure to take into account the facts as stated in the Prime Minister of India’s letter of September 26, 1959. It was clearly stated in that letter that the proposal made in 1899 by the British referred not to the eastern frontier of Ladakh with Tibet but to the northern frontier of Ladakh with Sinkiang. That proposal stated explicitly that the northern boundary ran along the Kuen Lun range to a point east of 80 degrees east longitude, where it met the eastern boundary of Ladakh. This showed beyond doubt that the whole of the Aksai Chin area lay in Indian territory, and the Government of China did not object to this definition of the boundary. If nothing came of the proposal of 1899, it was not because the Chinese Government declined to recognise the boundary according to the traditional alignment shown on Indian maps, but because even then they did not seem to consider necessary any formal definition of the well-known boundary in this area.

9. The Government of India never contended that the boundary had been explicitly defined in 1842 or 1899. Indeed formal definition or demarcation is not necessary for recognition of a boundary so long as it is fixed by custom and tradition and is well-known. The Chinese Government state that there is much indisputable evidence to show that this sector of the Sino-Indian boundary was not delimited. In fact the evidence that they have brought forward shows only that the boundary was not demarcated on the ground. The proposals of the then British Indian Government between 1921 and 1927 were merely for the determination of the ownership of a few pasture grounds in one particular area. There was no dispute about the main alignment, let alone a demand for its determination. The letter of Sir Arthur Lothian in The Times of December 11, 1959 has been quoted in this context. But this letter referred to an effort to secure delimitation “on the ground”—i.e., demarcation. The map published by the Survey of India in 1950 showed this boundary as “undefined”, to indicate that this sector had never been described in detail from point to point or demarcated on the ground. The statement of the Prime Minister in the Lok Sabha on the 28th August, 1959, that the boundary had not been marked, indicated merely that it had not been marked on the ground.

10. The Chinese Government contend that, except for the Demchok (Parigas) area, which according to them has been “occupied” by India in recent years, the rest of the area in Ladakh, claimed by China, has always belonged to her and has been under her effective control. These contentions are wholly baseless. That the Demchok area has for centuries been a part of Ladakh is proved by the treaty between Ladakh and Tibet signed in 1684, and by the accounts of travellers who visited the area thereafter.
As for the rest of the area, it is wrong to state that the major part of it was under the jurisdiction of Sinkiang. As already mentioned above, Chinese maps of the 18th and 19th centuries make clear that Sinkiang never extended south of the Kuen Lun mountains. So, no part of this area could ever have been a part of Sinkiang. Nor was any portion of this territory a part of Rudok Dzong of Tibet. Moorcroft, who visited this area in 1820, stated that Pamgong Lake divided the district of Rudok from the principality of Ladakh. This in effect conforms with the traditional alignment as shown on Indian maps rather than that shown on Chinese maps.
Strachey, who visited this area as a Boundary Commissioner in 1847, gave a more specific alignment, which is essentially in consonance with the alignment on Indian maps.

11. It is most regrettable that the Chinese Government should have claimed, without bringing forward any evidence in support, that their people have utilized this area for pasturage and salt-mining. In fact, the pastures and salt-mines referred to have always been the preserve of Ladakhi villagers who have regularly visited these areas; and these villagers never came across any Chinese trespassers. It is incorrect to say that since 1750 the Chinese Government has established checkpoints to exercise jurisdiction over and patrol this area. There were never any Chinese outposts south of the Kuen Lun mountains. Throughout the twentieth century, officials of the Kashmir Government and Indian traders and hunting parties moved freely in this area and they did not come across any evidence of the exercise of jurisdiction by the Chinese in that area.
During these years a detailed geological survey of the whole area was carried out by the Governments of Kashmir and of India. It is only in recent years that Chinese personnel have intruded into this territory; and the Government of India are astonished that the Chinese Government use this intrusion as the basis for their claim. The statement that Indian personnel came into this territory only thrice, and that too in recent times—in September 1958, in July 1959 and in October 1959—is unwarranted by facts. Indian personnel have patrolled this area regularly. Only on the three occasions mentioned by the Chinese Government did they come across Chinese troops.

12. It is strange that the Chinese Government should have brought forward an argument based on philology and advanced a claim on the fact that names such as Aksai Chin and Karakash are of Uighur origin. It is not necessary to treat this argument seriously. The Government of India will content themselves with drawing attention to the fact that centuries ago Indian influence swept deep into China, and there are place names in Tibet and Sinkiang of Sanskrit or Prakrit origin. The name Khotan itself is derived from the Sanskrit word Kustana. Again, the present name of the Ari district of Tibet is an abbreviation of the Sanskrit term Nari in Nari (Ngari) Khorsum, a name by which Western Tibet is known.

13. The Chinese Government have stated in their latest note that the delineation of the boundaries of Ladakh in Chinese maps for the past 200 years have in the main been consistent. This is certainly true of the Chinese maps published up to the twenties of the present century, but these maps consistently showed a boundary which was more or less in consonance with the traditional alignment as shown on Indian maps. It is only on Chinese maps published since the late twenties that different alignments have been shown. The broad trend in the recent Chinese maps has been to push the alignment deeper into Indian territory.

14. It is extraordinary that the Chinese Government should not be aware of their own official maps such as the one drawn in 1893, and that they should brush aside, The New Atlas and Commercial Gazetteer of China as the publication of a private agency. It was in fact based on authoritative official surveys as stated in the introduction. However, the Government of India would like to draw the attention of the Government of China to the Postal Map of China published in 1917 by the Chinese Government. This map shows the whole northern boundary of India more or less according to the traditional Indian alignment.

15. The Government of China attach little importance to the fact that the alignment shown on Indian maps runs along the main watershed. They seem unaware that traditional boundaries in mountainous areas tend to follow the main watershed rather than any other natural feature. This is because a watershed is the best of all possible natural boundaries. It is liable to no change and is readily recognisable. Where there are a series of mountain ranges, it is the watershed range rather than any other that becomes the traditional boundary, because the peoples on both sides tend to settle up to the sources of rivers but not beyond. That the alignment of the northern boundary of India throughout follows the major watershed supports the fact that this became the boundary through custom and tradition. The argument of the Chinese Government that the watershed boundary of Ladakh is vitiated by the fact that a river breaks through it, is untenable. There is hardly any major watershed in the world, however high and continuous, which is not pierced by some river; but that does not make it any less of a watershed. Equally untenable is the other argument that the alignment shown on Chinese maps is supported by the fact that the area now claimed by the Chinese Government is easily approached from the Chinese side and not from the Indian side. Accessibility is not a criterion for determining the alignment of boundaries.

16. The Government of India are glad to note the acceptance by the Government of China that the alignment of the boundary as shown on Indian maps between the Punjab, Himachal Pradesh and Uttar Pradesh in India and the Tibet "conforms to reality". This alignment conforms to the watershed principle and Chinese maps have also shown this alignment for the greater part of its length. The Government of India, however, reject the claim of the Chinese Government to certain areas in his sector—the Spiti area, Shipki pass, Nilang-Jadharg, Barahoti, Sangchamalla and Lapthal. The Prime Minister of India in his letter of September 26, 1959 has given sufficient data to show that these territories have always been part of India. The Chinese Government have ignored these precise data and have merely repeated their claim. In the circumstances the Government of India consider it unnecessary to repeat their earlier statements.

17. The Government of China have also accused the Government of India of having occupied Puling-Sumdo, one of the markets for trade in the Ari district of Tibet, specified in the 1954 Agreement. The Government of India repudiate this allegation. They are not, and never have been, in occupation of this place. The Chinese Government are confusing this trade mart with a locality in the Nian-lang-Jadhang area in India called Pulamsumda. This latter place in India, however, has never been a trade mart. The co-ordinates of Puling-Sumdo (also known as Poling) are 31° 19’ north and 79° 27’ east, and these co-ordinates were communicated by Mr. Kaul with his letter of March 26, 1954 to Mr. Chen Chia Kang. The co-ordinates of Pulamsumda are 31° 18’ north and 79° 8’ east. During the negotiations leading to the 1954 Agreement it was Puling-Sumdo (Poling) which was mentioned since it was a traditional trade mark. It was then made clear to the Chinese delegation that Puling-Sumdo and Poling were different names for the same place. There was no occasion to refer to Pulamsumda (31° 18’ north and 79° 8’ east) and no reference was in fact made to it either in the discussions or in the subsequent Agreement. There should, therefore, be no room for misunderstanding.

18. The Chinese Government contend that the Tibetan authorities are in possession of land deeds and census and taxation papers concerning these areas which they are claiming, and give as an example a document of the eighteenth century concerning Barahoti. The Government of India are somewhat surprised to know of this. During the prolonged discussions on Barahoti which took place in New Delhi in 1958 between the Chinese and Indian delegations, the Chinese delegation did not refer to the existence of such documents. It will be recalled that the Indian delegation stated at the time that they had revenue records and other evidence in their favour.

19. The Government of India cannot accept the contention of the Chinese Government that these areas belong to China because their inhabitants are of Tibetan origin. Indeed, such arguments based on ethnic affinities had been rebutted by Premier Chou En-lai himself as early as July 1957. Addressing the Fourth Session of the National People’s Congress at Peking on July 9, 1957, Premier Chou En-lai said: “The boundary question has a direct bearing on the interests of the nationalities living in compact communities on the Sino-Burmese borders. Therefore, in tackling this question we must specially take into account the interests of these nationalities. We know that the boundary line between two countries is often found dividing into two parts a nationality living in compact communities on the borders. This is the result of historical development. On the various sections of the defined boundary between China and Burma and on the border between China and other countries we find people of the same nationality living on both sides of the boundary line. So, when we solve the question of the undefined boundary line between China and Burma, we must realise beforehand that it will be hard to avoid separating the nationalities concerned by the boundary line.” India is a State in which people of different races and creeds enjoy common citizenship. There are thousands of Indian citizens of Tibetan origin. The study of the Tibetan language is encouraged by the Government of India. These Indians of Tibetan origin have always been loyal citizens of India.

20. The Government of India cannot accept that the Agreement signed in 1954 between India and China had no bearing on the question of the boundary between the two countries. It is true that during the negotiations neither side asked to discuss the boundary question. The Indian delegation did not raise it because, so far as the Government of India were concerned, the boundary was well-known and beyond dispute, and there could be no question regarding it. Not only was the boundary shown on official Indian maps, but Indian authorities had been exercising administrative control over all areas up to the international border shown on Indian maps. If the Chinese Government were at all serious about their claim to any of these areas, it would be expected that they would at least refer to their claims, if not discuss them. It is true that Premier Chou En-lai at the first meeting said that the relations between China and India were becoming closer every day and that from among the outstanding questions the two sides could settle questions which were ripe for settlement. The Indian Ambassador then pointed out that there were only small questions pending between India and China but he wished to see nothing big or small remaining outstanding between the two countries. Premier Chou En-lai replied that two large countries like India and China with a long common frontier were bound to have some questions, but all questions could be settled smoothly. In the context in which Premier Chou En-lai made this statement, it could hardly be inferred that he had in mind Chinese claims to vast tracts of territory which were shown as parts of India in Indian maps and were under Indian administration. At the meeting of January 8, 1954 the Vice-Foreign Minister of China stated that the negotiations between China and India were to settle, in accordance with the Five Principles, those pending questions that were ripe for settlement. The Indian side accepted the principles as the basis for discussions. In his speech on April 29, 1954, after the signing of the Agreement, the leader of the Indian Delegation stated, “we have gone through fully questions that existed between our two countries in this (Tibetan) region”, thus indicating that in the Indian view no dispute or question was left over. The Indian Delegation throughout took the line that all questions at issue between the two countries were being considered and, once the settlement was concluded, no question remained. In view of this the Chinese statement that Ambassador Raghavan agreed, in what is stated to be an informal talk, that the boundary question would not be discussed, is surprising.

21. In these circumstances the Government of India can only express their surprise at the contention of the Chinese Government that the question of the boundary between the two countries was not touched at all during the discussions leading to the 1954 Agreement. When Article 4, which specifies six passes in this area, was being discussed, the Chinese delegation brought forward a draft which stated that the Chinese Government “agrees to open” the passes. In other words, it was claimed that these passes belonged to China. This was contested by the Indian representative Mr. Kaul, who stated that they were Indian passes. It cannot, therefore, be asserted that the question of the ownership of these passes was not raised at all. The text as finally agreed upon was: “Traders and pilgrims of both countries may travel by the following passes and route”. This could only be interpreted to mean that the use of these passes does not involve ownership because they are border passes.

22. The Chinese Government have also contended on a priori grounds that the boundary question could not have been discussed in 1954 because at that time “the question which the two countries were most concerned about and which called for urgent solution was the establishment of normal relations between India and the Tibet Region of China on a new basis”.
But surely normal relations between India and Tibet region of China could not have been established if the Chinese Government had in mind at that time claims to large areas of Indian territory contiguous to the Tibet Region. The Government of China were then fully aware of the alignment of the international boundary as shown on official Indian maps. They must also have been aware of the authoritative declaration made in 1950 by the Prime Minister of India on the subject of India’s frontiers. Besides, the Government of China were aware that the Constitution of the Republic of India, adopted after lengthy discussions in open sessions of the Constituent Assembly, made specific mention in its Sixth Schedule of the Tribal areas of Assam and the North East Frontier Agency, which the Chinese Government now seek to claim as Chinese territory. In the 1954 Agreement the Chinese Government affirmed their respect for the territorial integrity of India. In the circumstances mentioned above they could not have done so if they intended to raise a demand subsequently for large areas of Indian territory. Further, in discussions with the Prime Minister of India in 1954 and 1956-57, the Prime Minister of China did not give any indication whatsoever that his Government had large territorial claims, but, on the contrary, gave the impression that the revision of the maps was essentially a procedural issue, which would be made in due course. The conclusion is obvious that the Chinese Government have changed their position since 1954.

23. The Government of India cannot accept the contention that the area south of the traditional boundary east of Bhutan has always belonged to China and was until recently under Chinese jurisdiction. The territory was under the Varman, the Salastambha and the Pala dynasties till the 8th century, when they came under the pressure of the Ahoms, a branch of the Shan tribe. Finally, in the 13th century, an Ahom ruler gained control over the whole kingdom and gave the name Ahom, now softened to Assam, to the country. The Ahom rulers held sway in this area for nearly six centuries till they were finally displaced by the British authority in India in 1826. During the last years of Ahom rule control over the tribal peoples in the north weakened, but authority was re-established by the then Government of India over a period of years. At no time, however, was the sovereignty over these areas lost by the rulers of Assam or acquired by the Tibetans. The tribal areas south of the traditional watershed boundary have always been part of India.

24. In the 19th century the Government of British India asserted their authority over the tribes who acknowledged the right of that Government to maintain law and order in their areas. References to the territory of the British in the agreements concluded by the British Indian Government with the tribes meant merely that such territory was then under the direct administration of the British Government in India, as distinct from the tribal areas where they only exercised loose control. But at no time did these tribesmen cease to be under the central authority of the British Indian rulers.

25. The only evidence that the Chinese Government have brought forward to support their claim to jurisdiction over this area is with reference to Tawang and the Walong area. But Tawang and Walong form only a tiny fraction of the large area now claimed by the Chinese Government, and the evidence brought forward in regard to these two localities has no relevance to the rest of the area. Even with regard to Tawang and Walong the arguments of the Chinese Government are untenable. Tawang was never a part of Tibet. The local administration of Tawang was in the hands of a Raja, who was assisted by Chhoryens, or headmen of groups of villagers, and Kachungs or village headmen. The only functions which the Lama hierarchy exercised in this area was ecclesiastical. In Tawang there is a large Tibetan monastery, whose Abbot and monks collected religious dues from the local inhabitants, who are Lamaists. Collection of such dues could not and did not confer any territorial sovereignty on the Tibetan authorities in respect of Tawang. This view is also supported by the statement made by the Chinese plenipotentiary at the Simla Conference in 1914. Ivan Chen stated on the 7th March 1914 that "what is paid to the Tibetans is not in the shape of revenue, in the ordinary sense of the word, but merely contributions to the monasteries. It is rather charity than a tax". And on 13th June 1914 Sun Pao-Chi, the Chinese Minister for Foreign Affairs, informed the British Minister in Peking that "the Tibetans affected to think that they had rights over all places inhabited by Lamaists, but this was not so. The Lamas might have ecclesiastical authority but this did not necessarily mean that these places belonged to Tibet".

26. Again, certain Tibetan families owned private estates south of the traditional boundary and collected rents. These rents cannot be regarded as Government taxes. It is possible that these rents were paid even after 1914, for the agreement between the Indian and the Tibetan representatives on the boundary safeguarded the rights of private estates.

27. The Chinese Government have quoted the agreement signed in 1853 between the British Indian authorities and the Monbas, and claimed that the Indian Government by this agreement recognised the Monbas as belonging to Tibet. Had this been so, it would be expected that the British Indian Government would have signed the agreement direct with Tibet. The Tibetan Government were, during these years, negotiating on their own, as is shown by their treaty with Nepal signed in 1856. In fact, the agreement of 1853 concerned one specific instance in which a Tibetan was involved, and the local Rajas appeared to be acting on this particular occasion for the Tibetan Government. Indeed, nine years earlier, in 1844, these Rajas accepted British authority in India by a written agreement. The key sentence of the 1844 Agreement reads as follows: "We also pledge ourselves to act up to any orders we may get from the British authorities."

28. The Walong area in the lower Lohit valley, which the Chinese Government refer to as Lower Tsayul, consists of a few villages inhabited by Mishmis and refugee Tibetans. The presence of the latter does not prove that this area belonged to Tibet. These refugees resisted the attempts of the Tibetan authorities to collect taxes.

29. It is incorrect to state that the authoritative maps published in India and China showed the boundary in this sector according to the alignment now being shown on Chinese maps. As already stated, the Postal Map of China published in 1917 should the boundary in consonance with the Indian alignment as shown in Indian maps. In November 1925 the University of Peking published a map showing the Frontiers of China at a time when China had expanded most, that is, in the days of the Ching dynasty before 1911. Even then the frontier east of Bhutan was shown approximately along the present alignment. As for official Indian maps, the Government of India have already drawn the attention of the Chinese Government to the Map of India published by the Survey of India in 1895, which showed the tribal area by a light orange colour wash. From 1938 to 1952 the Survey of India showed this boundary by an undemarcated symbol, because in fact the boundary had not been demarcated on the ground. As, however, the traditional boundary lay along a major watershed, the Government of India decided in 1954 that no demarcation on the ground was necessary. The undemarcated symbol was, therefore, omitted in subsequent maps.

30. The Government of China have mentioned in this connection the Map of India (1945) included in the third English edition of the book The Discovery of India by Mr. Nehru. The particular map was a sketch map inserted by the publisher, and the author could not be held responsible for its inaccuracy. Nor should any adverse conclusion be drawn from it, so far as the Government of India are concerned.

31. The Government of India regret that the Chinese Government should persist in questioning the validity of the Agreement reached in 1914 between India and Tibet confirming the traditional boundary east of Bhutan. This was not the first time that Tibet conducted negotiations and concluded treaties, in her own right, with foreign states. On several occasions before 1914 Tibet had conducted negotiations and concluded treaties with other states. For example, Tibet concluded a treaty with Nepal in 1856 and another with Great Britain in 1904. These treaties were never objected to by China and were fully operative. At the Simla Conference, the Tibetan and Chinese plenipotentiaries met on an equal footing. This position was explicitly and unequivocally accepted by the Chinese Government. The three Plenipotentiaries exchanged copies of their credentials at the first session of the Conference on October 13, 1913. The credentials of the Tibetan representative issued by the Dalai Lama made it clear that Tibet was an equal party at the Conference with the right “to decide all matters that may be beneficial to Tibet”, and the Chinese representative accepted the credentials of the Tibetan representative as being in order. The credentials of the British Indian representative, which were also accepted by the Chinese representative, confirmed that all the three representatives were of equal status, and that the Conference was meeting “to regulate the relations between the several Governments”.

32. It is not true to say that the Agreement of March 1914 between India and Tibet about the Indo-Tibetan boundary was secret. It was an Agreement between the authorised representatives of the two parties, reached after full discussion, and approved by the Government of Tibet. There was, therefore, nothing clandestine about it. Moreover, the Indo-Tibetan boundary was delineated on the map appended to the Tripartite Convention, which was also signed by the Chinese representative on April 27, 1914. The 1914 boundary Agreement was published in the 1929 edition of Aitchison’s Treaties, Engagements and Sanads, the previous edition having been published as early as 1909. The Chinese Government never protested against this Agreement. In fact, long before this Agreement the Government of British India had asserted their authority over these tribal areas, concluded Agreements with the tribes and created two Frontier Tracts comprising the entire territory. These facts were all well-known and neither the Tibetan nor the Chinese Government ever challenged the British Indian authority.
33. The Government of India cannot accept the contention of the Government of China that the Simla Conference only discussed the boundaries between Tibet and China and between Outer Tibet and Inner Tibet. It is also incorrect to say that the red line on the Convention Map which was signed by the Chinese representative represented only the boundary between Tibet and the rest of China, and that it was never stated that part of this red line was the boundary between China and India. The argument that the McMahon Line sector of the red line on the Convention Map represented the boundary between Tibet and China is fantastic. Article 9 of the Convention initialled by British Indian, Chinese and Tibetan plenipotentiaries, dealt with the boundaries of Tibet and the map attached to the Convention clearly showed Tibet's boundary with India. It is this boundary line which is known as the McMahon Line. The Postal Map of China published by the Chinese Government in 1917 showed this line as the boundary between India and Tibet, and marked the territory south of the line as India. By no stretch of imagination can it be contended now that any Chinese territory then lay south of the McMahon Line. The contention that the red line represents the boundary between Tibet and China is contradicted by the Chinese Government's own statement that jurisdiction had been exercised in the area south of the line by the Tibetan authorities and not by the Chinese Government.

34. It is strange that the Chinese Government should now seek to rely on the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907, and argue that the 1914 Agreement was invalid as Britain was precluded by the 1907 Convention from having direct negotiations with Tibet. As China was not a party to the Convention between Britain and Russia, she cannot invoke that Treaty in support of her contention. In fact, throughout the negotiations, the Russian Government were kept fully informed of the progress of the negotiations. A copy of the Agreement including the map was given to the Russian Government, who raised no objection to the negotiations and the subsequent Agreement.

35. The Chinese note refers to four protests made in 1946-47 by the Chinese Government. It may be stated that these protests related to acts of British Indian administration in a small area of the North-East Frontier Agency in 1943. The Government of India then replied that "the only activities in which the Government of India have been engaged in the area in question have been entirely restricted to the Indian side of the boundary between India and Tibet, which has been accepted for over 30 years". The protest of the Kuomintang Government of November 1949 merely stated that China had not signed the Simla Convention. No reply was sent to the protest as soon afterwards, in December 1949, the Government of India recognised the People's Government of China. A few months later, in August 1950, the Government of India mentioned in a note to the Government of China that the recognised frontier between Tibet and India should remain inviolate. The same year the Prime Minister of India declared publicly that India stood by the McMahon Line. There could, therefore, be no doubt about the Government of India's position in regard to the international boundary.

36. The Tibetans never protested against the Indo-Tibetan boundary as agreed upon in 1914. On more than one occasion, they acknowledged its existence and affirmed that they had no wish to dispute its validity. When the McMahon Line was verbally re-affirmed by the British Indian representative in 1936 and 1938, the Tibetan Government replied that they were fully aware of the terms of the 1914 Agreement. It is the Government of India which protested in 1943 against illegal penetration by the Tibetans into Indian territory. Similar protests were made by the Indian Government whenever the Tibetans sought to take advantage of Indian preoccupations in order to levy illegal dues in Indian territory. When the Government of India protested, the Tibetans withdrew. As for the fantastic Tibetan claims put forward in 1947, Prime Minister Nehru's letter of September 26, 1959 has adequately dealt with them.

37. The Chinese Government are aware of the special treaty relations which the Government of India have with Bhutan and Sikkim. In view of this the Government of India welcome the explanations given in the Chinese note relating to the boundaries between Sikkim and Bhutan on the one hand and Tibet on the other. The note states that the boundary between Sikkim and the Tibet region of China has long been formally delimited, and that there is neither any discrepancy on the maps nor any dispute in practice. The Government of India would like to add that this boundary has also been demarcated on the ground. As for Bhutan, its northern boundary is traditional and well-known. Adjoining it on the east is the North-East Frontier Agency of India, whose boundary with Tibet is both traditional and delineated by Agreement. It is not, therefore, possible for any Tibetan territory to lie south of the McMahon Line. The Government of India note with satisfaction that the Chinese Government have not repeated their map claims to any part of northern Bhutan. In view of the responsibility of the Government of India for the defence and maintenance of the integrity of Bhutan and Sikkim, the Government of India welcome the assurance of the Government of China that they will not encroach on the territory of Sikkim and Bhutan.

38. The foregoing paragraphs have set out in brief the points of substance regarding the Sino-Indian boundary question. The Government of India can only express their regret that the Chinese Government should have repeated their earlier versions of the incidents at Longju and at Kongka Pass in the Chang Chenmo Valley. The true facts regarding these incidents have already been communicated to the Chinese Government in the earlier Indian notes, and the various points raised in these notes still remain unanswered. It is only necessary to point out that if in fact the Chinese personnel entered Longju 5 days after the withdrawal of the Indian personnel, the Indian casualties cannot be explained. Similarly, the detailed account of Shri Karam Singh, which was handed to the Chinese Embassy in Delhi on November 24, 1959 disproves the Chinese Government's version of the incident at Kongka Pass. The Government of India have to state once more that these unfortunate incidents, involving severe casualties among Indian personnel, would not have occurred, if the Chinese troops had not intruded into Indian territory and taken offensive action against Indian police personnel engaged on routine patrol duty on Indian soil.

39. The Government of India share the sentiments of friendship expressed by the Chinese Government. Even before they attained independence, the people of India demonstrated in ample measure their friendship for the Chinese people. Since the achievement of independence by India this feeling of friendship has found expression in many concrete ways. The surprise and disappointment of the Indian people have therefore been all the greater at the challenge to the historic frontier of India by the Government of China. Recent developments have deeply disturbed the minds of the Indian people and created a feeling of uneasiness over the long frontier which for centuries had remained tranquil. In the interest of the two countries and of peace of the world, active steps must therefore be taken to remove the causes of the present tension and to establish a firm foundation of friendship between the two countries.

40. An essential first step is for the two Governments to agree on an arrangement without delay, which would completely eliminate the risk of border clashes and facilitate a friendly settlement of the disputes. In their latest note, the Chinese Government have repeated their earlier proposal that the armed forces of the two Governments should withdraw twenty kilometres or some other agreed distance from the border, and that the armed personnel of both sides should stop patrolling along the entire border. These suggestions have been discussed in detail in the Prime Minister of India's letter of November 16, 1959 to Premier Chou En-lai. The constructive proposals made by the Prime Minister of India in that letter are intended to secure the objective which both the Governments have in view. The Government of India would still hope that the Government of China would accept these proposals.

41. The Chinese Government have asked the Government of India to accept the position, as a preliminary to discussions, that "the entire boundary between the two countries has never been delimited and is therefore yet to be settled through negotiations". It is clearly impossible for the Government of India to accept this proposition which they consider unreasonable and against the facts of history, geography, custom, tradition and international agreements. The facts enumerated in the preceding paragraphs entirely disprove the Chinese Government's contention. The Government of India are anxious for a friendly settlement but they cannot possibly accept suggestions which gravely prejudice their basic position.

42. In his letter of November 16, 1959, to Premier Chou En-lai, the Prime Minister of India expressed his readiness to meet the Premier at a suitable time and place, but suggested that the immediate efforts of the two Governments should be concentrated on reaching an interim understanding, which would help in easing the present tension and prevent the situation worsening. Although no further border incidents have taken place in recent weeks, the urgent need for an interim understanding is paramount. The basic causes of tension and resentment remain. The Government of India are yet unable to understand why during the last year or so the long border which had remained tranquil through the centuries should have become a source of tension and anxiety. If there are any deeper reasons for this, they are unaware of them. Apart, therefore, from the boundary question, it is important, in the interest of both China and India and of world peace in general, that the two Governments should leave nothing undone, which could remove misunderstanding and restore the traditional friendship and cordiality between the two countries on a firm basis.
The Embassy takes this opportunity of renewing to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.

Peking, the 12th February, 1960.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs,
Government of the People's Republic of China.
Peking.
Peking, February 26, 1960

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

I thank Your Excellency for your letter of February 5, 1960, which was brought here on February 12 by Indian Ambassador to China, Mr. Parthasarathi. At the same time, the reply to the Note of December 26, 1959, of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China made by the Indian Embassy in China on the instructions of the Indian Government was also delivered by Mr. Parthasarathi to our Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The reply Note of the Indian Embassy will be answered by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs after studying it.

You have in your letter agreed to the suggestion of the Chinese Government and myself for the holding of a meeting between the Premiers of China and India in the immediate future so as to explore avenues which may lead to a peaceful settlement of the boundary issue, and invited me to visit Delhi in the latter half of March. I express to you my deep gratitude for your friendly invitation. The Chinese Government has consistently held that the friendship between the Chinese and Indian peoples is eternal, that it is necessary and entirely possible to settle the boundary issue between the two countries in a friendly and peaceful manner, and that the two countries must not waver in their common desire for a peaceful settlement of the boundary issue on account of temporary differences of opinion and certain unfortunate and unexpected incidents. The Chinese Government, therefore, takes a positive attitude towards the forthcoming meeting and has confidence in it. As to myself, needless to say, I am very glad of the opportunity of once again visiting the capital of great India, meeting the great Indian people fighting for the prosperity, strength and progress of their motherland and for world peace, and seeing you as well as other friends whose acquaintance I had the honour of making during my last visits. I particularly hope to see the dark clouds hovering between our two countries dispersed through our joint efforts, so that the long-standing friendly relations between the two countries may be consolidated and developed.

Owing to reasons in connection with State affairs, I shall come to your country in April. The specific date will be discussed and decided upon through diplomatic channels.

With kind regards,

CHOU EN-LAI
Premier of the State Council of the People's Republic of China.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Counsellor of China in India, 5 December 1959

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to state that during the last two months a number of unidentified aircraft, coming from the direction of the Tibet region of China, have flown over Indian territory. A statement of these violations of the air space of India, giving the places, time and the position of the aircraft, is attached to this note.

2. The Government of India protest against these repeated violations of air space over Indian territory. They request that immediate steps be taken to prevent such violations in future. It will be appreciated if strict instruction is given to the Chinese aircraft to respect Indian territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs take the opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Statement showing details of recent violations of our air space

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>S No.</th>
<th>Date and time of flight</th>
<th>Area</th>
<th>Approximate Latitude and Longitude</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1.</td>
<td>19/9/1959 2230 Hrs.</td>
<td>MOKOKCHUNG</td>
<td>26° 20' N 94° 32' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2.</td>
<td>21/9/1959 2215 Hrs.</td>
<td>ZUNHEBOTO</td>
<td>26° 10' N 94° 35' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3.</td>
<td>22/9/1959 0730 Hrs.</td>
<td>CHAMPANG (Tuesang Distt.)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4.</td>
<td>4/9/1959 0845 Hrs.</td>
<td>AININI (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28° 45' N 96° 00' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5.</td>
<td>10/9/1959 0930 Hrs.</td>
<td>TUTING (Siang Frontier Division)</td>
<td>29° 00' N 94° 50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6.</td>
<td>19/9/1959 2230 Hrs.</td>
<td>ZERO (Subansiri Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27° 35' N 93° 50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7.</td>
<td>19/9/1959 2330 Hrs.</td>
<td>LIMEKING (Do.)</td>
<td>28° 20' N 93° 30' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8.</td>
<td>20/9/1959 0130 Hrs.</td>
<td>DOPORIJO (Do.)</td>
<td>28° 00' N 94° 15' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9.</td>
<td>17/10/1959 0910 Hrs.</td>
<td>BUMLA (Kameng Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28° 40' N 94° 50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10.</td>
<td>18/10/1959 0915 Hrs.</td>
<td>TOWANG (Do.)</td>
<td>28° 30' N 91° 50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11.</td>
<td>18/10/1959</td>
<td>CHUTANGMU (Do.)</td>
<td>28° 40' N 91° 50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12.</td>
<td>19/10/1959 0720 Hrs.</td>
<td>TOWANG (Do.)</td>
<td>28° 30' N 91° 50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13.</td>
<td>19/10/1959 1115 Hrs.</td>
<td>TOWANG (Do.)</td>
<td>28° 30' N 91° 50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14.</td>
<td>31/10/1959 0830 Hrs.</td>
<td>LEH</td>
<td>34° 10' N 77° 40' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15.</td>
<td>24/11/1959</td>
<td>ZERO</td>
<td>27° 35' N 93° 50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16.</td>
<td>23/11/1959 0912 Hrs.</td>
<td>SEPIA (Kameng Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27° 20' N 93° 50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17.</td>
<td>15/11/1959 2200 Hrs.</td>
<td>HAYULIANG</td>
<td>28° 00' N 96° 30' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18.</td>
<td>15/11/1959 0035 Hrs.</td>
<td>WALONG</td>
<td>28° 10' N 97° 00' E</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China to the Embassy of India in China, 21 December 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note delivered by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India on December 5, 1959 concerning the alleged intrusions into Indian air space by unidentified aircraft from the direction of the Tibet region of China, has the honour to reply as follows:

The Chinese Government has enjoined the authorities concerned to investigate into the matter on the basis of the date regarding time and place provided by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in the annex to its note. It is satisfied that no flight of Chinese aircraft over Indian territory occurred at all. Therefore, the Chinese Government cannot accept the protest of the Indian Government. The Chinese Government expresses deep regret at the fact that the Indian Government rashly protested with the Chinese Government without ascertaining the facts.

The Chinese Government wishes to point out at the same time that intrusions by Indian aircraft into Chinese air space frequently occurred in recent months along the Sino-Indian boundary. Despite two previous protests by the Chinese Government, such provocative intrusions still did not stop. According to the reports of the Chinese frontier guards, in the past three months, Indian aircraft still kept intruding into the air space over the Tibet region of China, circling around and carrying out reconnaissance. The main facts are as follows:

1. At 13.25 hours on September 23, 1959 a double-engined Indian transport aircraft intruded into Chinese air space over Sama in the Tsayu area in south-eastern Tibet from the direction due south of Tsayu.

2. At 11.45 hours on October 11, 1959 an Indian aircraft intruded into Chinese air space over the Lake Pangong area in western Tibet.

3. At 12.00 hours on October 17, 1959 an Indian aircraft intruded into Chinese air space over the Lake Pangong area in western Tibet.

4. At 11.40 hours on October 18, 1959 a double-engined Indian aircraft intruded into Chinese air space over the area of Le and Hsiao in eastern Tibet from the direction of Kechilang pasture.

5. A double-engined Indian aircraft intruded into Chinese air space over the Le area in eastern Tibet at 09.10 hours on October 19, 1959 from Bang Pass, and over the Shatze area at 09.30 hours on the same day.

6. At 12.00 hours on December 7, two Indian aircrafts intruded into Chinese air space over the area east of the Kongka Pass in Sinkiang.

The Chinese Government lodges a third protest with the Indian Government against these serious provocations of repeated violation of China's air space by Indian aircraft and demands that the Indian Government immediately adopt necessary measures to ensure against further violation. of China's air space by Indian aircraft and to maintain the peace and tranquillity of the Sino-Indian border.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of China and with reference to the note delivered by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the Indian Embassy in China on the 21st December 1959 concerning the alleged intrusion into Chinese air space by Indian aircraft, have the honour to reply as follows:

The Government of India have caused careful enquiries to be made into the six alleged intrusions into Chinese air space by Indian aircraft. The enquiries show that allegations are entirely baseless. Indian aircraft have strict instructions not to fly over foreign territory without the prior permission of the foreign Governments concerned and these instructions are carefully observed. The Government of India cannot accept the protest of the Chinese Government, and express regret that they should have done so without ascertaining the full facts.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China to the Embassy of India in China, 23 January 1960

The Government of the People's Republic of China has received the memorandum of the Government of India of October 29, 1959 in reply to the Chinese Embassy in India concerning the Chinese Government's protest against the intrusion of Chinese territorial sea by few Indian Naval Ships. The Chinese Government cannot but deem with regret that the above-mentioned reply of the Government of India is unsatisfactory.

As pointed out by the Chinese Government in its memorandum, September 7, 1959 there is south-east of Hongkong an international navigational route for entry to and exit from Hongkong. It is known to all and has always been followed by ships of other countries. If Indian ships should have taken this route in approaching and leaving Hongkong the question of violation of China's sovereign rights over its territorial sea would not have arisen. However the I.N.S. Magar instead of taking the international route and in disregard of the repeated warnings of the Chinese coastal guard units twice sailed in Chinese territorial sea at will. This cannot but be deemed deliberate intrusion of China's territorial sea. When I.N.S. Magar left Hongkong for Singapore on September 16 although it no longer took the water way west of the Chiapeng and Tankan Islands of China as it had done on August 9 but sailed to the south-east of them yet it still did not follow the international route but intruded into China's territorial sea. After leaving China's territorial sea for some time it again at 15:10 hours unlawfully intruded into China's territorial sea at the point 21 degrees 48 minutes 37 seconds N, 114 degrees 18 minutes 9 seconds E and sailed in the direction west-west-south cutting as deep as 5:5 nautical miles into Chinese territorial sea. To shed its responsibility for the I.N.S. wilful act of not following the international route but intruding repeatedly and arbitrarily into China's territorial sea the Government of India resorted to the pretext that "No ship could leave Hongkong harbour without coming within 12 miles limit imposed by China". This allegation can only be interpreted to mean that the Government of India is deliberately evading the fact that the I.N.S. Magar repeatedly intruded into China's territorial sea and the Chinese Government absolutely cannot agree to this.

The Chinese Government would like to state once again that Indian ships in approaching and leaving Hongkong should take the customary international route which is now consistently followed by ships of other countries and should not intrude at will into China's territorial sea. The Chinese Government once again asks the Government of India to adopt effective measures ensuring against similar incidents in future.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Counsellor of China in India, 6 November 1959

When His Excellency the Chinese Ambassador called at the Ministry yesterday, he informed the Foreign Secretary that there were demonstrations in front of the gates of the Chinese Embassy at least four times during the day, namely at 11.45 A.M., 12.50 P.M., 1.35 P.M. and 3.50 P.M. The Ambassador said that on all these occasions there were crowds outside the gates of the Embassy uttering objectionable slogans and on one occasion they burnt some documents. Further, at 3.50 P.M. the Ambassador himself could not leave his premises for the Ministry because of the demonstrations just outside his gates.

2. In accordance with the promise made by the Foreign Secretary, the Government of India immediately called for a report from the local officers. They are informed that throughout the day more than 200 police men accompanied by senior police officers and magistrates were present in the vicinity of the Embassy. At no time was any demonstration permitted in front or within 100 yards of the Embassy gates. In the circumstances, the Government of India cannot understand the basis of the Ambassador's complaint that persons were allowed to assemble just outside the gates of the Embassy obstructing passage through the gates or that the normal functions of the Embassy were affected.

3. As has been pointed out to the Chinese Embassy in the past, under the Indian law demonstrations cannot be prohibited so long as they are peaceful. The Government of India are well aware of the diplomatic usage and practice in accordance with which the Embassy of a foreign country is entitled to full courtesy and protection from the receiving government. They are satisfied that adequate steps were taken by the local authorities in Delhi to secure compliance with this usage and practice and that no demonstration was permitted within 100 yards of the Embassy. As the Chinese Embassy must be aware, there is great indignation in India over the recent incident in Ladakh, which has resulted in severe casualties to the Indian police reconnaissance party, and the Government of India would not be justified in preventing peaceful demonstrations intended to express popular feelings on the subject. They wish, however, to assure the Ambassador that no demonstration will be permitted in the immediate vicinity of the Embassy nor will any interference by outsiders in the work of the Embassy be tolerated.
On November 6, 1959, Mr. J. S. Mehta, Deputy Secretary to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, handed over an informal note to Mr. Yeh Cheng-chang, Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy, in reply to the serious protest lodged orally on November 4 by the Chinese Ambassador with the Foreign Secretary of India regarding the incident of Indians holding demonstrations on the same day in front of the Chinese Embassy. The Chinese Embassy considers that the reply of the Indian Government is not in conformity with the facts and is what the Embassy cannot agree. The actual situation is as follows: At 11.45 on the morning of November 4, about 200 Indians demonstrated in front of the Embassy. Some of these people held bamboo sticks and tree branches in their hands, shouting slogans insulting the People's Republic of China and its state leaders, and someone among them made a speech to incite anti-Chinese sentiments. The demonstrators shouted and clamoured loudly and made big noises, and at about 12.10 they burnt Chinese publications. At about 12.50 P.M. some 100 Indians demonstrated again in front of the Embassy. At 01:35 P.M., another Indian bringing with him about 30 small pupils came in front of the Embassy in demonstration. At about 03:50 P.M. when the Chinese Ambassador was to go by car to fulfil his appointment with the Foreign Secretary at the Ministry of External Affairs of India, some 100 Indians coming from the left side were shouting slogans in front of the gate of the Embassy, and the passage was blocked with the result that the Ambassador failed to leave the Embassy in time. (The Foreign Secretary was then informed of the delay by telephone.)

From all these facts, it can be clearly seen that the anti-Chinese demonstrations held by Indians in front of the Embassy on November 4 from the morning till the evening were carried out successively in an organised way. These activities took place either in front of or within 100 yards from the gates of the Embassy. As the Ministry of External Affairs is aware, the Chinese Embassy is situated on the side of a main thoroughfare and there are pedestrians and vehicles passing through constantly every day. The almost day-long clamouring, confusion and the blocking of the traffic in front of the Embassy on November 4 are known to all in Delhi. This should by no means be denied. Such a situation has affected the normal functions as well as the tranquillity of the Embassy, for which the Indian Government cannot evade its responsibility.

As to the question of the so-called "public feelings" referred to in the Ministry's note, the Embassy would like to point out that the Kongka Pass incident was entirely caused by the Indian armed personnel's intrusion into Chinese territory and their armed provocation against China's frontier guards and that the anti-Chinese demonstrations in India were apparently an outcome of deliberate instigation. The fact that not a few children of about 10 years of age were among the demonstrators on November 4 is a vivid proof.
It must be further mentioned that after the protest lodged by the Chinese Ambassador on November 4 with the Ministry of External Affairs of India regarding the aforesaid incident, there should have occurred an incident in which at approximately 5.00 P.M. on November 9, some 40 Indians openly burnt an effigy of Premier Chou En-lai of the State Council of the People's Republic of China in front of the Embassy. This is a gross insult to the state leader of the People's Republic of China. Regarding this, the Embassy hereby lodges a serious protest.

In view of the above, the Embassy holds that the aforesaid reply of the Indian Government is not only inconsistent with the facts but also exceedingly unsatisfactory. The Embassy must point out that at present such anti-Chinese demonstrations are still continuing in India, to which the Indian Government give serious attention.
Note given by the Counsellor of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 27 November 1959

The Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India and hereby lodges a serious protest with the Ministry against the grave incident in which a group of Indians made provocations and disturbance in front of the gates of the Chinese Embassy and openly insulted the Chinese People’s leader and the head of the Chinese Government.

At 14.30 hours on November 17, 1959, more than 40 hooligans claiming to be members of the Indian “Bolshevik” Party made provocations and disturbance in front of the gates of the Chinese Embassy. They shouted such slogans as “Chini Luteron Hay Hay”, “Chou En-lai Murbad”, “Mao Tse-tung Hay Hay” and made speeches wantonly slandering the People’s Republic of China. What is most serious, they openly burnt on the spot two effigies of the Chinese People’s leader Chairman Mao Tse-tung and the head of the Chinese Government Premier Chou En-lai, which were made of straw, and the Indian police present watched on with folded arms, without intervening at all. These trouble-makers carried on their hulla-baloo and harassment and did not disperse till 15.50 hours.

Recently, some Indians who are hostile to the People’s Republic of China and to Sino-Indian friendship continually made disturbance in front of the premises of the Chinese Embassy and Consulates in India. These activities not only have seriously affected the normal functioning and tranquillity of the Chinese Embassy and Consulates, but have been calculated to incite an anti-Chinese campaign and to damage Sino-Indian friendly relations. And the Chinese Embassy has, upon instructions, more than once protested against these with the Indian Ministry of External Affairs and asked the Indian Government to pay attention and take effective measures to stop them. The Chinese Government cannot but deeply regret that, up till now, these provocations, instead of being stopped, have grown more and more rampant, culminating in the extremely grave incident of burning the effigies of the Chinese People’s leader Chairman Mao Tse-tung and the head of the Chinese Government Premier Chou En-lai in front of the gates of the Chinese Embassy on November 17. The Indian Government cannot shirk its due responsibility for this incident. The Chinese Government hereby lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government and asks it to deal with the matter speedily, give a satisfactory reply and take immediate effective measures to prevent the recurrence of similar incidents.

The Embassy of the People’s Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of External Affairs the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Counsellor of China in India, 5 December 1959

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Embassy's memorandum dated November 16 and note dated November 27 regarding demonstrations near the Chinese Embassy, have the honour to state as follows:

2. As has been explained by the Ministry on several occasions in the past, under the Constitution and laws of India, it is not possible to prohibit demonstrations so long as they remain peaceful. The Embassy must be aware that demonstrations in the country are not infrequent even against the Ministers of Government and many of these are organised by political parties. The Government of India are mindful of their obligation in regard to the protection of foreign missions in India. They have given strict instructions to the local authorities to ensure that no demonstration should be permitted within at least 100 yards of the main gates of the Chinese Embassy. Similar instructions have been issued in regard to protection to the Chinese Consulates and Trade Agency elsewhere in India. So far as the Chinese Embassy is concerned, a strong police force has always been deputed to enforce this instruction whenever information is received that a procession is proceeding towards the Embassy or that a procession or demonstration is planned. The Prime Minister of India has repeatedly condemned demonstrations against foreign embassies and consulates in India. In particular, he has expressed disapproval in public of the burning of effigies or shouting of slogans. The Government of India regret that a few people should have expressed their feelings in such an objectionable manner. They wish to assure the Embassy that they are determined to prevent such irresponsible demonstrations in front of the Chinese Embassy and other Chinese offices. The Government of India are not aware that the Embassy has, in any way, been prevented from carrying out its normal functions because of these demonstrations.

3. In regard to the reference to the incident in the Kongka Pass which has been referred to in the note of the Embassy dated November 16, the Government of India repudiate the suggestion that the Indian personnel were responsible for it. As the Embassy is aware, this has been the subject of detailed notes exchanged between the Governments of India and China and the Ministry do not propose to deal with it in the present note.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Chinese Embassy in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 17 December 1959

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of the Republic of India and has the honour to state as follows:

In recent months, there have been successive errors in the telegrams delivered to the Chinese Embassy by the Indian Central Telegraph Office, among them the following being the serious cases:

1. More than 20 errors and omissions were found in a telegram totalling about 300 words which was sent from the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong to the Embassy on September 19, 1959.

2. At 6 A.M. on October 28, 1959, the Embassy received a telegram from the Chinese Consulate General at Calcutta, which should have 180 words in all. But only less than 130 words were delivered to the Embassy by the Telegraph Office with 4 to 5 errors.

3. On November 26, 1959, the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong sent a telegram to the Embassy, which should have 213 words. But the Central Telegraph Office gave the Embassy only 154 words. After these apparent errors were found in the above-said telegrams, it was not until inquiries were made by the Embassy at the Indian Central Telegraph Office that the errors were corrected. However, the timely disposing of these telegrams by the Embassy was delayed.

The above-said successive errors of the Indian Central Telegraph Office have caused difficulties in the work of the Embassy, and affected the Embassy's normal contacts with other organs of China in India. The Embassy hereby requests the Government of India to pay attention to the above situation and prevent the recurrence of the errors mentioned above in the future.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India and has the honour to state as follows:

On October 10, 1959, some 400 Chiang Kai-shek clique elements and Tibetan rebels openly held a meeting in the vicinity of Kalimpong to celebrate the so-called "national day of the Republic of China". At the place of the meeting they even hung the national flag of India side by side with the so-called national flag of the Chiang Kai-shek clique, and the photographs of President Prasad and Prime Minister Nehru with that of Chiang Kai-shek. Not only the Indian local authorities failed to forbid such activities, but a director of the C.I.D. of Kalimpong and a police officer attended the rally in person. As instructed by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, the Embassy hereby lodges a protest against the Indian local officials' connivance at such acts hostile to the People's Republic of China and detrimental to the Sino-Indian friendly relations as well as against their attendance at the above-mentioned rally.

It must be pointed out that in the first half of this year the "Chinese Journal of India" in Calcutta made venomous slanders and attacks against the head of state of China, and the Chiang Kai-shek clique elements openly hung the so-called national flag of the clique in the Meikwang School. The Consulate-General of China at Calcutta has in the Meikurang School. The Consulate-General of China at Calcutta has taken up the matter with the Government of West Bengal, demanding that the Indian local government stop such acts of directing hostility towards the People's Republic of China and of creating "two Chinas". While this just demand is not yet met with a reasonably reply, there appeared during August, in Kalimpong, Darjeeling and other places propaganda leaflets, "President Chiang's message to Tibetans", etc., printed and circulated in large quantities by the Taiwan Chiang Kai-shek clique to oppose the Chinese Government. On October 10, the Chiang Kai-shek clique elements in Calcutta also obtained permission to hold celebrations for the so-called "National day of the Republic of China". The occurrence of such a series of incidents shows that the Indian local authorities concerned are deliberately conniving at the Chiang Kai-shek clique elements to be engaged in activities against the People's Republic of China and carry out the plot of creating "two Chinas" on Indian soil. Such course of events is harmful to the normal development of the friendly relations between China and India.

In the hope of preserving and developing the friendly relations between China and India, the Embassy demands that the Ministry of External Affairs of India speedily take effective measures to prevent occurrence of similarly incidents in the future.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 5 December 1959

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to their note of the 29th October, 1959 and state as follows:

Investigations show that some sort of a meeting was held on the 10th October in which some foreign nationals participated. There was no prior indication that the meeting was intended to express sympathy with the KMT regime, and as it was believed that the demonstration would be peaceful, the local authorities did not prohibit it. Instructions have, however, been issued to prevent any pro-Kuomintang meeting and demonstration in future. The Government of India will not hesitate to use the power recently taken by them to turn out of Kalimpong, any foreigner who indulges in objectionable activities. As the Chinese Embassy must be aware, the Government of India recognise the Chinese People's Republic. They do not recognise any other Government of China and will not permit any activities designed to promote the idea of two Chinas.

This Ministry take the opportunity of extending assurances of its highest consideration.
The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China and has the honour to report the following incidents:

At about 3 p.m. on 27th October, 1959, the maid-servant in the house at No. 14 Chun Shu Hutting occupied by a member of the staff of the Embassy, Mr. O. P. Puri, rang up to say that the ex-landlord of the house had unauthorisedly entered it and adopted a threatening attitude towards the female inmates. On receipt of this news Mr. Puri rushed back to his house and found the ex-landlord seated in his drawing room harshly abusing Mrs. O. P. Puri and Mrs. R. K. Sharma, the wife of another member of the staff who was visiting. When Mr. Puri entered the house the ex-landlord spoke disparagingly of the Indian people and the Government of India. The ladies who were taken by fright had locked themselves in the bedroom. On Mr. Puri’s return to the house the ladies came out crying. Mr. Puri begged the ex-landlord to leave the house. The landlord insisted that as the house was his property he was free to enter it any time he wished.

On the night of 26th October, the landlord had caused some misunderstanding. The house has two separate parts occupied by Mr. Puri and the landlord respectively. On the night in question Mr. Puri had locked his door and gone out to a party leaving his wife at home to attend to their sick child. He left the main entrance to the house unlocked in order to be able to get back to his quarters without disturbing anybody. He informed the landlord that he was doing so. The landlord, however, locked the main entrance making it difficult for Mr. Puri to re-enter his house. Mrs. Puri had to force the lock of their apartment in order to open the outer door to let her husband in.

The Embassy of India regrets these incidents and the offensive behaviour of the ex-landlord Mr. Ling Tien-Hsing. The Embassy hopes that action as may be deemed necessary will be taken by the Government of the People’s Republic of China to prevent a recurrence of this kind of harassment and ill-treatment of members of the Embassy.

The Embassy of India avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 6 November 1959

The Government of India wish to draw attention to the following incidents, which have recently been reported by the Indian representatives in Tibet:

(i) Kesong Tsering, who is the gardener attached to the dispensary of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung, was arrested by the Chinese authorities on the 22nd October, 1959. Kesong Tsering is an Indian protected person and his arrest without any reason is open to serious objection. The Indian Trade Agency in Yatung took up the matter with the local Foreign Bureau and sought permission under the terms of the 1954 Agreement to meet him. In reply the Trade Agency was informed that Kesong Tsering is a Chinese national. This is completely contradictory to the facts.

Kesong hails from Sikkim and even though he has been in the employment of the Indian Trade Agency, he continues to own property in Lachan. His father and his relations are similarly residing in Sikkim. There are no grounds on which Kesong Tsering can be regarded as a Chinese national. In fact the name of Kesong Tsering was included in the list of the Indian nationals furnished to the Foreign Bureau in May this year and no objection was raised that Kesong Tsering was a Chinese national. The Government of India strongly protest against the arbitrary detention of an Indian protected person and the denial of the rights of access to him by the Trade Agent in accordance with the international usage. The 1954 Agreement provides for Indian representatives meeting Indian nationals even if they may have been taken into custody for justifiable reason. In this case no justification has yet been provided. The Government of India urge that instructions should be issued for Kesong Tsering release immediately.

(ii) Dawa Thondup, retired head-clerk of the Indian Trade Agency, Gyantse who had been residing in Yatung as a small trader, requested permission some time ago to send his family to India. Dawa Thondup is an Indian national holding an Indian Trader’s certificate. It is true that his wife was born in Tibet, but by virtue of her marriage, she is fully entitled to Indian nationality. Indeed, one of his sons has been in India for sometime and Dawa Thondup now desires to send his eldest son for study and the rest of the family back to India. The matter has been taken up by the Indian Trade Agency, Yatung, to seek permission for the family of an Indian national to return to India. It may also be pointed out that the mother of Dawa Thondup’s wife was also an Indian national and thus, according to the Tibetan custom by which the nationality of the daughters is derived from their mothers, the claim of Dawa Thondup’s wife to Indian nationality is well grounded.

The general question of nationality of Indian nationals in Tibet has already been explained in the Government of India’s note of the 24th September, 1959. The Chinese Government have recognised in principle in the Sino-Nepalese Agreement that persons resident in the Tibet region... born of mixed parentage are entitled to exercise the option to choose one of the two nationalities. In the circumstances, the Government of India see no justification for placing restrictions on the return of Dawa Thondup's family to India.

The Government of India request that immediate instructions be issued for release of Kesong Tsering and for necessary permission to Dawa Thondup's family to leave for India.
Letter given by the Consulate General of India in Lhasa to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Lhasa, 21 December 1959

The Consulate General of India in Lhasa pays its compliments to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet and has the honour to invite attention to the meeting that took place between Mr. Chiang Su-Min, Vice Director of the Foreign Bureau and Mr. P. N. Kaul Consul General for India in Lhasa, wherein at the end Mr. Chiang narrated certain events that had taken place at Gyantse during the month of November. The Consulate General has in the meantime received instructions to lodge protest in regard to the incidents facts of which are reported to be as follows:

On 23rd November, a group of women entered the premises of Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse and searched the house of woman attendant. They were asked to leave by Mrs. Kapoor, the wife of the Trade Agent. Mr. Kapoor was then away in India. Similar intrusion took place on 22nd November and intruders were warned not to enter the premises. On 24th November, a group of 11 persons apparently under the influence of alcoholic drink, again entered the Agency premises and took out some articles from the premises. It was repeatedly explained to this crowd that they had no authority to enter the premises of a foreign Trade Agency without permission. When questioned, the crowd stated that they had been sent by the local Chinese authorities in the town. Thereupon Mrs. Kapoor and the Head Assistant of the Trade Agency went to report the incident to the Military Headquarters in Gyantse town. Only after waiting for some time was it possible for them to see and convey the narrative of the incidents to Mr. Mooyuting.

The Government of India take serious objection to repeated and apparently deliberate violations of the Agency premises by a crowd of persons. Whatever demand had to be made on the female attendant, the entry into Agency premises is clearly contrary to international usage and terms of 1954 Agreement between the two countries which enjoins mutual respect for the rights of the Trade Agencies. It is requested that the matter be investigated and action taken against the persons responsible for violation of Agency premises. Clear instructions may also be issued to ensure that no violation of Trade Agency premises should occur in the future.

The Consulate General of India takes this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs its assurances of highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China to the Embassy of India in China, 22 December 1959

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China has received the memorandum presented by the Embassy of the Republic of India in China on October 30, 1959, and hereby replies to it as follows:

Regarding the question of the non-diplomatic personnel of the Indian Embassy in China acting as temporary diplomatic couriers, in order to explain the situation, the Ministry would like to refer back to the related documents exchanged and verbal agreement reached on this question between the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Indian Embassy in China in 1953.

The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs issued on January 28, 1953 a note to the diplomatic missions in China (including the Indian Embassy in China) stating that in the case of non-diplomatic personnel of the missions in China wishing to act as temporary diplomatic couriers, the mission concerned could produce a 'certificate for temporary diplomatic courier', and that when the 'certificate for temporary diplomatic courier' has been endorsed with visas by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the diplomatic mail bags carried by the personnel concerned will be exempted from examination.

On February 20 and April 17, 1953 Mr. A. H. Safrani, First Secretary of the Indian Embassy in China, and Mr. R. Goburdhun, Counsellor of the Indian Embassy in China, respectively expressed the hope to Mr. Chin Li-chen, Director of the Visa Department of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, that the Chinese Government would agree to the non-diplomatic personnel of the Indian Embassy holding diplomatic passports and to issue them diplomatic visas when they act as temporary diplomatic couriers, because while they would not encounter problems in China for holding certificates for temporary diplomatic couriers, they would often be harassed by the Hongkong check-post for this, as they have to pass Hongkong both ways.

Taking into account those special difficulties mentioned by the Indian Government, and in line with the spirit of Sino-Indian friendship and cooperation, the Chinese Government made an exception in agreeing that non-diplomatic personnel of the Indian Embassy in China, while acting as temporary diplomatic couriers, may hold diplomatic passports and the Chinese Government will issue them diplomatic visas. However, in order to avoid the holding by these personnel of two identity papers concurrently and make them observe the regulations of the Chinese Government, the Chinese Government specifically made the point that, when non-diplomatic personnel acting as temporary diplomatic couriers hold diplomatic passports, the non-diplomatic passports originally held by them should be handed over to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs for the cancellation of the visas on them issued by the Chinese Government, and that, when their duty as temporary diplomatic couriers has terminated and they again become ordinary staff members, their diplomatic passports should be handed over to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs for the cancellation of the visas on them issued by the Chinese Government. This measure was notified to M. R. Goburdhun, Counsellor of the Indian Embassy in China, on September 10, 1953 by Mr. Chin Li-chen, Director of the Visa Department of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and Mr. Goburdhun thereupon expressed full agreement. It is regrettable that the Indian Embassy in China has never acted in accordance with the verbal agreement already reached, and especially, the holding of diplomatic passports by non-diplomatic personnel acting as temporary diplomatic couriers was extended to staff members of the Indian Consulate-General in Shanghai, and lately even staff members of the Indian Consulate General in Lhasa also held diplomatic passports and acted as temporary diplomatic couriers. Nevertheless, basing itself on Sino-Indian friendship, the Chinese Government for the time being did not take exception to the above-mentioned way followed by the Indian Government, which was inconsistent with the agreement between the two sides. In order to facilitate in future the issuance of visas for couriers, the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in its memorandum of August 21, 1959 to the Indian Embassy in China, requested the Embassy to furnish the Ministry with a name list of those staff members who often would act as temporary couriers. However, the Indian Government has up to now failed to adopt a co-operative attitude in respect of this normal and entirely reasonable request, and even advanced various pretexts in its memorandum of October 30, 1959 to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs for refusing to furnish the name-list. It should be pointed out that as early as in 1954 the Indian Government asked the Chinese Government for name-list of couriers and the Chinese Government, in a spirit of co-operation, has in the past years been furnishing the Indian Government with such name-lists. It is hoped that the Indian Government will also co-operate by speedily furnishing the Chinese Government with a name-list.

Regarding the question of the holding of diplomatic passports by non-diplomatic personnel of the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa acting as temporary diplomatic couriers, as the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs pointed out in its memorandum of August 21, 1959 to the Indian Government, because the Tibet region of China and India are contiguous and couriers can come and go direct and do not have to pass Hongkong, the staff members of the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa acting as temporary couriers will not be subjected to harassment by the Hongkong check-post, as described by the Indian side on February 20 and April 17, 1953, and therefore naturally do not need to hold diplomatic passports, but should in compliance with the Chinese Government's requirement hold certificates of temporary diplomatic couriers. The Chinese Government would like to point out that the diplomatic mail bags carried by temporary diplomatic couriers holding certificates of temporary diplomatic couriers have always enjoyed due protection and immunities within Chinese territory, and no mishap has even occurred. The Indian Government in its memorandum of October 30, 1959 described the reasonable request made by the Chinese Government in its memorandum of August 21, 1959 as in any way objecting to non-diplomatic personnel being chosen for couriers duties. This is an untruthful assertion and is inconsistent with the facts.

It is worth pointing out that since the beginning of this year there have been not a few cases of procrastination and delay in the issuance of visas for India by the Indian side to Chinese couriers. These unjustifiable delays cannot be regarded as in conformity with the immunities and facilities usually due to couriers in international practice.

Nevertheless, the Chinese Government has always taken an attitude of friendly co-operation with the Indian Government on the courier question, and has never had any intention of giving rise to unnecessary argumentation on the courier question. The Chinese Government would like to see the Indian Government take the same attitude, furnish name-lists of the personnel who will act as temporary diplomatic couriers and, in compliance with the requirement of the Chinese side, issue certificates of temporary couriers to those staff members of the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa who act as temporary diplomatic couriers, so that their diplomatic mail bags may be exempted from inspection.
According to the principle of the Government of the People's Republic of China in dealing with the question of nationality, a person born of a Chinese parent, father or mother, is a Chinese (except otherwise provided by treaty or agreement). Kesong Tsering's mother and Basang Chulma's father are Chinese. Therefore according to the above said principle Kesong Tsering and Basang Chulma are Chinese. Kesong Tsering was arrested on account of offence against the law and was meted due punishment corresponding with his guilt by the local authorities. This is entirely a matter of China's internal affairs. Yet the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung asked to "meet" him and the Government of India further unreasonably asked for his "immediate release" and even expressed "strong protest" etc. The Chinese Government is greatly surprised at this. These acts of the Government of India cannot but be conceived as an intervention in the Chinese Government's internal affairs and are incompatible with the five principles of peaceful co-existence jointly initiated by China and India as well with the friendly relations between our two countries. The Chinese Government expresses its deep regret at this and categorically rejects the protest of the Government of India.

2. On 22nd October 1959 Kesong Tsering who was in the employment of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung was arrested by the local authorities for felling trees without permission. After being arrested Kesong Tsering admitted his offence, accepted the reprimand and expressed his willingness to amend. He was released by the local authorities on 7th November 1959. According to Kesong Tsering's confession it was at the instigation of Pappachan a staff member of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung, that he felled trees without permission and that the objective of this theft was to set up electric poles in the compound of the Trade Agency. It should be pointed out that this act of Pappachan was very much out of keeping with his normal official duties in China's Tibetan region as a staff member of the Indian Trade Agency. Regarding Pappachan's instigation of other people to steal trees the Yatung office of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet already took up the matter with the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung, asked the Indian side to deal suitably with him and expressed the hope that no similar cases will occur in the future.

3. Reference Indian national Dawa Thondup's request for permission for his family of Chinese nationality to leave China, according to the regulations of the Chinese Government, a Chinese national should go through necessary exit formalities before he goes abroad. On this question Dawa Thandup not only failed to cooperate with the local authorities; on the contrary India unreasonably prevented his family from fulfilling the formalities for going abroad, refused to observe decrees and regulations of the Chinese Government and brazenly filled the name of his family who are of Chinese nationality in his Indian trader's certificate in an attempt to change their nationality surreptitiously and sneak them out of China. This was an offence against the law for which the Chinese authorities gave Dawa Thondup a severe reprimand. As to exit of Basang Chulma the local authorities in regard for the union of the whole family expressed consent once again on 10th November 1959 for them to leave China and gave them facilities by allowing them to go through the exit formalities locally.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China to the Embassy of India in China, 31 December 1959

Regarding question of nationality of the Indians and Ladakhi Lamas residing in the Tibetan region of China and the Kajis in the Tibetan region of China which has been raised by the Government of India on several occasions the Ministry would like to set forth the Chinese Government's views as follows:

1. Concerning the nationality of the Indians and Ladakhi Lamas residing in the Tibetan region of China:

The Chinese Government would like to reiterate that it has never had the intention of regarding Indian residents who are of Indian origin and the Ladakhi Lamas as Chinese. The local authorities have all along regarded them as having Indian nationality provided that they hold valid certificates of their Indian nationality. It should be pointed out that until now many among the above-mentioned persons still hold no legal certificates of nationality and so their nationality cannot be identified. Five years have passed since conclusion of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement on Trade and intercourse between the Tibetan region of China and India yet the Government of India have still failed to deal with the matter of the certificates which its nationals must hold in accordance with the provisions of the Agreement. This is an abnormal situation which it is hoped will be rectified speedily.

2. Concerning the nationality of the Kajis in the Tibetan region of China:

As pointed out by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China in its note to the Government of India, dated 18 September 1959 the ancestors of these persons moved to and settled in Tibet as early as several centuries back and they have become long since part of the Tibetans of China. There are adequate proofs to show that they have always been treated as the Tibetans of China by the local Government of the Tibetan region of China. Since 1951 most of them have been abroad with either Chinese passports or certificates for Chinese citizens going abroad and transit or exit visas were issued by the Indian Consul General in Lhasa on all the Chinese passports. Neither the Government of India nor the persons concerned ever complained about their status and treatment as Chinese nationals or asked that they renounced Chinese nationality. As Chinese they are naturally entitled to the rights and bear the obligations due to Chinese citizens. It is therefore entirely proper that they now continue taking part in various social activities and enjoy the right to education. The Chinese Government cannot agree to the fact that Government of India should lodge a so-called “strong protest” against this matter which is purely within the scope of China's internal affairs.

Even though according to the Indian Laws people can apply for and acquire Indian nationality the Government of India cannot ignore China's principle governing the handling of the question of nationality. It is aniversally acknowledged that according to international law and practice, if, in dealing with a question of nationality there should arise any clash between the laws of two countries it must be dealt with in accordance with the law of the country in which the person concerned resided, before the two countries have come to an agreement through consultations. The Chinese Government absolutely cannot agree to the view expressed in Government of India’s note and the practice of Mr. S. C. Chibber formerly Indian Consul General in Lhasa which would force persons of Chinese nationality living in China to unilaterally accept the Indian law.

Nevertheless the Chinese Government in line with its stand to settle the question of nationality through friendly consultations and respecting the desires of the persons concerned themselves in regard to their nationality is willing to settle the question of nationality of the Kajis in the Tibetan region in a sympathetic and reasonable manner. The Chinese Government therefore hold that those of them who desire of their own will to acquire Indian nationality must go through the legal procedure of renouncing Chinese nationality in accordance with the regulations of the authorities of the Tibetan region of China before they can choose Indian nationality. As to those who do not go through the procedure of renouncing Chinese nationality they no doubt remain Chinese and will continue to enjoy the treatment due to Chinese.

3. The Chinese Government has never forced any foreign national (including Indian nationals) residing in the Tibetan region of China to stay in Tibet and prevented him from going back to his country. It is a fact known to all that foreign nationals in the Tibetan region or any other part of China who desire to return to their country are always given permission by the local authorities to do so when they personally applied to the competent local Departments provided they are not involved in any outstanding civil or criminal case or other disputes. In the recent period alone the authorities concerned in the Tibetan region have given permission for more than 120 Ladakhi Lamas to leave China, assisted them in overcoming their difficulties and even subsidised them with travel expenses. This spirit of sympathy, reasonableness and humanitarianism is apparent to all. However the Government of India repeatedly stressed that the local authorities of the Tibetan region of China placed various difficulties in the return of Indian nationals to their country. This does not conform to the fact and the Chinese Government cannot but express its deep regret at this.
Note given by the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Lhasa to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa, 25 January 1960

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet pays its compliments to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa and has the honour to have received the letter of the Consulate General, dated 21st December 1959. According to the information got by the Bureau of Foreign Affairs the course of the matter was to be as follows:

On 20th November 1959 there was a local resident entrusted by the wife of Nisho, a resident there to fetch from Chomo the woman attendant of Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse the articles which she borrowed from Nisho; Chomo promised to return these articles later on. During their talks Mrs. Kapoor, the wife of the Trade Agent suddenly came and slung abuses at that resident. In view of her daring manner and unreasonableness that resident returned without disputation with her. Four days later Chomo still did not return the articles borrowed. On 24th November as requested by the wife of Nisho, 8 peasants went to fetch from Chomo the articles she borrowed. While reaching the outside of Chomo's living quarters these peasants asked gardener there to tell Chomo to send out the articles borrowed but Chomo threw out the borrowed mattress and other articles from her room to the court for peasants to take. Though it is an extremely discourteous behaviour but the five peasants still took back the articles. At that time Mrs. Kapoor once again came and slung abuses at the peasants; the latter held that it is not beneficial to the matter to dispute with a madam with strong emotions and daring manners. The peasants returned at once from the spot. At about 3.00 p.m. on 24th November 1959 under the circumstances of no previous engagement Mrs. Kapoor suddenly arrived at the Military Control Commission of Gyantse and requested meeting Mr. Yin or Mr. Moo. Though this behaviour ran counter to the usual way yet Mr. Moo immediately received her. Mr. Moo expressed that the situation she described would be investigated. Later on 8th December 1959 Mr. Chiang Su-Min, Vice-Director for the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet informed Consul General Mr. Kaul the result after investigation.

According to the above-mentioned situation it appears that the peasants entrusted by the wife of Nisho to fetch from Chomo the articles she borrowed were entirely reasonable and also the attitude of the peasants was very fine. Neither had they ever entered anyone's living quarters nor made the so-called "search". The contention stated in the letter from the Consulate General is not fair, also is not in keeping with the facts. The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet refuses to accept the protest lodged by the Consulate General of India. Simultaneously the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet regrettably noted that Mrs. Kapoor not only did not rein up her attendants rough behaviour but also did not edify Chomo to return the articles borrowed earlier. On the contrary discourteous abuse been slung at the peasants once and again. It was an unfriendly attitude towards the peasants, obviously was also extremely not in line with the status of a madam Trade Agent. The Bureau of Foreign Affairs hope that no similar unhappy matter should reoccur in the future.

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet take this opportunity to renew to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa its assurances of highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China to the Embassy of India in China, 27 January 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy and has the honour to acknowledge receipt of the note handed over by Mr. J. S. Mehta, Deputy Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India, to Counsellor Yeh Cheng-chang of the Chinese Embassy in India on October 26, 1959 on various questions concerning the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse. The Chinese Government, in its note of September 11, 1959, already made reply to the points set forth in this note of the Indian Government. Basing itself on facts, it has repeatedly and patiently made clear to the Indian side that the local authorities of China's Tibet region, consistently adhering to the spirit of Sino-Indian friendship and in accordance with the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement and the Notes exchanged, have given active assistance to the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse in its reconstruction. It is regrettable that the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse should lack a spirit of friendly co-operation with the active assistance of the local authorities, so that the questions which could have been settled long ago are procrastinated and remain outstanding up to now.

1. Regarding the extent of the land which the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse asked to lease.

Paragraph 4 of the Notes exchanged on the occasion of the conclusion of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement clearly provides that "The Government of China agrees that all buildings within the compound walls of the Trade Agencies of the Government of India at Yatung and Gyantse in Tibet Region of China may be retained by the Government of India. The Government of India may continue to lease the land within its Agency compound walls from the Chinese side." The Indian Government, however, in disregard of the agreement and on the pretext of the obsolete lease concluded at the time of the former British colonial government, repeatedly asked to lease large pieces of land outside of the compound walls. This is obviously unacceptable to the Chinese Government. According to the old lease, the area covered by the lease would have included a part of the Nienchu River at that place. This unreasonable demand made by the Indian Government is not only in violation of the Notes exchanged about the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement, but also inconsistent with the principle of sovereignty in international law.

The Chinese Government has noticed that the Indian Government, in its note of October 26, 1959, indicated that it would no longer lease land along the river, and has informed the Tibet local authorities about this. As to the Indian Government's request to lease lands north and northeast of the site, the local authorities of China's Tibet region would define a reasonable extent for the lease as permitted by local conditions and taking into consideration the actual needs of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government would instruct the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse to take a cooperative attitude towards the Chinese local authorities and quickly submit a plan for the consultation and conclusion of the lease so as to settle as soon as possible this question which could have been solved long ago.

2. Regarding the building of spurs.

Since the site to be leased by the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse will be moved northward, the question of building spurs no longer exists. However, as the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, in its note, has given an account inconsistent with the facts, it is necessary to set forth the truth of the facts.

In 1958, the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse planned to build spurs in the local public river. According to this plan, the spurs would seriously endanger the bridge and highway further down-stream; and the local authorities, naturally could not agree to this. On March 29, 1959 the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa handed over a so-called revised plan to the Tibet Foreign Bureau, and explained that this plan only called for the building of a protective wall along the land formerly leased, but no longer that of spurs in the river. In line with its consistent spirit of friendly assistance, the Chinese local authorities in Tibet agreed that the Indian side could build a protective wall along the river-bank provided that it would not endanger the bridge and highway and that the plan is examined and approved by the competent local organs at Gyantse. But strangely, the blueprints later handed over by the Indian Trade Agency to the authorities concerned at Gyantse still envisaged the building of spurs in the river. When this was discovered by the authorities concerned at Gyantse, they further notified the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse that it might not build spurs in the river. As many as seven such notifications were made in succession. However, the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse paid no heed to the notifications of the local authorities, peremptorily started the construction work, and built a great number of spurs in the river, seriously endangering the bridge and highway further down-stream of the Nienchu River, and causing the erosion of land of the southern bank. Such an action of peremptorily building a great number of illegal works in a public river of the host country, disregarding the security of local public installations, paying no heed to the repeated notifications of the local authorities, and failing to act on the expressed intention of the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa to revise its original plan, is indeed extraordinary. The Indian Government, instead of stopping this action of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse, supported it and in many ways argued for it in its note. The Chinese Government expresses its extreme regret at this.

3. Transport and supplies.

Regarding the question of transport and supplies serving the reconstruction of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse, the Chinese local authorities have all along rendered active assistance in spite of great material difficulties locally. The Indian Government has obviously had some misunderstandings on this matter so that it should have described the consistent active assistance given by the local authorities as deliberate creation of difficulties. The Chinese Government absolutely cannot agree with such an unwarranted charge.

The Chinese Government has noted that the Indian Government no longer persists in its request for the import of trucks for its Trade Agency.
The Chinese Government believes that if only the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse consults with the local authorities in a friendly and cooperative manner, reasonable requests made in connection with the reconstruction of the buildings of the Trade Agency undoubtedly will be reasonably satisfied.

4. Regarding the detention of the driver.

The Indian Government stated in its note of July 25, 1959 that, “Recently the local driver who had been in the service of the Agency for a long time was questioned and detained by the authorities,” etc. This was a distortion of the facts. The fact was that the original driver long hired by the Agency died in the spring of 1959 and the Agency then hired another local driver who had not obtained a formal driving licence. The local authorities repeatedly notified the driver that he must obtain a formal driving licence before he could drive. However, the Indian Trade Agency insisted on the driver driving at will without licence. It was only when its repeated notifications were ignored that the local authorities could not but detain that driver. It is perfectly clear that the Chinese local authorities had full right to take action against the driver who violated the regulations. However, the Indian Government said in its note of October 26 that, “No mention was made by the Foreign Bureau that the driver should not drive the car pending the issue of fresh licence.” Such an allegation is obviously unreasonable.

In its note of September 11, 1959, the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs made clear to the Indian Government that the local authorities had not detained the car of the Agency. Nor had the local authorities prevented personnel of the Agency from taking away the car. The Indian Government’s assertion in its note that “In fact the sentry did not allow him to take the car away” is inconsistent with the facts. The Chinese Government firmly rejects the protest made by the Indian Government on this matter.

5. Regarding the practice of the People’s Liberation Army units and the temporary accommodation of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse.

The Chinese Government, in its note of September 11, 1959, has given definite and clear replies to the Indian Government regarding these two questions. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will no more intervene unreasonably with the regular practice conducted by the Chinese troops on their own camp ground. As to the temporary accommodation of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse, the local authorities have exerted their utmost efforts and already properly settled the question by arranging more than ten premises.

6. Conclusion.

To sum up, the Chinese local authorities have all along given active assistance to the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse in its reconstruction work, and yet the latter has repeatedly made impracticable demands, and on many occasions failed to observe the regulations of the Chinese local authorities and even adopted various methods which impaired the Chinese people’s interests. It is regrettable that the accounts of the facts given by the Indian Government in its past notes are one-sided, and its arguments untenable. Therefore, its charges against the Chinese Government are also groundless.
Nevertheless, the Chinese Government, persisting in its desire of upholding Sino-Indian friendly relations and scrupulously adhering to the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement and the Notes exchanged, will instruct the local authorities to continue to assist the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse and to satisfy so far as possible the reasonable demands made by the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse in connection with its reconstruction work. It is hoped that the Indian Government will, in the same spirit, instruct the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse to cooperate with the Chinese local authorities so that concrete questions may be settled smoothly.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to express to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of India in Peking to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China, 2 February 1960

The Embassy of India in China presents its compliments to the Diplomatic Personnel Service Association of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and has the honour to state that the taps and water tanks at 36, Shun Chen Chieh, rented by this Embassy, are in need of immediate repairs. This has been repeatedly reported to the Housing Bureau.

2. The Housing Bureau informed the Embassy a few days ago that unless the house was properly heated, there was danger of water freezing and the pipes bursting. It was pointed out to them that all arrangements for heating existed at 36, Shun Chen Chieh and there was an immediate need for a servant to attend to the boiler. The D.P.S.A. was requested to recommend a person for the job. No person had been recommended for the work. In the circumstances, the Embassy was not in a position to accept any responsibility because it was not free to engage servants on its own.

3. The Press Attache, who is staying at the above residence has not yet been given a satisfactory cook. In the absence of servants, it is not possible to heat the house properly, even if fuel is supplied.

4. The Embassy of India requests that the Press Attache may kindly be given immediately the servants that the Embassy has asked for. The Embassy has rented the house for its use on payment of rent. The Embassy cannot accept responsibility for extensive repairs to the house. And as for any damage that may be caused to the installations from lack of adequate heating, the Embassy regrets it can accept no responsibility as the officer residing in the building was not given the servants necessary to fully operate the heating system.

The Embassy avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Diplomatic Personnel Service Association the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 19 February 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to invite attention to its note of the 26th October 1959 in regard to the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse. The Government of India have now seen the Chinese note presented on the 27th January 1960 to the Counsellor of the Indian Embassy in Peking on the subject. The Government of India will communicate their detailed comments on the various points raised in the note as early as possible. Meantime, they wish to draw the attention of the Chinese Government to the continued difficulty of accommodation of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse and delay in the reconstruction of the Agency premises.

A brief history regarding the difficulties of accommodation has already been given in the previous notes on the subject. The Government of India would invite the attention of the Chinese Government to paras 4 and 5 of the note of 26th October, 1959. The Government of India have throughout maintained that the lease concluded in 1943 for the property, on which the Indian Trade Agency was situated, remains valid, regardless of the internal changes in the Tibet region of China. They have also consistently affirmed that an area approximately equal to that specified in the original lease was required to reconstruct the various Trade Agency buildings. The Government of India cannot now accept the contention that it is necessary to negotiate afresh "the reasonable extent of the site required for the needs of the Trade Agency".

As stated above, the Government of India’s contention in regard to the actual area of the Trade Agency in Gyantse is supported by the terms of the lease for the property concluded in 1943 between the representatives of the then Government of India, the Tibetan authorities and the owners of the land. Article I of the lease defines the area of the property as measuring 29.13 acres and refers specifically to the description of the property in the Agreement signed in 1908 between Great Britain (then representing the Government of India), the Tibetan Delegate, and also the Central Government of China. The 1908 Agreement, it will be recalled, was concluded between the three parties to amend the Trade Regulations which were agreed upon in 1893. It may be noted that the Central Chinese Government was a party to the 1893 Regulations: the two Chinese Commissioners namely, Ho Chang-Jung and James H. Hart signed on behalf of the Chinese Government. Similarly, the Special Commissioner Chang Yin Tang signed the Agreement of 1908 on behalf of the Chinese Emperor. It is also clear that the Government of the People's Republic of China accepted the continuing validity of the lease and the area specified in it. It is surprising that, on the one hand, the Chinese Government implicitly agreed, in paragraph 4 of the notes attached to the 1954 Agreement, to the continuation of the arrangements made under the lease of 1943 and on the other hand, they call it now an 'obsolete lease'. Certainly the words 'retained' and 'continue to lease’ in this paragraph do not convey the existence of a legal vacuum concerning relations between the two parties in this regard before 1954.

As pointed out in earlier notes, the lease of 1943 is obviously endorsed by paragraph 4 of the notes attached to the 1954 Agreement regarding the Trade and Intercourse with the Tibet Region of China. The statement that “the Government of India may continue to lease the land within the Agency compound walls” should be read in the spirit of the agreement and in the context of the immediately preceding sentence in the notes. The fact is that there were no compound walls right along the perimeter of the Trade Agency either in Yatung or in Gyantse; and therefore the phrase ‘compound walls’ only signifies the boundary of the areas in question. The record of the proceedings makes it abundantly clear that under the provisions of the agreement, the Government of India would continue to remain in possession of the land occupied by its agencies prior to the conclusion of the 1954 Agreement. That the interpretation placed by the Government of India is correct and had been accepted by the Chinese authorities is clearly borne out by the fact that even after the conclusion of the 1954 Agreement India remained in possession of the entire area in Gyantse. The Trade Agency was obliged to leave the premises temporarily because of the unprecedented floods which washed away the buildings on this property in 1954. It may be added that on the authority of the same paragraphs in the 1954 Agreement the Government of India continue in possession of the original area of the Trade Agency in Yatung even up to this day and, in fact, the position has been recognised afresh by the Chinese Government in the lease agreement for the Yatung Agency concluded as recently as 1958.

The Government of India are therefore, greatly surprised by the suggestion now put forward that the Chinese Government dispute India’s right to continue to occupy and rebuild on the area remaining out of the original Agency compound. In November 1959 the Indian Trade Agent in Gyantse held discussions with the Local Foreign Bureau to finalise the exchange of land on the river side and to facilitate commencement of the reconstruction of the premises. In the meeting between Mr. Moo Uyu-Ting, Director of the Foreign Bureau in Gyantse, and the Indian Trade Agent on the 7th and the 14th November, Director Moo, on behalf of the Chinese Government, put forward for the first time the suggestion that the Government of India would be entitled merely to an area of land enclosed within the quadrangular compound near the tennis court and the main building of the previous Agency building. The area thus suggested would be approximately one fourth of an acre only. There could be little doubt in the mind of the local authorities that it would be quite impossible to build the office of the Trade Agency, the residential premises for the Agent and his staff in an area approximating to 1200 square yards only. The contention of the Chinese authorities is, therefore, not merely indefensible on the basis of previous agreements but is manifestly absurd.

Of the total area of 29.13 acres originally occupied by the Indian Trade Agency nearly a third has been eroded by the river and only about 19.13 acres remain. The Government of India are reconciled to the loss of the area along the river embankment and do not contend that its boundary limit should include any part of the river stream even though it originally lay within the leasehold. In fact, the Government of India have throughout tried to take an accommodating and reasonable attitude with a view to reaching an agreement and facilitating the reconstruction of the Agency premises as soon as possible. Even though the Government of India are fully convinced of the continuing validity up to 1971 of the lease agreement of 1943, in the spirit of accommodation they agreed to conclude a new lease. But, throughout the protracted discussions on the subject, the Government of India made it repeatedly clear that they not only have the right to the continued occupation of their entire leasehold area but they also wish to retain occupation of the area which now remains, after a portion has been washed away by the river. In fact, both the Chinese Government in Peking as well as the local authorities in Lhasa had agreed in principle to the leasing by the Government of India of the entire remaining area and even some extra land, to construct the protective works and also to start construction of the building, without the formal execution of a new lease deed. This was confirmed in letters exchanged at Lhasa in May 1958 and discussion held in Peking in June 1958. It was with a view to by-pass the question of protective works and their management, which apparently presented difficulties from the Chinese side, that the Government of India offered to surrender the site along the river embankment but at the same time it was stipulated as a condition to this arrangement that Agency must be guaranteed the right to draw water for the Agency requirements and that an area equal to and in lieu of the land so surrendered and contiguous to the Agency property on the north and north-eastern side of the Agency site is made available by the local authorities. The Government of India are prepared to make this adjustment but are unwilling to enter upon fresh negotiations on the question of the extent of the area required for the Agency premises.

The foregoing paragraph would show that the Government of India have throughout taken a fully co-operative attitude. They firmly reject the assertion in the latest note of the Chinese Government that the Indian attitude has in any way been unreasonable or difficult. Indeed, it is the local Chinese authorities which have persistently delayed and obstructed, on one pretext or another, the reconstruction of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse. The Embassy must be aware that the question of Gyantse property has been taken up by the Government of India at different times and at different levels. For three years the Government of India have been trying to secure the necessary facilities and co-operation to rebuild its Agency, and engineers have been waiting at Gyantse to start the construction work. It has been pointed out repeatedly that in the difficult climatic condition of Tibet, the Trade Agent and the staff suffer serious inconvenience in the absence of proper office and residential accommodation. At no time in the past on the long discussions on this subject, was any reservation made by the local authorities about the area of the land for the Agency and the Government of India can only conclude from the unreasonable attitude now taken by the Chinese Government that they are not anxious to give facilities for the proper functioning of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse. The Government of India protest against this attitude. They firmly reject the interpretation which is sought to be placed on the Agreement and are of the view that the present attitude amounts to a clear violation of the 1954 Agreement. It is paradoxical that the principle of sovereignty under International Law, in the exercise of which states enter into treaty relations, is invoked, in the note of the Chinese Government, to justify their unwillingness to fulfil in good faith the solemn international obligation thus freely assumed under such treaties.
The Government of India would again urge that immediate steps should be taken for the conclusion of the lease for the establishment of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse providing for an area of at least 19.13 acres largely on the original site. The Government of India would not be prepared to surrender the site. If however, lease agreement is not concluded in the near future on this basis and no satisfactory arrangements are reached without delay, the Government of India would have to consider closing the Agency establishment altogether.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China to the Embassy of India in China, 27 February 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to acknowledge receipt of the note on questions concerning the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung handed over by Mr. J. S. Mehta, Deputy Secretary of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, to Counsellor Yeh Cheng-chang of the Chinese Embassy in India on October 26, 1959, and the note regarding the trip of the Indian Trade Agent in Gartok to the western areas of China's Tibet delivered by the Indian Embassy in China to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs on August 29, 1959. Regarding many of the questions raised in the above-mentioned notes, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in its note of September 11, 1959 to the Indian Embassy in China already made clear the truth of the facts in a friendly and sincere manner. The Indian Government, however, has again brought up these questions and laid blame on the Chinese Government. This is obviously not conducive to the development of Sino-Indian friendly relations. The Chinese Government, out of the desire to safeguard the traditional friendship between China and India, would like to make further replies as follows:

1. Questions concerning the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung:

   (1) The local authorities of China's Tibet region have never obstructed the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung in its repair work such as white-washing of buildings, fixing of windows and painting of doors and window frames; they have also duly given permission to the plans for renovations or construction on its premises submitted by the Agency in accordance with the lease contract. This is sufficient to show the friendly and cooperative attitude of the local authorities of China's Tibet region towards the Agency. What should be pointed out is that the Trade Agency, in carrying out certain of its renovation or construction projects, did not always abide by the provisions of the lease contract. The local authorities of China's Tibet region will remain willing in the future to render assistance to the Trade Agency with regard to its reasonable requests in this respect; but it is also hoped that the Indian Trade Agency would likewise adopt a cooperative attitude and observe the relevant provisions of the lease contract.

   (2) With regard to the request of the local authorities of China's Tibet region that the Indian school in the premises of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung should not enrol Chinese pupils, the Indian Government said in its note that this request "seems extraordinary", and that it indicates "some unaccountable distrust of the elementary school maintained by the Indian Trade Agency at Yatung." The Chinese Government is amazed by these assertions. It is stipulated by the local authorities of China's Tibet region that Chinese children must receive Chinese education. The Indian Trade Agency should respect China's internal measures.
(3) The Chinese Government notes with satisfaction that the doctor and clinic specially serving the Indian Trade Agency will abide by the wish of the local authorities and will no longer take in Chinese patients in the future.

(4) The Indian Government, on the excuse of the verbal notification of Chinese laws and regulations by the local authorities of China's Tibet region, asserted that "it is not possible for the Indian posts in Tibet to know what local regulations they are expected to observe." The Chinese Government is astonished by such a statement. According to international practice, all relevant regulations of a country notified by its government to foreign representative organs either verbally or in written form should be regarded as valid. The ignoring of regulations of the local authorities of China's Tibet region as shown by Indian organs, in Tibet is rarely seen in international practice.

2. Regarding so-called restrictions on the movement of personnel of the Indian organs in Tibet:

(1) In its note of September 11, 1959, the Chinese Government has made clear that the local authorities of China's Tibet region have always given adequate facilities so far as possible to the personnel of the Indian organs in Tibet in their normal functioning, and have never imposed any restrictions on it. It is well known that for a considerable period before and after the Tibetan upper-class reactionary clique launched armed rebellion, the rebel bandits carried out harassment in various parts of Tibet. It was very necessary for the local authorities of China's Tibet region to adopt some protective measures for a period of time to protect the smooth functioning of the Indian organs in Tibet and to ensure the safety of the Indian officials. In fact, along with progress in the suppression of the rebellion, some of the protective measures have been gradually lifted. The Chinese Government is of the belief that, should the Indian organs in Tibet and Indian officials adopt a cooperative attitude, such well-intentioned measures on the part of the local authorities will have the full understanding of the Indian Government.

(2) The local authorities of China's Tibet have no objection to the Indian Trade Agency inviting local people to attend cinema shows. It must be pointed out, however, that the contents of some of the films shown by the Indian Trade Agency are obviously unwelcome. To draw large numbers of Chinese inhabitants to see these films is most inappropriate and hence also not in the interests of the normal development of friendly relations between the two countries.

3. Regarding the trip of the Indian Trade Agent in Gartok to western Tibet:

(1) The local authorities of China's Tibet region have consistently, in accordance with the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954, given assistance to the Indian Trade Agent in Gartok in his annual trip to western Tibet for the performance of his duties. They will continue to do so in the future. Since the Indian Embassy in China last year asked for the provision of a mobile radio station and security protection for the Trade Agent, the Chinese Government, taking into account the situation in Tibet at the time, made the timely suggestion that the Trade Agent change his route and enter Chinese territory and proceed to Pulan Dzong through the Lipulek Pass, so that this assistance could be rendered to him. This suggestion was entirely reasonable.

When the Indian Trade Agent arrived at Pulan Dzong on July 30, 1959, Chinese troops were mopping up remnant rebels in western Tibet. In order to ensure his security, the local authorities of China's Tibet region suggested to him that he ride in a car instead of using animal transportation, and also that he proceed to Gargunsa instead of Gartok for the time being. Moreover, as August is a rainy season in western Tibet, the road was impassable for motor traffic. It is understandable that under such exceptional circumstances the Indian Trade Agent should have been obliged to remain in Pulan Dzong for some time. In connection with this question, the Chinese Government has repeatedly enumerated the facts to make clear the good-willed attitude of the local authorities of China's Tibet region towards the Indian Trade Agent. However, the Indian Government has ceaselessly made complaints. The Chinese Government cannot understand this.

(2) Regarding the payment of rents by the Indian Trade Agency in Gartok, although, in accordance with the notes exchanged in 1957, it can also be made in Rupees through commercial banks in India, it is clear that when paying rents to the local authorities within Chinese territory, the Trade Agency should abide by Chinese regulations governing foreign exchange and pay in JMP. There is no room for argument on this question.

4. Regarding couriers and communication:

(1) The Chinese Government has noted that the Indian Government has agreed to start using Indians as couriers. As far as the various arguments made by the Indian Government in its note for the out-mode and unreasonable Chinese Tibetan messenger system, they are all untenable. This system is an old one left over by history, which does not conform to normal diplomatic relations and is totally inconsistent with the spirit of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954. The Chinese Government has from 1955 asked again and again that the Indian organs in Tibet stop using such messengers, and repeatedly indicated its willingness to assist the Indian organs in Tibet in the transmission of mailbags. However, the Indian side has not only adopted over a long period of time an attitude of not cooperating, but even labelled the Chinese Government's legal act of abolishing the Chinese Tibetan messenger system in faithful implementation of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 as an "arbitrary action." The Chinese Government expresses deep regret at this.

(2) The Indian Government alleged in its note that the Chinese local postal authorities, while handling the Indian Government's mail-bags, had opened these bags. The local authorities of China's Tibet region long ago explained to the Indian consulate-General in Lhasa that last year, when the post office of the former local authorities of Lhasa was taken over, it was discovered that one of the two mailbags destined to the Indian Consulate-General was torn. The Tibet local authorities could by no means be held responsible for this. As for delays in transmitting mailbags and food, it was difficult to avoid in April last year under the concrete conditions prevailing at that time in Tibet. But the situation has long since improved.

(3) As no formal agreement has yet been reached in the negotiations between the Chinese and Indian sides on the mutual establishment of radio stations on an equal and reciprocal basis, it therefore goes without saying that the radio stations now in the Indian organs in Tibet have not been recognized by the Chinese Government. This was clearly pointed out by Deputy Director Li Chen of the Asian Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in January 1958 in his talk with Counsellor Singh of the Embassy. Any assertion that the radio stations set up by the Indian organs in Tibet have obtained the permission of the Chinese Government is obviously inconsistent with the actual fact.

Apart from the above clear replies were made by the Chinese Government in its note of September 11 to the questions of the delay of Indian courier Shri Bhupindra Singh in Yatung and so-called deprivation of the Indian Government of facilities of communication with the Indian posts in Tibet, which were raised in the Indian notes. As a matter of fact, the Chinese local post and telegraphic offices have never refused to accept the mailbags and telegrams of the Indian organs in Tibet and have always rendered assistance in their transmission.

Summarizing the above facts, it can be seen that the Chinese Government and the Tibet local authorities have all along treasured friendly relations between China and India and faithfully carried out the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954. Many of the questions raised in the Indian Government's notes have already been settled with the assistance of the Chinese local authorities; as to the remaining questions, so long as the principles of mutual respect for territorial integrity and sovereignty, non-interference in each others' internal affairs and equality and mutual benefit are adhered to, most of them can also be settled through on-the-spot friendly consultations made by the Indian organs in Tibet with the local authorities of China's Tibet region. The Chinese Government considers that endless disputes over these questions not only would not help settle the actual questions, but would leave behind an unpleasant effect on friendly relations between China and India. So far as the Chinese Government is concerned, it will continue to enjoin the Tibet local authorities to give the Indian organs in Tibet various facilities that are possible and necessary in the latter's normal functioning in line with the Sino-Indian Agreement and friendship between the two countries. It is true that in the course of putting down the rebellion and instituting reforms in Tibet, there have arisen individual, temporary difficulties. This is unavoidable and is also fully understandable. The Chinese Government believes that, with the gradual restoration of normal order in the Tibet region, these difficulties will be eliminated step by step. The Chinese Government, however, must urge the Indian Government to instruct the Indian organs in Tibet likewise to abide strictly by the Five Principles and the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 and show full understanding and cooperation with the local authorities of China's Tibet region in their good-willed measures and assistance.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India the assurance of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 18 December 1959

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India and, regarding the unwarranted imposition of restrictions by the local authorities of Darjeeling on the normal functions of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong while conniving at the forcible intrusion by Americans into the compound of the Chinese Trade Agency, lodges a protest as follows:

As reported by the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, on November 27, 1959, Mr. A. B. Choudhury, Superintendent of police, Darjeeling District, and Mr. Nima Namchu, Deputy Superintendent, suddenly informed the Trade Agency that, for the purpose of avoiding unexpected incidents, they would send policemen to the Trade Agency to provide protection from November 28. At 8.30 on the morning of November 28, 1959 Mr. Namchu, the Deputy Superintendent, together with the personnel of the Foreigners' Registration Office, brought a group of armed soldiers to the gate of the Chinese Trade Agency and started posting them. Since then, fixed armed sentry guards were posted respectively at the front gate and the back entrance of the Trade Agency, and these armed soldiers were directed by plain-clothed persons of unknown identity who were stationed there all the time. These soldiers and unidentified plain-clothed persons obstructed and interrogated all the staff of the Trade Agency entering or coming out, either by car or on foot, of the Agency. Chinese nationals entering or leaving the Trade Agency were compelled to register their names, numbers of their Foreigner's Registration certificates, time of entering and leaving the Agency etc., and after that they were summoned to the Foreigners' Registration Office at Kalimpong for detailed questioning. The Chinese nationals were told that the Registration Office disliked their going to the Trade Agency, and that, should they go again, they must inform the Office in advance and submit the record of their conversations after their visit. Some Chinese nationals were prevented from entry into the Trade Agency without any reason. Even those Chinese nationals and Nepalese nationals who went to supply the Trade Agency with daily necessities or to work at the Agency also met with obstructions. When Chinese nationals stopped out of the Trade Agency after a film show given by the Agency for their entertainment, they were warned that they should go to the Foreigners' Registration Office for questioning.

It is surprising that, while the staff of the Chinese Trade Agency and the Chinese nationals were harassed without any justification as they entered or came out of the Trade Agency, the Indian soldiers and the unidentified plain-clothed persons twice connived at the intrusion of Americans into the compound of the Trade Agency. At 4.30 P.M. December 3, four Americans including Frederic Rheinstin of the U.S. National Broadcasting Co. and its Far East Bureau Chief, Cecil Brown, with the connivance of the Indian soldiers and the unidentified plain-clothed persons, arbitrarily intruded into the compound of the Trade Agency, in disregard of the objection of the personnel of the Agency, and forcibly took moving pictures and photographs there. At 12-30 P.M., December 4, Rheinstein and Brown intruded once again into the compound of the Agency.

The Chinese Embassy considers that the situation stated above is extremely serious. The above-mentioned line of action taken by the Darjeeling local authorities of India against the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong has by far exceeded the scope of providing protection for a foreign official organ, and is apparently in contravention of international usage. The unwarranted harassment carried out by the local authorities against the staff of the Trade Agency and the Chinese nationals entering or coming out of the Chinese Trade Agency is in reality intended to restrict the normal functions of the Agency and to oppose the Chinese nationals making contacts with the Agency. It may be pointed out that, under the present circumstances of military control, the guards sent by the Tibet local authorities of China for the security of the Indian Consulate-General at Lhasa, have placed no restrictions on the normal functions of the Consulate-General. However, viewed from the very fact that, in disregard of the objection of the personnel of the Agency, the Indian soldiers on guard at the Chinese Trade Agency even twice connived at the intrusion of Americans into the compound of the Agency, it cannot but make one suspect what India is actually aimed at in adopting such a measure. The unjustified restrictions imposed by the Darjeeling local authorities against the Chinese Trade Agency have seriously affected the carrying on of the normal functions of the Agency. Meanwhile, taking it into consideration that not long ago the local authorities have attempted to acquire without any justification the plots of land which are being used by the Chinese Trade Agency, one also has reason to suspect whether or not it is the intention of the Indian side to put to suspension the functions of the Chinese Trade Agency, or simply to make it impossible for the organ to continue to exist at all. Regarding this, the Chinese Embassy is instructed to lodge a serious protest with the Indian Government, and demand that the Indian Government instruct the Darjeeling local authorities immediately to do away with the unwarranted restrictions against the Chinese Trade Agency, and inquire into the case in which the Indian soldiers on guard at the Trade Agency connived at the intrusions of the Americans into the compound of the Agency.

The Embassy avails itself of the opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 15 January 1960

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India sent a note to the Ministry of External Affairs of India on December 18, 1959, lodging a protest against the unwarranted imposition of restrictions by the Darjeeling local authorities on the normal functions of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong while conniving at the forcible intrusion by Americans into the compound of the Chinese Trade Agency. Since then, however, the local authorities of Darjeeling have continued to carry on all sorts of harassments and place various restrictions on the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong, and they even went so far as to obstruct the delivery of telegrams to the Trade Agency and prevent Mr. Lee Chih-ken, the Deputy Trade Agent, and his wife from entering the Trade Agency. For instance, a telegram from the Embassy dated December 28, 1959 reached Kalimpong at 18:07 hours, December 29, but it was not received by the Trade Agency until 8.30 in the morning of December 30. The Trade Agency was told by the local telegraph office that a messenger had been sent to deliver the above-said telegram to the Trade Agency at 19:30 December 29, but failed to enter the Trade Agency because he was prevented by the sentry guard at the gate, and for this reason the time of the delivery was delayed. At about 12 o'clock, December 29, 1959, when another telegram was sent to the Trade Agency by the telegraph office, the delivery was also obstructed. The messenger said that the guard at the gate of the Trade Agency had told him that he was not allowed to enter without a “pass”. On December 27, 1959, Mr. Lee Chih-ken, the Deputy Trade Agent of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, and his wife were once prevented from entry when they came back to the Trade Agency from outside. It must be pointed out that the various harassments and obstructions to which the Chinese Trade Agency was subjected have put the functions of the Trade Agency to suspension. The Embassy requests that the Indian Government pay serious attention to this and immediately stop such improper measures against the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 6 February 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of China in India and with reference to the Embassy's note No.
M/450/59 have the honour to state as follows:

As the Embassy is doubtless aware, the Government of India are responsible for the protection of foreign Missions in India and their staff.
In pursuance of this general responsibility, and having particular regard to recent developments which have roused popular feelings in the Darjeeling area, the Superintendent of Police Darjeeling, and his Deputy informed the Chinese Trade Agent at Kalimpong on the 27th November 1959 that it had become necessary to post a protective police guard outside his office.
On the following morning police guards took up their positions at the two entrances to the office of the Chinese Trade Agent. In order to provide.
an adequate measure of safety, the police guards were obliged to question, as is customary in such circumstances, all those who desired to enter the premises and to allow only those who satisfied them as to their bona fides and identity. Many persons belonging to different communities and certainly all Chinese nationals were thus permitted to enter the Agency compound after preliminary questioning. The staff of the Trade Agency should be able to enter the premises freely on production of their identity cards.
The Government of India reject as baseless the suggestion that these precautionary measures constitute an interference in the conduct of the legitimate business of the Chinese Trade Agent.

2. With regard to interrogation of Chinese nationals, it is a fact that the Foreigners Registration Office at Kalimpong interrogates Chinese nationals as well as other foreigners as a part of its normal functions. The Chinese Embassy must be aware that Chinese nationals, like other foreigners, are required to comply with the provisions of the Foreigners, the provisions of the Foreigners Registration Act and the rules thereunder, and to provide to the Police authorities information concerning their residence, business, movement etc. Foreigners' registration has been in force in India for well over ten years.

3. As regards the alleged intrusion of two Americans into the Agency compound, the facts are that on the 3rd December 1959, two United States citizens, Mr. Cecil Brown and Mr. Fredrick Rhenstein, and two Germans Mr. Amon and Mr. Lingburger, went to the Chinese Trade Agency with the intention of seeking an interview with the Agent. The police guards at the gate after ascertaining their identity and purpose let them in as the authority to grant or refuse interviews vested not with the Police but with the Chinese Trade Agent himself. Subsequently, when it became known that the interview would not be granted, the persons in question withdrew from the Agency peacefully. The Government of India feel bound to point out that the account given by the Embassy is far removed from the facts of the case and that the protest in the Embassy's note is clearly unwarranted.
4. The Government of India are obliged once again to draw attention to the sharp contrast between the treatment accorded to their representatives stationed in Lhasa, Yatung and Gyantse and the courtesy and facilities extended to the Chinese Missions in India. The crippling restrictions on the movement of the Indian Trade Agent at Yatung, the confinement of the Indian Trade Agent at Gyantse to a radius of two miles from his office and the denial to Indian citizens of free access to their Consul-General at Lhasa are illustrative of the general attitude of the local Chinese authorities to the Indian representatives stationed in the Tibet region of China.

5. The Ministry take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 6 February 1960

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India has more than once requested that the Indian Government pay attention to the unwarranted imposition of restrictions by the local authorities on the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong. It is regrettable, however, that the abnormal treatment to which the Trade Agency has been subjected is not even slightly changed, and incidents of various unwarranted harassments have continued to occur. At 8-30 A.M. of January 19, 1960, an overseas Chinese trader, who used to supply the Trade Agency with bean curd regularly, was stopped by the Indian sentry guard at the back entrance of the Trade Agency, and that armed soldier even raised his rifle to threaten him into leaving the place. When the personnel of the Trade Agency came out to receive him on hearing the noise, three furious soldiers were still trying to prevent the trader from entering the Agency, saying that they had orders not to allow visitors to enter through the back entrance. Later, a plain-clothed man also confirmed that the orders had been issued by Mr. A. B. Choudhury, Superintendent of Police, Darjeeling District, India. At 10 A.M. on the same day, Mr. P. T. Maitra from the Darjeeling police office went to the Chinese Trade Agency, saying that what had happened in the morning was caused by "misunderstanding" and he denied the existence of the above-said orders, made apologies to the Agency on behalf of the Indian personnel involved and ensured against recurrence of similar incidents in the future. Yet, in fact, the various obstructions and harassments to which the Chinese Trade Agency was subjected has been not in the least reduced.

The Embassy hereby informs the Ministry of the above-mentioned incidents, and would like to point out that the very fact that the Indian Darjeeling police office made apologies to the Chinese Trade Agency is a proof of the gravity of the incident. The Embassy would like to request once again that the Indian Government pay serious attention to the various harassments and unwarranted restrictions to which the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong has been subjected, and hopes that the Indian Government will make an early reply to its note of December 18, 1959 and memorandum of January 15, 1960.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 27 October 1959

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India and, with reference to the attempt of the Darjeeling local authorities of India to acquire without any justification the land being by the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, has the honour to state as follows:

According to the report which the Embassy has received, at 2 o’clock on the afternoon of October 5, 1959, a person claiming to be from an office of land acquisition of Darjeeling entered without prior notice the compound of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong and, in disregard of the advice and prevention of the officials of the Agency, forcibly pasted up a notification of acquisition of land which was signed by the Deputy Commissioner of Darjeeling. According to the notification the land of the Trade Agency (plot Nos. 468A, 468/469A, 468/727, 468A/718 and 470/475) was to be subject to acquisition, and the Governor of West Bengal had authorised some officials with their servants and workmen to enter upon and survey the land and do other acts on it. The Embassy and the Trade Agency cannot but feel greatly surprised at this sudden and unscrupulous act taken by the Indian local authorities.

The Ministry must be aware that since its establishment in March 1955, the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong has been all along using the land referred to in the notification and land No. 468/692 (extension) together with the buildings on them. Furthermore, as early as several years back, the Agency came into agreement with the owner of the above-mentioned property of buildings and land, R. Omo, regarding the transfer of the buildings and land to the Agency. On August 1, 1957, R. Omo wrote to inform the Sub-Divisional Officer of Kalimpong of the discussions which she had had with the Agency regarding the transfer, and formally filed an application for necessary permission of the transfer. Meanwhile, the Embassy would like to mention that, besides the buildings and land mentioned above, the Agency also uses the land, Touzi Nos. 955 and 1086 and the godown thereon. It has also been agreed with the owner, Jigmie Panda, that this property of buildings and land be transferred to the Agency, and Jigmie Panda wrote on August 5, 1957 to the Deputy Collector of Darjeeling applying for the permission of the transfer. After the filing of applications by R. Omo and Jigmie Panda respectively with the local authorities concerned, Mr. Lee Chih-kan, Deputy Trade Agent of China at Kalimpong also wrote on October 17, 1957 to the Deputy Commissioner of Darjeeling, inquiring about the position of how these applications were being dealt with. Although in his reply of October 28, 1957, the Deputy Commissioner of Darjeeling stated that the matter was receiving consideration and that he would duly inform Deputy Trade Agent Lee Chih-kan of the result of the consideration, yet no further reply whatsoever has been received up to the present. It must be pointed out that the matter of the intended transfer to the Agency of the above-mentioned two properties of buildings and land has been undertaken completely in accordance with normal procedures, and that no objection has ever been raised by the Darjeeling local authorities. However, since then two long years have passed and the approval of the two applications for the transfer of the above-mentioned properties of buildings and land is still being awaited. This cannot but make one suspect that it was caused by the deliberate delay and shelving by the Darjeeling local authorities. It is extremely surprising that, in disregard of the fact that the above-mentioned two properties of buildings and land have all along been used by the Agency, and that the applications for the transfer of the properties have been made long ago and are still valid, the Darjeeling local authorities should have now issued, all of a sudden, a public notice to acquire the land on which the Agency is located.

The Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong has been established in accordance with the provisions of the Agreement between China and India on Trade and Intercourse between Tibet Region of China and India signed in 1954 and on a reciprocal basis. The notes exchanged between the Governments of the two countries have further provided that the Governments of both sides agree to render assistance to each other's Trade Agencies in respect of housing and the use of land. As the Ministry is aware, the Tibet local authorities of China have all along been given necessary facilities and assistance in regard to the question of house and land of the Indian Trade Agencies in Tibet. At the beginning of 1958, the Indian Trade Agency at Yatung completed the procedures of renewing the lease of land, and the Tibet local authorities of China are assisting the Indian Trade Agencies at Gyantse and Gartok in completing the procedures of leasing land and have also rendered them assistance in their work of construction. It is regrettable that the Darjeeling local authorities not only have failed to give necessary facilities to the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong in the transfer to the Agency of the buildings and land which the Agency has all along been using, but on the contrary, have attempted to use pretext to acquire the main part of the land of the Agency. Obviously it is intended to create difficulties for the Agency. The Embassy cannot but regard this as unfriendly and not in conformity with the provisions of the notes exchanged in 1954.

It must be further pointed out that the person of the office of land acquisition of Darjeeling, without obtaining the consent of the staff of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, should have arbitrarily entered the compound of the Agency and forcibly pasted up a notification there. This is apparently an unscrupulous act in contravention of international usage that foreign official organs be protected.

The Embassy holds that the fact mentioned above is very serious. In order that the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong may exercise its functions normally, the Embassy hereby demands that Ministry immediately take effective measures to enjoin the Darjeeling local authorities to withdraw the attempted acquisition of the land of the Agency, render assistance in completing at an early date the procedure regarding the transfer of the two properties of buildings and land to the Agency, and ensure in the future against recurrence of any incident of violating the privileges that the Agency should be protected.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 16 November 1959

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of People's Republic of China in India and with reference to their note of the 27th October 1959 regarding the premises occupied by the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong have the honour to state as follows:

The house at present occupied by the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong is required urgently for use by the West Bengal Government for an important educational institution in the area. In order, however, not to inconvenience the Trade Agency, Government have agreed not to take possession of the property for the time being. Transfer of the property by sale or permanent lease by the owner will, however, not be permissible.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 15 January 1960

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India and, with reference to the Ministry's note dated November 16, 1959 regarding the acquisition of the land being used by the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, has the honour to state as follows:

With regard to the attempt of the Darjeeling local authorities of India to acquire without any justification the land being used by the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, the Embassy would like to reiterate to the Ministry that it is clearly laid down in the notes exchanged in 1954 pertaining to the Agreement between China and India on Trade and Intercourse between the Tibet Region of China and India that the two Governments agree to render assistance to each other's Trade Agencies in the use of land and in housing. The Embassy, therefore, still requests that the Government of India, in line with the above-mentioned provisions, withdraw the acquisition of the land being used by the Chinese Trade Agency and kindly give facilities so that the two properties of buildings and land concerned may be transferred to the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong at an early date. The Embassy would also like to point out that, even well after the Ministry of External Affairs of India informed the Embassy in a note on November 16, 1959 that possession of the said property would not be taken for the time being, the land acquisition staff of the office of the Darjeeling Deputy Commissioner, India, accompanied by the Director of the Foreigners' Registration Office, Kalimpong, should have been to the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong on December 7, 1959, and requested for taking measurements both inside and outside the building for its acquisition. The Embassy cannot but express regret at this, and request the Ministry of External Affairs to prevent recurrence of similar incidents.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China,
4 March 1960

New Delhi; March 4. 1960

My Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

I thank you for your letter of the 26th February. I am glad that you have accepted my invitation to visit Delhi so that we can have talks about our problems and explore avenues which may lead to a peaceful settlement of these problems. I shall look forward to your visit in April.

We shall naturally try to suit your convenience about the date of your visit here. If I may suggest it, about the 20th April might perhaps be suitable. I shall probably have to leave India for Europe on the 29th or 30th April.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU
NOTES, MEMORANDA AND LETTERS EXCHANGED BETWEEN
THE GOVERNMENTS OF INDIA AND CHINA

MARCH 1960—NOVEMBER 1960

WHITE PAPER No. IV

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
On 10 March 1960, the Prime Minister presented to Parliament the Third White Paper containing the notes, memoranda and letters exchanged between the Government of India and the Government of the People's Republic of China since November 1959. This White Paper contains the notes, memoranda and letters exchanged between the two Governments since 5 March, 1960.

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS,
NEW DELHI.

CONTENTS

Border issues and incidents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 8 April 1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 29 July 1960</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Sino-Indian boundary disputes

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>5.</td>
<td>Letter from the Prime Minister of China to the Prime Minister of India, 19 March 1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6.</td>
<td>Letter from the Prime Minister of India to the Prime Minister of China, 19 March 1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 3 April 1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8.</td>
<td>Text of joint message of the Chinese and Indian official teams to the Prime Ministers of China and India, 24 September 1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 29 September 1960</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Territorial air space

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>11.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 4 April 1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 16 September 1960</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Territorial waters

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>20.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 8 April 1960</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Complaints and representations from the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>22.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 1 August 1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 20 August 1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 2 September 1960</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
27. Statement of the Chinese Government, 21 October 1960

Treatment of Indian representatives and nationals
28. Note of the Indian Government, 1 April 1960
29. Note of the Chinese Government, 8 April 1960
30. Note of the Indian Government, 13 April 1960
32. Note of the Indian Government, 30 June 1960
33. Note of the Chinese Government, 30 June 1960
34. Note of the Chinese Government, 11 July 1960
35. Note of the Indian Government, 14 July 1960
37. Note of the Indian Government, 4th August 1960
38. Note of the Chinese Government, 24 August 1960
39. Note of the Chinese Government, 30 August 1960
40. Note of the Chinese Government, 23 September 1960
41. Note of the Indian Government, 1 November 1960
42. Note of the Indian Government, 9 November 1960

Alleged restrictions on the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong
43. Note of the Indian Government, 4 April 1960
44. Note of the Indian Government, 4 April 1960
45. Note of the Chinese Government, 6 April 1960
46. Note of the Chinese Government, 6 June 1960
47. Note of the Indian Government, 14 June 1960
48. Note of the Indian Government, 14 June 1960
49. Note of the Indian Government, 16 August 1960
50. Note of the Chinese Government, 9 September 1960
51. Note of the Indian Government, 27 September 1960

Alleged anti-Chinese activities in India
52. Note of the Chinese Government, 29 March 1960
53. Note of the Indian Government, 24 June 1960
54. Note of the Chinese Government, 12 August 1960

Miscellaneous
55. Informal Note of the Indian Government, 25 April 1960

(ii)
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the 5th February. In reply the Ministry have to state that they cannot accept the version contained in the Chinese Government’s note of the incident which occurred near Kongka Pass in the Ladakh region of Jammu and Kashmir State on the 21st October 1959. There is no question of an Indian detachment having intruded into the Chinese territory, much less of any Indian patrol having had any aggressive intention towards a Chinese patrol party. The entire Chang Chenmo valley up to Lanak La falls within the Indian territory as has always been shown in official maps of the Government of India. As pointed out earlier, the Government of India had in fact specifically defined the border in this sector in a note sent to the Chinese Government as recently as the 13th August 1959 and no objection was taken to this by that Government. The place where the incident occurred is approximately forty miles within Indian territory.

2. The Government of India do not agree that a party of thirteen Chinese soldiers under a second lieutenant had come to this area merely on a routine patrol. It is quite apparent that a regular entrenched position had been established on the hill-top some time ago, and trucks, wireless equipment etc. were available ready at hand. Nor is it possible to believe that casualties were inflicted when the Indian party were advancing in attack towards the hill-top. Actually, the bodies of the members of the Indian party killed in the encounter were lying at the base of the hill; there was no evidence of any having rolled down the hill side and there were clear indications that the Indian party had been surprised by the Chinese armed detachment from their entrenched position.

3. The Government of India also cannot accept the contention that members of the Indian patrol party, who were taken into custody were provided with adequate food, lodging and other essential requirements to enable them to meet the climatic conditions of this terrain. The note of the Chinese Government admits that new tents for the use of the Indian police party arrived on the 24th October. The delay, which is admitted in the note, in providing necessary food, bedding, and clothing for the Indian personnel, remains unexplained. No Indian personnel on patrol duty in these regions, including the main party which returned to camp at Hotsprings after the encounter, have suffered from frost bites. Therefore the suggestion that the afflictions were due to the inadequacy of the Indian equipment has no basis. The frost bites were clearly the consequence of the prisoners not having been provided with adequate shelter and prompt medical attention. Shri Karam Singh who was later released by the Chinese authorities had to undergo an operation and remain under treatment in a hospital for over two months to recover from the frost bites and exposure which he had suffered during his detention.

101 E.A.—2
4. The Government of India cannot accept that the statements given by Shri Karam Singh and other members of the Indian party to their captors were voluntarily made. On the contrary, it should be self-evident from the details contained in the Chinese Government's note that these statements were either made under pressure or were written out by somebody else and subsequently the prisoners were made to append their signatures to them. For example, the statements, as recorded, constantly refer to 'Indian soldiers'. The prisoners were all members of the civil police. A member of the police force in India refers to his colleagues not as 'soldiers' but only as 'constables'. It is also surprising that Shri Karam Singh is alleged to have stated that he was unaware of the hill-features in Chang Chenmo valley and that the valley had been controlled by China for a long tie. Actually, Karam Singh was fully aware that several Indian expeditions had patrolled the Chang Chenmo valley up to Lanak La in the previous years and that an Indian patrol party had been to this area as late as June 1959. He could not therefore have made a statement attributed to him to the effect that the places to the east, north and south of Kongka Pass had always been Chinese territory. The manner in which the statements from the Indian party were secured and the certificates which have been appended thereto confirm the suspicion that these statements were either spurious or secured under threats or pressure.

5. The Government of India must again express their concern that the body of constable Makhan Lal still remains unaccounted for. He was carried by the Indian police party for two miles and left by the riverside in the custody of two Chinese soldiers. It is clearly the responsibility of the Chinese Government to explain his disappearance or to arrange for the return of the dead body.

6. The Government of India on their part do not find it pleasant to continue the exchange of notes on this unfortunate but serious incident. They share the hope that no such incident causing loss of life on either side would recur. At the same time they cannot but regret the manner in which the Indian party was attacked within Indian territory and the treatment which was meted out to the Indian prisoners during their detention under Chinese custody for over a period of three weeks.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 29 July 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to state that on 3rd June 1960 at about 1200 hours, more than 25 armed Chinese soldiers intruded into Indian territory in the Kameng Frontier Division of NEFA. These armed soldiers moved into Taktsang Gompa (91°51'E & 27°43'N) which is about 4½ miles inside Indian territory. A little later, when the soldiers attracted the attention of the local people, they returned towards Karsungla Gompa.

2. The Government of India are surprised by this armed Chinese intrusion into Indian territory particularly in the context of the decision reached by the two Prime Ministers that both sides would exercise every care to avoid border incidents. The Government of India take a serious view of this intrusion into their territory and urge the Government of the People's Republic of China to take all necessary measures to avoid a repetition of such incidents.

3. The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of the opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum of the Government of India to the Government of China,
27 September 1960

The Government of India have received a report that at 0830 hours on the 22nd September, 1960, a Chinese armed patrol consisting of one officer and 10 soldiers crossed and intruded several hundred yards into Sikkimese territory near Jelepla Pass. The party withdrew after some time on being detected by border administrative personnel in the region.

2. The Government of India strongly protests against this incursion into Sikkimese territory. This is yet another case of a further violation of the understanding reached between the two Prime Ministers that during the pendency of the Sino-Indian official level talks, both sides will avoid action which may result in friction or border clashes. Such an intrusion could well precipitate a serious incident.

3. The Government of India, therefore, urge that clear and unambiguous instructions may be given to ensure that no violation of this nature occurs in future.

4. The Government of India avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Government of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 20 October 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows: The Chinese Government has seen the Note delivered by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India on 27th September, 1960 in which the Government of India alleges that at 0830 hours on 22nd September 1960 an armed Chinese patrol consisting of one officer and ten soldiers crossed and intruded into Sikkimese territory near Jelepla Pass. Detailed investigations by the Chinese Government have now shown that at the above mentioned time and place no armed Chinese personnel crossed the Jelepla Pass therefore the Chinese Government cannot accept the Government of India's protest. According to report of the local authorities in China's Tibet on 22nd September eight inhabitants of the border area concerned while gathering medicinal herbs near the Jelepla Pass according to their usual practice reached a spot not far to the South of the Jelepla Pass and returned from there soon afterwards. It seems that the Government of India has protested with the Chinese Government on the basis of incorrect information mistaking these border inhabitants for Chinese armed force. This is regrettable.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

The Indian Ambassador to China, Mr. Parthasarathi, forwarded your letter on March 5. You suggested that the time for my visit to Delhi might be about April 20. This time is suitable to me and I entirely agree to it. If it suits your convenience and that of the Indian Government, I am prepared to visit Delhi for seven days, from the April 19 to 25.

I am eagerly looking forward to meeting you again and visiting your great country.

With cordial regards,

(Signed) Chou En-lai
Premier of the State Council of the People's Republic of China

His Excellency Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, Government of the Republic of India,
NEW DELHI.
Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

Thank you for your message of the 19th March. The date you have suggested, that is, April 19th, for your arrival here will be convenient to us and we shall be glad to welcome you here then.

With warm regards.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

Jawaharlal Nehru.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China and has the honour to state as follows:

The Chinese Government has received the Embassy's note of February 12, 1960 and has made a careful study of it. The Indian Government has indicated in the note that in the interest of the two countries and of world peace, active steps must be taken to remove the causes of the present tension and to establish a firm foundation of friendship between the two countries, and held that the two Governments must agree on an arrangement without delay, which would completely eliminate the risk of border clashes and facilitate a friendly settlement of the disputes. This accords with the long-cherished desire of the Chinese Government, and the Chinese Government heartily welcomes it.

The Chinese Government, in its note of December 26, 1959 already gave a detailed and comprehensive account of the facts about the Sino-Indian boundary and its stand on this issue. The Indian Government has, in its note, stated many differing views. But the objections raised by the Indian Government in its note cannot dispute the facts presented in the above-mentioned Chinese note or shake the stand of the Chinese Government. Moreover, the Premiers of our two countries will soon meet in New Delhi. Therefore, the Chinese Government does not propose to answer the Indian Government's above-mentioned note point by point. The present note will only give some necessary explanations about those major questions and some of the facts on which the Indian Government expressed disagreement, as a supplement to the Chinese Government's note of December 26, 1959. Now as before, the Chinese Government clarifies these questions and facts, not for arguing purposes, but in hopes of promoting the understanding of the Indian Government and narrowing down the differences between the two sides, so as to facilitate the forthcoming meeting of the two Premiers.

For convenience' sake, the terms of the western, middle and eastern sectors of the Sino-Indian boundary, as defined in the note of December 26, 1959, will be used in this note.

I. Has the Sino-Indian Boundary been delimited and is there any need to delimit it formally?

(1) The Indian Government does not accept the conclusion that the entire Sino-Indian boundary has never been formally delimited and that there is no boundary treaty or agreement between China and India. Yet it is unable to cite any fact to refute this conclusion. The Indian Government admits that the 1842 Treaty did not delimit the boundary in the western sector, yet it argues that this sector of the boundary was fixed from the 17th century onwards. However, it is still unable to cite any treaty basis for the delimitation of this sector of the boundary. With respect to the middle sector, the Indian Government admits that there exists no boundary treaty whatsoever. With respect to the eastern sector, the Indian Government can only cite the Simla Convention between Britain and the Tibet local authorities and the secret letters exchanged between them on the so-called McMahon Line in 1914. But the Chinese Government proved long ago that these documents are illegal and null and void, and that the Simla Conference did not discuss at all the question of delimiting the boundary between China and India. Judging from what has been said in the above, there is no gainsaying the fact that no boundary treaty or agreement exists between China and India, and that the entire Sino-Indian boundary has not been formally delimited.

(2) The Indian Government claims that the entire Sino-Indian boundary, as is well-known, runs along the main watersheds, and that according to international usage, a customary boundary which follows such unchanging natural features stands defined and does not require formal definition again by the two sides. This argument is unacceptable to the Chinese Government. Firstly, the Chinese Government proved long ago that the claim that the entire Sino-Indian traditional customary boundary follows well-known main watersheds is groundless. Secondly, according to internationally accepted principles, an international boundary signifies a demarcation line up to which neighbouring states exercise their sovereignty over their respective territories, and must be jointly defined by the states concerned. Therefore, even though some sections of the Sino-Indian traditional customary line may have comparatively distinct natural features, it is still necessary for the two sides to define jointly their starting and terminal points and their specific alignments. Thirdly, even Britain never put forward the proposition that there was no need to formally define the Sino-Indian boundary. This is borne out by the following facts: In 1899 Britain proposed to define with China the boundary between Kashmir (including Ladakh) and Sinkiang. Between 1921 and 1927, it entered into talks with China for the delimitation of the boundary between Ladakh and Tibet, talks which were not merely for the purpose of settling the ownership of a few pasture grounds, as alleged by the Indian Government. In 1914 it drew surreptitiously and unlawfully, with the Tibet local authorities, a so-called McMahon Line in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary. If there had been no need at all to formally delimit the Sino-Indian boundary, as claimed by the Indian Government, why had Britain in the past asked again and again to delimit with China the various sections of the boundary between China and India? It can thus be seen that the assertion that there is no need to formally define the Sino-Indian boundary is untenable.

(3) Since the boundary between two neighbouring countries, according to internationally accepted principles, has to be jointly defined by the two sides, any unilateral announcement by either side of its boundary line or change in the delineation of the boundary on maps in any manner obviously has no legal validity and is not binding on the neighbouring country concerned. Naturally, violation of the traditional customary line and expansion of extent of occupation by unilateral action all the more cannot constitute a legal basis for acquiring territory. The Chinese Government has always persisted in this stand on the Sino-Indian boundary question. The following may be recalled: Firstly, no Chinese Government has ever recognized Britain's territorial claims on the Tibet and Sinkiang regions of China; secondly, at the Simla Conference and afterwards, the Chinese Government explicitly declared its non-recognition of any treaty or similar document that might then or thereafter be signed between Britain and the Tibet local authorities; thirdly, the Chinese Government and the Tibet local authorities repeatedly lodged protests and made representations against Britain's past unlawful acts of violating the Sino-Indian traditional customary line and seizing Chinese territory; fourthly, since the founding of the People's Republic of China, the Chinese Government has also clearly stated to the Indian Government that there exists between China and India the question of undelimited boundary and that China has always taken the stand of non-recognition of the so-called McMahon Line. These facts were set forth in detail in the Chinese Government's note of December 26, 1959. The Indian Government, however, repeatedly asserts that the Chinese Government has never raised any objection to the unilateral claims regarding the Sino-Indian boundary left over by Britain, that the Chinese Government has never protested against foreign encroachment on its territory, and that it was not until September 1959 that the Chinese Government suddenly changed its stand on the Sino-Indian boundary question, and so forth. This is both surprising and incomprehensible to the Chinese Government.

(4) The Indian Government further contends that since neither side asked for a discussion of the boundary question in the 1954 Sino-Indian negotiations, it proves that no boundary question remained between them. This contention does not hold good, either. It is both illogical and inconceivable to argue that an outstanding issue will automatically cease to exist merely because it is not mentioned during certain negotiations. Moreover, the Chinese Government, from the very beginning of the negotiations, repeatedly made it clear that those negotiations were to settle those outstanding questions between the two countries that were ripe for settlement, and the Indian representative agreed to this. It can thus be seen that the 1954 negotiations did not solve, nor tried to solve, all the outstanding issues between the two countries. The assertion that, with the boundary question unsettled, normal relations between India and China's Tibet region could not have been established on a new basis is also untenable. By the establishment of normal relations between India and the Tibet region of China on a new basis is meant, chiefly that, following the liberation of China and the independence of India and the establishment of diplomatic relations between them, the state of affairs with India holding privileges in Tibet left over by Britain must be changed, and that Sino-Indian relations in China's Tibet region must be regulated in accordance with the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence. As for the question of undelimited boundary between the two countries, so long as both sides are willing to maintain the status quo of the border pending a settlement, it need not prevent the establishment of normal relations between them. There have been quite a number of cases like this in international relations.

(5) It can be seen from what has been said in the above that no boundary treaty or agreement has ever been concluded between China and India to formally delimit the boundary between the two countries. The Chinese Government is fully justified in maintaining that the two governments should conduct over-all negotiations and reach agreement on the boundary question. It is obviously incorrect to describe the Chinese Government's proposition as asking to reach a "new" boundary agreement to replace "old" ones, or to determine "afresh" the boundary between the two countries.

II. Individual Questions Concerning the Various Sectors of the Boundary

The Western Sector of the Boundary

(1) Facts about ownership and the exercise of jurisdiction. The Indian Government disagrees to the conclusion that the relevant area in the western sector of the boundary has always belonged to China and not to India, but it fails to produce any weighty piece of evidence to the contrary. In particular, the Indian Government has so far failed to give any explanations for the extraordinary thing that the Indian Government, which claims to have exercised jurisdiction and been sending personnel to carry out regular patrol in this area, should have for a long time been totally unaware of the fact that since 1950 Chinese personnel and supplies have been busily travelling between Sinkiang and Tibet through this area, and a road has been built across it.

(2) Regarding maps. The Indian Government asserts that Chinese maps up to the twenties of the present century drew the boundary line in this sector more or less in consonance with that shown on current Indian maps, and that it is only since then that the delineation has been changed; it also asserts that Chinese maps of the 18th and 19th centuries showed clearly that Sinkiang never extended south of the Kuen Lun Mountains. These assertions are all groundless. The fact is that many Chinese maps and gazetteers published since the 18th century, particularly authoritative ones like the "To Cing Yi Tung Chih" of 1784 and the "Chia Ching Revised Edition of the Ta Ching Yi Tung Chih" of 1820, clearly show that the limits of Sinkiang extend to the mountains southwest of the source of the Karakash River, that is, the Karakoram Mountains. This is in the main consistent with the delineation of the boundary on current Chinese maps, and inconsistent with that on Indian maps. As for the "Postal Map of China" of 1917 referred to by the Indian Government, it was compiled arbitrarily by French and British imperialist elements, who then controlled China's postal service, without the consent of the Chinese authorities. The Indian people who, like the Chinese people, were subjected for a long time to colonial aggression should find it easy to understand that that map did not represent the view of the Chinese people, but only that of the imperialist elements.

The Indian Government asserts that the maps and records of the British surveyors and some of the travellers who visited this area in the 19th century are in consonance with the maps currently published in India. This is also at variance with the facts. As a matter of fact, the maps and records of these persons showed great inconsistency and confusion. This precisely bears out the historical fact that for a hundred years and more Britain kept surreptitiously altering the delineation of the boundary to encroach upon Sinkiang and Tibet. Nevertheless, some of these persons still presented more or less accurately the actual state of the boundary. As the Chinese Government has pointed out, John Walker as well as G. W. Hayward and Robert Shaw mentioned in Prime Minister Nehru's letter understood the boundary in a way approximating the traditional delineation on Chinese maps. Even the Indian Government is unable to deny this. Yet it repudiates their authority and asserts that only the reports of W. H. Johnson and the Second Yarkand Mission are authoritative. But this is also untenable. Take the case of Johnson as an example. There were even obvious mistakes in the topographical survey made by him, as pointed out in the book "Abode of Snow" written by K. Mason, Superintendent of the Survey of India, and published in 1955. Furthermore, without any ground, Johnson's map marked the Sino-Indian boundary line north of Shahidulla in Sinkiang, that is, about 150 kilometers deeper northward into Chinese territory than the line shown on current Indian maps, a delineation to which perhaps even the Indian Government would not agree.

The Middle Sector of the Boundary

The Indian Government has not advanced any new argument about the disputed places in this sector of the boundary. The Chinese Government would only make some additional remarks on the question of Puling-Sumdo. The Indian Government assert that Puling-Sumdo and Pulamsumda are two different places, but Puling-Sumdo and Poling refer to one and the same place. This does not accord with the fact. The fact is that Puling-Sumdo is the same place generally known in India as Pulamsumda. It is not hard to see that Pulamsumda is only a different pronunciation of Puling-Sumdo, whereas Poling is entirely another place and has never been called Puling-Sumdo at the same time. In the explanatory note attached to Prime Minister Nehru's letter of September 26, 1959, the Indian Government also explicitly admitted that Puling-Sumdo was none other than Pulamsumda under Indian control.

The Eastern Sector of the Boundary

(1) Historical facts about jurisdiction. The Indian Government indicates that it cannot accept the viewpoint that the entire area south of the so-called McMahon Line comprising the three component parts of Monyul, Loyul and Lower Tsayul always belonged to China and was until recently still under Chinese jurisdiction. The Indian Government tries hard to prove that the entire area always belonged to India. But the reasons newly advanced by the Indian Government are all untenable too.

(A) Firstly, in the Monyul area, the Tibet local authorities not only exercised ecclesiastical authority, which was also admitted by the Indian Government, but what is more important, they also exercised administrative authority there. The Chinese Government has already cited many facts in this connection which are adequate proof. In addition, one can point to the fact that the British geographer Kingdom Ward, who had engaged in exploration in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian border, in his article "The Assam Himalaya: Travels in Balipara” published in the Journal of the Royal Central Asia Society in 1938, while asserting groundlessly that the Monyul area including Tawang “was ceded to India” in 1913-14, could not but admit that not only had Monyul, and particularly Tawang, been “within the Tibetan administrative system” before then, but “the Tibetan administration carries on” even in 1938 when he arrived in Monyul. Secondly, the area of Lower Tsayul including Walong not only was inhabited by Tibetans, but was always under the jurisdiction of Tibet. British troops unlawfully invaded and occupied Walong in 1944, and it was only after the Tibet local government sent a representative of the Dzong pon of Sangacho Dzong to make representations that the British troops withdrew. As to the Loyul area which is situated between Monyul and Lower Tsayul, it is a well-established fact that the Tibet local government had established extensively administrative organs of various levels and collected taxes there.

(B) The Indian Government claims that far back in the period before the 8th century, the area south of the so-called McMahon Line was under the rule of the Varman, the Salastambha and the Pala dynasties and not under that of Tibet. But it fails to produce any factual basis. The allegation that the Ahom dynasty gained control over this area from the 13th century onwards is also not true. The rule of the Ahom dynasty extended only to the plains on the northern bank of the Brahmaputra River, and never to the southern foot of the Himalayas. It can be seen clearly from the first chapter and the attached map of the book “Anglo-Assamese Relations” published in 1949 by the Department of Historical and Antiquarian Studies under the Government of Assam of India that the Himalayas and the areas at their foot inhabited by the Akas, Duils, Abors and Mishmis were to the north of the bounds of Assam and not within them. As for the agreements concluded since the 19th century by Britain with certain tribes living in these areas, which were repeatedly referred to by the Indian Government, it is not difficult to see from their provisions that they were merely agreements on mutual non-aggression or the acceptance of British economic aid, and cannot be regarded as proof that these tribes were British or Indian subjects.

(2) Whether the so-called McMahon Line is legal. The Indian Government no longer stresses the assertion that the Simla Convention was binding on the Chinese Central Government. This is because the fact that the Chinese Central Government did not sign the Convention in the first place, and much less ratified it, can in no way be denied (although the Chinese representative Ivan Chen initialled the draft Convention, he stated that it was not a formal signature and that formal signing would have to be approved of by the Chinese Government, and the Chinese Government immediately declared the initialling to be invalid). The Indian Government, however, emphatically contends: (A) that the Simla Conference did discuss the so-called McMahon Line; and (B) that the Tibet local government had the right to conclude treaties on its own. The Chinese Government would like to further clarify these two questions.
(A) Article 9 of the Simla Convention did not touch on the Sino-Indian boundary, nor was the Sino-Indian boundary marked on the map attached to the Convention. This is all the more understandable when seen in relation to the following facts. Firstly, the Indian Government has all along been unable to point to any particular date of the Simla Conference or any particular page of proceedings of the conference when and where the question of the Sino-Indian boundary, and in particular that of the so-called McMahon Line, was discussed. It is obviously inconceivable that ownership of territory involving such a vast area could have been determined in a treaty and its attached map without any previous discussions. Secondly, the boundary line between China and India was not marked on the map attached to the Simla Convention. All the documents of the conference contained nothing in writing which could be used as a basis for interpreting a particular section of the red line shown on the map (which actually shows the boundary between Tibet and the rest of China) as a section of the Sino-Indian boundary.

(B) It is absolutely indisputable that the Tibet local authorities had no right to enter into talks and conclude treaties, on its own, with foreign countries. Tibet is part of Chinese territory. China has full sovereignty over Tibet. Without the authorization and consent of the Chinese Central Government, the Tibet local authorities had no right to hold talks and conclude treaties with foreign countries; even if these were done, they were illegal and null and void. Even the British Government of the past dared not ignore this. A case in point is the British-Tibetan Convention of 1904 referred to by the Indian Government, which was imposed on the Tibet local authorities by Britain as the result of war. It may be recalled that, after compelling Tibet to sign this Convention, Britain still asked time and again the Chinese Government to sign and approve it. The question became a subject of repeated negotiations, and it was not until 1906 that it came to a close when another Convention was concluded between China and Britain and the above-mentioned British-Tibetan Convention was annexed to it. As for the secret letters regarding the so-called McMahon Line exchanged between the British representative and the representative of the Tibet local authorities at the time of the 1914 Simla Conference, they were exchanged behind the back of the Chinese Central Government and kept secret for a long time. Moreover, during the Simla Conference, the Chinese Government already made a general statement on its non-recognition of any treaty or similar document that might be signed between Britain and the Tibet local authorities. Those letters exchanged, therefore, are all the more illegal and null and void.

The Chinese Government hopes that the foregoing statement will help further clarify the following facts concerning the boundary, that is, the entire Sino-Indian boundary has never been formally delimited, and the areas now disputed by the two sides have always belonged to China, not to India, with a considerable part of them remaining up to now under the effective control of the Chinese Government. Nevertheless, the Chinese Government would like to reiterate that it has always hoped to achieve a reasonable settlement of the boundary question through friendly consultations with the Indian Government, so that there will be no more dispute between the two sides on the boundary question. Some people seem to think that differences between China and India are almost impossible to solve. The Chinese Government disagrees to this view. The Chinese Government feels that, no matter how great the present difference between China and India on this particular question, it is after all an issue of limited and temporary nature compared with the fundamental need of the two peoples to maintain friendly co-operation for thousands and tens of thousands of years to come. Provided the two sides value the fundamental interests of friendship between the two countries and world peace, display good faith, adhere to friendly consultations and the Five Principles, and adopt an attitude of mutual understanding and mutual accommodation, it is certainly possible to overcome all difficulties and bring about a settlement of the boundary question satisfactory to both sides. Although the Chinese Government has repeatedly set forth the facts about the boundary and its own stand, yet it has never set any pre-condition for the discussions between the two sides. The Chinese Government is willing, in the discussions, to explore together with Indian Government various avenues to a resolution of the differences with a conciliatory and reasonable attitude, and to try its best to promote the success of the discussions.

The Chinese Government has always advocated that, pending the settlement of the boundary question, both sides should maintain the present state of the border and preserve tranquillity along it, and see to it that this temporarily unsettled question do not affect the consolidation and development of friendly relations between the two countries. The Chinese Government has always been extremely careful on the Sino-Indian boundary question, and has never taken any step which might lead to clashes or tension on the border. For China the occurrence some time last year of tension and unfortunate incidents on the border of the two countries was totally unexpected, and China was utterly unprepared for it. After that, the Chinese Government promptly took measures and put forward proposals designed to ensure the tranquillity of the border and prevent the use of force or the occurrence of clashes. In its note of February 12, 1960, the Indian Government likewise expressed the hope that the two Governments agree on an arrangement without delay to eliminate the risk of border clashes and facilitate a friendly settlement of the disputes. This is worthy of welcome. The Chinese Government hopes that the proposals put forward by Premier Chou En-lai in his letter of December 17, 1959 will be accepted by the Indian Government as the basis for such an agreement, because the above-mentioned proposals were worked out on the basis of full consideration of the previous proposals of the two sides. The Chinese Government further hopes that both sides will not stop at this step, but will jointly make further efforts to arrange for the overall settlement of the boundary question so that the peoples of the two countries will no longer be troubled and worried about the boundary question.
Thanks to the efforts of the Chinese and Indian Governments and peoples, the once strained relations between China and India have improved. This is reassuring and encouraging. Now, the eyes of the whole world are turning towards the forthcoming meeting of the Premiers of our two countries. The Chinese people, the Indian people as well as other people of the world who love peace and are concerned for Sino-Indian friendship all cherish fervent hopes for this meeting of historic significance. Indeed, the importance of this meeting and the weight of responsibility on the Governments of the two countries can in no way be overestimated. The Chinese Government hopes that both the Chinese and the Indian sides will be fully aware of this, and will do their utmost so as not to disappoint the hopes of our two peoples and of all those who are concerned for friendship between our two countries. Of course, the Chinese Government has by no means overlooked the fact that there remain difficulties on the way ahead, and that there are still some people in the world who, harbouring ulterior motives, are trying by all means to split and undermine the relations of our two countries and to prevent the success of the talks. The Chinese Government, however, firmly believes that so long as the two Governments display good faith towards each other and endeavour to create conditions, they will certainly be able to bring about a speedy settlement of the boundary issue between the two countries, and the great friendship between the two countries not only will not be shaken, but will be further consolidated and developed.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Text of message sent by the leaders of the Chinese and the Indian official teams to the Prime Ministers of China and India, 24 September 1960.

The teams of officials of the Chinese and the Indian Governments have been meeting since June in accordance with the decision of the Prime Ministers of China and India as contained in the Joint Communique issued in Delhi at the conclusion of their meeting on April 25 this year. The teams met at first in Peking for six weeks, and have been meeting in Delhi for the last five weeks. Considering the size and scope of the assignment given to them, the two teams in mutual co-operation have covered a very substantial amount of ground towards the completion of the assignment.

2. The Joint Communique stated that the two teams should submit their report to the two Prime Ministers by the end of September. Despite our most determined efforts, we feel it may not be possible to complete the assignment in the prescribed time-limit. We hope, however, to finish or nearly finish the substantive work by the end of September.

3. In the circumstances, we, the leaders of the two teams, request that the two Prime Ministers may be pleased to extend the prescribed time-limit to enable the teams to complete the work and submit their report in the shortest possible time after the end of September. We would urge that in case the substantive work is not finished, we may be authorised to continue to meet in Delhi for a short while until we have done so; thereafter the teams may adjourn and re-assemble after a break to complete their work and finalise the report for submission to the two Prime Ministers.

4. The exact date and the venue of the subsequent meeting may be decided by the two Governments in consultation with each other.
I have the honour to refer to the joint message addressed to the Prime Ministers of India and China by the leaders of the teams of officials on 24th September, 1960.

I have been directed by my Prime Minister to inform Your Excellency that he agrees to the extension of the time-limit sought by the leaders of the two teams. The Government of India will of course be glad to have the Chinese team stay on in Delhi for the period necessary to complete the substantive work. The teams should reassemble as soon as possible and the Government of India would suggest that the teams should aim at the finalisation of their report by the first week of November. As regards venue of the third session the Government of India would suggest that it should be held in a third capital to be decided in consultation between our two governments through diplomatic channels and with the concurrence of the third Government concerned.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China and, referring to the joint message dated September 24, 1960, to the Prime Ministers of the two countries from the leaders of the official teams of China and India and the letter of His Excellency the Ambassador of India to Premier Chou En-lai on September 26, 1960, has the honour to state as follows:

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs is instructed by Premier Chou En-lai to inform the Embassy and ask the Embassy to convey to His Excellency Prime Minister Nehru that holding the same view as His Excellency Prime Minister Nehru, Premier Chou En-lai also consents to the request of the leaders of the official teams of the two countries to extend the time-limit of their meetings.

The Indian Government has agreed that the officials continue their meetings in Delhi to complete the substantive work and proposed that the official teams of the two countries should try to finalize in the first week of November their report to be submitted to the Governments of the two countries. The Chinese Government is pleased to concur with this. As to the site of the third session, the Chinese Government, in accordance with the spirit of the Joint Communique issued by the two Prime Ministers in Delhi on April 25, 1960, would like to invite and welcome the team of Indian officials to come to Peking for the session. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will kindly agree to this proposal. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs will be most grateful for an early reply.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to state that further instances of a large number of aircraft coming from the Tibet region of China and flying over Indian territory during the last three months have come to the notice of the Government of India. A statement giving the places and time of such violations is appended.

The Ministry of External Affairs have had occasion to draw the attention of the Chinese Embassy before to Chinese aircraft violating Indian air space and to request that strict instructions be issued to Chinese aircraft to respect Indian territory. The Government of India regret that intrusions by Chinese aircraft into the air space over Indian territory are still continuing. They protest against these repeated violations and request that immediate steps be taken to ensure that further violation of India's air space is stopped.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Statement showing details of recent air violations of our air space

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Sl. No</th>
<th>Date and time of flights</th>
<th>Area</th>
<th>Approximate Longitude &amp; Latitude</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>6-12-1959 1730</td>
<td>UKHIMATH (Uttar Pradesh State)</td>
<td>30°30' N 79°10' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>8-12-1959 0850</td>
<td>Ziro (Subansiri Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27°35' N 93°50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>Do. 1730</td>
<td>Ukhimath (Uttar Pradesh State)</td>
<td>30°30' N 79°10' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>9-12-1959 1300</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>&quot;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>10-12-1959 0930</td>
<td>Huri (Subansiri Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28°15' N 93°15' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>11-12-1959 1015 1345</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>&quot;</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>6-2-1960 2000</td>
<td>Walong (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28°10' N 97°00' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>Do. 2010</td>
<td>Anini (Do.)</td>
<td>28°45' N 96°00' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>Do. 2130</td>
<td>Tuting (Siang Frontier Division)</td>
<td>29°00' N 94°50' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>Do. 2130</td>
<td>Along (Do.)</td>
<td>28°15' N 94°45' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11</td>
<td>Do. 2140</td>
<td>Yinkiong (Do.)</td>
<td>28°30' N 95°00' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12</td>
<td>Do. 2150</td>
<td>Changlang Tirap Frontier Division</td>
<td>27°00' N 95°45' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13</td>
<td>8-2-1960 1820</td>
<td>Mipi Area (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28°45' N 95°45' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14</td>
<td>Do. 1945</td>
<td>Hayuliang (Do.)</td>
<td>28°00' N 96°30' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15</td>
<td>Do. 2130</td>
<td>Nampong (Tirap Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27°15' N 96°15' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16</td>
<td>Do. 2140</td>
<td>Yinkiong (Siang Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28°30' N 95°00' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17</td>
<td>Do. 2150</td>
<td>Bardumisa (Tirap Frontier Division)</td>
<td>Miao, Jairampur, Nampong</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18</td>
<td>Do. 2200</td>
<td>Chukam Area (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27°45' N 96°00' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19</td>
<td>9-2-1960</td>
<td>Sunpura (Do.)</td>
<td>27°45' N 96°00' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20</td>
<td>10-2-1960 2000 2300</td>
<td>Bardumisa (Tirap Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27°30' N 96°00' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21</td>
<td>Do. 2000</td>
<td>Changlang (Do.)</td>
<td>27°00' N 95°45' E</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

21
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Sl. No.</th>
<th>Date and time of flights</th>
<th>Area</th>
<th>Approximate Longitude &amp; Latitude</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>22</td>
<td>10-2-1960</td>
<td>Hunli Area (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28.15 N 96.00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Nampong (Tirap Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27.15 N 96.15 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Chukum (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27.45 N 96.00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Anini Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28.45 N 96.00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Namsai (Do.)</td>
<td>27.30 N 96.00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>27</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Changlang (Tirap Frontier Division)</td>
<td>7.00 N 95.45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>28</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Passighat (Siang Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28.00 N 94.25 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Celling (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28.15 N 96.45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30</td>
<td>11-2-1960</td>
<td>Damroh (Siang Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28.30 N 95.15 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31</td>
<td>12-2-1960</td>
<td>Namsai (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27.30 N 96.00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Hayuliang (Do.)</td>
<td>28.00 N 96.30 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>(Siang Frontier Division)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Anini (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28.45 N 96.00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Roing (Do.)</td>
<td>28.05 N 95.45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>36</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Changlang (Tirap Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27.00 N 95.45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>37</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Hampong (Do.)</td>
<td>27.15 N 96.15 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38</td>
<td>16-2-1960</td>
<td>Lungbatinga</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Metilliang (Lohit Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28.15 N 96.30 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Midnight Sunpura</td>
<td>27.45 N 96.00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>41</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Hayuliang (Do.)</td>
<td>28.00 N 96.30 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42</td>
<td>17-2-1960</td>
<td>Chukum (Do.)</td>
<td>27.45 N 96.00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>43</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>Along (Siang Frontier Division)</td>
<td>28.15 N 94.45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sl. No.</td>
<td>Date and time of flights</td>
<td>Area</td>
<td>Approximate Longitude &amp; Latitude</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------</td>
<td>--------------------------</td>
<td>------</td>
<td>----------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44</td>
<td>17-2-1960 0250</td>
<td>Changlang (Tirap Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27°00' N 95°45' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Nampong, Jairampur, Miao, Bardumisa</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>45</td>
<td>Do. 0205 0215</td>
<td>Kanumbari (Tirap Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27°00' N 95°30' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Khonsa, Lazu, Wakka</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>46</td>
<td>16-2-1960 2000</td>
<td>Wakka (Tirap Frontier Division)</td>
<td>26°45' N 95°30' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>47</td>
<td>17-2-1960 0315</td>
<td>Basar (Siang Frontier Division)</td>
<td>27°45' N 94°45' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>48</td>
<td>23-2-1960 0330</td>
<td>Gelling (Do.)</td>
<td>28°15' N 96°45' E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>49</td>
<td>9-3-1960 2240</td>
<td>Along (Do.)</td>
<td>28°15' N 94°45' E</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note delivered by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India on April 4, 1960 concerning the alleged flight of a large number of aircraft coming from the Tibet region of China over Indian territory, has the honour to reply as follows:

The Chinese Government has enjoined the authorities concerned to investigate into the matter on the basis of the data regarding time and place provided by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in the annex to its note. It is satisfied that no flight of Chinese aircraft over Indian territory ever occurred at all. Therefore, the Chinese Government cannot accept the protest of the Indian Government. The Chinese Government expresses its regret at the fact that the Indian Government rashly protested with the Chinese Government without ascertaining the facts. The Chinese Governments always adhere faithfully to the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence and definitely would not permit its aircraft to fly into the air space of other countries without the consent of the states concerned.

The Chinese Government wishes to point out at the same time that, since the end of 1959, the Chinese Government repeatedly received reports to the effect that unidentified foreign aircraft were discovered intruding into Chinese air space over the southwestern border area of China. The Chinese Government is clearly aware that there exist at present certain forces who are bent on splitting by various means the relationship between China and its southwestern neighbours. Particularly at a time when the Prime Ministers of China and India are trying to seek a peaceful solution to the Sino-Indian boundary question, it is most likely that these forces would try to attain their aims of disrupting the Sino-Indian relations by means of air intrusions into India or China. It is hoped that the Indian Government as well as the Chinese Government would maintain common vigilance against this.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 2 July 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and states as follows: According to the reports of the Chinese frontier guards, Indian aircraft have recently on many occasions intruded into China's air space above the southwestern part of Sinkiang and the Tibet region, circling and carrying out reconnoitering activities within Chinese territory, and there have also been cases of trespassing of the boundary by Indian military personnel. The main facts are as follows:

1. Something past 11·00 hours on May 30, 1960, two Indian military aircraft intruded into Chinese air space from the direction of southwest of the Kongka Pass; at 11·15 hours they intruded to the point 79° 06' E, 34° 20' N at the altitude of 2,000 metres, then flew northwestward to penetrate to the point 78° 56' E, 34° 23' N, from which they turned toward the southeast. At 11·20 hours these two aircraft left Chinese territory by turning toward the southwest at a point about four kilometres of the east side of the Kongka Pass. At 11·50 hours on the same day two Indian military aircraft again intruded into China's air space over the same area in the same direction and at the same altitude, and at 12·05 hours they made their return flight westward to Indian territory by the same route.

2. At 11·10 and 12·00 hours respectively on May 30, 1960, two Indian aircraft intruded southward into China's air space from the direction of the Kongka Pass up to the point 78° 54' E, 33° 57' N, and then turned westward to return to Indian territory.

3. At 11·00 hours on May 30, 1960, two Indian aircraft, flying from west to east, intruded into China's air space over the Lake Pangong area (78° 48' E, 33° 33' N) in the western part of China's Tibet region at the altitude of 1,000 metres, where they circled and carried out reconnaissance. It was not till 12·00 hours that they left Chinese territory by the same route of their intrusion. At 10·02 hours on May 31, an Indian aircraft intruded again into China's air space over the same area.

4. At 11·25 hours on May 31, 1960, four Indian military personnel carried out reconnoitering activities in the Chinese border area to the west of Spanggur in the western part of Tibet. One of them crossed into Chinese territory at 12·17 hours and penetrated to the point 78° 47' 20" E, 33° 33' 35" N where he stayed for four minutes before returning by the same route.

5. Indian military personnel on many occasions intruded into Chinese territory at the Nathu-la in the southern part of China's Tibet region. At 10·35 hours on May 21, 1960, nine Indian military personnel trespassed over the border and stayed in Chinese territory for more than forty minutes. At 13·01 hours on May 29, nine Indian military personnel again trespassed over the border and stayed in Chinese territory for over 20 minutes. At 11·30 hours on June 9, ten odd Indian military personnel trespassed over the border and stayed for three minutes in Chinese territory where they fired one shot and lit a fire. At 13·30 hours on June 9 eight Indian military personnel trespassed over the border and stayed for more than 40 minutes in Chinese territory where they lit two fires.

The Chinese Government is very much surprised at Indian aircraft's repeated intrusions into China's air space and Indian military personnel's trespassing over the border. The Chinese and Indian Premiers have not long ago stated explicitly in Delhi that during the period of further examination of factual material relevant to the Sino-Indian boundary by officials of the two countries every effort should be made by both parties to avoid friction and clashes in the border areas. The above-mentioned intrusions of Chinese air space by Indian aircraft and border-crossings by Indian military personnel not only violate the agreement between the two Premiers, but also contain a serious danger threatening the peace of the border areas. The Chinese Government cannot but take a serious view of these incidents, lodge a protest with the Indian Government, and demand that it immediately take necessary measures to prevent the recurrence of similar incidents.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 16 August 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and with reference to the Note dated July 2, 1960, from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China, has the honour to state as follows:

2. The specific details given in the Note regarding the alleged violations by Indian military personnel and Indian military aircraft on 21st, 28th, 30th and 31st May, 1960, as well as on 9th June, 1960, have been inquired into thoroughly by the Government of India. The result of the inquiries does not substantiate any of the allegations made by the Government of the People’s Republic of China.

3. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurance of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 22 August 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to bring to its notice instance of fresh violations of Indian air space by aircraft apparently coming from the Tibet region of China during the last few months. A statement giving the places and the time of such violations is appended.

2. The Government of India must once again, protest against repeated violation of Indian air space and request the Government of China to take immediate steps and issue strict instructions to stop recurrence of such incidents. The Government of India must point out that repetition of such incidents could easily result in grave consequences.

3. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurance of their highest consideration.
Statement showing details of Air violations of our Air Space

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Sl. No.</th>
<th>Date &amp; time of flight</th>
<th>Area</th>
<th>Approximate Longitude &amp; Latitude</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Hours</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>9-3-1960</td>
<td>2050</td>
<td>Bardumsa, Miao, Nampong and Jairampur</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2300</td>
<td>Sunpura</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2220</td>
<td>Manigong</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2045</td>
<td>Kibithoo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2240</td>
<td>Along</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>11-3-1960</td>
<td>2345</td>
<td>Bomdila</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2015</td>
<td>Walong</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2250</td>
<td>Amini</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2015</td>
<td>Kibithoo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>13-3-1960</td>
<td>0030</td>
<td>Chukam</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2300</td>
<td>Hayuliang</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12</td>
<td>14-3-1960</td>
<td>2218</td>
<td>Tezu</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2230</td>
<td>Hayuliang</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2215</td>
<td>Chukam</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2205</td>
<td>Anini</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16</td>
<td>15-3-1960</td>
<td>0110</td>
<td>Do.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17</td>
<td>Do. 0110-0115</td>
<td>Bardumsa, Miao, Jairampur &amp; Nampong</td>
<td>27.30 N 96.15 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18</td>
<td>16-3-1960</td>
<td>2000</td>
<td>Towang</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2130</td>
<td>Tezu</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20</td>
<td>Do.</td>
<td>2200</td>
<td>Sunpura</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21</td>
<td>17-3-1960</td>
<td>2200</td>
<td>Do.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>22</td>
<td>Do. 2105—2235</td>
<td>Tezu</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23</td>
<td>Do. 2000</td>
<td>Nampong</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24</td>
<td>Do. 2210</td>
<td>Passighat</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>Do. 2225</td>
<td>Manigong</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26</td>
<td>Do. 2230</td>
<td>Along</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sl. No.</td>
<td>Date &amp; time of flight</td>
<td>Area</td>
<td>Approximate Longitude &amp; Latitude</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------</td>
<td>-----------------------</td>
<td>---------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>27</td>
<td>12-4-1960 2018</td>
<td>Imphal</td>
<td>24:40 N 93:30 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>28</td>
<td>Do. 2130</td>
<td>Amini</td>
<td>28:45 N 96:00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29</td>
<td>Do. 2230</td>
<td>Yongkiong</td>
<td>28:30 N 95:00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30</td>
<td>Do. 2100</td>
<td>Kanulbari</td>
<td>27:00 N 95:30 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31</td>
<td>12-4-1960 2120</td>
<td>Changbar</td>
<td>27:00 N 95:45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32</td>
<td>2110</td>
<td>Hayulang</td>
<td>28:00 N 96:30 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33</td>
<td>2000</td>
<td>Zunhegoto</td>
<td>.. ..</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34</td>
<td>Do. 0300</td>
<td>Kepangto</td>
<td>28:00 N 96:40 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35</td>
<td>Do. 2330</td>
<td>Jairampur</td>
<td>27:15 N 96:15 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>36</td>
<td>13-4-1960 2359</td>
<td>Kong</td>
<td>28:15 N 94:45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>37</td>
<td>Do. 2110</td>
<td>Anini</td>
<td>28:45 N 95:30 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38</td>
<td>Do. 0130</td>
<td>Karko</td>
<td>.. ..</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39</td>
<td>Do. Gelling</td>
<td>..</td>
<td>28:15 N 96:45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40</td>
<td>Do. 2100</td>
<td>Hayulang</td>
<td>28:00 N 96:30 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>41</td>
<td>Do. 2100</td>
<td>Sunpura</td>
<td>27:45 N 96:00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42</td>
<td>Do. 1150-1155</td>
<td>Changliang</td>
<td>27:00 N 95:45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>43</td>
<td>Do. 2015-2020</td>
<td>Bardumsa</td>
<td>27:30 N 96:00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44</td>
<td>9-3-1960 2359</td>
<td>Paum</td>
<td>28:30 N 94:25 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>45</td>
<td>14-3-1960 2244-2245</td>
<td>Kepangla</td>
<td>28:00 N 96:42 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>46</td>
<td>16-3-1960 2155</td>
<td>Gelling</td>
<td>28:15 N 96:45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>47</td>
<td>16-3-1960 2125</td>
<td>Hunli</td>
<td>28:15 N 96:00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>48</td>
<td>17-3-1960 0225</td>
<td>Manigong</td>
<td>28:45 N 94:00 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>49</td>
<td>23-3-1960 0900</td>
<td>Bomdila</td>
<td>27:00 N 94:45 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>50</td>
<td>31-5-1960 1800-1853</td>
<td>Spanggur</td>
<td>33:25 N 78:40 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>51</td>
<td>6-6-1960 1458</td>
<td>Fotula Pass</td>
<td>34:10 N 76:35 E</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>52</td>
<td>15-6-1960 1115-11220</td>
<td>Chilmiri</td>
<td>30:35 N 77:50 E</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows:

1. On July 2, 1960, the Chinese Government addressed a note to the Indian Government on the repeated intrusions of China’s air space and territory by Indian aircraft and armed personnel in May and June. However, the Indian Government denied all these facts in its reply note of August 16, 1960. The Chinese Government cannot but express its regret at this. The Chinese Government has now received further reports that the following incidents of the intrusions of China’s air space and territory by Indian aircraft and personnel also happened in June:

(1) At 10.45 hours on June 9, 1960 an Indian aircraft from the southeast entered China’s air space northeast of Longju, and circled once before it flew southward.

(2) At 8.30 hours on June 23, 1960 an Indian aircraft entered China’s air space from the direction of the Nathu-la Pass and flew over Assam Village in China before it headed for Bhutan.

(3) Some time past 11.00 hours on June 29, 1960 six Indian personnel entered Chinese territory through the Nathu-la Pass and stayed there for about fifty minutes before leaving.

2. The following incidents further took place after the delivery of the above-mentioned note by the Chinese Government on July 2:

(1) On July 22, 1960 eight armed Indian personnel intruded into Kechilang pasture (west of Khinzemane) and kidnapped a Chinese inhabitant of the Le Village, Tsona Jong, named Kiayang-geltsen, who is still missing.

(2) Some time past 16.00 hours on July 28, 1960 an Indian aircraft entered China’s air space over the Lake Pangong area in the western part of China’s Tibet region, then it turned northwestward and skirted the southern bank of Lake Spanggur before leaving China.

(3) Some time past 10.30 hours on July 29, 1960 an Indian aircraft, flying from south to north, entered China’s air space over the southern bank of Lake Spanggur in the western part of China’s Tibet region, and left Chinese territory in the northwest direction.

(4) Some time past 11.00 hours on August 2, 1960 an Indian aircraft, flying from south to north, entered China’s air space over the southern bank of Lake Spanggur in the western part of China’s Tibet region, and left Chinese territory in the northwest direction. At 12.00 hours on August 3, an Indian aircraft again encroached on China's air space over the same area in the same direction.

3. The Chinese Government has received a report from the local authorities to the effect that on June 10, 1960 about seventeen Indian official personnel carrying wireless sets entered into China's Wu-je and forcibly occupied the lodging of Chinese mountain-keepers.

It must be pointed out that the entry of Indian official personnel into Wu-je is another attempt to change the status quo of this area belonging to China and being under Chinese jurisdiction, and constitutes an encroachment on China's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

4. As pointed out in the Chinese Government's note of July 2, the recent repeated trespasses of Indian aircraft and armed personnel not only constitute violations of the agreement between the Chinese and Indian Prime Ministers that every effort should be made by both parties to avoid friction and clashes in the border areas, but contain a serious danger threatening peace in the border areas. What is particularly regrettable is the occurrence of the incidents in which Indian official personnel openly entered into Chinese territory Wu-je and kidnapped a Chinese citizen from Kechilang pasture. For these incidents, the Chinese Government once again protests against the Indian Government, urgently demands that it promptly take effective measures to prevent the occurrence of intrusions of Chinese territory and air space, and in particular, order the Indian official personnel at once to withdraw from Wu-je and release Chinese inhabitant Kiayang-geltsen who was carried away from Kechilang pasture.

5. The Chinese Government has read the note which the Indian Ministry of External Affairs delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India on July 30, in which the Indian Ministry of External Affairs stated that on June 3, 1960, more than 25 armed Chinese soldiers crossed over the so-called McMahon Line. The Chinese Government has now satisfied itself after detailed investigation that, at the place and on the date furnished by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in its note, no armed Chinese personnel crossed over the so-called McMahon Line, but nine local working personnel of Hsiao of Tsona Jong in the eastern part of China's Tibet region, who went out to tell bamboos, lost their way owing to low clouds and thick fog and stepped over the so-called McMahon Line by mistake. As soon as they perceived it, they turned back. As the Indian Government is aware, although the Chinese Government has never recognized the so-called McMahon Line, yet in order to maintain the status quo of the boundary, ensure the tranquillity of the border and uphold the friendly relations between the two countries, Chinese military and administrative personnel are under the order not to overstep this line and this order has all along been scrupulously observed. The above-said inadvertent trespass of the so-called McMahon Line by local working personnel of Hsiao was solely due to loss of way in bad weather, and the Chinese Government has instructed the local authorities concerned to take caution in the future. The Chinese Government is surprised to note that, before the result of investigation into the facts is known and before a reply is made by the Chinese Government, the Indian Government has recently attacked the Chinese Government at the session of the Indian Parliament. This is an unfriendly act, and the Chinese Government expresses deep regret at it.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking to the Embassy of India in China, 16 September 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the note that the Indian Ministry of External Affairs delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India on August 22, 1960, has the honour to reply as follows:

The statement attached to the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs lists in all 52 alleged "instances of fresh violations of Indian air space by aircraft coming from the Tibet region of China". The result of investigations undertaken by the Chinese Government on the basis of the places and times of these incidents provided in the Indian note shows that there has not occurred at all any entry of Chinese aircraft into the Indian air space. Moreover, on the dates mentioned in the Indian note, no Chinese aircraft was in flight over those areas in China adjacent to the places listed in the note. Therefore, the Chinese Government cannot accept at all the protest of the Indian Government.

The Chinese Government notes that of the 52 cases of alleged violations of Indian air space by Chinese aircraft listed in the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, with the exception of the three dates of May 31, June 6 and June 15 which were after Premier Chou En-lai's visit to India, the other dates mentioned were all before Premier Chou En-lai's visit to India in April this year. It should be pointed out that during the period of the talks between the Prime Ministers of the two countries in Delhi, Premier Chou En-lai told His Excellency Prime Minister Nehru on April 25 that regarding the flights of aircraft discovered in the Sino-Indian border area as informed by the Indian Government to the Chinese Government, it had been found through investigation by the Chinese Government that these were aircraft of the United States. They took off from Bangkok, passed over Burma or China, and crossed the Sino-Indian border to penetrate deep into China's interior to parachute Chinese secret agents, weapons, supplies and wireless seats, and then flew back to Bangkok, again passing over the Sino-Indian border. Premier Chou En-lai assured His Excellency Prime Minister Nehru at the time that the Chinese Government would never allow its own aircraft to fly over the border and said that the Chinese Government had already sent a note to the Burmese Government, stating that should Burma discover any unidentified aircraft in its air space, it was fully entitled to take any counter-measure, either forcing them to land or shooting them down. Should China discover such aircraft in its air space, it would do likewise. Premier Chou En-lai then expressed his belief that India would do the same. Thereafter, in its Note of April 26 to the Indian Embassy in China, the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs again emphatically pointed out: "The Chinese Government is clearly aware that there exist at present certain..." forces who are bent on splitting by various means the relationship between China and its southwestern neighbours. Particularly at a time when the Prime Ministers of China and India are trying to seek a peaceful solution to the Sino-Indian boundary question, it is most likely that these forces would try to attain their aims of disrupting the Sino-Indian relations by means of air intrusions into India or China. It is hoped that the Indian Government as well as the Chinese Government would maintain common vigilance against this". The Chinese Government is extremely surprised that after such clear explanations from Premier Chou En-lai and the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs to His Excellency Prime Minister Nehru and the Indian Government, the Indian Government should continue to disregard the reality and once again make groundless charges and protest against the Chinese Government. This cannot but be considered as a very unfriendly act towards the People's Republic of China. The Chinese Government expresses deep regret at it. In order to be on guard against deliberate attempts by outside forces to wreck Sino-Indian relations, the Chinese Government proposes once again that the two sides maintain vigilance with regard to the flights by unidentified aircraft over the border between the two countries and notify each other in time, so that each side may take whatever measures deemed necessary.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances if its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 24 October 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India and have the honour to refer to the Note, dated August 27, 1960, handed over to Shri K. M. Kannampilly, Counsellor, Embassy of India, Peking, by Mr. Shen Ping, Deputy Director, First Asian Division of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China.

2. The Government of India have further examined the specific details contained in the note of the Chinese Government and are fully satisfied that none of the allegations of intrusion into Chinese ground or air-space has any substance. At the times mentioned in the Chinese note no Indian aircraft was flying anywhere in the neighbourhood of the specified areas either in the Eastern or Western Sectors, or along Sikkim’s border with the Tibet region.

3. The Government of India repudiate the suggestion that a Chinese national was kidnapped by an Indian patrol party from Chinese territory. The Chinese Government must be aware that during the last 18 months, over twenty thousand persons from the Tibet region of China have sought refuge into Indian territory. The border posts concerned have invariably taken prompt action to disarm such persons if they carried arms and to move them away from the frontier areas thereby to ensure that there was no abuse of the right of asylum permitted to them. The particular Chinese national referred to in the Chinese Government’s note has repeatedly affirmed in course of interrogation that he had come to seek refuge in India. In any case, no Indian personnel had crossed into Chinese territory either on the date mentioned or on any other date, and there could no question of their kidnapping a Chinese national and bringing him into India.

4. The Government of India cannot but express their surprise at the assertion in the Chinese Government’s note that Indian official personnel had entered “China’s Wuje and forcibly occupied the lodging of Chinese mountaineers”. It is hardly necessary to recall that the Government of India have throughout maintained that Barahoti, which the Chinese Government call Wuje, lies south of the traditional boundary and is clearly within Indian territory. Many notes have been exchanged between the two Governments on the subject. In 1958 discussions lasting for nearly two months were held between the Chinese and Indian official teams, and in course of these discussions the Government of India furnished clear and incontrovertible proofs that Barahoti was a part of the Uttar Pradesh State and has always been a part of India. However, pending the resolution of this dispute, it was agreed by the representatives of both Governments at the conference that both sides should continue to refrain from sending any armed personnel to the Barahoti area.
The Indian representatives put forward a proposal that even civil administrative personnel of the two sides should not be deputed to the areas, but the Chinese Government did not accept such a suggestion. In the absence of the Chinese Government's concurrence to this proposal the Indian side pointed out that the Government of India would be free to exercise their customary revenue and administrative jurisdiction over the area. The official personnel who were deputed to the area in 1958, 1959 and this year have been sent entirely in accordance with the traditional practice and within the confines of the understanding reached with the Chinese Government.

5. It may be further recalled that in a discussion which took place on the 24th April, 1958, between Shri K. M. Kannampilly, Counsellor of the Embassy of India, Peking, and Mr. Ho Ying, Deputy Director of the First Asian Department of the Chinese Foreign Office, Mr. Ho Ying recalled that the agreement not to send patrol parties to this area has been in force for the last several years and invited the Indian side to confirm that no such personnel would be sent in the future. As assurance was given by Shri Kannampilly that if the Chinese Government agreed not to send any armed personnel to the disputed area, the Indian side would continue to reciprocate and abide by this understanding. In course of the same conversation the Deputy Director informed Shri Kannampilly, in reply to an enquiry from him, that the suggested neutralisation did not affect the right to send officials. It is, therefore, a matter of extreme surprise that the Chinese Government should have ignored all these facts and alleged forcible occupation of the Barahoti area by Indian personnel. The Government of India could equally level the counter charge that the local administrative personnel of the Tibet region, who visited the area, unlawfully, intruded into Indian territory.

6. The Government of India would now deal with the Chinese Government's reply to their note of the 30th July, 1960. It has been stated by the Chinese Government that twenty-five armed Chinese soldiers had not entered India across the so-called McMahon Line, but that only nine local working personnel of Tsone Dzong who had lost their way because of inclement weather when out to fell bamboos had 'stepped across the so-called McMahon Line' by mistake. The Government of India cannot but state that this version of the incident is not in accordance with facts. The Government of India are satisfied after further enquiries that the intrusion was by no means an unintended one; that the number of personnel was twenty-five and not nine, and that the personnel carried arms which were slung from their shoulder. Taktsang is situated at a height of 12,000 to 15,000 feet and is about seven miles south of McMahon Line and there are no trees or bamboos at this height. Indeed the information of the Government of India is that the personnel, apart from carrying arms, were in uniform and there was nothing to indicate that they were out to cut bamboos.

7. Facts being as stated above, there is no truth in the Chinese Government's allegation that the Government of India attacked them in a session of the Indian Parliament; much less could there be any question of an unfriendly act on the part of the Indian Government. Intrusion by Chinese personnel several miles within Indian territory is very serious matter. It violates the understanding reached by the two Prime Ministers that during the pendency of the official level talks, no action, which is likely to lead to friction or clashes in the border areas, should be undertaken. Any such intrusion might have very unfortunate consequences. The Government of India, therefore, hope that strict instructions will be given so that no such violation of the Indian territory occurs in the future.

8. The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurance of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 24 October 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Note dated September 16, 1960, which was handed over to the Counsellor of Embassy of India, Peking, by Mr. Hu Chengfang, Deputy Director of the First Asian Division of the Chinese Foreign Office.

2. The Government of India note the statement in the Chinese Government's reply that the aircraft which violated the Indian air space did not originate from China and that the Chinese Government were in no way responsible for such violations. The Government of India could not ignore as many as 52 violations of their air-space, and since the planes were noticed to enter Indian territory from China they had to bring the details to the attention of the Chinese Government. More particularly it is difficult to believe that the planes which violated the Indian air-space in the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary were based any where other than on Chinese territory. The Government of India repudiate any suggestion that in sending their note of August 22, 1960, they committed an unfriendly act.

3. The Government of India must point out that even subsequent to the receipt of the Chinese Government's note of 16th September, a further instance of the violation of Indian air-space has been reported, and on this occasion by a helicopter. On 18th September, at about 1730 hours, a helicopter was reported flying over Thratsang La (7840 East Lat., 3505 North Long.). The helicopter flew into Indian territory from Western Tibet and was clearly of Chinese origin.

4. It has been reported that as recently as the 13th October two armed Chinese personnel on horses intruded up to points approximately 1½ miles east of Hot Springs in the Kongka Pass area in Ladakh. The Chinese personnel only withdrew when they were surprised by an Indian grass-cutter. The place which was being patrolled by the Chinese personnel is about two miles west of the point where the bodies of Indian personnel killed in the Kongka Pass incident were handed over to the Indian police personnel.

5. The instances mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, viz., intrusion into Indian air-space by a helicopter and into Indian territory by Chinese personnel, are in violation of the understanding reached between the two Prime Ministers that during the pendency of the official-level talks both Governments will avoid taking steps which may precipitate border clashes or friction. The Government of India urges that the subordinate authorities concerned be instructed to take scrupulous care that such violations of the ground and air-space of India do not recur. The Government of India need hardly state that they observe the utmost vigilance about the protection of their frontiers, whether on the ground or in the air, and are determined to take action against all intruders, whatever their origin.

6. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 8 April 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to their Note of the 23rd January have the honour to state that further investigation regarding the course taken by I.N.S. 'Magar' when leaving Hong Kong harbour on her return voyage have been made. After careful scrutiny and check of the log-books of the ship, Government of India are satisfied that in accordance with the instructions issued by them, I.N.S. 'Magar' took the course mentioned in the opening sentence of the second paragraph of the Chinese Government's note. The Government of India do not accept the allegation that the I.N.S. 'Magar' violated the Chinese territorial sea on 16th September.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 11 July 1960

The Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India has recently received a report from the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay that Mr. Lin Kuo-chang, functionary of the Consulate, was prevented at the gate of the Bombay Railway Station from coming out at 12.50 hours of June 2, 1960 by an Indian policeman who intended to search the Consulate’s car in which Mr. Lin was riding. This happened when Mr. Lin, who had entered the said station to check up the packing of some articles to be transported to the Chinese Embassy at 12.00 hours, was leaving the station. Mr. Lin told the policeman that the car belonged to the Chinese Consulate, but the latter insisted that it should be searched. Mr. Lin rejected the unreasonable demand, and went to see the police officer in the duty room at the station gate and made representation to him. The police officer remarked in a very unfriendly way that no matter whose car it was, it had to be searched, with no exception for the car of the Chinese Consulate-General, and that if Mr. Lin did not agree to the search, the car was to be left there. Although the car bore the Consular Corps plate and the car number and Mr. Lin made it clear to him again and again, yet the police officer insisted that it was difficult to prove that the car belonged to the Chinese Consulate-General, and it must be searched. The officer even refused Mr. Lin to contact the Chinese Consulate-General by the telephone in the room. It was not until some time later when a senior police officer came in, and following Mr. Lin’s representations, saw the Consular Corps plate and the car number, and contacted the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay by telephone that he consented to release the car. It was already 1.35 in the afternoon.

The Embassy would like to point out that, according to general practice, cars of the consulates are not subject to search. In the past, cars of the Chinese Consulate-General entering or leaving the Railway Station, have always been allowed to pass so long as it is informed that they belong to the Consular mission. Yet, this time, in spite of the fact that the identity of the car was well shown by the Consular Corps plate on it and that Mr. Lin made it clear time and again, the Indian police officer still persisted in searching the Chinese Consulate-General’s car, and did not allow Mr. Lin to inform the Chinese Consulate-General of the incident by telephone, thus resulting in a detention for as long as forty-five minutes. This was extraordinary, and can only be regarded as deliberate obstruction. The Embassy expresses deep regret at this, and requests that the Government of India take measures to ensure against recurrence of similar incident in the future.
The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, and, with reference to the Indian Government's refusal to permit Kao Liang, correspondent of China's Hsin Hua News Agency in New Delhi, to continue his stay in India and its request for the "withdrawal" of the New Delhi Branch Office of the Hsin Hua News Agency, expresses the following to the Indian Ministry of External Affairs:

The Chinese Embassy in India has learned that the Indian Government has informed Kao Liang, correspondent of China's Hsin Hua News Agency in New Delhi, that his period of stay in India will expire on August 2, 1960, that he is not permitted to continue to stay in India, and that the New Delhi Branch Office of the Hsin Hua News Agency is requested to "withdraw". In the conversations during the several interviews he had with Kao Liang, Mr. P. N. Menon, Director of External Publicity Division, Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India, attacked without any justification the dispatches of the Hsin Hua News Agency concerning India, slandering the dispatches of the Hsin Hua News Agency as "distorted, cooked up", "harmful to Sino-Indian friendship", "interfering in the internal affairs of India", etc. The Chinese Embassy expresses its regret at this measure taken by the Indian Government, which harms the friendly relations between China and India, ignores international practice and the principle of freedom of press, and discriminates against the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency.

Dispatches of the Hsin Hua News Agency are factual, objective and fair. This has won universal recognition throughout the world, as well as enjoyed great popularity and fame. The reports about India sent by the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency in New Delhi have always made according to facts, based on the true happenings in India and on Indian news agencies, newspapers and statements issued by Indian official quarters. Each and every item of the news and report sent by the correspondent concerning India is founded on facts and has its source. Even when Mr. Menon was accusing the reports of the Hsin Hua News Agency about India as "distorted, garbled and cooked up", he failed to give a single fact to support his allegation. Thus, it can only be regarded as an unfounded accusation against the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency.

It is always in the spirit of enhancing mutual understanding between the peoples of China and India and of promoting their friendly relations that the Hsin Hua News Agency has made its reports on India. In spite of the fact that many newspapers and news agencies of India (including those representing official circles) have for a long period of time been attacking and slandering China by using all sorts of venomous terms, the Hsin Hua News Agency has never adopted similar tactics in its news and reports about India. If the reports of the Hsin Hua News Agency are accused as being "harmful to Sino-Indian friendship" merely because their viewpoints and stand are different from those of the Indian Government, and under such a pretext the New Delhi Branch Office of the Hsin Hua News Agency is forced to "withdraw", then the Chinese Embassy cannot but point out with regret that it is precisely this unwarranted act on the part of the Indian Government that has done harm to the friendship between China and India.

It is the proper right of the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency in New Delhi to report on what has happened in India, as any correspondent of a news agency reports on the various happenings in a country in which he resides; otherwise, he would have nothing to do. This is international practice as well as common sense. That the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency in New Delhi reports on the happenings in India has, therefore, nothing to do with "interfering in the internal affairs of India" as alleged by Mr. Menon. As regards the dispatches about the strike waged by the Indian Government employees, not only the official Indian Information Service of the Indian Government, the Press Trust of India, the major newspapers in India, but also the correspondents of the various Western countries in India have all made a great many reports, and the Hsin Hua News Agency has only made objective, true and fair reports based on the above-mentioned sources, which is not at all connected with the so-called "interference in internal affairs of India", and no one is in any way entitled to interfere in the reports of the Hsin Hua News Agency, using "interference in internal affairs" as a pretext. As to what news the Chinese newspapers and radio are to report and what headlines are to be used by them, it is a matter of their own right, and, similarly, no one whosoever has the right to interfere in it.

The Government of India further used "reciprocity" as a pretext, alleging that Indian correspondent could not enter China, so the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency should not stay in India either. As a matter of fact, for a long period of time in the past there has never occurred that any Indian news agency has made any request to the Chinese Government for sending permanent correspondent to China under the principle of reciprocity.

The Chinese Embassy considers, therefore, that it is obviously discrimination against the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency that the Indian Government has baselessly refused to permit the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency to continue his stay in India, and asked the New Delhi Branch Office of the Agency to "withdraw". Such an action of the Indian Government has not only crudely violated international practice, but also made one bound to suspect the principle of "freedom of press" claimed by the Indian Government. The result of this action taken by the Indian Government following the anti-Chinese campaign for more than one year in India, will certainly further undermine the friendly relations between the two countries, and aggravate the tension between them. The Chinese Embassy cannot but express its regret at this.
In the interest of maintaining the friendly relations between China and India and upholding the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence, and in order to preserve the principle of freedom of press, the Chinese Embassy requests that the Indian Government restore the legitimate right of the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency in New Delhi to continue to stay, and cancel the decision of asking the Agency to "withdraw". It is hoped that the Indian Government will give serious consideration to and accept this request.

The Embassy avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 20 August 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China, and with reference to its note No. M/291/60, dated August 1, 1960, which was handed by His Excellency the Ambassador of the People’s Republic of China to the Foreign Secretary to the Government of India, have the honour to state as follows:

As the Foreign Secretary informed His Excellency the Ambassador, the Government of India were satisfied from a study of the despatches and reports of the Hsin Hua correspondent during the last few months that his further stay in India would be detrimental to good relations between India and the People’s Republic of China. The Hsin Hua correspondent had made it a regular practice to select critical comments and highlight adverse opinions against the Government of India, picked from newspapers which are either not of any standing or are opposed to Government. The picture which these despatches presented of India was entirely one sided if not false, and the only object of the despatches appeared to be to bring down the credit of India in foreign countries. Public opinion in India was greatly agitated by the fact that a foreign news agency was allowed the liberty of maligning India on the pretence that the news agency’s despatches merely quoted comments and writing from Indian newspapers. The activities of the Hsin Hua correspondent in India, were creating bitterness in the minds of the Indian people, and thereby were undermining the friendship between India and the People’s Republic of China.

2. The Government of India cherish and uphold the principle of the freedom of the press. Even a cursory survey of the Indian and world press would convince an unprejudiced observer of the freedom of comments allowed to Indian and accredited foreign correspondents in India. The correspondent of the Hsin Hua news agency was abusing this freedom for the purpose of lowering the credit of India. The action taken against him had no element of discrimination; it was entirely reasonable and justified. Far from the action being a violation of international practice, the latitude allowed and the patience shown to the Hsin Hua correspondent was more than what would have been allowed under much less provocation in most countries of the world, including the People’s Republic of China.

3. The Embassy of the People’s Republic of China has stated in its note that “no one is any way entitled to interfere in the reports of the Hsin Hua news agency.” The Government of India must point out to the Embassy that it has no right to question the wisdom or the propriety of the action which a sovereign government have taken against a foreigner who is in their view had been indulging in mischievous propaganda while resident in India. The Government of India cannot allow the Embassy to interfere in the exercise of their sovereign right to decide whether a foreigner, who has abused the hospitality extended to him, should not be allowed continued residence in India.

4. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurance of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 2 September 1960

The Chinese Embassy has received a report that Mr. Chiang Wen-kuei, manager of the Bank of China, Calcutta, and the Chinese nationals who have long been residing in Calcutta or Kalimpong, Mr.
Chang Ching, principal of the Hsing Hua Middle School, Mr. Peng Wei-hsia, principal of the Chinese School, Mr. Wu Tao-lung, printer and publisher of the China Review, Mr. Liang Tzu-chih, head of the Board of Directors of the Chung Hwa School, Hou Hsing-fu, Liu Wei-tai, Wei Chien-wu, and a number of others, have received orders from the local authorities of India to leave the country within a limited period of time, thus, causing difficulties in their stay in India.

The Chinese Embassy would like to point out that the Bank of China, Calcutta, has been playing a positive role in promoting trade between China and India and has made beneficial contributions to promoting Sino-Indian friendship, and that this is inseparable from the efforts of Manager Chiang Wen-kuei, who, further more, has always abided by Indian laws and regulations and maintained good cooperation with the authorities concerned. At the same time, the Chinese Embassy would also like to point out that the Chinese nationals who have been ordered by the local authorities of India to leave the country within a limited period of time have been living in India for a long time, some of whom were born in India, and they all have proper occupations, always respect local laws and regulations, uphold Sino-Indian friendship, and live in amity with the local people, and most of them are responsible persons taking care of the cultural and welfare undertakings of the Chinese nationals. That they are ordered to leave India within a limited period of time not only causes difficulties to them and affects the cultural and welfare undertakings of the Chinese nationals, but also is detrimental to the maintenance and development of friendly relations between the two countries.

In consideration of the friendly relations between China and India and the actual difficulties encountered by these Chinese nationals who have been ordered to leave India within a limited period of time, the Embassy hopes that the Indian Government will permit these Chinese nationals to continue their long-term stay in India.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 27 September 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Memorandum presented by Mr. Ma Mu-Ming to Shri S. Sinha on July 11, 1960, regarding the detention of the car of the Consulate General in Bombay and its occupant Mr. Lin Kuo-Chang at Carnac Bandar Goods Depot.

2. It is the normal practice for all vehicles leaving the Railway Goods Depot to be checked for contraband and the stopping of the car was in accordance with this precaution. When Lin Kuo-Chang informed the sentry that it was a Chinese Consulate car, the matter was reported to the Sub-Inspector-in-charge who took steps to ascertain whether in fact the car belonged to the Consulate and to ensure that no unauthorised person was using the number plate. The Consulate General when first addressed on the telephone, informed the Sub-Inspector that no car of the Consulate was deputed to the Carnac Bandar Goods Depot. It was only on a subsequent call made by Mr. Lin Kuo-Chang that the identity of the car and the occupant as belonging to the Consulate General was fully established and thereafter the car was promptly released.

3. While the Government of India regret the unintended inconvenience caused, it may be mentioned that the detention could have been avoided altogether if, as is expected, Mr. Lin Kuo-Chang had carried his personal identity card which would have promptly established that he was a member of the Consulate staff and the vehicle, in which he was travelling, were entitled to a privileged position.

4. The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurance of their highest consideration.
On September 2, 1960, Mr. Yeh Chang-chung, Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy, presented a memorandum to Shri J. S. Mehta, Director, China Division, regarding the orders issued to some Chinese nationals to leave India within a specified period. In the memorandum the Government of India were requested to permit these Chinese nationals to continue to stay in India. It was asserted in the Memorandum that the Chinese nationals had contributed to the promotion of Sino-Indian friendship and that their departure from India would be detrimental to the maintenance and development of friendly relations between the two countries.

2. The Government of India's attitude with regard to the residence of foreigners in India is extremely liberal by any standards: so are the freedom and facilities given to foreigners to work and trade in a bona fide manner within the country. But such facilities to all foreigners in India, as indeed in China and elsewhere, are subject to the condition that they do not partake, directly or indirectly, in political activity and particularly associate with any activity against the national policies and interest of India. The residence of foreigners in India is at all times specifically subject to the Foreigners Act, 1946, and the regulations made in pursuance of this Act.

3. There are several thousand persons of Chinese origin who have been residing in India for a long time without any curbs or disabilities being placed on them. Many have been living in India since before Independence and some have come subsequently. In accordance with their democratic policies and liberal principles the Government of India have continued to afford them full facilities of work and also of remittance of their earnings to China. The handful of persons against whom notices to leave India have been given are persons who for over a period of time have been reported to be associating and participating in activities which are prejudicial to Indian national interests. The Government of India, after further investigations, cannot accept the Embassy's contention that continued stay of those persons in India is beneficial to the maintenance of Sino-Indian friendship; in fact their activities have not only been an abuse of the hospitality and freedom permitted to foreigners but have been prejudicial to the development of Sino-Indian friendly relations. It was with reluctance, therefore, that the Government of India, in exercise of its sovereign discretion in this respect, have been compelled to authorise action to terminate the stay of some of those persons. It is regretted the decision in principle cannot be modified in those cases. In the case of genuine individual hardship in view of Embassy's representation, Government of India may be agreeable to extend the time limit prescribed in the individual case by another month or six weeks.
Statement made by the Vice Minister of China to the Ambassador of India in China, 21 October 1960

We have received reports from our Embassy in India to the effect that, in the morning of September 26 this year, the Police Commissioner in Kalimpong called on Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai an old Chinese national and on pretext of wanting him for inquiry at the Police Office took him there under custody. Then Ma was arrested sent under guard to the court and imprisoned on the pretext that he was allegedly involved in the murder of an old Lama. On September 27 the Police Office further searched Ma's house and took away his tonic medicine and other belongings.

For this case Mr. Hsu Jen our Deputy Trade Agent in Kalimpong several times made representation with the local District Head and yet the Indian local authorities have hitherto failed to provide any reason and evidence warranting the arrest of Mr. Ma. Mr. Ma has been residing in Kalimpong for 40 years; he has always abided by the laws and is on good terms with the Chinese nations both Han and Tibetans and enjoys a good reputation there. Mr. Ma is 71 years of age and weak and sickly. After being imprisoned without warrants no bail is allowed nor visit or delivery of food and medicines by his family. This is totally against the humanitarian spirit.

As for the allegation that Mr. Ma is involved in the murder of an old Lama this is a sheer fabrication. In fact Mr. Ma has never been acquainted nor had any contact with the murderer. There is obviously something else behind the scenes when an old man who has always abided by the laws should have been charged with involvement in a murder case. The local authorities of Kalimpong have repeatedly refused to see our Deputy Trade Agent and even denied him access to Mr. Ma in accordance with provisions relating to the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement. All these acts are obviously not in the interest of the friendly relations between China and India.

It is also necessary to recall that since June this year the Indian local authorities in Calcutta and Kalimpong have successively given orders without any justification for Mr. Chiang Wen-Kuel, Manager of the Bank of China, Calcutta, and other responsible persons in charge of cultural and welfare undertakings of the Chinese nationals in the localities totalling over 30 to leave India within a limited period of time. Our Embassy in India on September 2nd and again on October 17th made representations with the Ministry of External Affairs of your country explaining that these persons have been lawfully living in India for a long time and they all have proper occupations, have always abided by local laws and regulations, actively upheld Sino-Indian friendship and living in amity with the local people and expressing the hope that the Government of India would permit them to continue their stay. However this question has up to now failed to be settled reasonably; on the contrary an ever increasing number of Chinese nationals have been ordered to leave India within a set time limit. Moreover in its reply dated October 17 the Ministry of External Affairs of your country even asserted that these Chinese nationals told to leave India are “persons who for over a period of time have been reported to be associating and participating in activities which are prejudicial to Indian national interests”. We cannot agree at all to this reply. It must be pointed out that it is the consistent policy pursued by our Government to instruct the Chinese nationals to live in amity with the local people to abide by laws and regulations of the country they reside in and not to participate in the political activities of the locality. It is inconceivable that the charge of “associating and participating in activities which are prejudicial to Indian national interests” should be made without any grounds against these law abiding Chinese nationals. It is indeed difficult to understand why Indian local authorities should have given such unreasonable treatment to the nationals of a friendly country in such a great hurry.

The above mentioned events have already impaired the proper rights and interests as well as the rights of lawful residents of the Chinese nationals whose life and human rights are endangered. The continuous occurrence of these events in India have aroused the extreme uneasiness of the broad masses of Chinese nationals and our Government express serious concern over this situation. Proceeding from its desire to safeguard the traditional friendly relations between the Chinese and Indian people and to truly ensure the life and property of the Chinese nationals the Government of your country is requested immediately to adopt effective measures to release the innocent and falsely accused Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai to give the broad masses of Chinese nationals who abide by the laws including those who were informed of leaving India within a set time-limit the rights of lawful residents to stop the various unreasonable measures adopted by the local authorities to order Chinese nationals to leave India and to prevent disruptive activities of Tibetan rebels and elements of the Generalissimo Chiang Kai Shek clique.

I also hope that your Excellency Mr. Ambassador will convey to your Government the serious concern and requests of our Government.
The Consulate General of India in Lhasa presents its compliments to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet and have the honour to refer to Foreign Bureau's note of 21st January, 1960. In reply the Consulate General has to state that the version of the two incidents of trespass into the premises of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse, given in the Note, are at variance with what the Consul General was told by Mr. CHIANG SU MIN, Vice Director of the Foreign Bureau on the 8th December, 1959. For example, the Vice Director told the Consul General on 8th December that two women went to the hut of the maid-servant of the Indian Trade Agent and that their purpose was to register the material which the said maid-servant had borrowed from a rebel named NISHU. In the Bureau's note of 21st January, however, it has been stated that a local resident was entrusted by the wife of NISHU, a local resident, to fetch from CHOMO, a woman attendant of Indian Trade Agent at Gyantse, the articles which she had borrowed from NISHU. At the discussion on the 8th December also it was stated that on 24th November cadres of Chinese Peasants' Association went to the said maid servant's compound with a view to taking away material which the maid-servant had borrowed from rebel NISHU.

Apart from such contradictions, even the Chinese authorities have not denied the fact that some unauthorised persons did trespass into the Trade Agency compound. This would hardly be an appropriate method of recovering debts even from a local national of a Foreign Trade Agency residing within the premises of the Trade Agent. The entry of the two women and eight peasants into the residential premises of the Trade Agent without prior notice to the Trade Agent can only be regarded as contrary to the rights and courtesies which are customarily due to the representatives of another country. The Consulate General of India is, therefore, instructed to urge the Foreign Affairs Bureau to instruct the local authorities to ensure that such unwarranted intrusions do not occur again and the sanctity of Indian Trade Agency is duly respected.

The Consulate General of India takes this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs its assurances of highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of the Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 8 April 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to acknowledge receipt of the note handed over on February 19, 1960 by Mr. J. S. Mehta, Deputy Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India to Mr. Ma-Mu-ming, Secretary of the Chinese Embassy in India, concerning the question of lease of land by the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse.

The Chinese Government notes with regret that the Indian Government, in its note, still claims the old lease concluded in 1943 at the time of the former British colonial government to be valid. This statement which is hard to comprehend obviously cannot be deemed consistent with the spirit of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement and exchange of notes. In its note of February 19, 1960, the Indian Government also clearly admits that it "agreed to conclude a new lease." Agreement to conclude a new lease signifies that the old one has ceased to be in force. These Chinese Government cannot understand why the Indian Government, while agreeing to conclude a new lease, maintains, in disregard of the fact, that the old lease remains valid, thus procrastinating for a long time a simple question which should have been settled long ago, and even complicating it. Such a way of dealing with the question is actually of no help to the settlement of the question of reconstruction of the premises of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse.

As to the extent of the lease, it is clearly provided in the notes exchanged in 1954 that “The Government of China agrees that all buildings within the compound walls of the Trade Agencies of the Government of India at Yatung and Gyantse in Tibet region of China may be retained by the Government of India. The Government of India may continue to lease the land within its agency compound walls from the Chinese side.” It should be pointed out that both the premises of the Indian Trade Agencies at Yatung and Gyantse had compound walls, and that during the 1954 negotiations for the Sino-Indian Agreement, the Indian representative Mr. Ragavan repeatedly stated to the Chinese representative Mr. Chang Han-tu that the Indian Trade Agencies at Yatung and Gyantse did have compound walls. In its note of February 19, 1960, however, the Indian Government asserts that “the fact is that there were no compound walls right along the perimeter of the Trade Agency either in Yatung or in Gyantse; and therefore the phrase ‘compound walls’ only signifies the boundary of the areas in question...” This assertion is wholly inconsistent with the fact. Such a strange interpretation of the Agreement and the notes exchanged is lacking in seriousness and is unfavourable to the development of friendly relations between China and India. The Chinese Government, therefore, is firmly against accepting such an interpretation.
In its note of January 27, 1960, the Chinese Government has again explained patiently to the Indian Government the facts about the question of reconstruction of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse. With respect to the extent of the lease, although the notes exchanged in 1954 only provide that the Indian Government may continue to lease the land within its agency compound walls, yet the Chinese local authorities in Tibet, in the spirit of Sino-Indian friendship, have still been willing to discuss and determine a reasonable extent for the lease, as permitted by local conditions and having regard for the actual needs of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse. Unfortunately, the Indian Government fails to appreciate this consistently friendly and helpful attitude taken by the Chinese Government. The Chinese Government cannot deem this a cooperative attitude.

It should be pointed out that the Indian Government at various places in its note of February 19, 1960, used discourteous and inappropriate language. This can by no means be considered as in conformity with diplomatic usage and the courtesy due to be shown between two friendly countries. The Chinese Government expresses its deep regret at this.

Nevertheless, the Chinese Government will still deal with the questions concerned with a goodwill, according to its consistent desire to uphold Sino-Indian friendly relations and in the spirit of the solemn Agreement and exchange of notes between China and India in 1954. The Chinese Government would like to state once again that it will still instruct the local authorities to continue to render assistance in the reconstruction of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse. The Chinese Government has noted that, in its note of February 19, 1960, the Indian Government indicated the desire of leasing 19.13 acres of land for the reconstruction of the premises of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse. The Chinese local authorities, in the spirit of friendly assistance, are willing to give consideration to this request. It must be pointed out, however that the concrete extent of the lease has to be negotiated and determined by the two sides, and that this has nothing to do with the old lease.

In conclusion, it is hoped that the Indian Government will instruct the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse to take a cooperative and practical attitude and no longer persist in its unreasonable demands. The Chinese Government fully believes that the various concrete questions encountered in the reconstruction of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse will be settled smoothly on the basis of mutual cooperation, mutual confidence and mutual understanding between the two sides.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurance of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and, with reference to the Note of 31st December, 1959, presented by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China to the Embassy of India in Peking, have the honour to state once again the following position regarding the nationality of persons of Indian origin residing in the Tibet region of China.

2. The Government of India have stated clearly that, in terms of the relevant clauses of the Indian Constitution and the Citizenship Act of 1955, persons of Indian origin, who have been residing in the Tibet region of China, are entitled to the privileges of Indian citizenship and, that under the Indian law registration with the diplomatic and consular missions for Indian nationalities is a matter of option without any time limit. No general grounds can, therefore, be advanced by which Indian nationals can be deemed to have lost their claim to Indian citizenship. It is an accepted canon of international law, which was specifically upheld in a declaration by the Permanent Court of International Justice in 1923, that the question of nationality law lie solely within domestic jurisdiction of a state. The Government of India are therefore under no obligation to accept any law of nationality or executive decree promulgated in the People's Republic of China, which, in effect, would amount to depriving the persons, so entitled, of their rights to Indian citizenship. Further, the Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict on Nationality, concluded at the Hague Conference in 1930, stated that the law of each State on nationality shall be recognised by the other States in so far as it is consistent with international conventions, international custom and the principles of law generally recognized with regard to nationality. The Government of India and the then Government of China subscribed to this convention. The Indian laws on the subject are fully consistent with well accepted international principles of nationality. On the other hand, the Government of India were not aware of any law on nationality promulgated by the Government of the People's Republic of China. The traditional practice of the Government of China in regard to nationality was apparently based on the principles of jus sanguinis, that is, every descendent of Chinese nationals, irrespective of residence, was considered to be of Chinese nationality. The Chinese note under reference admits that the Kashmiri Muslims and the Ladakhi Lamas resident in Tibet are of Indian origin. The Government of India, are, therefore, all the more surprised that the Chinese Government should endeavour to challenge the right to Indian citizenship of the persons of Indian origin. This right is based on a principle to which the Chinese Central authorities have traditionally and specifically subscribed, and even now continue to subscribe.
3. It may be added that the considerations which the Chinese Government have adduced are totally irrelevant to the legal right to Indian nationality of this group of persons who came from India. For example, the fact that these persons did not hold Indian nationality certificates has no relevance since, as pointed out earlier, there is no time limit prescribed under Indian laws, within which they must register with Indian Missions abroad. Such registration abroad is a matter of option. Actually, as far as these persons residing in the Tibet region are concerned, they did endeavour to approach the Indian Consulate General, for the necessary papers and it was the Chinese authorities which obstructed them from doing so. The Government of India immediately drew the attention of the Chinese authorities to this in the letter sent by the Consul General on 13th May, 1959 to the Chinese Foreign Bureau in Lhasa. Indeed, the local authorities went as far as to forcibly confiscate the registration forms and papers of Indian nationals who had succeeded in obtaining them from the Consulate-General.

4. It is also equally irrelevant that the Tibetan local authorities treated these persons as Chinese Tibetans. Under international practice the treatment meted by any local Government cannot unilaterally be deemed to confer or determine the question of nationality of foreign citizens.

5. The Chinese Government in their note have also contended that many of the Indian nationals had been abroad with Chinese travel papers. Although some Indian nationals might have, for the sake of convenience and out of ignorance, taken Chinese papers, the Government of India believe that such assertion does not apply to the bulk of Kashmiri Muslims. In this connection it would not be inappropriate to recall, as was pointed out in the Indian note of 24th September, that as soon as these persons reached India, they claimed the benefits which were reserved for Indian citizenship even though they might be holding Chinese papers. They proceeded to the Haj as Indian nationals in pilgrim-ships which were intended for Indian citizens only. In any case, the possession of Chinese passports and certificates does not necessarily result in their losses of Indian nationality.

6. From such information and representations as have been received by the Government of India, they must categorically reject the Chinese Government's assertion that the Indian nationals were satisfied at being treated as Chinese nationals. Apart from the fact that Chinese nationality as such was never conferred on them, from all evidence these people appear to be waiting impatiently to return to the places in India from where they originated, whatever their economic losses.

7. The basic facts remain that these persons are of Indian origin and by tradition, common to both China and India and under Indian laws, they are fully entitled to be treated as foreign nationals in Tibet with the right to return to the country of their origin. The Ladakhi Lamas went to the Tibet region for the theological studies during their life time. The Kashmiri Muslims, even though they may have been in Tibet for more than a generation, have retained their separate identity and their traditional connection with their homeland. There is no evidence that these persons have expressly renounced their right to Indian citizenship.
and, as such, any unilateral attempt to treat them as Chinese nationals is contrary to international law and practice, apart from being at variance with the spirit of friendship between the two countries.

8. It is therefore unfair and illegal to insist that these persons should renounce their Chinese nationality when in fact there is nothing to suggest that they had acquired Chinese nationality much less that they had surrendered their Indian nationality.

9. Even if these Indians, by virtue of their residence, are deemed to have fulfilled the conditions which would qualify them for Chinese citizenship, they would be entitled to the benefit of dual nationality. According to the international conventions and the application of China’s own practice mutatis mutandis, in another context, Indian nationals retain the right title to Indian citizenship. The Government of the People’s Republic of China have the sovereign right to confer its own citizenship on foreigners, but they cannot claim the right to deprive foreigners of their nationality.

10. In this connection, it may be expedient to recall the Treaty between the People’s Republic of China and the Republic of Indonesia on the question of dual nationality. Article I of the Treaty upholds the principle that all persons who simultaneously hold the nationality of the two signatory countries have the right to choose according to their own will which nationality they would wish to adopt. Further, an authoritative comment on this treaty made by Mr. Wang Chi Yuan, Member of the Standing Committee of Peking—returned Overseas Chinese Association, published in ‘People’s China’ of June 16, 1955, may be recalled in this connection. It referred to the notable features which can be found in the Treaty. Among them he stated, is the principle of the choice of nationality at one’s own free will for men and women alike . . . . He went on to say that “The signing of this Treaty has set a precedent for the settlement of the dual nationality question between China and other countries in South East Asia. The Chinese Government is ready to settle it with other Government concerned.” The Government of India seek nothing more than the application of these same principles to persons of Indian origin.

11. Moreover the same principle of choice was in the Agreement concluded between the People’s Republic of China and the Royal Nepal Government in 1956 in respect of the persons of mixed parentage residing in the Tibet region of China. In fact, only recently, a decree issued in Lhasa has reiterated the terms of the agreement.

12. The Government of India finds it patently illogical that the Chinese Government should afford the right of persons of Chinese origin living for generations in foreign countries to Chinese nationality, regardless of their residence and birth, pledge themselves to the principle of option implicit in dual nationality, and at the same time persistently refuse to give the freedom to exercise the same option to the persons of Indian origin residing in the People’s Republic of China. Such an attitude is as inconsistent as it is unfair from the humanitarian point of view.
13. To summarise the Government of India wish to reaffirm that persons of Indian origin are fully entitled to Indian nationality. The Chinese Government have so far failed to give any proof of such persons having expressly acquired Chinese nationality under any recognised procedure or law and consequently it is presumed they do not enjoy dual citizenship. Even if it is established that these persons have simultaneously acquired Chinese nationality, the only fair course would be to give them option of choice of nationality. The Government of India are gratified at the arrival of some Ladakhi Lamas but at the same time the Government of India continue to receive reports of hardships suffered by a large community of Kashmiri Muslims and Ladakhi Lamas who are still in Tibet. A full list of the Kashmiri Muslims families in the Lhasa Shigatse areas has already been furnished with the Indian note of 24th September. The Government of India trust that in the spirit of friendship between India and China and in accordance with International law and custom the Chinese Government will facilitate the return to India of persons of Indian origin should they so desire and that local authorities in Tibet will be instructed to remove obstruction in the way of their doing so.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 17th May 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to invite their attention to the note regarding currency and exchange difficulties, experienced by Indian traders in Tibet, which was handed over to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China by the Counsellor of the Indian Embassy in Peking on September 17, 1959.

2. The Government of India regret to point out that although four months have since elapsed, no steps appear to have been taken to ease the difficulties faced by the Indian nationals who are engaged, in accordance with the provisions of the 1954 Agreement, in the customary trade between India and the Tibet region of China. In fact, it would seem that these difficulties have recently increased because of fresh restrictions placed by the Chinese authorities in Tibet. As has been mentioned previously, the traders feel that the authorities in the Tibet region are hampering the normal exchange or sale of goods which was the traditional basis of this trade. In the interest of preserving the traditional trade connections and removing the hardships which are being inflicted on individual traders, the Government of India would request the Chinese authorities might take urgent steps to remove the difficulties to which their attention has previously been drawn.

3. In the following paragraph, the Government of India would like to mention some of the more specific difficulties which have come to their attention. All these appear to be of recent origin:

(i) It is learnt that the local authorities in Tibet continue to refuse to issue rupee drafts to all Indian traders in lieu of the Chinese currency held by them, except when the trader proposes to close down his business and terminate his trading connections with Tibet. Such drafts are necessary in view of the regulations passed by the Chinese authorities in July last year. In the absence of some method of repatriation of the earnings and profits, these trading connections can obviously not continue. The Government of India fail to understand what objection there could be to the grant of rupee drafts against the legal currency of China.

(ii) It has been brought to the notice of the Government of India that even when such drafts are issued, the commission charged by the Bank of China is exorbitantly high. The commission which was two per cent in the past was in itself excessive. The decision to raise it hundred per cent cannot but be construed as a deliberately restrictive measure intended to deprive the trader of his legitimate profit from the trade. Such a measure acts as a deterrent to the continuance of trade.
(iii) The question of the recovery of debts owed to Indian traders by the officials and other Chinese nationals in the Tibet region has been the subject of many previous representations. It is regretted, that no significant effort seems to have been made to help the Indian nationals in the realization of their bona fide claims.

This difficulty is particularly unfortunate for the small Indian traders who, according to traditional practice, were trading with western Tibet where Indian traders habitually supplied goods on credit and even made cash loans to Tibetan inhabitants and officials. This was done in good faith because, in the past, no difficulty was experienced in securing repayments. At present, however, because of certain recent measures taken by the Chinese authorities the Indian nationals cannot contact most of their debtors and trading partners. It is true that the paragraph (15) of the notes exchanged provides that disputes between traders of both countries over debts and claims shall be handled in accordance with local laws and regulations. But for the reasons mentioned in the preceding paragraphs the Government of India urge intervention by the Chinese authorities so that, where the claims of Indian traders are bona fide the local authorities may help in the realisation of old debts. The total value of these loans outstanding in Western Tibet is approximately Rs. 11 lakhs. Since the Indian nationals concerned are petty traders, the loss of such a vast amount is causing serious hardship. The Government of India hope that some concrete steps for the realisation of these debts will be taken during the coming season in discussions with the Indian Trade Agent for Western Tibet.

Similarly, in Central Tibet, a large amount of debt is due to Indian traders. As the Government of India have already pointed out in their note of 26th October, 1959, the main difficulty in recovering the debts in this area has been that many of the Tibetan traders have moved to Shigatse and Lhasa, which are inaccessible to the Indian traders in the absence of travel permits. The Indian trader cannot even contact those Tibetans to recover their debts. The Government of India would, therefore, urge the Chinese Government either to afford necessary facilities on an ad hoc basis to Indian traders to visit Shigatse and Lhasa for expeditious realisation of their debts or to devise some other measure whereby local authorities might help in the realisation of these debts.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the correspondence resting with the Ministry's note dated April 13, 1960, on the question of the national status of persons of Indian origin residing in the Tibet region of China. The Ministry would further draw the attention of the Embassy to the informal note on the subject handed by the Foreign Secretary to the Government of India to H. E. Mr. Chiao Kuan-hun, Assistant Minister of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China on April 25, 1960, and to the discussion which the Prime Minister of India had with H. E. the Chinese Premier on the same subject on the morning of April 25, 1960.

2. Even before the presentation of these notes there was much correspondence between the two Governments on the subject. The Government of India are aware of the arguments advanced by the Government of the People's Republic of China as embodied in the Embassy's note dated December 31, 1959. That note did not deny the Indian origin of Ladakhi Muslim families and Ladakhi Lamas, although it argued that these persons had by long stay become a part of the Tibet region of China, and that there was evidence to show that they had been treated as such by the local Government of the Tibet region of China. The legal implications of the issues raised in the Embassy's note were examined and answered in the Ministry's note dated April 13, 1960, wherein it was also pointed out that the basic fact remained that these persons were of Indian origin, and that by tradition common to both China and India, as well as under the Indian laws, they were fully entitled to be treated as foreign nationals in Tibet with the right to return to the country of their origin. The Ladakhi Lamas went to the Tibet region for theological studies during their life time. The Kashmiri Muslims, even though they might have been in Tibet for more than a generation, had retained their separate identity and their traditional connections with their homeland. There was no evidence that these persons had expressly renounced their right to Indian citizenship, so that any unilateral attempt to treat them as Chinese nationals was contrary to international law and practice, apart from being at variance with the spirit of friendship existing between India and China. It was further argued that even if these Indians by virtue of their long residence were deemed to have fulfilled the conditions which would qualify them for Chinese citizenship, they would be entitled to the benefit of dual nationality, and in accordance with international usage governing dual nationality, they should be given the option to return to India if they so wished. According to international conventions and the applications of China's own practice mutatis mutandis in other contexts.

(Cf. A) Agreement with the Republic of Indonesia on the question of nationality of persons of Chinese origin resident in Indonesia;
3. The Ministry of External Affairs regret that, while no reply has been vouchsafed to their representations referred to above, they have from time to time received disquieting reports of the increasingly harsh treatment to which the members of the Ladakhi Muslim community in the Tibet region have been subjected. More than once the Consul General of India in Lhasa was asked to express to the Foreign Bureau in Lhasa the Government of India's concern over the plight of these helpless people. He was asked to plead for them with the Chinese authorities in Lhasa and obtain for them treatment generally accorded to the nationals of a friendly country. Nevertheless, by all accounts it is clear that the condition of these persons deteriorated sharply as measure after measure was taken by the authorities in the Tibet region against the community. It has been reported that several persons of this community are under arrest, that the property and cash of some have been confiscated and that the entire community has been debarred from drawing rations. These and other disabilities have been imposed on the community on the ground that they have refused to register themselves as Chinese.

4. Recently there has been a report of a mass gathering summoned by the local authorities on the morning of June 20 in the new Athletic Stadium in Lhasa. Kashmiri Muslims were instructed to attend this meeting and it was given out to them that the meeting would be of interest and concern to them. Kashmiri Muslims, therefore, attended the meeting in a body. When they were ordered to break up into area-wise groups, they pleaded that they were Indian Kashmiris, and upon this they were told that they were not wanted at the meeting and should leave forthwith.

5. Thereafter some prisoners, both Chinese and Ladakhi Muslims, were brought in a prison van to the meeting. They were made to face the crowd hand-cuffed and with heads bent. The Chinese prisoners were first disposed of with sentences ranging from death to long-term imprisonment. The Kashmiri Muslim prisoners were then brought before the gathering. There were four of them hand-cuffed, and with heads bent, they heard the sentences passed on them. Three of them were given prison terms varying from 15 to 11 years. Their crime, according to the indictment, was 'incitement of Ladakhi Muslims to claim a foreign nationality'. One of them was additionally charged with 'continuing the movement for foreign nationality among his people and authorship of certain anonymous posters'.

6. The Government of India have for some time been perturbed by reports of the worsening situation of the Ladakhi Muslims in the Tibet region. They were, however, patiently hoping that the many amicable and legal representations made on behalf of these people at the highest level were being given due consideration by the Government of the People's Republic of China. The report of the incidents of June 20 in Lhasa has belied this hope. The Government of India regard it as extraordinary that, while the subject of the national status of these persons is still in negotiation between the two countries, a public meeting should have been held to announce extreme punishments on some of the leaders of the community on the ground that they had claimed Indian nationality. The Government of India are not aware what trial, if any, was held before the sentences were pronounced. They are also unaware whether the prisoners in question were given adequate facilities to defend themselves. They are, however, aware that their representative in Lhasa had no access to these prisoners, and was given no facility to provide for their adequate defence. The Government of India, in these circumstances, are left in little doubt that the events that took place at the meeting in the Lhasa Athletic stadium on June 20 were calculated to victimize certain leading Ladakhi Muslims and to intimidate the rest of the community, as well as to display publicly the disrespect in which responsible authorities in the Tibet region of China seem to hold the representations made by the Government of India. In the light of these facts the Government of India must register their grave and emphatic protest at the unprecedented methods resorted to by the responsible authorities in Lhasa, and must ask in all earnestness that prompt steps be taken to prevent further punitive measures against persons of Indian origin residing in the Tibet region.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurance of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 30 June 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to an unofficial note and an official Note dated September 24, 1959 and October 26, 1959 respectively which were handed over by Mr. Mehta, Deputy Secretary of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs regarding the question of poisonous drugs carried by Brahmachari Alam Chaitanya while going on pilgrimage to Tibet, has the honour to state as follows:

About the question of holding up the poisonous drugs carried by the said pilgrim, a reply to this effect was already furnished in the Chinese Government Note of September 11, 1959 to the Indian Government. After again studying carefully a recent report by the local authorities in Tibet, the Chinese Government is even more confident that its original viewpoint is most appropriate. A laboratory test by the authorities concerned in Tibet already proved that the so-called "frequently required drugs for self use" contained in ten odd bottles carried by the pilgrim Brahmachari Alam Chaitanya were poisonous matters comprising such highly poisonous drugs like Arsenic Alb, Merc. Cor., Aconit Nap., Phosphorus, Nux Vom and so on. No one with a little commonsense would think that such a big variety of highly poisonous matters being in the possession of a single person can become the "frequently required drugs for self use". It is to be regretted that the Government of India in its Note also described them in the beginning as "drugs for self use" and then described them as "drugs for similar use in treatment", and even lodged protest with the Chinese Government for examining the law-breaking pilgrim and the confiscation of the poisonous drugs for the purpose of safeguarding the security of life of the Tibetan people and for protecting, in accordance with the exchange of Notes, the security of life of those going on a pilgrimage in Tibet from India. The Chinese Government categorically rejects this kind of reasonable protest and cannot but think that this attitude of the Indian Government is an irresponsible attitude on their part towards the unfortunate incident that might take place. The Chinese Government requests the Government of India to deal strictly with the pilgrim that carried poisonous drugs with him to Tibet and expresses the hope that measures will be adopted to prevent the recurrence of similar cases.

The Ministry avails of this opportunity to convey to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Chinese Bureau of Foreign Affairs, Lhasa, to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa, 11 July 1960

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet presents its compliments to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa and has the honour to reply to the Consulate General's letter of 1st April 1960 as follows:

The Foreign Bureau holds that Vice-Director Chiang Su-ming's talks with Mr. Consul General P. N. Kaul on the 8th December 1959, are not at variance with the facts set in the Foreign Bureau's letter of 21st January 1960 to the Consulate General. The facts still remain: That a few local peasants were twice entrusted to fetch from Chomola, a maid servant of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse, the articles which she borrowed from the rebellious bandit Nisho. These peasants had never entered anyone's living quarters, to say nothing of making the so-called "search". These peasants had, at all times, maintained a fine attitude and it is entirely reasonable of them in so doing. But Mrs. Kapoor adopted a daring and unreasonable attitude towards these peasants by hurling abuse and made statement distorting facts to Military Control Commission of Gyantse.

In view of what is said above, the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet hopes the Consulate General of India would tell the Trade Agency at Gyantse that no similar unhappy matter should recur in the future.

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet takes this opportunity to renew to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa its assurances of highest consideration.
Record note handed over by the Ambassador of India in China to the Vice-Minister of China, 14 July 1960

On June 30, 1960, the Secretary-General of the Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India handed over a Note to His Excellency the Ambassador of China regarding the treatment meted out to Kashmiri Muslims in the Tibet Region of China. In the Note the Government of India had asked in all earnestness that prompt measures be taken to prevent further punitive measures against persons of Indian origin residing in the Tibet Region.

The Government of India have to state, much to their regret, that since the Note of June 30th was delivered they have received a stream of messages from Lhasa reporting acts of terror and intimidation and indiscriminate arrests of Kashmiri Muslims. All these measures have been taken to force the Kashmiri Muslims to abandon their claim to Indian nationality.

According to our information Kashmiri Muslims are being called every day to the area offices, subjected to severe abuse and then admonished to line up with other Tibetans and attend indoctrination meetings. On July 8th and 9th, the Chinese authorities had them summoned to area offices and directed them to furnish lists of their property. They were then ordered to pay sales tax on their assessed sales of the past six months. In most cases, the Chinese assessed their sales at between JMP 8000–15000 per month whereas the actual sales till shops were closed down under protest on May 2, 1960, hardly exceeded between JMP 300–500 per month. Although the Kashmiri Muslims submitted to this arbitrary levy of sales tax they were summoned again by the authorities to the area offices on July 10th and there subjected to severe abuse and beating. It is reported that the beating lasted from five to six hours and was administered through the Tibetans. A leading member of the community Barkat Ullah Shahkali was beaten with fists and bled profusely. He and another Kashmiri Muslim called Ibrahim were not only beaten up badly but were threatened with rifles aimed at them that they would be shot dead. They were charged with having led the movement in the community for claiming Indian nationality. After this inhuman treatment the Kashmiri Muslims were abjured to forget about their claim to Indian nationality and to attend indoctrination meetings. They were warned that if they failed to obey the worst offenders would be shot and others sentenced to various terms of imprisonment.

The Government of India are gravely concerned over the continued persecution of persons of Indian origin residing in the Tibet Region and would urge once again that immediate instructions be issued to the responsible authorities in the Tibet Region to stop further punitive action. The Government of India would also request in all earnestness that facilities be given to persons of Indian origin in the Tibet Region to exercise their right to return to their country and arrangements made for their repatriation to India as soon as possible.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 27 July 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and, with reference to Note No. 10/3/(1) dated the 30th June, 1960 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China to the Embassy of India in China, have the honour to state that the views expressed by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in that note are not based on facts. The medicines carried by Swami Brahmachari Atam Chaitanya and found in his possession by the Chinese authorities are as follows:

1. Aconite Napeilus
2. Arnica Montana
3. Arsenic Album
4. Belladonna
5. Bryonia Alba
6. China
7. Colocynth
8. Ipecacuanna
9. Mercurius Corresiuus
10. Mercurius Solubilis
11. Nux Vomica
12. Phosphorus
13. Rhus Tox
15. Sulphur.

2. These are well-known and commonly used homoeopathic medicines, and although they are derived from the poisons after which they are named, they are so diluted as to make them innocuous and absolutely safe for medicinal use. In fact such drugs are freely sold in India and other countries and no case of death or poisoning is known to have followed the administration of these medicines. The Government of the People's Republic of China must be aware that whether a drug is poisonous or not depends on its potency. In the circumstances the Government of India cannot but view the official note from the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs as a casual disposal of a genuine complaint of a pilgrim who was subjected to detention, interrogation and harassment by Chinese guards on the suspicion that he was carrying poison. It is indeed interesting to know that the Chinese Government "examined the law-breaking pilgrim and confiscated the poisonous drugs to safeguard the security of life of the Tibetan people and to ensure the security of life of Indians on pilgrimage in Tibet." The Government of India are unaware that the mere existence of poison is a threat to life.

3. The Government of India firmly reject this wholly unsatisfactory reply from the Chinese Government and do not accept that their protest was 'unreasonable' or that their attitude was 'irresponsible'.

4. In view of these lapses on the part of Chinese guards in the Tibet region of China which are in contravention of the notes exchanged between the two Governments on the protection to be afforded to pilgrims, the Government of India would request the Government of the People's Republic of China to take necessary measures to ensure that similar unfortunate incidents do not occur in future.

The Ministry avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Consulate General of India, Lhasa, to the Chinese Bureau of Foreign Affairs, in Tibet, 4 August 1960

The Consulate General of India in Lhasa presents compliments to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet Lhasa and has the honour to state that Mr. KAUL Consul General discussed at previous few occasions with Hr. CHIANG SU MING Vice Director of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs about the early disposal of cases of TROME GESHE RIMPOCHE, NAMDOL ZANGPO, PHIGU driver and LOBZANGI RIGDO. Mr. CHIANG SU MING had assured of early disposal of these cases by the concerned authorities.

The above mentioned persons being Indians/India protected nationals, this Consulate is receiving constant requests from their relations for their welfare and early return to India. This Consulate General shall therefore feel grateful if it could be intimated about the welfare of these persons and assisted with early disposal of their cases. An early reply is requested.

The Consulate General of India in Lhasa takes this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs its assurances of highest consideration.
Note given by the Chinese Bureau of Foreign Affairs, Lhasa, to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa, 24 August 1960

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet presents its compliments to the Consulate General of India, Lhasa and has the honour to inform the latter, with respect to the taking into employment of local staff members and servants of Chinese nationality by your Consulate and Indian Trade Agencies in Tibet, as follows:

In order that the arrangements of labour and production of the local people may not be effected, it is hoped that when the Consulate General of India, Lhasa and Indian Trade Agencies wish to employ local staff members and servants of Chinese nationality, they would inform this Bureau and Sub-Offices of Foreign Affairs concerned, in advance, to assist in introducing. The Foreign Bureau also express the hope that the Consulate General of India and Indian Trade Agencies would inform this Bureau and Sub-Offices of Foreign Affairs concerned in writing, whenever there is any increase or decrease of their personnel.

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Consulate General of India the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Chinese Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet to the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung, 30 August 1960

The Yatung Office of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet presents its compliments to the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung and has the honour to acknowledge receipt of Mr. TASHI's letter to Mr. TANG dated 6th July 1960 through which the Yatung Office is aware of the disappearance of two Chinese staff members of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung, Mr. SONAM GYATSO and Mr. TASHI, together with their families from the compound of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung on the night of 4th July 1960. In these regards the Yatung Office of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet would like to set forth its views as follows:

(i) The Yatung Office expresses its surprise at the disappearance of two Chinese staff members of the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung on the night of 4th July 1960.

(ii) These two staff members of Chinese nationality worked and stayed in the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung and disappeared suddenly. The Yatung local authorities are deeply concerned about it. The Indian Trade Agency in Yatung should be responsible for their safety and also has the responsibility to assist us in finding out their whereabouts by supplying the Yatung local authorities with clues, at any moment, to facilitate their searching for them.

(iii) The Yatung Office has notified the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung before that the Indian Trade in Yatung should on its own initiative inform the Yatung Office of any increase or decrease of its personnel. However the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung did not inform the Yatung Office in time after it approved, Mr. SONAM GYATSO's resignation. This is surprising and it is hoped that note is being taken in the future.

The Yatung Office of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Trade Agency the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 23 September, 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China and has the honour to put the following views with reference to the question of the nationality of Kajis in China's Tibet region and other questions referred to in the notes of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs delivered to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India on April 13 and June 30 respectively, and to the memorandum which H.E. Indian Ambassador to China, G. Partha-sarathi, personally handed to Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs Keng Piao on July 14, 1960:

1. In its notes of September 11 and December 31, 1959, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs cited many indisputable facts and made explanations to back the case that the Kajis in China's Tibet region are Chinese. But in its notes of April 13 and June 30, the Indian Government repeatedly ignored and distorted the theses of the Chinese Government, flagrantly rejected the proposal for a sensible and rational settlement of the question of the nationality of the Kajis, which the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in a spirit of friendly consultation, put forward in its note of December 31, 1959, and stuck to its unilateral stand that Indian law be imposed on persons of Chinese nationality living on Chinese territory. The reasons held by the Indian Government in the above-mentioned notes and memorandum are utterly untenable and the Chinese Government resolutely expresses its disagreement to them.

2. The Chinese Government has always considered the Kajis to be Chinese and is fully entitled to deal with such questions as their nationality and exist as China's internal affairs. The Chinese Government would naturally respect the wishes of the Kajis concerned, who do not want to remain Chinese, and settle the question of their nationality in accordance with the regulations of the Chinese Government. The Chinese Government would also give facilities, in accordance with the regulations concerned, to those among them who request to leave the country. Therefore, the question has never arisen of any obstruction on the part of the Chinese Government in settling the question of the nationality and exit of the Kajis. Hereafter, should they, out of their own will, apply to the Chinese Government for exit or ask to settle their nationality, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs believes that the Chinese Government, in view of the friendship between the Chinese and Indian peoples, will as before effect a sensible and rational settlement of their questions, and will be prepared to give whatever possible consideration to those who apply for exit.

3. The Indian Government, in its note of June 30 and memorandum of July 14 this year, also mentioned that of late these Kajis had been subjected to "increasingly harsh treatment" by the authorities in China’s Tibet region. The Chinese Government made an investigation of this. The facts show that there are no grounds whatever to the allegations that the Kajis were subjected by the local authorities to “acts of terror and intimidation and indiscriminate arrests,” that they were “being called everyday to the area offices,” and “subjected to severe abuse,” and that the properties and cash of some of the Kajis were “confiscated,” etc. as stated by the Indian Government in the above-mentioned note and memorandum. According to reports received by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Chinese local authorities in Lhasa have never beaten and abused any Kaji, nor “confiscated” the properties and cash of any Kaji, much less resorted to any intimidation against them. The unwarranted charge made by the Indian Government in its note in such an irresponsible manner against the local Government of China’s Tibet region can only be considered as slanders against the authorities in China’s Tibet region, and is detrimental to the spirit of Sino-Indian friendship. As Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs Keng Piao pointed out to H.E. Indian Ambassador Parthasarathi, the present local government in Tibet was a government of the people, which always stood by its own people, maintained very close ties with them and would never subject its own people to any “harsh treatment”. As to the few Kajis who committed offences against the law, it is entirely correct for the Government to deal with them in accordance with the law, and is also a matter entirely within the scope of China’s sovereign rights in which the Indian Government has no right to meddle. Therefore, the Chinese Government firmly rejects the “grave and emphatic protest” lodged by the Indian Government in its note of June 30, regarding the sentences passed by the authorities in China’s Tibet region on a few Kajis who have committed offences against the law.

4. In its notes of April 13 and June 30, the Indian Government referred time and again to the questions of the nationality and exit of Ladakhi lamas on pilgrimage to China’s Tibet region. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs in its note, dated December 31, 1959, reiterated that the Chinese Government had never had the intention of regarding the Ladakhi lamas as Chinese. At the end of 1959 alone, more than one hundred and twenty Ladakhi lamas were given permission to leave China. According to recent reports, by the end of May this year, the great majority of Ladakhi lamas who remained in Lhasa and Shigatse on pilgrimage were also given permission one after another to leave China. Proceeding from the desire of upholding the traditional friendship between China and India, the authorities in China’s Tibet region, at the time of their departure, took the initiative in supplying them with means of transportation, and also helped those lamas in difficult economic straits by supplementing them with traveling expenses and food rations on the way. Such warm attentions of goodwill have won the praise of all Ladakhi lamas who left China, who before leaving China more than once expressed their heart-felt gratitude for the friendly solicitude shown by the authorities in China’s Tibet region. In its note, dated April 13, the Indian Government also stated that it was “gratified at the arrival of some Ladakhi lamas” in India. At present, the remaining small number of Ladakhi lamas are all those who stayed behind of their own accord to continue their pilgrimage. In deference to their religious desire, the Chinese Government has given them facilities to continue with their stay. The Chinese Government would like to reiterate that if anyone among them wishes to apply for exit, he will likewise be given permission and friendly attentions by the Chinese Government. Disregarding the incontrovertible facts mentioned above, the Indian Government in its note of June 30, 1960 to the Chinese Government, nonetheless raised in a self-contradictory manner the non-existent question of the nationality of Ladakhi lamas and the question of their exit which has been smoothly settled long ago so as to pester the Chinese Government unjustifiably. The Chinese Government cannot but express its deep regret at this.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Indian Trade Agency in Yatung to the Yatung Office of the Tibetan Bureau of Foreign Affairs, 1 November 1960

The Indian Trade Agency Yatung presents its compliments to the Yatung Office of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet and has the honour to refer to its note dated August 30, 1960 regarding the disappearance of two Chinese members of the staff of the Indian Trade Agency together with their families.

In the note referred to above the Yatung office of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet has suggested that the Indian Agency was aware and should assist in the location of these missing Chinese nationals.

The fact is that the Indian Trade Agency had no knowledge of the intention of Messrs. Gyatso and Tashi to leave the Agency premises nor are they aware of their present whereabouts or that of their families. In fact their disappearance was as much a matter of surprise to the Agency as to the Chinese authorities. Apart from their responsibilities in connection with the work assigned to them are Agency does not exercise any control over them. In deference to the Chinese Government's wishes even such facilities as schooling are not now being extended to the families of Chinese nationals serving the Agency.

Further, the Agency cannot accept the contention of the Foreign Bureau Yatung that it is any part of Agency's responsibility to assist the Yatung Office in finding out the present whereabouts of the persons who have disappeared. The suggestion that a foreign post is in any way responsible for the movement or whereabouts of local nationals of the country concerned, even though they may be employed in the foreign post concerned, is contrary to normal international practice. These Chinese nationals being the subjects of and owing allegiance to the People's Republic of China are not under the jurisdiction and control of the Agency and the Agency cannot be expected to be held responsible or be asked to render assistance in locating them. Indeed the Agency has no means of locating them.

The Agency has noted that the Yatung office would like to be informed of any increase or decrease in the Agency personnel and would be agreeable to supply such information at periodical intervals.

The Trade Agency of India takes this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs its assurances of highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 9 November 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have to state with regret that in contravention of the provisions and principles embodied in the 1954-Agreement for trade and intercourse between India and the Tibet Region of China, the Indian Trade Agent who has just concluded his visit to Western Tibet was subjected to various difficulties in the discharge of his normal duties.

2. The Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 stipulated the establishment of an Indian Trade Agency in Gartok in Western Tibet and its functioning throughout the year. Unfortunately, owing to the lack of any suitable accommodation and the delay in the conclusion of the lease to enable construction of a Trade Agency, the Indian Trade Agent has only been able to make seasonal visits in the summer to Western Tibet. The attention of the Chinese Government was drawn to the difficulties encountered by the Indian Trade Agent last year in the Government of India's note of the 26th of October, 1959. Even so similar difficulties were faced during the current season and the necessary co-operation from the Chinese authorities in Western Tibet was not forthcoming.

3. It will be recalled that the Embassy was informed in the Ministry's Note No. 1 (3)EAD/60, dated June 2, 1960 that the Trade Agent and his party would be entering Western Tibet via Lipulekh Pass in the 1st week of July, 1960. The Embassy was also requested in this Note to provide the usual facilities of a mobile wireless set, security guard and transport. The Chinese Government were further informed on 3rd June, 1960 by the Indian Embassy, Peking, of the Trade Agent's impending visit to Western Tibet. The Indian Consul-General also wrote to the Chinese Foreign Bureau at Lhasa on the 10th June, 1960 about the Trade Agent's visit. The detailed itinerary of the Indian Trade Agent was attached to the Ministry's Note No. 1(3)EAD/60, which was presented to the Secretary of the Embassy on the 10th June, 1960, with a view to enable the Embassy to give advance notice to the local authorities for making the necessary arrangements. This itinerary included the Trade Agent's proposed visit to some of the marts recognised by article II(2) of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 and places of pilgrimage mentioned in article III(1) of the said Agreement. The Embassy issued the necessary visas and the party left for their journey as planned. The Embassy also informed the Ministry in their Note No. K/308/60, dated 2nd July, 1960, that the contents of the Ministry's Note for provisions of usual facilities had been conveyed to the local authorities and that the Indian Trade Agent should contact them directly on arrival in Tibet.
4. On 29th June, 1960, the Indian Consul-General was informed by the Foreign Bureau at Lhasa that the Trade Agent and party should not enter Tibet till the 15–20th July, 1960, as local authorities were launching an offensive against the rebel elements. The Indian Trade Agent was then already on his way to Lipulekh but was instructed not to proceed further. After repeated approaches, the Chinese Foreign Bureau informed the Indian Consul-General that the Indian Trade Agent could enter Tibet only after 20th August, 1960. In the meanwhile, because of this delay, the difficulties and hazards of this journey had increased considerably owing to the arrival of the monsoon and the Trade Agent was able to reach Taklakot only on 31st August, 1960.

5. Unfortunately, the difficulties did not end there. The Trade Agent had not only no co-operation from the local authorities, but he had also to face a variety of impediments in the performance of his normal duties. The following are illustrative:

(i) The non-diplomatic staff of the Indian Trade Agency used to carry with them sporting guns and small arms for self-protection with the approval of the Chinese Government. This time, however, they were not allowed to do so. The staff accordingly complied with the instructions of the local authorities and deposited their arms with them. However, this caused much inconvenience to them and this could have been avoided if they had been notified at the time of the grant of visas.

(ii) The Trade Agent’s itinerary, which included visits to Gyanima and Chakra trade marts and to Kailash and Mansarowar between 6th and 20th August, 1960, was given to the Foreign Bureau’s representative at Taklakot. It would be observed that the names of these places along with others had been communicated to the Embassy as early as the beginning of June. The Trade Agent was told, however, that according to the instructions of the Foreign Bureau he should first proceed to Gartok and then apply for permission to visit other places. After his arrival at Gartok, he repeated his request for visit to the other places. He informed the Foreign Bureau that he would like to visit Tashigong and that a member of the Trade Agency should, in accordance with custom, be allowed to go to Kailash and Gyanima. In a conversation at the Foreign Bureau, the Trade Agent was told on 21st September, 1960, that he could not visit Tashigong due to the apparent non-availability of transport. The Trade Agent’s visit to any other trade mart was also not agreed to. Similarly, the visit of a member of the Trade Agency to Gyanima or Kailash was rejected on the ground that it was too late. The Trade Agent has an obligation to discharge certain responsibilities under the terms of 1954-Agreement and it is obviously contrary to the spirit of the Agreement that he should be prevented from performing these functions by the authorities concerned in Western Tibet. It may also be mentioned that the limited transport requirements of the Trade Agent had always been traditionally provided, and since animal and mechanical transport is controlled by the State authorities, it must be for the local authorities to make available such facilities for the fulfilment of his stipulated responsibilities. For want of transport to be supplied by the local authorities, the Trade Agent was stranded at Taklakot for 10 days.

(iii) The local authorities totally stopped the Tibetans from visiting the Trade Agency even for selling the articles of daily use. A person who supplied his Yaks on hire to the Trade Agency for bringing firewood was ill-treated and told not to have any dealings with the Trade Agency. Another person who sold some sheep to the Trade Agency occasionally was stopped from doing so and the Trade Agency was asked to approach the Foreign Bureau whenever the Agency needed a goat. The goats were supplied by the Foreign Bureau at a rate which was double the market price.

6. The above facts will show that as in 1959 the Trade Agent’s stay in Western Tibet was not only curtailed but almost rendered infructuous by preventing his discharging the duties which devolve on him under the 1954 Agreement. He was not accorded the treatment which as an accredited representative of a friendly country performing his legitimate duties in accordance with a valid and binding international agreement he had the right to expect.

7. It may also be mentioned that although the agreement provides visits to Kailash and Mansarowar by Indian pilgrims, most of them could not fulfil their religious obligations as the local authorities during the last two years advised against such visits. Similarly the Indian traders again found various types of disabilities which have severely undermined the customary pattern of Indo-Tibetan trade along this border. A number of new taxes were imposed on them and they were prevented from exporting to India the traditional commodities of export taken by them in barter, like wool, salt, borax and beasts of burden. The Indian traders also could not recover the old debts from the local Tibetans owing to the ban on the export of these articles to India. They were also stopped from bringing to India their animal property which virtually amounted to confiscation by the local authorities. The unsold goods of Indian traders lying in deposit with the Bhutanese Representative were sealed by the local authorities and were not released to the owners in spite of their repeated representations. Due to non-availability of local currency, the Indian traders had to pay the local taxes in kind at low prices. The value of the articles so realised came to much more than the rate of taxes. These articles were later sold at cheap rates in Government sponsored shops with a view to ruin the Indian traders.

8. The Embassy is aware that Indian Trade Agents in Western Tibet traditionally used to enter Tibet through one pass and leave by another of the passes mentioned in Article 4 of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954. This practice had the advantage of enabling the Trade Agents to perform their duties in an approximate manner and to cover many of the markets without having to perform a double journey. It has been noticed that the Chinese authorities in Western Tibet have been restricting the entry and exit of Trade Agents to only one route and permission has been withheld to return by the other routes, even though they are clearly recognised as border passes in the 1954-Agreement. Last year the Trade Agent wanted to enter Western Tibet via the Nito pan but after initially agreeing to and granting a visa for entry by this pass, the Chinese authorities suggested his entry through Lipulekh, involving a very tortuous diversion after he had virtually reached the frontier. This year the Trade Agent informed the authorities in Gartok of his desire to return to India via Shipki La, another recognised route, but the necessary arrangements were not made. It is hoped that in future the Trade Agent will be permitted to use the routes recognised in the 1954-Agreement.

9. As the Chinese Government are aware, the Chinese Trade Agencies in India function throughout the year without any impediments and Chinese pilgrims and traders enjoy freedom of movement and customary trade in India. By contrast the Indian pilgrims traders and the Indian Trade Agency in Western Tibet suffer severe handicaps and difficulties and Government of India cannot but state that these impediments render virtually nugatory the provisions of the Sino-Indian Agreement regarding Trade and Intercourse between India and Tibet region of China. The Government of India trust that the Government of China will take suitable steps to enquire into these difficulties and issue instructions to ensure necessary and customary facilities to the traders and pilgrims and also to render the usual facilities to the Indian Trade Agent, Gartok to enable him to discharge his normal duties in accordance with the principles of 1954-Agreement.

10. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity of renewing to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India and with reference to their note dated the 15th January, 1960, have the honour to state as follows:

On the 29th December, 1959, three telegrams addressed to the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong were received by the Kalimpong Post Office at 07.35 hrs., 10.55 hrs. and 18.07 hrs., respectively. The first two telegrams were delivered to the Trade Agency by mid-day on the same day. When the telegraph messenger reached the premises of the Agency at about 19.30 hrs. to deliver the third telegram, he found that the inner gate of the office building was closed from within. He tried to contact the Agency’s representative but having failed in his efforts he had no option but to return to the telegraph office. The telegram was consequently delivered on the following morning. It is not true that the messenger was denied entry into the premises by the Indian police sentry at the gate of the Agency. Incidentally, no sentry is posted near the inner gate of the building.

As the Embassy must be well aware, no restrictions have been imposed on the movement of any official of the Trade Agency at Kalimpong and therefore the statement that the Deputy Trade Agent was prevented by the sentry from entering the premises is unfounded and cannot be accepted.

The Ministry take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 4 April, 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India and with reference to their note dated the 6th February, 1960, have the honour to state as follows.

2. As has already been clarified by the Ministry in their note dated the 6th February, 1960, it was to ensure an adequate protection for the personnel and property of the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong that sentry guards were posted at the main and rear gates of the Agency. The guard, who was on duty on the 19th January, 1960, at the rear gate, did not know the Chinese trader concerned and requested him to enter the Agency premises by the front gate. Since the guard was not satisfied of the bona fides of the person he was fully justified in diverting stranger to the main gate. It has been reported to Government that some employees of the Trade Agency actually got hold of the sentry and forcibly dragged the stranger into the Trade Agency compound. Some time later, these employees appeared again and demanded from the sentry his authority for guarding the gates of the Agency. The Government of India take serious exception to this gross interference with the sentry who was discharging his duties according to the instructions given to him. The sentries are strictly under the orders of their superior officers, and any communications, verbal or written, by the Agency officials should be addressed only to the Sub-Divisional Officer, Kalimpong, and not conveyed to the constable or any other junior official. In this case, but for the exemplary sense of calm and devotion to duty of the sentry, an ugly incident might have been precipitated. It may also be mentioned that the sentry guards posted around the Indian Consulate General in Lhasa strictly enforce the requirement that outsiders should enter the premises of the Consulate General from the main gate.

3. There is no truth in, nor indeed would there be any justification for the contention that Shri P. T. Moitra expressed apology for the so-called incident.

The Ministry take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 6 April 1960

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India. The Embassy considers that the reply, which the Ministry made in its note dated February 6, 1960 regarding the questions of the unwarranted restrictions by the Darjeeling local authorities on the normal functions of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong and of the connivance at the forcible intrusion by Americans into the compound of the Chinese Trade Agency, is unsatisfactory.

The Indian Ministry of External Affairs stated in the note that it had become necessary to post a protective police guard outside the Chinese Trade Agency in view of the local conditions in Kalimpong. However, the many facts enumerated in the Embassy's note of December 18, 1959 and its memoranda of January 15 and February 6, 1960, have fully shown that such kind of guard has by far exceeded the scope of providing protection for a foreign official organ, and that it is obviously in violation of international practice. In the Ministry's note, it was further mentioned that "the staff of the Trade Agency should be able to enter the premises freely on production of their identity cards". The Embassy is surprised at this and expresses its entire disagreement. According to international practice, staff members of foreign official organs are entitled to free entry into and exit from their own premises without being subjected to any restrictions.

The explanations made by the Ministry in its note regarding the two arbitrary intrusions by Americans with apparent ulterior motives into the Trade Agency are utterly untenable. It must be pointed out that when these Americans intruded for the first time into the compound of the Trade Agency and made troubles, the staff members of the Agency protested strongly against it, which all the Indian soldiers then on the spot saw with their own eyes. In spite of this, however, these Americans were even again allowed to intrude into the Agency for the second time. For this there can be no other explanation except deliberate connivance on the part of the Indian soldiers.

The Embassy must point out that, in its previous notes sent to the Indian side on many occasions, the Chinese Government has made it clear that the Tibet local authorities of China has all along treated the official organs of India in Tibet in accordance with the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence and the spirit of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement. Even though under the present circumstances of military control the Tibet local authorities of China have posted sentry guards to ensure the safety of the Indian Consulate-General at Lhasa, no restrictions have been placed on the normal functions of the Consulate-General. The personnel of the official organs of India at Lhasa, Yatung and Gyantse have all along been enjoying full freedom of movement within the city. area. No restrictions have ever been placed by the Tibet local authorities on Indian citizens entering or coming out of the Indian Consulate-General at Lhasa. As to the Indian citizens mentioned in the Ministry's note, if it is referred to the Kajis, then as the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China has pointed out in its notes of September 11 and December 31, 1959, they are not Indian nationals but Chinese citizens. The Tibet local authorities certainly have the right to exercise due administration over the citizens of their own country.

At present, various unjustified harassments are still continuing to take place against the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, to which the Embassy would like once again to draw the attention of the Indian Government, and requests that instructions be issued to the Darjeeling local authorities to stop immediately the improper measures against the Chinese Trade Agency.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 6 June 1960

The Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of the Republic of India, and with reference to the notes of reply of the Ministry, dated April 4, 1960 to the memoranda of the Embassy, dated January 15 and February 6, 1960, regarding the unwarranted restrictions imposed by the Darjeeling local authorities of India on the normal functioning of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, has the honour to state as follows:

On January 19, 1960, there occurred the serious incident in which an Indian sentry guard threatened with a raised rifle an overseas Chinese trader in preventing him from entering the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong. In the above-mentioned note, the Ministry stated that it was because the Indian sentry guard did not know the Chinese trader concerned. The Embassy holds that such a contention should by no means be the pretext for the Indian sentry guard threatening the overseas Chinese trader with a raised rifle. The residence of the said trader is not far from the rear gate of the Trade Agency. For the last several years, the trader has been going to the Agency to supply it with bean curd generally once every three or four days, which has remained so ever since the posting of sentry guards at the Trade Agency by the Darjeeling local authorities of India. When the Indian guard was preventing the trader from entering the Trade Agency on January 19, 1960, the personnel of the Agency came out on hearing the noise and explained to the Indian guard that the man was a trader supplying the Agency with bean curd. The Indian guard, however, still attempted to prevent him forcibly. This is an undeniable fact. The Embassy has noted that the Ministry in its note evaded making an answer with regard to the serious incident of the Indian sentry guard threatening the trader with a raised rifle in preventing him from entering the Trade Agency. This is extremely regrettable. Furthermore, the Ministry even alleged that some employees of the Trade Agency got hold of the sentry and forcibly dragged the said trader into the Agency, thereby interfering in the discharge of duties by the sentry. This allegation not only has no factual basis whatsoever, but also cannot cover up the unwarranted behaviour of the sentry, because it is hard to imagine that the employees of the Agency could have, with bare hands, got hold of a furious sentry who was raising his rifle to threaten people, and it is even harder to conceive that in such an atmosphere, the employees of the Agency would have forcibly dragged the trader into the Agency. The Embassy, therefore, categorically rejects the above-mentioned charge of the Ministry.

The Ministry in its note went so far as to deny the fact that Mr. Maitra had been to the Trade Agency to make apologies for the incident in which the Indian sentry guard raised his rifle to threaten the above-said overseas Chinese trader. The Embassy would like to state once again that Mr. Maitra went and apologized to the Trade Agency on the same day of the above incident after it had taken place. At that time besides three functionaries of the Trade Agency, there were present, on the Indian side, five or six sentry guards and two or three plain-clothed men of unknown identity. The Embassy considers that the fact that apologies were openly made on such an occasion cannot be altered by a single denial.

The Ministry also alleged in its note that employees of the Trade Agency demanded from the sentry his authority for guarding the gates of the Agency. This is not true. It was nearly two months since the Darjeeling local authorities of India posted sentry guards at the gates of the Trade Agency. Any one could see that it would be meaningless and also unnecessary then for the personnel of the Trade Agency to make such a query. Nevertheless, the Embassy is of the view that the personnel of the Trade Agency are fully entitled to question or protest on the spot against behaviours which they deem brutal and unreasonable.

With regard to the question of the delay in delivering telegram to the Trade Agency caused by the sentry guards at the gate of the Trade Agency preventing the messenger from entering the Agency, the contention of the Ministry also does not conform to the facts, and is unsatisfactory. The Ministry stated in its note that the delay was caused by the failure in contacting someone in the Agency to open the inner gate. The Embassy wishes to point out that the inner gate of the Agency is installed with electric bell, and that there are people living in the Agency's building both in the day time and at night, and there is no difficulty in contacting the personnel of the Agency at any time so long as one gets to the inner gate. And there has never occurred in the past any delay in the delivery of telegrams due to failure in getting the inner gate opened. Just as the local telegraph office has told the Agency, the fact is that the messenger could not enter the Agency because he was prevented by the sentry guards at the gate. This is the sole cause that delayed the Trade Agency in receiving the telegram.

It should also be pointed out that in its memorandum of January 15, 1960, the Embassy has pointed out that when the messenger went to the Agency to deliver a telegram on the morning of the next day of the said incident, the Indian sentry guard again prevented him from delivering the telegram to the Agency in time under the pretext that the messenger had no "pass", hence not permitted to get in. With regard to this fact, the Ministry was also unable to deny in its note of reply.

Speaking of the question of telegram delays, the Embassy wishes to take this opportunity to draw the attention of the Ministry to the fact that telegrams which the Embassy has received from the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong and other places have also time and again been delayed and there have been serious cases of omissions. On December 17, 1959, the Embassy took up this matter with the Ministry, however, the Ministry has not so far made any account for it.

It is surprising that in its note the Ministry has denied the fact that Chinese Deputy Trade Agent Lee Chih-ken and Mrs. Lee were once prevented by the sentry guard on December 27, 1959, from entering the Trade Agency. It should be pointed out that since the posting of the sentry guards, incidents in which Deputy Trade Agent Lee Chih-ken was obstructed by the sentry guards have taken place time and again. The above-mentioned incident took place on the mid-day of December 27, 1959, when Mr. Lee and his wife were walking back to the Agency from outside. After this incident, Mr. Lee was still subjected to such obstructions. For instance, on January 21, 1960, when Mr. Lee and his interpreter were going back to the Agency in a car, they were stopped at the gate of the Agency which drew more than thirty nearby wool workers and inhabitants to look on around them. The truth of the fact can never be obliterated by denial.

The Ministry also mentioned in its note the question of sentry guard at the Indian Consulate-General at Lhasa. The fact is that the premises of the Indian Consulate-General have only one gate on the northern side, and that the personnel of the Indian Consulate-General have neither in any way been interrogated nor prevented from entry into or exit from the Consulate-General by the sentry guards, thus forming a striking contrast to the treatment received by the personnel of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong.

The Embassy would like to reiterate that the unwarranted restrictions imposed by the Darjeeling local authorities of India on the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong are now not in the least reduced but, on the contrary, keeping on increasing. Regarding this, the Embassy wishes once again to draw the serious attention of the Ministry, and requests that the Government of India instruct the Darjeeling local authorities to immediately abolish the various improper measures against the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong.

The Embassy avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and with reference to the latter’s note No. M/129/60 dated the 6th April, 1960 have the honour to state that the Government of India have viewed with surprise that notwithstanding the Ministry’s note dated 6th February, 1960 and the verbal explanation given to Mr. Ma-Mu-Ming by the Director of the China Division of the Ministry, the Embassy has thought it fit to return to the same unfounded allegations. The Embassy’s note has charged the Darjeeling local authorities with having placed unwarranted restrictions on the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong. These unwarranted restrictions apparently refer to the protective guard posted outside the Trade Agency at Kalimpong. It has been alleged that the guard has exceeded its responsibilities in violation of international practice. The Ministry of External Affairs are of the view that the Embassy’s note reveals a grave mis-conception of the status and privileges attached to the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong. The Trade Agency is not a diplomatic establishment and does not under international law enjoy customary diplomatic immunities and privileges. The Embassy’s attention is drawn to the “Agreement between India and China on trade and intercourse between Tibet Region of China and India (1954)” wherein the status and privileges of the Trade Agency have been defined on the following terms:

“The Trade Agencies of both Parties shall be accorded the same status and same treatment. The trade agents of both Parties shall enjoy freedom from arrest while exercising their functions, and shall enjoy in respect of themselves, their wives and children who are dependent on them for livelihood freedom from search.

The Trade Agencies of both Parties shall enjoy the privileges and immunities for couriers, mail-bags and communications in code.”

2. The above Agreement confers certain privileges and immunities on Trade Agencies of both countries, but these derive from the Agreement and not from international law and practice.

3. The Ministry of External Affairs must refer in this context to the restrictions imposed on the Indian trade posts and Consulate General in Tibet. In fact, restrictions have been imposed even on the movement of the diplomatic and non-diplomatic members of the Indian Embassy in Peking. The Chinese Government have sought to justify the various restrictions on members of the Indian Embassy by their right to the exercise of sovereign jurisdiction in their own territories. The Government of India have not imposed any reciprocal restrictions on the staff of the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi. They could not, however, agree to a privilege position for the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong.
4. The Embassy is aware of the circumstances in which a guard had to be posted outside the Chinese Trade Agency, Kalimpong to afford protection to the Agency and its members. The Government of India are satisfied that despite provocations and interference from members of the Chinese Trade Agency, the guard has discharged its duty. The Embassy has not produced any evidence of “excess” by the guard.

5. It seems to the Government of India that the few incidents to which exaggerated importance have been given by the Embassy, and on which the protests of the Embassy are made, go to show that the Chinese Trade Agency are anxious to have the guard rendered ineffective or have it withdrawn. As the safety of the foreign organ in question as well as its members is the sole responsibility of the Government of India, they must see that the measures taken in this behalf are effective. These protective measures do not impose ‘un-warranted restrictions’ on the Chinese official organ. The Government of China must be aware that considerable freedom is enjoyed by the members of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong.

6. The Embassy’s note has referred to the “connivance” of the authorities “at the forcible intrusion by Americans into the compound of the Chinese Trade Agency.” The implications of this charge would have been grave, but for the fact that it is not substantiated. Firstly, the use of force by the Americans has not been proved. It was explained to the Embassy that the guard was not aware that the visitors in question who wished to call on the Chinese Trade Agency were Americans. The Americans allowed to go in were, however, not granted an interview and they withdrew from the Agency peacefully. There was no evidence that the Americans had caused any harm to the Chinese Trade Agency or its members.

7. It is strange that while the Embassy desire the Government of India to stop all Americans (and presumably other aliens) from entering the premises of the Chinese Trade Agency, they suggest that the guard posted there should not interrogate persons seeking admission into the Agency premises. To provide security, Government of India must insist that the guard check the identity of every person entering the premises of the Chinese Trade Agency. This is entirely a precautionary measure in the interests of security and safety of the Chinese Trade Agents’ establishment in Kalimpong. The Government of India regret that they cannot surrender their responsibility in this regard.

8. The Government of India would take this opportunity to state again that the views of the Chinese Embassy on the treatment given to the official organs of India in the Tibet Region of China are not in accordance with known facts. In fact, official organs of the Government of India in Tibet have been rendered virtually ineffective and the privileges and immunities assured them in the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 have been violated on numerous occasions. The Government of India have noted the Embassy’s reference to the Kashmiri Muslims in Tibet and are constrained to state that even on a matter of this nature, the authorities in the Tibet Region of China have adopted a harsh and arbitrary attitude. Instead of taking a sympathetic attitude to the plight of these Kashmiri Muslims, they have used intimidation and persecution to force them to accept the unilateral Chinese view that they have ceased to be Indians.

9. While always maintaining due regard for the principle of reciprocity in international relations, the Government of India cannot agree to a specially privileged position for the Chinese official organs in India. The Government of India would request the Embassy to insure that in the interest of the safety of its members the Trade Agency in Kalimpong should cooperate with the local authorities.

The Ministry avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 14 June 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the latter’s note No. M/209/60 have the honour to state as follows:—

1. The Government of India consider that the protective guard posted outside the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong would have failed in its duty had it allowed an unknown individual to enter the Agency premises by the rear gate. The guard had appropriately asked the visitor to go by the front gate. The Ministry have no doubt that in the circumstances the guard had carried out its duty in directing a stranger whose bona fides were not known to seek admission through the main entrance gate. As to what happened thereafter, there is no reason to doubt that the bean-curd seller had raised a row, and there was swift physical intervention from 3 members of the Chinese Trade Agency. It is interesting to note that the Embassy has not denied that the stranger in fact did obtain admission into the premises of the Chinese Trade Agency through the rear door despite the guard’s contrary directions. The Government of India are informed that Shri Maitra did not enter the premises of the Chinese Trade Agency nor did he offer any apology.

2. The Ministry would like to draw the attention of the Embassy to the grave consequences that might follow if there should be any further interference with the duties of the official guard posted outside the Chinese Trade Agency. Should the Trade Agency have any questions to ask or any protests to make, these should be delivered to the appropriate quarters.

3. Regarding delay in delivery of telegrams or omissions in telegrams addressed to the Chinese Trade Agency, Kalimpong, and the Embassy in New Delhi, the originals of the telegrams delayed or in which omissions occurred, should be sent to the appropriate authorities for investigation in accordance with the regulations of the Directorate of Indian Posts and Telegraphs. No such case has been received from the Chinese official organs in India for investigation.

4. The allegation that the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent, Mr. Lee Chih-ken was prevented by the sentry from entering the Trade Agency on December 27, 1959, has on investigation proved unfounded. As to the incident of January 21, 1960 when it is alleged that Mr. Lee and his interpreter were stopped in a car at the gate of the Agency, the facts are not known and an enquiry is being ordered. It would seem, however, from the Embassy’s note that the car was stopped probably to see whether there was any unknown stranger in it. If so, this was not objectionable and it cannot be construed therefrom that Mr. Lee was deliberately stopped.
5. In conclusion, the Ministry of External Affairs would express the hope that the Chinese official organs resident in India would cooperate with the local authorities of the Government of India to ensure the safety of their members.

The Ministry avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 16 August 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and in continuation of their Note dated June 14, 1960, have the honour to state as follows:

In its Note No. M/209/60, the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China had alleged that on January 21, 1960, when Mr. Lee Chih-ken, Deputy Trade Agent in Kalimpong, and his Interpreter were going back to the Agency in a car they were stopped at the gate of the Agency. As promised in the Indian Note of June 14, enquiries were made by the Government of India and the facts are as follows:

On January 21, 1960, at about 1200 hours, the sentry on duty at the main gate of the Chinese Trade Agency noticed that a motor vehicle with two occupants besides the driver was about to enter the Agency. In the discharge of his duty the sentry signalled the car to stop in order to find out if any unauthorised Indian or foreigner was entering the Agency premises. It may be remembered that when in the first week of December, 1959, two Americans entered the Agency compound it was alleged by the Embassy that their entry was deliberately connived at by the local authorities. The sentry after satisfying himself that an official of the Agency was in the car signalled it to enter the premises. There is no truth in the Embassy’s statement that the above incident drew more than 30 nearby wool workers and inhabitants to the scene of the incident. The Government of India consider that the action of the sentry in requiring the driver of the car to stop was in bona fide discharge of his duties and in order to ensure the security of the Chinese Trade Agency, and there is no legitimate ground for objection or protest on this score.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurance of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 9 September 1960

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and with reference to the Ministry's two notes dated June 14, 1960 and one note dated August 16, 1960, has the honour to state as follows:

Regarding the unwarranted restrictions imposed by the Darjeeling local authorities on the normal functioning of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, the Embassy has in its three notes and two memoranda previously handed over to the Ministry enumerated not a few indisputable facts. It is highly regrettable that the Indian Government not only did not give consideration to the representations formally made by the Embassy and issue instructions to the local authorities to remove these unwarranted restrictions, but, on the contrary, tried to shirk its responsibility by various untenable arguments and made groundless assertions and charges.

In its note the Ministry mentioned that "these unwarranted restrictions apparently refer to the protective guard posted outside the Trade Agency at Kalimpong," and considered that "the Chinese Trade Agency are anxious to have the guard rendered ineffective or have it withdrawn." The Embassy would like to point out that this assertion is entirely inconsistent with the fact. The fact is that in its previous notes and memoranda to the Ministry the Embassy has never raised objection to the matter of posting guards itself, nor has it made any request for the withdrawal of the guards. The question now is whether the guards posted at the gates of the Chinese Trade Agency are really carrying out the duties they should perform. It can be seen from the facts given by the Embassy that on the one hand unwarranted obstructions and harassments were imposed on the personnel of the Chinese Trade Agency and Chinese nationals entering or coming out of the Agency, while, on the other hand, Americans with ulterior motives were connived with in intruding into the compound of the Chinese Trade Agency on two successive occasions in disregard of the objection of the staff members of the Trade Agency. This gives one reason to suspect what the Indian side actually aimed at in adopting such an attitude. Similarly, it is extraordinary to describe the request for the removal of the harassments imposed on the Chinese Trade Agency's staff entering or coming out of the Agency as a request by the Agency for enjoying privileges. As is well known, the personnel of any foreign official organ have the right to freely enter or leave their own premises without being subjected to any restriction, however, the personnel of the Chinese Trade Agency and even the Deputy Trade Agent himself, have been on many occasions subjected to obstructions and harassments. The Embassy has in its previous notes stated time and again that under the present condition of military control, the guards posted by the Tibet local authorities of China for the security of the Indian Consulate-General at Lhasa have not placed any restriction on the personnel of the Indian Consulate-General and the Indian nationals entering or leaving the Consulate.

The Chinese Government is surprised at the allegation made by the Ministry in its note that “restrictions have been imposed even on the movement of the diplomatic and non-diplomatic members of the Indian Embassy in Peking” by China. The Chinese Government does not know that there has ever been any complaint made in this connection by the Indian Embassy, which, like all the other foreign missions in China, has been enjoying an equal treatment and has never been subjected to any discrimination. Likewise, the Tibet local authorities have always taken a friendly and cooperative attitude towards the various Indian official organs in the Tibet region of China. Since the Indian Government attaches importance to the principle of reciprocity, the Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will accord equal normal treatment to the Chinese official organs in India.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 27 September 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to its Note No. M/340/60, dated September 9, 1960.

2. The Government of India have examined the matter again in the light of the note from the Chinese Embassy. They are satisfied that the Guard outside the Trade Agency functions only with a view to ensure the protection of the Trade Agency. While in exercise of its functions, the Guard is obliged to take certain legitimate precautions to interrogate any person who cannot prima facie be recognised as belonging to the Trade Agency, the Guard carries strict instructions not to interfere in any way with the entry and exit of personnel belonging to the Trade Agency.

3. It may be added that there can be little doubt that the Chinese Embassy and Chinese posts in India enjoy far greater freedom of movement and functioning than is permitted to the Indian Missions in Peking or the Indian posts in other parts of China. From such incontrovertible information as is in their possession, Government of India cannot also accept the assertion contained in the Note that the local authorities in Tibet have taken a friendly and co-operative attitude to the various Indian officials and organs in the Tibet region of China.

4. The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and regarding the incident in which the Tibetan rebels who have fled to India openly held a meeting in Kalimpong to “observe” the first anniversary of the rebellion in Tibet, hereby lodges a serious protest with the Ministry as follows:

At 9:30 in the morning of March 10, 1960, over 500 reactionary Tibetan nobles, Tibetan rebels and Khamba rebel bandits, who have fled to India, and members of the so-called “Tibetan Association” in Kalimpong and the “Association of Tibetan India” openly held a meeting at the Tharpa Chholing Monastery to observe the first anniversary of the rebellion in Tibet. When these reactionary elements assembled for the meeting, and made demonstrations, they carried at the head of their processions, besides the Indian national flag, the so-called “Tibetan national flag” painted with lion and snow-covered mountains. At the meeting, Khemey Sonamwongdru, ring-leader of the Tibetan rebels and commander-in-chief of the former Tibetan army, and other representatives of the rebel bandits made speeches in succession, instigating the rebel bandits to continue their traitorous activities, and at the same time reactionary Tibetan songs were sung. After the meeting they demonstrated in processions along the main streets in Kalimpong, frantically shouted reactionary slogans such as “Ordure for the Hans”, “Communists go back” and “Long live Indo-Tibetan cooperation”, and put up many reactionary posters on the streets. They did not disperse until 1:30 in the afternoon. Not only the local authorities of India did not try to ban such anti-China activities, but the responsible persons of the police office attended the meeting themselves, and allowed the rebel bandits to continue their activities at the Kalimpong Town Hall on the afternoon of the same day. Such activities further went on in the evenings for four successive days. Obviously such an attitude taken by the local authorities of India is in grave violation of the assurance which has been given by the Indian Government that India by no means permits any activities on its territory directed against the People’s Republic of China. This is not in conformity with the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence, and seriously damages the friendly relations between China and India. The Embassy is, therefore, instructed to lodge a serious protest against the Indian local authorities’ act of connivance at the Tibetan rebel bandits to carry on activities against the People’s Republic of China and undermine the friendly relations between China and India, and the local officials’ taking part in the above-mentioned meeting, and demands that the Govt. of India take effective measures to prevent recurrence of similar incidents in the future.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 24th June, 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to its Note No. M/122/60, dated the 29th March, 1960, have the honour to reply as follows:

A meeting was held at the Tharpa Choling Monastery by a section of the Tibetan population of Kalimpong on the 10th March, 1960, for the purpose of offering prayers for the long life of the Dalai Lama. A substantial portion of the congregation consisted of Tibetan refugees, and during the meeting they gave expression to their feelings in a peaceful manner. The meeting was followed by a peaceful procession in the course of which some slogans were shouted. There were song and dance recitals at the Town Hall on the same afternoon, and elsewhere on the following days in order to raise money for the relief of Tibetan refugees.

Such demonstrations by sections of India's population are, as the Embassy of China must be aware, quite common and the authorities do not take any action against them unless a threat to law and order develops. The suggestion in the Chinese Note that Police officials attended the meeting is misconceived. The local Police were posted at the site of the meeting and along the route followed by the procession in pursuance of their duty to ensure that there was no breach of public peace. The statements made in the Note of the Chinese Embassy are not in accordance with facts and the Government of India feel bound to reject it.

The Ministry take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and with reference to the Ministry’s note No. F.1(4)EAD/60, dated June 25, 1960, has the honour to state as follows:

Regarding the incident in which the Tibetan rebels, who had fled to India, openly held a meeting in Kalimpong to “observe” the first anniversary of the rebellion in Tibet, the Embassy in its note of March 29, 1960 to the Ministry gave a detailed account of the facts of the incident which took place at the time. The Ministry in its reply note did not deny the relevant facts, but attempted to shirk its responsibility under some untenable pretexts, at which the Embassy cannot but express its deep regret.

As is well known, March 10, 1959, was the day when the Tibetan rebels started their rebellion. On the same day this year, the Tibetan rebels, who had fled to India, openly held a meeting to “observe” the day at the Tharpa Choling Monastery in Kalimpong. This is by no means an ordinary meeting for “offering prayers for the long life of the Dalai Lama” as described in the Ministry’s reply note, but is obviously a meeting of political character. This can be proved not only by the date of the meeting, but also by the speeches of the ringleaders of the Tibetan rebels present at the meeting as well as the slogans shouted and the posters pasted up during the demonstration following the meeting. Not only the Indian local authorities did not prevent in advance these activities carried out on Indian territory openly directed against the People’s Republic of China, but the responsible persons of the Indian local police office who were then on the spot deliberately connived at them instead of taking any action against them. This cannot but be a grave violation of the assurance previously made by the Indian Government that India by no means permits any activities on its territory directed against the People’s Republic of China. In its reply note, however, the Indian Government considered the incident to be “quite common”, and tried to shirk its responsibility with the so-called “peaceful manner”, “peaceful procession”, etc. as a pretext. The Embassy considers that such an assertion is unacceptable.

Tibet is a part of China’s territory. The Chinese Government cannot permit any one to interfere in China’s internal affairs on questions pertaining to the Tibet region. The occurrence of the abovementioned incident is harmful to the relations between China and India. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will attach importance to Sino-Indian friendship and adopt effective measures to carry out, in earnest, its previous assurance that Indian by no means permits any activities on its territory directed against the People’s Republic of China.

The Embassy avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurance of its highest consideration.
Informal note handed over in New Delhi by the Foreign Secretary to Mr. Chiao Kuan-Hua, Assistant Minister for Foreign Affairs of China, 25 April 1960

1. Bhutan and Sikkim.

Under India's Treaties with Bhutan and Sikkim, Government of India is clearly responsible for the external relations of these two States. This has been pointed out to the Government of the People's Republic of China, as also the fact that the question relating to the northern boundaries of Sikkim and Bhutan have to be considered at the same time as the boundary between India and China.

Our concern is all the greater because persistent reports have reached us over a period of months that propaganda organs as well as senior Chinese officials in the Tibet region have been saying that China intends incorporating Sikkim and Bhutan like Ladakh into the Chinese People's Republic. On some occasions it was even stated that China might take military steps to occupy these territories. It is hoped that in the interest of restoring Sino-Indian relations and assuaging apprehensions, India's responsibility in respect of the external relations of Sikkim and Bhutan would be fully understood and respected and such propaganda would be stopped.

2. Difficulties in the implementation of the 1954 Agreement regarding the Tibet Region.

Indian official representatives in the Tibet region as well as Indian nationals continue to suffer unnecessary and crippling restrictions even though the privileges are guaranteed on a reciprocal basis by the 1954 Agreement.

Following are some examples of such restrictions:–

(i) Accommodation Difficulties

(a) Gyantse.

Ever since the buildings of the Agency were washed away in 1954, we have been trying to negotiate with Chinese authorities for the reconstruction of the Agency premises. We even offered to construct protective works along the river embankment at our own expense and to send our Chief Engineer to explain that our proposals would in no way damage the public highway and bridge in the Gyantse township. Later, we even offered to surrender the area along the river bank if an equivalent area could be provided on the other side of the existing Agency site. The lease for the land on which the Agency was located is valid till 1971; but as a measure of goodwill we agreed to sign a new lease. Despite these offers and many representations no satisfactory agreement has been reached or facilities provided to resolve the difficulties. The Government of the People's Republic of China in a recent note have suggested our resuming reconstruction of the premises; but no lease has yet been finalised. Government of India are anxious that the lease for at least 19.13 acres of land (which is the area left over from the original site) should be concluded to enable reconstructions to be started. Unless the lease is signed and this area, largely on the original site, made available, it would not be possible for the Government of India to embark on large-scale and expensive construction measures. This request is fully in accordance with the provisions of the 1954 Agreement.

We also hope that pending reconstruction, the local authorities would help in improving the temporary accommodation facilities of the Agency.

(b) Gartok.—A lease deed for the area was at last signed in 1959. We request that the Chinese authorities will give us active co-operation to enable us to start the construction of the Agency buildings this season.

(c) Functioning of the Trade Agencies.

Very strict restrictions have been imposed on the freedom of movement and functioning of the Indian Consulate General in Lhasa and the Indian Trade Agencies in Yatung, Gyantse and in Western Tibet. In contrast with the facilities enjoyed by the Chinese posts in India our officers are afforded no opportunity to move around or to have any contact even of a cultural nature with local nationals. Despite the provisions of the Agreement, in 1959 the Indian Trade Agent in Western Tibet was not only greatly delayed, but was not even able to visit the specified trade marts.

The Agencies have also experienced a variety of small but irritating difficulties in their functioning in such matters as the hiring of transport and communication facilities. Local servants have been discouraged from serving in the Indian posts.

(d) Indo-Tibetan Trade.

The traditional trade has suffered serious decline largely because the customary export of wool, salt, etc. is not being facilitated. Traders are not allowed to contact their traditional trading partners. Moreover, no remittance facilities are being provided to enable Indian traders to repatriate their legitimate profits. Either bank drafts are not provided at all or, if they are, under restrictive conditions, the rate of commission is exorbitantly high. The traders, especially in Western Tibet are also experiencing difficulties in obtaining premises, hiring transport and in realising old debts.

It is hoped that the Government of the People's Republic of China would ease these difficulties and continue facilities for the traditional exchange in accordance with the 1954 Agreement.

(e) Pilgrims.

Pilgrims were discouraged from proceeding to Kailash and Mansarover last year. In view of the sanctity attached to these places, it is hoped that necessary facilities to Indian pilgrims would be provided in accordance with the provisions of the 1954 Agreement.
(f) Indian nationals.

According to our information, about 125 families of Kashmiri Muslims residing in the Lhasa area and a few hundred Ladakhi Lamas now in Tibet region are extremely anxious to return to India. Under Indian laws, regardless of the period of their residence abroad, these persons of Indian origin are entitled to Indian nationality. We are not aware that they have accepted Chinese nationality under any law promulgated by the Government of the People's Republic of China. Even if they have qualified for Chinese nationality in accordance with international usage governing Dual Nationality, persons of Indian origin should be given the option to return to India if they so wish.

This is fully in accordance with the stand of the Government of the People's Republic of China in respect of persons of Chinese origin in Indonesia, and with the principles embodied in the Treaty of Dual Nationality signed after Bandung. It is also in accordance with the arrangement agreed between China and Nepal with regard to persons of mixed parentage residing in the Tibet region.

Apart from Indians wishing to leave Tibet, there are about 22 Indian nationals reported to be under arrest. According to the Agreement, they should have been treated as foreigners and in any case have been provided with opportunity to seek the help of the local Indian representatives.

In respect of all these matters pertaining to the 1954 Agreement, one or more representations have been made to the Government of the People's Republic of China, explaining the Indian requests in detail during the last year.

(3) Enclaves.

Apart from the above, it is also hoped that the Government of the People's Republic of China would respect the sovereign rights of the Government of Jammu and Kashmir and therefore of the Government of India over MINSAR in Western Tibet. Similarly, in accordance with the representation made last year, the control of Bhutan should be restored over the Bhutan enclaves near Kailash in Western Tibet.

It is also requested that Sikkimese nationals who have been residing in certain estates in the Chumbi Valley, and are traditionally treated as distinct from Tibetans might continue to receive the treatment which has been traditionally accorded to them and allowed facilities of movement to Sikkim.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 17 October 1960

On the 4th October 1960 an I.A.F. Hunter aircraft took off from Ambala at 0932 hours on a routine training flight. It was in normal contact with its base until 0954 hours when it was reported at a bearing of 080° from Ambala. Since then the aircraft has been reported missing and despite repeated searches no trace of the aircraft has been found. There was only one occupant of the aircraft, the Pilot Flt. Lt. K. P. Singh.

2. While all Indian aircraft carry strict instructions not to violate Chinese air-space, it is considered possible that owing to navigational error or mechanical failure the aircraft may have strayed and possibly crashed in Chinese territory. The Government of India would appreciate if the Chinese Government would instruct investigations to be made in the Western Tibet region in case any information pertaining to the missing Indian aircraft or the Pilot has been reported by the local authorities concerned.
NOTES, MEMORANDA AND LETTERS EXCHANGED BETWEEN
THE GOVERNMENTS OF INDIA AND CHINA

NOVEMBER 1960-NOVEMBER 1961

WHITE PAPER No. V

UNIVERSITY OF DELHI
LIBRARIES

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

Price Re. 00.50 nP.
On 14 November, 1960, the Prime Minister presented to Parliament the Fourth White Paper containing the notes, memoranda and letters exchanged between the Government of India and the Government of the People's Republic of China since March 1960. This White Paper contains the notes, memoranda and letters exchanged between the two Governments since 9 November 1960. It also contains four earlier notes which had not been included in the previous White Paper.

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS,
NEW DELHI
CONTENTS

Border issues and incidents

1. Note of the Indian Government, 2 December 1960        Page 1
2. Note of the Chinese Government, 10, December 1960     2
3. Note of the Chinese Government, 19 December 1960      4
4. Note of the Chinese Government, 30 December 1960      5
7. Note of the Indian Government, 13 April, 1961         8
9. Note of the Indian Government, 6 May 1961             10
10. Note of the Indian Government, 6 May 1961            11
11. Note of the Chinese Government, 23 May 1961          12
15. Note of the Chinese Government, 21 August 1961       16
17. Note of the Chinese Government, 2 November 1961      18
18. Note of the Indian Government, 15 November 1961      19

Sino-Indian boundary dispute

22. Note of the Chinese Government, 4 May 1961           25
23. Note of the Indian Government, 15 June 1961          27
25. Note of the Chinese Government, 6 August 1961        34
27. Note of the Indian Government, 19 September 1961     37

Territorial air space

29. Note of the Chinese Government, 10 December 1960     39
32. Note of the Indian Government, 29 April 1961         42
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Note of the</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>34.</td>
<td>Chinese Government, 2 June 1961</td>
<td>2 June 1961</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>41.</td>
<td>Indian Government, 9 November 1961</td>
<td>9 November 1961</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Treatment of Indian representatives and Nationals

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Note of the</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>42.</td>
<td>Indian Government, 26 November 1960</td>
<td>26 November 1960</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>43.</td>
<td>Chinese Government, 10 December 1960</td>
<td>10 December 1960</td>
<td>60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44.</td>
<td>Chinese Government, 12 December 1960</td>
<td>12 December 1960</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>46.</td>
<td>Indian Government, 7 January 1961</td>
<td>7 January 1961</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>47.</td>
<td>Indian Government, 28 January 1961</td>
<td>28 January 1961</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>52.</td>
<td>Chinese Government, 16 May 1961</td>
<td>16 May 1961</td>
<td>78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>54.</td>
<td>Indian Government, 5 June 1961</td>
<td>5 June 1961</td>
<td>80</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>57.</td>
<td>Indian Government, 26 August 1961</td>
<td>26 August 1961</td>
<td>86</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>58.</td>
<td>Indian Government, 31 August 1961</td>
<td>31 August 1961</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>60.</td>
<td>Indian Government, 10 November 1961</td>
<td>10 November 1961</td>
<td>91</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Alleged ill-treatment of Chinese Nationals in India

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>63.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 8 November 1960</td>
<td>8 November 1960</td>
<td>102</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>64.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 8 November 1960</td>
<td>8 November 1960</td>
<td>103</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
65. Note of the Chinese Government, 6 December 1960
66. Note of the Indian Government, 20 December 1960
67. Note of the Chinese Government, 3 January 1961
68. Note of the Chinese Government, 2 February 1961
69. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 3 February 1961
70. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 7 February 1961
71. Note of the Indian Government, 11 February 1961
73. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 8 March 1961
74. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 8 March 1961
75. Note of the Chinese Government, 13 March 1961
76. Note of the Indian Government, 17 March 1961
77. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 21 March 1961
78. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 2 May 1961
79. Note of the Government of West Bengal
80. Note of the Indian Government, 24 May 1961
81. Note of the Chinese Government, 22 June 1961
82. Note of the Chinese Government, 18 August 1961
83. Note of the Indian Government, 24 November 1961

The Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong

84. Note of the Indian Government, 1 June 1961
85. Note of the Chinese Government, 21 June 1961
86. Memorandum of the Indian Government, 10 August 1961
91. Note of the Indian Government, 28 August 1961
92. Note of the Chinese Government, 22 September 1961
95. Memorandum of the Indian Government, 7 October 1961
Alleged publication of Anti-Chinese news by Indian Embassy

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Note Details</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>96.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 27 June 1961</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>97.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 5 July 1961</td>
<td>144</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>98.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 23 September 1961</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Miscellaneous

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Note Details</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>100.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Indian Government, 18 October 1960</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>102.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 30 December 1960</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>103.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 10 February 1961</td>
<td>152</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>104.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 18 March 1961</td>
<td>153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>105.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 9 May 1961</td>
<td>154</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>106.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 24 June 1961</td>
<td>155</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>107.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 12 August 1961</td>
<td>156</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>108.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 10 November 1961</td>
<td>157</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 2 December 1960

The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and has the honour to refer to the Note dated October 20, 1960 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China to the Indian Embassy in China.

2. The Government of India have made a further inquiry regarding the intrusion by a Chinese armed patrol on September 22, 1960 into Sikkim near Jelepla Pass and are satisfied that facts as communicated to the Embassy in the Ministry of External Affairs Note of September 26, 1960 are correct. The Government of India would, therefore, repeat their request to the Chinese Government to take steps to prevent such violation of Sikkim territory in future.

3. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking to the Embassy of India in China, 10 December 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the note that the Indian Ministry of External Affairs delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India on October 24, 1960, has the honour to state as follows:

2. In its note the Indian Government, while admitting that the Chinese inhabitant Kiayang-geltsen is now still retained unwarrantedly by the Indian authorities concerned, attempts to describe armed Indian personnel's intrusion into Chinese territory to kidnap a Chinese citizen as Kiayang-geltsen's going to India to seek asylum. The Chinese Government must point out that Kiayang-geltsen was kidnapped from Kechilang pasture within Chinese territory by armed Indian personnel who had illegally intruded into that area. Here the question of so-called asylum does not exist at all. A Chinese inhabitant named Chien Tseng of the Le village who was with Kiayang-geltsen at the time confirmed that Kiayang-geltsen was suddenly kidnapped by the trespassing Indian troops when he was at lunch in a villager's house in Kechilang pasture. The Chinese Government once again demand that the Indian Government order the authorities concerned to release immediately the Chinese inhabitant Kiayang-geltsen.

3. The Chinese Government has always stated that Wu-je is Chinese territory and has always been under the jurisdiction of Daba Dzong of the Tibet region of China. After a situation of armed forces of China and India confronting each other arose for the first time in Wu-je in 1955, the Chinese Government, with a view to avoiding armed clashes, took the initiative to propose that both sides should refrain from stationing troops at Wu-je, pending the settlement of the dispute through negotiations. This was done entirely out of the desire of maintaining tranquillity on the border, and by no means implied any change in sovereignty over this area. Therefore, as said in the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, when in 1958 the Indian representatives put forward a proposal that even civil administrative personnel of the two sides should not be deputed to the area, the Chinese Government did not agree to this proposal. In disregard of the stand of the Chinese Government, the Indian Government in 1958 and 1959 repeatedly sent official personnel into China's Wu-je area. This could not but be regarded as attempts to change the status quo of this area belonging to China. Hence, the Chinese Government more than once lodged protests. Under these circumstances, the assertion that on April 24, 1958 (it should be 1959) Mr. Ho Ying, Deputy Director of the First Asian Department of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said that not sending troops did not affect the Indian side's sending officials to Wu-je is obviously a distortion of the Chinese Government's stand as presented by Deputy Director Ho Ying.

4. The Chinese Government must point out that, regarding the incident of June 3 referred to in the note of the Indian Government of July 30, 1960, in which more than 25 armed Chinese soldiers allegedly crossed the so-called McMahon Line, although nearly two months had passed before the Indian Government raised it to the Chinese Government and although it attacked the Chinese Government before the facts were looked into and before a reply was made by the Chinese Government, the Chinese Government still made serious investigations and informed the Indian Government of the results of the investigations. However, in its note the Indian Government, in disregard of the facts furnished by the Chinese Government, still persists in its original charge without any basis. The Chinese Government can only express its regret at this.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking to the Embassy of India in China, 19 December 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and has the honour to state as follows:

The allegation of the Indian Government that an armed Chinese patrol entered the territory of Sikkim on September 22, 1960, has been proved untrue through investigation by the Chinese Government. The Chinese Government already gave an unequivocal answer to this effect in its note of October 20, 1960. Nevertheless, in its note of December 2, the Indian Government still clung to its original allegation without any basis. The Chinese Government cannot but express regret at this.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 30 December 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the incident that Tibetan rebel bandits who had fled to the south of the so-called McMahon Line intruded into China's Tibet, made harassment and kidnapped local Chinese inhabitants, has the honour to state as follows:

The Chinese Government has received confirmed reports that at about 23:00 hours on November 10, 1960, a band of armed Tibetan rebel bandits, numbering 100 or so, intruded from south of the so-called McMahon Line into Pangtse Village (93° 47' E, 29° 1' N), Milin County, in the south eastern part of China's Tibet region. Most of the bandits carried pistols and some of them were in disguise. Among them were Paimalamje and Lapadenju, reactionary former chieftains of the Pangtse and Bajang villages, who had fled to Ba Cha Shi Ri, south of the so-called McMahon Line, after the rebellion in Tibet in the spring of 1959. Having surrounded Pangtse village and made harassment for about two hours, the rebel bandits forcibly kidnapped 42 able-bodied youth and men from that village and fled south of the so-called McMahon Line via the Lo Pass.

The Chinese Government is surprised at the fact that the Indian Government should have permitted Tibetan rebel bandits who had fled to the south of the so-called McMahon Line to carry arms and even connived at their intrusion into China's Tibet to carry out harassment and kidnap peaceful inhabitants. Such planned activities of harassment and sabotage by this band of Tibetan rebel bandits have caused tension on the border, have breached the peace and tranquillity of the border area and may lead to serious consequences.
In view of this, the Chinese Government lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government and demands that the Indian Government immediately take due and effective measures to impose restrictions on those Tibetan rebel bandits and require them to release at once the 42 Chinese inhabitants kidnapped from Pangtsevillage.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and with reference to two incidents of Indian armed personnel intruding into Chinese territory has the honour to state as follows:

1. About 1800 hours on 26th November 1960 four Indian policemen carrying arms intruded into Pao-la (approximately 88° 34 minutes E, 28° 07 minutes N) in Chinese territory by crossing Kailu Pass from the direction of Sikkim. They threatened the local inhabitants with arms and seized a shotgun from PENG TO a herdsman. The four Indian policemen returned to Sikkim by the same route about 1830 hours on the same day.

2. About 1200 hours on 29th December 1960 three Indian military men carrying arms intruded into Sheralungma pasture (approximately 79° 40 minutes E, 32° 48 minutes N) of Kiah-Aghsiang Rudok Dzong in China's Ari District on horseback made stealthy observations with binoculars fired their guns and then returned to India.

The Chinese Government feel surprised at the repeated intrusions of Indian armed personnel into China's territory and their acts of threatening and robbing Chinese inhabitants. This cannot but be regarded as deliberate encroachment on the territory and sovereignty of China. Against this the Chinese Government lodges a protest with the Government of India and demands that it takes effective measures to prevent the recurrence of similar incidents in future.

The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 30 March 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and have the honour to refer to the note dated December 10, 1960, received by His Excellency the Indian Ambassador in Peking.

2. As has already been intimated in the note presented by the Ministry of External Affairs to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India on October 24, 1960, there is no basis for the allegation that a Chinese national was kidnapped by an Indian patrol from the Chinese territory. The Chinese national whose name has been mentioned by the Government of China has repeatedly stated that he had come to seek refuge in India and that he was not prepared to go back to China.

3. The Government of India have throughout maintained that Bara Hoti is part of India and this fact was indisputably substantiated with a mass of details during the discussions between Indian and Chinese officials in 1958 and more recently in the officials' discussions which took place last year. On the other hand, the Chinese Government produced no clear topographical detail of the area, much less any material evidence to prove their contention. Nevertheless, in order to safeguard against any armed clash, the Government of India, in a reciprocal understanding with the Government of China, have refrained from sending any armed personnel to Bara Hoti plain for a number of years now. The despatch of civil administrative personnel is a different matter altogether. In the absence of any agreement not to send civilian officials to the area the Government of India cannot agree that there has been any change in the status quo prevalent in the area. The Government of India must reserve their right to exercise their sovereignty in Bara Hoti in the traditional manner.

4. In regard to the intrusion by 25 armed Chinese soldiers into Indian territory on June 3, 1960, the Government of India cannot but express their surprise that the Chinese Government should persist in claiming that the local working personnel of Hsiao of Tsona Dzong merely lost their way into Indian territory while in search for firewood. Facts do not sustain this theory of unintended and innocent intrusion into Indian territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 13 April 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Note No. (60)/First Asian/No. 1315, dated December 30, 1960, presented by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China to the Counsellor of the Indian Embassy in Peking, Shri K. M. Kannampilly, have the honour to state that the Government of India have thoroughly investigated the allegation contained in the Note mentioned above. As a result of the investigations, they are satisfied that there was no evidence of any person of Tibetan origin going into Tibet from Indian territory and compelling other Tibetans to flee back into India against their will. The Government of India have throughout taken effective steps to disarm all Tibetan refugees coming into Indian territory and prevent them from using Indian territory as a base for hostile activity. The Government of India firmly repudiate the insinuation that they connived at so-called "armed bandits" going across into Tibet or compulsorily detaining any Tibetans within India against their wishes. No Tibetan or Chinese nationals in India are prevented from returning to their homeland should they so wish. On the other hand, India, having granted asylum to those refugees, cannot force them to return to China.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note delivered by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India on March 30, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:

Regarding the intrusion into the Chinese territory of Wu-je by Indian official personnel, the intrusion into the Kechilang pasture and kidnapping Chinese inhabitant Kiayang-geltsen by armed Indian personnel and the allegation that 25 Chinese soldiers entered into Indian territory, the Foreign Ministry, in its notes to the Embassy, dated August 27 and December 10, 1960, has fully explained the truth of the related facts and the stand of the Chinese Government. The Chinese Government cannot agree to the various allegations inconsistent with the facts made by the Indian Government in its note, and cannot but express regret at them.

The Foreign Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China with reference to the Note, dated February 25, 1961, presented by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs to Shri K. M. Kannampilly, Counsellor of the Embassy of India, Peking, have the honour to say that the Government of India have carefully inquired into the alleged incidents of November 26, 1960, and December 29, 1960.

2. These investigations have established, to the full satisfaction of the Government of India that these allegations of incursions by Indian armed personnel into Chinese territory have absolutely no foundation in fact. The Government of India are constrained to observe that the Chinese Government appear to have been misled by unfounded assertions by irresponsible junior officials or local elements.

3. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 6 May 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and have the honour to bring to their notice the following intrusion by armed Chinese personnel:

On April 20, 1961, three Chinese personnel carrying arms were detected in Sikkim territory near Jelapla. As soon as they realised that their unauthorised presence in the territory of Sikkim had been detected they withdrew.

The Government of India once again lodge a protest against the failure to respect the boundaries of Sikkim and renew their request that the Government of China instruct the subordinate authorities to ensure that such violation of Sikkim territory does not recur. Intrusions of this kind, even if brief, could easily lead to serious incidents.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 20 June 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China, and with reference to Note dated May 23, 1961, handed over to the Indian Embassy in Peking by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, have the honour to state as follows:

The Government of India are surprised that despite their reply dated 13th April, 1961 which refutes on the basis of careful investigations allegations regarding intrusion into the Tibet region of China and kidnapping of Chinese inhabitants, the Government of the People's Republic of China have returned to the same charge.

As the Government of the People's Republic of China are no doubt aware refugees from the Tibet region of China have come, and continue to come, to India of their own free will. What is more if any of them wish to return to China, they are free to do so. No Tibetan refugee is being held by any one in India, either Indian or Tibetan. If the intention of the Government of the People's Republic of China is that the Government of India should exercise force or pressure on certain Tibetan refugees to compel them to return, this cannot be done under the internationally accepted principle of asylum.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 6 May 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and have the honour to bring to their notice the following intrusion by armed Chinese personnel:

On April 20, 1961, three Chinese personnel carrying arms were detected in Sikkim territory near Jelapla. As soon as they realised that their unauthorised presence in the territory of Sikkim had been detected they withdrew.

The Government of India once again lodge a protest against the failure to respect the boundaries of Sikkim and renew their request that the Government of China instruct the subordinate authorities to ensure that such violation of Sikkim territory does not recur. Intrusions of this kind, even if brief, could easily lead to serious incidents.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 20 June 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China, and with reference to Note dated May 23, 1961, handed over to the Indian Embassy in Peking by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, have the honour to state as follows:

The Government of India are surprised that despite their reply dated 13th April, 1961 which refutes on the basis of careful investigations allegations regarding intrusion into the Tibet region of China and kidnapping of Chinese inhabitants, the Government of the People's Republic of China have returned to the same charge.

As the Government of the People's Republic of China are no doubt aware refugees from the Tibet region of China have come, and continue to come, to India of their own free will. What is more if any of them wish to return to China, they are free to do so. No Tibetan refugee is being held by any one in India, either Indian or Tibetan. If the intention of the Government of the People's Republic of China is that the Government of India should exercise force or pressure on certain Tibetan refugees to compel them to return, this cannot be done under the internationally accepted principle of asylum.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 5 August 1961.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China present its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the Note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs handed over to the Chinese Embassy in India on May 6, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:

Regarding the incident referred to in the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in which three Chinese personnel carrying arms allegedly intruded into Sikkim territory near Jalepla on April 20, 1961, the Chinese Government has satisfied itself, after careful investigation, that no intrusion by any Chinese personnel carrying arms occurred at the above-mentioned time and place. Therefore the Chinese Government refuses to accept the protest of the Indian Government and expresses its regret at such a totally groundless charge made by the Indian Government.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 2 November 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs on September 12, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:

Being unable to persist in denying flatly the indisputable fact that it connived at the intrusion and harassment of a Chinese border area by Tibetan rebel bandits and their kidnapping of Chinese inhabitants, the Indian Government went so far as to argue in its note that it "could have no knowledge of the happenings in Chinese territory". This effort is futile. In its past notes, the Chinese Government already presented facts in detail showing that that band of rebel bandits had their base established in an area south of the so-called McMahon Line illegally controlled by India at present. They intruded into China's Pangtse village from there and abducted local Chinese inhabitants to that base area. It is obvious that the Indian Government should bear unshirkable responsibility for that incident. Now, in its note, while brushing aside the concrete fact and the Chinese Government's proper demands, the Indian Government even counter-charge the Chinese Government with attempting to implicate India in China's internal affairs. The Chinese Government once again expressed its deep regret at such an unreasonable attitude and manner of the Indian Government.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 5 August 1961.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China present its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the Note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs handed over to the Chinese Embassy in India on May 6, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:

Regarding the incident referred to in the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in which three Chinese personnel carrying arms allegedly intruded into Sikkim territory near Jalepla on April 20, 1961, the Chinese Government has satisfied itself, after careful investigation, that no intrusion by any Chinese personnel carrying arms occurred at the above-mentioned time and place. Therefore the Chinese Government refuses to accept the protest of the Indian Government and expresses its regret at such a totally groundless charge made by the Indian Government.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 2 November 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs on September 12, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:

Being unable to persist in denying flatly the indisputable fact that it connived at the intrusion and harassment of a Chinese border area by Tibetan rebel bandits and their kidnapping of Chinese inhabitants, the Indian Government went so far as to argue in its note that it "could have no knowledge of the happenings in Chinese territory".
This effort is futile. In its past notes, the Chinese Government already presented facts in detail showing that that band of rebel bandits had their base established in an area south of the so-called McMahon Line illegally controlled by India at present. They intruded into China's Pangtse village from there and abducted local Chinese inhabitants to that base area. It is obvious that the Indian Government should bear unshirkable responsibility for that incident. Now, in its note, while brushing aside the concrete fact and the Chinese Government's proper demands, the Indian Government even counter-charge the Chinese Government with attempting to implicate India in China's internal affairs. The Chinese Government once again expressed its deep regret at such an unreasonable attitude and manner of the Indian Government.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 15 November 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to Note No. (61) Pu Yi Tzu No. 877, dated November 2, 1961, sent to the address of the Embassy of India in Peking by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs have the honour to state that mere repetition to baseless allegations does not help to establish a case where none exists. It is the considered view of the Government of India, after careful investigations, that the incident to which the Chinese Note has referred is a fabrication. However it would serve no useful purpose to prolong a fruitless disputation in a case where the two Parties are unable to agree on the facts. It is extraordinary that in re-stating its case over an alleged intrusion from Indian territory the Chinese Government should bring up the issue of the so-called McMahon Line and insinuate that India is in illegal possession of her own territory south of that line. By multiplying imaginary charges all that the Chinese Government has so far succeeded in proving is its lack of respect for the territorial integrity of India ample evidence of which already exists in the territorial aggression committed by China in India's Ladakh. Barren charges will not cover up these acts of unlawful occupation of Indian territory by Chinese forces.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
and in a spirit of mutual understanding and mutual accommodation, so as to seek a reasonable settlement of the boundary question. This has been the consistent stand of the Chinese Government in the past and present, nor will it change in the future. The Chinese Government believes that, by this approach, the entire boundary question between China and India can be settled and, along with it, the question of the tri-junction of China, India and Burma will be finally decided.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 15 November 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to Note No. (61) Pu Yi Tzu No. 877, dated November 2, 1961, sent to the address of the Embassy of India in Peking by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs have the honour to state that mere repetition to baseless allegations does not help to establish a case where none exists. It is the considered view of the Government of India, after careful investigations, that the incident to which the Chinese Note has referred is a fabrication. However it would serve no useful purpose to prolong a fruitless disputation in a case where the two Parties are unable to agree on the facts. It is extraordinary that in re-stating its case over an alleged intrusion from Indian territory the Chinese Government should bring up the issue of the so-called McMahon Line and insinuate that India is in illegal possession of her own territory south of that line. By multiplying imaginary charges all that the Chinese Government has so far succeeded in proving is its lack of respect for the territorial integrity of India ample evidence of which already exists in the territorial aggression committed by China in India's Ladakh. Barren charges will not cover up these acts of unlawful occupation of Indian territory by Chinese forces.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
and in a spirit of mutual understanding and mutual accommodation, so as to seek a reasonable settlement of the boundary question. This has been the consistent stand of the Chinese Government in the past and present, nor will it change in the future. The Chinese Government believes that, by this approach, the entire boundary question between China and India can be settled and, along with it, the question of the tri-junction of China, India and Burma will be finally decided.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 30 March 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and, with reference to the Memorandum of the Chinese Government dated the 21st February, 1961, have the honour to state as follows:

1. The Government of India are surprised at the statement that the maps attached to the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty do not show the western extremity of the boundary between Burma and China as lying at the Diphu Pass. The first sheet of the Chinese maps attached to the Boundary Treaty, and explicitly captioned the "Map showing the Entire Boundary Between Burma and China", shows the alignment, proceeding westwards, from a point approximately Long. 98° 18' and Lat. 27° 36' to a point approximately Long. 97° 20' and Lat. 28° 9' 30"; and this line is shown as terminating at the Diphu Pass. This alignment shown on the map is clearly in accordance with Articles 5 and 7 of the Boundary Treaty, which specifically define the boundary up to the western extremity. It is obvious, therefore, that the Diphu Pass, and not any point either north or south of it, was delineated as the western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary. Indeed, Section 3 of Article 7 places beyond any doubt the fact that the Diphu Pass marks the western extremity:

"The alignment of the entire boundary line between the two countries described in this Article and the location of the temporary boundary marks erected by both sides during joint survey are shown on the 1/250,000 maps indicating the entire boundary and on the 1/50,000 maps of certain areas, which are attached to the present Treaty."

2. The western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary must perforce touch the boundary of India; and this determines the meeting-point of the Sino-Burmese, Indo-Burmese and India-China boundaries. The western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary is, therefore, the tri-junction of India, Burma and China.

3. The Government of India have already furnished to the Government of People's Republic of China precise indication of the traditional boundary in the eastern sector of the India-China boundary. The boundary was confirmed in the Instrument of Agreement between the Indian and the Tibetan plenipotentiaries when the so-called McMahon Line was delineated in respect of the eastern sector of India as well as the northern part of the Sino-Burmese boundary, and which has been accepted as the traditional boundary for north Burma. The official maps of the Government of India which showed this alignment were never disputed until September, 1959 by the Government of China and were further acknowledged.
settlement of the question of the boundary between them. So far as the question of the boundary between China and India is concerned, the Chinese Government has also always been willing, in accordance with the same principles, to reach a fair and reasonable settlement with the Indian Government and thereby to define the specific location of the tri-junction of China, India and Burma. It is regrettable that this friendly and reasonable desire of the Chinese Government has never received a corresponding response from the Indian Government. The Indian Government in its note of March 30, 1961 even openly stated that it could not accept that the boundary between China and India was a matter for negotiation. This attitude of the Indian Government of refusing to negotiate and trying to impose its unilaterally claimed alignment on China is in actuality refusal to settle the boundary question.

The Indian Government's charge that the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty and its attached maps which show the Diphu Pass as a dividing point of the boundary between China and Burma have an adverse implication on the territorial integrity of India, and its allegation that the tri-junction of China, India and Burma should be five miles north of the Diphu Pass are totally untenable. The only so-called basis of the Indian Government is still the so-called McMahon Line which is unlawful and invalid, and which was created single-handedly by British imperialism. Such basis has long been strongly refuted by the Chinese Government in the correspondence and talks between the two countries. Moreover, the Indian Government attempted to utilize the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty to back up this unlawful line; this attempt will also not succeed. The unshakable fact remains that it is only the boundary line running along the southern foot of the Himalayas, as consistently pointed out by the Chinese Government, which is the true traditional customary line of the boundary between China and India in the eastern sector. According to this line, the traditional tri-junction of China, India and Burma is not only not at a point five miles north of the Diphu Pass, as alleged by the Indian Government, nor at the Diphu Pass itself, but is obviously located far south of the Diphu Pass.

The Chinese Government, which has made consistent efforts to develop Sino-Indian friendly relations on the basis of the Five Principles, has always been willing to settle the boundary question between China and India through friendly negotiations in a spirit of mutual understanding and mutual accommodation, and to define jointly with the Governments of Burma and India the exact location of the tri-junction of the three countries. However, it must be pointed out that, so long as the Indian Government does not give up its attitude of refusing to negotiate and trying to impose its views on others, the Chinese Government will absolutely not retreat an inch from its stand on the questions of the Sino-Indian boundary and of the tri-junction of China, Burma and India. The Indian Government will never succeed in its unreasonable tangling.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 30 March 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and, with reference to the Memorandum of the Chinese Government dated the 21st February, 1961, have the honour to state as follows:

1. The Government of India are surprised at the statement that the maps attached to the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty do not show the western extremity of the boundary between Burma and China as lying at the Diphu Pass. The first sheet of the Chinese maps attached to the Boundary Treaty, and explicitly captioned the "Map showing the Entire Boundary Between Burma and China", shows the alignment, proceeding westwards, from a point approximately Long. 98° 18' and Lat. 27° 36' to a point approximately Long.
97° 20' and Lat. 28° 9' 30"; and this line is shown as terminating at the Diphu Pass. This alignment shown on the map is clearly in accordance with Articles 5 and 7 of the Boundary Treaty, which specifically define the boundary up to the western extremity". It is obvious, therefore, that the Diphu Pass, and not any point either north or south of it, was delineated as the western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary. Indeed, Section 3 of Article 7 places beyond any doubt the fact that the Diphu Pass marks the western extremity:

"The alignment of the entire boundary line between the two countries described in this Article and the location of the temporary boundary marks erected by both sides during joint survey are shown on the 1/250,000 maps indicating the entire boundary and on the 1/50,000 maps of certain areas, which are attached to the present Treaty."

2. The western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary must perforce touch the boundary of India; and this determines the meeting-point of the Sino-Burmese, Indo-Burmese and India-China boundaries. The western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary is, therefore, the tri-junction of India, Burma and China.

3. The Government of India have already furnished to the Government of People's Republic of China precise indication of the traditional boundary in the eastern sector of the India-China boundary. The boundary was confirmed in the Instrument of Agreement between the Indian and the Tibetan plenipotentiaries when the so-called McMahon Line was delineated in respect of the eastern sector of India as well as the northern part of the Sino-Burmese boundary, and which has been accepted as the traditional boundary for north Burma. The official maps of the Government of India which showed this alignment were never disputed until September, 1959 by the Government of China and were further acknowledged.
settlement of the question of the boundary between them. So far as the question of the boundary between China and India is concerned, the Chinese Government has also always been willing, in accordance with the same principles, to reach a fair and reasonable settlement with the Indian Government and thereby to define the specific location of the tri-junction of China, India and Burma. It is regrettable that this friendly and reasonable desire of the Chinese Government has never received a corresponding response from the Indian Government. The Indian Government in its note of March 30, 1961 even openly stated that it could not accept that the boundary between China and India was a matter for negotiation. This attitude of the Indian Government of refusing to negotiate and trying to impose its unilaterally claimed alignment on China is in actuality refusal to settle the boundary question.

The Indian Government's charge that the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty and its attached maps which show the Diphu Pass as a dividing point of the boundary between China and Burma have an adverse implication on the territorial integrity of India, and its allegation that the tri-junction of China, India and Burma should be five miles north of the Diphu Pass are totally untenable. The only so-called basis of the Indian Government is still the so-called McMahon Line which is unlawful and invalid, and which was created single-handedly by British imperialism. Such basis has long been strongly refuted by the Chinese Government in the correspondence and talks between the two countries. Moreover, the Indian Government attempted to utilize the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty to back up this unlawful line; this attempt will also not succeed. The unshakable fact remains that it is only the boundary line running along the southern foot of the Himalayas, as consistently pointed out by the Chinese Government, which is the true traditional customary line of the boundary between China and India in the eastern sector. According to this line, the traditional tri-junction of China, India and Burma is not only not at a point five miles north of the Diphu Pass, as alleged by the Indian Government, nor at the Diphu Pass itself, but is obviously located far south of the Diphu Pass.

The Chinese Government, which has made consistent efforts to develop Sino-Indian friendly relations on the basis of the Five Principles, has always been willing to settle the boundary question between China and India through friendly negotiations in a spirit of mutual understanding and mutual accommodation, and to define jointly with the Governments of Burma and India the exact location of the tri-junction of the three countries. However, it must be pointed out that, so long as the Indian Government does not give up its attitude of refusing to negotiate and trying to impose its views on others, the Chinese Government will absolutely not retreat an inch from its stand on the questions of the Sino-Indian boundary and of the tri-junction of China, Burma and India. The Indian Government will never succeed in its unreasonable tangling.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 15 June, 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the revised English translation of the Chinese text of the Report of the Officials of the Governments of India and the People's Republic of China on the Boundary Question, made available to the Ministry in April, 1961. After careful comparison of the revised informal English translation with the original Chinese text, Ministry of External Affairs are of the view that at least nine (9) changes, as in the statement enclosed, take the meaning beyond what is warranted by the Chinese text. These changes on matters of substance are unwarranted by the Chinese text and therefore unacceptable to the Government of India.

Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of the opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Explanatory note on abbreviations:

CRPV = Chinese Report Printed Version (Govt. of India Publication).
RT = Revised Translation.
CT = Chinese Text

(Headings and sub-headings have not been counted for the purpose of indicating lines.)

(1) CRPV page 15 line 7 . The sentence "First, the treaty did not define any specific location of the boundary; regarding this the Chinese side submitted as evidence documents exchanged between the two sides at that time," has been changed to read "First, the treaty did not define any specific location of the boundary, as was proved by the documents submitted by the Chinese side, which were exchanged between the two sides at that time." The first translation is more in conformity with the Chinese Text.

RT page 19 line 23

CT page 19 line 6

(2) CRPV page 17 line 36 . The sentence "With regard to such a strange logic, the Chinese side will not deal with it for the time being," has been changed to read, "The Chinese side will not make any comment as far as such a strange logic is concerned," thus omitting the words "for the time being".

RT page 23 line 4

CT page 22 line 9

(3) CRPV pages 24 & 25 line 52 . The sentence "After the above mentioned correspondence of the Chinese Government, up to 1949, the Ambassador to India of Chiang Kai Shek clique which at that time still maintained diplomatic relations with the Indian Government, sent a note to the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, repudiating the Simla Convention which the Indian Government held to be valid," has been changed to read, "Subsequent to the above mentioned correspondence of the Chinese Government, even as late as 1949, the Ambassador in India of the Chiang Kai Shek clique which at that time still maintained diplomatic relations with the Indian Government, still sent a note to the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, repudiating the Simla Convention which the Indian Government held to be valid," thus omitting the words "up to".

The sentence "As is well-known, a boundary should be delimited jointly by both sides through negotiations," has been changed to read, "As is well-known, a boundary must be delimited jointly by both sides through negotiations and agreement," thus adding the words "and agreement".

The sentence, "with reference to Shahidulla, which lies in the south-east of the area under the jurisdiction of Ghuma Bazar County now belonging to Hotien Tao, it is a district which on the southern side extends to Kalahulumu Tapan, borders on British Tiaopaiti (that is, Ladakh), and is an important place through which Chinese and Indian traders and people travel to and from India," has been changed to read, "With reference to Shahidulla, which lies south-east of the area under the jurisdiction of Ghuma Bazar County now belonging to Hotien Tao, it is a district extending on the southern side to Kalahulumu Tapan, which borders on British Tiaopai (that is, Ladakh) and is an important route through which Chinese and Indian traders and people travel" to and from India,”, thus making out that is not Shahidulla but Kalahunmu Tapan which borders on Ladakh.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The sentence “Some of the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side including the so called official Chinese maps, likewise could not prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India,”, has been changed to read, “Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.

The words “Exercise of administration” have been changed to read “Exercise of administrative jurisdiction”.

The word “always” has been replaced by the word “invariably”.

The sentence “It is obvious that since this line did not exist at all at that time, how could the Chinese Government give it recognition?” has been changed to read, “Since this line did not even exist at that time, it is obviously out of the question that the Chinese Government could have given recognition to it.”

Similarly, nor can the Chinese maps cited by the Indian side, including so called official Chinese maps, prove that China has accepted the boundary claimed by India”, dropping the word “Some”.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 16 June 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India and with reference to the Note dated May 4, 1961, handed over by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the Indian Embassy in Peking have the honour to state as follows:—

In the Note under reference the Chinese Government have continued to contend that the Diphu Pass has not been shown as the western extremity in the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty and its attached maps. That this contention is absolutely groundless is clear from the points mentioned in paras 2 to 5 below.

2. The detailed description of the alignment up to the western extremity in the text of the Treaty leaves no doubt that the western extremity is at the Diphu Pass. An examination of the maps attached to the Treaty also proves this point indisputably.

3. The Chinese Government have sought support for their contention by drawing a distinction between the description in the Treaty of the western extremity and that of the southeastern extremity. The fact that the south eastern extremity has been described more fully is of no relevance. The description of the alignment leading up to the western extremity is so precise that it obviously ends at the Diphu Pass. Indeed, it was so clear that there was no need in the Treaty to give further elucidation as in the case of the south eastern extremity.

4. The Chinese Government have further stated that in the maps attached to the Treaty, Diphu Pass is “marked in a different way from the marking for the south eastern extremity of the boundary”, and that “according to the legend of the attached maps, the Diphu Pass is shown only as a dividing point of the boundary between China and Burma”. However, on examination of the maps and the legends thereon do not substantiate these two contentions. There is no difference between the markings of the western extremity and that of the south eastern extremity, and there is no specific legend in which Diphu Pass has been described as the dividing point on the line between China and Burma. Indeed, as the Government of India have already stated, the first sheet of the Chinese maps attached to the Treaty is explicitly captioned the “Map showing the Entire Boundary between Burma and China” and this map shows the alignment as terminating at the Diphu Pass.

5. From the above, it is clear that the Government of India have neither interpreted the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty in a distorted manner, nor have they tried to act arbitrarily for the two contracting parties. It is precisely because the treaty is being correctly interpreted, and this interpretation shows that a considerable area of Indian territory under Indian administration and control has been assumed by the Treaty as falling within China that they object to the showing of Diphu Pass as the western extremity of the boundary between China and Burma.

6. The Chinese Government are correct when they say that the western extremity of the boundary between China and Burma is the tri-junction between China, Burma and India. However, from this it cannot follow that every tri-junction should now be decided anew by the parties concerned. As the Government of India have pointed out on innumerable occasions, the northern and eastern boundary of India is traditionally well known and well recognised and, therefore, requires no further definition. The Government of China seem to be exploiting the opportunity offered by the China-Burma Boundary Treaty to support their unwarranted claim for negotiating the question of the India-China boundary. As the Chinese Government are aware, the Government of India have pointed out repeatedly and in clear unmistakable terms that this boundary is well known and well recognised and has been so for centuries and cannot be a subject of any negotiations.

7. At the discussions held between the Indian team of officials and the Chinese team of officials it was conclusively proved that the eastern extremity of the boundary between India and China lies at a point approximately five miles north of the Diphu Pass. It is a travesty of truth to say that the only so-called basis of the Indian alignment in this sector, is the so-called McMahon Line. The boundary of India in this sector, as in the others, is a traditional and customary boundary lying along the main watershed in the region. Further, Indian administration and jurisdiction have extended it for centuries. What is more, the so-called McMahon Line which provided formal confirmation of this natural, traditional customary and administrative boundary, is valid in international law because it was arrived at after an agreement between the Governments of India and Tibet at a time when Tibet had treaty-making powers. The Chinese Government were always aware of it and accepted it.

8. The Ministry are surprised that the Chinese Government, contrary to the legal and factual position, not only exploit the occasion of their Treaty with Burma to question the established frontiers of India by suggesting Diphu Pass as the tri-junction of the boundaries of India, Burma and China but also to reiterate their baseless recent claim that the alignment runs along the southern foothills of the Himalayas. That this claim is totally untenable was conclusively proved during the talks between the officials. This claim has also been rejected by the Government of China themselves in the Sino-Burmese Treaty which shows the western extremity at Diphu Pass and not south of it. It is surprising that the Government of China persist in refusing to recognise the basic contradiction between their acceptance of the traditional boundary and the watershed principle, which the so-called McMahon Line confirmed, as far as Burma is concerned, and their repudiation of the traditional boundary and that very principle with regard to India.

9. It will be clear from the above that the suggestion that the Government of India are trying to impose their views on others is wholly baseless. It is, in fact, the Government of China who, in total disregard of a well-established boundary alignment continue to claim large areas of Indian territory and seek to impose their changing views and expansionist claims on others. It is not the Government of India who are trying to confuse the issues but the Government of China who, not only seek new boundary settlements and question the validity of traditional boundaries formalised by agreements but continue to exploit every opportunity to expound their recent untenable claims.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 6 August 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the Note of the Ministry of External Affairs of the Indian Government to the Chinese Embassy in India dated June 16, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:—

The Indian Government continues to insist in its Note on its misinterpretation of the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty and the attached maps, arbitrarily asserting that the Treaty and the attached maps had defined Diphu Pass as the western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary. An exhaustive answer to this was already made by the Chinese Government in its memorandum of February 21, 1961 and its Note of May 4, 1961 pointing out clearly that the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty had not defined the location of the western extremity, i.e., the tri-junction of China, Burma and India and that this was because China and India still differ in their understanding of the eastern section of the Sino-Indian boundary and a settlement through negotiations was yet to be achieved. In its Note, the Indian Government merely indulged in repeating its untenable contentions and no new argument was advanced. Therefore, the Chinese Government holds that the explanations and clarifications it has already made on this question are clear enough and need not to be repeated any more. But, in view of the continued haggling by the Indian Government in its Note, the Chinese Government deems it necessary to stress the two following points:—

(i) Regarding the text of the treaty.—Even the Indian Government had to admit in its memorandum of December 30, 1960 that the relevant article “does not specify the exact location of the western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary.” In its Note of June 16, 1961 itself, the Indian Government, while misrepresenting the Treaty in various ways, could not after all totally disregard the basic fact that in the Treaty there is a clear distinction between the description of the western extremity and the specified definition of the south-eastern extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary.

(ii) Regarding the maps attached to the Treaty.—According to the legend Diphu Pass is clearly shown only as a boundary dividing point on the Sino-Burmese boundary and not as its western extremity. This is also an indisputable fact.

In the above mentioned two replies, the Chinese Government has already clearly pointed out that the true traditional customary line in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary runs in the main along southern foot of the Himalayas, and that the traditional tri-junction of China, India and Burma is not at Diphu Pass much less north of it but is located far south of the Pass. The Indian Government's allegation that the eastern extremity of the Sino-Indian boundary lies at a point approximately five miles north of Diphu Pase is by no means tenable. As regards the so-called "McMahon Line", the Chinese Government has more than once stated: it was a product of British imperialist aggression against China and has always aroused the great indignation of the Chinese people; it has never been recognised by any successive Chinese Governments, and is therefore illegal and null and void. The Indian Government now asserts again that the Chinese Government has accepted this line, that is all the more a distortion of the facts. The Indian Government further contends that, as the Chinese Government has accepted the watershed principle on the Sino-Burmese boundary question it should not deny the same principle in connection with the Sino-Indian boundary question. This contention is totally groundless.
The Chinese Government has repeatedly pointed out that the geographical factor is only one of factors forming the traditional customary boundary line and that the watershed is but one feature of the geographical factor. The Sino-Burmese boundary has been delimited in accordance with various factors through friendly negotiation.

The above mentioned position and view points of the Chinese Government on the Sino-Indian boundary question are consistent and known to all. Here, the alleged self contradiction, change of opinion and expansionism are totally out of the question. Moreover, having regard for the fact that the Sino-Indian boundary has not yet been formally delimited and that there is a dispute between China and India on the boundary question, the Chinese Government has consistently stood for a reasonable settlement with the Indian Government of the question of the boundary between the two countries in accordance with the Five Principles and the spirit of mutual understanding and mutual accommodation and through friendly negotiation. It is regrettable that the Indian Government has all along adopted, on the Sino-Indian boundary question a rigid attitude of refusing to negotiate. It is none other than the Indian Government itself that attempts to impose on others its unilateral expansionist claim. On the question of the western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary the Indian Government has further deliberately stirred up a dispute and wilfully distorted the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty. It is incomprehensible on what grounds the Indian Government deems its understanding of a treaty concluded to the other countries more authoritative than the explicit explanation of the treaty made by the parties to it. The Chinese Government has to point out once again that the Indian Government's approach of refusing to negotiate and haggling over and over cannot settle any question.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
I am instructed to make the following reply to the note delivered by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India on June 15, 1961:

First of all, the Chinese Government wishes again to draw the attention of the Indian Government to the fact that Chinese is the only authentic language for that part of the Report of the Chinese and Indian Officials on the Boundary Question which was drafted by the Chinese side. The English translation of that part was provided at the request of the Indian side and is merely an unofficial version. Because the translation work was done in a hurry, it was conceivable that there would be some imperfections in it, and the Chinese side reserved the right to revise it afterwards. There was a clear understanding on this question between the officials of the Chinese and Indian sides throughout their meetings.

The revised unofficial English version was provided for the purpose of correcting certain inaccuracies in the previous version and is undoubtedly closer to the sense of the Chinese original. A careful check of the nine changes in the revised version mentioned in the Indian note shows that they are closer to the sense of the Chinese original and do not, as charged by the Indian side, take the meaning beyond what is warranted by the Chinese text. Therefore, the Chinese Government cannot but express its surprise and regret at the totally groundless charge made in the Indian note.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 19 September 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Note dated August 6, 1961, of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs have the honour to state that the Government of India have already stated their position in this matter, which is fully supported by factual data and universally accepted principles regarding traditional international boundaries. The Chinese Government have themselves accepted these principles in their boundary agreements with other neighbouring countries. As the Government of India have already elaborated this in great detail in the previous correspondence regarding this matter, they see little purpose in continuing this present exchange.

2. It is of no concern to the Government of India, as contended by the Chinese Government, whether textually or in cartographic representation of the text of the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty the western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary has been left "undefined". The reason adduced by the Chinese Government for such an incomplete boundary treaty is that China and India differ in their understanding of the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary. This is an unwarranted misrepresentation of the position of the Government of India in regard to this matter. The Government of India are not aware of any doubts affecting this or any other sector of India's boundary with China.

3. The Chinese note, which purports to be a full reply to the previous Indian note, offers no comment on the implication and validity of the first sheet of the Chinese map attached to the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty captioned "Map Showing The Entire Boundary Between Burma and China." The Government of India have also not found the legend which is said to show the Diphu Pass as a 'dividing point' on the Sino-Indian boundary. Had such a legend been shown on the map, the Government of India would have been constrained to disregard and consider as void such an infringement of their own territory, and, in exercise of their inherent right of self-defence, adopt necessary and appropriate measures for the protection of the territories of the Indian Union.

4. It is a travesty of history for the Chinese Government to assert that the traditional Indian boundary, which has been well-known and recognized for centuries, is a product of British Imperialism. In fact, it is the Chinese Government who have, during the last few years, shown aggressive designs and imperialist ambitions by unauthorisedly occupying large areas of Indian territory in violation of the solemnly agreed Panch Sheel principle of respect for each others territorial integrity. It is this aggression by China on Indian territory that is the cause of differences between India and China.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 28 September 1961

Reference the Note handed over to Shri P. K. Banerjee, Charge d'Affaires, Indian Embassy, Peking, by Mr. Chen Tze-pisy, Vice-Director, Asian Division of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China on 13th September 1961 regarding the Officials' Report on the boundary question drafted by the Chinese side and the English translation thereof.

While it is indisputably correct that the Chinese text of the aforesaid Report is the authoritative one, the Government of India do not accept the view that the revised unofficial English translation of the Chinese text is closer to the sense of the Chinese original in every instance. In regard to 9 changes introduced therein to which the attention of the Chinese Government was drawn, the meaning conveyed alters the sense of the original. However, the Government of India recognise that there is, in this matter, a difference of opinion between the two sides.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 10 December 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the note that the Indian Ministry of External Affairs delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India on October 24, 1960, has the honour to state as follows:

The Chinese Government notes that the Indian Government still persists in its totally groundless charges, although the Chinese Government has repeatedly declared that no Chinese aircraft has intruded into Indian air space, pointed out the fact that U.S. aircraft were discovered on the Sino-Indian border, and suggested that both sides should maintain vigilance against crossings of the border of the two countries by unidentified aircraft. The Chinese Government cannot but express its surprise and regret at this. In its note, the Indian Government asserts that it finds it difficult to believe that the planes which violated Indian air space were based anywhere other than on Chinese territory. It is needless to point out that, on the same logic, the Chinese Government could also have charged that all unidentified aircraft which crossed the Sino-Indian border to intrude into Chinese air space were Indian aircraft, yet it has not made such an unwarranted charge.

The result of investigations undertaken by the Chinese Government on the basis of the times and places provided in the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs shows that the charges of intrusion of Indian air space by a Chinese helicopter and entry of Indian territory by two armed Chinese personnel were totally groundless. As a matter of fact, no flight of Chinese aircraft or patrol of armed Chinese personnel ever took place at the times and places mentioned in the Indian note. Therefore, the Chinese Government rejects the charge made by the Indian Government about the Chinese Government allegedly violating the understanding reached by the Prime Ministers of the two countries.

The Chinese Government once again states that no Chinese aircraft has ever crossed the Sino-Indian boundary and expresses the hope that the Indian Government, like the Chinese Government, would maintain vigilance against the crossing of the boundary of the two countries by foreign aircraft. Should India discover any unidentified aircraft in its border air space, the Indian Government is fully entitled to take any counter-measure and need not make any inquiry of China.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 13 February 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to bring to the notice of the Embassy the following violations of Indian air space by Chinese aircraft:

(i) On November 8, 1960 a Chinese aircraft flew over Chung-thang in Sikkim (27°40' N and 88°35' E) from 1200 hours to 1226 hours;

(ii) On December 24, 1960, a Chinese aircraft flew over Ukhimath (30°32' N, 79°05' E) at 0903 hours.

2. The Government of India protest once again against violations of Indian air space by Chinese aircraft. It is once again requested that the Government of China instruct its subordinate authorities not to violate Indian air space, as such violations can easily lead to serious consequences.

3. The Ministry of External Affairs avails themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 25 February 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note delivered by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India on February 13, 1961, has the honour to reply as follows:

The Chinese Government has found through investigation that the allegation made in the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs that Chinese aircraft had twice flown into the territorial air of India and Sikkim respectively is groundless, as no flight of Chinese aircraft was made at the time over the places mentioned in the note. It may be recalled that even Prime Minister Nehru admitted in his speech before the Indian Lok Sabha on February 17 that the Indian Government had not identified the nationality of the aircraft in the alleged two flights. The Indian Government, on the mere basis of presumption, supposed the aircraft to be Chinese and went to the length of lodging a protest with the Chinese Government. This attitude cannot be regarded as correct and friendly. The Chinese Government rejects the protest of the Indian Government and cannot but express regret at the attitude taken by the Indian Government.

The Chinese Government once again declares that no Chinese aircraft has ever flown across the Sino-Indian border and that, in case India discovers any unidentified aircraft in the territorial air over its border areas, the Indian Government has every right to deal with the matter without having to make any enquiries of the Chinese Government.

The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 29 April 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to bring to their notice the following violation of India air space by a Chinese aircraft.

On March 17, 1961, a Chinese aircraft was observed flying over Askote (8020E, 2945N), Joshimath (7940E, 3035N) and Badrinath (7930E, 3045N), from about 1015 hours to 1100 hours.

The Government of India lodge an emphatic protest against the repeated violations of India's air space by Chinese aircraft and reiterate their request that the Government of China instruct their subordinate authorities not to indulge in such violations.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 2 June 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs on April 29, 1961, has the honour to reply as follows:

The Chinese Government has made a detailed investigation into the alleged flight of a Chinese aircraft over Indian territory on March 17 referred to in the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs. The results of the investigation show that the allegation is completely groundless and that no flight of Chinese aircraft took place at the time and place mentioned in the note. Reference may be made to the fact that even Mr. Krishna Menon, the Indian Minister of Defence, admitted before the Indian Lok Sabha on May 4 that the Indian Government failed to identify the nationality of the said aircraft. The Indian Government has more than once imprudently made protests against the Chinese Government before any verification is made; this attitude cannot be regarded as correct and friendly. The Chinese Government categorically rejects the utterly groundless protest lodged by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in its note of April 29 and deeply deplores such an unjustified attitude.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embasssy of India in China, 2 June 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to three recent incidents of Indian aircraft encroaching upon China's territorial air, has the honour to state as follows:

1. On April 26, 1961, at 12.57 hours, an Indian airplane intruded into the air space over Dehra Village (approximately 34° 55' N, 78° 41' E) in the south-west of the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, China, at an altitude of approximately 3,000 metres, and circled three minutes over there for the purpose of reconnaissance.

2. On April 27, 1961, at 9-40 hours, an Indian airplane intruded into the air space over Kota Village (approximately 34° 29' N, 78° 55' E) Shamal-Lungpa (approximately 34° 29' N, 78° 55' E) and other places in the south-west of the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, China, at an altitude of approximately 1,000 metres, and circled seven minutes over there for the purpose of reconnaissance.

3. On May 3, 1961, at 10.00 hours, an Indian airplane intruded into the air space over Height 5819 (approximately 35° 27' N, 78° 09' E) in the southwest of the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, China, at an altitude of approximately 300 metres, and circled as long as thirty minutes over there for the purpose of reconnaissance.

Such repeated incidents of Indian aircraft encroaching upon China's territorial air cannot but be regarded as deliberate provocations and as a menace to peace in the area along the border between the two countries. In regard to this, the Chinese Government lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government and demands that it immediately adopt effective measures to prevent the recurrence of similar incidents in the future.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 16 June 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to Note dated 2nd June, 1961, handed over to the Indian Embassy in Peking by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, have the honour to state that the allegations contained in the Note about violations of Chinese air space are without any foundation. Indian aircraft are under strict instructions to limit their operations within Indian territory, and on no account to encroach on the territories of others. The Government of India are unable to give credence to these baseless reports and are surprised that the Government of China should have thought it fit not only to lodge a protest against imaginary violations of their air space but also to describe them as "deliberate provocations".

The Ministry of External Affairs takes this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 22 June 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Note dated 2nd June, 1961 handed over to the First Secretary of the Indian Embassy in Peking by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs regarding an intrusion into India's air space by a Chinese aircraft on 17th March, 1961 have the honour to state that the reply given by the Chinese Government is unsatisfactory and evasive. As usual the reply seeks to draw support from an official statement, this time ascribed to India's Defence Minister, which the later never made. On 4th May, 1961 in reply to a starred question in the Lok Sabha India's Defence Minister stated that a Chinese aircraft had violated India's air-space inspite of earlier protests which had been lodged by the Government of India. The Government of India would again express the hope that the Government of the People's Republic of China would exercise the necessary authority to restrain Chinese aircraft from violating India's air-space.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurance of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 5 July 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to bring to the notice of the Embassy the following further violations of Indian air space by Chinese aircraft:

(1) On May 26, 1961, at about 21:45 hours, an aircraft flew over Kalapani (8055 East 3015 North).

(2) On May 31, 1961, at about 20:45 hours, an aircraft flew over Kalapani (8055 East 3015 North).

(3) On June 2, 1961, at about 21:30 hours, an aircraft flew over Gunji (1852 East 3012 North).

(4) On June 3, 1961, at about 21:00 hours, an aircraft flew over Gunji (8052 East 3012 North).

In lodging a firm protest against these repeated air violations of Indian air-space, the Government of India would again urge the Government of People’s Republic of China to warn all Chinese aircraft to cease forthwith violating Indian air-space as such unlawful activity could lead to grave consequences.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 12 August 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents his compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows:

In the recent period, Indian troops, personnel and aircraft repeatedly encroached on Chinese territory and territorial air in China's border areas and even openly made armed provocations. The Chinese Government now points out the following serious cases:

(1) About 12:00 hours on July 9, 1961, thirty odd armed Indian military men approached the traditional customary boundary line to the west of Spanggur in China's Tibet Region. Nine of the Indian military men intruded into Chinese territory at different times and reached a point approximately 33° 36' N, 78° 46' E, and jointly with other Indian Military men staying outside of Chinese territory, they, unprovoked, fired thirteen shots towards Chinese territory. About 16:30 hours on the same day, two more armed Indian military men intruded into Chinese territory and reached a point approximately 33° 35' N, 78° 47' E. It was not until about 17:00 hours on that day that all the Indian military men who had illegally crossed the border withdrew.

(2) Since last April, Indian troops, starting from their illegally occupied Parigas which is situated in China's Demchok area, continually pushed further into Chinese territory, and expanded the area of their unlawful patrol to include Cuje sheepfold (approximately 32° 41' N, 79° 26' E) and Rato (approximately 32° 42' N, 79° 29' E). In May, Indian troops went so far as to illegally set up a checkpoint at Oga (approximately 32° 50' N, 79° 26' E). More recently, on July 5, thirty odd Indian military men carrying light and heavy machine-guns and other weapons came on unlawful patrol to Kargo (approximately 32° 40' N, 79° 28' E), and on July 22 they penetrated still deeper to Charding La (approximately 32° 32' N, 79° 24' E) for unlawful patrol.

(3) Between July 21 and 22, 1961, six Indian military men carrying weapons, starting from Indian illegally occupied Tsungsha area of China, crossed Thaga Pass and penetrated deeply into a place about one kilometre southeast of China's Salan (approximately 31° 31' N, 79° 09' E) and carried out reconnaissance.

(4) Last June, some fifteen Indian official personnel, carrying a receiver-transmitter set, intruded again into China's Wu-je area and stationed there to carry out unlawful activities.

(5) Indian aircraft repeatedly encroached on Chinese territorial air. The instances of encroachment are as follows:

(a) On May 19 and about 10:00 hours on May 20 respectively, an Indian airplane intruded into the air space over Chiakang (approximately 32° 54' N, 79° 37' E) of China's Tibet Region for the purpose of reconnaissance.

(b) About 11·00 hours on June 3 and at 10·48 hours on July 15 respectively, an Indian airplane, flying from the direction of the Tinruzhe airfield on the Indian border, intruded into the air space over Digra (approximately 33° 33' N, 78° 53' E) of China's Tibet Region for the purpose of reconnaissance. Afterwards, it flew back in the direction of the Tinruzhe airfield.

(c) At 12·45 hours on June 9, an Indian airplane, flying from the direction of Murgg of India, intruded into the air space over an area of China's Sinkiang (approximately at 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E) for the purpose of reconnaissance. Afterwards, it flew back along the Chipchap River in Chinese territory.

(d) About 09·00 hours on June 8 and at 12·11 hours on July 17 respectively, an Indian airplane, flying along the Subansiri River, overflew Migyitun (approximately 28° 40' N, 93° 37' E) in China's Tibet Region and further intruded into the air space over Yalep (approximately 28° 44' N, 93° 19' E) for the purpose of reconnaissance; thence it flew back by the same route.

The above-mentioned activities of the Indian side have gravely encroached on the territory, territorial air and sovereignty of China, and once again caused the tension in the border areas. The Chinese Government is consistently devoting itself to maintaining the status quo of the boundary and keeping tranquility along the border so as to facilitate the peaceful settlement of the boundary dispute between the two countries, and all the Chinese frontier outposts, for this purpose, are continuing to desist from sending out patrol parties. The Indian side, on the contrary, taking the goodwill of China for a sign of weakness, has wilfully carried out armed provocations and expanded its illegally occupied areas in the Chinese border region. The Chinese Government cannot but lodge a serious protest against this and point out that such practice may lead to serious consequences. The Chinese Government asks the Indian Government to order the immediate withdrawal of all the Indian troops and other official personnel who have crossed the border and adopt effective measures to prevent the recurrence of similar incidents.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 21 August 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the notes handed to the Chinese Embassy in India by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs on July 5 and June 22, 1961, respectively, has the honour to state as follows:

1. In its note of July 5, 1961, the Indian Ministry of External Affairs asserted that from May 26 to June 3, Chinese aircraft allegedly flew over Kalapani and Gunji, twice over each. The Chinese Government has satisfied itself through investigation that no flight of Chinese aircraft took place at the time and place mentioned in the note. The Chinese Government categorically rejects the protest of the Indian Government in regard to the alleged intrusion into Indian air space by Chinese aircraft, and deeply deplores such a totally groundless charge made by the Indian Government.

2. The Chinese Government has noted that in the note of June 22, 1961, the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, ignoring the statement made by the Chinese Government in its note of June 2, 1961 to the effect that no Chinese aircraft flew over Indian territory, persisted in its unjustified charge and did its utmost to argue away the statement made by the Indian Minister of Defence in India's Lok Sabha on May 4. The Chinese Government draws the attention of the Indian Government to the report carried by India's official news agency the Information Service of India on May 5 which unequivocally said: "There was further violation of Indo-air space by aircraft suspected to be Chinese on March 17 last, Defence Minister V. K. Krishna Menon informed Lok Sabha May 4." This passage clearly shows that the aircraft which was in "violation of Indo-air space" was merely "suspected" and not identified as Chinese aircraft. Thus, the arbitrary assertion made by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in its notes of April 29 and June 22 that an alleged Chinese airplane intruded into India's air space is contradictory to the statement of the Indian Minister of Defence. The Chinese Government cannot but express once again its regret at the fact that the Indian Government keeps making imprudent charges against the Chinese Government without finding out the facts.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 31 October 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs Note (No. 61) PU Yi Ya tzu No. 648, dated August 12, 1961, handed over in Peking to the Charge d'Affaires of the Indian Embassy have the honour to state as follows:

2. Despite a searching enquiry into the allegations about encroachments into Chinese territory and violations of Chinese air space by Indian armed personnel and aircraft including an on-the-spot survey, Government of India have not discovered a single instance where Indian forces or aircraft transgressed into Chinese territory. The existing border establishments of the Government of India are well within Indian territory unlike a number of border posts of the Chinese Government unlawfully established on Indian territory in Ladakh. Indeed, according to recent reports, Chinese troops have made further inroads into Indian territory.

3. The specific allegations of intrusion mentioned in the Chinese note are dealt with below:

Allegation I: At about 1200 hours on July 9, 1961 thirty-odd armed Indian personnel allegedly approached the traditional customary boundary line to the west of Spanggur in China's Tibet region etc.

Comments: The customary boundary line, as the Chinese should be well aware, does not run to the west of Spanggur but cuts across the eastern part of the Spanggur lake. It follows that had nine Indian Army men reached a point approximately 3336 N, 7846 E, which is not a fact, they would have been 10 miles west of the Indian boundary. It has been further alleged that about 1630 hours on the same day two armed Indian personnel reached a point approximately 3335 N, 7847 E, and while this too is factually incorrect, had it been so, the two men would have been still well within the customary boundary line. All the locations mentioned in paragraph I of the Chinese protest note are on the Indian side of the international border and demarcated so in Indian maps. The allegation that Indian troops are intruding when they go to a part of the Indian territory is manifestly absurd. As to firing by Indian armed personnel on Indian territory, on careful examination, it has been established that no shots were fired from or near the locations in Indian territory mentioned in the note.

Allegation II: The Chinese note alleges that Indian troops have recently “pushed further into Chinese territory” in the Demchok area and patrolled up to the Guje sheepfold and Rato, etc.

Comments: Both Demchok and the other locations mentioned in the Chinese note are well within India's international border in this sector. The Chinese note refers to the setting up of a checkpost at Oga. The Ministry do not see why the Government of China should have any concern with measures India adopts inside her territory for the defence of Indian territories. As regards patrolling up to Kargo and Charding La, while Kargo is well within Indian territory, Charding La is on the border, and has been under Indian control for several years. The Chinese Government would appreciate that it is illogical to expect the Government of India to leave their territories unprotected to facilitate Chinese incursions, and indeed unlawful occupation by the Chinese has already occurred in wide areas of India's Ladakh.

Allegation III: Six Indian armed personnel crossed Thagala and penetrated up to 1 kilometer deep south-east of Salan for reconnaissance etc.

Comments: Nilang which is called Tsungsha in the Chinese note has been a part of India for many years. It is several miles south of the border pass of Thagala. Detailed enquiries have revealed that no Indian patrol crossed the Indian border pass of Thagala or any other part of the international frontier in this sector.

Allegation IV: Last June, some fifteen Indian personnel intruded into the Wuje area etc.

Comments: It would be recalled that, in the discussions held on August 19, 1958, on Barahoti—which the Chinese call Wuje—between the Chinese and Indian delegations, it was mutually agreed that the two sides would refrain from sending armed personnel to Barahoti, while the area remained in dispute. The Indian side had further proposed that the civil authorities of either country should not extend their jurisdiction over Barahoti until the dispute had been finally settled. This suggestion was not found acceptable to the Chinese side. The Government of India have therefore been continuing to send their civil officials to Barahoti just as they used to do before in exercise of their traditional jurisdiction.

Allegation V: Violations of Chinese territorial air by Indian aircraft.

Comments: The Government of India, after a very thorough investigation, are in a position to assert positively that no Indian aircraft was involved in the flights mentioned in the Chinese note. However, the Government of India must enter a caveat to the unfounded Chinese claim that the air space over Digra and the point 35.19 N and 78.12 E [(b) and (c) of paragraph 5 of the Chinese Note] are Chinese. These locations are in Indian territory, so is the Chipchap river. If, as it seems from the Note, the Chinese are establishing posts on this river, the Government of India must denounce this further incursion into Indian territory.

4. It is surprising that the Chinese Government should draw up a list of groundless allegations against the Government of India based on false assumptions and imaginary provocations and conclude therefrom that the activities of the Indian side have “once again caused tension in the border area”. The facts are clear and they clearly establish that the tension in the border areas is caused by acts of transgression committed by the Chinese.
5. As late as December 17, 1959, H.E. Premier Chou En-lai writing to the Indian Prime Minister had, inter alia, said that "as a matter of fact, the Chinese map published in 1956 to which Your Excellency referred correctly shows the traditional boundary between the two countries in this sector (Ladakh-Tibet/Sinkiang)". The Chinese forces consolidated their hold on that line in 1959-60. Since then, however, aggression is being added to aggression and instances of China's misbehaviour against a neighbour bound to her by the Five Principles of co-existence are increasing.

6. It is not true that the Chinese 'are continuing to desist from sending out patrol parties'. Nor is there any factual basis for the ascertain that the 'Chinese are devoting themselves to maintenance of the status quo'. There are reports of intensive Chinese patrolling on the frontier, of numerous incursions into Indian territory, of new military roads close to the frontier in the middle and eastern sectors and deep inside Indian territory under unlawful Chinese occupation in the western sector and new army posts closer to the border than those of 1959. Of instances of recent Chinese intrusions into Indian territory, some are cited below:—

Western sector

(1) In April 1960 Chinese military personnel posted at Khurnak Fort patrolled the Suriah (E. 7852, N. 3347) area inside Indian territory.

(2) A Chinese survey party visited Suriah on June 25, 1960, and returned towards Khurnak Fort the same day.

(3) On October 13, 1960 two mounted Chinese soldiers were seen about 1½ miles east of Hot Springs (E. 7857/N. 3419).

(4) Four Chinese soldiers were seen at MR. E. 7901, N. 3417, about five miles from Hot Springs in the second week of October, 1960.

(5) Sometime in May 1961, the Chinese intruded into Indian territory near Chushul at MR E. 7848, N. 3331. A section of Chinese troops was also seen on May 22, 1961 towards the east of this location.

Middle sector

(7) On September 22, 1960, a Chinese armed patrol party consisting of one officer and ten soldiers crossed the Sikkim-Tibet border near Jelepla and came 200 yards inside Indian territory.

(8) On April 20, 1961, an Indian army patrol at Jelepla noticed three Chinese wearing khaki uniforms, approximately 80 yards within Indian territory.

(9) On September 12, 1961, 12 Chinese armed personnel in blue uniforms came 100 yards inside Indian territory from Jelepla.
Eastern sector

(10) One June 3, 1960, a Chinese patrol party consisting of 25 soldiers intruded four miles within Indian territory and came to Taksang Gompa (E. 9150, N. 2745).

(11) In the first week of July 1961, a Chinese patrol entered a point about one mile west of Chemokarpola in Kameng Frontier Division.

As against these, there is not one instance of Indian intrusion into Chinese territory.

7. This is not all. Reports received in August-September 1961 show that the Chinese forces have spread even beyond the 1956 Chinese claim line in Ladakh to establish the following new posts, and that they have constructed roads to link these posts with rear bases:

- Post at E. 78.12, N 35.19.
- Post at Nyagzu.
- Post at Dambuguru.

These fresh instances of violation of Indian territory by the Chinese establish conclusively that the Chinese are guilty of further aggression against India and their protestations to the contrary are only a cloak to cover up these renewed incursions and aggressive activities.

8. The Government of India reject the Chinese note of protest, dated August 12, 1961, and urge on the Government of China to stop further incursions into Indian territory and withdraw from areas of Indian territory illegally occupied by Chinese forces.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurance of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and with reference to the note handed over to the Indian Embassy in Peking by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China on August 21, 1961, have the honour to state as follows:—

While the Government of China have rejected in their present note India's protest against violations of Indian air space by Chinese aircraft between May 26, 1961 and June 3, 1961, it may interest the Chinese Government to know that the Government of India satisfied themselves prior to lodging their protest that the aircraft concerned were of Chinese origin. The Government of India are unable therefore, to accept the Chinese contention that the charge was 'totally groundless', and would request the Chinese Government again to issue appropriate instructions to all concerned to cease indulging in these violations of Indian air space which could lead to unfortunate consequences.

In the note, dated August 21, 1961, a reference has been made to this Ministry's note dated June 22, 1961 in reply to the Chinese note of June 2, 1961. It is apparent that the Government of China are still relying on a mis-quotation from the Defence Minister's reply in Parliament to counter the facts of the case. The Chinese note now refers to a report carried by the Information Service of India on May 5, in its morse transmission. As already pointed out in this Ministry's note dated June 22, 1961, the Defence Minister replying to a question in Parliament on May 4, 1961, said that Chinese aircraft had violated Indian air space in spite of earlier protests lodged by the Government of India. The question and the answer given to it was in Hindi. The Press Trust of India mistranslated the answer, and the Information Service of India which gathers its material from news agencies among other sources carried this mistranslation in its transmission of May 5, 1961. There is, therefore, no material support for the Chinese contention in the Defence Minister's statement in Parliament on May 4, 1961.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the Chinese People's Republic the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of India in China to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, 26 November 1960

The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China, and has the honour to refer to a most unpleasant and serious incident which took place on the special train on the return journey of the Diplomatic Corps from Shaosin to Peking. The members of the Diplomatic Corps entertained at Shaosin at 6 p.m. on Monday, November 21, 1960. At about 11.30 p.m. the Ambassador of India was asked to see the Acting Director of Protocol who was accompanying the diplomats. The Acting Director alleged that at 6.40 p.m. that evening the Ambassador's Private Secretary, Mr. Sundaram, had "misbehaved" towards a Chinese girl attendant in the corridors of the train and had tried to embrace her. He further alleged that the girl had freed herself from Mr. Sundaram and Mr. Sundaram had then run away from the scene of the alleged incident. The Acting Director stated that the personnel of the train were indignant over what he called the "misbehaviour" of a member of the Indian Embassy who was also concurrently the Ambassador's Private Secretary. The Acting Director wanted the Ambassador to "educate" his Secretary and ensure that no repetition of the alleged incident would occur. The Ambassador expressed shocked surprise at the grave charge made against his Private Secretary Mr. Sundaram, and said that Mr. Sundaram was a happily married sober young man whose conduct had always been above reproach. The Ambassador added however that he would make enquiries.

Next morning (Tuesday November 22nd) the Ambassador spoke to Mr. Sundaram about the charge made against him. Mr. Sundaram was astonished and said that he had not been near a Chinese girl on the train, or at any time during the diplomatic trip. He added that the charge was fantastic and was a complete fabrication. He gave the Ambassador a detailed account of his movements on the previous evening and said that from 6.15 p.m. to 7.20 p.m., and consequently at the time of the alleged incident, he was sitting in another compartment along with six or seven others. At about 7.20 p.m. he left the compartment, along with the others, to take his dinner in the dining car. On checking all the facts given by Mr. Sundaram, the Ambassador was quite satisfied that the charge was completely false. The Ambassador then went to the Acting Director of Protocol at 10 a.m. and informed him of the result of his investigation. The Acting Director said that he regretted that Mr. Sundaram had flatly denied the charge and that the Ambassador "accepted the denial" and "repeated it" to him. The Acting Director again said that the leading man and the train personnel were indignant over the incident and wanted to know what action was being taken. He proposed that the alleged "victim" and Mr. Sundaram should be confronted with each other and their respective versions obtained. On this occasion the Acting Director added that there had been an eye-witness to the incident, although he had made no mention of any witness to the alleged incident when he had talked to the Ambassador the previous night. The Ambassador pointed out that there were difficulties in carrying out such an investigation on a running train carrying the entire Diplomatic Corps. He also added that he had no Chinese knowing person with him who could check on what was being said by the supposed “victim” and eye-witness and who would also ensure that what Mr. Sundaram said was being properly interpreted. The Ambassador however said that he would think over the matter.

After dinner that evening, the Ambassador met the Acting Director again and told him that he could not accept an investigation on a running train. He pointed out that joint investigations of such a nature could be carried out only under proper conditions, with both sides having full facilities for presenting their respective cases. The Ambassador added that if an investigation was insisted upon, it could be carried out in Peking where each side would have the services of its own interpreters. The Acting Director regretted the Ambassador’s decision not to agree to an immediate investigation and also regretted what he called the Ambassador’s “judgment” in accepting Mr. Sundaram’s version. The Acting Director added that he would convey the Ambassador’s decision to the train personnel whose indignation, he said, would thereby increase. He further stated that he would not be responsible for any unpleasant incident that might take place as a result of “their increased indignation”. The Ambassador protested strongly against the Acting Director’s attempt to intimidate him and reminded the Acting Director that he and members of his party were the guests of the Chinese Foreign Office.

Half an hour later, that is at 11.30 p.m. Mr. Kallukaren, the Indian Press Attache, who was sharing the compartment with Mr. Sundaram, rushed into the Ambassador’s compartment and informed him that Mr. Sundaram had been dragged out of his compartment by members of the Protocol Department to the place of the alleged incident where a group of train personnel was demonstrating against him. The Ambassador and his wife went to the place where Mr. Sundaram was being heckled and shouted at, by a group of train personnel, with Foreign Office interpreters translating the abuses and repeatedly calling Mr. Sundaram “Rascal!, Rascal!” They were also shouting at him most violently: “Admit it! Admit it! Admit it!” One of them went so far as to shout, according to the Protocol interpreter himself, “What sort of an Indian Ambassador who will not take a responsible attitude!” The alleged “victim” and eye-witness were there but the militant demonstration was entirely carried on by another girl and a man who were assisted by Protocol interpreters. Mr. Sundaram was completely hemmed in and subjected to abuse and humiliation, physically debarred from leaving the spot and practically imprisoned, since the Chinese party had taken care to lock the door in front of which he was standing. The demonstrators were adopting an increasingly threatening and violent attitude, when the Ambassador and his wife arrived on the spot. The latter reminded the demonstrators that the Ambassador and his party were the guests of the Chinese Government and that their behaviour was not in keeping with their position as hosts. They also reminded them that earlier on, the Ambassador had already told the Acting Director that he was agreeable to having an investigation held in Peking and that therefore this demonstration was completely unjustified. The staff of the Protocol Department, who were on the spot and in the vicinity, did nothing to pacify the demonstrators. On the other hand they encouraged them, repeating to the bystanders their version of the alleged “misbehaviour”. The Ambassador and his wife, however, were able to rescue Mr. Sundaram from the yelling and gesticulating crowd and take him to their compartment. There is no doubt that Mr. Sundaram would have been assaulted but for the Ambassador’s intervention. As the Ambassador, his wife and Mr. Sundaram were walking back to their compartment, the Acting Director and the Deputy Director of the Protocol Department, who had also been near the scene throughout this unruly demonstration, were returning to their compartment just ahead of the Ambassador.

Though by then it was midnight, the Ambassador walked across to the bogey where the Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, His Excellency Mr. Lo Kwei-po, was seated with his staff, obviously getting a report of the demonstration. The Ambassador made a very strong protest against the unruly and unseemly demonstration which had just taken place and the insult deliberately offered to the Indian Embassy. The Ambassador reminded the Vice-Minister that he had already expressed his agreement to an investigation in Peking under proper conditions, and was therefore all the more shocked and surprised that the train personnel had taken the law into their own hands, and had been assisted in doing so by officials of the Foreign Office. The Ambassador said he refused to believe that the demonstration could not have been controlled by the officials of the Foreign Office. The Vice-Minister said that he would not accept the Ambassador’s protest and commended what the demonstrators had done, saying that “their action was right”. He added that the demonstration was not an insult to the Indian Ambassador but a protest against the “misbehaviour” of Mr. Sundaram. He also said that in not having agreed to an immediate investigation on the running train, the Ambassador had shown an “unfriendly attitude”. The Ambassador repudiated what the Vice-Minister said and pointed out that joint investigations in such cases had to be carried out under proper conditions and that the Chinese proposal to render summary justice on the spot, by holding an immediate investigation, was neither fair nor acceptable to him.

The Government of India are shocked at this incident and have directed their Ambassador to lodge a strong protest against the violent demonstration of the train personnel, actively assisted by officials of the Chinese Foreign Office, in dragging a member of the Indian Embassy out of his compartment on a running train and in subjecting him to violent threats, insults and humiliation in its corridors. The Government of India are shocked that the train personnel were allowed to take the law into their own hands, in spite of the assurance given by the Ambassador of India, that he would agree to a joint investigation on returning to Peking. The Government of India strongly feel that the incident was specially deplorable, because of the pressure, not only of senior officials of the Chinese Foreign Office on the train, but also of the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, His Excellency Mr. Lo Kwei-po. The Ambassador of India and his party were guests of the Chinese Government and it is incredible to the Government of India, that the subordinate staff of the train could have been allowed to take the law into their own hands in thus insulting them. The Government of India strongly protest against the whole incident which was deliberately designed to insult the Indian Embassy and bring it into disrepute.

The Embassy of India avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 10 December 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China has read the note of the Ministry of External Affairs of India delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India on May 17, 1960 and has the honour to reply to this note as well as the memoranda of the Indian Embassy in China, dated August 25, 1959 and September 17, 1959, the note of the Ministry of External Affairs of India, dated October 26, 1959 and its informal note of April 25, 1960 as follows:

1. In the above-mentioned memoranda and notes, the Indian Government said that Indian traders allegedly encountered difficulties and restrictions in China's Tibet region, and claimed that certain proper measures and regulations of the Tibet region of China had altered or violated the so-called "customary practice" in trade between the Tibet region of China and India, and on this basis made a series of charges against and demands on the Chinese Government. Having made a serious check on all the cases mentioned in the above memoranda and notes, the Chinese Government deems it necessary to point out that the charges made by the Indian Government against the local authorities of the Tibet region of China are groundless, and the many demands made by the Indian Government are also unacceptable to the Chinese Government.

2. In the above-mentioned memoranda and notes, the Indian Government repeatedly objected to certain regulations and measures adopted by the local authorities of the Tibet region of China, charging that they had altered or violated the so-called "traditional pattern of trade" or "customary practice" in trade between the Tibet region of China and India. The Chinese Government rejects this charge. What the Indian Government means by "customary practice" is mainly that Indian traders may make trade payments in Indian rupees, Tibetan coins or Chinese silver dollars. It must be pointed out that there are no provisions at all on trade payments in the Sino-Indian Agreement on Trade and Inter-course Between the Tibet Region of China and India of April 1954. Article II of the Agreement specifies the places where traders of both sides known to be customarily engaged in trade may trade. Article IV specifies the routes by which traders of both sides travel. Paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of Article V provide that traders of both sides or inhabitants of the border districts of the two countries or porters and mule-team drivers who perform necessary transportation services need not hold passports issued by their own country in travelling across the border. Obviously, there are in the Agreement no provisions on matters concerning trade itself such as payment. Needless to point out, these matters should be dealt with in accordance with the regulations and measures in force of the local authorities of the Tibet region of China. In its note the Indian Government also referred to Paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article VII of the Sino-Indian Trade Agreement of October 14, 1954 as a "reason" for making demands on the Chinese Government.
True, Paragraph 1 of Article VII stipulates: All commercial and non-commercial payments between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India may be effected in Indian rupees; and Paragraph 4 stipulates: Payments for border trade between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India, however, will be settled according to the customary practice. It must be pointed out that concerning trade between the Tibet region of China and India, there is a specific provision in Article V of the Sino-Indian Trade Agreement, which stipulates that the above-mentioned trade will be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Sino-Indian Agreement on Trade and Intercourse Between the Tibet Region of China and India of April 1954. As pointed out above, there are no provisions at all on trade payments in this Agreement. It is, therefore, groundless for the Indian Government in the above-mentioned memoranda and notes to insist that Indian traders in the Tibet region of China effect trade payments in Indian rupees, Tibetan coins or Chinese silver dollars. And the Chinese Government cannot agree to this.

3. After the quelling of the rebellion and the carrying out of democratic reforms in the Tibet region of China, the local authorities of the Tibet region of China, in the light of specific conditions and actual needs, have introduced certain necessary financial and economic reforms, such as the exchange of the Tibetan currency into Jen Min Pi, with a view to stabilising finance and bringing about economic prosperity. This currency reform is purely a matter within the scope of China's sovereignty and no foreign country has any right to interfere with it. All foreign nationals and traders without exception are obliged to observe the relevant laws and regulations of the country in which they reside. The Indian Government in its memorandum of August 25, 1959 went so far as to describe this currency reform which is purely a domestic measure of China's as "arbitrary measures". This shows that the Indian Government not only fails to understand correctly the great significance of the currency reform introduced by the local authorities of the Tibet region of China, but also tries deliberately to interfere in China's internal affairs. The Indian Government demands that Indian traders be permitted to take to India Tibetan coins and Chinese silver dollars, and further asks that no difficulties should be placed in the way of remittance of profits of the Indian traders from Tibet to India, or that it should be allowed "without any conditions". It must be pointed out that monetary measures are matters within the scope of a country's sovereignty. The Chinese Government cannot accept these demands of the Indian Government. The regulation that Indian traders applying for foreign exchange must undertake to import goods of equivalent value has been in force for many years. Furthermore, this is also a matter of sovereign right exercised by a country in foreign exchange management in which no foreign country has the right to interfere.

4. The Indian Government, in the above-mentioned memoranda and notes, also mentioned other so-called "difficulties" encountered by Indian traders. These, too, are groundless. The Indian Government alleged that the commission of two per cent. had been doubled. The Chinese Government has been satisfied that this is absolutely untrue. The local authorities of the Tibet region of China did suggest in the spring of 1959 that certain Indian traders in Western Tibet take back to India their unsold merchandise; this was done entirely out of consideration for protecting the security of the Indian traders' merchandise. However, the local authorities of the Tibet region of China indicated at the time that the Chinese side did not object to Indian traders leaving their merchandise in the locality, so long as the Indian traders themselves wished to do so. Regarding the export of sheep and goats to India, the local authorities of China's Tibet region, with a view to effecting economic prosperity and developing animal husbandry, have stipulated that, except for the necessary amount of meat sheep and goats, no sheep and goats are to be exported at will. This is not only a matter of China's internal affairs, but also a natural measure which should be understandable to the Indian Government. The Chinese Government wishes that the Indian Government would advise Indian traders to respect the regulations of the local authorities of China's Tibet region. It should also be mentioned here that the Indian Government's allegation in its note that the Tibet local authorities refused to accept goods shipped to Tibet by Indian Traders in fulfilment of earlier contracts is untrue. Check-ups have revealed that trade organizations of the Tibet region have always faithfully observed contracts, while Indian traders, on the contrary, more than once violated provisions of contracts. Some Indian traders failed to deliver goods according to the time stipulated in the contracts; individual Indian traders even failed to deliver goods according to the specifications of the contracts, in an attempt to pass inferior goods as high quality goods. For example, of the 180 woollen piece-goods which the trade organization of China's Tibet region ordered from the Indian-Sikkim Company, only one-third are conformable to the specifications. It was only in these circumstances that the trade organization of China's Tibet region, in order to avoid losses, had to refuse to accept them.

5. The Chinese Government has all along taken a positive attitude towards the promotion of trade between the Tibet region of China and India. Even in the situation of armed rebellion in the Tibet region, in which trade between the Tibet region and India met with certain temporary and partial difficulties, the Tibet local authorities still made the greatest endeavour to provide Indian traders with the possibility of carrying on trade. A proof of this is the fact that the Tibet local authorities have never discontinued the export of the important commodity wool. Although the Indian Government expressed its desire to develop trade between China's Tibet region and India, yet in the past period, there have occurred some adverse situations on the Indian side. On October 3 and 22, and November 1, 1959, the Indian Political Commissioner's Office in Sikkim issued successive orders prohibiting the export to the Tibet region of many kinds of goods such as kerosene and iron-made farm tools, and even food grain which the Tibetan border inhabitants used to exchange for. It is learnt that Indian traders have been obstructed again and again from taking orders placed by the trade organization of China's Tibet region. The Chinese Government does not know the purposes of the Indian side in adopting these and similar measures, nor wishes to raise any demands concerning measures which are India's internal affairs. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will take practical measures in the interest of the development of trade between China's Tibet region and India.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 12 December 1960

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China, and, with reference to the informal note delivered in Delhi by Foreign Secretary Dutt of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to Assistant Minister Chia Kuan-hua of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China on April 25, 1960, has the honour to reply as follows:

1. Regarding the question of accommodation for the Indian official organs in Tibet:

The local authorities of China's Tibet region have all along done their utmost to render assistance, in accordance with the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement, to all the Indian official organs in the conclusion of leases and the construction of buildings. For example, regarding the question of the lease of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse, the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet has conducted several discussions with the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa on the draft lease put forward by the Chinese side in June this year, and agreement has been reached on many questions in the draft lease. Now the local authorities of China's Tibet region are waiting for the final reply of the Indian Consulate-General. As regards the request of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse for renting three more rooms, energetic assistance has been rendered by the local authorities of Gyantse in the light of the local conditions.

Regarding the construction of the premises for the Indian Trade Agency in Gartok, the Tibet local authorities have, in the light of the present local conditions, agreed to assist the Indian Trade Agency in building some local-typed houses for temporary use.

Besides, the local authorities also rendered assistance to the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa when the latter wanted to build more houses this year.

The Foreign Ministry believes that, in the future, reasonable requests of the Indian official organs in Tibet will continue to be fulfilled with the assistance of the local authorities. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will instruct its official organs in Tibet to adopt an attitude of co-operation similar to that of the Chinese local authorities.

2. Regarding the question of the functioning of the Indian Consulate-General and Trade Agencies in the Tibet region of China:

(1) It must be pointed out that the allegation made by the Indian Government in its note that "very strict restrictions have been imposed on the freedom of movement and functioning" of the Indian Consulate-General and Trade Agencies does not tally with the fact at all. This year, despite the very heavy transport duties of the communications departments, the local authorities of the Tibet region of China have provided members of the Indian official organs with the facility of vehicles needed for travel and transportation of supplies. In July this year, the local authorities asked the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa and the Trade Agencies in Gyantse and Yatung respectively to submit their transportation plans month by month so as to include them in the monthly plan of the communications departments so long as possible.

(2) The local authorities of China's Tibet region have never imposed any restrictions on the proper activities of the Indian official organs in Tibet. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs must seriously point out that certain members of the Indian Trade Agencies have repeatedly seizing various opportunities to carry on activities wholly incompatible with their status. For example, the officials of the Indian Trade Agency in Gyantse, during their visit to Pai Chu Monastery in Gyantse, distributed to the lamas donations wrapped in sheets of Indian newspapers carrying anti-Chinese statements and cartoons which slander the Chinese Government as committing aggression and dispatching spies to carry on activities in India, and sow discord in Sino-Soviet, Sino-Burmese and Sino-Nepalese relations. This was obviously an act which impairs friendship between China and India. It is regrettable that, without verifying the facts, the Indian Government should have charged the Chinese Government with failure to afford opportunities for Indian officials to move around to various places and make so-called “cultural contact” with local people; this is difficult to understand.

(3) The Chinese Government holds that whether the local people employed by the Indian organs are willing to continue their service is entirely up to themselves and they have all along enjoyed full freedom in this matter. The allegation in the Indian Government’s note that “local posts” is without factual basis.

3. The question of pilgrims:

In the past several years, the Chinese Government has consistently, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Sino-Indian Agreement and the notes exchanged, given various facilities to Indian pilgrims coming on pilgrimage to the Tibet region of China. For example: lodgings at 18 places have been cleared out by the monasteries around Kang Rimpocha (Kailas) and Mavam Tso (Manasarover) to house the pilgrims; free medical treatment has been given to them and relief to individual poor pilgrims. After the rebellion launched by the Tibetan upper strata reactionaries, the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet informed the Indian Consulate-General in Lhasa that it would be advisable for Indian pilgrims not to come for pilgrimage in 1959. Last summer, when remnant bandits were still making harassment in parts of the Ari District of Tibet, the local authorities also advised Indian pilgrims not to come for pilgrimage for the time being. All this was done out of concern for the safety of the lives and properties of Indian pilgrims. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs believes that the pilgrimage by Indians to China’s Tibet region will return to normal gradually.
4. As regards the questions concerning the Indian Trade Agent in Gartok having remained for a period in Pulan Dzong on his way to Gartok in 1959 and the arrest of some foreign criminals, who were involved in the rebellion, by the military authorities of the Tibet region in the course of quelling the rebellion in Tibet, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs already made explanations in its notes dated September 11, 1959 and February 27, 1960. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will take notice of the explanations set forth in the successive notes of the Chinese Government.

5. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs is much surprised at the hope expressed by the Indian Government in its note that the Chinese Government should “respect the sovereign rights of the Government of India over Minsar in Western Tibet”. Minsar is China's territory, and is a part of the Ari District of China’s Tibet region. Yet the Indian Government now hopes that the Chinese Government on Chinese territory, “respect” the “sovereign rights” of India. The Chinese Government cannot but firmly reject this.

6. As regards the question of China’s boundaries with Bhutan and Sikkim, it was already clarified in Premier Chou En-lai’s letter to His Excellency Prime Minister Nehru, dated September 8, 1959, and the note of the Chinese Foreign Ministry, dated December 26, 1959. Concerning the allegation in the Indian Government’s note that “China might take military steps to occupy” Sikkim and Bhutan, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs already reiterated the Chinese Government’s solemn and just stand in its note of December 26, 1959 and pointed out that “All allegations that China wants to encroach on Bhutan and Sikkim, just like the allegations that China wants to commit aggression against India and other southwestern neighbouring countries, are sheer nonsense”. Now the Indian Government still repeatedly resorts to these allegations, long refuted by the facts, that the Chinese Government wants to commit aggression against its neighbouring countries. The Chinese Government cannot but feel special regret at this.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 31 December 1960.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the note of the Embassy, dated November 26, 1960, has the honour to state as follows:

With regard to the insult offered by Mr. Sundaram, staff member of the Indian Embassy and private secretary to the Indian Ambassador, to a Chinese stewardess during the tour of the Diplomatic Corps, the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs is surprised to note that His Excellency the Indian Ambassador, on the strength of Mr. Sundaram's disavowal, categorically denied the fact, although the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, out of goodwill, adopted a friendly attitude and well-intentionedly informed His Excellency the Indian Ambassador of the truth of the fact in the hope that he would give appropriate criticism and education to his private secretary and guarantee that no similar incidents would recur in the future. In the Embassy's note of November 26, 1960, the Indian Government went so far as to describe this incident as one "deliberately designed to insult the Indian Embassy and bring it into disrepute". The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs is astonished at this assertion by the Indian Government, which disregards the fact and falsely accuses the wronged party, and cannot but express the greatest regret at it.

The truth of the incident has been informed to His Excellency the Indian Ambassador by the Deputy Director of the Protocol Department of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs. At about 6:40 P.M. on November 21, 1960, on board the train from Shaohsing to Hangchow, Mr. Sundaram, on his way from his carriage (No. 7) to carriage No. 9, forcibly embraced a Chinese stewardess standing in front of the service room at one end of carriage No. 8. Mr. Sundaram denied being present at the scene at the time of the incident. But according to His Excellency the Indian Ambassador in his talk with the Deputy Director of the Protocol Department, Mr. Sundaram himself admitted that he was in carriage No. 7 when the train left Shaohsing at 6:00 P.M. on November 21, and that later he went to carriage No. 9. The incident occurred that very evening after the train left Shaohsing at 6:00 P.M. and at the very place at one end of carriage No. 8. Moreover, it was witnessed by a steward from the other end of the carriage (This was referred to when the Deputy Director of the Protocol Department first talked to His Excellency the Indian Ambassador). All this proves that the case is true.

The case could have been settled properly provided the Indian Embassy had respected the fact. On receiving the report from the head steward, the officials of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, having regard for the public reputation of the Indian Embassy and being unwilling to see expansion of the case, tried hard at the time to persuade and restrain the train personnel and in a friendly manner...
informed His Excellency the Indian Ambassador of the truth of the fact, in the hope that the Embassy would deal with the case properly on its own. Contrary to the expectations of the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, His Excellency the Indian Ambassador showed a biased confidence in Mr. Sundaram’s one-sided denial and rejected the fact; at the same time, on the pretexts that there was no Chinese-speaking Indian present and that no investigation could be made on a running train, he rejected the reasonable demand of confronting the two parties concerned in the case so as to clarify right and wrong thus adopting an attitude of mistrust to the goodwill of the Chinese side. Under such circumstances, it was only natural that the train personnel should feel disappointed and dissatisfied with His Excellency the Indian Ambassador’s failure to settle this incident fairly; it was also fully justified that they sent five representatives to lodge face to face protest with Mr. Sundaram. At the time Mr. Sundaram requested that he would ask Mr. Mallukaran, Press Attaché of the Indian Embassy, to accompany him and the representatives of the train personnel agreed to this request. In response to the request of the representatives of the train personnel, Mr. Sundaram, also agreed to go to the scene of the incident for checking. The note of the Embassy has gone so far as to assert that Mr. Sundaram was dragged by personnel of the Protocol Department from the compartment to the scene of the incident, that the officials of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs actively assisted the train personnel in insulting Mr. Sundaram that he was practically imprisoned, that the train personnel adopted an increasingly threatening and violent attitude, etc. Needless to point out, these assertions are entirely untrue, but purely fabrications and slanders. As a matter of fact, in the course when the representatives of the train personnel lodged their protest with Mr. Sundaram, no official of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was present except the interpreter who was asked to go there to interpret. Although the representatives of the train personnel, including the stewardess subjected to insult, were extremely indignant at Mr. Sundaram’s bad attitude of flatly denying the fact and even making false counter-charges, they still maintained proper manners towards Mr. Sundaram. The assertion in the Embassy’s note that the Deputy Director of Protocol Department was in the vicinity of the scene during the whole process was also an arbitrary fabrication. The fact is that on his way to the scene of the incident on learning of the matter, he met the Indian Ambassador and his wife who were already returning from the scene.

The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs wishes to point out that the occurrence and development of the case was entirely caused by the Indian Embassy. It cannot but be deeply regretted that the Indian Embassy not only failed to make due response to the friendly attitude of the Chinese side, but, on the contrary, made charges which were totally in disregard of the facts and devoid of all justification. The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs refuses to accept the entirely groundless protest of the Indian Government and hopes that the Indian Embassy will respect the facts and adopt a cooperative attitude, and that no similar incidents will recur in the future.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Consulate General of India in Lhasa to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Lhasa, 7 January 1961

The Consulate General of India, Lhasa, presents its compliments to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet Region of China and has the honour to refer to the latter's Note dated August 24, 1960, regarding employment of local staff members and servants of Chinese nationality by the Consulate General and the Indian Trade Agencies in Tibet.

2. The Consulate General of India, Lhasa, and the Indian Trade Agencies in Tibet will inform the Foreign Bureau and the Sub Offices of Foreign Affairs concerned of their requirements of Chinese nationals to serve as members of staff or domestic servants. The Consulate General and the Trade Agencies have also noted that the Foreign Bureau and the Sub Offices of Foreign Affairs concerned would like to be informed of any decrease or increase in their personnel and they are agreeable to supply such information at periodical intervals.

3. The Consulate General of India in Lhasa avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet Region of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of India in China to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, 28 January 1961

The Embassy of India in China presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China and, with reference to the note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs dated December 31, 1960, has the honour to state as follows:

The Government of India are shocked to find that in their note of December 31, 1960, the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs persist in defending and commending the unwarranted action of the train personnel in taking the law into their own hands and organizing a violent demonstration, subjecting a member of the Indian Embassy to threats, insults and humiliation, and in completely distorting the facts relating to the deplorable incident on the special train carrying the Diplomatic Corps on November, 22, 1960.

The true facts were stated in their entirety in the note of the Embassy of India dated November 26, 1960. When the Acting Director of Protocol made the charge against Mr. Sundaram, the Ambassador of India made full enquiries. Although his enquiries established that Mr. Sundaram, was innocent, the Ambassador nevertheless expressed willingness to hold a joint investigation in Peking. What the Ambassador did not agree to was the Acting Director's insistent proposal to hold an enquiry on a running train without the members of the Indian Embassy party having a Chinese-knowing Indian interpreter with them. Any impartial observer would agree that an investigation of a charge of such a serious nature should be carried out only under proper conditions and with full facilities being made available for both sides. The Ambassador's decision was therefore in accord with accepted procedure. To describe it as "a failure to settle the incident fairly" is a distortion of the facts. To go further and assert, as the Chinese Ministry's note does, that because the Ambassador declined an unreasonable demand, the train personnel were justified in taking the law into their own hands, is to find a pretext to defend the train personnel's reprehensible conduct.

It is a matter for deep regret that the fact of the incident, which were within the knowledge of the members of the Indian Embassy and many others, should have been distorted as they have been in the Chinese note in order to buttress up a case that does not exist. Soon after the train left Shaohsing Mr. Sundaram had, no doubt left his compartment and entered another compartment in carriage No. 9, but he had already done so by 6-15 p.m., from which time up to dinner at 7-20 p.m. and after dinner, he was continuously in carriage No. 9. Hence the relevant fact is not that he left his compartment that evening, but the time at which he left it; for long before 6-40 p.m., the time of the alleged incident, he was already in the company of several others in carriage No. 9, from where he did not move at all. until 7-20 p.m. and then only in company with others. This fact is within the knowledge of all those in whose company he was from 6-15 p.m. onwards and proves that the charge against Mr. Sundaram is completely false.

Again the Chinese Ministry's note says that Mr. Sundaram "agreed to go to the scene of the incident for checking." This is entirely untrue. When Mr. Sundaram was confronted at the door of his compartment by a group of excited train personnel led by Mr. Shieh, the Foreign Office interpreter, he told Mr. Shieh and the demonstrators that he did not want to leave the compartment and say anything except in the presence of the Ambassador. But the demonstrators refused to allow him to get into touch with the Ambassador. It is wholly incorrect to say that Mr. Sundaram willingly accompanied the demonstrators to carriage No. 8. He was forced and elbowed out of his compartment into the corridor towards carriage No. 3 by the demonstrators. Again, Mr. Sundaram's request in regard to Mr. Kallukaran was not that the latter should accompany him but that the latter should report the matter to the Ambassador. On this point also the Chinese note misstatements the facts.

The note also gives a completely false description of the ugly demonstration. Mr. Sundaram was hemmed in by a gesticulating crowd of train personnel, who were adopting a threatening attitude, shouting abuses and insults and jabbing the air menacingly with their fingers. The demonstrators were certainly more than five in number and nearer 12 or 15. It is completely false to say that the demonstrators adopted "proper manners" towards Mr. Sundaram; on the contrary, they were excited, unruly and most hostile. This fact can be vouched for by the onlookers of the scene who were mostly junior diplomats. The attempt of the Chinese Ministry note to minimise the nature of this preplanned and hostile demonstration is utterly out of keeping with the facts.

It is extremely surprising that the Chinese Ministry's note should deny the facts in regard to the active part played by the Chinese Foreign Office officials in the whole incident. Mr. Shieh, the Foreign Office interpreter, took the demonstrators to Mr. Sundaram's compartment and insisted on his coming out, saying that the demonstrators wanted him. Again, at the scene of the demonstration Mr. Shieh was nearest to Mr. Sundaram, wholly identifying himself with the demonstrators and shouting in English the unseemly abuses and insults hurled at Mr. Sundaram. With the demonstrators was also Mr. Wang, another Foreign Office interpreter, and a few feet away was Miss Kuo, also a Foreign Office interpreter. Both Mr. Wang and Miss Kuo were loudly declaiming and broadcasting among the onlookers the false charges against Mr. Sundaram in an obviously concerted attempt to blacken his reputation. It is a matter for shocked surprise that the Chinese Foreign Office should provide interpreters for hostile demonstrators against their guests.

The statement made in the Embassy's note of November 26, 1960, that the Acting Director or Protocol and the Deputy Director were near the scene of the incident is in accord with the facts. It is surprising that the Chinese note should attempt to maintain that the Deputy Director alone was on his way to the scene of the demonstration as if he had just learnt about it. When the Foreign Office officials must have been aware of it for quite a while, as is proved by the presence of Mr. Shieh with the demonstrators from the very beginning.

In the light of what has been stated above and in the Embassy's note of November 26, 1960, the statement made in the Chinese note that "the occurrence and development of the case was entirely caused by the Indian Embassy" is a complete perversion of the facts. The Government of India refuse to accept the wholly wrong version of the deplorable incident given in the Chinese note and the justification given therein for the demonstrators being allowed to take the law into their own hands. The Government of India strongly renew their protest against the violent demonstration of the train personnel, actively assisted by the officials of the Chinese Foreign Office, and against the deliberate insult offered to the Indian Embassy.

The Embassy of India renews to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 28 March 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the notes delivered by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India on July 27 and November 9, 1960 respectively, has the honour to reply as follows:

1. The local authorities in China's Tibet, in accordance with the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement, received in the same friendly way as in previous years the Indian Trade Agent in Gartok who came to western Tibet in August 1960. They not only provided him with facilities in transport, communications, security guards, etc., but also designated officials of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs to give him help in various ways when he entered and left China and, according to the local conditions, rendered every assistance to him in his daily needs. For this, the Trade Agent himself more than once expressed his gratitude to the local Government. It is regrettable, however, that the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in its note of November 9, 1960 to the Chinese Embassy in India should have disregarded the above-mentioned facts and made utterly unreasonable charges and complaints against the Chinese side. This is what the Foreign Ministry cannot accept.

2. In its note of November 9, 1960, the Indian Ministry of External Affairs reiterated many things concerning trade between China's Tibet and India and the activities of Indian traders in the Tibet region of China which are inconsistent with the facts, and made unwarranted charges against the Chinese side. The Chinese side already made a detailed explanation of its position on this question in the note delivered by the Foreign Ministry to the Indian Embassy in China on December 10, 1960, and no repetition will be made in the present note. However, the Foreign Ministry must sternly point out that the allegation made by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in the above-mentioned note that Chinese traders "enjoy freedom of movement and customary trade in India," is inconsistent with the fact. In recent years, many Chinese traders who went to India for normal trade and Chinese border inhabitants who carried on border trade were continuously subjected to unwarranted questioning and harassment by the Indian side. Regarding this question, the Chinese Foreign Ministry addressed a note to the Indian Embassy in China on September 11, 1959, drawing the attention of the Indian Government on it. Regrettably, however, after that such unfortunate incidents have still occurred one after another, and their nature has become more and more serious. For instance, since May 1960, there have occurred at the Indian checkpost at Chusul several cases of infringement on the human rights in which innocent Chinese traders were detained, beaten and interrogated. Therefore, the Foreign Ministry once again has to call the serious attention of the Indian Government to this question, and ask it to adopt effective measures to prevent the recurrence of such unfortunate incidents so that Chinese traders can go back and forth between the Tibet region of China and India normally.

3. The local authorities in China's Tibet have always, in accordance with the provisions of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement and the notes exchanged, given protection and facilities to Indian pilgrims coming on pilgrimage to western Tibet in China. As for pilgrims who break the law, however, they should be dealt with according to law by the Tibet region. Regarding the medicines carried by Swami Brahmachari Atma Chaitanya, a law-breaking Indian pilgrim, even the list of the above-mentioned medicines given in the July 27, 1960 note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs itself clearly includes many poisons. The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs cannot but express its regret over the fact that the Indian Ministry of External Affairs should have repeatedly tried to defend the law-breaking pilgrims.

In conclusion, the Foreign Ministry reaffirms that the Chinese Government has consistently, in accordance with the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence, acted on the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement on Trade and Intercourse Between the Tibet Region of China and India and the related notes exchanged. Despite certain temporary limitations in facilities and inconveniences faced by the Tibet region at present, the Chinese local authorities have still rendered necessary assistance to Indian officials, traders and pilgrims in their normal activities. The Foreign Ministry hopes that the Indian side will instruct its officials, traders and pilgrims in Tibet to take a co-operative attitude too in the interest of the consolidation and development of the friendship between the peoples of the two countries.

The Foreign Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Consulate General of India in Lhasa to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Lhasa, 18 April 1961

The Consulate General of India in Lhasa presents compliments to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet, Lhasa and has the honour to state that consequent upon the ban placed on the export of animals from the Ari District, many of the Indian traders visiting Ari District for trade were compelled to leave behind their animals such as yaks, sheep etc. with their trading parties in Ari District. As the animals left behind by the Indian traders are their own property, it is, therefore, requested that the authorities of the Ari District may kindly be requested to permit the Indian traders in question to take back their animal properties from Ari District during the forthcoming trading season, or in the alternative they may arrange for adequate compensation to be paid to the individual traders.

This Consulate General would feel grateful if it could be informed of the assistance forthcoming in this respect at an early date so that the traders in question could be informed in time of the procedure to be adopted.

The Consulate General of India in Lhasa takes this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet, Lhasa its assurances of highest consideration.
Note given by the Consulate General of India in Lhasa to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet, Lhasa, 21 April 1961

The Consulate General of India in Lhasa presents compliments to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet, Lhasa and has the honour to invite attention to the meeting of 15 April 1961, between Director YANG KUNG SU and Mr. P. N. KAUL, whereat Director YANG KUNG SU informed Mr. KAUL that the Indian pilgrims could visit Kailash and Mansrover during the forthcoming pilgrimage season, but suggested that entry and exit be restricted through Lipulek Pass only. As per Director YANG's suggestion, action is being taken to inform the intending pilgrims to proceed to Kailash and Mansrover and return therefrom by the Lipulek Pass. It may, however, be observed that the proposed restriction is contrary to Article IV of the Sino-Indian agreement of 1954 which lays down that pilgrims may travel by routes and passes mentioned therein; there is a possibility that some stray pilgrims may go through passes other than the Lipulek Pass.

The Consulate General of India in Lhasa takes this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs its assurances of highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China and, with reference to the Embassy's note dated January 28, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:

Regarding the question of Mr. Sundaram, private secretary to the Indian Ambassador, insulting a Chinese stewardess, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in its reply note to the Embassy of December 31, 1960, has already given a detailed account of the whole truth of the facts and the fair and reasonable attitude adopted by the Chinese side. In its note, the Embassy, still disregarding the facts, has persisted in defending the conduct of Mr. Sundaram, and repeated the previous wholly unreasonable charges and utterly groundless protest against the Chinese side. The Foreign Ministry cannot but express its extreme regret at this. It firmly rejects the unreasonable charges and groundless protest of the Indian Government.

The Foreign Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet, Lhasa, to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa, 16 May 1961

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet region of China has received the letter 21st April 1961 from the Consulate General of India in Lhasa, and, with regard to the question of pilgrimage by the Indian pilgrims to Ari District referred to in that letter, gives reply as follows:

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs wishes to reiterate that the local authorities of China's Tibet region have always done according to the relevant provisions of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement towards those pilgrims who come to Ari for pilgrimage. In view of the fact that at present there are still a very few scattered remnant rebel bandits in Ari District, the local authorities of China's Tibet region, in order to undertake the pilgrims' security, suggest that it would be advisable for them to come and leave through the Lipulek Pass which is also one of the passes as prescribed in the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement. This is not only in conformity with the provisions of the 1954 Sino-Indian agreement, but also is entirely out of goodwill of local authorities concerned for the pilgrims. It is unacceptable that the Indian Consulate General in Lhasa has gone to the length of charging this goodwill suggestion as contravention of the Sino-Indian agreement, the Bureau of Foreign Affairs cannot but express its regret at this unreasonable complaint.

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Consulate General of India in Lhasa presents compliments to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet, Lhasa and has the honour to invite attention to its note of 18 April 1961 in which a request was made for permission to Indian traders visiting Ari District to recover their animal properties left behind because of the ban placed on taking of same out of Tibet Region of China.

As the traders have already started visiting the trade marts in Ari District it is, therefore, requested that an early assurance of assistance may kindly be intimated to this Consulate General.

The Consulate General of India in Lhasa takes this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet, Lhasa its assurances of highest consideration.
Note given by the Consulate General of India in Lhasa to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Lhasa, 5 June 1961

The Consulate General of India in Lhasa presents compliments to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet, Lhasa and has the honour to invite attention to its note of 12 April 1961 requesting for assistance in recovering some moveable properties of Indian lamas left behind in Tibet Region of China. The Consulate General of India shall feel grateful for early assistance in the said matter.

The Consulate General of India takes this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet, Lhasa its assurances of highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 15 July 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in New Delhi and with reference to the note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China dated the March 28, 1961, have the honour to state as follows:

The treatment meted out to Indian traders, pilgrims and members of the Indian Missions in Tibet leaves much to be desired. Indian traders are no longer allowed to barter their goods with the inhabitants of the Tibet region of China. The export of conventional merchandise has been either stopped or controlled by the local authorities. Again facilities to remit normal profits or capital assets in the event of the closure of their trade establishments in Tibet are delayed or not given to Indian traders. In some cases these facilities are offered on a conditional basis. In one way or another the assets of Indian traders in the Tibet Region have been blocked. Loans given by Indian petty and customary traders to inhabitants of Aru region of China's Tibet are yet to be recovered.

In contrast Chinese traders in India have freedom of trade in accordance with tradition and custom. They can barter their goods and carry on their avocations as in the past. The allegation of the Government of China that traders of the Tibet region were subjected to unwarranted questioning and harassment in India is not in accordance with facts. All courtesy is shown to Tibetan traders and their entry into India is allowed in strict accordance with the provisions of the 1954 Agreement.

In regard to Indian pilgrims, the Government of China had advised that they should not go to Kailash and Mansrovar. Such of them as were able to visit the holy places were not permitted to perform the Parikrama. This year the Chinese authorities have allowed Indian pilgrims to enter and leave Tibet through Lipulekh Pass only. This is not in accordance with the 1954 Agreement.

The Indian Missions in Tibet region are facing many difficulties. They have been deprived of all social, cultural, and other normal contacts with the local inhabitants; their movements have been restricted and impediments continuously placed in the construction of buildings for Indian Trade Agencies. Thus, the provisions of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 have been circumvented.

In regard to paragraph 2 of the Chinese note relating to the alleged harassment of Chinese traders by the Indian checkpost in May, 1960 near Chusul, the Ministry of External Affairs would point out that the Government of India do not maintain any army or police checkpost at Dingroze where the Chinese nationals are said to have been detained. Further, as far as the Government of India are aware, there is no such place called Zaha. Therefore, the allegations regarding Chinese nationals being detained and harassed at Dingroze checkpoint are without any foundation. The Government of India are unable to accept these unfounded accusations. It may be of interest to the Chinese Government that to date, no trader from the Tibet region has found it necessary to lodge any complaint of harassment with the local authorities at Chusul in India.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Indian Trade Agency in Gartok to the Ari Region Office of the Tibetan Bureau of Foreign Affairs, 21 July 1961

Indian Trade Agency, Gartok presents its compliments to the Foreign Bureau of Ari Region in Tibet of the People’s Republic of China and with reference to the discussions between the Foreign Bureau Chief and Indian Trade Agent at Gartok on 20th July, 1961 has the honour to forward herewith the plan of the portion of our Agency buildings to be constructed this year along with a list of our requirements of labour, materials etc. It will be highly appreciated if a favourable reply is given as early as possible to enable our Engineer to start construction, as the working season is very short in Western Tibet as also to enable the Trade Agent to return to Taklakot for starting tour of Trade Marts which is already getting late.

Looking forward to your co-operation, this Agency avails this opportunity to renew to the Foreign Bureau the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 26 August 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India and have the honour to bring to the Embassy’s notice the uncooperative attitude of the local authorities of the Tibet region of China in facilitating the construction of the Indian Trade Agent building at Gartok. Paragraph 12 of the Notes exchanged between the representatives of the Government of India and China at the time of the conclusion of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 provides that the three Trade Agencies of both the parties may function throughout the year. In paragraph 4 of the said Note, the Government of the People’s Republic of China undertook to render all possible assistance for housing the Indian Trade Agency at Gartok. Accordingly, the Indian Trade Agent, Gartok, approached the authorities of Ari district of Tibet region of China for suitable accommodation to house the Trade Agency. In October, 1954, he was told that they would not be able to provide a house for the Trade Agency but would lease land for the purpose. In spite of the fact that this offer was accepted, it took more than three years to finalise the terms of the lease-deed for the land on which the building of the Indian Trade Agency, Gartok was to be constructed. The final draft of the lease-deed was handed over by the Indian Consul-General, Lhasa to the Chinese Foreign Bureau in January 1958, but no acceptance was received from the Foreign Bureau till October, 1958, when the working season at Gartok was over. Owing to the demand of the local authorities that the Trade Agent should enter via Lipulekh Pass though he had by then actually reached the Niti Pass caused further delay in the conclusion of the lease-deed which was actually signed in October, 1959, and thus making any construction impossible during that year.

2. During 1960, the Trade Agent, Gartok party which included Engineering staff was stopped by the local authorities while they were on their way to Western Tibet. The Indian Consul-General, Lhasa was informed on the 29th June that the Trade Agent, Gartok and his party should not enter Tibet till the 15-20th July. As the season would have been far too advanced for any constructions, when the party would have reached Gartok, the Engineering Staff was withdrawn. Early in 1961, the Consul-General, Lhasa, again broached the subject with the Foreign Bureau and he was told that the local authorities would assist in the construction of mud huts with sun-dried mud bricks. On 23rd May, 1961, a Memorandum was handed over to the Embassy in which it was stated that an Indian officer with technical experience would be deputed to Gartok in order to see that the construction is in accordance with our requirements. In the memorandum, the hope was expressed that the construction would be completed during this year. Accordingly, a Technical Officer accompanied the Trade Agent to Western Tibet. They reached Taklakot on the 2nd July, 1961. The Trade Agent requested the Foreign Bureau representative to arrange for transport for the Technical Officer to proceed to Gartok for construction work as soon as possible. He was informed, however, that the Foreign Bureau representative had no knowledge about the construction programme. The Trade Agent was also asked to consult the local authorities at Gartok about the construction. Thereupon, the Trade Agent and the Technical Officer left Taklakot for Gartok. On arrival there, the Trade Agent approached the Foreign Bureau on 20th July, 1961, for facilities in regard to construction of the Agency building. The Chief of the local Foreign Bureau told him that he should first supply a blue-print of the building plans and then he would be able to let him know the concrete assistance which could be extended. The plan and the list of requirements were supplied to the Foreign Bureau immediately, but there was no response.

3. On July 26, 1961, the Chief of the Foreign Bureau informed the Trade Agent that he had not till then received any instructions in the matter and that he did not know how long these would take to reach. Further, on August 13, 1961, the Technical Officer was informed that material, tools and plant, including moulds for making bricks and masons were not available and that the position regarding unskilled labour was under consideration.

4. In the meanwhile, the Foreign Bureau also demanded Rs. 7,112 as the price for the old stock of rubble and 11,685 mud bricks which have been lying on the site since 1956. According to the information available with the Government of India 37,800 bricks and some quantities of earth and gravel were collected by the Garpons on the site during 1956. They had demanded a sum of Rs. 11,029 for all this material. Since the Indian Trade Agent had, at no time, placed a firm order with the Garpons for this material, the Government of India naturally could not accept the responsibility for the payment. Thereupon, the local authorities removed a major portion of this material for their own use. In the circumstances, the demand for Rs. 7,112 for 11,000 bricks, half of them unserviceable, and some quantities of gravel and earth is very unreasonable, especially as the local authorities had themselves taken 26,115 bricks for Rs. 3,917 only. However, in spite of the fact that the price demanded is exorbitant, the Trade Agent has offered to pay in the hope that construction will begin immediately. The trade Agent has been informed now that instructions are being sought from the higher authorities.

5. The above facts will prove beyond any doubt that the local authorities of Ari region, by adopting dilatory tactics, are making impossible the construction of the Trade Agency building and thus preventing the Trade Agency from functioning in Gartok throughout the year. In contrast, the three Chinese Trade Agencies in India function all the year round. Consequently, the principle of reciprocity accepted in Article I of the 1954 Agreement has not been honoured fully. Even at this late stage, the Government of India urge the Government of China to instruct the local authorities concerned to render all possible assistance in the construction of a Trade Agency building during the current working season.

6. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Indian traders who went to Western Tibet sometimes stored their unsold goods with the Bhutanese Officer at Dharchin on the conclusion of the trading season. They did so in 1959. However, in October 1959, the Bhutanese Officer, Sonam Rajye left for India leaving his house in the charge of a watchman, and in his absence the Chinese local authorities sealed the house. When the Indian traders visited Western Tibet in 1960 and wanted to take delivery of the goods which they had left with the Bhutanese Officer, the Chinese local authorities refused to deliver the goods to them and insisted that the Bhutanese Officer should come there personally to hand over the goods. Our Trade Agent enquired whether the production of a letter of authority from the Bhutanese Officer would be acceptable but this apparently did not find favour with the local authorities.

On this account the Indian traders concerned have been put to great hardship. According to our information, there are at least 23 Indian traders whose goods are lying sealed in that house and these goods are valued at about fifty thousand rupees.

The Government of India have received a number of representations from these traders requesting their intercession in the return of these goods. The traders have pointed out that these goods deposited by them with the Bhutanese Officer in 1959 were not returned to them by the watchman under instructions of the Chinese authorities.

Our Trade Agent at Gartok has been authorised by these traders to receive the goods on their behalf and the Bhutanese Officer has also signified his approval to the handing over of these goods to the traders concerned through the Trade Agent.

We have already drawn the attention of the Chinese Government to this problem in the note sent to the Chinese Embassy on the 9th November, 1960, but the note remains unanswered. Our Trade Agent, Gartok again tried to discuss this question with the Chief of the Local Foreign Bureau on the 20th July, 1961 but the Chief evaded the question on the ground that it was beyond his competence.

The Embassy would perhaps appreciate that the sufferers in this case are poor Indian traders who had in good faith left their unsold merchandise in the Bhutanese Officer’s house. The Bhutanese Officer himself is willing to return these goods to their Indian owners. If there is any particular procedure which the Chinese authorities would wish to follow in this matter, this may be intimated to us soon particularly as further delay may mean deterioration of the goods. Government of India on their part are willing to take over the goods and arrange for their return to their owners, and have authorised their Trade Agent in this behalf. Early facilities in this regard by the Chinese authorities would be greatly appreciated.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 6 September 1961

It is with regret that the Government of India are bringing the following facts of life at Gyantse to the notice of the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China:—

(i) On about the 28th July, 1961 two seasonal gardeners and a watchman were asked by the Area Leaders at Gyantse to stop working for the Indian Trade Agency. The three workers accordingly stopped working for the Agency from 1st August 1961.

(ii) Two local boys are working as domestic servants for some officials of the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse. They are under pressure through their parents to give up working for Indian officials. If their help is withdrawn from the Indian officials, the latter will have to do their own cooking and washing. As it is these officials live in Gyantse separated from their families who are unable to join them in Gyantse for want of accommodation.

(iii) Shri N. R. Sharma, a member of the engineering staff at Gyantse, took ill on 27th July, 1961, and his condition sharply deteriorated on the afternoon of 28th July. As the Indian Trade Agency at Gyantse is not entitled to approach the local doctor direct and has to do so through the local Foreign Bureau, an official of the Agency was urgently despatched to move the Foreign Bureau for a doctor. However, the English Interpreter of the Foreign Bureau through whom alone an approach can be made to the Foreign Bureau raised the issue that in order to see him, an official of the Indian Trade Agency must first write and ask for an appointment. As the matter was urgent and could not wait for the correct performance of protocol requirements, the official of the Indian Trade Agency pressed the English Interpreter for help in obtaining the services of a doctor. Thus a precious hour was lost before a doctor could be obtained. The patient died. Upon his death the Indian Trade Agency asked for a death certificate which was refused on the ground that the local regulations did not permit the issue of a death certificate. The deceased was cremated on 29th July. His family was informed, and they were anxious to have his ashes for the performance of death rites which are held on the 13th day after death. In order to have the ashes sent in time for the death rites, arrangements were made to despatch an official of the Indian Trade Agency with the ashes to India. It was in these circumstances that a letter was addressed by the Trade Agency to the Foreign Bureau on 3rd August 1961.
asking for travel permit and re-entry visa for Shri Bharadwaj who was due to leave for India on 5th August 1961 with the ashes. Till 0700 hours on 5th August nothing was heard from the Foreign Bureau. An urgent letter was therefor sent to the Foreign Bureau as a reminder. The person who took the letter to the Foreign Bureau was asked to go back because the Foreign Bureau was very busy. On his return at about 1030 hours, on 5th August another letter was sent to the Foreign Bureau explaining the urgency of the request. The Foreign Bureau replied later that the matter was being reported and a further reply would be sent on 7th August. On 7th August the Foreign Bureau responded by inquiring whether Shri Bharadwaj was travelling alone or was being accompanied. Not until the evening of 7th August did the Foreign Bureau find it convenient to issue the necessary travel permit to Shri Bharadwaj, and the latter could therefore leave Gyantse only on 8th August. The result was that the ashes did not reach Delhi in time for the death rites on the 13th day after the death.

The attention of the Embassy is drawn to the Agreement between India and China on Trade and Intercourse between Tibet Region of China and India (1954), wherein the two Governments have agreed that “The Trade Agencies of both Parties shall be accorded the same status and same treatment”.

Item (7) of the Notes exchanged between the two Governments on April 29, 1954 contains the provision “The Trade Agents and traders of both countries may hire employees in the locality”.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India and with reference to the Note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China dated the 12th December, 1960, have the honour to state as follows:—

Accommodation

2. A few facts are mentioned below in regard to the construction of buildings for the Indian Trade Agencies at Gyantse and Gartok. These facts speak for themselves and are sufficient to belie the Chinese Government’s contention that they did their best to render ‘energetic’ assistance, in accordance with the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement, to the Indian Missions in Tibet.

(a) Indian Trade Agency, Gartok

3. In its Note No. 7(16)/NEF/56-111, dated 26th August 1961 the Government of India has already drawn attention to the unhelpful and uncooperative attitude of the local authorities in Ari District of Tibet in providing suitable accommodation to the Indian Trade Agency, Gartok. Though negotiations in the matter were started as early as October, 1954, the Agency has still no building of its own. Nor has it been given any facility to rent accommodation in order to function at Gartok permanently as provided for in paragraph 12 of the Notes exchanged between the representatives of the Governments of India and China on the 29th April, 1954.

4. The Indian draft of the lease for land, on which the Indian Trade Agency is to be constructed was based on mutually agreed principles and was handed over by the Indian Consulate-General to the Foreign Bureau at Lhasa in January 1958 but final acceptance was not communicated by the Foreign Bureau till October 1958 making any construction impossible in that year. The construction was further rendered impossible during 1959 and 1960 as the Chinese local authorities first delayed the entry of the Trade Agent in Western Tibet and then declined to give him the necessary facilities to proceed with the construction. Government of India even accepted the Lhasa Foreign Bureau’s suggestion that the construction programme of the Indian Trade Agency, Gartok, be phased in parts. This year again an Indian Engineer was attached to the Trade Agent’s party after full discussion with the Foreign Bureau, Lhasa and with knowledge of the Chinese Embassy here. At every stage Government of India fell in line with the wishes of the local authorities in Tibet but to no avail. The year 1961 has gone by without any progress being made which is entirely due to the unreasonable and obstructive attitude to the local authorities.

5. The Chinese note under reply has referred to their promise of assistance in building temporary local type houses. In fact when the Indian Consulate-General at Lhasa broached the matter with the Foreign Bureau in May this year, the latter stated that even these temporary houses would have to be no more than mud huts because stones could not be made available. The offer to send stone masons from India was turned down. On 16th May, 1961, the Foreign Bureau offered to supply only sun-dried bricks. This was accepted along with the broad assurance that labour and other materials required for this primitive type of construction would be forthcoming. In the event when our Trade Agent reached Gartok on the 18th of July and approached the Foreign Bureau for the promised assistance, he was told that he must first submit a blue print of the building plans before the nature of any concrete assistance to be provided could be made known to him. The plans were supplied on the same day but there was no response. On the 26th July, 1961, the Foreign Bureau, instead of giving assistance, put forward another condition, namely, that the Trade Agent should first arrange to pay Rs. 7,112 on account of an old stock of rubble and mud bricks lying on the site since 1956. Unless this payment was made, the Foreign Bureau warned, no assistance would be provided nor would construction of the huts be allowed to commence. The Trade Agent sought in vain to explain that the local Foreign Bureau had raised a new issue which had no relation to the assistance they were committed to provide for the construction work. The fact is that this old stock of rubble and brick was brought to the site by the then local Garpons without any order having been placed with them. The Chinese had themselves removed two-thirds of the total stock of bricks for Rs. 3,917 approximately leaving a third of mostly unserviceable bricks for compulsory sale to the Indian Trade Agency at a cost of Rs. 7,112. Rather than give the Chinese local authorities an excuse to justify their obstructive and delaying tactics the Indian Trade Agent offered immediate payment of the amount demanded by the Foreign Bureau. At this stage the Chinese authorities insisted that payment should be made at Gartok. This was an impracticable proposition as the Trade Agent was on tour of the Trade marts, and was in no position to return to Gartok earlier than the end of September 1961. Although the payment for bricks was made early in October, there was no move on the part of the Foreign Bureau to extend assistance in the way of labour, material etc. for the start of construction. At the end of the trading season the Trade Agent left Gartok for Takalakot en route to India without being able to construct a single ‘mud’ hut.

6. Such are the facts. Had there been ‘energetic’ assistance from the Chinese local authorities as asserted in the Chinese note, there should have been a few mud-huts to show for it. Instead, nothing has been achieved except frustration. Government of India’s patient and laborious efforts to put up some kind of shelter for their Trade Agency at Gartok have been ‘energetically’ and successfully defeated. It is apparent that the Chinese authorities were determined to make it impossible for the Government of India to have buildings of their own at Gartok during the currency of the 1954 Agreement.

(b) Gyantse

7. At Gyantse it was the same story. Earlier notes state the position reached in the latter half of 1960 regarding the protracted negotiations for lease of land to the Trade Agency at Gyantse.
8. In November 1960 the Government of India had agreed to the new draft lease as proposed by the Chinese authorities. All that remained to be done was demarcation of the physical boundaries of the land for incorporation in the draft lease. The Chinese had earlier suggested that the Indian side should surrender some land along the river bank in exchange for land to the north and north-east of the Indian Trade Agency's existing site. The Government of India agreed to this.

9. On 22nd November 1960, the Consulate-General, Lhasa, was informed that instructions were being issued to Foreign Bureau, Gyantse to finalise the boundaries and sign the lease. However, on 9th December when the Indian Trade Agent approached the Foreign Bureau, Gyantse, he was told that the matter was still under examination. On January 5th, 1961, when approached again, the local Foreign Bureau informed the Indian Trade Agent that they could not finalise the boundaries until the lease for the buildings rented by the Trade Agent at Gyantse was signed. The Trade Agent was taken by surprise. The two matters were wholly unrelated. Foreign Bureau, Gyantse, however, insisted on compliance with this condition. Judging from subsequent delays, this was a further deliberate move to delay finalisation of the lease.

10. Urged on by the Indian Trade Agent, the local Foreign Bureau at last indicated the proposed boundaries to him in March, 1961, but to his great surprise the boundaries indicated differed from those agreed to earlier by him and the Foreign Bureau. Going back on the earlier understanding the Chinese side had now offered, instead of areas to the North and North-East of the site, areas to the South-East which were near the river bank and vulnerable to flood and erosion. The Foreign Bureau simultaneously raised another demand viz. removal of protective works which the Agency had per force to construct at considerable cost in order to prevent the continual erosion of the Agency lands—a danger greatly enhanced by the 'protective works' which the Chinese had themselves undertaken at another point on the river.

11. Thus, despite patient effort and a keen desire to accommodate the Chinese on every point, the Trade Agent found it impossible to sign the lease deed, much less to begin any construction work till the end of this year.

12. The Agency continues to be housed in rented accommodation insufficient for its needs. Repeated requests for additional rented accommodation have gone unheeded. Even the lease deed for the rented buildings in Gyantse could not be finalised because of diverse obstacles put up by the local Foreign Bureau, which sought inter alia to impose a condition that the Lessee should be responsible for damage to trees even from natural causes.

13. The facts cited above in regard to Gyantse and Gartok leave no room for doubt that far from giving "energetic" assistance to the Trade Agencies in the matter of construction the Chinese side has used devious means to cause delays and make it impossible for the Government of India to have buildings of their own either at Gyantse or at Gartok. The result is that only two of three Agencies stipulated for are able to function through the year in Tibet. Chinese Missions in India, by comparison, are very comfortably accommodated.

14. The Government of India are unable to accept any suggestion from the Chinese side that its officers in Tibet have shown an uncooperative attitude or indulged in improper activities. This is manifestly absurd because no one much less a foreigner can afford to be uncooperative or act improperly on Chinese territory where they must live under rigid controls. It is no surprise therefore that while the Chinese note speaks of improper activities and uncooperative attitude of Indian officials, no example is cited. The Government of India knows only too well how under the most trying conditions its officers have endeavoured to establish rapport with the Chinese authorities in Tibet. If they have failed the blame lies on the other side. The local authorities in Tibet have for long shown a studied discourtesy in their dealings with the Indian Agencies. Appointments, on request, are unduly delayed. Local regulations are not communicated to the Missions even when requests for them are made. For instance in October 1961, Indian Trade Agency asked for a copy of the regulations governing trade at Yatung. The Foreign Bureau declined to meet this request on the ground that the traders should themselves have asked for it. Apart from the discourtesy this attitude puts the Trade Agency in an invidious position since it is not in a position to comply or advise compliance with regulations which are not made known to it.

15. Indian Missions in Tibet have continued to suffer from restrictions placed on their movements and contacts. They are restricted to the municipal limits of the station beyond which they cannot go without a permit from the local Foreign Bureau. Permits are also necessary if a car of one Mission has to go to another. They are stopped for meeting local visitors, or inviting local political or religious personalities except through the Foreign Bureau.

16. The Chinese side has often argued that there are no restrictions on the Indian Missions in Tibet. While all restrictions may not have been reduced to writing, they not only do exist but are rigidly enforced. These restrictions are part of the facts of life for India's Missions in Tibet. The Chinese side should know better the many direct and indirect restrictions imposed on Indian Missions in order to circumscribe their field of activity and render them completely immobile and helpless. Local people, for instance, are under pressure not to have any contacts with the Indian Missions. There is no written restriction in this regard but it is no less effective for that matter. In every way Indian Missions in Tibet are paralysed, rendered ineffective, immobilised and insulated from the life of the people.

17. Transport requirements of the Indian Missions are held up as a matter of deliberate policy. Reminders bring no response. In consequence rations and essential stores meant for staff members of the Indian Consulate General, Lhasa and the Trade Agency, Gyantse are held up at Yatung for long periods.

18. Furthermore, Indian Missions do not even have the option of choosing their local employees either for official or domestic work.
The Chinese note dated the 24th August 1960 has decreed that recruitment of local people shall be through the Foreign Bureau only. At the same time the local employees are under pressure not to serve Indian Missions or Indian personnel.

19. The Note para. 2(ii) has revived an old charge against the Indian Trade Agent, Gyantse. Some traditional gifts were sent to the monastery in question wrapped in old news paper sheets. Surely it is not being seriously suggested by the Chinese side that the Trade Agent used this silly means to carry out so-called anti-Chinese propaganda contained in these crumpled up newspaper sheets. The next thing the Chinese side might suggest is that the Trade Agent used this underhand means to teach these Tibetan monks a foreign language viz English for it would be conceded that not one of the monks of this monastery had any knowledge of this language with which these sheets were printed. The Government of India cannot but treat this charge with the levity it deserves.

20. The traditional pilgrimage from India to Kailash and Mansarovar has continued to suffer from lack of rest-house, medical and other facilities. Nor is any protection given to the pilgrims. Though paragraph 10 of the Notes exchanged between the representatives of the two Governments in 1954 provides that the Government of China will, as far as possible, construct rest houses for the use of pilgrims along the route from Taklakot to Kailash and Mansarovar, little has been done in the past seven years. One rest-house only was constructed at Rakshastal, and even this is reported to be sodden and sloppy, and in a state of collapse. The 18 other places said to have been abandoned by the monasteries and reserved for the use of Indian pilgrims have little to recommend themselves for the tiny rooms in them are said to be full of grime and dirt, and there is no arrangement for cooking. Government of India's offer to supply timber for the construction of separate rest-houses for the pilgrims has not, of course, been accepted. Medical aid is not easily had and can be obtained only with the permission of the military authorities at Taklakot.

21. Minsar as the Chinese Government must be aware is a part of the State of Jammu and Kashmir, and revenue was paid by that village to the State of Jammu and Kashmir until quite recently. There is a wealth of evidence in census reports and revenue records to prove Minsar's connection with Kashmir, and the Tibetan Government has always respected this fact. The Chinese Government's illegal occupation of Minsar and rejection of Government of India's sovereign rights over it constitute an entirely unjustifiable act of aggression. In this connection the attention of the Chinese Government is drawn to the Officials' Report on the Boundary Question where overwhelming evidence to prove that Minsar is a part of Jammu and Kashmir is marshalled.

22. Finally, the Government of India welcomes the assurance that its apprehensions regarding the aggressive intentions of China towards Bhutan and Sikkim which are bound to India by special treaty relations, are "sheer nonsense".

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 16 November 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China, dated 10th December, 1960 have the honour to state that, as explained earlier in the Ministry's Note of 10th May 1961, Indian traders, customary as well as petty, have continued to suffer from various restrictions and disabilities in Tibet.

2. The Government of India has no intention of interfering in the internal affairs of China but in regard to the measures taken by the Chinese authorities to devalue and demonetise Tibetan currency which adversely affected the interests of Indian traders in Tibet, there is a legitimate issue for discussion between the two Governments under the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 on Trade and Inter-course between Tibet Region of China and India. Necessary protection was not afforded by the Chinese to the property and financial interests of Indian traders whose accumulation of Tibetan currency from sales of Indian merchandise was considerably reduced by these monetary manipulations which the Chinese Note describes innocuously as "currency reform".

3. Regarding trade payments Art. VII of the Trade Agreement between the Republic of India and the People's Republic of China signed on 14th October 1954, as amended by the exchange of letters of May 1957, provides as follows:—

Para 1—All commercial and non-commercial payments between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India may be effected in Indian rupees.

Para 4—Payments for border trade between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India will be settled according to the customary practice.

4. The Chinese Note argues that the above provisions do not apply to trade in Tibet. Apart from the specific mention of "border trade between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India" in the paragraph cited above, the letters exchanged between the Governments of India and China on 14th October 1954 which form part of the Trade Agreement of 1954 state inter alia that "both Governments desire to maintain and develop the existing customary trade between India and the Tibet Region of People's Republic of China". There is no doubt at all that the provisions of the Trade Agreement of 1954 were meant to apply to the Tibet region to give formal sanction to the existing customary practice in that region. Nevertheless, in disregard of the Agreement, new restrictive measures in the matter of trade payments were issued by the Chinese Government during the currency of the Agreement.

5. It has been customary for Indian border traders to barter goods direct with Tibetans without any official interference and to bring pack Tibetan goods freely to India. Cash proceeds if any, of the trade was customarily brought back in bullion, silver dollars, coins and/or Indian currency. Thus Indian traders were able to return to India with their capital assets as well as normal profits whenever they wished to do so. At no time during the long course of this traditional border trade were Indian traders obliged to give an undertaking to bring back goods of equal value in return for facilities for the transfer of their assets. Under the new restrictive and arbitrary measures introduced in Tibet in violation of the International engagements cited above, Indian traders are unable to repatriate their profits and assets from Tibet. Remittance facilities are not being granted and applications in this behalf are being held up, even when an Indian firm is winding up its business in Tibet. To take a recent instance. M/s Tibet Motor & Cycle Co., an Indian firm at Yatung which served notice of its intention to close, has been given a bank draft for Yuans 5,220 only thereby compelling the firm to leave the balance of its assets amounting to Yuans 43,957.26 on deposit with a local bank. One result of the restrictive trade and fiscal policy of the Chinese authorities in Tibet has been the sharp decline in the number of Indian shops at Yatung. Many were forced to withdraw because of the loss incurred as a result of the sudden devaluation of Tibet currency and the lack of facilities to repatriate trade assets. The Chinese authorities in Tibet have also interfered in the direct barter deals of petty border traders and have imposed various restrictions on normal exports of the conventional produce of Tibet to India. In other ways, too, the Chinese authorities have interfered with the customary practices of Indo-Tibetan trade. Indian border traders customarily left their unsold merchandise and animals at the end of the trading season with their Tibetan friends and/or officials. Since 1959 the Chinese authorities asked Indian traders to take back their unsold merchandise with them to India. When the Chinese authorities were apprised of transport and other difficulties they allowed the Indian traders to keep their merchandise with local Tibetans but without any guarantee of safety. Some Indian traders kept their goods in the house of the Bhutanese officer at Tharchin. This house was later sealed by the local authorities and our traders were refused permission to reclaim their goods in the trading seasons of 1960 and 1961. Meantime the goods deteriorated but there was no redress. Although this was a legitimate trade matter, the Foreign Bureau refused to discuss it with India’s Trade Agent. An approach had to be made by the Government of India to the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi in the matter. At the close of the 1961 trading season when the passes were about to be snow-bound, the Chinese Embassy informed the Ministry, on 21st October 1961, that Indian traders could take back their goods left at Tharchin. This belated offer was of no practical help to the Indian traders concerned.

6. As the Chinese Government are no doubt aware border traders have been going across the Himalayan passes from time immemorial carrying their merchandise on the back of sheep and goats to the trade marts in Western Tibet or in search of Tibetan Dokpas (peasants) with whom they bartered goods. In this traditional trade and intercourse there has been a real problem regarding the safe storage of merchandise. To meet this necessary requirement of the trade, a provision was made in para 13 of the Notes Exchanged between the Governments of India and China on 29th April 1954 which reads:

“The traders of each country may rent buildings and godowns in accordance with local regulations in places under the jurisdiction of the other Party”.

No such facility was in fact provided to the Indian traders by the Chinese authorities in Tibet. Again, as has been pointed out earlier, it is customary for Indian traders to use sheep and goats as pack animals to carry merchandise to Western Tibet, and to leave these animals with their Tibetan friends at the end of the trading season. The ban imposed on the return of these animals to India is tantamount to confiscation of animals owned by Indian traders. This ban is ultimately bound to affect the trade. At any rate, if the Indian owners cannot bring back their animals, they should be allowed to sell them, or in the event of outright confiscation, they should be given fair compensation.

7. Furthermore, there are large amounts of unsettled trade claims and credits of Indian traders in Tibet. Facilities for the recovery of these loans have not been given by the Chinese local authorities. Some Tibetan debtors have moved away to Lhasa or Shigatse but Indian traders are not allowed to go to these places to contact their debtors. Even where Tibetan debtors are present in the locality, the Chinese authorities do not allow Indian traders to contact them. Some of these debtors are reported to be under Chinese detention but no access to them is permitted. Attention of the Government of China was drawn to this important question in the Government of India Note of 17th May 1960 but there has been no promise of relief.

8. From time to time the Chinese Government has asked the Government of India to ‘advise Indian traders to respect the regulations of the local authorities of China’s Tibet region’. There is something mysterious about these local regulations which are not published and communicated to the Indian Trade Missions in Tibet even when requests are made for them. In October 1961, the Indian Trade Agent, Yatung asked for a copy of the regulations governing trade at Yatung. The local Foreign Bureau declined to meet his request. Apart from the discourtesy this negative attitude puts the Trade Agency in an invidious position since it is not in a position to comply or advise compliance with regulations which are not made known to it. In fact there has been a bumper crop of new regulations since 1959. Again in the application of these regulations there has been wide or confusing variations. Whenever unfair and arbitrary action was taken by the local authorities against Indian traders and pilgrims, India’s Trade Agents made representations to the Foreign Bureaus. But the latter did not accept the complaints of India’s Trade Agents in these matters describing them as ‘consular business’.

9. It has been alleged that Indian traders sometimes failed to deliver goods within the period stipulated in the contracts, and sometimes they failed to supply goods according to specifications. This is not surprising as some of these traders were compelled to enter into contracts which they were not in a position to fulfil. The Government of India are informed that Indian traders are being forced to sign contracts in return for remittance facilities. It is obvious that this practice violates the spirit of the April 1954 Agreement.

10. Regarding the reference to export control orders made in the Chinese Note, these are not unilateral but rather the result of the arbitrary stoppage of exports of conventional Tibetan produce like borax and animals, and restrictive exports of wool and Pashmina to India.

11. In every way, therefore, the Chinese authorities have sought to strangle the traditional trade and intercourse between India and Tibet and to undermine the foundations of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954. Violating the stipulations of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 they have only recently refused permission to 15 Indian traders to trade at Yatung, which is a mart recognised by Article II of the Agreement. These traders had entered Tibet with valid traders certificates issued by competent Indian authorities in terms of Art. V(i) of the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954. Further, an Indian firm, M/s. Indarchand Nathmall, Yatung, which had been trading at Yatung or many years was stopped from carrying on its normal business after it had withdrawn its application for the closure of the establishment. All this can hardly be said to be in consonance with the principles enunciated in the 1954 Agreement.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Statement made by the Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs of China to the Indian Ambassador, 21 October 1960

"We have received reports from our Embassy in India to the effect that, in the morning of September 26 this year, the Police Commissioner in Kalimpong called on Mr. MA CHU-TSAI an old Chinese national and on pretext of wanting him for inquiry at the Police Office took him there under custody. Then MA was arrested under guard to the court and imprisoned on the pretext that he was allegedly involved in the murder of an old Lama. On September 27 the Police Officer further searched MA's house and took away his tonic medicine and other belongings.

For this case Mr. HSU JEN our Deputy Trade Agent in Kalimpong several times made representation with the local District Head and yet the Indian local authorities have hitherto failed to provide any reason and evidence warranting the arrest of Mr. MA. Mr. MA has been residing in Kalimpong for 40 years; he has always abided by the laws and is on good terms with the Chinese nationals both Han and Tibetans and enjoys a good reputation there. Mr. MA is 71 years of age and weak and sickly. After being imprisoned without warrants no bail is allowed nor visit or delivery of food and medicine by his family. This is totally against the humanitarian spirit.

As for the allegation that Mr. MA is involved in the murder of an old Lama this is a sheer fabrication. In fact Mr. MA has never been acquainted nor had any contact with the murderer. There is obviously something else behind the scenes when an old man who has always abided by the laws should have been charged with involvement in a murder case. The local authorities of Kalimpong have repeatedly refused to see our Deputy Trade Agent and even denied him access to Mr. MA in accordance with provisions relating to the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement. All these acts are obviously not in the interest of the friendly relations between China and India.

It is also necessary to recall that since June this year the Indian local authorities in Calcutta and Kalimpong have successively given orders without any justification for Mr. CHIANG WEN-KUEI, Manager of the Bank of China, Calcutta, and other responsible persons in charge of cultural and welfare undertakings of the Chinese nationals in the localities totalling over 30, to leave India within a limited period of time. Our Embassy in India on September the 2nd and again on October the 17th made representations with the Ministry of External Affairs of your country explaining that these persons have been lawfully living in India for a long time and they all have proper occupations, have always abided by local laws and regulations, actively upheld Sino-Indian friendship and living in amity with the local people and expressing the hope that the Government of India would permit them to continue their stay. However this question has up to now failed to be settled reasonably; on the contrary an ever increasing number of Chinese nationals have been ordered to leave India within a set time limit. Moreover in its reply dated October 17 the Ministry of External Affairs of your country even asserted that these Chinese nationals told to leave India are “persons who for over a period of time have been reported to be associating and participating in activities which are prejudicial to Indian national interests”. We cannot agree at all to this reply. It must be pointed out that it is the consistent policy pursued by our Government to instruct the Chinese nationals to live in amity with the local people to abide by laws and regulations of the country they reside in and not to participate in the political activities of the locality. It is inconceivable that the charge of “associating and participating in activities which are prejudicial to Indian national interests” should be made without any grounds against these law abiding Chinese nationals. It is indeed difficult to understand why Indian local authorities should have given such unreasonable treatment to the nationals of a friendly country in such a great hurry.

The above mentioned events have already impaired the proper rights and interests as well as the rights of lawful residents of the Chinese nationals whose life and human rights are endangered. The continuous occurrence of these events in India have aroused the extreme uneasiness of the broad masses of Chinese nationals and our Government express serious concern over this situation. Proceeding from its desire to safeguard the traditional friendly relations between the Chinese and Indian people and to truly ensure the life and property of the Chinese nationals the Government of your country is requested immediately to adopt effective measures to release the innocent and falsely accused Mr. MA CHU-TSAI to give the broad masses of Chinese nationals who abide by the laws including those who were informed of leaving India within a set time-limit the rights of lawful residents to stop the various unreasonable measures adopted by the local authorities to order Chinese nationals to leave India and to prevent disruptive activities of Tibetan rebels and elements of the Generalissimo CHIANG KAI SHEK clique.

I also hope that your Excellency Mr. Ambassador will convey to your Government the serious concern and requests of our Government.”

Vice Minister spoke in particular about MA CHU-TSAI stressing humanitarian aspect. He also mentioned arrest on October 5 of one WANG CHIN-SHAN a grocer in Kalimpong who was supplying Chinese Trade Agency.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 8 November 1960

The Embassy also finds it necessary to take up with the Ministry of External Affairs of India the case of a Chinese national in Kalimpong Mr. Ma Chu-tsai who has been falsely implicated in a crime and detained. It is quite a long time since he was detained unwarrantedly. The Embassy of China in India and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of People's Republic of China have taken up this case with the Ministry of External Affairs of India and the Embassy of India in China respectively, but the Indian side has not yet given any reply in regard to the case. The Embassy of China hereby makes representation to the Ministry of External Affairs of India once again; Mr. Ma Chu-tsai's health is now indeed extremely poor; the local authorities of India have neither given any account for his unwarranted detention, nor have they released him speedily, and what is more, he is not even allowed to be released and return home on bail. It is indeed surprising that such inhumane measures should have been imposed upon a Chinese national who is an innocent victim and also an old man of an advanced age of 71 years and in extremely poor health. The Embassy demands that the Government of India immediately instruct the local authorities to speedily release Mr. Ma Chu-tsai or to at once allow him to be released and return home on bail.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 8 November 1960

On October 21, 1960, His Excellency Mr. Ken Piao, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China took up with the Embassy of India in China the matter of Chinese nationals being ordered to leave India within a specified period. Pending a reply from the Indian Government, the Calcutta local authorities of India, however, successively issued orders at the end of October to further unwarrantedly restrict the movements of Mr. Chiang Wen-Kuei, Manager of the Bank of China, and other Chinese nationals, demanding them to report themselves at the Foreigners' Registration Office three times a week and not allowing them to change their residence unless they are given permission to do so, and went so far as to openly detain Chinese nationals who have always been law-abiding. This insolent action constitutes a grave infringement on their personal freedom, and seriously affects their livelihood, thus making it quite impossible for Mr. Chiang Wen-kuei, Manager of the Bank of China, and other law-abiding Chinese nationals to engage in their proper occupations and consequently placing them in a very difficult position. This is an unfriendly action. Out of a desire for maintaining the friendship between the peoples of China and India, the Embassy of China in India demands that the Government of India speedily instruct the authorities concerned to remove various unwarranted measures against Mr. Chiang Wen-kuei, Manager of the Bank of China, and other Chinese nationals who have suffered wrong, restore their freedom and reinstate them the right to continue their lawful stay in India.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 6 December 1960

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of the Republic of India, and has the honour to state as follows:

On the morning of November 24, 1960, the Indian authorities concerned suddenly dispatched policemen to detain Mr. Chiang Wen-kuei, Manager of the Bank of China, Calcutta. It is surprising that the Indian authorities should have taken such an unruly action as violates human rights in relation to the bank manager of a friendly country.

Since he received in July 1960 a notice to leave India within a specified period, Mr. Chiang has time and again made it clear to the authorities concerned that he has taken charge of his duties at the Bank of China for many years, has always been law-abiding and devoted to his duties, has all along valued highly Sino-Indian friendship, has made positive contributions to promoting trade between China and India and maintained good co-operation with the authorities concerned. Actuated by the urgent need of the business, he has applied for continuing his stay. The Chinese Embassy and the Chinese Consulate-General at Calcutta have made repeated representations with the Indian Ministry of External Affairs and the West Bengal Government respectively, and the Indian Government has not provided any specific reason warranting withholding Mr. Chiang permission to stay. Later, Vice-Minister Ken of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China once again took up this question with the Indian Ambassador who replied that enquiries would be carried out. However, it is regrettable that even before the Indian Government gives its due reply to the representations made by the Chinese Embassy and the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs on October 17 and 21 respectively, and also before a reply is given to Mr. Chiang who has applied for continuing his stay, discriminative measures should have hastily been adopted to restrict the personal freedom of Manager Chiang, and what is more, policemen should have openly been dispatched to detain him. The Embassy expresses its utmost regret at such an extremely unfriendly action.

It is also necessary to point out that for a time certain Indian newspapers have carried remarks made by Indian officials, alleging that overseas Chinese nationals have been engaged in "anti-Indian activities". This kind of contention is inconceivable. It is the consistent policy of the Chinese Government towards overseas Chinese to instruct them to respect laws and regulations of the country in which they reside, refrain from participating in local political activities and live in amity with the local people. In case individual overseas Chinese actually offend Indian law and definite information is provided by the Indian Government in this regard, the Chinese Embassy, in line with its consistent stand of maintaining Sino-Indian friendly relations, wishes to adopt a co-operative attitude and give due consideration to it. The Embassy hopes that the Indian Government would take the same friendly attitude in dealing with questions concerning overseas Chinese. But it is incredible that this year not a few responsible persons of overseas Chinese organizations have been asked to leave India within a specified period, and that in spite of the repeated representations made by the Chinese side the Indian Government has so far not given any factual grounds supporting the alleged cases of offending laws by overseas Chinese. What is particularly worth noting is the fact that when the Indian side has promised to make enquiries with reference to the representations by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs and a reply is still being awaited, such measures as imprisonment, detention, investigation, fine and restriction of freedom should have been adopted against law-abiding and bona fide Chinese nationals. All these are obviously no accidental happenings, and the Embassy cannot but express its grave concern over them.

Out of the desire for maintaining the friendly relations between the peoples of China and India and to seek a reasonable settlement of the question by means of friendly co-operation, the Embassy requests that the Indian Government speedily reply to the representations by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Chinese Embassy, and immediately remove such discriminative measures as violate the personal freedom of Mr. Chiang and other Chinese nationals. The Embassy hopes that while the two Governments are seeking a reasonable settlement of the above-said question through diplomatic channels the local authorities of India will not take any steps which might complicate the question.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and with reference to the Embassy's Note No. L/568/60, dated December 6, 1960, have the honour to enclose for its information a copy of the Statement presented to His Excellency the Vice Minister of China,
Mr. Keng Piao, by the Ambassador of India in Peking on December 15, 1960. This statement constitutes the reply of the Government of India to the various representations, verbal and written, made to them by the Chinese Government and the Chinese Embassy in India.

2. Apart from the matters of substance, the Embassy in its Note referred to above stated that "in case individual overseas Chinese actually offend Indian law and definite information is provided by the Indian Government in this regard, the Chinese Embassy, in line with its consistent stand of maintaining Sino-Indian friendly relations, wishes to adopt a co-operative attitude and give due consideration to it". If this statement is intended to suggest that the Chinese nationals resident in India will be duly advised by the Embassy to desist from political activities and respect the Indian legislative and administrative enactments, the Government of India welcome this assurance. If, however, the statement in any way purports to suggest that the Embassy be associated with the Government of India in taking appropriate action or decision in matters pertaining to Chinese nationals living in India, the Government of India are obliged to point out that the question of the terms and conditions upon which foreign nationals in India may continue to reside in India is a matter solely within the discretion of the Government of India and this Government cannot in any way share its sovereign jurisdiction in this respect with any other authority. The Government of India continue to take an extremely liberal attitude towards foreign nationals, including Chinese, to stay, trade and enjoy freedom and facilities within India. But if any foreigner behaves in a manner contrary to or against the security requirements of the country the Government of India must take appropriate action against such an offender.

3. The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Enclosure to the Government of India note, dated 20 December 1960

The Government of India have examined the statement made by His Excellency, the Vice Minister of China, Mr. Keng Piao, to the Ambassador of India at Peking on October 21, 1960, regarding the arrest of Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai, a Chinese national residing in India. The Vice Minister also referred to the orders recently passed by the Government of India terminating the stay of certain Chinese nationals in India. The Government of India had also received representations, verbal and written, from the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi on the same subjects.

2. (i) Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai

It has been stated by the Vice Minister that Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai has been involved in the murder of an old Lama on a fabricated charge. The question whether Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai is guilty or innocent of the offence, on which he has been arrested, will be decided by a Court of Law, according to the Indian Penal Code and Criminal Procedures. The Government of India must await the court's verdict and, in the meantime, they cannot accept the allegation that the charge against Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai is fabricated.

The court before which Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai was produced has already ordered his release on bail. Since, however, he is not able to fulfil the conditions of the bail, he continues to be in detention. The Government of India are informed that an officer of the Chinese Consulate-General in Calcutta and the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent at Kalimpong have been permitted to interview the prisoner and the interview has already taken place. Delivery of food and medicines to an under-trial prisoner in custody by his family is governed by appropriate rules in India, applicable to all prisoners, and these rules are being followed in respect of Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai. There is no difficulty about supply of food to him by his family, but the supply of medicines from outside is strictly controlled. The jail authorities, however, take the fullest responsibility for the health of a prisoner. In fact, on November 13, 1960, Mr. Ma Chu-Tsai was removed to a hospital in Darjeeling, where necessary treatment was given to him.

(ii) Chinese nationals in India

A reference has been made in the Vice Minister's statement to the problem of Chinese nationals in India, and in particular to the orders passed recently by the Government of India asking some Chinese nationals to leave India within a specified period. As the Chinese Government must be aware, the Government of India are most liberal in respect of allowing foreigners to reside in India. Foreigners have full freedom and facilities of work and trade in the country, and thousands of Chinese nationals have taken advantage of these facilities. The Government of India cannot, however, permit a foreigner to take part, directly or indirectly, in political activities or associate himself with any activity which is likely to damage the interest of India. The persons against whom orders have been issued to leave the country have been indulging, over a considerable period, in activities which are prejudicial to Indian national interest. The Government of India have, therefore, been forced to take action against them, and it is regretted that these orders cannot be modified. In case of individual hardship, however, the Government of India will be prepared to extend the time-limit prescribed in the ‘quit notice’ orders.
The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of the Republic of India, and has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the Ministry's reply note of December 20, 1960 regarding the question of overseas Chinese nationals and a copy of the statement of December 15, 1960 of the Indian Ambassador to China, and the Embassy is now instructed by the Government of China to reply as follows:

1. The consistent policy pursued by the Government of China towards overseas Chinese nationals is to instruct them to observe laws and regulations of the country in which they reside, to live in amity with the local people and to refrain from participating in the local political activities. The Embassy and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of China have time and again pointed out that the Chinese nationals who have been ordered by the authorities concerned of India to leave the country within a specified period have all been residing in India for a long time, have been minding their own business and law-abiding, have proper occupations and have made contributions to upholding Sino-Indian friendship. The Indian side in its several replies, however, failed to give a single concrete fact of Chinese nationals' breaking law. Therefore, the Embassy cannot agree at all to the allegation that the Chinese nationals "have been indulging in activities which are prejudicial to Indian national interest."

2. The Embassy has never had the intention to interfere in the sovereignty of India, but it is the Indian local authorities who have without any justification asked Mr. Chiang Wen-kuei, official functionary of the Bank of China, and other responsible persons in charge of the Chinese nationals' cultural, educational and welfare undertakings who have long been residing in India lawfully, to leave India within a specified period, and adopted such discriminative measures as restriction of personal freedom, detention and investigation. This can only be considered as an unfriendly attitude towards the nationals of a friendly country. The Embassy, out of the desire for upholding the friendly relations between the peoples of the two countries, expressed its serious concern over this matter, and hoped that a reasonable settlement of the question would be sought in the light of facts and in the spirit of the friendship between the two countries. It is regrettable that this attitude of friendly co-operation taken by the Embassy has not met with corresponding response.

3. At present, Mr. Chiang Wen-kuei's personal freedom has been repeatedly subjected to grave infringement, and this has made it quite impossible for Mr. Chiang to continue his normal functions and has also seriously affected the work of the Bank of China. In spite of these numerous unfriendly actions taken by the Indian authorities concerned, the Chinese side, out of its consistent desire for unholding the friendship between the peoples of the two countries, still wishes to take another step and make new efforts. The General Managing Office of the Bank of China has decided to send Mr. Jun-chang, roving inspector of accounts of the Bank of China, who is now in Pakistan, to go to Calcutta and take over Mr. Chiang Wen-kuei’s post. The Chinese Embassy in Pakistan will approach the Indian High Commission in Pakistan for Mr. Shen’s entry visa for India, and it is hoped that the Government of India will, starting from the desire for maintaining Sino-Indian friendship on its part, grant the required visa as speedily as possible and give necessary time and facilities to the new and old managers in the handing over of the post. The Embassy also hopes that the Government of India will, also in the spirit of the friendship between the peoples of the two countries, give sympathetic consideration to the question of stay of other Chinese nationals who have long been residing in India lawfully, and have been minding their own business and law-abiding.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 2 February 1961

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and has the honour to state as follows:

Regarding the unwarranted request for Mr. Chiang-Wen-kuei, Manager of the Bank of China, Calcutta, to leave India, while a reply from the Ministry of External Affairs of India to the Embassy's note of January 3, 1961 is still being awaited, the local authorities of India suddenly detained Manager Chiang without any justification on January 25 in disregard of the serious representations of the Embassy and the reasonable demand already put forward by Manager Chiang himself to the authorities concerned to leave India soon. This is utterly an unfriendly act, at which the Embassy expresses extreme regret. As a result of the unjustified measure taken by the authorities, it has been rendered impossible for Manager Chiang to perform his banking duties. With a view to bringing about a speedy settlement of the question, the General Managing Office of the Bank of China has decided to transfer Mr. Chiang to China immediately, and it is requested that the Government of India release Manager Chiang expeditiously and unconditionally and grant to him an exit visa valid for two weeks.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Regarding the order issued by the West Bengal Government to Mr. Chiang Wen Kuei, Manager of the Bank of China, Calcutta, to leave India within a specified period, the Chinese Embassy in India and the Chinese Consulate General in Calcutta have for several times made representations with the Ministry of External Affairs of India and the Government of West Bengal. Mr. Chiang Wen Kuei himself also made repeated representations with the local authorities. However, the local authorities disregarding these strong and just representations once again arrested Mr. Chiang on January 25 and have detained him till now. This is an unfriendly action, for this the Chinese Consulate General expresses its deep regret.

As the local authorities have taken such unjustifiable measures, Mr. Chiang feels it impossible to carry on his bank duties. For the sake of an immediate solution of this problem, the Head Office of the Bank of China in Peking, has decided to recall Mr. Chiang back to China immediately. Mr. Chiang will leave for China within two weeks. The Chinese Consulate General demands that the Government of West Bengal find a reasonable settlement of this case and release Mr. Chiang Wen Kuei immediately and unconditionally, thus enabling him to leave India for China in due course.
Regarding the order issued by the West Bengal Government to Mr. Chiang Wen Kuei, Manager of the Bank of China, Calcutta, to leave India within a specified period, the Chinese Consulate General in its Memorandum, dated February 3, informed the West Bengal Government that the Head Office of the Bank of China in Peking has decided to recall Mr. Chiang Wen-Kuei back to China immediately, and demanded that the Government of West Bengal release Mr. Chiang immediately and unconditionally, thus enabling him to leave India for China in due time. After his release on bail on February 3, Mr. Chiang wrote a letter to the Office of Security Control on February 4 stating that he would leave India by February 25 and requested the Office to endorse his departure from India. On February 6, as Mr. Chiang was sick, he entrusted Mr. R. N. Dhar, Solicitor, to apply on his behalf to the Office of Security Control for withdrawing his court case. In the meantime, Mr. R. Gupta, Chief Secretary of the Government of West Bengal also expressed on February 3 that he would propose to the Government of India to withdraw this case. While the Chinese Consulate General in Calcutta and Mr. Chiang were awaiting the reply in respect of this matter, Mr. Chiang was again unwarrantedly arrested in the afternoon of February 7 by the local authorities. The Chinese Consulate General in Calcutta feels it inconceivable, expresses deep regret, and demands that the West Bengal Government release Mr. Chiang immediately and expedite his departure formalities.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 11 February 1961

As the Embassy is aware, the Government of India through the agency of the Government of West Bengal had given notices to Mr. Chang Ching, Principal, Hsinhua High School, Calcutta, and Hou Hsing-fu, Editor, China Review, Calcutta, to leave India within specified periods. The periods of notice expired some time ago but the two Chinese nationals have not so far left this country. In view of the serious nature of their anti-Indian activities, the Government of India have decided to deport them forthwith. They will be pushed across the land frontier at Nathula on Monday, the 13th February, 1961, at 9-00 A.M. I am giving advance notice of this intention of the Government of India to enable the Chinese Government to make arrangements to receive them if the Chinese Government so desire.
The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of the Republic of India, and has the honour to state as follows:

At three o'clock on the morning of February 11, the police authorities of Calcutta unwarrantedly and unlawfully arrested, all of a sudden, Mr. Chang Ching, principal of the Hsing Hua Middle School, who had long been residing in Calcutta, and Mr. Hou Hsing-fu, editor of the China Review, who was born in India, forcibly took them in custody to and deported them from Nathula Pass on February 13. When they were on the way under custody, they were subjected to inhuman treatment.

It must be pointed out that after receiving orders from the local authorities of West Bengal asking them to leave India, both Mr. Chang Ching and Mr. Hou Hsing-fu put forward, in accordance with law, legitimate reasons requesting to continue to stay in India. While the Indian local authorities referred their cases to judicial procedures and a just settlement by the court was being awaited by them, the Indian local authorities, however, took such a step as to have suddenly arrested them and deported them from India under custody. The Embassy expresses its regret at this unreasonable measure. It is requested that the Government of India put an end to such discriminative measures against the Chinese nationals.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 8 March 1961

In August 1960, Mr. Chang Hsiu-feng, Principal of the Chung Hwa School at Kalimpong, and his wife, who have long been residing in India, received orders from the local authorities not permitting them to reside in Kalimpong, and were arrested in December by the same authorities without any justification. Later Mr. Chang was sentenced to four months' imprisonment by the local court, and his wife Yao Pan-ying was also sentenced to two months' imprisonment by the local court on February 27, 1961.

The Chinese Embassy in September 1960 brought up the question of their stay to Mr. V. V. Paranjpe of the China Division of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, and the Chinese Consulate General at Calcutta also took up the matter with the West Bengal local authorities in 1960 and January 1961 on several occasions, in the hope that the question of their stay would be dealt with in a reasonable way, and it has been repeatedly pointed out that Mr. Chang has always been law-abiding, devoted to the education of the children of Chinese nationals, and enjoying popular respect. Chang's wife is a housewife, dependent on her husband and looking after their children. As entrusted by the Chinese nationals, Mr. Chang serves as the Principal of the Chung Hwa School of the local Chinese nationals and in the interest of the education of the children of the Chinese nationals and necessitated by his work in the school, he had applied to the local authorities for continuing to stay. When a formal reply to his application was still being awaited, he was suddenly arrested by the local authorities without any justification and was sentenced to rigorous imprisonment and to a fine.

It must be pointed out in particular that Mr. Chang's wife Yao Pan-ying was born and brought up in India, and that she has been ailing for a long time and is very weak, while five children are under her care, one of whom is still at the breast. She together with the children, lives entirely on her husband's income, and is also dependent on her husband as to where to stay. It is entirely necessary to show sympathy towards a woman in such a position. However, it is surprising that she was also unwarrantedly detained by the local authorities on December 5, 1960, and it was not until December 17, 1960, that she was permitted to come out on bail on condition that she should leave Kalimpong in the night of the same day. Thus, bringing all her children with her, she had to go to Calcutta and stayed there for the time being. Owing to the fact that her husband is in prison, she has been leading a poor and hard life and has been difficult to find a shelter, since she arrived in Calcutta. In order to save her family from plight, she has requested the local authorities to release her husband immediately so that they may go back to China together. The local authorities, however, in disregard of her reasonable and appropriate demand based on the fact that she has five children to look after, and she is in bad health and has financial difficulties, twice forcibly ordered her to go to Kalimpong from Calcutta for trial, passed an utterly unjustified judgment and imprisoned her with a fine. It should be pointed out that even those who were present at the court were very much surprised at such unreasonable sentence.

In view of the above facts, the measures taken by the Indian local authorities against Mr. Chang and his wife are utterly unjustified as well as inhuman. This is inconsistent with the liberal spirit towards foreigners as claimed more than once in its note by the Indian Government.

In view of the fact that Mr. Chang’s wife is in bad health and her five children need the care of their parents and that she has applied for leaving India and returning to China, the Embassy requests that the Government of India adopt measures to release Mr. Chang Hsiu-feng and his wife, so that they may leave India.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 8 March 1961

In October and November 1960, the Chinese Embassy took up for several times with the Ministry of External Affairs of India the wronged case of an innocent Chinese national, Mr. Ma Tsu-tsai, who originally resided in Kalimpong. Owing to the condition of his health, Mr. Ma Tsu-tsai himself has for many times expressed his desire to return to China for rest and treatment, and has already submitted to the Chinese Consulate General at Calcutta a formal application for return to China at an early date.

According to his application, Mr. Ma has been in bad health for a long time as he is old and weak. Particularly since he was put into prison in October 1960, the several months' imprisonment has done serious harm to his health which is deteriorating daily and he himself and his family are very much concerned over his health. After a careful examination of his health, the doctor also advises that he needs a tranquil environment for rest and treatment. He has applied for return to his native place in China for rest and treatment, where members of his family will look after him and meet the charges for his medical treatment.

The Embassy hopes that the Ministry of External Affairs will, in a humanitarian spirit, render assistance to Mr. Ma Tsu-tsai so that he may return to China at an early date.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 13 March 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and has the honour to state as follows:

The Chinese Government has received a report stating that three specialists sent to Nepal by China, Hsing Yi-hsing, Yang Yung-chi and Mao Hung-yuan, accompanied by an official of the Department of Industry of the Nepalese Government, were deliberately harassed and unreasonably detained by the Indian checkpost personnel at India's Nepalganj Station on their way to western Nepal at 11:00 A.M. on February 28, 1961. The Chinese specialists showed their passports with valid transit visas issued by the Indian Embassy in Nepal. But the Indian checkpost personnel detained the Chinese specialists, alleging that they did not possess legal transit documents. Despite the protests of the Chinese specialists and the repeated representations of the Nepalese official who accompanied them, the Indian checkpost personnel claimed that they had the right to detain any person for 24 hours. It was not until 20.00 hours that day that the passports of the Chinese specialists were examined and they were set free as late as 24.00 hours. The Chinese specialists were unreasonably detained for as long as 13 hours.

The Chinese Government is surprised at the unreasonable detention of the Chinese specialists by the Indian checkpost personnel and the deliberate delay in examining the valid visas issued by the Indians themselves. This cannot but be regarded as extraordinary and unfriendly. While expressing its deep regret at this, the Chinese Government requests the Indian Government to attend to it and give instructions to the authorities concerned against any recurrence of similar incidents.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 17 March 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note of the Embassy, dated the 25th February.

Mr. Chang Ching and Mr. Hou Hsing-fu were Chinese nationals holding Chinese passports. In view of their undesirable activities, under the provisions of the Foreigners’ Act they were required to leave India within a stipulated period which allowed adequate margin for preparation and departure from the country. Since they did not comply with the orders served on them, the Government of India considered it necessary in the interest of security to compel them to leave Indian territory. The allegation that they were subjected to “inhuman treatment” is entirely unfounded. In fact, they were provided with adequate food and clothing and treated with consideration.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 21 March 1961

On March 8, the Embassy, at the request of Mr. Ma Chu-tsai's family, took up with the Ministry of External Affairs the matter that Mr. Ma Chu-tsai requested to leave India for China because of his old age, weakness and daily deteriorating health.

Now members of Mr. Ma's family have again reported at the Chinese Consulate-General at Calcutta and requested the Embassy to assist them in getting out of their difficult position.

Since Mr. Ma was put into prison on a false charge, great harm has been done to his health. When he was released on bail, he was not allowed to reside in Kalimpong, thus he moved to Calcutta. His whole family was also ordered to leave Kalimpong. His house in Kalimpong was sealed. He has reached an advanced age of over 70 and is suffering from serious illness. Several doctors have time and again advised him that he should not move within a short period of time, and his lawyer has presented the health certificate to the Kalimpong court. However, in disregard of the practical difficulties that Mr. Ma is extremely weak and that all his family has been forced to leave Kalimpong, the district court, Kalimpong, has now again ordered Mr. Ma to travel a long distance to appear at the Kalimpong court. Consequently, Mr. Ma has been obliged to go there though suffering from illness. In these circumstances, Mr. Ma's family is very much worried about his health and has great fear that his life will be in danger. Mr. Ma himself and his family earnestly hope that the authorities concerned will transfer the case to Calcutta for trial.

The Embassy considers that his request is proper and reasonable, and hopes that the Ministry of External Affairs will give it sympathetic consideration. The Embassy is seriously concerned about Mr. Ma Chu-tsai's health and his present difficult position, and would like to request the Government of India to pay due attention to his life and safety in the process of the case. It is also hoped at the same time that sympathetic consideration will be given to his request for an early return to China for rest and treatment on account of his illness.
Memorandum given by the Consulate General of China in Calcutta to the Government of West Bengal, 2 May 1961

The Chinese nationals in Calcutta Mr. Liu Wei-tai (Manager of Peking Restaurant) and Mr. Wu Tao-lung (ex-publisher of the Chinese Review) have been living in India for many years and have always been law abiding. The West Bengal Government, however, on July 25, 1960, unreasonably ordered them to leave India within 90 days, then again in November and December 1960, arrested them and sent them to the Calcutta local court for trial respectively, disregarding the representations made by the Chinese Consulate General in Calcutta and petitions submitted by themselves for continuing their stay in India. While they were waiting for the trial of the court, the Calcutta Police, all of a sudden, at 3 O'clock in the morning of April 29, 1961, arrested them again and deported them from India under Police custody. Such a series of unjustifiable and discriminative measures taken by the West Bengal Government against Mr. Liu Wei-tai and Mr. Wu Tao-lung, particularly that of deporting them unreasonably from India under custody, are obviously very unfriendly and inhumane. For them, the Chinese Consulate General lodged a protest with the West Bengal Government.
Reference Chinese Consul in Calcutta's letter of protest to the Government of West Bengal on May 2, 1961, regarding the deportation of Messrs Wu Tao Lung and Lee Wei Tai.

2. The Government of West Bengal firmly reject the assertion of the Chinese Consul that the deportation of Messrs Wu Tao Lung and Lee Wei-tai was unjustifiable and discriminatory. As the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi was informed on April 29, 1961, by the Ministry of External Affairs the two Chinese nationals had been served with notice to leave India within specified period. Even though the periods of notice expired they had not made any effort to leave the country. In view of the serious nature of their anti-Indian activities, the Government of India were constrained to effect their deportation across the land frontier.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 24 May 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and with reference to the Note, dated March 13, 1961, handed over to Sri S. K. Bhutani, First Secretary, Embassy of India, Peking by Mr. Wang Chao Chen, Special Officer in the First Asian Department of the Chinese Foreign Office, have the honour to state as follows:

The Government of India have read with surprise the allegation in the Chinese Note that three (3) Chinese Officials were harrassed and detained by Indian Checkpost personnel at Nepalganj station at 11 A.M. on 28th February 1961.

2. The fact is that these Chinese Officials had repeatedly entered Indian territory by unauthorised routes from Nepal and had not heeded previous warnings given to them. On 25th February 1961 they entered Indian territory at Tanakpur again by an unauthorised route. After proper investigation of the case, the three Chinese were treated with leniency as it was felt that they had violated the Foreigners Order 1948 of the Government of India out of ignorance. They were verbally warned and instructed that under Indian regulations no foreigner should enter or leave India (from Nepal) except by an authorised route. Any contravention of these regulations renders the foreigners liable to prosecution under the Foreigners Act of 1946 of the Government of India. However, the three Chinese concerned demanded a written warning which had to be prepared and served on them.

3. Thus it will be seen that in the circumstances the three Chinese in question were treated with exceptional courtesy when under the law they should have been prosecuted.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China present its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the note of the Ministry of External Affairs of India dated May 24, 1961, has the honour to reply as follows:

With regard to the case in which three specialist sent to Nepal by China were unreasonably detained by Indian checkpost personnel, the Indian Ministry of External Affairs alleged in its note that the Chinese specialists had not heeded previous warnings and repeatedly entered Indian territory by unauthorised routes from Nepal. This allegation does not tally with the fact. It may be pointed out that at the time when they applied to the Indian authorities concerned for transit visas, the Chinese specialists listed specifically the places in Nepal to which they would proceed by land or by air via India territory. Either at the time of applying for the transit visas or when they were obtaining them, they received no notification in whatever form specifying the routes authorised for entering Indian territory. Each time when they entered Indian territory on transit, the Chinese specialists went to the authorities concerned of their own accord to go through the necessary formalities. Instead of making objections or warnings, the Indian officials who examined their documents told the Chinese specialists clearly that they had completed all the formalities and would have no trouble in continuing their trip. It was only when they were passing through the Nepalganj Station on their way from India to Nepal that they were deliberately harassed and unreasonably detained by local Indian checkpost personnel in spite of the fact that, as declared by the Indian checkpost personnel, the Nepalganj Station is precisely one of the points through which foreigners are allowed to enter or leave Indian territory as stipulated by the Indian Government. In its note, the Indian Ministry of External Affairs not only evaded the fact cited by the Chinese Government that the Chinese specialists were unreasonably detained by the Indian checkpost personnel, but put forward excuses without factual basis in a futile attempt to sophistically defend the unreasonable acts of the Indian checkpost personnel, and went so far as to glibly state that the Chinese specialists "were treated with exceptional courtesy." The Chinese Government cannot but feel regret at this. As to the allegation made in the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs that the Chinese specialists had demanded a written warning, the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs wishes to point out that what really happened was that the Chinese specialists demanded the Indian checkpost personnel to make a written explanation for their unreasonable detention.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Chinese Bureau of Foreign Affairs, Lhasa, to the Consulate General of India in Lhasa, 18 August 1961

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet present its compliments to the Consulate General of India, Lhasa and hereby lodges the following protest with the Consulate General regarding illegal detention of a Chinese citizen by the Indian troops illegally entrenched in Tsungsha of China.

According to the report of the local authorities in Ari on the 7th June 1961, KADUP a border inhabitant of Tseda County in China’s Ari, passing through Tsungsha area of China to carry on petty trade customarily was illegally detained for 8 days by the Indian troops illegally entrenched in Tsungsha on the pretext that KADUP was not in possession of a trader’s certificate.

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet again point out the following two points to the Consulate General of India, Lhasa:

(1) Chinese Government has repeatedly stated that Tsungsha area has always been Chinese territory. India should respect the territorial integrity of China and withdraw all the Indian personnel who have illegally intruded into Tsungsha area.

(2) Leaving aside the question of ownership of territory, according to the item 2 of article V of the Sino-Indian Agreement signed in April 1954 and customary practice in border area, there has always been no need for border inhabitants on both sides to carry certificates for going back and forth. It can thus be seen that the detention of KADUP by Indian side on the pretext of his not possessing a trader’s certificate is entirely an unreasonable harassment, an act of arbitrary infringement on human rights and is in contravention with the agreement of 1954.

Based on what is mentioned above the Foreign Bureau hereby lodges protest against the unreasonable detention of a Chinese citizen by the Indian troops which have illegally intruded into Chinese territory and requests that the Consulate General convey to the Government of India to take effective measures for the prevention of reoccurrence of similar incidents.

The Bureau of Foreign Affairs in Tibet avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Consulate General of India, Lhasa, the assurances of its highest consideration.
Consul General of India presents his compliments to Foreign Bureau and with reference to latter's note dated 18 August 1961 has the honour to state as follows:—

The note is based on false assumptions and the allegations contained in it are entirely without any factual basis. It reveals both malicious and predatory motives.

No person by name KADUP of Tseda county attempted to pass through Nilang which the Chinese call Tsungsha on June 7, 1961. Nilang is an integral part of the territories of the Indian Union. That has never been in doubt, and for any foreign authority to ask the Government of India to withdraw their control over Indian territory is extraordinary procedure and an act of irresponsibility.

Regarding specific subject of complaint namely harassment and illegal detention of KADUP detailed enquiries have been made. While no person by name KADUP sought entry into Nilang a Tibetan named GHUTUK of village sarang arrived at Nilang on June 7th, 1961 and sought entry into India as a petty trader. But as he was an official of the local Government of Tibet there was doubt whether under Article V of the 1954 Agreement he could enter India for purposes of trade and intercourse without a duly visaed passport. The matter was referred to higher authorities for a decision but GHUTUK was not prepared to wait and left for Tibet on 14th June 1961. At no time was GHUTUK placed under detention.

The attention of the Foreign Bureau is invited to Article V(5) of the 1954 Agreement.

It is regretted that the Foreign Bureau should have framed false charges in order to lodge a protest. As there is no factual basis for the allegation, Foreign Bureau's protest is rejected.

The Consul General of India takes this opportunity to renew to the Bureau of Foreign Affairs its assurances of highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 1 June 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and have the honour to state that it has been brought to the notice of the Government of India that on February 13, 1961 the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent at Kalimpong along with three other members of the Chinese Trade Agency drove through Teesta Police Checkpost in a taxi ignoring the traffic signal. While the Police signalled the taxi to stop, the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent directed the driver to ignore the Police signal and proceed. Enquiries made into this incident show that the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent had wilfully directed an Indian national to violate the laws and regulations of the State. The Chinese Deputy Trade Agent who called at the Kalimpong Police Station stated that the driver was not at fault.

The Ministry of External Affairs regret this irresponsible conduct of a member of a Chinese Mission in India and hope that similar wilful violations of the law will stop.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and with reference to the Ministry's note of June 1, 1961 and the conversation of May 24 between Mr. V. V. Paranjpe, Under Secretary of the Ministry, and Mr. Ma Mu-ming First Secretary of the Embassy, has the honour to state as follows:

With regard to the Ministry's allegation in the above note and conversation that the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent at Kalimpong ignored the traffic signal, the Embassy has made enquiries. The fact was that, at about 4.30 on the afternoon of February 13 when the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent at Kalimpong together with other three members of the Trade Agency was to pass through the Teesta Bridge in a taxi, the car began to slow down and the horn was repeatedly sounded. At that time, a policeman at the checkpost, after making out the passengers in the car, gesticulated that the car may pass, giving no signal to stop the car, thus the car continued to proceed. But when it was passing in front of the Kalimpong police station, the police suddenly stopped it and took the driver into the police station, accusing him of having ignored a signal to stop the car. Members of the Trade Agency then accompanying the Deputy Trade Agent followed the driver into the police station and explained the actual position of what happened.

It must be pointed out that the allegation made by the Ministry does not conform to the facts at all. The car was moving in accordance with the traffic signal by the policeman at the Teesta checkpost; the Deputy Trade Agent did not direct the driver to ignore a policeman's signal to stop the car; nor did the Deputy Trade Agent go into the police station himself. The assertion of the Ministry that the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent had wilfully directed an Indian national to violate the laws and regulations of the State is thus completely baseless. The Embassy categorically rejects this unwarranted charge and cannot but express regret at it.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 10 August 1961

The Government of India have decided that with effect from 16 August 1961, for security reasons, the officers and staff members of the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong will not travel beyond the municipal limits of Kalimpong less that portion of the Development Area falling south of the following points:

(1) Sub-Divisional Officer's bungalow (Adambari),
(2) Surja Sadan (on Ringkingpong Road), and
(3) Office of Block Development Officer, Block No. I (Bong Road), except with the prior permission of the Sub-Divisional Officer, Kalimpong, to be obtained by application (in triplicate) in the proforma enclosed.

2. The Trade Agent and his staff may travel beyond the limits of Kalimpong municipality as defined in the foregoing paragraph only after the Sub-Divisional Officer, Kalimpong, has accorded his permission in writing.
PROFORMA

To

The Sub-Divisional Officer,
KALIMPONG.

Dear Sir,

This is to request you to allow me to travel beyond the Municipal limits of Kalimpong on ................. Details of the journey are given below.

(date)

Faithfully yours,

(Name)

Official designation

Details of the journey

1. Date of the commencement of the journey ......................
2. Purpose of the journey ........................................
3. Mode of travel ..............................................
4. Destination ...................................................

(Name of each city/town or other place to be visited should be mentioned)

5. Arrival time in each place and time of departure therefrom.....
6. Date and time of return to Kalimpong .........................
Letter given by the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs at Kalimpong to the Deputy Trade Agent of China at Kalimpong, 14 August 1961.

Sir,

I am directed to say that the Government of India have decided that with effect from 16th August, 1961 for security reasons, the officers and staff members of the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong will not travel beyond the municipal limits of Kalimpong less that portion of the Kalimpong Development Area falling South of the following points:

(i) Sub-Divisional Officer’s bungalow (Adambari);
(ii) Surja Sadan (on Ringkingpong Road); and
(iii) Office of the Block Development Officer, Block No. 1 (Bong Road);

except with the prior permission of the Sub-Divisional Officer, Kalimpong, to be obtained by application (in triplicate) in the proforma enclosed.

2. The Trade Agent and his staff may travel beyond the limits of Kalimpong Municipality as defined in the foregoing paragraph, only after the Sub-Divisional Officer, Kalimpong, has accorded his permission in writing.

Yours faithfully,

(Sd.) D. C. MOOKERJEE,
Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India, at Kalimpong.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 24 August 1961.

On August 10, 1961, Mr. B. C. Mishra, Deputy Secretary of the Ministry of External Affairs of India, handed over an Aide Memoire to Mr. Ma Mu-ming, First Secretary of the Chinese Embassy in India, stating that the officers and staff members of the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong will not go beyond a limited area of the Kalimpong municipality except with the permission in writing of the Sub-Divisional Officer, Kalimpong. It must be pointed out that, following the various harassments and restrictions imposed on the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong, the Government of India has now again taken such a step as to stipulate that, except with permission in writing, not only the personnel of the Trade Agency are not allowed to travel beyond a limited area of the Kalimpong municipality, but they are not allowed even to enter the Development Area which is an important section lying within the Kalimpong municipality. This is further unwarranted restriction against the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong, and is not in conformity with the spirit of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement. The Embassy hereby expresses its regret at it.

Dear Mr. Hsu Jen,

I have the honour to invite your attention to my letter No. 474C, dated 14-8-1961 to your address containing some instructions of the Government of India regarding movement of staff members of the Trade Agency of the People’s Republic of China at Kalimpong and am very sorry to point out that instructions of my Government have not been acted upon and intentionally disregarded in as much as on the 24th August, 1961, at about 07.00 hours, two of your staff members came out of Kalimpong Municipal area in the CAR WBA 3730 and was proceeding towards Siliguri along our National Highway 31A till they were found out at Teesta Bridge when their Laissez Passer was asked for in terms of my above quoted letter, which they failed to produce.

2. May I request you kindly to take steps that your subordinate staff members do not violate security instructions of the Government of India and I would highly appreciate if you kindly confirm me the action taken by you to prevent recurrence of the same.

With warm regards,

I am,

Yours sincerely,

Sd/- D. C. MOOKERJEE,
Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India at Kalimpong.
Note given by the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs at Kalimpong to the Trade Agency of China at Kalimpong, 28 August 1961.

The Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India, at Kalimpong, presents his compliments to the Trade Agency of the People's Republic of China at Kalimpong and has the honour to state as follows:

(i) The Government of India desires that the Trade Agency of the People's Republic of China at Kalimpong should not deal with any other Departments of the Government, whether of the Central or State Government, or with any Indian citizens, except through the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs at Kalimpong. Such communications, in future, may be sent for onward despatch to the undersigned and it is assured that the same will be despatched, if the Government of India, have no objection, with all convenient speed.

(ii) The Trade Agency of the People's Republic of China at Kalimpong should give previous notice to the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs at Kalimpong of the arrival and departure from Kalimpong of the names of the diplomatic officers of the Trade Agency. The names of non-diplomatic personnel and other particulars should also be registered with the undersigned.

(iii) The Trade Agency of the People's Republic of China at Kalimpong should notify to the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs at Kalimpong the name of all Indians who are employed by the Trade Agency and intimate him the change of personnel on their own initiative both in respect of Chinese and Indian personnel and diplomatic and non-diplomatic personnel.

(iv) It is further the desire of the Government of India that no function in which Indian nationals are proposed to be invited should be held in the premises of the Trade Agency of the People's Republic of China at Kalimpong except with the previous permission of the Government of India to be accorded by the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs at Kalimpong on this behalf.

2. The Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India, at Kalimpong, would highly appreciate if the Deputy Trade Agent of the People's Republic of China at Kalimpong would kindly note the request of the Government of India in the preceding paragraph and would favour the undersigned with information on clauses (ii) and (iii) of the same.
3. The Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India, at Kalimpong, takes this opportunity to renew to the Trade Agency of the People's Republic of China at Kalimpong his assurances of highest consideration.

Yours sincerely,

Sd/- D. C. MOOKERJEE,
Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India at Kalimpong.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to their letter No. M/139/61, dated June 21, 1961 have the honour to state as follows:—

On the question of facts regarding the incident of February 13, 1961, when the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent, Kalimpong, made a taxi driver ignore the traffic signal while driving through Teesta police post, the Embassy asserts \textit{inter alia} "nor did the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent go into the police station himself". This could mean that he was dragged into the police station by some agency other than himself, for which there is no evidence. Therefore it could only mean that the Deputy Trade Agent went into the police station not because he wanted to but because he had to in the circumstances of the case where he was responsible for misguiding a citizen against the law.

As the facts of the case, it may interest the Embassy to know that the driver of the taxi cab in question pleaded guilty to the offence in court, and he was convicted and sentenced. The driver stated that he violated the traffic signal at the Teesta checkpost at the instance of the Deputy Chinese Trade Agent, and that he had no other reason for doing so.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 22 September 1961

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and with reference to the Ministry's Note No. 17(35)EAD/61, dated August 28, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:

With regard to the so-called incident in which the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent at Kalimpong was alleged to have ignored traffic signal, the Chinese Embassy, in its Note No. M/139/61, dated June 21, 1961 to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, already gave a detailed and exact account of the facts. The police at the checkpost did not ask the car to stop at the time; the Deputy Trade Agent did not enter the police station, he all along stayed outside. However, the Ministry of External Affairs in its note disregarded the facts and attempted to make a distorted interpretation of the translation of the above-mentioned note of the Embassy and draw inferences utterly devoid of any factual basis. The Embassy cannot but express its regret at such distortion and unreasonable tangling of the Ministry.

The Embassy avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Letter given by the Deputy Trade Agent of China at Kalimpong to the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs at Kalimpong, 27 September 1961.

Dear Mr. Mookerjee,

Your letters of 14th, 25th and 28th August received. After imposing various restrictions on this Agency, the Indian Government have now made a further decision that officials and staff members of this Agency “will not travel beyond the municipal limits of Kalimpong” before obtaining written permission. Within the municipality there are again certain portions where their movement is restricted. And moreover, there has been such an occurrence that members of this Agency were prevented from going to Bagdogra Airport, Siliguri to receive Deputy Trade Agent home. On the 24th of August, two members of the Agency drove to the airport, and around 7 A.M. while passing through Teesta Bridge they were stopped by a police officer at the checkpoint there. Notwithstanding their explanation that they were proceeding to meet Deputy Trade Agent returning from Calcutta, the officer refused their pass. On indicating at that moment the refusal to be an unfriendly act, they retraced the journey, as compelled to, back to Kalimpong. You must be aware that the road connecting Kalimpong with the airport is the only one by use of which this Agency have been able to come into contact with the outside in carrying out official functions.

As is well-known, it is the least privilege of and a usual, indispensable business procedure for this Agency to deal with departments concerned of the Indian Government and Indian traders while as a Chinese official trade organ it is performing legitimate duties. It is, therefore, surprising that the Indian Government should openly place restrictions in this field, stipulating that this Agency should not deal with any official quarters of Indian traders except through the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs at Kalimpong, the Sub-divisional Officer, Kalimpong, that communications to them should be despatched only through him and with his “no objection” first; and above all, that “previous permission” should be obtained before invitations are extended to Indian nationals to any function to be held at the Agency. Surely, these are all rarely heard.

It has to be pointed out that such a series or afore-said unwarranted restrictions and harassments further imposed on this Agency are in violation of the spirit of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement. I hereby lodge a protest.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

Sd/- HSUE JEN.

Deputy Trade Agent of the People’s Republic of China at Kalimpong.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 27 September 1961

Following the unwarranted restricting of the movement of the personnel of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong to a limited area in August 1961, the Government of India has now further imposed various restrictions and obstructions on the Agency. As reported by the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong, the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs of India, in a note sent on August 28, 1961 to the Trade Agency, went so far as to request that the Trade Agency should not deal with any other departments of the Government of India, whether of the Central or State Government, or with any Indian citizens, except through the Agent of the Ministry of External Affairs. It was also requested in the note that no function in which Indian nationals are invited should be held in the premises of the Trade Agency except with the previous permission of the Government of India. Moreover, on August 24, 1961 when the Chinese Deputy Trade Agent went back to Kalimpong from Calcutta, two officers of the Trade Agency proceeded in a car to the airport to meet him, but when they reached the Teesta Bridge, the check-post did not allow them to pass, with the result that when the Deputy Trade Agent arrived at the airport near Siliguri, no officer from the Agency received him. The Chinese Embassy hereby lodges a protest with the Ministry of External Affairs of India against these unreasonable restrictions and obstructions which are in violation of the spirit of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 7 October 1961

Reference Note dated 27th September 1961 handed over by Mr. Yeh Cheng-Chang, Counsellor of the Chinese Embassy, to the Director of the China Division of the Ministry of External Affairs.

The Note referring to the procedure instituted by the Government of India to regulate the movements of the personnel of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong uses the term "uwarranted" and suggests that the SDO, Kalimpong, in communicating certain other procedures to the Chinese Trade Agency on August 28, 1961, went too far. The Embassy seems to question the Government of India's right to institute regulations and procedures for the conduct of affairs in this country. Indeed, a case has occurred in the past where a particular official Agent of the Chinese Government went to the extent of wilfully misguiding an Indian citizen to act against the law and public security. The Embassy will note that at all times there must be due and proper observance of Government laws and regulations in India, and wilful violations thereof cannot be permitted.

The Embassy's Note mentions that on August 24, 1961 two officials of the Trade Agency at Kalimpong were not allowed to proceed in a car beyond Teesta Bridge to receive the Deputy Trade Agent who was returning from Calcutta. The Embassy will note that the officials of the Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong deliberately went to Teesta Bridge without a laissez passer as required under the regulations communicated by the SDO to the Chinese Trade Agency on August 14, 1961. It is hoped that, in future, the Chinese official agencies in India will comply with the regulations and procedures of Government and there will be no recurrence of such incidents in future.

The Chinese Trade Agency has not, so far, complied with the requirement that officers as well as staff of the Trade Agency should be registered with the SDO, Kalimpong, and names and particulars of Indian nationals employed by the Trade Agency should likewise be communicated to him. It is necessary that the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong comply with the official regulations of the country. We hope the Chinese Embassy will now issue necessary instructions to their Trade Agency instead of instigating their staff in non-observance of official regulations by lodging a "protest" in support of unjustifiable conduct of their staff.

The Embassy's note contains the perfunctory remark that the regulations instituted in Kalimpong are "in violation of the spirit of the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement". The relevant provision in the 1954 Agreement states that "The Trade Agencies of both Parties shall be accorded the same status and same treatment". In the notes exchanged at Peking on April 29, 1954, mention is made of trade as well as contacts in accordance with laws and regulations of the local Governments. The Embassy are aware that the Official Agencies of the Government of India in Tibet have been subjected to various official regulations and directives by local officials. There is no violation of the 1954 Agreement as this is purely a question of conforming to the laws and regulations of the local Government.

The Ministry of External Affairs, on the grounds stated above, reject the Chinese Embassy's protest of September 27, 1961.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of India in China, 27 June 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs has noted with regret that the No. 8/61 issue of the India News, published by the Indian Embassy on June 1, carried a resolution adopted by an Indian political party which slanderously charged China with "maintaining her violations" of Indian territory. The Embassy has, therefore, abused the hospitality and courtesy extended by the Chinese Government in taking advantage of issuing bulletins to arbitrarily slander and attack the Chinese Government. In this regard, the Ministry lodges a protest with the Embassy.

The Ministry would also like to draw the attention of the Embassy to the fact that materials have time and again appeared in the bulletins and publications distributed by the Embassy, which make groundless charges against the Chinese Government. This practice cannot but be regarded as most unfriendly.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 5 July 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs refer to the note read on June 27, 1961, to Shri P. K. Banerjee, Counsellor, Indian Embassy, Peking by Mr. Kang Mao Chao, Deputy Director of the Information Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of China.

2. The Indian Embassy in Peking brings out a fortnightly newssheet entitled “India News”. This news-sheet is a modest effort on the part of the Indian Embassy to give some news of India to the Chinese people. The Government of the People’s Republic of China must be fully aware of the extreme caution exercised by the Indian Embassy in issuing its news-sheets and distributing its publications.
No material which can be construed to be an attack on the People’s Government of China is ever used by the Embassy and the publications distributed do not include any literature which can be construed as an attack on the People’s Government of China. Statements made by non-officials in India and press comments from Indian papers on China are never reproduced in the news-sheets. The news-sheets only reproduce speeches by the Prime Minister and other Ministers of the Indian Government bearing on India’s territorial integrity.

3. The People’s Government of China are aware that even this modest effort is closely circumscribed and the Indian Embassy bulletin has virtually no circulation except among the few surviving Indian nationals now in China and some members of the diplomatic corps.

4. The Ministry of External Affairs are constrained to observe that the accusation made in the Chinese note that the Embassy of India in Peking puts out from time to time material in its bulletins and distributes publications which make groundless charges against the Chinese Government is based on no evidence whatever. No examples have been cited nor was any complaint, even informally, made to the Embassy in this matter at any time in the past.

5. The Government of China are aware that a garbled and interpolated version of the resolution passed by the All India Committee of the Indian National Congress appeared in a Hsin Hua release on May 31, and this was featured in the People’s Daily and other Chinese papers on June 1, 1961, under the sensational headline “National Committee of Indian National Congress Party turns Black into White”. Having regard to these facts, it was the duty of the Indian Embassy in Peking, in the interests of the centuries old friendship of the people of India and China, to correct the false impression created and all that the Indian Embassy did was to publish without comments the true version of the resolution in its news-sheet No. 8/61. As the People’s Government of China know the Indian Congress Party, having secured a majority in the Indian Parliament in free democratic elections under a system of universal franchise, constitutes the ruling party in charge of the Government of India and this Party has the responsibility of governing the country and formulating national policies. The resolution passed by the All India Committee of the Indian National Congress at its last session only reflects the official views of the Government of India which are well-known to the Government of the People's Republic of China in as much as these have been expounded in clear and unmistakable terms at the official talks on the border problem and mentioned in the Indian Parliament on several occasions by the leaders of the Government of India.

6. The above paragraphs show that the Embassy of India in Peking has all along strictly conformed to the requirements of international practice in the matter of its bulletins. The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in Delhi, on the other hand, carries on a wide propaganda offensive on Indian soil against the Government of India. The Embassy distributes literature, e.g. "Peking Review", "China Reconstructs", etc. which contain material highly offensive to the Government of India. Some of these Chinese publications have directly attacked the Government of India in matters concerning their internal jurisdiction.

7. It will be clear from the above that the charge of abusing 'hospitality and courtesy levelled against the Embassy of India in Peking is completely wide off the mark. It will be more appropriate for the Government of the People's Republic of China to advise the Chinese Embassy in Delhi to conform to the correct standards maintained by the Embassy of India in Peking and to curb the propensity of Hsin Hua to distort, "arbitrarily slander" and misrepresent the Government and the people of India in the Chinese press.
The Information Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India and has the honour to request the Embassy to send to the Information Department three copies of the material attacking Chinese press reports which the Embassy issued recently. The Embassy has not yet sent the said printed material to the Information Department.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs takes this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of India in China to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, 28 September 1961

The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China and, with reference to their Information Department's letter No. (61) Hsin Tze Ti O/306/Hao, dated September 23, 1961, has the honour to state that the Embassy of India is not aware of any material, attacking Chinese press reports which is alleged to have been published by the Embassy.

2. The Embassy of India avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
On the 4th October 1960 an Indian Air Force hunter aircraft took off from Ambala at 0932 hours on a routine training flight. It was in normal contact with its base till 0954 hours when it was reported at a bearing of 080 degree from Ambala. Since then the aircraft has been reported missing and despite repeated searches no trace of the aircraft has been found. There was only one occupant of the aircraft, the pilot Flight Lieutenant K. P. Singh.

2. While all Indian aircraft carry strict instructions not to violate Chinese air space, it is considered possible that owing to navigational error or mechanical failure, the aircraft may have strayed and possibly crashed in Chinese territory. The Government of India would appreciate if the Chinese Government would instruct investigation to be made in the western Tibet region in case any information pertaining to the missing Indian aircraft or Pilot has been reported by the local authorities concerned.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 26 November 1960

It was stated in the memorandum delivered by the Indian Embassy in China on October 18, 1960 that an I.A.F. Hunter aircraft was reported missing on October 4, 1960, during its flight on Indian territory near the Ari district of China's Tibet region and that it might have strayed and possibly crashed in Chinese territory. The Chinese Government has instructed the local authorities concerned to conduct detailed investigation into this. It is satisfied that no foreign aircraft was found crashed on the above date in China's Tibet region.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 30 December 1960

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and with reference to the Indian Ministry's note of August 20, 1960 to the Chinese Embassy has the honour to state as follows:

In its note of August 20, the Ministry of External Affairs of India not only failed to give serious consideration to the proper request made by the Chinese Embassy in its note of August 1, but deliberately misrepresented what was stated in the note and made totally groundless charges against the Chinese Embassy and the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency in India. The Embassy of China expresses its deep regret at this. In its note of August 20, the Ministry of External Affairs of India arbitrarily put blame on the reports of the correspondent of the Hsin Hua News Agency as "picked from newspapers which are either not of any standing or are opposed to Government", "entirely one-sided if not false". The Indian Ministry in its note, however, failed to give a single fact to support its above allegations. All those who pay heed to facts can see that the reports on India sent by the Hsin Hua correspondent are all well founded on facts and have their sources. In reporting about the happenings in India, the Hsin Hua correspondent based himself exclusively on the newspapers and journals openly published in India for his source of information. It is entirely a normal practice and there is nothing objectionable for a foreign correspondent to quote information from the newspapers and journals openly published in the country to which he is accredited. It may be asked whether the Government of India has ever laid down any stipulations which regulate that information from certain newspapers or journals may be quoted while information from others should not be quoted. If quotations of information different from the views of the Government of India are considered "false and one-sided", such kind of charge holds no water at all. Nevertheless, the Government of India, using this as a pretext, should have compelled the Hsin Hua correspondent and all other members of the staff of the New Delhi Branch Office of the Hsin Hua News Agency to withdraw from India; this is obviously a self-irony to "the freedom of the press" bragged about by the Government of India. Since the Government of India has deprived the Hsin Hua correspondent even of the right to objectively quote information from the newspapers and journals openly published in India, how can there be such contention as it is found in the Indian Ministry's note that "the Government of India cherish and uphold the principle of the freedom of the press"? If the Government of India exceptionally does not allow the Hsin Hua correspondent to objectively quote information from the newspapers and journals openly published in India while allowing "the freedom of comments" to Indian and accredited foreign correspondents in India, then how can it be said that this does not constitute a discrimination against the Hsin Hua correspondent?

The Indian Ministry in its August 20 note also deliberately misrepresented what was stated in the Chinese Embassy's note of August 1, and groundlessly charged the Chinese Embassy with interfering in the Indian Government's exercise of its sovereign right. The Chinese Embassy cannot but express its surprise and regret at this. In the conversations during the two interviews he had with the Hsin Hua correspondent Mr. Kao Liang in the middle of July, Mr. P. N. Menon, Director of External Publicity Division, Ministry of External Affairs of India, asked Mr. Kao Liang to counsel the Head Office of the Hsin Hua News Agency, Peking, to change its policy of reporting on India. This action on the part of Mr. Menon obviously constitutes an interference in the affairs of the Chinese state news agency, and that is the reason why the Chinese Embassy pointed out in its note of August 1 that "no one is in any way entitled to interfere in the reports of the Hsin Hua News Agency, using 'interference in internal affairs' as a pretext". This is altogether necessary and appropriate. The Indian Ministry in its note, however, countercharged that the Chinese Embassy interfered in the Indian Government's exercise of its sovereign right. This charge is totally groundless and reverses right and wrong.

The Embassy of China holds that the Government of India by not allowing the Hsin Hua correspondent to continue his stay in India, particularly by compelling the entire staff (including a driver) of the New Delhi Branch Office of the Hsin Hua News Agency to withdraw, has created a situation in which the New Delhi Branch Office of the Hsin Hua News Agency has been forced to suspend its work. This is neither in conformity with the normal relations between China and India, nor in the interest of the friendship between the Chinese and Indian peoples. The Embassy of China, therefore, requests that the Government of India take steps so that the New Delhi Branch Office of the Hsin Hua News Agency may restore its work at an early date.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 10 February 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India and with reference to the latter’s Note No. M/447/60, dated December 30, 1960, have the honour to state that it was with regret that the Government of India were obliged to take the decision requiring the Hsin Hua News Agency correspondent to leave Delhi and to obtain the closure of the News Agency Office. The Government of India cannot accept the substance or the analysis contained in the note and must point out that the decision regarding the closure of the Agency was taken after careful consideration and on the firm conviction that the reports which had been sent by the Hsin Hua News Agency over a period of time were contrary to facts and were calculated to cause further harm to the friendly relations between India and China. The Government of India do not admit the right of the Chinese Government to question the validity or the wisdom of a decision which lies entirely within the sovereign discretion of the Government of India. They firmly reject the contention in the Embassy’s note.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 18 March 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and has the honour to state as follows:

A soldier of the Chinese frontier guards stationed in the Yatung area in the Tibet region of China, Liu Shu-jung, was found missing while performing his normal duties on March 7, 1961, and up to now he has still not returned to his base. Meanwhile, according to news reports, the Indian Government has declared that a Chinese soldier was arrested by an Indian armed patrol on the Sikkim border on March 10. Judging from the date and place, this Chinese soldier appears to be Liu Shu-jung, the missing Chinese soldier mentioned above. The Indian Government is kindly requested to assist in sending him back to China, for which the Chinese Government would be deeply grateful.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 9 May 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and with reference to the Note dated March 18, 1961, presented to Shri S. K. Bhutani, First Secretary of the Indian Embassy, Peking, by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China, have the honour to state as follows:

On March 10, 1961, an armed Chinese soldier was apprehended in Sikkim territory near the Sikkim-Tibet border. After his apprehension by an Indian patrol he declared that he did not want to go back to China and that he would like to seek asylum in India. In this circumstance, the Government of India regret their inability to return the soldier to China.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of India in China, to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, 24 June 1961

The Embassy of India presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China and has the honour to request for information concerning the opening of branches of foreign banks in China. The Embassy would be grateful if rules and regulations on the subject are given to it at an early date.

The Embassy of India avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 12 August 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents compliments to the Embassy of India in China and has the honour to address a reply to the Embassy’s note of June 24, 1961.

Regarding the Embassy’s request for supplying information on the rules and regulations for the setting up in China of the branches of foreign banks, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, after consulting the authorities concerned, came to know that no appropriate material of this kind is available.

We avail of this opportunity to convey to the Embassy the assurances of our highest consideration.
In September, 1961, Government of India's attention was drawn to the distortions in Chinese press reports on the proceedings of the Belgrade Conference, and in particular to the deliberate and mischievous misrepresentations of the Prime Minister's statement and the role of the Indian Delegation. The Foreign Secretary spoke to His Excellency the Chinese Ambassador on the subject on September 14, 1961 and the Indian Charge d'Affaires in Peking made a verbal démarche to the Chinese Foreign Office on the same day. The Chinese Government's response to the representations on the subject was conveyed verbally by His Excellency the Vice-Foreign Minister, Mr. Keng Piao, to our Charge d'Affaires in Peking on October 24, 1961. The Chinese reply denied that their press reports of the Prime Minister's speech at Belgrade contained deliberate and mischievous misrepresentations and asserted that Chinese newspaper reports had brought out the objective truth. In this reply there were further attacks on the Prime Minister, the Defence Minister and the Secretary-General of the Ministry of External Affairs. Other matters, irrelevant to the issue, were also raised. A note Verbale on the subject was handed over to the Chinese Counsellor in New Delhi on November 10, 1961, the text of which follows:

The Government of India have seen with surprise and regret a report from their Charge d'Affaires in Peking about Vice-Foreign Minister Keng Piao's talk with him on 24th October. The Vice-Foreign Minister made a series of allegations against the Government of India and the Indian Press. He also indulged in personal attacks on Prime Minister Nehru, Defence Minister Krishna Menon and Secretary General R. K. Nehru. No attempt was made to substantiate the allegations which were couched in language which is calculated to cause offence.

2. The Vice-Foreign Minister accused the Secretary General of making an "incorrect and untrue statement" to the Press on his return from Mongolia via China. The Secretary General's visit to China was not fortuitous. He was representing the Government of India at the 40th Anniversary celebrations of the Mongolian Revolution. It was found expedient for him to return from Ulan Baton via China and Hongkong. He was asked to utilise the opportunity thus provided to renew his contacts with the Chinese leaders whom he had known during his tenure as Ambassador of India in Peking, and at the same time to inspect Indian missions in Peking and Hong Kong.

3. The visit to Peking was informal and the Secretary General's talks with the Chinese leaders were in the nature of an exchange of views on relations between the two countries in which the Secretary General had long been deeply interested. The Secretary General felt that it would be appropriate for him to seek the reactions of the Chinese leaders to the facts stated in the Officials' Report on the border problem. The whole purport of the talks, as the record will show, was to emphasise the fact that occupation of Indian territory by China had come in the way of friendly relations. This was repeated by the Secretary General in different words in a brief statement he made to the Press on his return to India.

4. These are the facts relating to the Secretary General's stop-over in China en route to India from Mongolia, and the facts were stated by the Prime Minister at a press conference prior to the Secretary General's departure for Mongolia and China and briefly related to Parliament on the Secretary General's return. It is surprising that, in regard to these facts, the Secretary General should be charged with prevarication and abuse of Chinese hospitality. Not content with this attack on the Secretary General, Vice-Foreign Minister Keng Piao has discourteously charged the Prime Minister of India with 'dishonest dealing'. Such accusations and offensive remarks are not conducive to high level contacts between the two Governments.

5. Vice-Foreign Minister Keng Piao referred to what he called "slandering speeches" made by Prime Minister Nehru, Defence Minister Krishna Menon and the Secretary General. There is no slander in these speeches and statements. They are a bare statement of facts about unlawful intrusion and occupation of Indian territory by Chinese forces. In 1957-58, while China was still bound to India by the five principles of peaceful co-existence, Chinese forces marched in and occupied Indian territory in Aksai Chin.
Since then they have extended their occupation further into Ladakh. Solemn assurances and official statements of the Chinese Premier notwithstanding, Chinese forces have gone even beyond the limit which Premier Chou En-lai had arbitrarily claimed for China in India's Ladakh up to 1959-60. When India's territorial integrity is at stake as a result of aggressive activities on the part of Chinese forces, how else should the Indian Government react? And if it reacts and tells Chinese representatives that they have acted wrongly, does it amount to slandering China?

6. There is very little criticism of China per se in the Indian Press although the Indian Press naturally reacts to the national preoccupation and concern over the threat posed by China to India's territorial integrity. As the Defence Minister put it "India is determined not to negotiate a surrender". How could this sentiment be objectionable to the Chinese Government unless it wants India to acquiesce tamely in the occupation of India's territory?

7. It should be apparent that Indian leaders and the Press are not anti-Chinese but rather pro-Indian and deeply interested in the security and integrity of the Indian Union. They do not go out of the way to attack or make offensive remarks about another Government or its leaders. As for the Chinese press which the Vice-Foreign Minister has described as 'always objective, never indulging in distortions, misrepresentations, or maligning', it has carried on a campaign of vilification against India. For sometime past, it has been propagating the view that India's Prime Minister was representing the Western Powers at the Belgrade Conference, that he was acting for the Colonial powers and that he confused issues by raising the question of "war and peace". While the Chinese Government may quite legitimately claim these as their authentic views and true appreciation of the Prime Minister's role at the Belgrade Conference, it is inconceivable that they who were not represented at the Conference should put out a version of the Prime Minister's speech at Belgrade holding it to be more authentic than the official version. Indeed the Chinese press has gone far and wide to search for words and phrases in foreign comments which it could touch up to suit its view of the Indian Prime Minister's role at the Belgrade Conference. It has even used fragmentary sentences torn out of context from India press reports and comments to buttress the campaign against India's Prime Minister.
8. The Indian Embassy in Peking who were for a while silent spectators of this growing campaign of calumny against India's Prime Minister, deemed it necessary to meet enquiries from friendly foreign sources by putting out on restricted distribution a comparative statement of the speech delivered by India's Prime Minister and the Chinese versions thereof. This was a modest effort which placed side by side the original speech and that put out by the Chinese press. But the Chinese press reacted to this with great vehemence. It has also shown extraordinary intolerance by resorting (as Hsinhua and China Youth Daily have done) to highly improper methods of intimidation against the Indian Embassy in Peking. The Government of India are unable to agree that the reproduction of speeches/statements of Indian leaders in the Indian Embassy news-bulletins is contrary to international practice.

9. The Vice-Foreign Minister touched upon a number of other small matters and these have been dealt with separately in notes from the Government of India. These allegations too are unfounded. If the Chinese Government need any clarification on any particular matter they can appropriately enquire through diplomatic channels before turning their own doubts into allegations against the Government of India. It is a malicious charge that the Government of India are 'continuing to encourage Tibetan rebels' because Tibetan refugees in India have all along been restrained from indulging in anti-Chinese activities. No 'armed Tibetan rebel' has carried out a raid on Chinese territory from Indian soil.

10. The Vice-Foreign Minister refurbished the disingenuous charge that while Chinese troops have been withdrawn from the border, Indian troops are making every effort to trespass into Chinese territory. As the Chinese Government know, there is intensive military activity entirely on the Chinese side, and India has recently lost some more territory to Chinese intruders.

11. Regarding strong notes since June/July 1961 these have in the main come from Chinese official quarters only, while Indian notes during the period have been restricted to a bald statement of facts.

12. As to the Chinese Ambassador in Delhi not being able to see anybody important, he has never been refused a request for interview by anyone from the Prime Minister downwards.
13. As the Chinese Government are no doubt aware for many years it was the Government of India's endeavour to have friendly relations with them. Even now that is the Government of India's wish. But the forcible occupation of Indian territory by Chinese forces, so long as it continues, cannot lead to friendly relations.
NOTES, MEMORANDA AND LETTERS EXCHANGED BETWEEN
THE GOVERNMENTS OF INDIA AND CHINA

NOVEMBER 1961—JULY 1962

WHITE PAPER No. VI

MINISTRY OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

PRINTED IN INDIA BY THE GENERAL MANAGER, GOVT. OF INDIA PRESS, NEW DELHI AND PUBLISHED BY THE MANAGER OF PUBLICATIONS, DELHI 1962

Price Re. 0.50 nP.
On 28 November 1961, the Prime Minister presented to Parliament the Fifth White Paper containing the notes, memoranda and letters exchanged between the Government of India and the Government of the People’s Republic of China since 9 November 1960. This White Paper contains the notes, memoranda and letters exchanged between the two Governments since 2 December 1961. It also contains 7 earlier notes which had not been included in the previous White Paper.

Ministry of External Affairs,
New Delhi.
CONTENTS

Border issues and incidents

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Note of the Chinese Government, 2 November 1961</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 30 November 1961</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 9 December 1961</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 26 February 1962</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 1 March 1962</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 13 March 1962</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 20 March 1962</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 22 March 1962</td>
<td>21</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 15 April 1962</td>
<td>26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 18 April 1962</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 21 April 1962</td>
<td>28</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 26 April 1962</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 27 April 1962</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 30 April 1962</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 30 April 1962</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 11 May 1962</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 14 May 1962</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 15 May 1962</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 19 May 1962</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 21 May 1962</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 21 May 1962</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>22</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 26 May 1962</td>
<td>51</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 28 May 1962</td>
<td>52</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 28 May 1962</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 2 June 1962</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 4 June 1962</td>
<td>59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>27</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 6 June 1962</td>
<td>60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>28</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 6 June 1962</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 6 June 1962</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 16 June 1962</td>
<td>66</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 18 June 1962</td>
<td>67</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 22 June 1962</td>
<td>68</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 28 June 1962</td>
<td>71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 28 June 1962</td>
<td>72</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 30 June 1962</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>36</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 6 July 1962</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No.</td>
<td>Description</td>
<td>Page</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>37</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 8 July 1962</td>
<td>78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 10 July 1962</td>
<td>79</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 10 July 1962</td>
<td>81</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 12 July 1962</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>41</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 13 July 1962</td>
<td>85</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 14 July 1962</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>43</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 16 July 1962</td>
<td>91</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 22 July 1962</td>
<td>92</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>45</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 24 July 1962</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Sino-Indian boundary dispute

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>46</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 20 November 1961</td>
<td>95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>47</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 10 May 1962</td>
<td>96</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>48</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 31 May 1962</td>
<td>98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>49</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 31 May 1962</td>
<td>99</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>50</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 30 June 1962</td>
<td>103</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Territorial Air Space

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>51</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 7 October 1961</td>
<td>106</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>52</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 2 November 1961</td>
<td>108</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 4 December 1961</td>
<td>109</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>54</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 9 December 1961</td>
<td>110</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>55</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 4 January 1962</td>
<td>111</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>56</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 24 January 1962</td>
<td>114</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>57</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 25 January 1962</td>
<td>115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>58</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 22 February 1962</td>
<td>116</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>59</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 7 March 1962</td>
<td>117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>60</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 9 March 1962</td>
<td>118</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>61</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 10 March 1962</td>
<td>119</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>62</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 10 March 1962</td>
<td>120</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>63</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 14 March 1962</td>
<td>121</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>64</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 20 March 1962</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>65</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 20 March 1962</td>
<td>123</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>66</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 24 March 1962</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>67</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 4 April 1962</td>
<td>127</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>68</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 17 April 1962</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>69</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 19 April 1962</td>
<td>129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No.</td>
<td>Description</td>
<td>Page</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>70.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 23 April 1962</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>71.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 17 May 1962</td>
<td>131</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>72.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 21 May 1962</td>
<td>132</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>73.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 31 May 1962</td>
<td>133</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>74.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 6 June 1962</td>
<td>137</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>75.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 13 June 1962</td>
<td>138</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>76.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 28 June 1962</td>
<td>139</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>77.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 30 June 1962</td>
<td>142</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>78.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 25 July 1962</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Alleged ill-treatment of Chinese Representatives and Nationals in India

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>No.</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>80.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 28 November 1961</td>
<td>145</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>81.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 2 December 1961</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>82.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 4 December 1961</td>
<td>147</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>83.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 12 December 1961</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>84.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 12 December 1961</td>
<td>149</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>85.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 14 December 1961</td>
<td>151</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>86.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Indian Government, 5 January 1</td>
<td>152</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>87.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 18 January 1962</td>
<td>154</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>88.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 18 January 1962</td>
<td>155</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>90.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 23 January 1962</td>
<td>159</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>92.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 2 March 1962</td>
<td>161</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>93.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 6 March 1962</td>
<td>163</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>95.</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 28 April 1962</td>
<td>167</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>96.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 28 April 1962</td>
<td>168</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>97.</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 5 May 1962</td>
<td>169</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>98.</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 5 May 1962</td>
<td>171</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Page</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>172</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>173</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>174</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>177</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>178</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>179</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>181</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>182</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>183</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>184</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>185</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>186</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>187</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>188</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>189</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>191</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>193</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>197</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>201</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>203</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>206</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>211</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>216</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>219</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>222</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>223</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>225</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The Chinese Trade Agency at Kalimpong

126. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 2 December 1961 .......................... 227
127. Note of the Indian Government, 30 March 1962 ............................................ 228
128. Note of the Chinese Government, 2 May 1962 ............................................... 229
129. Note of the Indian Government, 15 May 1962 ............................................... 230
130. Memorandum of the Indian Government, 21 May 1962 ................................. 231

Treatment of Indian Representatives and Nationals

133. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 2 March 1962 .............................. 235
134. Note of the Chinese Government, 14 March 1962 ......................................... 237
137. Note of the Indian Government, 21 April 1962 ............................................ 241
139. Note of the Indian Government, 22 May 1962 ............................................. 243
140. Note of the Chinese Government, 28 May 1962 ........................................... 244
141. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 13 June 1962 ............................. 245
144. Note of the Indian Government, 22 June 1962 ............................................. 247
145. Memorandum of the Indian Government, 3 July 1962 .................................... 250
146. Note of the Indian Government, 26 July 1962 ............................................. 251

Miscellaneous

150. Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 3 April 1962 ............................. 258
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>151</td>
<td>Letter of the Chinese Government, 5 April 1962</td>
<td>259</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>152</td>
<td>Letter of the Indian Government, 7 April 1962</td>
<td>262</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>153</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 30 April 1962</td>
<td>263</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>154</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Chinese Government, 5 May 1962</td>
<td>266</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>155</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 8 May 1962</td>
<td>267</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>156</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Indian Government, 9 May 1962</td>
<td>268</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>157</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 9 May 1962</td>
<td>269</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>158</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 10 May 1962</td>
<td>270</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>159</td>
<td>Memorandum of the Indian Government, 14 May 1962</td>
<td>271</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>160</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 26 May 1962</td>
<td>272</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>161</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 29 May 1962</td>
<td>273</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>162</td>
<td>Note of the Chinese Government, 11 June 1962</td>
<td>276</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>163</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 27 June 1962</td>
<td>278</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>164</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 12 July 1962</td>
<td>279</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>165</td>
<td>Note of the Indian Government, 26 July 1962</td>
<td>280</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 2 November 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with regard to the repeated violations of China's territory and territorial air by India, has the honour to state as follows:

(1) In recent months, Indian troops have continuously expanded their illegal occupation and patrol range in China's Demchok area. On July 6, 1961, Indian troops intruded into the Rato area east of Demchok and set up a checkpost there. They openly carried out military exercises with solid shots there and time and again illegally sent their patrols to and around Gore (approximately 32° 38' N, 79° 34' E) to the east of Rato. On August 9, three Indian soldiers penetrated deep into the Deboche area (approximately 32° 27' N, 79° 25' E). 20 odd kilometres south of Demchok. On July 22, Indian troops went so far as to detain illegally in the Demchok area, which is China's territory, a Chinese citizen named Dopoe, who was held as long as five days and interrogated nine times before being released.

(2) In June 1961, fifty odd Indian military men intruded into China's Wuje area, stationed themselves around 30° 49' N, 75° 58' E, and built fortifications and other works there. On July 2, 3, 5 and 15, each day an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over that area and air-dropped supplies to these intrusive Indian troops. The intrusive Indian troops did not withdraw till early September.

The Chinese Government points out with regret that, despite its repeated protests to India against the latter's illegal activities in the two areas mentioned above, Indian troops have still been further expanding their area of occupation, setting up strong points and carrying out all kinds of illegal activities in China's territory. Moreover, the intrusion into and stationing at the Wuje area by Indian troops are in serious violation of the Sino-Indian agreement to refrain from sending armed personnel into the area. The Chinese Government hereby once again lodges a strong protest with the Indian Government against all these activities on the part of the Indian side.

The Chinese Government has been following with great anxiety the Indian troops' steady pressing forward on China's borders and cannot but regard such action of the Indian side as an attempt to create new troubles and to carry out its expansion by force in the Sino-Indian border areas. It is not difficult to conceive that, had not the Chinese side restrained strictly its own border guards to avoid by all means any conflict with India in line with China's consistent stand of maintaining peace and tranquillity along the border, such gross violations of China's territory and sovereignty by the Indian troops would have led to very serious consequences. The Chinese Government deems it necessary to point out that it would be very erroneous and dangerous should the Indian Government take China's attitude of restraint and tolerance as an expression of weakness. The Chinese Government hereby demands that the Indian Government speedily change its present practice and order all the intruding Indian troops to put an end immediately to their violations of China's territory and territorial air and withdraw from Chinese territory and take effective measures to prevent the recurrence of similar incidents in the future.

103 M of E A—2.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 30 November 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and with reference to the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India dated 31st October, 1961 has the honour to state as follows:

The Indian Government has in its note denied and quibbled about facts of Indian intrusions into Chinese territory and air space as pointed out in the Chinese Government's note of 12th August, 1961 and at the same time made groundless charges against Chinese Government concerning alleged intrusions into Indian territory by Chinese forces. Of late the Indian Government has further made use of these groundless charges to whip up another anti-Chinese campaign in India. The Chinese Government expressed its extreme regret at such actions of the Indian Government which seriously impair the friendship between Chinese and the Indian peoples.

All places listed in Chinese Government's note of 12th August which were invaded by the Indian side lie indisputably within Chinese territory and have all along been under actual jurisdiction of the Chinese Government. In disregard of the jurisdiction in these places the Indian Government has despatched armed personnel to push into these places and even cross the boundary line claimed by the Indian side itself. This is obviously an attempt to realise its territorial claim unilaterally and by force. Although trying hard to deny the fact that the Indian side has further invaded Chinese territory in Spanggur, Demchok, Salan, Wuje etc., and that Indian aircraft have continually intruded into China's air Space the Indian Government in its note nevertheless cannot but admit its unlawful activities such as the setting up of check post extending patrolling and despatch of personnel in the Demchok and the Wuje area. The Chinese Government has long since proved with large quantities of authentic documents and facts that both Demchok and Wuje are within Chinese territory. As the Chinese Government has pointed out in its note of 12th August armed Indian provocations within Chinese territory and the extended illegal occupation thereby the Indian side cannot but once again cause tension in the border area.

It is especially surprising that the Indian Government in its note of 31st October arbitrarily and unreasonably asserts that the above mentioned places invaded by the Indian side excepting Salan are within boundary line unilaterally claimed by India and that therefore whatever actions the Indian side may take these do not constitute intrusions into Chinese territory. Such logic of the Indian Government is untenable and also most dangerous. The Indian Government must be aware that the Chinese and the Indian Governments do not hold identical views concerning the boundary between the two countries. Taking the case of the Eastern Sector of the Sino-Indian boundary the Chinese Government has always held that this sector of the boundary lies along the Southern foot of the Himalayas and that the so called “McMahon Line” is totally illegal. If the Indian Government’s above logic should be followed, the Chinese Government would have every reason to send troops to cross the so called “McMahon Line” and enter the vast area between the crest of the Himalayas and their Southern foot. But the Chinese Government has never done so and all Chinese military and administrative personnel, acting upon orders, have not crossed the so called “McMahon Line”. The Chinese Government has always held that pending final settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question both sides should maintain status quo of the boundary. The Chinese Government has proved by deed that it is true to this stand. The Indian Government however has ceaselessly tried to change unilaterally the status quo of the boundary and this can only harm peaceful settlement of the boundary question and the maintenance of the tranquillity of the border area. The Chinese Government once again asks the Indian Government to stop its unlawful action in the Chinese border area otherwise Indian Government must be held fully responsible for the new tension caused by such unlawful action.

For some time Indian Government has continually stepped up its military activities in border areas and established many new check posts. This was not denied even by responsible officials of the Indian Government including Prime Minister Nehru in their public statements. But the Indian Government has now groundlessly charged against Chinese troops with establishing new posts in western sector of the Sino-Indian border, going beyond so called “1956 Chinese claim line in Ladakh”, etc. It should be pointed out that the Sino-Indian traditional boundary in the Western sector has always been most clear and definite. It is the line marked on Chinese maps published in 1956 which was mentioned in Premier Chau En-lai’s letter to Prime Minister Nehru dated 17th December, 1959; it is also the line marked on the maps handed over to the Indian side by the Chinese officials during meeting of Chinese and Indian officials in 1960. The vast territory east of this sector of the boundary, except the Parigas area in the Demchok region, which has been occupied by India in recent years has all along been under the effective administrative jurisdiction of the Chinese Government. Out of consideration for Sino-Indian friendship and border tranquillity the Chinese Government has ordered its frontier guards to strictly observe this sector of the boundary and has kept Chinese troops from sending patrols within 20 kilometres on the Chinese side of the boundary. Hence the question of Chinese troops crossing the so called “1956 Chinese claim line in Ladakh” cannot possibly arise. The three places where Chinese troops were alleged by the Indian Government in its note of having established new posts are within Chinese territory east of this sector of the boundary line. The Chinese check posts at Nyagzu and at 35 degrees 19 minutes N, 78 degrees 12 minutes E have long been in existence and no check post has ever been established at Dambuguru. The Indian Government’s fallacious charge that China has established new posts at these three places not only is an open interference with China’s internal affairs but also shows the Indian Government’s irresponsible attitude of trumping up falsehoods. This cannot but greatly pain the Chinese people and Government who have consistently upheld traditional Sino-Indian friendship.

In its note the Indian Government further lists 11 cases charging the Chinese side with intrusions into Indian territory. These 11 cases can be divided into two categories:

(1) 4 of the cases are repetition of old stories. Case (3) alleges that Chinese soldiers were seen near hot springs in Indian territory in the Western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary. Cases (7) and (8) allege that 11 armed Chinese personnel and three Chinese respectively crossed into the territory of Sikkim South of Jelpeila. Case (10) alleges that 25 Chinese soldiers went to Taksang Gompa in the area controlled by India in the Eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary. Concerning these four cases the Indian Government long ago sent note to the Chinese Government and the Chinese Government already pointed out in its respective replies that the result of the investigation showed that there was no case of armed Chinese personnel entering the above area referred to by the Indian side. In replying to the allegation (7), the Chinese Government on its own initiative explained that at the said time eight Chinese border inhabitants who were gathering medical herbs in the vicinity of Jelpeila according to their usual practice had reached a spot not far to the South of Jelpeila but returned from there soon afterwards. In replying to allegation (10) too the Chinese Government explained that nine local working personnel of the Tibet region of China while out to fell bamboos had lost their way because of the low clouds and thick fog and stepped over the so called "McMahon Line" by mistake but that as soon as they perceived it they had turned back. The above replies fully prove that the attitude of the Chinese Government is one of seeking truth from facts and is open and above board. Category II, the other seven so called new cases are mostly dating over a year ago; in some cases no specific dates have been supplied at all. In spite of this the Chinese Government has conducted serious and thorough investigations. The replies are given which are as follows:

A. Four of the cases pertain to the Western sector. Case (1) and (2) allege that Chinese military personnel and a Chinese survey party went to the Suriah area. Case (4) alleges that four Chinese soldiers were seen at 34 degrees 17 minutes N, 79 degrees 01 minutes E. Case (5) alleges that Chinese and Chinese troops were seen near 33 degrees 31 minutes N, 78 degrees 48 minutes E. The Chinese Government deem it necessary to point out that all the above places are within Chinese territory and have all along been under the effective administrative jurisdiction of the Chinese Government and so the Indian Government has no right to intervene. Moreover as mentioned above the Chinese Government in order to maintain the tranquillity of the border area has instructed the Chinese frontier guards not to send patrol within 20 kilometres on Chinese side of the boundary. The results of the recent investigations show that the Chinese frontier guards have always observed this instruction faithfully and have not trespassed into Indian territory at all. On the contrary as pointed out by the Chinese Government in its note of 12th August 1961, it is the Indian frontier guards who have not only occupied long ago Demchok and other places within Chinese territory in the Western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary but have pushed forward and expanded continually the extent of its illegal occupation.

B. Case (6) also pertains to the Western sector. It is alleged that a Chinese patrol was seen near, Dauletbeg Oldi. Of all the seven new cases brought up in the note this is the only case which concerns Indian territory. But the time given in the Indian note is extremely vague using only the loose expression of "sometime in the autumn of 1960". According to the result of investigation the Chinese Government can reply definitely that throughout the autumn of 1960 no Chinese patrol ever went into the area within 20 kilometres on Chinese side of the Western sector of the Sino-Indian traditional boundary to say nothing of course of trespassing into Indian territory.

C. Case (9) concerns the China Sikkim border. It is alleged that 12 armed Chinese personnel went 100 yards inside Sikkim territory from Jelepela. As is well known the China Sikkim boundary has long been formally delimited and its location is very clear. The result of investigation once again shows that this boundary has always been respected by Chinese side and that no armed Chinese personnel trespassed into the territory of Sikkim at the time mentioned in the Indian Note.

D. Case (11) says that in the first week of July 1961, a Chinese patrol was seen near Chemokarpla, South of the "McMahon Line" in the eastern sector. The Note fails to give the specific coordinate of the scene of the so-called incident or exact date. In spite of this Chinese Government has conducted an extensive investigation but no Chinese forces are found to have gone beyond the so called "McMahon Line" in early July.

It can be seen from the above that the Indian Government in order to make the fabricated charges of "aggression" against Chinese Government has not hesitated to repeat allegations which were refuted by the facts, and make new allegations in which even simple matter of date cannot be clearly stated and only one of the places involved is really within Indian territory. Thus it is very difficult to make people believe that the Indian Government was taking a serious and responsible attitude. The Indian Government in its Note asserts that it was not true that the Chinese side had desisted from sending out patrolling parties and that there was no factual basis for China's maintenance of the status quo of the boundary and so on. This can only be regarded as an attempt to create pretexts for unlawful activities by Indian side in the Chinese border areas. The Chinese Government has never spared any effort to maintain status quo of the boundary and the tranquillity of the border area in the hope of creating favourable conditions for the settlement through negotiation of the boundary question by the Chinese and Indian sides in accordance with five principles of peaceful co-existence. The Indian Government however has acted in a diametrically opposite way, it has made incessant provocations in border areas in an attempt to realise its territorial claims by force, and turned back to falsely accuse China of committing so-called new aggression. Such practice of the Indian Government whatever needs it may be designed to meet will only result in the daily aggravating of tension in the Sino-Indian border areas the putting off of a settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question and the lack of improvement in Sino-Indian relations and these run counter to the common desire of the Chinese and Indian peoples. The Chinese Government earnestly hope that the Indian Government will change its line, treasure Sino-Indian friendship and the interests of the Chinese and Indian peoples, adopt a friendly and co-operative attitude, agree to settle reasonably boundary question and improve relations between two countries.

The Ministry is availing itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurance of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 9 December 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in New Delhi, and with reference to the note dated 2nd November, 1961, handed over to the Indian Charge d'Affairs in Peking by the Chinese Foreign Ministry, regarding alleged intrusions into Chinese territory by Indian armed personnel, have the honour to state as follows:

The allegations contained in the present Chinese note are a repetition of the charges made earlier in their note of August 12, 1961, to which an answer has been given in this Ministry's note of October 31, 1961. It is all the more surprising that the Chinese Government should return to the same charges.

The specific allegations of intrusion mentioned in the present Chinese note are dealt with below:

Allegation I.—It has been alleged that on July 6, 1961, Indian troops intruded into the Rato area and set up a post there. They carried out military exercises with 'solid shots' and time and again sent patrols to Gore.

Comments.—The Demchok area and the other locations mentioned in the Chinese note are within India's international border in this sector and have been traditionally under Indian administration. For the Chinese Government to raise questions about Indian posts and patrols in Indian territory is an entirely unjustified interference in the sovereign affairs of the Government of India. However, Indian forces in this sector have not carried out any military exercise with or without "solid shots".

Allegation II.—On August 9, three Indian soldiers went into the Deboche area.

Comments.—No Indian soldier, as alleged in the Chinese note, ever went into the Deboche area.

Allegation III.—On July 22, Indian troops detained a Chinese citizen named Dopoje in the Demchok area and interrogated him.

Comments.—The Government of India has no information regarding the alleged detention of a Chinese citizen named Dopoje in the Demchok area of India's Ladakh. More particulars of this Chinese citizen should be furnished to facilitate enquiries.

Allegation IV.—In June 1961, 50 odd military men intruded into Waje and built fortifications there. On July 2, 3, 5 and 15 Indian aircraft intruded into the air space in the area and dropped supplies to Indian troops.
Comments.—Chinese Government’s attention is drawn to the comments under Allegation IV of the Ministry’s note of October 31, 1961, wherein it has been clearly stated that no armed post exists in Barahoti which the Chinese call Wuje. Indian posts in adjoining areas do not fall within the purview of the agreement on the demilitarisation of Barahoti so long as Barahoti is in dispute. The Government of India has rigidly adhered to the understanding between the two Governments in respect of Barahoti only.

It is a matter of regret that the Chinese Government should question the propriety of certain defensive measures taken by the Indian Government on its own territory. That the Chinese Government should also lodge a protest on this account is not only a mockery of truth but unwarranted interference in India’s internal affairs. In face of growing Chinese aggression on Indian territory since 1957-58, and expansion of unlawful Chinese occupation over parts of Ladakh it ill-behoves the Chinese Government to ask the Government of India to desist from taking measures to safeguard its territorial integrity. As to the profession that the Chinese Government has exercised restraint on its troops along the border, this has to be seen in the background of its record of aggression in recent years. The Sino-Indian border was always a border of peace and friendship until the Chinese Government embarked on a course of aggression. To restore peace and tranquillity on this border as well as to create fresh confidence in the Chinese Government’s professions, Chinese forces should first of all withdraw from Indian territory into Chinese territory. It would serve no useful purpose for the Chinese Government to go on pressing faked charges about Indian intrusions into Chinese territory in order to justify its own aggression on India.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 26 February 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China of November 30, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:—

The Government of India regret that the Government of the People's Republic of China ignore the clear and detailed information provided in the note of the Government of India of October 31, 1961, and continue to make baseless charges about Indian intrusions into Chinese territory and air space. In their note of October 31, 1961, the Government of India established conclusively that at no time had Indian forces or aircraft gone beyond what is, and has been for centuries, Indian territory. The territory west of Spang-gur, the Demchok area, Nilang and Barahoti (which the Chinese call Wuje) have always been parts of India and been administered by Indian authorities. To substantiate this position, a large amount of relevant evidence was produced by the Indian side at the talks which were held recently between the Indian and Chinese officials. It is, therefore, legitimate for the Government of India to establish check-posts and despatch personnel required for the administration of these areas.

It is, in fact, the Government of China who have during recent years been guilty of systematic and continuous aggression into Indian territory, and it is they who have sought to justify unlawful occupation by unwarranted territorial claims. These actions have been followed by a sustained campaign of falsehoods and propaganda against India.

It seems preposterous to the Government of India that the Government of China should argue that because the Government of India continue to exercise lawful jurisdiction over the territories that traditionally belong to them, the Government of China would be justified in crossing the so-called "McMahon Line" in order to assert their unfounded claims to the territory south of it. This territory, as the territory in the Western and Middle Sectors, has always been a part of India and been subject to Indian jurisdiction and administration. The "McMahon Line" Agreement of 1914 merely formalized what was the traditional boundary, well-known and recognized by the authorities on both sides. The Government of India take strong exception to the Chinese attempt to reply to Government of India's protest against Chinese aggression in the Western Sector by threatening aggression elsewhere. If the threat materialises and Chinese forces attempt to cross the "McMahon Line", the Government of India would regard it as a further instance of aggression and take such action as may be necessary to meet this further aggression.
The Government of India fail to understand the constant reference made by the Government of China to the need for a final settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question. The boundary between the two countries has long been settled. It has the sanction of centuries of tradition and custom as well as the confirmation, for almost its entire length, of valid treaties and agreements. It is the Government of China who have in recent years sought to change unilaterally by means of force the long-existing status quo. This has violated what had throughout history been a frontier of peace and jeopardized relations between the two countries. Peace on the border and friendly relations between the two countries can never be restored until the Government of China withdraw from the Indian territory which they have unlawfully occupied.

The Government of India welcome the fact that the Government of China now recognize that the traditional boundary between the two countries in the Western Sector has always been most clear and definite. This has throughout been the position of the Government of India. The traditional boundary in this area is that which has been shown on official Indian maps and in support of which a vast amount of evidence was brought forward during the talks of the officials. In China, however, this well-known traditional boundary has been in recent years ignored and a bewildering variety of alignments have been shown on their maps. There was even, as has been shown in the Report of the Officials and in the note of the Government of India of October 31, 1961, a discrepancy between the map published in China in 1956, which according to His Excellency Premier Chou En-Lai showed the alignment correctly, and the map provided by the Chinese side at the talks between the officials. This has been repeatedly pointed out to the Government of China; and it is a matter of surprise that they continue to assert, without regard to the facts, that the alignments on these two maps are identical. The map of 1960 showed an alignment which ran due east from the Karakoram Pass whereas that in the map of 1956 ran south-east from that point. In the Pangong region, the map of 1960 cut across the western half of the Pangong Lake, while the map of 1956 left the entire western half in India. In the Spanggur area, the map of 1960 showed an alignment west of the lake but the map of 1956 showed the major part of the lake in India.

Regarding the three new check-posts established by the Chinese in Indian territory to which attention was drawn in the note of the Government of India of October 31, 1961, the Government of China continue to claim that they are within Chinese territory. This is, of course, a complete travesty of the facts. The post at the point East 78° 12', North 35° 19' is well within Indian territory and about 120 miles to the west of the traditional boundary alignment. The check-post at Nyagzu is one mile west of the traditional boundary alignment and that at Dambuguru is about two miles within Indian territory.

The Government of China have made no effort to deny the existence of the check-posts at the first two points but merely assert that they have long been in existence. Aggression cannot be justified by time; but in fact, as the Government of India have stated, they have been set up recently and constitute fresh incursions into Indian territory.

The Government of India cannot accept the assertion of the Government of China that they have no check-post at Dambuguru. It is beyond doubt that such a post has been recently established.

The three posts have also been linked to bases in the rear by roads constructed across Indian territory. The Government of India drew attention to these also in their note of October 31, 1961; and the Government of China have not denied it.

The Government of India cited, in their note of October 31, 1961, eleven instances of recent Chinese intrusions into Indian territory.
The Government of China have given no satisfactory explanations for any of these. They have denied that Chinese soldiers were seen east of Hot Springs on October 13, 1960 and south of Jelep La on April 20, 1961. Mere denials cannot set aside first-hand evidence of these incursions into Indian territory. As regards the crossing by a Chinese patrol party of the northern border of Sikkim on September 2, 1960 and the intrusion by a Chinese patrol party four miles into Indian territory south of the so-called “MacMahon Line” on June 3, 1960, the Government of China assert that these were accidental trespasses by local inhabitants. But in both cases there is evidence to show that the violations were by large parties of Chinese soldiers carrying arms.

The Government of India note that the Government of China do not deny that their military personnel were present in Indian territory, in April and June 1960 at Suriah, in October 1960 near Hot Springs and in May 1961 near Chushul. All these areas form traditional Indian territory which have for centuries been under Indian jurisdiction and administration. The acceptance by the Government of China of the presence of their military personnel in these areas is, therefore, tantamount to acknowledgment of unlawful incursions on their part.

These incursions belie the statement of the Government of China that their patrols have been instructed not to proceed within twenty kilometres of the alignment claimed by the Chinese Government.
The check-posts which have been recently established are also much less than twenty kilometres away even from the alignment claimed

The Government of China deny that one of their patrols intruded into Indian territory near Dauletbeg Oldi in the autumn of 1960.
But this patrol left behind sufficient traces and evidence to establish beyond doubt that it had intruded into what even the Government of China accept to be Indian territory.

The intrusion of Chinese armed personnel across the Jelep La on September 12, 1961, was noticed by Indian border guards, and their evidence cannot be refuted by a mere denial.
As stated by the Government of India in their note of October 31, 1961, a Chinese patrol entered the Kameng Frontier Division of India in July 1961 and came to a point west of Chemokarpola. The co-ordinates of the point are East 91° 51’ North 27° 45’. The patrol left behind considerable evidence of its intrusion.

It is clear, therefore, that the Government of China are not only still in unlawful occupation of a large area of Indian territory but continue to violate the traditional boundary alignment between the two countries and to make repeated incursions into India. It is only when the Government of China withdraw from Indian territory and begin to respect the validity of the international boundary, which has been recognized in law and by history, that the relations between India and China can improve.

The Ministry of External Affairs takes this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 1 March 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and with reference to the note of December 4 and the two notes of December 9, 1961, from the Ministry of External Affairs of the Indian Government to the Chinese Embassy in India, has the honour to state as follows:—

(1) The Indian Government, in its notes, tried to deny the facts stated in the Chinese Government's note of October 7 and its two notes of November 2, 1961, concerning further Indian encroachments and intrusions into China's territory and air space. Not only this, the Indian notes, while levelling wanton slanders and attacks at the Chinese Government, asserted that the illegal Indian activities of encroaching and intruding into China's territory and air space were Indian measures to safeguard its territorial integrity. This shows that Indian encroachments and intrusions into Chinese territory and air space are by no means accidental, but deliberate attempts to realize by force the territorial claims put forward by the Indian Government to the Chinese Government. The Chinese Government cannot but seriously point out that this line of action of the Indian Government is most dangerous and may lead to grave consequences.

(2) In the interest of friendship between China and India, the Chinese Government has always worked for the peaceful settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question. Although the boundary line pointed out by China is the genuine traditional customary line and that claimed by India is without historical or legal basis, the Chinese Government has all along insisted on a settlement of the boundary question through friendly negotiations. The Chinese Government held that, pending a settlement of the boundary question, the two sides should jointly maintain the status quo of the boundary and refrain from changing it by the use of force or by any other unilateral action. In order to ease the situation along the border, the Chinese Government further proposed that the armed personnel of each side withdraw twenty kilometres from the entire boundary and that they stop patrolling there. After these proposals were rejected by the Indian side, China has on its own stopped patrolling within twenty kilometres on its side of the boundary. The Chinese Government has done this because it is deeply convinced that maintenance of the status quo of the boundary is the only way to avoid military clashes and an indispensable pre-requisite to seeking a peaceful settlement of the boundary question.
(3) The Indian Government has taken a diametrically opposite stand. It has refused to hold negotiations. While persisting in its illegal occupation of the Chinese territory south of the so-called McMahon Line in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary, it has repeatedly demanded that China withdraw from vast tracts of Chinese territory in the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary. It not only groundlessly claimed these territories from the Chinese Government, but has actually been undermining the status quo of the boundary and nibbling at Chinese territory by unilateral action. Since 1954, the Indian Government, basing itself on the boundary line it unilaterally claims has occupied, one after another, not a few pieces of Chinese territory in the middle sector of the Sino-Indian boundary. In the past year and more, it has shifted its emphasis in occupying China's territory to the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary, where Indian troops have steadily pushed forward, continually set up new check-posts and extended their scope of patrol of China's territory. Indian aircraft have intruded into Chinese air space again and again to carry out wilful reconnaissance and harassment. As a result, the situation along the Sino-Indian border, far from easing, has become increasingly tense since the talks between the Prime Ministers of the two countries in April, 1960.

(4) In spite of all this, the Chinese Government still hopes that these matters can be settled reasonably through diplomatic channels. Contrary to expectation, the Indian Government arbitrarily described its actions, which are liable to give rise to serious incidents, as measures to safeguard its own territory. Prime Minister Nehru himself also said, when speaking in Lok Sabha on December 5, 1961, that such actions were taken "in defence". This actually amounts to saying that the Chinese Government must unconditionally accept the territorial claims advanced by the Indian Government, and that even when the Indian side is imposing these territorial claims on China by force, China has no right to raise objection. As the Indian Government is aware, although the Chinese Government does not recognize the so-called McMahon Line unilaterally claimed by the Indian side in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary, yet in order to maintain the status quo of the boundary pending a settlement of the boundary question it has strictly restrained all its military and administrative personnel from crossing this line. If, like the Indian Government, the Chinese Government had also taken unilateral actions to violate the status quo of the boundary, what would the relations between the two countries have been like? The Chinese Government has not done so and considers that it should not do so. Proceeding from the overall consideration for Sino-Indian friendship, the Chinese Government has all along exercised the greatest self-restraint. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government too will take account of the fact that the present unilateral actions of the Indian Government on the Sino-Indian border, if carried on, will never lead to a settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question.

(5) The Sino-Indian boundary question can be settled only through peaceful negotiations and not through any other means. The Chinese Government perseveres in this stand. It was precisely in accordance with this consistant stand of the Chinese Government that Premier Chou En-lai held talks with Prime Minister Nehru in April 1960. Although the talks failed to produce the desired results, Premier Chou En-lai still hoped that negotiations would continue between the two sides. As far as the Chinese side is concerned, the door for negotiations is always open. The Chinese Government has noted that in his speech at Poona on February 11, 1962, Prime Minister Nehru also indicated that India wanted to settle the Sino-Indian border dispute through peaceful means and not to create an everlasting enmity with China. The Chinese Government hopes that this indicated desire will be translated into action. The Chinese and the Indian Peoples are friendly to each other. China and India are two neighbouring great powers in Asia. No force will ever emerge that can alter the geographical proximity of China and India. However long it may be deferred, the boundary question between China and India will have to be settled peacefully some day. In the interest of the Chinese and Indian people and of Asia and world peace, an early settlement is better than a late one. It is hoped that these views will be given serious consideration by the Indian Government.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 13 March 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the note of the Government of China of 26 February 1962, has the honour to state as follows:—

The note of the Government of India of 4 December 1961, and their two notes of 9 December 1961, have shown conclusively that the charges of Indian intrusion into Chinese territory and air space, made by the Government of China, are without warrant. At no time have Indian personnel or aircraft crossed the traditional and well-recognised boundary of India. Clear instructions have been issued to all Indian personnel to avoid trespass into Chinese territory and air space, and these instructions have been scrupulously observed. On the other hand, Chinese troops remain in occupation of a large portion of Indian territory and continue to trespass at a number of places along the border. The Government of India have, in their earlier notes, cited many instances of the intrusion of Chinese armed parties into Indian territory. These facts belie the contention of the Government of China that their patrols have not approached within 20 kilometres of the line of control. The notes of the Government of India of 31 October 1961 and 26 February 1962 established indisputably that Chinese patrols have not only advanced into Indian territory well beyond the line of control claimed but the military posts, which have been recently established, are also well beyond the line of control claimed by the Government of China.

It is the legitimate right, and indeed the duty, of the Government of India to take all necessary measures to safeguard the territorial integrity of India. The Government of India regret that the Government of China have, in contravention of international law, and, in total disregard of the principle of respect for territorial integrity, taken steps which have violated the tranquillity and peace in the Indian border areas and compelled the Government of India to adopt protective measures to stop further inroads into Indian territory. The Government of China have, in recent years, upset by force the long existing status quo in the Sino-Indian boundary region, and sought to justify their forcible occupation of Indian territory by putting forward claims which were shown by the evidence produced by the Indian side at the recent meetings of the officials to be baseless.

Since 1957, Chinese forces have begun a process of intrusion and occupation in the Aksai Chin area of Ladakh. In September 1958, they captured an Indian patrol, led by Capt. Iyengar, at Haji Langar. This was the first attempt on the part of the Chinese to interfere with the lawful exercise of Indian jurisdiction in the area. It was with surprise and regret that the Government of India learnt of the road which the Chinese were then clearing through Aksai Chin and they protested about it. In disregard of this protest, Chinese forces, by the end of 1959, spread further west and south of Aksai Chin and cleared roads from Lanak-la to Kongkala and along the bed of the Qara Qash river; which area was being regularly patrolled by the Indian border police. It was in these circumstances that an Indian police party on regular patrol duty was ambushed by the Chinese at Kongkala in October 1959 and suffered heavy casualties. Between 1960 and 1961 Chinese forces advanced further into Indian territory as was brought to the notice of the Government of China by the Note of the Government of India dated the 31 October 1961.

The Government of India have drawn attention repeatedly to the well-known fact that the traditional boundary of India as shown on official Indian maps, has been confirmed by tradition, recognized by custom and defined by treaty. Even the Government of China recognized this and did not, till 1959, question the validity of this boundary or object to the exercise of jurisdiction by the Government of India right up to the customary border. Facts do not sustain the statement of the Government of China that the latter have always worked for the peaceful settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question. The true position is that this boundary had long been settled and there was no Sino-Indian boundary question till the Government of China saw fit to disturb the peace in the border areas in very recent times.

The Government of India are aware of course, that the boundary between the two countries, which lies along high watersheds, has not been, in many places, demarcated on the ground. But this was never, during all these centuries, a matter of concern because the boundary lies along well-known natural features and was recognised by both sides. It is true that the Government of India have been willing, to consider minor mutual adjustments in a few areas of the border in the interests of friendship between the two peoples and peace in Asia. However, the Government of India cannot accept that the entire boundary between India and China has not been delimited and should be the subject of negotiations. That would be to set aside centuries of history and the sanction of a large number of treaties and agreements.

The Government of India are in entire agreement with the Government of China that the two sides should maintain the status quo of the boundary and refrain from changing it by use of force or any other unilateral action. The status quo had been maintained by the peoples and Governments on either side of the boundary from ancient times. The Government of China have, however, in recent years, disturbed the status quo by forcibly occupying an area which has always been the territory of India. The Government of India hope that the Government of China, in accordance with the principle which they have themselves stated so clearly will withdraw from this territory and restore the status quo. Such a restoration of the status quo through the withdrawal of Chinese forces from Indian territory, into which they have intruded since 1957, is an essential step for the creation of a favourable climate for any negotiations between the two Governments regarding the boundary.
The Government of India are surprised that the Government of China, in face of all the evidence and their own recognition in the past, continue to assert that the territory south of the "McMahon Line" does not belong to India. This area is, and has always been, inhabited by peoples of India and administered by Indian authorities. The Governments of Tibet and of China have at all times in the past recognized that the boundary runs along the main watershed in the region. This traditional boundary had secured the added confirmation of the treaty in 1914. The Government of India fail to understand the basis for the accusation of the Government of China that India is guilty of unlawful activity in the Eastern Sector. This accusation is made without any basis merely to cover up the aggression committed by the Chinese authorities in the Western Sector. In the Middle Sector also, the areas right up to the watershed boundary have been traditionally parts of India and administered by Indian authorities. The Government of India reject the baseless charge that it is only since 1954 that some of these areas have been occupied by the Government of India.

The Government of India have, in their note of 26 February 1962, already dealt with the argument of the Government of China that because the Government of India objected to the Chinese occupation of Indian territory in the Western Sector, the Government of China could, but for their self-restraint, similarly object and occupy Indian territory in the Eastern Sector. It is strange that the Government of China should justify a wrong done by them in one area by taking credit for not committing a similar wrong in another area.

As the Chinese Government are well aware, the Government of India are dedicated to the use of peaceful methods for the settlement of international problems. They have adhered to this policy despite grave happenings in recent years in the border areas affecting Indian territory and lives. In fact, they have patiently refrained from any resort to force to bring about the vacation of Indian territory forcibly occupied by Chinese forces in recent times. The Chinese Government have rightly drawn attention to the Prime Minister's speech expressing India's earnest desire to achieve a peaceful settlement of the border problem with China for which the necessary foundation has to be laid, in the first instance, by the peaceful withdrawal of Chinese forces from territories which have traditionally been a part of India. Such action by China would re-establish faith in international law and respect for the traditional boundary between the two countries, and go a long way in restoring the traditional friendship between the peoples of India and China, and so assist in the maintenance of peace in Asia and the world.

The Ministry of External Affairs takes this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 20 March 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows:—

In its notes of August 12 and November 2, 1961 the Chinese Government lodged protests with the Indian Government against Indian troops’ illegal activities of setting up new posts, extending their scope of patrol in the Demchok area of Tibet, China, between April and July, 1961. However, Indian activities of advancing further into Chinese territory and expanding the scope of its illegal occupation have continued to increase. In July 1961 Indian troops occupied a place near Jara Pass (approximately 32° 48' N, 79° 32' E); in December they occupied Chang Pass (approximately 33° 01' N, 79° 22' E); and they illegally set up posts at these two places on Chinese territory. In October 1961, Indian troops also illegally set up a provisional post at Charding La (approximately 32° 32' N, 79° 24' E) within China. It is obviously the attempt of the Indian side through these illegal activities to annex about 1,300 square kilometres of Chinese territory in the Shangatsangpu River area. Furthermore on February 12, 1962 seven Indian military men even came beyond the boundary line unilaterally claimed by India and crossed the watershed between Chang Pass and Jara Pass to penetrate into Duobaozao within Chinese territory; and they declared to Chinese herdsmen that the boundary line was about another 800 metres east of Chang Pass.

The Chinese Government hereby lodges a serious protest against these activities of Indian troops of continuously expanding its occupation of Chinese territory and further violating the status quo of the boundary, and asks the Indian Government to order the intruding Indian troops to withdraw from Chinese territory.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the notes of the Ministry of External Affairs of the Indian Government dated February 26 and March 13, 1962, has the honour to state as follows:

In its note dated November 30, 1961, the Chinese Government, basing itself on facts established through close investigation and repeated verifications, pointed out that the charge made by the Indian Government about alleged Chinese intrusions into Indian territory and violation of the status quo of the boundary was totally inconsistent with the facts. In its note of February 26, 1962, the Chinese Government further stressed the importance of maintenance of the status quo of the boundary by both China and India and reiterated its sincere desire for a peaceful settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question through negotiations.

The Indian Government in its note of February 26, 1962, however, still repeated its entirely groundless charge that the Chinese Government had committed aggression against India. It was especially unexpected that the Indian Government in its note of March 13, 1962, took a negative attitude towards the Chinese Government’s friendly indication for a peaceful settlement of the boundary question through negotiations. The Indian Government stated in its note that “restoration of the status quo through the withdrawal of Chinese forces from Indian territory, into which they have intruded since 1957, is an essential step for the creation of a favourable climate for any negotiations between the two Governments regarding the boundary.” But what is called here “Indian territory into which they have intruded since 1957” is Chinese territory which has long been under Chinese jurisdiction. In the same note the Indian Government, moreover, said that it is legitimate for the Indian Government to take all measures in regard to the above-mentioned area in the western sector. The Indian Government even asserted in its note of February 26 that “peace on the border and friendly relations between the two countries can never be restored” until the Chinese Government withdraws from the said area in the western sector. The Chinese Government cannot but feel disappointment and regret at this attitude of the Indian Government of refusing to negotiate and refusing to maintain the status quo of the boundary.

In both its notes, the Indian Government asserted that there was no boundary question between China and India, that the boundary question between them had long been settled, and that the problem had now arisen merely because the Chinese Government had in recent years “violated what had throughout history been a frontier of peace.” These assertions are wholly untenable.
True, the Chinese and Indian peoples have always been friendly to each other since ancient times. Yet no fair-minded historian can ignore the fact, that, having gained complete control over India more than a century ago, British imperialism, taking advantage of the unfortunate situation in which the Indian people were powerless and using India as its base, expanded into China's Tibet and Sinkiang regions. This is exactly the root cause of the Sino-Indian boundary dispute. Therefore, how can it be said that no Sino-Indian boundary dispute has existed historically? The so-called international treaties the Indian Government cited to prove that the Sino-Indian boundary question has been settled, such as the secret notes exchanged in 1914 between the British and Tibetan representatives on the so-called McMahon Line, have in fact proved the very opposite, that is, the Sino-Indian boundary has never been formally delimited and, as a result of the aggressive policy pursued by British imperialism, a boundary dispute does exist between China and India. Even the then Government of old China clearly expressed its non-recognition of the so-called McMahon Line. What could that be, if not a boundary dispute? Even the government of old China took such an attitude, how can one expect the government of new China to recognize this line as legal? Moreover, the so-called McMahon Line exists only in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary, while concerning the middle and western sectors even illegal secret boundary treaties are non-existent, how then can one expect the Chinese Government to accept the assertion that "the boundary between the two countries has long been settled"?

The Sino-Indian boundary question is a question left over by history. China and India, being both newly independent countries, could not be held responsible for the rise of these questions. Proceeding from this basic fact the Chinese Government has always held that the two sides should take into account both the past historical background and the present actual situation and peacefully settle the Sino-Indian boundary question in accordance with the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence and through friendly negotiations, and that, pending the settlement of the question through negotiations, both China and India should maintain the status quo of the boundary so as to create the necessary atmosphere for its peaceful settlement. In the past several years, the Chinese Government has consistently adhered to this stand. The Chinese Government does not recognize the McMahon Line, yet it has all along respected the status quo of the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary and has not gone beyond this line. No deliberate distortion can alter this fact, a fact of which the Indian Government itself is aware. As for the area in the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary, it has always been under the effective jurisdiction of the Chinese Government. To say nothing of the remote past, after the founding of the People's Republic of China it was by the traditional route running through this area that Chinese troops in 1950 entered the Ari District of Tibet from Sinkiang. From 1954 to 1957, China surveyed and constructed the 1200 kilometre-long Sinkiang-Tibet Highway which traverses this area. Before the summer of 1958 the Indian Government had never questioned or objected to the exercise of sovereignty in this area by the Chinese Government. The Indian Government stated in its note that it was in 1957 that the Chinese Government began to enter the Aksai Chin area. This statement is a distortion of the fact and does not merit any refutation. In the past twelve years and more, Chinese military and administrative personnel in the western sector have always worked for the maintenance of the status quo of the boundary and have never gone a single step beyond their own territory. The same is true with the middle sector of the Sino-Indian boundary. Whether in the eastern, western or middle sectors of the Sino-Indian boundary, it is India, not China, which in fact has gone beyond its own territory and entered the territory of the other side, and a record of this can be found in the previous notes of protests from the Chinese Government and other documents.

In order to ease the border situation and avoid clashes, the Chinese Government further decided, on its own, not to send patrols within 20 kilometres on its side of the boundary. The fact that this decision has always been earnestly carried through can by no means be distorted. The Indian Government on the one hand rejected the proposal but forward by China for the armed personnel of each side to withdraw 20 kilometres from the boundary, and on the other hand in its notes blamed China for failing to abolish its existing frontier-posts. This attitude can in no way be deemed fair.

As the Chinese Government repeatedly pointed out, it is the Indian side that has undermined the status quo of the Sino-Indian boundary by unilateral action. To justify its untenable position, the Indian Government in its note further charged that in recent years Chinese maps had ignored India's so-called "well-known traditional boundary" in the western sector. Here it should be pointed out that, in the Chinese and Indian officials' meeting, the Chinese officials proved with a great deal of factual material that the traditional customary line pointed out by China is well founded and that the alignment in Chinese maps published over the past several decades has in the main been consistent, whereas the boundary line shown on current Indian maps is without historical or factual basis. Up to 1954 official Indian maps had generally confirmed that the boundary in the western sector was undetermined and had marked no boundary line at all. How comes that this boundary line which has appeared in official Indian maps only since 1954 suddenly becomes a "well-known traditional boundary line"?

In disregard of the above-mentioned facts, the Indian Government continually charged China with aggression against India and repeated intrusions into Indian air space by Chinese aircraft. The Chinese Government categorically rejects these utterly groundless charges. The Chinese side has always strictly observed the status quo of the boundary and Chinese aircraft has never made any flight over areas along the Sino-Indian border. Therefore, this line of action of the Indian Government is indeed incomprehensible.
How could China possibly commit aggression against India? China suffered greatly from imperialist aggression for over a century, and to date China's Taiwan is still, under armed U.S. occupation and China's security is continuously threatened by U.S. imperialism. How is it thinkable that China in turn should commit aggression against Indian territory? The socialist system chosen by the Chinese people determines that China does not need war, that it would never permit itself to, nor should it ever, nor will it ever seize a single inch of a neighboring country's territory. What China needs from the new-born Asian countries, which have achieved independence from under imperialist oppression, is friendship. China is ready to live in amity with these countries, settle with them the questions left over by history and together with them enter the new era of peace and prosperity in Asia. China has never regarded India as its enemy, nor will it ever do so. China has never seized a single inch of Indian territory, nor will it ever do so.

The Chinese Government has noted the wish expressed by the Indian Government in its note of March 13 for a peaceful settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question, however, it cannot but point out that what the Indian Government termed peaceful settlement is for China to withdraw from its own territory, which is in fact tantamount to the summary rejection of peaceful settlement. The Indian Government also talked about negotiations in its notes, but it insisted that pending any negotiations China must withdraw from its own territory, which is in fact tantamount to the summary rejection of negotiations. In its notes, the Indian Government also agreed that the status quo of the boundary should be maintained, but what is termed maintenance of the status quo is still for China to withdraw from its own territory, which is in fact tantamount to the summary rejection of the maintenance of the status quo. Anyone who is sensible and reasonable can see that such a rigid and threatening attitude will certainly lead to no solution, even if it were not intended to. What is more disquieting is that such an attitude will aggravate the unrest along the border and even augment the danger of clashes. The consequence of such an attitude will obviously only be advantageous to the imperialist and reactionary forces hostile to Sino-Indian friendship and absolutely cannot bring any good to the Chinese and Indian peoples.

There is no conflict of fundamental interests between China and India. The Chinese Government still believes that the Sino-Indian boundary question, though encountering difficulties at the present time, must be, and entirely can be, settled in a friendly way through peaceful negotiations. Although Premier Chou En-lai's talks with Prime Minister Nehru in the capital of India in April 1960 failed to produce the desired results, the Chinese Government still hopes that negotiations will continue between the two sides. It is clear that to refuse to maintain the status quo and reject negotiations is to reject a peaceful settlement. Such an important question as the Sino-Indian boundary question should not be treated so lightly. As far as the Chinese side is concerned, the door for negotiations is always open. The Chinese Government once again expresses the hope that these sincere opinions will be given positive consideration by the Indian Government.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 15 April 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to draw the attention of the Embassy to yet another instance of Chinese violation of India's territorial integrity resulting from the setting up of a new Chinese Military post at MR 7834 E 3501 N, 6 miles west of Sumdo. This Chinese post has obviously been developed recently and constitutes, needless to say, a flagrant breach of the repeated assurances extended by the Chinese Government regarding maintenance of the status quo in the area.

The Government of India, in their note dated 31st October 1961, have already drawn the attention of the Government of the People's Republic of China to three new Chinese Military checkposts established on Indian territory between 1960 and 1961 and to the numerous other instances of intrusion by Chinese Military patrols and survey parties into Indian territory. The Government of China, however, have continued to make the untenable claim that these posts so set up are within Chinese territory although such an assertion cannot be sustained for a moment when examined on the basis of available facts.

It is a matter of deep concern to the Government of India that the Government of the People's Republic of China should continue in this manner to persist in their systematic and deliberate encroachments into Indian territory without proper regard to the grave consequences that these may entail.

While lodging a strong protest against the establishment of this latest Chinese post on Indian territory at MR 7834 E 3501 N the Government of India express the hope that the Chinese Government will take immediate action to withdraw from this new position that they have occupied.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs. New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 18 April 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to state that another instance of Chinese intrusion into Indian territory in the Eastern Sector of the border took place in the second week of January 1962. Two Chinese officials of Migyitun accompanied by an interpreter and two platoon commanders crossed the Sino-Indian border near Longju and visited the village of Roi, which is about half a mile South of Longju.

The Government of India have taken serious notice of this unlawful intrusion into Indian territory which is contrary to the repeated assertions of the Government of China that their personnel have never violated the Sino-Indian border in the Eastern Sector. The Government of India regret the despite these solemn assertions Chinese personnel have again intruded into Indian territory and caused fear and tension among the local inhabitants.

In lodging a firm protest with the Government of China in regard to this illegal activity on the part of Chinese personnel in the Tibet region, the Government of India hope that appropriate steps will be taken by the Government of China to ensure that similar intrusions into Indian territory do not occur in future.

The Ministry of External Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 21 April 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows:

Around 12:00 hours on April 11, 1962, about 25 Indian military men crossed the Sino-Indian boundary in the western sector and intruded into the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region of China. They penetrated as far as about 10 kilometres into Chinese territory, reaching a place south of Height 5,500 metres (approximately 35°22′ N, 78°07′ E), and carried out prolonged reconnaissance. About 13:00 and 15:00 hours respectively on April 13, two other groups of Indian military personnel intruded into the same area in China and sneaked to appoint at 35°20′N, 78°03′E for reconnaissance. The Chinese Government hereby lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government against such grave activities for further violation of Chinese territory by the Indian side.

In the past one year and more, Indian military personnel have repeatedly violated the status quo of the boundary between China’s Tibet Region and India, seizing pieces of Chinese territory and making intrusions. Regarding this the Chinese Government has lodged many solemn protests with the Indian Government and pointed out that the grave danger couched in those activities. The Indian side, however, not only disregarded the protests of the Chinese Government, but has furthermore expanded its illegal activities to the Chinese frontier areas along the Sinkiang-India border. With full knowledge of the existence of a Chinese post at 35°19′N, 78°12′E, in this region, the Indian side, however in January 1962, sent an aircraft over there, carrying out reconnaissance at a low altitude and making provocative air-droppings. And now, the Indian side has gone even further and openly made armed reconnaissance on the ground near the post. This cannot but seriously endanger the peace and tranquility along the border and greatly increase the danger of clashes. It must also be pointed out that over a long period of time the Indian side has continually set up additional posts on the Sino-Indian border and strengthened its military dispositions. In recent months, news reports have been disseminated from New Delhi to the effect that Indian troops are preparing to make armed provocations against China when the thaw comes to the border areas. The Chinese Government has reasons to believe that the above mentioned Indian intrusion into Chinese territory is a sign of deliberate violation of the status quo of the boundary in the said region. The Chinese Government once more seriously urges the Indian Government to stop immediately such activities which may lead to grave consequences.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 26 April 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows:

Around 12:30 hours on April 16, 1962, three Indian Military men trespassed into a place 33° 36' N, 78° 46' E, west of the Spanggur lake in the Ari District in Tibet, China, and did not leave there until they had conducted reconnaissance for about 40 minutes. The Chinese Government hereby lodges a protest with the Indian Government against this fresh illegal action undertaken by the Indian side in that area, which could entail serious consequences, and urges the Indian Government to take prompt measures to prevent similar activities of intrusions.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 27 April 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the note from the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India dated April 15, 1962, has the honour to state as follows:

The Indian Government in its note charged the Chinese Government with setting up a new post at 35° 01’ N, 79° 34’ E, six miles west of Sumdo in the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary, and thus violating the status quo of the boundary. The Chinese Government categorically rejects this charge.

The entire area east of the traditional customary Sino-Indian boundary line in the western sector, including the aforesaid place, is part of China’s territory and has been and is under the effective control of China. Exercise of China’s jurisdiction in the entire area is completely within China’s sovereignty and also in full conformity with the principle of maintaining the status quo of the boundary. The place where China has allegedly set up a new post according to the note of the Indian Government is deep within Chinese territory, being over thirty kilometres from the boundary line. Whether China does or does not adopt any measure there is entirely China’s internal affair with which the Indian Government has no right at all to meddle. Moreover, so far as the fact is concerned, the Indian charge is totally untrue, because China has never set up any post, let alone a new one, at the aforesaid place at 35° 01’ N, 78° 34’ E. Therefore, it is entirely unjustifiable for the Indian Government to charge China with something China has not done on its own territory and describe it as a violation of India’s territorial integrity and of the status quo of the boundary. The Chinese Government categorically rejects the protest of the Indian Government.

The Chinese Government has always advocated and practised maintenance of the status quo of the boundary. This is a fact which the Indian side can in no way distort. It is in fact the Indian side itself that has repeatedly violated the status quo of the boundary, and especially in the western sector where the Indian side itself that has repeatedly violated the status quo of the boundary and made further intrusions and encroachments into side recently has again and again violated the status quo of the boundary and made further intrusions and encroachments into China’s territory and airspace, as recorded in the great number of notes of protest from the Chinese Government. The Indian Government now once again makes a fabricated charge against China and repeats the accusation previously put forward in its note of October 31, 1961 but long refuted by the Chinese Government. This can only be deemed an attempt of the Indian side to cover up its continual intrusions into China's border areas and to create a pre-text for carrying out more such unlawful activities. The Chinese Government expresses its resolute opposition to this line of action of the Indian side.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 30 April 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the Government of China of 22nd March 1962.

2. The Government of India have, in their earlier notes of 26th February and 13th March 1962, reiterated the basic facts of the Sino-Indian border problem which clearly establish that Government of China's contentions, based on a subjective approach, are completely untenable. It is indisputable that, by stages since 1957, the Government of China have occupied unlawfully a large area of territory which has always been a part of India. Until this process of intrusion and occupation began, the Sino-Indian frontier had been peaceful.

3. In 1954, the two Governments negotiated an Agreement which contained a solemn assurance that each would respect the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the other. At that time, the clear and precise alignment of India's northern boundary was well-known to the Government of China, and there was no doubt or misgiving of any kind.

4. In signing the Agreement, the Government of India had unreservedly accepted the bona fides of the Government of China in regard that solemn covenant. There was no dispute, but warm regard and friendship between the two countries. When, therefore, the fact of Chinese intrusion into Aksai Chin territory of India came to the knowledge of the Government of India, they protested to the Government of China in the expectation that the intrusion had been committed in ignorance rather than on purpose and that, once this error was known, the intruding forces would be withdrawn. At that time, the Government of India had, because of Chinese assurances on incorrect maps and the friendly and cordial relations between the two countries, no reason to suspect that the Government of China were contemplating making extensive claims to Indian territory. It was only in 1959 that the Government of China suddenly faced the Government of India with a claim over nearly 50,000 square miles of Indian territory. To say, therefore, that a Sino-Indian boundary dispute existed earlier than 1959 is contrary to facts, and, indeed, contrary to the relations which had developed between the two countries on the basis of mutual respect for each other's sovereignty and firm acceptance of the territorial limits of the two countries.

5. In the course of the correspondence between the two Governments, and in the talks between their officials in 1960, an overwhelming amount of evidence of tradition, custom, administration and jurisdiction was produced to establish that the boundary between the two countries, which had been accepted without question by both sides prior to 1959, was the boundary alignment shown on official Indian maps. There was no need, therefore, for negotiations to unsettle this firm boundary, sanctioned by history, law and treaty.

6. The Government of India agree with the Government of China on the need to maintain the status quo of the well-recognised traditional boundary. In recent years, however, the Government of China have violated the status quo, made numerous incursions at various points along the boundary, and unlawfully occupied large areas of Indian territory. These developments have disturbed the peace in the border areas and disrupted friendly relations between the two countries. The Government of India have, therefore, sought the cooperation of the Government of China, in the best interests of the two countries, for a reversal of these aggressive measures which have caused tension and for withdrawal of Chinese forces unlawfully posted in Indian territory.

7. It is a matter of regret to the Government of India that the Government of China continue to disregard the Report of the officials of the two sides which examined the factual evidence regarding the Sino-Indian boundary problem. In fact, the Government of China not having seriously considered the Report of the officials are still reiterating, without any evidence, that the Indian territory in Ladakh which is now under their occupation has for long been under Chinese jurisdiction. This is an entirely subjective view, unwarranted by facts.

8. The territory in Ladakh, now under Chinese occupation had always been under the administrative control of Indian authorities; and evidence establishing the continuous and comprehensive exercise of Indian administration of this area for over a hundred years has been provided by the Government of India. The Government of China, on the other hand, were unable to establish on the basis either of historical evidence or of administrative record that these areas had at any time been under the effective jurisdiction of the Government of China or that they had ever been there prior to the recent unlawful occupation. This is also confirmed by the claim made by the Government of China themselves that they had sent their forces through this area for the first time in 1950. In fact, there is evidence to show that the Chinese forces did not enter into this area in 1950, and that the Government of China are now obviously ante-dating their aggression. It is a well established principle of international law, that such trespass and unlawful incursions cannot create title to the territory of another country.

9. The Government of India regret that the Government of China should have deliberately confused the situation regarding the boundary by referring to British Imperialism in the context of the Indo-Chinese border. The records of British rule in India, which are now accessible and open to examination, show that the British only extended their authority over those territories which were historically and traditionally parts of India. These records also show that the British far from expanding into Tibet or Sinkiang region, actually helped the Chinese to consolidate their authority in these regions. As the Government of China are aware, the Government of India who are opposed to Imperialistic or aggressive policies, in any form, undertook negotiations in 1953-54 to terminate extra-territorial rights and privileges inherited from the British in Tibet and to establish close and friendly relations with China. The results of these negotiations were reflected in the Agreement of 1954.

103 M of E.A.—4.

10. It is surprising that the Government of China have again questioned the validity of the treaties and agreements which have provided added sanction to the traditional boundary between the two countries. In the Western and Middle sectors, there are treaties and agreements between the Governments of India and China which confirm the traditional boundary. In the Eastern Sector, the Simla Convention and the “McMahon Line” Agreement merely formalised what had for centuries been the traditional boundary between India and Tibet. It is clear from the records of the Simla Conference that the then Government of China had full knowledge of the formalisation of the India-Tibet boundary and of the “McMahon Line” and had approved of them. This is attested by the initials and seal of the Chinese plenipotentiary on the document, and by the subsequent correspondence between the Governments concerned. If ratification of the Simla Convention was subsequently delayed, it was not because of any opposition to the formalisation of the boundary between Tibet and India as shown in the “McMahon Line” but because the then Government of China did not agree to the line of demarcation between Inner Tibet and Outer Tibet, it being understood that the former would be under Chinese influence.

11. It is clear that so far as past history is concerned, there is nothing to show that there was ever a Sino-Indian boundary question. The only legacy left by history in this respect is an unbroken tradition of friendship between the two countries based on mutual respect for a firm, delimited boundary. Even after the establishment of the People’s Republic of China, almost for ten years, the two countries were aware of no Sino-Indian boundary problem. The present situation is a new creation, and the result solely of certain policies pursued by the Government of China since about 1957. They cannot, therefore, evade responsibility for it by attributing it to history.

12. The Government of India fail to understand on what grounds the Government of China allege that it is India and not China, who has entered the territory of the other side. The extent of Indian jurisdiction has never exceeded the traditional boundaries of India; and no new claims to territory have ever been put forward by the Government of India. As the Government of China are aware, in view of the situation created by recent Chinese activities on the border, the Government of India had necessarily to take additional measures for the protection of their territory and stop further inroads by the Chinese. In view of the fact that the Government of China have gradually occupied a large area of Indian territory and of the numerous instances of violation by them of the boundary between the two countries, it is absurd for the Government of China to claim that they have all along maintained the status quo and their patrols have not been sent within 20 kilometres of their side of the boundary.
13. As for the alignment shown on Chinese maps, the Indian side established that even official Chinese maps had, for long, shown the traditional boundary between the two countries correctly. It was only from the late thirties of the 20th century that these maps began to vary the traditional boundary alignment and to show large parts of Indian territory within China. That the Chinese Government had no fixed ideas as to what territory was theirs or where they thought their boundary line lay, was clear from the many variations and inconsistencies in these maps. As has already been pointed out by the Government of India, there is even a contradiction between the alignment shown on the map of 1956 which Premier Chou En-lai had stated to be correct, and the alignment on the map given to the Indian side at the talks of the officials in 1960. On the other hand, there has never been any doubt about the limits of Indian territory or about the traditional boundary which lay along well-known natural features. The official Indian maps have always shown the alignment correctly. If certain Indian maps did not show the alignment, this did not mean that there was no traditional and customary boundary alignment, or that India had no international boundaries. These maps only showed either the internal divisions or physical relief. This is a generally accepted cartographic practice and prevails even in China. There are a number of Chinese maps which do not show all the regions of China within China's international frontiers. For some years the Survey of India showed the northern boundary of India by an undemarcated symbol because the boundary though delimited had not actually been demarcated on the ground.

14. The Government of India are glad to see an affirmation in the Chinese note that "the Socialistic system chosen by the Chinese people determines that China does not need war" and also that "what China needs from the new-born Asian countries, which have achieved independence from under imperialist oppression, is friendship." If Chinese policy were based strictly on these objectives which are in harmony with the spirit of the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence, there would be a proper foundation for her relations with her neighbours and no cause for a Sino-Indian boundary problem. As the Government of India have repeatedly shown there was no Sino-Indian boundary problem of any consequence until 1959 when the Chinese Government for the first time unfolded extravagant and totally untenable claims to Indian territory. The Government of China have in recent years shown scant respect for the status quo of the boundary between the two countries and have resorted to measures since 1959 to push their forces across the accepted boundary line to occupy Indian territory. It is most regrettable that these activities which involved loss of Indian lives and territories took place after the Sino-Indian Agreement of 1954 which bound the two countries to respect each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty.

15. This is, therefore, no quarrel of India's seeking. The boundary problem is China's quarrel with India. Throughout history, the Indian people have shown sincere affection and warm regard for the Chinese people. Even before attaining independence, the people of India extended warm support and help to the Chinese people in their struggle for national independence. After independence, India's foreign policy was based on establishing close and friendly relations with China. From 1950 to 1954 the Government of India went a considerable way to accommodate the Government of China in the Tibet region and on this account willingly gave up all those rights and interests which India had inherited in Tibet. Elsewhere, too, the Government of India made strenuous efforts to establish the Government of China in their rightful place in international organisations. Since 1949, the Government of India have made unremitting efforts not only to bring about close understanding and cooperation between India and China but also to create through this understanding stable and peaceful conditions over a wider region of Asia in order that the newly independent States of Asia could develop rapidly in an atmosphere free from cold-war influences and reconstruct their long neglected economy. There was so much to be done, and little time to fritter away in quarrels. The Government of India regret that their hopes and aspirations in this regard have been frustrated through lack of cooperation from the Government of China who have pursued policies in total disregard of the fundamental interests of the region and have created situations of conflict and tension among the nations of Asia.

16. There is in India a long tradition of peace and non-violence. The people of India by custom and tradition adhere to peace and do not look for quarrels. It is in this tradition that the Government of India have consistently used their influence in international affairs to bring about cessation of hostilities wherever these took place and create conditions which are for stable peace and cooperative relations among nations. The people of India need peace to enable them to forge ahead with the tremendous task of economic regeneration which the country has undertaken since its independence. They have consequently no urge for any adventurist policy in international affairs; nor do they ever wish to encroach on the territories or others.

17. It is a travesty of facts to suggest, as the Government of China have done, that the Government of India has adopted a negative attitude on the question of the Sino-Indian boundary. Despite Chinese aggressive activities, the Government of India have shown considerable restraint and taken, during the last two years, various measures to promote peaceful settlement by negotiations. There have been numerous exchanges and high-level meetings between the two Governments on the subject. A committee of experts have also gone into the evidence of the case of the two sides. Conclusive evidence has been produced to establish the Government of India's intention that there is no boundary problem except the one created by recent Chinese encroachments on Indian territory. The Chinese incursions into Indian territory, however, still continue. While the Government of India are always willing to negotiate with the Government of China, they cannot obviously compromise with any aggression on Indian territory. Nor can they negotiate as long as their territories remain under Chinese occupation. It is for the Government of China to correct the errors of the recent years and, by withdrawing from Indian territory, create the essential conditions for peaceful negotiations so that the boundary question is settled and peaceful and cooperative relations are reestablished between India and China.

The Ministry of External Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with respect to the grave situation in which Indian troops have intruded into China's Sinkiang region, established new military posts, carried out continual provocative activities and menaced the security of a Chinese frontier post, has the honour to state as follows:

The Chinese side has discovered that Indian troops have intruded into China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region and established two new military posts. One is at a place approximately 35° 16' N, 78° 08' E, southwest of the Chinese post at 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E, and is about eleven kilometers within China's territory. The other is at a place approximately 35° 22' N, 78° 05' E, northwest of the aforesaid Chinese post, and is about four kilometres within China's territory. Indian troops have moreover constructed fortifications at these two new posts and carried out provocative activities around them. The Chinese side is in possession of indisputable facts showing that the two aggressive posts of the Indian side were set up recently.

Furthermore, after making the three intrusions on April 11 and 13, 1962 into the area near the aforesaid Chinese post and carrying out provocative activities there, against which the Chinese Government already lodged a protest in its note of April 21, 1962 with the Indian Government, Indian troops again made as many as fifteen successive intrusions into the same area from April 15 to 27. The cases of Indian troop intrusions are as follows:

(1) On April 15, 1962, two Indian military men intruded at about 11:00 hours into a place a approximately 35° 22' N, 78° 04' E, northwest of the aforesaid Chinese post, did not leave until 19:00 hours.

(2) On April 17, 1962, over forty fully armed Indian troops crossed the boundary at about 12:00 hours, and approached Height 5,000 metres (approximately 35° 22' N, 78° 07' E) northwest of the Chinese post. More than twenty of them sneaked farther to the top of the Height, penetrating about six kilometres within China's territory. These Indian troops made prolonged reconnaissance on the Chinese post.

(3) At about 15:30 hours on April 17, 1962, three Indian military men intruded into a place at approximately 35° 16' N, 78° 11' E, south of the Chinese post, to make reconnaissance.

(4) At about 11:00 hours on April 18, 1962, two Indian military men intruded into a place at approximately 35° 22' N, 78° 04' E, northwest of the Chinese post.

37
(5) At about 16.30 hours on April 19, 1962, eight mounted Indian military men intruded into the same place at approximately 35° 22' N, 78° 04' E, northwest of the Chinese post.

(6) At about 11.00 hours on April 21, 1962, one Indian military man intruded into a place at approximately 35° 23' N, 78° 06' E, northwest of the Chinese post for parrying.

(7) At about 19.00 hours on April 22, 1962, six Indian military men intruded into a place at approximately 35° 15' N, 78° 12' E, south of the Chinese post, and made reconnaissance for about half an hour.

(8) At about 14.40 hours on April 23, 1962, three mounted Indian military men intruded into a place at approximately 35° 21' N, 78° 04' E, west by north of the Chinese post and did not leave until about 15:40 hours.

(9) On April 24, 1962, three Indian military men taking a round approached at about 7:30 hours to a place at approximately 35° 15' N, 78° 14' E, southeast of the Chinese post, and carried out reconnaissance for as long as three hours.

(10) At about 11:10 hours on April 25, 1962, three Indian military men leading three horses intruded into a place at approximately 35° 23' N, 78° 06' E, northwest of the Chinese post, to make reconnaissance.

(11) At about 17:40 hours on April 25, 1962, eight Indian military men (four of whom were mounted) intruded into a place at approximately 35° 21' N, 78° 04' E, west by north of the Chinese post.

(12) At 10:45 hours on April 26, 1962, three Indian military men intruded into a place at approximately 35° 22' N, 78° 03' E, northwest of the Chinese post.

(13) At about 12:50 hours on April 26, 1962, 120 odd Indian military men in three groups (one group was mounted) intruded into a place at approximately 35° 21' N, 78° 04' E, west by north of the Chinese post. The mounted group came at about 15:10 hours to a place at approximately 35° 18' N, 78° 05' E, southwest of the Chinese post, and further moved to the south of the Chinese post.

(14) At 10:35 hours on April 27, 1962, twenty one mounted Indian military men intruded into a place at approximately 35° 22' N, 78° 07' E, northwest of the Chinese post, to make reconnaissance.

(15) On April 27, 1962, five Indian military men intruded at about 15:30 hours into a place at approximately 35° 21' N, 78° 05' E, northwest of the Chinese post.

Within the seventeen days from April 11 to 27, Indian military personnel made eighteen successive intrusions into China's Sinking, pressing towards the Chinese post at 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E from three directions. What is more serious, both to the southwest and northwest of the Chinese post, Indian troops have established aggressive posts with fortifications, which are obviously meant for prolonged entrenchment. This shows that Indian troops are pressuring on the Chinese post and carrying out provocation, and even would not scruple to create another incident of bloodshed. The Chinese Government hereby lodges the strongest protest with the Indian Government against these new, planned and systematic Indian provocations which seriously encroach on China's territory and threaten the security of the Chinese post, and demands that the Indian Government immediately withdraw the Indian military posts and intruding Indian troops from Chinese territory. Should the Indian Government refuse to withdraw its aggressive posts and continue to carry out provocation against the Chinese post, the Chinese frontier guards will be compelled to defend themselves. The Indian side will be held wholly responsible for all the consequences arising therefrom.

In the past two years and more since the Indian side rejected the Chinese proposals for the withdrawal of the armed personnel of each side by twenty kilometres from the boundary and for the cessation of patrols, the Chinese Government has one-sidedly stopped sending patrols within twenty kilometres on its side of the boundary.
The Chinese Government has done this for the purpose of avoiding misunderstanding and clashes on the border. However, the facts in the past two years and more, unfortunately show that this step of the Chinese side has not reaped the expected results; on the contrary, the Indian side, taking advantage of the cessation of patrols by Chinese frontier guards, has been pressing forward steadily into China, encroaching on Chinese territory and threatening the security of a Chinese post. In these circumstances, the Chinese Government, exercising its sacred right to defend China's territory and maintain the tranquility on the border, has ordered Chinese frontier guards to resume border patrols in the sector from Karakoram Pass to Kongka Pass, where recently the Indian side has made repeated intrusions and harassment. The Chinese Government still believes that cessation of border patrols by both China and India will help maintain the status quo of the boundary and will create a favourable atmosphere for the peaceful settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question. If India withdraws from Chinese territory the military posts it has set up and no longer makes intrusions into China, the Chinese Government will renew its efforts for the realization of the above proposition. However, if India continues to invade and occupy China's territory and expand the area of its intrusion and harassment on China's border, the Chinese Government will be compelled to consider the further step of resuming border patrols along the entire Sino-Indian boundary.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 6 March, 1962

Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and with reference to another recent case of intrusion and provocation by Indian troops into the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary, has the honour to state as follows:

Recently, Indian troops, about twenty in number, again intruded into Chinese territory in the area south of the Spanggur Lake in western Tibet, China. On May 2, 1962, they pressed forward to a place (approximately 33° 28' 30" N, 78° 50' 30" E) only about four kilometres from the Chinese outpost at Jecliung, and there they set up a military post and constructed fortifications in preparation for prolonged entrenchment. Moreover, on May 5, 1962, two of the above-mentioned Indian military men continued to sneak deeper into Chinese territory for about 600 metres and from there fired three shots at the Chinese outpost (two shots were fired at 12:11 hours and the third at 12:23 hours). If the Chinese frontier guards had not put themselves on the alert in time and firmly maintained an attitude of cool-headedness and self-restraint, the aforesaid unwarranted provoking firing by the Indian troops would have led to very serious consequences.

The Chinese Government hereby lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government against the above-mentioned intrusion and provocative activities of the Indian troops and demands that India immediately withdraw its aggressive post and put an end to all its intrusions and provocations. As the Chinese Government pointed out in its note of April 30, 1962, India's encroachment on the border of Sinkiang and its provocations against a Chinese post there has already created a very grave situation on the border between the two countries. And now the Indian Government, in disregard of the warning of the Chinese Government, has further-more stepped up its encroaching and provocative activities in western Tibet, threatening the security of another Chinese outpost. This shows that the Indian Government has set its mind on aggravating tension in the entire western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary and does not scruple to create incidents of bloodshed. The Chinese Government hereby reiterates, if India does not withdraw its aggressive posts and intruding troops from Chinese territory and continues to carry out provocative activities, the Chinese frontier guards will have to defend themselves, and the Indian side will be held wholly responsible for all the consequences arising therefrom.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 14 May 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs presents its complements to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to refer to the note handed over by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the Indian Embassy in Peking on 30th April, 1962.

2. It is obvious that the allegations made in the Chinese note are misconceived and are based on an erroneous notion of the territorial boundary of the Sinkiang and Tibet regions of China. The Government of India have repeatedly tried to correct this erroneous notion but their patient and repeated efforts in this regard seem to have had no effect on the Chinese Government.

3. It is an indisputable fact that, by stages, since 1957, the Government of China have occupied unlawfully a large area of Ladakh which has always been part of India. It is in this process of enlarging their occupation of Indian territory that the Chinese post on the Chip Chap river was established at 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E in 1961.
The Government of India had, in their note dated 31st October, 1961, drawn the attention of the Government of China to the fact of the establishment of this new post and had urged the Government of China to withdraw the post from Indian territory. This protest, like many others before and after it, has gone unheeded, and meantime, a further gradual change has been brought about in the territorial status quo in this region of the Sino-Indian border.

4. It is strange that inspite of this deep advance into Indian territory, the establishment of military strong points and the construction of roads through Indian territory linking these military strong points with rear bases, the Government of China continue to affirm "that they have stopped sending patrols within 20 kms. on their side of the boundary". This claim, as the Government of India's earlier notes have shown, is patently false and, in the context of further inroads into Indian territory pointed out in the various notes of the Government of India, absolutely meaningless.

5. The Chinese note alleges that the Government of India have set up two posts at 35° 16' N, 78° 8' and at 35° 22' N, 78° 5' E. No post at these points has been established by the Government of India although the Government of India have had posts at approximately 78° 06' E, 35° 17' N and 78° 02' E, 35° 21' N. These latter posts which are well inside Indian territory have been in existence for some time.

6. The Chinese note cites 18 cases of alleged intrusions from April 11 to 27. This entire area into which Indian troops are alleged to have intruded is part of Indian territory and the Government of India are responsible for the protection of this territory. In compliance with this defence responsibility, the Government of India have certain posts in the area and men at these posts have been going out occasionally for essential purposes. These posts have been established there to defend Indian territory from further inroads. They are not there to attack anybody or for any aggressive activity as alleged in the Chinese note.

7. The Government of China are doubtless aware of the aggressive patrolling which Chinese troops in the Chip Chap river area have been carrying out. A few recent examples of such patrolling are cited below:—

(1) On 16th April 1962, 11 Chinese soldiers reached a point at approximately 78° 14' E, 35° 16' N and tried to encircle 4 Indian soldiers at 78° 13' E, 35° 15' N.

(2) On 21st April 1962, 20 Chinese soldiers with 7 horses reached a point 2,000 yards to the north of the Indian post at 78° 11' E, 35° 16' N for reconnaissance.

(3) On 22nd April 1962, approximately 70 to 80 Chinese soldiers debussed from three 3-tons lorries immediately to the north of the Indian post at 78° 11' E, 35° 16' N. These men moved forward and occupied a hill feature at 78° 12' E, 35° 15' N, approximately 3,000 yards southeast of the Indian post.

(4) On 6th May, 1962, at 0930 hours, approximately 20 Chinese soldiers came within 150 yards of the Indian post at 78° 07' E, 35° 28' N. They were supported by a party of another 100 Chinese soldiers, who were approximately 1,000 yards away. When the 20 Chinese soldiers moved up closer to the Indian post, the Indian post commander walked up to within 100 yards of the Chinese party and asked them to withdraw.

The examples cited above show which of the two sides it pursuing an aggressive course in the area. The fact is that not only have Chinese soldiers been carrying on aggressive patrolling deep inside Indian territory and systematically violating India's territorial integrity and security but the Government of China have themselves been constantly threatening to extend these activities along the entire Sino-Indian boundary. Such threats and aggressive activities are not indicative of peaceful intentions.

8. In the context of the position stated in paras 3, 4 and 7 above, the Government of India must point out that the order which has now been issued by the Chinese Government to their frontier guards to resume patrolling in the sector from Karakoram pass to Kongkala and the further threat that Chinese troops in certain contingencies will resume patrolling along the entire border can only mean that far from maintaining "tranquility on the border" the Chinese Government propose to adopt further aggressive measures and precipitate clashes. The Government of India hope that the Chinese authorities will consider the grave consequences of what they have threatened to do and act with circumspection.
9. The Prime Minister of India stated in Parliament on 2nd May 1962, "India does not want, and dislikes very much, a war with China. But that is not within India's control". The Government of India hope that the Government of China are earnest about maintaining peace. If so, the two Governments should take necessary steps to prevent armed clashes on the border, ease the tension now existing in the northern sector of Ladakh and lay a proper foundation for peaceful negotiations or the boundary question between the two Governments. In this connection, the Government of India would urge the Chinese Government to give serious consideration to the offer made in the Indian Prime Minister's letter dated 16th November 1959 to Premier Chou En-lai, which inter alia proposed as an interim measure that, in the Ladakh region, the Government of India should withdraw their personnel to the west of the line shown in the 1956 Chinese map and the Government of China should withdraw their personnel to the east of the international boundary shown in Indian official maps. This will apply not only to armed but also to unarmed and administrative personnel which should be withdrawn and the entire area between the boundaries claimed by the two sides left unoccupied. The adoption of this suggestion will lead to the relaxation of tension in this border region and create the necessary atmosphere for settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary problem by negotiations and discussions. The Government of India are prepared, in the interest of a peaceful settlement, to permit, pending negotiations and settlement of the boundary question, the continued use of the Aksai Chin road for Chinese civilian traffic. In renewing the Prime Minister of India's offer of 16th November 1959 and also providing for the continued use of the Aksai Chin road, pending negotiations and settlement, the Government of India are solely motivated by their earnest desire to settle the boundary question by peaceful methods. The Government of India hope that the Chinese Government will give serious consideration to this proposal and avoid threatening and aggressive postures which solve no problem but only create a climate of conflict.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 15 May 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the note of the Ministry of External Affairs of the Indian Government dated April 18, 1962, has the honour to state as follows:

In its note, the Indian Government alleged that Chinese personnel entered Ruyu Village (referred to as Roi in its note) about half a mile south of Longju in the second week of January 1962, and, on this basis, charged that Chinese personnel had crossed what the Indian side unilaterally termed the Sino-Indian boundary and intruded into Indian territory. The Chinese Government categorically rejects the above-mentioned charge and protest of the Indian Government.

It must be pointed out that the place referred to in the Indian note is actually in Chinese territory, and in fact is even situated within Chinese territory lying north of the so-called McMahon Line, i.e., the Sino-Indian boundary in the eastern sector unilaterally claimed by the Indian side. Therefore, whether Chinese personnel had been there or not, the question of their having “crossed the Sino-Indian border” does not arise at all. The Chinese Government does not understand what right the Indian Government, which is in illegal occupation of large tracts of Chinese territory south of the so-called McMahon Line, has to interfere unwarrantedly even in affairs within China’s sovereignty north of this Line.

It must also be pointed out that neither is there any truth in the instance stated by the Indian Government. The fact is: no official of the Chinese side visited the place mentioned in the Indian note on any day in the second week of January.

The Chinese Government cannot ignore the fact that it was at a time when India was stepping up its encroachment on Chinese territory and violation of the status quo of the boundary that the Indian Government suddenly made this fabrication and charge. Moreover, the Indian side is now intensifying its military activities directed against China near the McMahon Line in the area unlawfully occupied by India close to Longju. It may still be recalled that in August 1959 it was precisely in this area that a military clash occurred as a result of unlawful intrusion and armed provocation by Indian troops. There is reason for the Chinese Government to believe that the aim of the Indian Government in raising the above-mentioned groundless charge is to seek pretexts for India’s further violations of the status quo of the boundary and precipitation of new armed clashes in this area. The Chinese Government cannot but regard this with gravity and is closely following the development of events.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 19 May, 1962

* The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows:

At noon-time on April 28, 1962, ten fully armed Indian military personnel intruded into Chinese territory at Longju and disseminated the information that they would come for a prolonged stay; and they did not leave till they had carried out military reconnaissance there. Having made repeated verifications, the Chinese Government hereby lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government against the abovementioned act of provocation by the Indian troops which constitutes a grave violation of Chinese territory.

Just as predicted by the Chinese Government, the slanderous charge made by the Indian Government on April 18, 1962 to the effect that Chinese personnel had gone south of Longju was indeed a fore-token of India's further encroachment on Chinese territory in that area. The Chinese Government already pointed out in its note on May 15, 1962 that the Indian side had recently been intensifying its military activities directed against China in the area unlawfully occupied by India close to Longju. The aforesaid new action of Indian troops was obviously taken to pave the way for their renewed occupation of Longju and precipitation of new armed clashes; and at the same time it clearly indicates that India intends to disrupt the status quo of the boundary and create tension not only in the western sector, but also in the eastern sector of the Sino-Indian boundary. The Chinese Government demands that the Indian Government desist immediately from its intrusion into Longju; otherwise the Chinese Government will not stand idly by seeing its territory once again unlawfully invaded and occupied, and the Indian Government must bear the responsibility for all the grave consequences arising therefrom.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs presents their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs’ note dated 20th March 1962.

2. The Chinese Government have commenced their note under reference by repeating certain unfounded allegations made by them in their earlier notes dated 12th August and 2nd November 1961. That these allegations were absolutely groundless has been fully established in the Government of India’s notes dated 31st October 1961 and 9th December 1961.

3. A reference to the Government of India’s earlier notes would show that the Demchock area has historically formed a part of India, and Indian border guards have long been stationed there to protect the area. The Government of China have been aware of these facts. However, extracts from the earlier notes of 31st October 1961 and 9th December 1961 are given below for ready reference:

“Both Demchock and the other locations mentioned in the Chinese note are well within India’s international border in this sector. The Chinese note refers to the setting up of a checkpoint at Oga. The Ministry do not see why the Government of China should have any concern with measures India adopts inside her territory for the defence of Indian territories. As regards patrolling upto Kargo and Charding la, while Kargo is well within Indian territory, Charding la is on the border and has been under Indian control for several years. The Chinese Government will appreciate that it is illogical to expect the Government of India to leave their territories unprotected to facilitate Chinese incursions, and indeed unlawful occupation by the Chinese has already occurred in wide areas of India’s Ladakh.”

“The Demchock area and the other locations mentioned in the Chinese note are within India’s international border in this sector and have been traditionally under Indian administration. For the Chinese Government to raise questions about Indian posts and patrols in Indian territory is an entirely unjustified interference in the sovereign affairs of the Government of India.”

4. It is obvious from the foregoing that the Government of China are reiterating old unfounded allegations which have been exposed as totally baseless and making false and unjustified claims to Indian territory. The Ministry regret that the Government of China should resort to this highly objectionable practice condemned by all civilized countries of first advancing groundless claims to the territory of a neighbouring country and then following these up by false charges of encroachment on their territory.

5. The Government of India, after thorough investigation, have found that the latest allegation about 7 Indian military men having gone beyond the boundary line and crossed the water-shed between Chang pass and Jara pass to penetrate into Dubeezao within Chinese territory on 12th February 1962 is as groundless as the other allegations made in the Chinese note. It has been confirmed from the local command of Indian forces in the area that at no time had Indian troops penetrated into Chinese territory as alleged in the Chinese note. Indian border guards always scrupulously observe the instructions issued to them not to trespass into Chinese territory and unlike Chinese forces, they have a clear knowledge of the limits of Indian territory.

6. In rejecting these utterly baseless allegations, the Government of India must reiterate that it is the Government of China who in recent years have sought unilaterally to change the long existing status quo of the Sino-Indian border. It is they who have, since 1957, repeatedly set up posts and tresspassed into Indian territory; and it is they who are in unlawful occupation of over 12,000 sq. miles of Indian territory in Ladakh.

7. The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 21 May, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note handed over by the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the Indian Embassy in Peking on May 11, 1962.

The note, under reference, contains certain totally unjustified and baseless allegations. These are:—

(a) that on 2nd May 20 Indian troops intruded into a place at 33°22'30" N, 78°50'30" E about 4 kms. from a new Chinese military post set up at Jechitung;

(b) that intruding Indian troops have set up a military outpost in the area; and

(c) that on 5th May 2 Indian soldiers advanced 600 metres deeper into the area and fired three rounds at a Chinese post.

The Government of India firmly repudiate these allegations.
Indian troops did not enter the area on 2nd and 5th May as alleged in the Chinese note. Nor have they established any fresh post. On the contrary, Chinese troops moved down south from their post at Spanggur and established a new post at 78°52'30" E 33°30' N approximately 8/10 miles south-east of Spanggur on Indian territory. This has been fortuitously admitted in the Chinese note. Furthermore, as the Government of China are aware, Chinese troops are digging in at this new post and are constructing fortifications. As to the allegation that intruding Indian troops resorted to firing on Chinese troops on 5th May, this again is untrue. A similar allegation about firing by Indian troops made in the Chinese note of August 12, 1961, was categorically repudiated in the Government of India's reply dated October 31, 1961 (vide under Allegation I).

In the face of the aggressive activities being systematically pursued by Chinese forces on Indian territory, it is incongruous for the Government of China to bring up charges against India of "aggravating tension" and "creating incidents of bloodshed". There can be no doubt in any quarter that the Government of China are resorting to these allegations as they had done in the past in order to cover up their fresh sets of aggression on Indian territory.

As the Government of China are aware, the international boundary in this sector of the border cuts across the eastern part of Spanggur lake and follows the northern and eastern water-shed of the Indus.
The setting up of the new Chinese military post at 78°52'30" E 33°30' N about 6/10 miles south-east of Spanggur constitutes a further serious violation of Indian territory and an act of grave provocation.

The Government of India lodge an emphatic protest with the Government of China for thus continuing their aggressive activities.
and establishing fresh posts on Indian territory and accusing the Government of India of sending troops to intrude into what is indisputably Indian territory. If the Government of China are at all interested in maintaining the status quo and the peace on the border, they would be well-advised to restrain their forces and desist from constantly pushing forward and setting up new military posts on Indian territory. If any breach of the peace results from the unabated pursuit of aggressive ends by China, the responsibility rests solely with the Government of the People's Republic of China. Allegations against the Government of India, totally devoid of any substance whatever, only add to the mischief of aggression, which China conducts continually.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 26 May, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Note No. 345 dated 26th April 1962 from the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The note has alleged that at about 12.30 hours on April 16, 1962, three Indian soldiers had trespassed into a place at 33°35' N 78°46' E, west of the Spanggur Lake and stayed at that place for about 40 minutes. The Government of India have checked and found that the allegation in question is entirely unfounded. On April 16, 1962, at 12.30 hours, no Indian soldier had gone to the place at 33°36' N 78°46' E.

However, the alleged act of trespass cited in the Chinese note is in respect of territory which lawfully forms a part of India. It is an established fact that the international boundary in this sector of the border cuts across the eastern part of Spanggur Lake and follows the northern and eastern water-shed of the Indus.

As the Government of China are aware, trespass in this area has been committed by Chinese troops. The Chinese note under reference only provides further evidence of the fact of such trespass. As pointed out in the Government of India's note dated 21st May 1962, Chinese troops have moved down south from their post at Spanggur and established a new post at 78° 52.30' E and 33°36' N approximately 8/10 miles south east of Spanggur on Indian territory. It is the Chinese forces who have, despite repeated assurances regarding maintenance of the status quo given by the Chinese Government, trespassed in this sector of Indian territory.

The Government of India, therefore, reject the Government of China's protest and urge them to order the prompt withdrawal of their troops who have trespassed into Indian territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 28 May 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to Note dated 19th May, 1962, of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China.

It is apparent from the note that the Government of China are again wanting to create disturbance in the Eastern Sector of the border, which has been peaceful since 26th August 1959 when Chinese troops crossed the international border and dislodged the Indian post from Longju by force. Since then, except for occasional intrusions by Chinese personnel, the international border in the Eastern Sector has been quiet although the Government of China in their recent notes dated 30th November 1961 and 30th April 1962 have held out the threat of extensive military action in the Eastern Sector in the event of the Government of India adopting measures for the defence of their territories in the Western Sector of the border.

In their note dated 18th April 1962, the Government of India have drawn the attention of the Government of China to the intrusion by Chinese officials and army personnel into the village of Roy (Ruyu), half a mile south of Longju on the 2nd week of January 1962. In the face of threats held out by the Government of China and the aggressive activities pursued by their personnel on the border, it is absurd for the Government of China to make false allegations of planning aggression in the Eastern Sector against the Government of India.

As to Longju, the past facts would bear reiteration. Longju which is south of the McMahon Line has always been a part of Indian territory. It is about two miles south of the international border and at about the same distance south of the Tibetan village of Migytun.

Longju has always been under the administrative jurisdiction of India and the Government of India maintained a border checkpoint there. As the Chinese Government are aware, in July 1959, the Officer-in-charge of the Indian Checkpost at Longju fell seriously ill. The Government of India informed the Government of China on 24th July 1959 in a note verbale that they proposed to paratroop a doctor at the post. While communicating this information to the Government of China, the Government of India gave the Grid Reference of the post. This was done as Longju was near the border, and lest the pilot of the aircraft by ‘error of judgment’ intruded into Chinese airspace. There was no objection from the Chinese Government.

Yet, on the 25th August 1959, a strong Chinese detachment crossed into Indian territory south of Migytun and fired without notice on an Indian picket. They arrested the entire picket. Thereafter, on the 26th August 1959, Chinese forces encircled the post at Longju and opened heavy fire on it. The Indian personnel at Longju had, in the circumstances, to abandon the post. The Government of India lodged a strong protest with the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs on 28th August 1959. In their note dated 10th September 1959, the Government of India had offered to discuss with the Chinese Government the exact alignment of the McMahon Line at Khinzemane, Longju and Tamaden areas on condition that the status quo was maintained at all these places. As far as Longju was concerned, the Government of India had expressed their willingness not to send their personnel back to the area provided the Chinese also withdrew their forces from Longju. This meant that neither side would have their personnel at Longju pending discussion.

Thereafter, the Prime Minister of India had reiterated this proposal, and although there was news that the Chinese personnel at Longju had withdrawn sometime in 1961, the Government of India made no attempt to re-enter Longju.

The specific allegation made in the Chinese note that 10 armed Indian soldiers had intruded into Longju on 28th April 1962 is completely false. There are Indian checkpoints in the area adjoining Longju but, in accordance with the directive given by the Prime Minister, Indian forces have not re-entered Longju since 26th August 1959.

The Chinese note under reference suggests that Chinese troops have again trespassed into Longju and their forward patrols are engaged in reconnaissance around Longju. The Government of India register an emphatic protest against these aggressive activities on the part of Chinese troops in Indian territory. It should be clear to the Government of China that Longju is in Indian territory and that the Government of India will not allow any foreign aggression in Longju. If the Chinese Government have any doubt about the precise alignment of the border in this area, the Government of India would be glad to discuss the matter with them and clarify their doubt.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 28 May 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to India’s establishment of a new military strong point in Chinese territory in the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary and further intrusions and provocation there, has the honour to state as follows:

1. India not only gave no heed to China’s protests and refused to evacuate its new aggressive strong points in the Chip Chap River Valley area in Sinkiang, China, but has recently set up another military strong point at Hongshantou (approximately 35°18’N, 78°05’30” E), which is barely some eight kilometers west by south of the Chinese post (approximately 35°19’ N, 78°12’ E) in that area, and built fortifications there. In addition, Indian troops have repeatedly intruded into the areas west, northwest and southwest of the Chinese post for harassment. It has been established through repeated check-ups that in the period from April 28 to May 17, 1962 alone, 18 such cases involving 131 person-times occurred. What is more, the intruding Indian troops and aircraft have kept on conducting reconnaissance and making provocations against the said Chinese post. For instance, at about 18:30 hours on May 1, 1962, 11 Indian military men intruded into the area around height 5,500 metres in proximity to the Chinese post and conducted reconnaissance for as long as over 40 minutes; at 9:15 hours on May 10, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the Chinese post, flying audaciously at such a low altitude as no more than 400 metres from the ground, and circled there for reconnaissance for as long as 30 minutes or so.

2. In the Ari district in Tibet, China Indian troops have continued to make intrusions and made another provocative firing. Here are the outstanding cases:

(1) At about 14:00 hours on May 7, 1962 five Indian military men, three of whom were mounted, intruded into the area around 35°16’ N, 79°01’ E, that is, the place where Indian troops had provoked the Kongka Pass incident of bloodshed in October, 1959, and carried out armed reconnaissance there. On the same day, another group of Indian military men numbering about 20 intruded into the area at 34°18’N, 79°01’E for illegal activities there.

(2) At about 17:30 hours on May 9, 1962, Indian troops again fired three shots at the Chinese post at Jechiung from the Indian military strong point only about 4 kilometres away, which was set up recently in Chinese territory at a place south of the Spanggur Lake. This is another serious armed provocation by Indian troops since their firing at the same Chinese post on May 5.
(3) On May 3, 1962 four mounted Indian soldiers intruded deep into Chinese territory and even went beyond the boundary line claimed by the Indian side itself for about four kilometers and arrived at Goro (approximately 32°38'N, 79°34'E) in Tibet and conducted reconnaissance for quite some time.

The Indian Government, having remained indifferent to the repeated protests of the Chinese Government, has not only refused to withdraw its aggressive strong points newly set up on Chinese territory and put an end to its intrusions and provocations, but even set up new aggressive strong points on Chinese territory, expanded the scope of its encroachments and continued its intrusions and provocations. The Chinese Government hereby lodges a strong protest with the Indian Government against these actions, and demands that the Indian Government, in the interest of peace, evacuate immediately its military strong points set up recently in Chinese territory and put an end to all its unlawful intrusions into China. Otherwise, the Indian side must bear the responsibility for the consequences of such intrusions.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
1. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to acknowledge that the Chinese Government has received the Indian Government's note of May 14, 1962 in reply to the Chinese Government's note of April 30, 1962.

2. The Indian Government in its note not only refuses to withdraw its military strong points and intruding troops, but fraudulently contends that it is responsible for the protection of the areas it has intruded. This further shows that India is determined to encroach on Chinese territory and, to this end, does not scruple to provoke bloody conflicts. The Chinese Government cannot but express its utmost regret at this.

3. The Indian note again repeats the fallacy that large tracts of territory in the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary, which always belong to China, are part of Indian territory. The Chinese Government in its previous related notes has refuted in detail this completely groundless platitude. A lie is after all a lie and a truth a truth. A lie can never be turned into truth no matter how often the Indian Government repeats it. As a matter of fact, India admits in its reply note that it has set up strong points at approximately 35°17' N, 78°06' E and 35°21' N, 78°02' E and carried out activities around them, thus testifying to nothing but India's encroachment on Chinese territory. In order to cover up its own intrusions, the Indian Government slanderously counter-charges that the Chinese post at 35°19' N, 78°12' E, which was set up China years ago, is a newly-established one and describes the normal patrols by Chinese frontier guards as aggressive patrolling intended for encircling Indian soldiers. This is entirely a distortion of the fact and a reversal of right and wrong; it is like the trick of a thief calling "stop thief", which serves all the more to reveal the offence he intends to cover up.

4. The Indian Government in its reply note reiterates its proposal made in 1959 that, in the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary the Indian Government should withdraw its personnel to the west of the line shown on Chinese maps and the Chinese Government should withdraw its personnel to the east of the line claimed by India as shown on Indian official maps. The note further states that the Indian Government is prepared, in the interest of a peaceful settlement, to permit, pending negotiations and settlement of the boundary question, the continued use of the Aksai Chin road for Chinese civilian traffic. Why should China need to ask India's permission for using its own road on its own territory? What an absurdity! As for the Indian Government's old proposal made in 1959, Premier Chou En-lai already pointed out in his letter to Prime Minister Nehru dated December 17, 1959 that it is unfair and that though “equitable” it may appear, it in fact would require China to make a one-sided withdrawal. The Indian Government knows this only too well. Prime Minister Nehru said in Parliament on May 14, 1962 that this proposal “applies entirely to the Ladakh area (it should be read as ‘the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary’) and not the eastern area at all, because we are not going to withdraw in the east. In the Ladakh area, it meant a very small withdrawal for us—a few villages—and it meant a large withdrawal for them”. That is to say, this “very fair” proposal bragged of by India means in essence that India wants to secure the Chinese side's withdrawal from large tracts of Chinese territory, measuring more than 33,000 square kilometres, which have always belonged to China in exchange for the Indian side's withdrawal from a few points, which always belong to China but have only recently been occupied by India, while the Indian side continues to occupy, exactly as before, Chinese territories in the eastern and middle sectors of the Sino-Indian boundary. This is of course unacceptable to the Chinese Government, unacceptable now as before.

5. There is reason to believe that the Indian Government is not serious in making the above-mentioned proposal. If it truly wishes the Chinese Government to give earnest consideration to its proposal, it should be prepared to apply the principle embodied in the proposal equally to the eastern section of the border, that is to say, to acquire both the Chinese and Indian sides to withdraw all their personnel from the area between the so-called McMahon Line and the section of the Sino-Indian boundary as shown on Chinese maps. However, judging from Prime Minister Nehru's May 14 speech in the Indian Parliament, the Indian Government has renewed this proposal on the pre-condition of not doing that. How can one assume that the Chinese Government would accept such unilaterally-imposed submissive terms? Is China a defeated country? It is clear that the Indian Government, in making the proposal, did not expect earnest consideration from the Chinese Government. It is evident that, in doing so, it only attempted to divert people's attention.

6. But people's attention can in no way be diverted. The most urgent problem in the current Sino-Indian border situation is that the Indian side persists in changing by force the status quo of the Sino-Indian boundary and setting up military strong points on Chinese territory and is carrying on provocations, so that a border clash may touch off at any moment. As China pointed out in its note of May 28, since China lodged its protest on April 30, Indian troops have set up another new military strong point inside Sinkiang, China, and have continued their intrusions and provocations in Sinkiang and the Ari district. Facts speak louder than words. They show that what the Indian Government now seeks is to provoke bloody conflicts, occupy China's territory and change the status quo of the boundary regardless of consequences, and not at all to settle the Sino-Indian boundary question peacefully through negotiations.

7. The Chinese Government consistently stands for a peaceful settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question through negotiations. Even now when the Sino-Indian border situation has become so tense owing to Indian aggression and provocation, the door for negotiations is still open so far as the Chinese side is concerned. However, China will never submit before any threat of force. What is imperative now is for the Indian Government to stop its military provocations and withdraw Indian military strong points and troops from Chinese territory. The Chinese Government renews its protest and demand made on April 30 and May 28. This is a serious test as to whether the Indian Government has the sincerity to settle peacefully the Sino-Indian boundary question and improve Sino-Indian relations.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state the following:

It has been verified through careful investigation by the Chinese Government that the activities of intrusion and provocation of Indian troops on China's border have recently been extended to another area in Sinkiang, China, that is, the area near the source of the Karakash River. Indian troops have set up another new military strong point at approximately 34°58'30" N, 78°22'30" E in that area, which is as deep as about 15 kilometers within Chinese territory and built an air-dropping ground and forts there. Large groups of Indian infantry and cavalrymen frequently came out from that strong point and made harassment all around. At the same time, Indian aircraft repeatedly intruded into China's air space and dropped large quantities of military supplies to that strong point. The Chinese Government hereby lodges a strong protest with the Indian Government against the Indian troops' pressing forward step by step and continuously expanding its encroachment on Chinese territory.

The facts cited above more clearly show that the Indian side is deliberately encroaching on China along the entire western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary in an attempt to realize by force its claims to Chinese territory. The Chinese Government, while following with vigilance this serious situation, once again demands that the Indian Government immediately withdraw all its aggressive strong points recently set up in Chinese territory and put an end to all its intrusions and provocations, and urges the Indian Government to give earnest consideration to the serious consequences to which these activities may lead.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Note dated the 21st April 1962 from the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The Note makes two entirely unwarranted allegations: (1) That on 11th April 1962 at about 1200 hours, about 25 Indian soldiers penetrated 10 Kms. into Chinese territory, reached a point approximately 35°22’ North 78°00’ East and carried out prolonged reconnaissance; and (2) That on 13th April 1962 at 1300 hours and 1500 hours two parties of Indian soldiers “intruded into the same area and sneaked to a point approximately 35°20’ North, 78°07’ East for reconnaissance”.

Indian troops are in certain areas of Ladakh to defend Indian territory. If these Indian troops move about inside Indian territory, it should not be a matter of any concern to the Government of China.

However, since the Government of China made certain specific allegations, these were carefully investigated and it was found that no Indian soldier had been at either of the places at the time cited in the Chinese Note. Therefore it is clear that the Government of China preferred these charges and assumed the right to protest about so-called intrusions by Indian troops without any basis at all. Under the circumstances, the Government of India reject these protests which not only have no basis in fact but constitute unjustifiable interference in the internal affairs of India.

It has been noticed that the Government of China are increasingly taking recourse to such baseless allegations against the Government of India at a time when Chinese forces are themselves making fresh encroachments into Indian territory.

Such Chinese military activity has been noticed particularly in the vicinity of the Chinese Military Base illegally set up at 78°12’ East 35°10’ North, and a point 78°13’ East 35°15’ North.

Carefully verified reports from other sectors of Ladakh also show that Chinese troops are daily intruding into Indian territory, pushing forward on trucks and jeeps, blasting the mountainside with heavy explosives, constructing new military bases and extending military bases already set up.

It is on record that since 1960-61 Chinese intruders have set up no less than five new military bases on Indian territory at Nyagzu, Dambuguru, at point 78°12’ E, 35°19’ N on the Chip Chap river, at a point of six miles west of Sumdo, and at 78°52’30” E, 33°30’ N about 8/10 miles south-east of Spanggur.
Against this record of territorial aggression by Chinese forces, there is not even single case to show that Indian troops intruded into Chinese territory or set up a post there.

It seems clear that the Government of China are spreading rumours about the so-called “news reports disseminated from New Delhi” to prove that “Indian troops are preparing to make armed provocations against China when the thaw comes to the border areas” to cover up their aggressive activities. The Government of India have no wish to embroil themselves in hostilities with any country, far less to invade Chinese territory. They are, however, bound to do all they can to preserve the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Republic of India.

The Government of India lodge an emphatic protest with the Government of China for the fresh encroachments into Indian territory by Chinese intruders and urge the Government of China to put an end to such dangerous and illegitimate activities.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 6 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Note dated the 27th April 1962 of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China.

The Government of China’s Note under reference provocatively asserts that the location of the new Chinese post and other areas of Ladakh have always been under the effective control of China.

This assertion is against the evidence of history. Neither the present nor any other regime in China had ever exercised any authority in this region of India. Nor did the rulers of China ever lay any claim to it. It is entirely without warrant to suggest, as the Chinese Note has done, that they have always exercised “effective control” over it. As the Government of China are well aware, the traditional international boundary in these sector of the border runs from the Karakoram Pass along the watershed between the Shyok (belonging to the Indus system) and the Yarkand, and runs through the Qara Tagh Pass (Lon. 78°20’ East and Lat. 35°43’ North) to cross the eastern end of the Qara Qash river (north of Haji Langer) and to ascend the main Kuen Lun mountains. Thereafter the boundary runs through the Yangi Pass (Long. 79°25’ East and Lat. 35°55’ North) along the crest of the mountains separating the Yurungkash basin from those of the lakes in Aksai Chin. It leaves the main crest of the Kuen Lun mountains at a point approximately Long. 80°21’ East and descends in a south-western direction, separating the basins of the Amtogor and Sarigh Jilganang lakes in India from those of Leighton and Tsoggar lakes in Tibet, down to Lanak Pass (Long. 79°34’ East and Lat. 34°24’ North). Nor is the Chinese denial of the existence of the new post supported by the facts on the ground. The fact is that Chinese intruders in Ladakh set up a new post recently at 35°1’ North 78°34’ East six miles west of Sumdo, as stated in the Government of India’s Note dated 15th April 1962. That post still exists and continues to testify to a new violation of the status quo on the border.

In the light of facts cited above, the Government of India reject the contentions in the Government of China’s reply under reference which evades the charge fully supported by facts made in the Government of India’s note dated 15th April 1962.

It is a source of deep and continuous concern to the Government of India that the Government of China should persist in this manner in their systematic and deliberate unlawful encroachments into Indian territory without any regard to the grave consequences that these may entail.

The Government of India would again urge the Government of China to view the problem with the seriousness it deserves and to take urgent steps to withdraw their new military post at 35°01' North, 78°34' East as well as all the other military posts which they have illegally set up on Indian territory since 1957.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 6 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note dated 15th May 1962 of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China.

The Government of India do not accept the unwarranted ascertainment made in the Chinese note that the village of Roi, which is half a mile south of Longju, is situated in Chinese territory, north of the McMahon line. Longju itself is about 2 miles south of the international border and the village of Roi is further south of Longju. There can be no question but that Roi is well inside Indian territory.

About Longju the facts are well-known and these have been restated in the Government of India's note dated 28th May 1962 to the Government of China. A strong Chinese force had crossed the international border on 25th August 1959 and dislodged the Indian post at Longju by force on the 26th August 1959. Such are the facts which form part of the record of Sino-Indian relations since 1959.

It is not only false but definitely mischievous to describe the invasion of Indian territory south of the McMahon line by a strong Chinese force in August 1959 as a case of "unlawful intrusion and armed provocation by Indian troops". Such distortion of facts adds to the mischief of aggression, and militates against the fundamental principles on which international relations are based.

The Chinese note has denied the specific charge made in the Government of India's note of 18th April 1962. The facts about the intrusion into the village of Roi by a Chinese party in the 2nd week of January 1962 were carefully verified before a protest was lodged with the Government of China. The names of the Chinese officers who intruded into the Indian village of Roi are known to the Government of India. These intruders had sought to exert pressure on the inhabitants of Roi to make them go over to Tibet.

In the face of this evidence it is useless to deny that Chinese intruders had unlawfully entered the village of Roi and interfered with the internal jurisdiction of the Government of India.

The Government of India's charge is straight and simple. It is based on the direct evidence of village people who are unaccustomed to prevarication. The Government of China cannot evade responsibility for this act of intrusion into Indian territory by taking recourse of propagandist allegations against the Government of India.

The Government of India reject the Chinese note of May 15, 1962, and urge upon the Government of China to desist from further intrusions into Indian territory and to respect India's territorial integrity and sovereignty.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest considerations.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 16 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to state that it has been noticed that Chinese intruders into Indian territory in Ladakh have cleared a new road through Indian territory running South East from E 78° 35' N 35° 0·33' to the West of E 79° 10' N 34° 43' and thence southward to E 79° 8' N 34° 33'. It has been further noticed that they have unlawfully set up a new post at E 79° 8' N 34° 33'. A considerable amount of Chinese activity has also been reported from the vicinity of the Chinese post unlawfully set up at E 78° 55' N 34° 25'.

All this is fresh evidence of the systematic and planned violation of Indian territory by Chinese intruders despite repeated assurances from the Chinese Government that their forces are maintaining the 'status quo' on the Sino-Indian border.

The Government of India lodge a firm protest against this fresh instance of violation of Indian territory by Chinese forces unlawfully posted on Indian territory and urge upon the Chinese Government to desist from such activities which are not conducive to good relations between the two countries.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 18 June 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state the following:

On May 29 '62 the Roma family of Lung Village, Lungtzu Country, Tibet, China, ten persons in all (4 men, 4 women and 2 children), were returning from the Taksing area. When they reached Natien-mula (at one o'clock in the afternoon of the same day), which is north of the so-called McMahon Line and east of Lung Village (approximately 28° 22' N, 93° 09' E), 6 Indian soldiers audaciously crossed the "McMahon Line" in their pursuit, and unwarrantedly fired 6 shots at them. Roma (male), Yekhu (female) and her five-year-old son Manfa and four-year-old daughter Yehmeng, both carried on Yekhu's back, were hit and fell down. The other six persons fortunately made a narrow escape. The whereabouts and the life or death of Roma and the three others are unknown up to now.

The Roma family were originally peaceful inhabitants of Lung Village. In May 1959, they were forced by the Tibetan rebels to go to the Taksing area south of the "McMahon Line". Now, out of their own free will, they were returning to Lung Village. This is their legitimate right that cannot be deprived of. It is astounding that Indian troops should have tried to obstruct them from returning to their original abode and did not scruple to cross the so-called McMahon Line, and pursue and shoot at innocent Tibetan inhabitants, including even women and children. The Chinese Government strongly protests against the intrusion into Chinese territory by Indian troops and their atrocity of shooting at peaceful Chinese inhabitants. The Chinese Government demands that the Indian Government immediately undertake thorough investigations and enquiries into this case, punish those criminals who fired at the peaceful Chinese inhabitants, compensate the family of the victims and adopt effective measures to ensure against the recurrence of similar incidents.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 22 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Government note dated the 28th May 1962.

The Government of India have not established any strong points in any part of Chinese territory. It is the Chinese who have unlawfully established various posts in Indian territory and violated India's territorial integrity. If the Government of India have, in the light of these Chinese intrusions, taken measures to prevent further intrusions by the Chinese, this is what any sovereign government would and must do in the exercise of its responsibility for maintaining the integrity of its territory. It is preposterous, therefore, for the Government of China to allege that not only Indian territories which have been illegally occupied by the Chinese forces in Ladakh are part of Chinese territory but some Indian areas beyond these are also Chinese territory. There seems to be no limit to Chinese expansionist aims.

The specific instances of alleged intrusions cited in the Chinese note are dealt with seriatim below:

Alllegation (1):

India has recently set up another military strong point at approximately 35° 18' N 78° 05' 30" E. 8 Kms. west by south of the Chinese post at 35° 19' N 78° 12' E on the Chip Chap river.

Comments:

This is a repetition of an allegation made earlier in the Chinese note of 30th April 1962. It was then alleged that India had set up a new military post at 35° 16' N 78° 08' E. The Government of India in their note of 14th May 1962 had pointed out that there was no post as alleged at 35° 16' N 78° 08' E, but that they had had a post at approximately 35° 17' N 78° 06' E. It was made clear then that this Indian post which was well inside Indian territory had been in existence for some time. Nevertheless the allegation, already refuted, has reappeared in the Chinese note under reference with a new Chinese name given to the location and with a small change in the map reference of the post.

This allegation of intrusion into Chinese territory is entirely baseless.

Alllegation (2):

Between 28th April and 17th May Indian troops repeatedly intruded into this area. There were 18 cases of such intrusions.
Comments:

The Chinese note of 30th April 1962 carried more or less the same allegation, viz., that in 17 days Indian troops had intruded 18 times into the area. This time the number of intrusions remains the same although the period during which they took place has been extended by 3 days. In refuting the earlier allegation, Government of India had observed in their note of 14th May 1962 that “the entire area into which Indian troops are alleged to have intruded is part of Indian territory and the Government of India are responsible for the protection of this territory. In compliance with this defence responsibility, the Government of India have certain posts in the area and men at these posts go out occasionally for essential purposes. These posts have been established there to defend Indian territory from further inroads. They are not there to attack anybody or for any aggressive activity as alleged in the Chinese note”.

This allegation of intrusion into Chinese territory is not only baseless but is merely a repetition of an earlier allegation which had been dealt with fully. Introduction of phrases like “131 persons—times” does not alter the fact that it is a baseless repetition.

The two specific instances of intrusion cited in the Chinese note to illustrate the general allegation, viz., (1) that on 1st May 1962 11 Indian soldiers had gone to the area near Height 5500 metres and (2) that on 10th May 1962 at 9:15 hours Indian aircraft flew over the Chinese post unlawfully set up in Indian territory at 35° 19' N 78° 12' E, are both unfounded.

The truth behind these Chinese allegations is that

(1) Chinese troops are illegally posted in this area where they have no right to be;

(2) they have built a strong military base with fortifications in the area which is Indian territory;

(3) they are extending this fortified area; and

(4) strong patrols from this Chinese military base are threatening the adjoining areas and the Indian posts located there.

Allegation (3):

On 7th May 1962 at about 14:00 hours, five Indian soldiers intruded into the area at 34° 16' N 79° 01' E. On the same day another 20 men intruded into the area at 34° 18' N 79° 01' E.

Comments:

Although both the locations are inside Indian territory there is no truth in the Chinese allegation that Indian soldiers had been there on the 7th May 1962. On the contrary on the 7th May 1962, 20 Chinese soldiers had intruded into this very area at 15:20 hours. What is more, there is evidence to show that Chinese troops are daily intruding into this area and are carrying out various illegal activities.
Allegation (4):

On 9th May 1962 at 17:30 hours Indian soldiers again fired 3 shots at the Chinese post at Jechiung.

Comments:

A similar allegation was made in the Chinese noted ated 11th May 1962 which said that on 5th May 1962 Indian soldiers had reached the same location and fired 3 shots at the Chinese outpost. That allegation as pointed out in the Government of India’s note dated 21st May 1962 was untrue. An earlier allegation about firing by Indian troops made in the Chinese note of 12th August 1961 had also proved unfounded. The present allegation about firing at the Chinese post on 9th May 1962 has been checked, and it has been found to be untrue. The fact is that Chinese intruders have set up a new military base at ‘Jechiung’ in Indian territory and are covering this up by resorting to baseless allegations against Indian troops.

Allegation (5):

On 3rd May 1962, 4 mounted Indian soldiers intruded into Gore at 32° 38’ N 79° 34’ E for carrying out reconnaissance.

Comments:

The Government of India firmly repudiate this entirely baseless allegation. Indian soldiers did not visit Gore on 3rd May 1962 or on any other day. Unlike Chinese intruders, Indian soldiers are strictly forbidden to cross the international frontier. The Government of India are fully satisfied that there has been no case where Indian soldiers trespassed into Chinese territory across the international border.

The Government of India are constrained to observe that these and other baseless allegations are being repeated by the Chinese Government as part of their planned propaganda against India to further Chinese expansionist aims and to lay fresh claims to Indian territory and to divert attention from the unlawful activities which are being ceaselessly pursued by Chinese forces in Indian territory. The Government of India, therefore, cannot but reject the Government of China’s protest note based on these false allegations.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 28 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to their note dated 6th June 1962 in reply to the Chinese Government’s note dated 21st April 1962, wherein it was pointed out that intensified Chinese military activity had been reported particularly in the vicinity of the Chinese military posts illegally set up on Indian territory at 78° 12’ E, 35° 19’ N and at 78° 13’ E, 35° 15’ N.

It has of late been confirmed that the Chinese intruders have set up a new military post at 78° 15’ E 35° 15’:80 N, six miles south south-east of the Chinese post illegally set up at 78° 12’ E 35° 19’ N. This new Chinese post not only constitutes a further violation of India’s territorial integrity but is approximately 9/10 miles west even of the 1956 Chinese claim line which India did not accept and about which Premier Chou En-lai in his letter dated 17th December 1959 to the Indian Prime Minister said that “it correctly shows the traditional boundary between the two countries.”

The Government of India lodge an emphatic protest with the Government of China against this further aggression on Indian territory and the setting up of another military post further inside Indian territory. This constitutes a fresh act of provocation and a threat to peace as this new post has been set up in dangerous proximity to an existing Indian post south of the Chip Chap River.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 28 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs' Note dated the 4th June 1962 about the alleged establishment of a new Indian post at 34° 58' 30" N 78° 22' 30" E.

The precise location of the alleged Indian post given in the Chinese note shows that it is not only in Indian territory but is also at least five miles west of the nearest point even of the boundary claimed by China, i.e., the Chinese claim line of 1956 which had not been accepted by India. It is pertinent to mention in this connection that Premier Chou En-lai, in his letter dated 17th December 1959, to the Prime Minister of India had said that "it (the 1956 map) correctly shows the traditional boundary between the two countries".

It is a fact that the Government of India have had for some time posts in the region concerned but such administrative and other posts are for the legitimate protection of Indian territory and the Government of China have no right to raise any question about them. The Government of India emphatically repudiate the fight assumed by the Chinese Government to protest and interfere in the sovereign rights of the Government of India over what is clearly Indian territory.

As the record will show, since 1957, it is the Government of China who have step by step moved deeper into Indian territory and set up a number of strong military posts. The Government of China owe it to themselves, in the interests of peace and good neighbourly relations, to withdraw from Indian territory and restore the status quo as it prevailed before these recent Chinese aggressive moves.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 30 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs note dated 18th June 1962.

The Government of India ordered a full enquiry into the allegations made in the Chinese note, and the enquiry has led to the following findings:—

On 28th May, an Indian tribal Chadang Tameng, resident of the village of Lengbeng, two miles east of Taksing, came to Taksing and stole a rifle from the border police lines at Taksing. Later that evening, information was received that he and 10 other tribesmen had escaped from the village of Lengbeng. These 11 escaping Indian tribesmen were intercepted by Indian border guards near Asaiila (N 28° 21' E 93° 14') in Indian territory. As the tribesmen fired at the border guards, the latter fired back in self-defence. The tribes had actually used the stolen rifle to fire at the border guards. As a result of this exchange of fire, a tribal named Loma was killed. Tribals had actually used the stolen rifle to fire at the border guards, recovered the stolen rifle as well as a muzzle loader from the scene of action. A woman member of the tribal party, named Yaku, later returned to Taksing with her two minor children. The rest of the tribal party are still missing.

The Government of China, based on hearsay, have made two unfounded allegations, viz., (1) that the tribals in question were returning to their original home in Lung village in Tibet and that they were obstructed from doing so, and (2) that Indian troops crossed the McMahon Line and pursued and shot at them.

The facts show that the tribals in question were running away after stealing a rifle, and that they even used the stolen rifle to fire at the Indian border guards. What is more, the entire incident including the exchange of fire, took place on Indian territory.

As to the allegation that Indian troops have used force to prevent Tibetan refugees in India from returning to their homes in Tibet and have committed atrocities on them, it is well known that Tibetan refugees in India have been treated with generosity and compassion due to people who are rendered homeless. While the Government of India have helped to rehabilitate Tibetan refugees to the limit of their capacity, they have never stood in the way of any Tibetan refugee who wished to return to Tibet. Any Tibetan refugee who wishes to return to Tibet is free to do so.

It is obvious from the facts stated above that the Government of China are not only harbouring fugitives from India but are using an incident which took place in Indian territory to make false and propagandist allegations against the Government of India.

In the light of the facts stated above, the Government of India firmly reject the Chinese protest note of 18th June 1962.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs note dated 2nd June 1962.

The Government of India's note dated 14th May 1962 gave the correct location of certain Indian checkpoints in North Ladakh, and pointed out that the posts in question had been there for some time purely for the protection of Indian territory from further Chinese inroads and not for any aggressive purpose. The Chinese Government have, however, derided the purpose and questioned the legitimacy of measures taken by the Government of India in exercise of their right of self-defence, and have even mischievously accused India of intruding into Chinese territory and provoking "bloody conflicts": The record shows that such "bloody conflicts" as have taken place invariably occurred when Chinese troops, trespassing into Indian territory, ambushed Indian border guards and fired at them.

The Indian checkpoints, to which the Chinese Government have taken exception, are at a distance of over 120 miles inside India from the nearest point on the international border in the east. The Chinese posts in the vicinity, on the other hand, are not only over 100 miles inside Indian territory but even beyond the alignment shown in the 1956 Chinese map about which Premier Chou En-lai said that "it correctly shows the traditional boundary in this sector of Ladakh" (vide Ministry of External Affairs note dated 28th June 1962).

As to provocation, there are reports of numerous daily intrusions by Chinese troops deep inside Indian territory. They are incessantly attempting to push forward, spying new ground, clearing roads and setting up new advance posts.

While the Chinese army pursues its illegal and provocative activities on Indian territory, the Government of China have made it a practice to send offensive notes as part of their campaign to denigrate India and convey threats. In their latest note, the Government of China have again adopted a menacing attitude and used intemperate language because Indian troops have not been withdrawn from posts south and west of the posts unlawfully set up by Chinese intruders in North Ladakh. Neither threats nor use of offensive language in violation of the usual standards of diplomatic intercourse can alter the basic factual position of progressive Chinese violations of Indian territory particularly since 1957.

The Chinese Government have all along maintained that their forces on the border are preserving the status quo and have stopped forward patrolling. Factually, however, it is clear that they have continued to set up new military posts further inside Indian territory and have built new roads across Indian territory linking these new posts with rear bases (vide Ministry of External Affairs Notes dated 6th June and 28th June 1962).

A number of instances have already been cited in the Government of India's note 14th May 1962 when Chinese troops in superior strength manoeuvred to encircle small groups of Indian defenders in North Ladakh. These hostile manoeuvres have been innocently described in the Chinese note as "normal patrolling".

The record shows that in breach of the solemn covenant entered into by the two countries to respect each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty, the Government of China have since 1957 started a process of intrusion and occupation of Indian territory. In 1960-61 while the two sides were engaged in talks and there was a gentleman's agreement that for the duration of the talks neither sides would push forward and alter the status quo on the border, Chinese troops made further inroads inside Indian territory and set up posts at Nyagzu, Dambuguru and at 78° 12' E, 35° 19' N on the Chip Chap river. A full account of these incursions with dates have already been given in the previous notes of the Government of India.

The Government of India have time and again made it clear that Indian and Chinese maps confirmed the traditional boundary alignment in this sector right up to recent times. When recent maps published in the People's Republic of China began to show certain inaccuracies in the boundary alignment in this sector, the attention of the Government of China was drawn to these inaccuracies and they readily gave the assurance that the erroneous maps in question would be corrected in due course. Now these incorrect maps have become blue prints of Chinese aggressive designs.

The territory unlawfully occupied by Chinese intruders in Ladakh is not Chinese territory. It has always been, and still is Indian territory. It is absurd for the Government of China to argue that any part of Ladakh had at any time formed part of Chinese territory or that large tracts of Ladakh 'always belonged to China'. This is a deliberate mis-statement of facts, which ignores treaty, tradition, facts of geography and actual jurisdiction. There has never been any doubt that the area unlawfully occupied by Chinese forces in Ladakh is part of Indian territory. Trespass and unlawful intrusion do not confer title to territory.

To claim, as the Government of China have done, that the area in Ladakh has always belonged to them is to use their own language "palpable distortion of the fact and reversal of right and wrong".

To ease the tension now existing in Northern Ladakh and in conformity with their peaceful aims, the Government of India had renewed their proposal that the two sides should withdraw as an interim measure from the disputed area in Ladakh (i.e. the area between the international boundary shown in official Indian maps and that shown in the 1956 Chinese map). The offer was well-intentioned and it was made in the interests of peace and honourable negotiations between the two countries. It offered the Government of China the use of the road in Aksai Chin for civilian traffic pending a settlement. There can be no question but that the offer was solely prompted by an earnest desire to promote a settlement by peaceful negotiations in consonance with the dignity, self-respect and vital interests of the two countries. That the proposal involved withdrawal of the Chinese forces from larger areas is solely due to the fact that it is the Chinese and not the Indians who have altered the status quo in the area by progressive large scale violations of Indian territory particularly since 1957. Surely the Chinese authorities are aware of this factual position and of the need to restore the status quo to promote the right climate for settlement by peaceful negotiations.

The Government of India regret the tone and the contents of the Chinese note which further complicates the problem which the Chinese have themselves created in Ladakh. The Government of India hope that the Chinese authorities will, in the larger interests of peace, reconsider the matter and make a constructive response to the Indian proposal.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
On July 6, about twenty Indian troops intruded into Sinkiang, China, reaching a point at approximately 34 degrees 37 minute 30 second north, 78 degrees 35 minute 30 second east, as deep as about six kilometres inside the Chinese territory in the Galwan valley area and attempting to establish there a new base for aggression. This intrusion of Indian troops is a serious one; by seizing that place, they obviously intended to cut off the only rear route for the Chinese post located at the lower reaches of the Galwan river and to launch an attack on that Chinese post. Furthermore, the above-mentioned Indian troops, relying on their superiority in numerical strength, made provocations against a small Chinese patrol on the northern bank of the Galwan river; they crossed the Galwan river from the southern bank at 13:00 hours and pressed forward right up to a place only about one hundred metres from the Chinese patrol. A serious incident was averted only because the Chinese patrol exercised self-restraint throughout, repeatedly advised the Indian troops against a clash and withdrew a certain distance on their own. Nevertheless, the Indian troops have not stopped their pressing forward on the Chinese patrol and a dangerous situation there is not yet over.

The Chinese Government hereby lodges the strongest protest with the Indian Government against the above-mentioned serious intrusion and provocation made by Indian troops.

The Chinese Government states once again that while always trying to avoid clashes with the intruding Indian troops, the Chinese side will never yield before an ever deeper armed advance by India, nor will China give up its right to self-defence when unwarrantedly attacked. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will fully realize the danger involved in the aforesaid intrusion and provocation by Indian troops and withdraw at once their intruding troops from the Chinese territory. It is hardly necessary to point out that if the Indian troops should persist in their intrusion and provocation, India will be held responsible for all consequences arising therefrom.
Of late, Indian troops have continued to intrude into China’s Sinkiang and have further set up four new military strong-points on the Chinese territory. Of these, one is located at approximately 35 degrees 14 minutes north, 78 degrees 9 minutes east, another at approximately 35 degrees 10 minutes north, 78 degrees 12 minutes east, the third at approximately 35 degrees 16 minutes north, 78 degrees 11 minutes east, and the fourth at approximately 35 degrees 25 minutes north, 78 degrees 5 minutes east. The first two strong-points are both as deep as about twelve kilometres, the third as deep as sixteen kilometres and the fourth nearly one kilometre inside the Chinese territory. The aggressive strong-points set up by Indian troops form a threatening encirclement of the Chinese posts. Meanwhile, the Indian side has kept sending more troops to these aggressive strong-points, constructing roads and building fortifications near the strong-points. Moreover, Indian troops have from time to time sallied out in different directions to harass and provoke Chinese frontier guards.

Recently, Indian troops have also established a new military strong-point at approximately 33 degrees 31 minutes and 30 seconds north, 78 degrees 47 minutes east, on the Sino-Indian boundary line west of the Spanggur Lake in China’s Tibet. This and the other strong-point established on the Chinese territory by the Indian side which was referred to in the Chinese Government’s Note of May 11, 1962, form a pincer threat on the Chinese post in the Spanggur Lake area. Moreover, Indian troops after firing provocative shots at the Chinese post on May 5 and 9, 1962 (See Chinese Government’s Notes of May 11 and 28, 1962) disregarded repeated protests of the Chinese Government and at about 11:40 hours on May 22, for the third time, fired on the said Chinese post from the same direction. It can be seen from these new serious cases that the Indian Government’s denial made in its reply Notes of 21 and 26, 1962, regarding the facts of the Indian troops’ intrusion into this area brought up by the Chinese Government is totally worthless and unworthy of refutation.

To the south west of the Kongka Pass, Indian troops have recently built a block house and trenches at approximately 34 degrees 18 minutes north, 78 degrees 59 minutes east on the Sino-Indian boundary close to the Chinese post in the locality and have crossed the boundary to make harassment.

Indian aircraft have continually acted in co-ordination with and support of Indian invasion on the ground, frequently intruding into Chinese air space and air dropping supplies to India’s aggressive strong-points established within the Chinese territory.

The above-mentioned facts once again show that the Indian Government far from intending to stop its encroachment and harassment on the Chinese territory is expanding and aggravating them.
The Indian Government talks glibly about the desire to 'maintain the status quo', 'reach a peaceful settlement' and so on. But a comparison of its words and deeds shows obviously that it is merely creating a smokescreen for an armed invasion.

In its reply Note of June 6, 1962, the Indian Government described a series of Indian intrusions into the Chinese territory as made 'for the defence of the Indian territory'. In the same Note and that of May 21, it further falsely accused China of 'daily intruding into Indian territory' and so forth. These assertions are great mockery of truth. As a matter of fact, it is the Indian side that has been intruding into and carrying on armed provocation against China while the Chinese side has always been in the defensive position on its own territory. In his speech in Indian Parliament on June 20, 1962, Prime Minister Nehru unwittingly let out the truth. He stated that to say that China had made 'a fresh intrusion' was 'hardly correct' and that it was due to the Indian movements 'sometimes going behind Chinese positions' and 'largely due to the movements on our (Indian) side that the Chinese had also to make movements'. Is it not clear enough who has incessantly been undermining the status quo and intruding into the other party's territory and who is creating tension on the Sino-Indian border?

The Chinese Government strongly protests against the aforesaid fresh activities of intrusion and provocation carried out by Indian troops and once again urges the Indian Government to withdraw immediately from the Chinese territory all its newly established aggressive strong-points and its intruding troops. The Chinese Government categorically rejects the groundless and false accusation levelled by the Indian Government. It reiterates that the Indian Government must bear full responsibility for all grave consequences that may arise from obstinate practices of the Indian side.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs Memorandum, dated the 8th July 1962.

The allegations made in the Chinese memorandum are entirely baseless. Indian border forces have regularly been patrolling the Galwan valley and have never encountered any Chinese infiltrators in the valley. It cannot therefore be true that Chinese troops have infiltrated and set up a post "in the lower reaches of the Galwan valley". The lower reaches of the Galwan valley are not only well inside Indian territory but also about 28 miles even from the claim line shown in the Chinese 1956 map about which Premier Chou En-lai wrote to the Indian Prime Minister in his letter, dated the 17th November 1959, that "it correctly shows the boundary alignment in this sector of the border". If as claimed in the Chinese memorandum Chinese troops have penetrated and set up a post "in the lower reaches of the Galwan river", it is a serious violation of Indian territory which must be vacated.

The Government of India have had for some time a post at approximately 73° 38' E, 34° 39:45' N which is 10½ miles west and beyond the claim line shown in the Chinese map of 1956. The Indian post is located there for the legitimate defence of Indian territory.

The Chinese memorandum has falsely charged that Indian border guards "made provocations" against a Chinese patrol on the north bank of the Galwan river that the border guards crossed to the north bank at 13:00 hours and went to within one hundred metres of the Chinese patrol that the Chinese patrol thereupon 'exercised self-restraint and repeatedly advised the Indian troops to avoid a clash'. On detailed verification it has been found that Indian border guards had not as alleged, encountered any Chinese patrol on and up to 9th July 1962.

However, more than 48 hours after the despatch of the Chinese memo, i.e., at 09:30 hours 1st on 10th July, 1962, a party of 25 Chinese soldiers took up position 200 yards opposite the Indian post. Ten minutes later the first party was reinforced by another party of 40—45 Chinese soldiers. These Chinese intruders immediately started to prepare for hostile action. A batch of Chinese soldiers soon after went from the rear up to within 75 yards of the Indian post, where they occupied a position astride the track leading to the Indian post. At 18:00 hours the same day 300 more Chinese soldiers arrived and encircled the Indian post from the east, south and west. They moved up threateningly to within 50 to 70 yards of the post. The Government of India register a most emphatic protest against the threat posed to the Indian post by Chinese intruders.
It is clear from the facts stated above that the Government of China have preferred entirely baseless allegations against Indian border guards making it appear as though the latter were in pursuit of the Chinese intruders. It is significant that after they had made these false and mischievous allegations about an imaginary encounter between the Indian border guards and Chinese intruders, large bodies of Chinese troops moved to take up hostile positions and to encircle the Indian post.

The Government of India lodge an emphatic protest against this unwarranted aggressive activity of the local Chinese forces and in view of the factual position stated above reject the Chinese memorandum of 8th July 1962.

If any Chinese patrol has erroneously infiltrated into the "lowe reaches of the Galwan river", it must return to its base. At the same time the Government of China should stop the incessant intrusions deeper inside Indian territory and ceaseless provocative activities against Indian border guards. Time and again Indian border guards have exercised the utmost restraint in the face of grave provocations and attempts at encirclement by Chinese troops. There can be no doubt that the present situation in Ladakh has developed as a result of the aggressive activities systematically pursued by Chinese forces in Indian territory. It any untoward incident should now occur, the responsibility for it would entirely rest on the Government of China.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India the assurances of their highest considerations.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 12 July 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Ministry of External Affairs Note, dated 6th June 1962, in which it was pointed out that "carefully verified reports from...Ladakh show that Chinese troops are daily intruding into Indian territory, pushing forward in trucks and jeeps, blasting the mountain side with heavy explosives, constructing military bases and extending the military bases already set up".

The aggressive activities referred to above had led in recent weeks to the establishment of a number of new Chinese posts deep inside Indian territory. The particulars of these posts are given below:—

A. Chip Chap River Region

(1) Post at 78° 08' E, 35° 28' N: This post is not only well inside Indian territory but also 2½ miles even beyond the claim line shown in the Chinese map of 1956.

(2) Post at 78° 08' E, 35° 29:45' N: This post is 4 miles south of the international boundary in this sector.

(3) Post at 78° 07' E, 35° 24' N: This post is not only well inside Indian territory but 6 miles further west from the claim line shown in the Chinese map of 1956.

(4) Post at 78° 10' E, 35° 20:30' N: This post is well inside Indian territory and 6 miles south-west of the claim line shown in the Chinese map of 1956.

(4) Post at 78° 10' E, 35° 20:30' N: This post is well inside Indian territory but also 9 miles further south-west from the nearest point on the claim line shown in the Chinese map of 1956.

(6) Post at 78° 12' E, 35° 16:30' N: This post is not only well inside Indian territory but also 9 miles further south-west from the nearest point on the claim line shown in the Chinese map of 1956.

(7) Post at 78° 15' E, 35° 15:30' N: This post is not only well inside Indian territory but also about 12 miles further south-west from the nearest point on the claim line shown in the Chinese map of 1956.

B. Chang Chenmo Valley Region

(8) Post at 79° 02' E, 34° 17' N: This post is more than 30 miles west of the international border in this sector.

C. Spanggur Region

(9) Post at 78° 50:30' E, 33° 44:30' N: This post is 12 miles beyond the international border in this sector.
Thus as many as 6 out of the 9 new Chinese posts referred to above are not only well inside Indian territory but well beyond even the boundary alignment claimed by the Government of China in their 1956 map, about which Premier Chou-En-lai wrote in his letter dated 17th December 1959 to the Prime Minister of India that "it (the 1956 map) correctly shows the traditional boundary between the two countries". Although this 1956 Chinese alignment is itself fallacious and untenable the fact that Chinese forces have pushed even beyond it is indicative of China's unlimited territorial ambition in the region.

These new Chinese posts, deep inside Indian territory, constitute further serious violations of India's territorial integrity. Not only are Chinese forces now poised in menacing proximity to existing Indian posts in the area, but their incessant aggressive and provocative activities are increasing tension and, if not restrained, may create a clash at any moment.

Recent Chinese moves have again given the lie to their much vaunted claims of maintaining the status quo on the border and not sending forward patrols. The Government of India while lodging a strong protest against the establishment of these new Chinese posts urgently call upon the Government of China, in the interests of peace and good neighbourly relations, to withdraw from Indian territory and restore the status quo on the border as it prevailed until the Chinese aggressive activities in the last few years.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 13 July 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the Indian troops' intrusion into the Galwan Valley in China's Sinkiang in a deliberate attempt to provoke an armed clash, states again the following:

The Chinese Government lodged a strongest protest on July 8, 1962, against the Indian troops' flagrant intrusion on July 6, 1962, into the Galwan Valley in China's Sinkiang, cutting off the route of a Chinese post to its rear and making armed provocations against a Chinese patrol, and demanded that the Indian Government immediately withdraw the intruding Indian troops so as to avoid any unfortunate incident. The Indian side, however, has turned a deaf ear to the Chinese Government's solemn warning and demand. Far from withdrawing its troops from Chinese territory up to now, the Indian side has actively reinforced its troops, tightened its encirclement of the Chinese post and patrol in preparation for an armed provocation at any time.

In the three days from July 7 to 9, Indian reinforcements kept arriving at the Indian military strong point at 34° 37' 30" N, 78° 35' 30" E. On July 10, Indian troops in three groups advanced further on the northern bank of the Galwan River to occupy positions and close in on the Chinese patrol, coming as near as 50 metres. On July 11, two Indian helicopters flew reinforcements to the aggressive strong point and circle over the vicinity at a low altitude for reconnaissance and intimidation against the Chinese post and patrolmen. On the same day, a detachment of the Indian troops moved down along the Galwan River for about nine kilometres and set up a new aggressive strong point there, thus further threatening the security of the Chinese post whose rear route had already been cut off.

By now, the above-mentioned Chinese post has lost touch with the rear for as long as eight days, and the Chinese patrol is besieged by Indian troops of superior strength. The Chinese Government solemnly demands once again that the Indian troops immediately stop their provocations and threats against the Chinese frontier guards and withdraw from Chinese territory at once.

The Chinese Government has just received the Indian Government's note, dated July 10, 1962 and cannot but express great indignation at the attitude shown in it. While admitting that Indian troops have set up a military strong point in the Galwan Valley, the Indian Government has distorted the facts in an attempt to shirk its responsibility for intruding into Chinese territory and threatening Chinese frontier guards.

The Indian Government asserts that there is no Chinese post on the lower reaches of the Galwan River and that Indian forces have regularly been patrolling the Galwan Valley and have established a post there since long ago. This is entirely groundless. The plain fact is that the Chinese post has been there since long ago and is located at approximately 30° 42' N, 78° 26' E, while Indian troops had never been to the Galwan Valley in China before, let alone setting up a post there. As late as July 4, 1962 when a patrol sent by the above-mentioned Chinese post last patrolled the upper reaches of the River, no sign of any Indian troops or post was yet found. The Indian troops invaded this area only after July 4, 1962. It was only on its return after fulfilling a patrol task on July 6 that the Chinese patrol was hindered by the Indian post which had just been set up at 34° 37' 30" N, 78° 35' 30" E. This is an established and unchangeable fact. If India had earlier set up a strong point there (34° 39.45" N, 78° 38' E, as asserted in the Indian note), how could Chinese frontier guards get through the path controlled by the strong point to set up the post on the lower reaches of the Galwan River?

In its note the Indian Government has repeated its customary method of describing the Indian troop intrusions as "legitimate defence of Indian territory" on the pretext that "the lower reaches of the Galwan Valley are not only well inside Indian territory but also about 28 miles even from the claim-line shown in the Chinese 1956 map". This trick has long been repeatedly exposed and repudiated by the Chinese Government. As part of the whole Aksai Chin area, the lower reaches of the Galwan Valley have always been Chinese territory. Both the 1956 map of China, which was confirmed by Premier Chou-En-lai and cited by the Chinese side during the meeting of the officials of the two countries, and the map handed over by the Chinese side during the meeting of the officials of the two countries in 1960 show this area as within China. The delineation of the western sector of the boundary in the above-mentioned 1956 map of China is in full conformity with the boundary line which China has consistently pointed out. The Indian assertion about inconsistency in the Chinese Government's position is a sheer slander.

It is entirely a fact that on July 6 the Indian troops, as pointed out in the Chinese Government's memorandum of July 8, came within 100 metres to make provocations against the Chinese patrol. Yet the Indian Government falsely alleges that the Indian troops had not encountered any Chinese patrol on and upto July 9. Especially surprising is the fact that the Indian Government even fabricated the entirely groundless story that allegedly three to four hundred Chinese soldiers encircle the Indian post from three directions and thereupon lodged a most emphatic protest with the Chinese Government. So unscrupulous has become the Indian Government in order to relieve the Indian troops of their responsibility. Facts can in no way be covered up. The Chinese Government categorically rejects the unwarranted charge and protest of the Indian Government.

Since last spring, Indian troops have continually intruded into Chinese territory in the western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary, established a series of aggressive strong points and made repeated provocations against Chinese frontier guards. In his speeches made in the Indian Parliament on June 20, 21 and 23, 1962, Prime Minister Nehru again and again boasted about the many new posts established by the Indian troops, saying that those posts “give us (India) certain advantage”. He openly admitted: “Our (India’s) movements sometimes go behind the Chinese positions”. The Chinese Government has lodged repeated protests against these Indian aggressive activities, yet the Indian side has turned a deaf ear to them. There are many signs indicating that Indian activities in the western sector of the boundary in the past few months have been fully planned and systematic. India aims not only to assert its territorial claims on China by armed force, but also deliberately to provoke a military clash on the border so as to create an anti-Chinese atmosphere. Proceeding from the desire of maintaining friendship between the two countries and settling the boundary question peacefully, the Chinese Government has all along exercise forbearance and self-restraint. The Chinese Government is extremely unwilling to see any unfortunate incident occurring on the Sino-Indian border. But if the Indian side should overdo it and provoke an armed clash, and the Chinese side should be compelled to defend itself, the Indian side would have to bear the whole responsibility.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 14 July 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs note, dated the 10th July 1962.

It has been repeatedly pointed out in note after note from the Government of India that since 1957 the Government of China have started a process of intrusion and occupation of Indian territory. This process continued unabated even during the officials’ talks when it was expected that the two sides would not push forward or send out patrols. By September 1961, Chinese forces had made further advances into Indian territory and had set up three new posts as cited in Government of India’s note of 31st October 1961. Thereafter, they continued to push forward and set up more posts in Indian territory as cited in the Government of India’s notes of 15th April 1962, 21st May 1962, 16th June 1962, 28th June 1962 and 12th July 1962. Thus, in recent months, Chinese intruders have set up no less than 13 new posts in Indian territory.

The Government of India could not ignore the threat to the security and territorial integrity of India posed by Chinese forces advancing and illegally occupying Indian territory. They had to take necessary measures for the defence of Indian territory. These measures taken in Indian territory are however, purely for defensive purposes and threaten no one.

As to the Indian posts cited in the Chinese note, although the references given are not all correct, it is true that the Government of India have some posts in that general location. All these posts are, however, well within Indian territory and are there for the purpose cited in the preceding paragraph. Even assuming that the bearings given in the Chinese note are correct, these posts are not only well inside Indian territory but 20 to 25 miles west and beyond even of the claim line shown in the Chinese map of 1956 about which Premier Chou En-lai wrote to the Prime Minister of India in his letter, dated the 17th November 1959 that “it correctly shows the traditional border between the two countries in this sector”. As the Government of China are aware, this claim line in the Chinese map of 1956 has been rejected by the Government of India and detailed reasons for this position have been given by the Indian officials in the report of the talks between officials. The fact, however, that the Chinese authorities are now attempting to cover up their intrusions into Indian territory by protesting against Indian posts which are not only well inside Indian territory but several miles west even of the claim line in 1956 Chinese maps shows beyond doubt the aggressive and expansionist policy of the Chinese authorities.

The Government of India have repeatedly made it clear that their objectives are peaceful. They have no intention to embroil themselves in hostilities and armed clashes. The Government of India hope that the Chinese authorities would carefully consider the contents in the various notes presented by the Government of India, revise their policy and peacefully withdraw from Indian territory which they are unlawfully occupying. It is false and mischievous to suggest that Indian troops have at any time threatened to encircle Chinese posts. There has not been to date a single incident of such encirclement. On the contrary, Chinese forces have set up new posts in the vicinity of Indian posts in order to encircle and harass them. The Chinese posts at 78° 08' E, 35° 28' N, 78° 12' E, 35° 16'30' N and 78° 15' E, 35° 15'30' N have been deliberately set up in Indian territory to encircle and harass the Indian post in that general location. More recently, Chinese troops have taken similar aggressive action against an Indian post in the Galwan valley (vide Ministry of External Affairs note, dated 10th July 1962).

The Chinese note makes a reference to road construction and fortifications by Indian troops in north Ladakh. It is the intruding Chinese forces who have incessantly carried on aggressive activities, constructed numerous roads and built fortified posts in Indian territory. In the face of these activities, Government of India had to take such minimum precautions as they considered necessary to stop further Chinese encroachment on Indian territory.

The Chinese note has referred to an Indian post at 33° 31'30' N, 78° 47' E. This post is not only in Indian territory but it is even beyond any boundary claim in this region made by the Chinese authorities in the past. As the Government of China are aware, the international boundary in this sector of the border cuts across the eastern part of Spanggur lake and follows the northern and eastern watershed of the Indus. It is the Chinese Government who have violated Indian territory by setting up posts at 78° 52'30' E, 33° 30' N and 78° 48' E, 33° 34' N in Indian territory. Indian posts in the area are not threatening anyone but are there only to exercise normal vigilance against any further Chinese intrusions into Indian territory. It is an entirely baseless allegation that they fired shots at the heavily fortified Chinese post at Spanggur. That this allegation is absurd is clear from the fact that no one would fire at a post which is more than five miles away. It is obvious that such baseless allegations against Indian troops are being repeated merely to cover up Chinese aggressive plans in this area.

There is no Indian post at 34° 18' N, 78° 59' E as mischievously alleged in the Chinese note. In any case, this location is well within Indian territory. It is the Government of China who have made a fresh intrusion into this area and set up a new post in Indian territory at 79° 02' E, 34° 17' N, 30 miles beyond the internation border in this sector (vide Ministry of External Affairs note, dated the 12th July 1962).

Indian aircraft have never violated Chinese air space. Indian maintenance aircraft fly on legitimate duty well inside Indian air space. In contrast, Chinese aircraft have on innumerable occasions violated Indian air space and carried out provocative activities.
The Chinese Government have made an out of context reference to the Indian Prime Minister's reply to a debate in Parliament. What the Prime Minister of India conveyed in his reply in Parliament on 20th June 1962 was that Chinese intrusions into Indian territory which had taken place in the immediately preceding months were not on the same scale as the earlier ones from 1957—60 which involved "over 12,000 square miles of Indian territory". It is a fact that Chinese forces are still attempting to nibble away at Indian territory but they are obviously unable to make the same deep inroads into Indian territory as they did from 1957 to 1960 because Indian posts and patrols are now standing guard against such intrusions. The Prime Minister's statement was an assurance to the country that the process of intrusion and occupation of Indian territory started by the Government of China, since 1957, had been, by and large, brought to a halt.

In the light of the facts stated above the Government of India reject the Chinese note of 10th July 1962. It is for the Government of China to call a halt to their aggressive activities and peacefully withdraw their forces from Indian territory. At the same time, the Government of India must urge that immediate steps be taken to end the recent menacing and provocative activities of Chinese forces against Indian posts in Indian territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 16 July 1962

The Indian troops have lately set up another three aggressive strongpoints in Ari, Tibet, China, one at approximately 33 degrees 44 minutes north, 78 degrees 51 minutes east near Sirijap on the northern bank of the Pangong Lake, about two kilometers within Chinese territory, another at Yula (approximately 33 degrees 41 minutes north, 78 degrees 52 minutes east) on the southern bank of the Pangong lake over ten kilometers within China; and the third at approximately 34 degrees 3 minutes north, 78 degrees 43 minutes east, northwest of Nyagzu and about five kilometers within China. Taking advantage of the fact that the Pangong lake is astride of the boundary, the Indian side has moreover kept sending motorboats to intrude into part of the lake within China, making wanton harassment and bringing men and material to support its newly established aggressive strongpoints. The Chinese Government hereby lodges a strong protest with the Indian Government against these serious new intrusions and provocations by India.

Since last April, Indian troops have set up a series of aggressive strongpoints at various places in the Chinese border area in the Western sector of the Sino-Indian boundary and recently even created a dangerous situation in the Galwan valley in Sinkiang in which an unfortunate incident may occur at any time. Now Indian troops again set up strongpoints in the Pangong lake area and the Nyagzu area within China and carried out provocations there. This shows that India's aggressive activities against China along the entire western sector of the boundary have grown most fanatic. Already more than once the Chinese Government has shown forbearance to Indian troop intrusions and provocations. The Indian side will make a fatal mistake if it should think that China is flabby and can be bullied in view of her self-restraint and forbearance and persist in its act of playing with fire in an attempt to assert its territorial claims by armed force. The Chinese Government sternly demand that the Indian Government immediately withdraw its aggressive strongpoints and stop all its intrusion and provocations.
The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to state that on 21st July 1962 an Indian patrol in the region of Chip Chap river area, while performing routine patrol duties within Indian territory was attacked by Chinese troops with light machine mortar and rifle fire resulting in the wounding of two members of the Indian patrol. Our patrol exercised extreme restraint and did not return fire. Later, however, in the face of continuing firing by the Chinese, they were forced to return the fire in self defence.

On the same day, in the region of the Pangong lake Chinese troops fired at another Indian party. In spite of grave provocation, Indian forces exercised great self-restraint and did not return the fire.

The Government of India had warned the Chinese Embassy as late as July 12 that the establishment of Chinese posts deep within Indian territory apart from being a violation of the territorial integrity of this country was also aggravating tension in that area and increasing the risk of a clash. The Government of India strongly protest at the aggressive action taken by the Chinese forces both in the Chip Chap river area and in the Pangong lake area.

The Government of India deplore the continuing border tension in this area arising out of continuing provocations from Chinese forces and would urge the Chinese Government to issue orders to Chinese troops in the area to refrain from provocative armed action and to withdraw from Indian territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to refer to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs' notes dated the 13th and 16th July, 1962.

As has been stated earlier in this Ministry's note of 10th July an Indian post is located for the legitimate defence of Indian territory at E 78° 33' N, 34° 39' 45" and not E 78° 35' 30" N, 34° 37' 30" as mentioned in the Chinese note. The Chinese allegations that reinforcements were sent to this post from 7—9th July, that on 10th July Indian troops advanced in three groups towards the north bank of the Galwan river and that two helicopters flew over the area on the 11th July are unfounded. The allegation that on 11th July a detachment of Indian troops moved down the Galwan river for about 9 kilometres and set up a new aggressive strongpoint is equally baseless. On the contrary, it is the Chinese forces who have as stated in this Ministry's note of 10th July made aggressive and threatening moves against the Indian post and are interfering with its communications and supplies. The Government of India hope that this interference will cease and the Chinese forces will withdraw peacefully to the east of the international frontier in this region.

The note of the Chinese Government that their patrol on its return after fulfilling a patrol task in a rear area was hindered by the Indian post on July 6th is without foundation. In their Memorandum of July 8th the Chinese Government vaguely referred to this post as "a post on the lower reaches of the Galwan". It was only on the 13th of July that coordinates of the post have been given. It appears that the Chinese allegations are an obvious attempt to confuse the issue and to find an excuse for establishing an aggressive base in that area.

The Indian Government have observed that in the Chinese note of 13th July after stating "both the 1956 map of China" and "the map handed over by the Chinese side during the meeting of the officials of the two countries in 1960 show this area as within China" the Chinese note goes on to maintain that the delineation of the Western Sector of the boundary in the above mentioned 1956 map of China is in full conformity with the boundary lines which China has consistently pointed out. That this contention is incorrect is clear from the fact that the Indian side at the Officials Conference referring to the 1956 and 1960 maps of the Chinese Government had stated that "the Indian side noted that the Chinese side were unable to explain the discrepancies between the alignment shown in this Sector on the 1956 map and authoritatively confirmed by Premier Chou En-lai in 1959, and that shown in the map provided by the Chinese side at these meetings. The latter map showed an alignment which ran due east from the Karakoram Pass rather than south-east as in the 1956 map, and then, making a sudden turn southward, it cut across the Upper Shyok or Chip Chap river, the Galwan river, and the Changlung river to reach the Kongka Pass. It did not run between the Shyok and the Qara Qash as the 1956 map had done. In the Pangong region, instead of leaving the entire western half of the lake in India as in the 1956 map, it cut across the Western Pangong Lake." It is obvious that the Chinese authorities are either themselves confused or are deliberately confusing the question of the international frontier in this region. So far as the Government of India are concerned, the only frontier recognised by them is the international frontier that has been clearly established and indicated in the maps that have been handed over to the Chinese Government by the Indian side at the meetings of the officials of the two Governments.

The Chinese Note of July 16th refers to three Indian posts in Indian territory west of the international frontier. These are for defensive purposes and have been necessitated by continuing Chinese aggressive activities in the area. The Indian Government share the desire of the Chinese Government to see that no unfortunate incident takes place on the Indo-Chinese border and hopes that the Chinese Government will issue instructions to the Chinese forces in the area to desist from harassing Indian military posts established purely for the defence of Indian territory in this region and to withdraw to points outside Indian territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs takes this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 20 November 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note of the Ministry of External Affairs of India to the Chinese Embassy in India dated September 19, 1961, has the honour to state as follows:

With regard to the question of the western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary, the Indian Government, basing itself on its own distortion of the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty and the Attached Maps, has on four successive occasions raised objection to the Chinese Government. Despite the fact that the Chinese Government has repeatedly given exhaustive explanations to the Indian Government, the Indian Government has persisted in its position of trying to impose on others the alignment claimed by the Indian side and continued to make unreasonable haggling. Under these circumstances, it would indeed be meaningless to continue the present exchange of notes. The Chinese Government only wishes to reiterate the following: No specific provisions are made in the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty regarding the exact location of the western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary, which is at the same time the tri-junction of China, Burma and India. This is out of the consideration that the Sino-Indian boundary has not yet been formally delimited, and there is a dispute between China and India over the boundary question. Once the Sino-Indian boundary is formally delimited through negotiation, as the Chinese Government has consistently desired, the question of the western extremity of the Sino-Burmese boundary will be finally settled along with it. It is not difficult to see that the above-described way of dealing with the question in the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty is reasonable and appropriate, and does not affect at all the respective positions held by the Chinese and the Indian sides on the Sino-Indian boundary. The Chinese Government cannot but express deep regret at the fact that the Indian Government has repeatedly made unreasonable charges.

In its note of September 19, 1961, the Indian Government once again tried to defend its unilaterally claimed alignment and the British imperialist activities of aggression against China. The Chinese Government has long ago thoroughly refuted these hackneyed arguments and there is no need to repeat here. But it has to be pointed out that in its note, the Indian Government flagrantly slandered the Chinese Government as having "aggressive designs and imperialist ambitions," violating the Five Principles and "unauthorisedly occupying large areas of Indian territory". The Chinese Government hereby strongly protests against these wanton slanders and provocations on the part of the Indian Government.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to state that according to a communiqué issued by the Government of the People's Republic of China on the 3rd May 1962, the Governments of China and Pakistan have entered into an agreement "to locate and align their common border".

As the Government of China are aware there is no common border between Pakistan and the People's Republic of China. It is the India-China boundary which starts from the tri-junction of the boundaries of India, China and Afghanistan at approximately long 74° 34' E and Lat. 37° 3' N and runs eastward upto the tri-junction of the boundaries of India, Burma and China.

There has never been any doubt that the sovereignty over the entire State of Jammu and Kashmir, including that part which is under Pakistan's unlawful occupation, vests solely in the Indian Union. The Government of India had so far believed that the Government of the People's Republic of China had accepted this basic position without any reservation. This was confirmed by Premier Chou-En-lai when he stated to the Indian Ambassador in Peking on March 16, 1956 "that the people of Kashmir had already expressed their will' on the issue of Kashmir's accession to India. The same impression was gained at the meeting between the Secretary General of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs and the Chinese Prime Minister in July 1961. At that time it seemed that the Government of China still acknowledged the final accession of the State of Jammu and Kashmir to the Indian Union. The Government of India are, in view of this background, surprised that the Government of the People's Republic of China should have suddenly decided to enter into an international agreement to negotiate the boundary of that part of the State of Jammu and Kashmir which is under the unlawful occupation of Pakistan with the Government of Pakistan. This is a reversal of the attitude of the Government of the People's Republic of China in regard to India's sovereignty over the entire State of Jammu and Kashmir and is obviously a step in furtherance of the aggressive aims that China has been pursuing towards India in recent years.

In lodging an emphatic protest with the Government of the People's Republic of China for this interference with the sovereignty of India over the State of Jammu and Kashmir, Government of India solemnly warns the Government of China that any change, provisional or otherwise, in the status of the State of Jammu and Kashmir brought about by third parties which seeks to submit certain parts of Indian territory to foreign jurisdiction will not be binding on the Government of India and that the Government of India firmly repudiate any agreements provisional or otherwise regarding her own territories arrived at between third parties who have no legal or constitutional locus standi of any kind.

It is clear that the Government of China are in this matter acting in furtherance of their aggressive designs and are seeking to exploit the troubled situation in Kashmir and India's differences with Pakistan for their advantage. The Government of India will hold the Government of China responsible for the consequences of their action.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of the opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 31 May 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Chinese Government dated the 20th November 1961 have the honour to state as follows:

It is strange that the Chinese Government should continue ad infinitum to contend that the Sino-Indian boundary at the tri-junction of China, Burma and India has not been finally settled or that the Diphu pass has not been shown as the western extremity in the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty and its attached maps. The latter contention goes against the concrete evidence available in the text of the Sino-Burmese Boundary Treaty, and more particularly the first sheet of the map attached to the Treaty which is explicitly captioned "the map showing the entire boundary between Burma and China".

The northern and eastern boundary of India is traditionally well known and well recognised and requires no further definition. The Government of China, adopting an unhistorical and subjective view, have sought to exploit the opportunity offered by the China-Burma Boundary Treaty to raise a non-existent dispute in this sector of the Sino-Indian boundary which has been firmly fixed.

The Government of India wish to make it clear that they cannot accept this unhistorical and subjective stand taken by the Government of China.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the note of the Ministry of External Affairs of India dated May 10, 1962, has the honour to state the following:

1. The Indian Government in its note has gone to the length of lodging a protest with the Chinese Government against Sino-Pakistan negotiations for a provisional boundary agreement and wantonly slandering and intimidating China. The Chinese Government categorically rejects the unjustifiable protest of the Indian Government and, from the Indian Government's completely unreasonable attitude of imposing its will on others, cannot but draw with regret the conclusion that the Indian Government is bent on making use of the Sino-Pakistan negotiations to whip up anti-Chinese sentiments and aggravate the tension between China and India.

2. The Indian note alleges that the Chinese Government accepted without reservation the position that Kashmir is under Indian sovereignty, that there is no common boundary between China and Pakistan, and that therefore China has no right to conduct boundary negotiations with Pakistan. This allegation is totally untenable. When did the Chinese Government accept without any reservation the position that Kashmir is under Indian sovereignty? The Indian Government could not cite any official Chinese document to prove this arbitrary contention but, basing itself solely on the guesswork and impression of Indian diplomatic officials who have been to China, insisted that Chinese Government authorities had made statements to that effect. This is not only a unilateral misrepresentation of the fact but a conclusion imposed on others, to which the Chinese Government categorically objects. There is a boundary of several hundred kilometres between China's Sinkiang and the areas the defence of which is under the control of Pakistan, and it has never been formally delimited and demarcated. If one does not shut his eyes to the facts, how can he assert that there is no common boundary between China and Pakistan? Since both China and Pakistan are sovereign states, why cannot China conduct negotiations with Pakistan to settle the question of the actually existing common boundary so as to maintain tranquillity on the border and amity between the two countries? Long before it agreed with the Government of Pakistan to negotiate the boundary question, the Chinese Government had repeatedly proposed, and now still proposes, to conduct negotiations with the Indian Government for the settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question. But the Indian Government has again and again turned down China's proposal, consequently the Sino-Indian boundary question remains unsettled and the situation on the Sino-Indian border becomes increasingly tense. Now the Indian Government not only refuses itself to negotiate a settlement of the boundary question with China, but object to China's negotiating a boundary settlement with Pakistan. Does it mean that the Indian Government, after creating the Sino-Indian boundary dispute, wishes to see a similar dispute arise between China and Pakistan?

3. The boundary negotiations between China and Pakistan do not at all involve the question of the ownership of Kashmir. The agreement between the Governments of China and Pakistan made it crystal clear that after the settlement of the dispute between Pakistan and India over Kashmir, the sovereign authorities concerned shall reopen negotiations with the Chinese Government on the question of the Kashmir boundary so as to conclude a formal boundary treaty to replace the provisional agreement to be signed after the Sino-Pakistan negotiations. The signing of such an agreement will only help maintain tranquility on the existing boundary between China and Pakistan, and will in no way prejudice a peaceful settlement of the Kashmir dispute between India and Pakistan. The Indian Government is wholly unjustified in objecting to boundary negotiations between China and Pakistan on the pretext of the Kashmir dispute.

4. With regard to the Kashmir dispute, it has been the consistent position of the Chinese Government to be impartial and to wish that India and Pakistan will reach a peaceful settlement. This has been and still is, the Chinese position. The Indian Government is clearly aware of this. Suffice it to point out the fact that Premier Chou En-lai declared at a press conference in Calcutta on December 9, 1956, that the Chinese Government considered the Kashmir question "an outstanding issue between India and Pakistan". Furthermore, Premier Chou En-lai, together with the late Prime Minister Bandaranaike of Ceylon, made an appeal in their joint statement issued on February 5, 1957, to India and Pakistan to strive further for a peaceful settlement of the Kashmir question. This attitude of the Chinese Government of never getting involved in the dispute over Kashmir can in no way be distorted and is well-known throughout the world.

5. The Chinese Government has always refrained from making any remarks on the historical background of the Kashmir question. Nevertheless, the Kashmir question is after all a dispute between two legal governments, those of India and of Pakistan. China has diplomatic relations with India and also with Pakistan, and India, too, has diplomatic relations with Pakistan. The Chinese Government only hopes that this dispute between India and Pakistan will be settled by them peacefully, and has always been against anyone taking advantage of it to sow discord in the relations between the two countries. So far as China is concerned, nothing would be better than a peaceful settlement of this dispute by India and Pakistan through negotiation. However, more than ten years have passed, and despite the best wishes and expectations all along cherished by China, this dispute between India and Pakistan remain unsettled. In these circumstances, anyone with common sense can understand that the Chinese Government cannot leave unsettled indefinitely its boundary of several hundred kilometres with the areas the defence of which is under the control of Pakistan merely because there is a dispute between India and Pakistan over Kashmir.
It is entirely necessary, proper, legitimate and in accordance with international practice for the Chinese Government to agree with the Government of Pakistan to negotiate a provisional agreement concerning this boundary pending a final settlement of the Kashmir question. What fault can be found with this? Yet in the note the Indian Government rudely slanders the Chinese Government's agreeing to open negotiations with Pakistan as taking advantage of the difference between India and Pakistan and committing aggression against India. But unreasonable assertions can never hold water. The fact, on the contrary, is that the Indian Government itself is seeking to make use of the boundary question to sow discord in the relations between China and Pakistan. On May 7, 1962, Prime Minister Nehru openly admitted in the Indian Parliament that "we treated the Pakistan Government in a friendly way in these matters because we thought that any action which they might take should be in line with the action we were taking in regard to this border and should not conflict". Small wonder that the Indian Government should get so excited about Sino-Pakistan negotiations. Its scheme to sow discord in the relations between China and Pakistan has failed.

6. The excitement of the Indian Government will only bring results contrary to its expectations. Anyone in the world with common sense will ask: Since the Burmese and Nepalese Governments can settle their boundary questions with China in a friendly way through negotiations and since the Government of Pakistan has also agreed with the Chinese Government to negotiate a boundary settlement, why is it that the Indian Government cannot negotiate and settle its boundary question with the Chinese Government? Such a common-sense query is indeed rather embarrassing. But it is useless to get furious with China. As in the past, the Chinese Government stands for a friendly settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question through peaceful negotiations. The Indian Government's unenviable situation on this matter is of its own making. For example the Indian Government's note says: "It is the India-China boundary which starts from the tri-junction of the boundaries of India, China and Afghanistan ....... and runs eastward up to the tri-junction of the boundaries of India, Burma and China". Pray, what kind of an assertion is that? Not only are the areas the defence of which is under the control of Pakistan negated, but even Nepal no longer exists, Sikkim no longer exists, and Bhutan no longer exists. This is out-and-out great-power chauvinism. The Indian Government should realise that it is now in the sixties of the 20th century and that the cursed era in which great powers controlled everything has gone for ever. Anyone who persists in an attitude of great-power chauvinism in international affairs will always knock his head against a stone wall.

7. The Chinese Government is deeply convinced that it is a good thing to hold boundary negotiations between China and Pakistan, which are in the interests of both friendship among Asian countries and peace in Asia. No slander of any kind can ever distort this fact. The position of the Chinese Government is not difficult for any reasonable person to understand. One who tries to make use of Sino-Pakistan negotiations to whip up anti-Chinese sentiments will only be lifting a rock to crush his own toes in the end. The Chinese Government hopes that the Indian Government will coolly think it over: Would it not be better to make some earnest effort towards a peaceful settlement of the Sino-Indian boundary question, rather than wasting its strength in such fruitless quarrel?

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 30 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Government of China's note dated 31st May, 1962, regarding Sino-Pakistan agreement "to locate and align" their "common boundary."

The Government of China have made an attempt to minimise the grave implications of the step they have taken to enter into negotiations with Pakistan for the demarcation of Indian territory, and have also brushed aside the legitimate and well-founded objections of the Government of India in this regard as "wanton slander" and "intimidation." The Government of India deplore the use of such expressions which cannot, however, lessen the Government of China's responsibility for having taken a calculated step which is bound to further aggravate tension in the area.

It has been argued by the Government of China that "they cannot indefinitely leave unsettled their boundary of several hundred kilometers with the areas the defence of which is under the control of Pakistan merely because there is a dispute between India and Pakistan over Kashmir". To justify their untenable move, the Government of China have emphasised a particular necessity which in fact does not exist. There is no boundary dispute in this sector of the Sino-Indian boundary and no urgency for a fresh settlement over it. Even in 1847, the Government of China had informed the British Government that as the boundary in this sector was sufficiently and distinctly fixed there was no need for any additional measures for refixing it. The initiative in this matter was for political reasons taken by the Government of Pakistan who had committed aggression in Kashmir. Though the Chinese Government had not responded to this initiative earlier, it is clear that they decided to do so now for possible political advantage to be obtained by exploiting the Indo-Pakistan differences in this matter.

The position stated in the preceding paragraph is confirmed by the earlier Chinese attempts to exploit Indo-Pakistan differences. On 23rd May, 1959, the Chinese Ambassador in New Delhi had mentioned to the Indian Foreign Secretary that India could not afford to have "two fronts" against her. Now the Government of China have brought the "two fronts" together against India to further the territorial ambitions of Pakistan and China.

It is patent that the Government of China have now taken a new stand on the legal status of Kashmir. Hitherto, while not formally declaring their official stand on the status of Kashmir, they had, perhaps with mental reservations of their own, given the impression on a number of occasions that they had, by and large, accepted India's basic position in Kashmir. At other times, they had declared themselves against any third party interference in the situation created by Pakistan’s aggression in Kashmir.

108

On March 16, 1956, Premier Chou En-lai told the Indian Ambassador in Peking that “the people of Kashmir have already expressed their will”. Again on 16th July 1961, at the talks between Premier Chou En-lai and the Secretary-General of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs, Premier Chou En-lai stated that “Pakistan had formally proposed border talks” but emphasised that the Chinese Government “have not discussed with them anything so far”. In the same discussions, Premier Chou En-lai went on to ask the Secretary-General, “Can you cite any document to show that we have ever said that Kashmir is not a part of India?” Now this position has been reversed. The Chinese note under reply asks, “Can you cite any document to show that we have ever said that Kashmir is a part of India?”

The issue in Kashmir is one of Pakistan's aggression, and there is no room in this for any third party intervention. That, as the Chinese note states, had been acknowledged in the Chinese Premier’s press conference in Calcutta on 9th December 1956 and in the joint statement of Premier Chou En-lai and the late Prime Minister of Ceylon Mr. Bandarnaike of 5th February 1957. At a press conference in Karachi on December 24, 1956, Premier Chou En-lai correctly observed “I hope Pakistan and India will settle this question directly between themselves”. The advice given by Premier Chou En-lai in his various statements refer to the situation created by Pakistan’s aggression in Kashmir and do not question India’s sovereignty based on the State’s accession to India. Again, in the joint statement issued by Premier Chou En-lai and Prime Minister Cyrankiwicz of Poland in Peking on April 11, 1957, it was stated that the Kashmir question “should be settled by the countries concerned through peacefull negotiations and should not be allowed to be made use of by external forces to create new tensions.”

The entire evidence cited above supports the view that, until recently, the Chinese Government had declared themselves in favour of the question of Pakistan's aggression in Kashmir being settled peacefully, and against any third party taking advantage of it. However, this stand of the Government of China has changed and a new situation now created by the Sino-Pakistan agreement to demarcate their non-existent common border. In departing from their earlier policy of non-interference in the Kashmir situation the Government of China are giving legal and moral encouragement to an aggressor State and prejudicing the prospects of a peaceful settlement of the Kashmir issue between India and Pakistan.

There is an out of context reference in the Chinese note to a statement made by the Indian Prime Minister about certain exchange of information between India and Pakistan in regard to the border. This step was essential to safeguard India's territorial integrity. The Chinese note has also referred to the Sino-Indian boundary question and has drawn attention to the settlements which the Government of China have reached with Nepal and Burma. It is known that these are common principles which are the basis of the international frontiers of Burma, Nepal and India but this fact has been consistently ignored by the Government of China. If the same terms are applied in the case of India, there should be no boundary dispute between India and China.

India has not laid any claims to Chinese territory; nor has she exercised diverse pressures to force these claims on China. It is the Government of China who have used force and diverse other pressures and unlawfully occupied 12,000 square miles of Indian territory since 1957.

Only the Government of China’s persistent efforts at misrepresentation of facts can explain their deliberate misreading of the description of the India-China boundary given in the Government of India’s note of 10th May 1962. This description was not a complete description of the border but only gave two terminal points to show that Pakistan and the People’s Republic of China have no common border, whether in the West or in the East. Government of India regret that this limited description has been deliberately and mischievously twisted by the Chinese authorities in an attempt to cause damage to the existing friendly relations between India and Nepal, Bhutan and Sikkim.

The Government of India on their part not only respect the independence and sovereignty of Nepal but are interested in seeing Nepal grow from strength to strength. They have full faith in their relations with Nepal, and have no doubt that their age-old fraternal ties with the Kingdom of Nepal will stand the test of time.

The Government of India have special treaty relation with Bhutan and have, at the request of the Government of Bhutan, taken up at various times with the Government of China such matters as Chinese cartographic aggression on Bhutan, protection of Bhutan’s right and interests in Tibet and violation of Bhutan’s air space by Chinese aircraft. There can be no question but that, in co-operation with the Government of Bhutan, the Government of India are bound to ensure the protection and inviolability of the territory of Bhutan.

The Government of India’s position in relation to Sikkim is clear. The Government of India are responsible for the defence and external relations of Sikkim and no foreign power has any right to interfere in Sikkim.

The Government of India, while rejecting the Government of China’s note under reference, would again reiterate that any change, provisional or otherwise, in the status of the State of Jammu and Kashmir brought about by third parties which seeks to submit certain parts of Indian territory to foreign jurisdiction will not be binding on the Government of India.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 7 October 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the continued intrusions into China's air space by Indian aircraft, has the honour to state as follows:

(1) About 11:25 hours on the morning of August 8, 1961 an Indian airplane intruded into China's air space over Spanggur (approximately 33° 36' N, 78° 49' E) in Tibet, China.

(2) About 9:40 hours on the morning of August 9 and about 9:50 hours on the morning of August 14, 1961, each time one Indian airplane intruded into China's air space over Height 6,181 metres (approximately 35° 07' N, 78° 11' E) and Height 5,651 metres (approximately 35° 20' N, 78° 04' E) in Sinkiang, China. The one which flew in on August 9 circled over the said places as long as 30 minutes.

(3) About 10:00 and 10:40 hours on the morning of August 14, 1961, each time one Indian airplane intruded into China's air space over a place (approximately 34° 13' N, 79° 07' E) east of Kongka Pass in Tibet, China. The former circled at a low altitude for about 5 minutes and the latter for about 10 minutes.

(4) About 9:00 hours on the morning of August 26, 1961, an Indian airplane penetrated deep into China's air space over a place east of Lake Spanggur in China's Tibet region and then flew at a low altitude along the same Lake back to India.

(5) From September 11 to 25, 1961, Indian airplanes intruded into China's air space over the above-mentioned Height 5,651 metres in Sinkiang, China, for 10 sorties as follows: 12:18 hours at noon on September 11, one airplane; about 10:00 hours on the morning of September 12, two airplanes; about 11:20 hours on the morning of September 13, three airplanes; 10:12 hours on the morning of September 14, one airplane; about 10:00 and 11:10 hours on the morning of September 22, one airplane each time; and about 10:25 hours on the morning of September, one airplane. Each of these aircraft circled at least 20 minutes over the said place. The two airplanes which flew in on September 12 circled over there as long as 40 minutes.

(6) From September 23 to 25, 1961, Indian airplanes intruded into China's air space over the area around 35° 18' N, 78° 09' E in Sinkiang, China, for four sorties, one each, as follows. About 10:20 hours on the morning of September 23, about 10:05 and 10:30 hours on the morning of September 24; and about 10:00 hours on the morning of September
25. Each of these aircraft circled about 20 minutes over the said place.

Since recently, Indian aircraft have time and again violated China’s air space, thus creating new tension in the China-India border areas. Although the Chinese Government has made repeated representations, such Indian intrusions, instead of coming to an end or decreasing, have obviously been on the increase. In the period of one month and more since August 8, Indian airplanes have intruded into China’s air space for at least 20 sorties. What is particularly most disturbing is that these Indian aircraft time and again circled for a long time at a low altitude over the Chinese border areas where Chinese frontier guards were stationed. The Chinese Government lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government against these deliberate provocations by the Indian side and demand once again that the Indian Government should take effective measures at an early date against the recurrence of such intrusions into China’s air space by Indian aircraft.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its high consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to incidents of Indian aircraft encroaching on China's territorial air, has the honour to state as follows:

(1) On October 4, 1961, about 12:00 hours at noon, an Indian airplane intruded into the air space over the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, China, and circled around the area of Lanak La (approximately 54° 23' N, 79° 32' E), Howeitan (approximately 34° 58' N, 78° 36' E) and Chipchap La (approximately 35° 19' N, 78° 25' E) for as long as one and a half hours.

(2) About 5:50 hours in the afternoon of the same day, an Indian airplane intruded into the air space over the area of Nischu (approximately 34° 37' N, 79° 06' E) in the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, China, and then circled as long as about 35 minutes over the area between Nischu and Howeitan.

The Chinese Government has noted that the Indian side, in disregard of the Chinese Government's repeated protests against Indian aircraft encroaching on China's territorial air, has again sent its aircraft to penetrate deep into China's territorial air and circle for an unusually long time over several thousand square kilometres of Chinese territory. Against these acts of deliberate provocation and tension-creating by Indian aircraft, the Chinese Government hereby lodges a strong protest with the Indian Government and demands that it immediately adopt effective measures to prevent the recurrence of incidents of Indian aircraft encroaching on China's territorial air.

The Ministry avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.

108
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 4 December 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs presents their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India, and with reference to note dated October 7, 1961, handed over by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China to the Indian Embassy in Peking, have the honour to state that the Government of India after due verification is in a position to state that there has been no violation of Chinese air space by Indian aircraft as alleged in the Note.

2. It has been noted that of the places mentioned in the Chinese Note all but one are in Indian territory now under unlawful Chinese occupation.

3. The Government of India does not accept the Chinese Government's right to be present in these places which lawfully belong to and form part of the territories of the Indian Union.

4. In the interests of peace and international amity the Chinese Government may wish to consider the immediate withdrawal of its forces from Indian territories to Chinese territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 9 December 1961

The Ministry of External Affairs presents their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the note dated 2nd November 1961 handed over to the Indian Charge d'Affaires in Peking about alleged intrusions into Chinese air space have the honour to state as follows:—

(1) An enquiry into the specific instances of air space violation mentioned in the Chinese note has established that no Indian aircraft flew, as alleged, on October 4, 1961, at noon and at about 5:50 hours in the afternoon over Lanak La, Howeitan, Chip Chap La and Nischu.

(2) However, in recent months the Chinese Government has been sending note after note about alleged intrusions by Indian aircraft into "Chinese air space". There would be no occasion for such allegations had the Chinese Government not entertained an exaggerated notion of its territorial limits. As in the past it transpires that all the places mentioned in the present Chinese note are well within Indian territory. If Indian aircraft had flown over these places, which are inalienable parts of Indian territory, there would be no violation of any foreign air space. This effort to legitimise unlawful Chinese occupation of Indian territory by charging India with sending aircraft deep into 'Chinese air space' is fictitious in fact as well as law. In the interests of peace and international amity the Chinese Government should withdraw its forces from Indian territory and vacate its aggression on India.

(3) The Government of India rejects the Chinese note of 2nd November 1961 which is baseless.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows:—

The Chinese Government points out with great regret that the Indian Government, in disregard of the previous protests by the Chinese Government, not only failed to take measures to prevent the recurrence of intrusions into China’s air space by Indian aircraft, but has of late stepped up the dispatch of aircraft for continued intrusions into China’s air space, numbering 49 sorties in the two months alone from October 6 to December 5, 1961. What is particularly serious is that on many occasions Indian aircraft penetrated deep into the air space over Chinese territory and flagrantly circled and reconnoitred over it for long periods, sometimes as long as an hour. Following are the facts of the intrusions of Indian aircraft in 49 sorties into China’s air space in the above-mentioned two months:

(1) At 10:05 hours October 6, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Sama (approximately 28° 22’ N, 97° 03’ E) in Tibet, China, circling about 20 minutes.

(2) At 15:00 hours October 7 and 14:20 hours October 11, 1961, respectively, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Spanggur area in Tibet, China.

(3) At 13:30 hours October 18, 1961, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over the area around Tashi-gong (approximately 32° 32’ N, 79° 41’ E) in Tibet, China.

(4) At 13:30 hours October 19 and 16:00 hours October 20, 1961, respectively, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Chiakang (approximately 32° 54’ N, 79° 37’ E) in Tibet, China.

(5) At 12:40 hours October 20, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over China’s Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, circling about an hour over the area between Howeitan (approximately 34° 58’ N, 78° 36’ E) and Qizil-jilga.

(6) At 16:00 hours, October 20 and 12:40 and 16:20 hours October 22, 1961, respectively, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the area between Howeitan and the upper reaches of the Chipchap River, in China’s Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region. The aircraft which intruded on October 20 circled about an hour and the one which intruded at 16:20 hours October 22 circled for more than 40 minutes.

(7) At 16:45 hours October 20, 1961, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Ngolo (approximately 32° 35’ N, 79° 36’ E) in Tibet, China.

111
(8) At 14:00 hours October 23, 1961, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over the area around Shingzhang (approximately 33° 32' N, 79° 01' E) in Tibet, China.

(9) At 14:15 hours November 1, 12:14 hours November 3, 12:50 hours November 4 and 13:00 hours November 5, 1961, respectively, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the area of the Spanggur Lake.

(10) At 15:00 hours November 1, 13:15 hours November 2, 14:25 hours November 3, 12:50 hours November 5 and 14:10 hours November 18, 1961, respectively, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the area around Howetan in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region. The aircraft which intruded on November 5 circled for 30 minutes and the one which intruded on November 3 circled for one hour and 50 minutes.

(11) Between November 3 and 18, 1961, Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the area (approximately 35° 22' N, 78° 04' E) north of Height 5651 metres beside the Chipchap River in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region in 7 sorties, i.e., one at 10:45 hours November 3, 10:40 hours November 4, 10:40 hours November 6, 10:30 hours November 7, 11:17 hours November 9, 11:02 hours November 11 and 11:15 hours November 18 respectively. These Indian aircraft all circled repeatedly over the said place.

(12) At 14:10 hours and 15:25 hours November 3 and 13:20 hours November 5, 1961, respectively, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space and circled over the upper reaches of the Chipchap River in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, the one which intruded at 15:25 hours November 3 circling about an hour.

(13) At 14:49 hours November 3, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the upper reaches of the Chipchap river and the area around 35° 26' N, 78° 09' E in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, circling about 16 minutes.

(14) At 14:20 hours November 3, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space and circled repeatedly over the area approximately 35° 36' N, 77° 57' E, northeast of the Karakoram Pass in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region.

(15) At 13:15 hours November 5, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Hot Springs (approximately 34° 25' N, 78° 55' E) in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region.

(16) At 13:20 hours November 6, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the area (approximately 33° 44' N, 79° 01' E) south of the Khurnak Fort in Tibet, China.
(17) At 13:18 hours November 6, 1961, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over the eastern extremity (approximately 33° 31' N, 79° 30' E) of Pangong Mountain in Tibet, China.

(18) At 14:00 hours November 6, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the Tashigong area in Tibet, China.

(19) At 10:48 hours November 20 and 10:25 hours November 25, 1961, respectively, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the area around the Spanggur Lake in Tibet, China.

(20) At 12:05 hours November 29, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Tashigong in Tibet, China.

(21) At 13:17 hours December 2, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Howeitan in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region. At 14:00 hours December 4, two Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the same place, one of which circling there about an hour.

(22) At 13:40 hours and 13:45 hours respectively on December 3, 1961, an Indian Aircraft intruded into the air space over the area between the upper reaches of the Chipchap River and the Chipchap La in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, and circled there about 50 minutes.

(23) At 14:10 hours December 4, 1961, two Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the area among Hot Springs (approximately 34° 25' N, 78° 55' E) the point approximately 34° 21' N, 79° 06' E and Nischu (approximately 34° 37' N, 79° 06' E) in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region and Tibet Region, circling about 30 minutes.

(24) At 15:00 hours December 5, 1961, two Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Nischu in China's Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region.

The fact that Indian aircraft so frequently intruded into China's territorial air cannot but be regarded as planned provocation against China and an attempt to create tension. The Chinese Government strongly protests against this, and once again asks the Indian Government immediately to stop dispatching its aircraft for further intrusions into China's air space, otherwise the Indian Government must bear responsibility for any consequences that may arise therefrom.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances to its highest consideration.

Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 24 January, 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows:—

On January 14, 1962, at 12-15 hours, an Indian airplane bearing the marking of “BK 505” flying from the direction of the Indian post at Dauletbeg Oldi intruded into the air-space over the Chinese post at 35° 19’ N, 78° 12’ E in the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, China, and made repeated reconnaissance circlings at an altitude as low as about 200 metres from the ground for about 15 minutes and dropped scores of stuffed gunnies and wooden cases on the Chinese post. In its note of November 30, 1961, the Chinese Government already made an explicit reply to the Indian Government that China had a post at the above-mentioned place. It is obviously a deliberate encroachment on the Chinese territorial air and territory and a provocation that the Indian Government should have now gone so far as to send its aircraft to intrude into the air space over the said place for reconnaissance and air-dropping. The Chinese Government hereby lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government against this and demands that the Indian Government take effective measures at once to ensure against the recurrence of similar incidents in the future.

In its previous notes, the Chinese Government has already cited more than once large amounts of facts of repeated encroachments on China’s territorial air and reconnaissance and provocative activities carried out by Indian aircraft. The Indian Government, however has always tried its hardest to deny and quibble about it. But this time the Indian air-dropping of a large quantity of material into Chinese territory has once again thoroughly refuted the denials and quibbles of the Indian side and testified to the conclusive truth of the Chinese Government’s charges. The Chinese Government must also point out emphatically that the Indian side is certainly mistaken if it thinks it can benefit by unscrupulous provocations against Chinese posts.

In the consistent spirit of valuing Sino-Indian friendship, the Chinese Government is willing, given true assurance against the recurrence of such intrusions from the Indian Government, to consider letting the Indian side take back the material illegally air-dropped into Chinese territory. The procedures for the taking-back can be arranged through diplomatic channels. The Chinese Government requests an early reply from the Indian Government.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 25 January, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India, and have the honour to state that there has been yet another violation of India’s air space by Chinese aircraft. On January 6, 1962, at about 9:45 A.M. Indian standard time, a Chinese aircraft flew over Sherathang (approximately 2,722 North, 8,850 East) in Sikkim for about five minutes.

The Government of India protest against this renewed violation of Indian airspace by Chinese aircraft, and urge upon the Chinese Government to adopt measures to stop similar violations of Indian airspace which could have grave consequences.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 22 February, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in New Delhi, and with reference to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs note given to India's Charge d'Affaires in Peking on 24th January 1962, regarding the dropping of supplies at the wrong location, have the honour to state that the facts about the incident are as follows:

2. On 14th January 1962, an Indian aircraft bearing number "BK 505" went on a supply dropping mission to the Indian outpost at the track junction seven miles south south-east of Dauletbeg Oldi. The aircraft arrived in the area of the outpost approximately at 09-50 hours IST. The pilot of the aircraft spotted some tents and dropped the supplies.

3. Enquiries made since the receipt of the Chinese note of 24th January have elicited the information that the aircraft drifted 3-4 miles east of the track junction outpost due to a westerly wind. The airdrop occurred at the wrong location because the pilot mistook a Chinese patrol camp 12 miles further forward from the Chinese post set up on Indian territory at MR 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E on the Chip Chap river in September 1961, in regard to which Government of India has already entered a strong protest with the Chinese Government (vide Ministry of External Affairs' Note dated 31st October, 1961) to be the Indian outpost at the track junction seven miles south-east of Dauletbeg Oldi.

4. It is a matter of deep regret to the Government of India that the Chinese Government has been sending out advance patrols further inside Indian territory so soon after renewing the assurance that Chinese forces on the Sino-Indian border have been strictly enjoined to maintain the status quo. The Chinese Government's statement which claims that the supplies in question were dropped on the Chinese post on the Chip Chap river which is 12 miles east of the location where the supplies were actually dropped, in order to make out an untenable case of air space violation against the Government of India, is factually incorrect.

5. In the light of the facts stated above, the Government of India urges the Chinese Government to issue strict instructions to maintain the status quo and to direct that no patrols should be sent out to make further inroads into Indian territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 7 March, 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China, and, with reference to the note of the Ministry of External Affairs of the Indian Government dated January 25, 1962, has the honour to state as follows:

With regard to the Indian Government's charge made in the note that a Chinese aircraft flew over Sherathang, Sikkim on January 6, 1962, it has been established through detailed investigation conducted by the Chinese Government that no Chinese aircraft has entered the territorial air of Sikkim. The Chinese Government has repeatedly stated that no Chinese aircraft has ever violated the territorial air of other countries, but the Indian Government has now once again made groundless charges in disregard of the facts. The Chinese Government cannot but express its surprise and regret at this and reject the Indian Government's protest.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 9 March 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to draw the latter's attention to the fresh violations of Indian air space by Chinese aircraft on the 11th January 1962. At 08-30 hours IST a Chinese aircraft painted white flew over Spiti (3205 N 7845 E) which is 5 miles inside Indian territory. The same day Chinese aircraft were detected flying over Chini (3130 N 7815 E) and Jangi (3137 N 7825 E) between 7-30 and 7-40 a.m. and 8-30 and 8-35 a.m. IST 15 miles and 30 miles respectively inside Indian territory. These fresh violations of Indian territorial air space so soon after the violation of Indian air space referred to in the Indian Government's note of the 25th January 1962, constitute grave provocation.

The Government of India protests against these violations and urge the Chinese Government to take necessary measures to stop such violations of Indian air space in future.

The Ministry of External Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 10 March, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Ministry's note dated 9th March, 1962 regarding fresh violations of Indian air space by Chinese aircraft has the honour to state that Chinese aircraft was detected flying over Chini (3130 N 7815 E) between 07-30 and 08-35 IST on 12th January, 1962. The details of the other Indian air space violations by Chinese aircraft are the same as in the Ministry's earlier note.

The Ministry of External Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 20 March, 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, in regard to the serious cases of violation of China's air space by Indian aircraft on 37 sorties from December 4, 1961 to the end of February 1962, has the honour to state as follows:—

(1) At 09·58 hours December 4, 1961, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Digra (approximately 33° 33' N, 78° 50' E) in Tibet, China.

(2) At 14·40 hours December 5, 1961 two Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Shingzhang (approximately 33° 32' N, 79° 01' E) in Tibet, China.

(3) At 15·09 hours December 15, 1961, 10·17 hours February 2 and 17·10 hours February 26, 1962 respectively, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Chiakang (approximately 32° 54' N, 70° 37' E) in Tibet, China. The Indian aircraft which intruded on February 2, 1962 even penetrated into the air space over the area near Kiagang (approximately 32° 55' N, 79° 47' E).

(4) At 15·25 hours January 2 and 13·30 hours January 7, 1962 respectively, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space and circled over the area near Toling (approximately 31° 29' N, 79° 48' E) in Tibet, China. The Indian aircraft which intruded on January 7 further dived down to scare the local people.

(5) At 17·40 hours January 2, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space and circled over Parkha (approximately 30° 52' N, 81° 18' E) in Tibet, China.

(6) From January 2 to February 5, 1962, Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Rudok (approximately 33° 27' N, 79° 42' E) and its adjacent areas in Tibet, China on eight sorties, one at each of the following times: 17·15 hours January 2, 14·00 hours January 16, 13·44 hours January 28, 16·20 hours January 29, 10·25 hours January 30, 16·37 hours January 31, 11·22 hours February 3, and 16·20 hours February 5.

(7) At 19·10 hours January 6, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space and circled over Gyanima (approximately 30° 49' N, 80° 46' E) in Tibet, China.

(8) From January 16 to February 28, 1962, Indian aircraft intruded into the air space and repeatedly circled at low altitude over the area of Height 5,651 metres (approximately 35° 20' N, 78° 04' E) on the Chipchhap River in Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, China, on eight sorties, one aircraft at each of the following times: 14·10 hours January 16, 11·40 hours January 24, 11·20 hours February 19 and 11·20 hours February 28, and two aircrafts at 11·30 hours February 12 and 11·12 hours February 21 respectively.

(9) At 13·50 hours January 28, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the area of Chang Pass (approximately 33° 01’ N, 79° 22’ E) and Tashigong (approximately 12° 32’ N, 79° 41’ E) in Tibet, China.

(10) At 10·00 hours February 1, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over the area of Gunsa (approximately 32° 11’ N, 79° 59’ E) in Tibet, China.

(11) At 09·32 hours February 2, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Aunglajui Lake to the northeast of Rudok in Tibet, China.

(12) At 10·00 hours February 2, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Tsaperang (approximately 31° 28’ N, 79° 40’ E) in Tibet, China.

(13) At 11·32 hours February 3 and 11·41 hours February 6, 1962 respectively, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Chilong (approximately 33° 24’ N, 79° 33’ E) in Tibet, China.

(14) At 16·50 hours February 7, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space and circled over Height 5,200 metres approximately 33° 59’ N, 78° 53’ E) near Nyagzu in Tibet, China.

(15) At 17·55 hours February 7, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Kota village (approximately 34° 29’ N, 78° 53’ E) in the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, China.

(16) At 13·20 and 15·06 hours February 13, 1962 respectively, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the Chinese post (approximately 35° 19’ N, 78° 12’ E) and its vicinity in the Sinkiang Uighur Autonomous Region, China.

(17) At 16·24 hours February 14, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Tashigong and Bongru Pass (approximately 32° 26’ N, 79° 33’ E) in Tibet, China.

The aforesaid cases show that since last December intrusions by Indian aircraft into China’s air space over Sinkiang and Ari, Tibet, have become more serious than ever before. Of the above-mentioned 37 sorties of Indian aircraft intrusions, 24 sorties have exceeded the alignment unilaterally claimed by India, and some even intruded into the air space over Rudok, Gunsa, Toling, Gyanima and Parkha, which are all towns well within Ari in Tibet, China. The Chinese Government hereby lodges a strong protest with the Indian Government against such deliberate Indian provocations in disregard of China's sovereignty and in serious violation of China's air space, and demands that the Indian Government immediately stop such illegal actions.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself to this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 20 March, 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note of the Ministry of External Affairs of the Indian Government dated March 9, 1962, has the honour to state as follows:—

With regard to the charge made in the Indian Government's note that Chinese aircraft had flown over Spiti, Chini and Jangi, it has been established through close investigation conducted by the Chinese Government that no such incidents as alleged have ever occurred.

The Chinese Government has more than once stated that China absolutely does not allow its aircraft to violate the territorial air of any other country, and that in case the Indian Government should discover any unidentified aircraft in the air space over its border areas, it is fully entitled to deal with them on its own. The Chinese Government has notified the Indian and Burmese Governments respectively that there are at times aircraft of the United States of America and the Chiang Kai-shek clique engaged in illegal activities over the Sino-Indian and Sino-Burmese borders, and expressed the hope that China, India and Burma would maintain common vigilance. Facts have proved that the Chinese Government is correct. The Burmese side has shot down an aircraft of the Chiang Kai-shek clique within the Burmese border, a fact which was testified to by Prime Minister Nehru himself in his speech before the Indian Rajya Sabha on December 11, 1961. Nevertheless, the Indian Government refused to accept the statement of the Chinese Government and repeatedly made groundless charges against the Chinese Government. The Chinese Government cannot but express deep regret at this. The Chinese Government states once again that the Indian Government is fully entitled to deal with any unidentified aircraft discovered in Indian air space without having to make any enquiries of the Chinese Government.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 24 March, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to state as follows:

On 27th November 1961 at 08:30 hours a Chinese jet aircraft flew over Thimphu, Bhutan. Similar violations of the air space over Bhutan had occurred on the 24th and 25th November 1961 when Chinese aircraft flew over Paro. The aircraft in question were observed approaching from a North-East direction. The Government of India, on behalf of the Government of Bhutan, hereby lodge a protest against these violations of Bhutan's air space by Chinese aircraft and urge the Chinese Government to take all necessary measures to avoid similar violations in future, which could have serious consequences.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 4 April, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Note dated 7-3-1962 of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China, has the honour to state as follows:

The Ministry of External Affairs' protest note dated 25th January, 1962 in regard to a fresh violation of India's air space by Chinese aircraft over Sherathang (2722' N—8850' E) on January 6, 1962, at about 9-45 A.M. IST, was lodged after a full verification of the facts.
It is a fact that the aircraft immediately after committing the aforesaid air space violation flew back into the Tibet region of China from whence it came.

The Government of India regret that in the face of facts the Government of China in their note under reference have disowned responsibility for the air space violation. Considering the seriousness of the matter, the Government of India would again request the Government of China to take necessary measures to prevent similar violations of Indian air space in future.

The Ministry of External Affairs renews to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 17 April, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the note dated 14th March 1962 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China.

All the facts concerning the dropping of supplies at the wrong location on 14th January 1962, have been stated in the Ministry of External Affairs Note of 22nd February 1962. The facts do not warrant the Chinese Government's contention that the air drop took place over the Chinese post at MR 35° 19' N 78° 12' E. The air drop of the 14th January 1962 had taken place a full 12 miles away from the illegal Chinese post set up on Indian territory referred to above, and the supplies dropped had been intended for the regular Indian outpost situated at the track junction 7 miles south south-east of Dauletbeg Oldi.

There is no doubt that on the day of the supply dropping mission, that is, on the 14th January 1962, a Chinese patrol had pitched tents some 3 to 4 miles east of the Indian track junction outpost, violating the status quo and committing fresh intrusion into Indian territory. In this context it is far fetched to suggest that the supplies had been dropped over the Chinese post at MR 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E, the existence of which is known to the Government of India and which had also formed the subject matter of the Ministry of External Affairs note dated 31st October 1961. In the light of these known facts, it is surprising that the Chinese Government should insist that it was "precisely at the Chinese post that the Indian aircraft made the air dropping". This view is neither consistent with fact nor with logic, for surely it is not the intention of Indian air-drop missions to supply Chinese posts illegally set up on Indian soil.

The Chinese Government's charge that India "has repeatedly taken unilateral action to disrupt the status quo" is a travesty of the truth and an obvious attempt to confuse the actual situation on the border. It is the Government of China who have been guilty of systematic and continuous aggression into Indian territory and it is they who have sought to justify unlawful occupation by unwarranted territorial claims as the evidence cited in the Ministry of External Affairs note dated 26th February 1962 has established.

In rejecting the contention of the Government of the People's Republic of China, the Government of India would once more urge that Chinese forces on the Sino-Indian border be strictly enjoined to maintain the status quo and to desist from attempting further inroads into Indian territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 19 April 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to acknowledge the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs' Note dated 20th March 1962, regarding alleged violations of China's air space by Indian aircraft.

It is remarkable that many of these alleged air space violations relate to the air space over Indian territory under unlawful Chinese occupation as has indeed been admitted in the Chinese note itself. Any protest from the Government of China on this account is, therefore, improper.

The Government of India are, however, after full investigation into all the cases of alleged violations of Chinese air space, satisfied that no Indian aircraft had been involved in any of these alleged cases. As the Government of China are well aware, there are strict instructions against Indian aircraft entering Chinese air space.

The Government of India regret that the Government of China are still persisting with these unfounded allegations about violations of Chinese air space by Indian aircraft which are not conducive to peace and friendship between the two countries.

The Ministry of External Affairs renews to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 23 April 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China, and with reference to the latter's note dated 20th March, 1962, have the honour to state as follows:

The Government of India are reassured to learn that the Chinese Government "absolutely does not allow its aircraft to violate the territorial air space of any other country". However, the facts relating to violations of Indian air space over Spiti, Chini and Jangi had been communicated to the Chinese Government after full verification had been carried out. The Government of India would request the Government of the People’s Republic of China to issue once again necessary instructions in this regard to the concerned authorities so as to avoid similar occurrences in future.

In this connection the Chinese Government have suggested that the aircraft concerned could well belong to the United States of America or other third parties such as Taiwan. But there would appear to be little evidence to support this view, particularly as all the three air space violations specified relate to the western half of India's border.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of the opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 17 May 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China, and, with reference to the note of the Ministry of External Affairs of the Indian Government dated April 17, 1962, has the honour to state as follows:

Regarding the intrusion of an Indian aircraft into the air space over a Chinese frontier post in Sinkiang, China, for air-dropping on January 14, the Chinese Government has, in its notes of January 24 and March 14, brought forward indisputable facts which established the case conclusively. In its two reply notes, the Indian Government, while admitting the air-drop by Indian aircraft, wilfully insisted that the air-drop took place 12 miles away from the Chinese post and arbitrarily asserted that there had been Chinese patrol tents there. This is indeed very poor quibbling. As the Chinese Government already pointed out, since the place where the Indian Government alleged the air-drop was made was, as claimed by Prime Minister Nehru, precisely where an Indian post was located, there naturally could not be any Chinese "patrol camp" or tents there. The Indian Government had no other recourse but to leave this obvious flaw unmentioned in its reply note.

As for the false countercharges lodged by India that China has disrupted the status quo of the boundary and has been "guilty of systematic and continuous aggression into Indian territory", they are completely untenable. Facts are precisely to the contrary. As admitted in its note of April 17, the Indian Government has been clearly aware that China has a post at 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E. However, of late, the Indian Government has again sent its troops and aircraft to intrude into that area; the Indian troops have even set up aggressive posts around the said Chinese post, pressed on it and perpetrated provocations. It has now become crystal clear that the unlawful air-drop of January 14 is not only an act of flagrant contempt for China's sovereignty over its territorial air and a provocation against the Chinese posts, but also an action in direct coordination with the encroaching activities of India on the ground. The Chinese Government hereby once more solemnly and sternly urges the Indian Government to stop immediately all its intrusions into China's territory and territorial air.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.

131
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 21 May 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the Indian Government's notes of April 4 and 23, 1962, has the honour to state as follows:

In its notes, the Indian Government, completely ignoring the clear and definite answer provided in the Chinese Government's notes of March 7 and 20, 1962, continued to insist on its fabricated charge that Chinese aircraft had flown into the air space over Sikkim and India.
The Chinese Government hereby once again categorically rejects the Indian charge.

The Chinese Government has always firmly held that, pending a settlement of the boundary question, the status quo of the Sino-Indian boundary should be maintained by both China and India. The Chinese Government has also on many occasions stated that China absolutely would not allow its aircraft to violate the territorial air of any other country. And in fact, no Chinese aircraft has ever violated the territorial air of any other country. The slanders repeatedly made in disregard of the facts by the Indian Government that Chinese aircraft had flown across the border and that China had violated the status quo of the Sino-Indian boundary are obviously intended for camouflaging the stepped-up activities of Indian personnel and aircraft in violating Chinese territory and territorial air.

Moreover, the Indian Government, in an attempt to sow discord between China and Bhutan, made a groundless charge in its note of March 24, 1962, that Chinese aircraft had violated Bhutan's territorial air. The Chinese Government expresses its regret at this. As a matter of fact, there does not exist at all the question of violation or threat on the part of China in regard to Bhutan's territory and territorial air. The repetition of such slanders can only be regarded as representing ulterior motives.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 31 May 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state as follows:

1. Of late, Indian aircraft have continued to intrude into China's air space and within the fifty-six days from March 6 to April 30, 1962, counting only those which have been verified, another sixty-seven sorties took place, raising the frequency of intrusions to an unprecedented height. (See annex for the list of intrusions). The Chinese Government hereby once again lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government against this.

2. The intrusions of Indian aircraft took place all over the eastern, middle and western sectors of the Sino-Indian border, with the intrusions into China's air space over the western sector the most serious. It is obvious that such intrusions by Indian aircraft were made it direct co-ordination with the setting up of new military strong points on Chinese territory and other recent Indian activities of intrusion and provocation on the ground. Many of these intruding Indian aircraft repeatedly circled and carried out reconnaissance over Chinese territory and especially over Chinese posts, some even circling for as long as one hour. Of these, planes in twelve sorties even went beyond the boundary line unilaterally claimed by India and flew over Gyanima, Chilong, Risung and other places which are well inside the Ari district of Tibet, China.

3. In its notes of March 10 and April 19, the Indian Government tried to deny the established facts of the repeated intrusions of Indian aircraft into China's air space from last October to February as previously cited by the Chinese Government. This attempt is completely futile. It claimed in one of the two notes that 'there are strict instructions against Indian aircraft entering Chinese air space.' However, it can be seen from facts listed in the annex that the aforesaid assurance of the Indian Government is not a genuine one. Moreover, the extent of intrusions by Indian aircraft into China's air space has far exceeded the area for which India has groundlessly laid territorial claims on China, and extended to many towns well inside the Ari district of Tibet, China.

4. No arbitrary arguments or distortions by the Indian Government will help it shake off its responsibility for aggravating the tension on the border. The Chinese Government once again demands that the Indian Government immediately stop its intrusions into China's air space.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Annex

Cases of Intrusions into China’s air space by Indian Aircraft in March and April 1962

1. Indian aircraft successively intruded into the air space over Height 5,651 metres (approximately 35° 20’ N, 78° 04’ E) in Sinkiang, China, to tallying 31 sorties; some of them circled repeatedly at a low altitude over that Height. The specific dates and times of the intrusions are as follows:—

March 6, 1962, at 10.15 hours March 6, 1962, at 14.45 hours.
March 14, 1962, at 12.57 hours March 14, 1962, at 14.15 hours.
March 18, 1962, at 10.40 hours March 23, 1962, at 13.00 hours.
March 24, 1962, at 10.00 hours March 25, 1962, at 10.00 hours.
March 28, 1962 at 9.44 hours March 30, 1962, at 10.00 hours.
April 14, 1962, at 10.15 hours April 19, 1962, at 10.20 hours.
April 19, 1962, at 12.15 hours April 19, 1962, at 12.20 hours.
April 23 1962, at 10.15 hours April 24, 1962, at 9.35 hours.
April 28, 1962 at 9.35 hours April 28, 1962, at 10.00 hours.
April 29, 1962 at 14.58 hours April 29, 1962, at 15.05 hours.
April 29, 1962, at 13.00 hours April 29, 1962, at 13.07 hours.
April 29, 1962, at 14.58 hours April 29, 1962, at 15.05 hours.
April 30, 1962, at 13.10 hours.

2. Indian aircraft intruded into the air space and circled over Howeitan (approximately 34° 58’ N, 78° 36’ E) in Sinkiang, China, one at each of the following dates and time: March 7, at 12.00 hours; April 20, at 13:40 hours; April 28, at 10:45 hours; April 28, at 16:10 hours; April 29, at 14:20 hours; and April 29, at 14:30 hours all in 1962.

3. At 13:05 hours, March 7, 1962, two Indian aircraft intruded into the air space and made reconnaissance over the place at approximately 33° 58’ N, 78° 54’ E in Tibet, China, and Hot Springs (approximately 34° 25’ N, 78° 55’ E) and the place at 34° 27’ N, 78° 53’ E in Sinkiang.
4. Two Indian aircraft, at 13.05 hours, March 7, 1962, and one Indian aircraft, at 7.30 hours, March 13, intruded into the air space over the region around the Spanggur Lake in Tibet, China, and the place at approximately 33° 38' N, 78° 51' E.

5. At 16.20 hours, March 2, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Tibet, China, in the area near Chang Pass (approximately 33° 01' N, 79° 22' E), the area west of Chiakang (approximately 32° 54' N, 79° 37' E) and Jara Pass (approximately 32° 47' N, 79° 33' E), and circled repeatedly over Jara Pass.

6. At 13.15 hours, March 13, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space and circled over Sama (approximately 28° 22' N, 97° 03' E) and Ladin (approximately 28° 25' N, 97° 05' E) both located in Tibet, China.

7. At 12.40 hours, March 15, and 15:01 hours, March 22, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space over Khoja (approximately 30° 13' N, 81° 13' E) and Chihtai (approximately 30° 15' N, 81° 09' E) of Tibet, China.

8. At 12.50 hours and 13.42 hours, March 15, 1962, one Indian aircraft, each respectively intruded into the air space over Toyu (approximately 30° 18' N, 81° 10' E), Renkung (approximately 30° 25' N, 81° 05' E) and the nearby areas, all located in Tibet, China.

9. At 11.00 hours, March 16, 1962 an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space and made repeated circling over Chilong (approximately 33° 24' N, 79° 33' E) and Risung (approximately 33° 02' N, 79° 51' E), both located in Tibet, China.

10. At 14.20 hours, March 22, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Gyanima (approximately 30° 49' N, 79° 51' E) and Renkung, both located in Tibet, China.

11. At 13.45 hours, March 25; and 12.10 hours, March 29, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, penetrated into the air space over Tashigong (approximately 32° 32' N, 79° 41' E) in Tibet, China, and repeatedly circled over there for reconnaissance—the former for as long as one hour and the latter 40 minutes.

12. At 14.15 hours, March 25, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Tashigong, the place at 32° 44' N, 79° 44' E) and Jara Pass, all these places being in Tibet, China, and repeatedly circled for as long as 35 minutes.

13. At 12.40 hours, March 29, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over Hot Springs, Nischu (approximately 34° 37' N, 79° 06' E) and Kota Village (approximately 34° 29' N, 78° 53' E) in Sinkiang, China, and repeatedly circled over there.

14. At 12.50 hours, March 29, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space of a place (approximately 34° 23' N, 79° 06' E) to the east of Kongka Pass in Sinkiang, China.
15. At 13.10 hours, March 29, 1962, an Indian aircraft penetrated into the air space over Chiakang and Kiagang (approximately $32^\circ 55'\ N, 79^\circ 47'\ E$) both located in Tibet, China, and circled over there.

16. At 14.50 and 15.30 hours, April 21; 10.40 hours, April 23; and 17:15 hours, April 28, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time intruded into the air space over the place at approximately $35^\circ 18'\ N, 78^\circ 54'\ E$ and its adjacent areas in Tibet, China.

17. At 10.30 hours, April 27; 16.25 and 17.05 hours, April 28, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space over Height 5,851 metres (approximately $35^\circ 17'\ N, 78^\circ 12'\ E$) Height 5,651 metres in Sinkiang, China. Moreover, the aircraft that intruded on April 27 circled repeatedly at a low altitude over Height 6,200 metres (approximately $35^\circ 14'\ N, 78^\circ 13'\ E$).

18. At 14.00 and 17.10 hours, April 28, 1962, Indian aircraft, two at each time, intruded into the air space over Hot Springs and the areas to the northeast in Sinkiang, China.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 6 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the note dated 17th May 1962 of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China.

Facts regarding the airdrop on 14th January, 1962 have been given in the Government of India's notes dated 22nd February and 17th April, 1962. There is nothing new to add to what has already been stated in these earlier notes. It is true that the airdrop in question went wide by 3 to 4 miles, and the pilot of the aircraft himself has confirmed that he dropped supplies where he spotted some tents similar to those at the Indian track-junction outpost. The error in this case was caused by a strong westerly wind on the morning of the airdrop.

The Government of India have known about the existence of the Chinese post at 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E since it was first set up in Indian territory between 1960 and 1961, and had lodged a strong protest in their note dated 31st October, 1961. The setting up of this post, deep inside Indian territory, coincided with official level talks between the two governments. This action of the Chinese authorities violated the tacit understanding that, for the duration of the talks, the two sides would keep to their actual line of control and refrain from pushing forward. Apart from this case, the Chinese authorities further violated this understanding by setting up, during the same period and immediately after two more new posts on Indian territory at Nyagzu and Dambuguru.

As to Indian posts which exist in certain parts of Ladakh, the Government of India would like to reassure the Government of China that these posts are not there for any offensive action but entirely for the defence of Indian territory.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 13 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Chinese Government's Note No. 439 dated the 21st May 1962 have the honour to state as follows:—

The Government of India have no doubt about the facts concerning the air violation over Cherathang (2722N—8850 E) on January 6, 1962 at 9.45 A.M. IST. These facts were carefully verified and confirmed before a protest was lodged with the Chinese Government. Moreover it is undeniable that the Chinese aircraft had, after committing the aforesaid air space violation, flown back into the Tibet region of China from whence it came. The Government of India regret that faced with the truth the Government of China have disowned responsibility for this unlawful act and have resorted to baseless allegations against the Government of India. What is required is not a casual dismissal of these charges as 'slander' but the adoption of firm measures to put an immediate stop to further unlawful encroachments into Indian air space.

As to the specific instances when Chinese aircraft violated the air space over Bhutan, viz., on the 24th and 25th November 1961 over Paro and on the 27th November 1961 over Thimphu, the intruding Chinese aircraft were distinctly observed approaching from the direction of the Tibet region of China. It is no use simply denying these air intrusions.

The Government of India are surprised that their legitimate move on behalf of the Government of Bhutan to ensure the protection and inviolability of the territorial air space of Bhutan has been construed by the Government of China as an attempt to 'sow discord' in the relations between Bhutan and China. The Government of India are not aware that China has any relations with Bhutan.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 28 June 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state the following:

During the month of May 1962, the Indian Government continued to send its aircraft to intrude repeatedly into China's air space, with a total of 59 sorties verified through repeated investigations (see Appendix for facts), reaching nearly two sorties a day on average.

It can be seen from the facts listed in the Appendix that all the intrusions of Indian aircraft during the month of May were concentrated on the air space over the Chinese territory in the western sector of the Sino-Indian border. It was in coordination with the intrusions of Indian troops on the ground that the Indian aircraft made these intrusions. They made long circlings for reconnaissance over Chinese territory especially over Chinese posts, dropped supplies on a large-scale time and again to the aggressive strong points illegally set up lately by Indian troops in Sinkiang, China. Obviously, these activities were done for the purpose of facilitating long entrenchment by Indian troops on these strong points and expansion of their encroachments on Chinese territory.

The Chinese Government once again lodges a serious protest with the Indian Government against the increasingly frequent Indian aircraft intrusions and the activities deliberately intended for aggravating the tension on the border, and demands that the Indian Government immediately stop its intrusions into China's air space.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
APPENDIX

Facts of Intrusions into China’s Air Space by Indian Aircraft in May 1962.

1. At 12.30 hours, May 1; 11.50 hours, May 5; 10.10 hours, May 14; and 13.30 and 14.25 hours, May 16, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space over Height 6,200 metres (approximately 35° 14' N, 78° 13' E) and its adjacent areas in Sinkiang, China. The one that intruded on May 1 even circled over the Chinese post at 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E.

2. At 12.30 hours, May 2 and 10.00 hours, May 3, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space over the point at 35° 08' N, 78° 31' E and its adjacent areas in Sinkiang, China. The one that intruded on May 3 circled over there as long as 40 minutes.

3. Indian aircraft, totalling 11 sorties, successively intruded into the air space over Howeltan (approximately 34° 58' N, 78° 36' E) and its adjacent areas in Sinkiang, China, and made long-time circlings at a low altitude over there, some even lasting more than one hour. The specific dates and time of the intrusions are: 12.37 hours, May 2, 10.55 hours, May 5; 9.04 hours, May 9; 9.50 hours, May 10; 9.10 hours, May 13; 9.20 and 12.30 hours, May 14; 9.00 hours, May 15; 13.45 hours, May 17; 8.50 hours, May 23; and 12.45 hours, May 26, 1962.

4. Indian aircraft, totalling 18 sorties, successively intruded into the air space over Height 5,651 metres (approximately 45° 20' N, 78° 04' E) in Sinkiang, China, and some of them even repeatedly circled at a low altitude over that Height. The specific dates and time of the intrusions are: 9.15 hours, May 4 (two aircraft); 9.20, 10.17, 11.00, 11.05, 11.14 and 12.18 hours, May 8; 10.45 hours, May 11; 11.55 hours, May 14; 14.28 hours, May 15; 10.20 hours, May 17; 8.47 hours, May 21; 12.10 hours, May 23; 8.30, 10.10 and 13.00 hours, May 25; 8.36 hours, May 27, 1962.

5. At 11.20 hours, May 5 and 8.30 hours, May 9, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space over the area southeast of the point at 35° 15' N, 78° 16' E in Sinkiang, China.

6. At 9.30 hours, May 8 and 9.20 hours, May 9, 1962, Indian aircraft, two at each time, intruded into the air space over the point at 35° 16' N, 78° 08' E in Sinkiang, China and repeatedly circled over there. The two that intruded on May 8 circled as long as 50 minutes and the two on May 9 intruded, in addition, into the air space over Height 6,200 metres and repeatedly circled over there.

7. At 14.30 hours, May 8, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space of the area southwest of the Chinese post at 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E in Sinkiang, China.

8. At 9.15 hours, May 10 and 8.50 hours, May 23, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space over the Chinese post at 35° 19' N, 78° 12' E and its adjacent areas in Sinkiang, China. The one that intruded on May 10 circled at a low altitude over the Chinese post as long as 30 minutes.

9. At 11.00 hours, May 11; 12.30 hours, May 15, and 13:35 hours, May 17, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space and repeatedly circled over the point at approximately 35° 16' N, 78° 09' E in Sinkiang, China. The aircraft which intruded on May 11 and 17 even made air drops over the aggressive strong point unlawfully set up there by Indian troops. Three bales of supplies were dropped on May 11 and three air-drops were successively made on May 17.

10. At 13.30 hours, May 13 and 12.05 hours May 21, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space over the vicinity of the Spanggur Lake in Tibet, China. The one that intruded on May 13 also repeatedly circled over the point at 33° 29' N, 78° 51' E.

11. At 12.20 hours, May 14, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space over the area around 35° 34' N, 77° 50' E in Sinkiang, China.

12. At 15.30 hours, May 17, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space of Hongshantou (approximately 35° 18' N, 78° 03' 30" E) in Sinkiang, China.

13. At 8.50 hours, May 21 and 9:00 hours, May 23, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space and circled over the point at 35° 9' N, 78° 29' E in Sinkiang, China. The one that intruded on May 21 circled over Howeitan also.

14. At 8.50 hours, May 23; 8.30 hours, May 25; and 8.40 hours, May 27, 1962, Indian aircraft, one at each time, intruded into the air space and repeatedly circled over the point at 35° 0' N, 78° 29' E and its adjacent areas in Sinkiang, China and air-dropped large quantities of supplies over the aggressive strong point at approximately 34° 58' 30" N, 78° 22' 30" E unlawfully set up in Sinkiang, China by Indian troops. About 80 parachutes were dropped on May 23, over forty bales of supplies were dropped on May 25, and over thirty bales of supplies were dropped on May 27.

15. At 9.00 hours, May 26, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space and repeatedly circled over Height 5,651 metres in Sinkiang, China and dropped over thirty bales of supplies over the aggressive strong point unlawfully set up at approximately 35° 16' N, 78° 08' E by Indian troops.

16. At 14.15 hours, May 26, 1962, an Indian aircraft intruded into the air space and circled over the point at 35° 27' N, 78° 09' E in Sinkiang, China.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 30 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Government's note dated 31st May, 1962.

The Government of China have themselves admitted in their note that as many as 55 out of 67 sorties about which they have protested relate to the air space over areas which are inside India. The Government of India firmly repudiate the untenable position assumed by the Government of China to protest on a matter which is exclusively within the sovereign jurisdiction of the Government of India.

The Government of India have, however, made careful enquiries into each case of alleged intrusion by Indian aircraft including the other 12 instances of intrusion into Chinese air space cited in the Chinese note and have found that no Indian aircraft had been to any of the places at the time and date given in the note.

It is obvious that by repeating such baseless allegations, the Government of China are merely serving the ends of their anti-Indian propaganda. However, as the record shows, it is the Government of China who have steadily increased their wrongful occupation of Indian territory in recent years and have carried out activities there in violation of India's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

In the light of facts stated above, the Government of India reject the protest lodged by the Government of China in their note dated 31st May, 1962.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Government's note dated June 1962.

The details given in the "Appendix" to the Chinese note show that all the places except one over which the alleged violations of air space are stated to have occurred, are well inside Indian territory. Any protest from the Government of China in regard to flights over Indian territory is not only highly improper but constitutes unwarranted interference in the internal affairs of India. The Government of India reject this untenable position assumed by the Chinese Government.

The Government of India have, however, carefully investigated each of these allegations about flights by Indian aircrafts, including the solitary instance relating to Chinese air space, cited in the Chinese note, and have found that no Indian aircraft had flown over any of the places at the times and dates mentioned.

It is noticed in this connection that the Chinese note has repeated the general allegations made in their earlier note dated 31st May 1962, which have been fully rebutted in the Indian Government's reply dated 30th June 1962. At no time have Indian military personnel or aircraft crossed the traditional well-recognised boundary of India. Indian maintenance aircraft on legitimate duty invariably keep well inside Indian air space. In sharp contrast, Chinese aircraft have violated Indian air space on innumerable occasions and Chinese troops have unlawfully established posts on Indian territory. The Government of India deplore this aggressive attitude adopted by the Chinese forces which has caused serious strain and tension in the relations between the two countries.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 25 July 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to draw the latter's attention to a fresh violation of Indian air space by Chinese aircraft.

On 7th July 1962 at 0900 hours I.S.T. a Chinese aircraft was observed flying over Chushul (33° 45' North 78° 40' East) which is 18 miles inside Indian territory. After committing the violation the aircraft flew back to the Tibet region of China.

Such repeated violations of Indian air space by Chinese aircraft constitute a deliberate provocation and serve to increase the existing tension on the border. While lodging a strong protest on the present violation, the Government of India once more urge the Chinese Government to put a stop to such aggressive activities.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Consulate General of China, Calcutta, to the Government of West Bengal, 28 November 1961

In the afternoon of November 18, 1961, four Chinese nationals namely Mr. Yeh Tien-lin, the acting Principal of Chinese Primary School in Calcutta, Mr. Ling Chi-kang, a shoe merchant in Calcutta, Mr. Hu Tung-hai, a barber in Calcutta and Mr. Fu Yin, a bean-curd seller in Kalimpong were arrested by the Indian Government and deported from India.

Mr. Yeh Tien-lin, Mr. Ling Chi-kang, Mr. Hu Tung-hai and Mr. Fu Yin are Chinese nationals who have long been residing in India. They have always been law-abiding, and have had proper occupations. The West Bengal Government, however, ordered them to quit India, arrested and detained them, put them on trial and finally unwarrantedly deported them to China through Nathula Pass under custody. This is obviously very unfriendly and inhumane. For this, the Chinese Consulate General in Calcutta lodges a protest with the West Bengal Government.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 2 December 1961

The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and has the honour to state as follows:

(1) At about 5 O'clock in the afternoon of November 25, 1961, about 40 Indians gathered outside the Chinese Consulate-General at Calcutta, clamouring and shouting anti-Chinese slogans; they stayed there for about half an hour and dispersed.

(2) At about 5 O'clock in the afternoon of November 25, 1961, about 50-60 Indians demonstrated in front of the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay, holding anti-Chinese placards and shouting slogans, slandering China such as "Chinese aggressors quit India", etc. Among them some one made a speech. They went away at about half past five.

(3) At about 7 O'clock in the afternoon of November 27, 1961, some 100 Indians went to the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay, clamouring and shouting. They held anti-Chinese placards, such as "Down with red China" and "Shut up the Chinese Consulate-General".

The frantically shouted slogans, maliciously slandering China and insulting the Chinese leaders, such as "Chinese aggressors get out of India", etc. Among them, eight or nine persons rushed to the gate of the Consulate, burned effigies of Chinese leaders, Chairman Mao Tse-tung and Premier Chou En-lai; there was also another person who held a chain in his hand, approached the gate of the Consulate and attempted to lock it up from outside.

Since the Indian Government made baseless charges in the Parliament that China had further violated India's territory another new wave against China has been unleashed in India. A few ruffians have been permitted to make troubles in front of the Chinese Consulate-General and burn straw effigies of the Chinese peoples respected and beloved leaders Chairman Mao Tse-tung and Premier Chou En-lai. This is a serious provocation to China, for which the Government of China cannot but express indignation at it, and hereby lodges a strong protest and requests that the Indian Government immediately take effective measures to prevent recurrence of similar incidents.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 4 December 1961

On November 18, 1961, the Government of India unwarrantedly arrested, all of a sudden, Chinese nationals Ling Chi-kang, Yeh Tien-lin, Fo Yin (Wang Ching-shan) and Hu Tung-hai, and soon after that on November 21 brought them in custody to the desolate and bitterly cold Nathula Pass and deported them out of India, subjecting them to physical harm. Once more the Indian Government took such a rude measure as to have unwarrantedly arrested and deported Chinese nationals out of India, at which the Embassy expresses utmost regret.

This year, the Indian Government has more than once unwarrantedly arrested Chinese nationals and deported them from India under the pretext of the so-called “anti-India activities”. The persecution of Ling Chi-kang and three others this time is the fourth one of the series. The Indian Government again used “anti-India activities” as a pretext, but there is no factual basis at all. Ling Chi-kang, Yeh Tien-lin, Fo Yin (Wang Ching-shan) and Hu Tung-hai all resided in India for a long time and had proper occupations as teacher, shoe-maker, hair-dresser and bean-curd seller. During their stay in India, the Indian local authorities had never charged them with any act against the law. The Indian Government, however, first unreasonably ordered them to leave India within a stipulated period, then successively arrested, sentenced and imprisoned them, and despite the fact that they had, in accordance with law, applied for continuing to stay, forcibly deported them under escort out of India, with the result that they were separated from their families. This is an act utterly devoid of any justification.

The Chinese side, having regard for the friendship between the peoples of China and India, has time and again adopted an attitude of restraint and tolerance towards such continuous persecution of Chinese nationals by the Indian side. But it is regrettable that the Indian Government has unceasingly carried out various persecutions against Chinese nationals, and time and again deported under escort innocent Chinese nationals out of India. This absolutely runs counter to the wish for friendship of the peoples of the two countries. In the interest of maintaining the friendship between the two peoples, the Embassy requests that the Government of India respect the proper and legitimate rights of the Chinese nationals and immediately stop measures of persecution against Chinese nationals.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 12 December 1961

Regarding the case of the false charge against Mr. Ma Chu-tsai, a Chinese national who originally resided in Kalimpong, the Chinese Embassy, at the request of Ma's family, has on many occasions made representations to the Ministry of External Affairs of India. However, Ma's case, which has lasted as long as over one year, still remains delayed and unsettled.

As recently reported by Ma's family, the case has undergone several trials at the Court of Jalpaiguri, and from all the circumstances as shown in these trials it should have been very clear that Mr. Ma Chu-tsai is completely innocent, and even the Court has also indicated that it is difficult to consider the case as established, and that it should be settled speedily. Nevertheless, it has again decided that the case be transferred to another court for continued trial. Thus Ma's wronged case will again continue to remain unsettled, and Ma's health will continue to be subjected to suffering. It should be noted that Mr. Ma Chu-tsai has been compelled to move to Calcutta. He has been asked to appear at the Court of Jalpaiguri which is several hundred miles away. These long journeys have caused difficulties to him. His family is very much concerned about the health of this old man at an advanced age of over 70. Moreover, he is financially facing a helpless plight. He has repeatedly requested the Embassy to render him assistance so that he may be able to return to China at an early date.

The Embassy is much concerned over this. The Embassy once again hopes that the Government of India will out of humanitarian considerations give assistance to Mr. Ma Chu-tsai so that he may leave India for China at an early date.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 12 December 1961

On the morning of December 2, 1961, elements of the Chiang Kai-shek clique in Kalimpong, under the name of the so-called refugee school, intruded into the Chung Hwa School, Kalimpong, making disturbances and clamouring noisily in an attempt to seize the School. This seriously affected the normal studies of the students of the School.

It must be pointed out that, in June 1961, the elements of the Chiang Kai-shek clique were engaged in plotting to seize the Chung Hwa School. At that time, the Kalimpong local authorities confirmed to the Chung Hwa School that the Chiang Kai-shek clique elements had consulted the Sub-Divisional Officer of Kalimpong in an attempt to seize the Chung Hwa School. The Chinese Consulate-General at Calcutta took up this matter with the Government of West Bengal on July 3, 1961. It is surprising that the Chiang Kai-shek clique elements should have been further allowed to intrude into the school to make disturbances. This cannot but be considered as connivance by the Indian local authorities at the activities of the Chiang Kai-shek clique elements.

Since the beginning of 1960, the Indian local authorities have been, without any justification, carrying out planned persecution against the Chung Hwa School. They successively ordered Mr. Liang Tsu-Chin, Head of the Board of Directors of the School, Mr. Chang Nai-chin and Mr. Ma Chia-kuei, Deputy heads of the Board of Directors, to leave India or Kalimpong within a stipulated period. They further unwarrantedly detained the Principal of the School Mr. Chang Hsiu-feng and his wife, gave them extremely inhuman treatment, and finally compelled them to leave India. Since October 1961, the local government of India again carried out persecution against the Chung Hwa School. If first ordered the acting Principal of the School Wang Wei-chin and teacher Pema, and then ordered teachers Ma Fu-shou and Yang Lan-ying to leave Kalimpong within a stipulated period.

In the meantime, the parents of the children of the School have been subjected to constant threat that they should not send their children to study in the School.

This series of unwarranted persecution carried out by the Indian local government against the Head of the Board of Directors, Deputy Heads, Principal and teachers of the School as well as its connivance at the repeated plotting of the Chiang Kai-shek clique elements to seize the School cannot but lead one to the belief that the Indian local government is putting the School beyond any means of continued existence, thus achieving the aim of strangling the legitimate cultural and welfare undertaking of the Chinese nationals and facilitating the activities of the Chiang Kai-shek clique elements.
As is well-known, the Chung Hwa School in Kalimpong is a school run by the Chinese nationals in the locality with their contribution of funds. Over many years in the past, it has always been law-abiding and on amicable terms with the local people, and has made its due contributions to the education of the children of the Chinese nationals as well as to the friendship between the Chinese and Indian peoples. The Indian local government should have carried out continuous unwarranted persecutions against the School and connived at the activities of the Chiang Kai-shek clique elements. The Embassy expresses its regret at this. It is requested that the Government of India immediately stop its persecutions against the Chung Hwa School, Kalimpong, and prevent the elements of the Chiang Kai-shek clique from scheming against and sabotaging the School.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 14 December 1961

As reported by the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay, about 10:50 a.m. on December 5, 1961, the personnel of the Consulate-General heard some slight explosion in the courtyard; when they immediately came out to see what was happening; they discovered that a coconut tree in the courtyard was on fire and the sofas lying under the tree also caught fire. They extinguished the fire promptly, so it did not spread.

Judging from the circumstances at that time, it was obvious that somebody from outside the Consulate-General had thrown combustibles into the courtyard in an attempt to set fire. But the combustibles were blocked by the coconut tree which instantly caught fire and began to burn with the sofas below affected. After the fire was put out, a lot of half-burned combustibles such as old cotton and cloth rags soaked with something like oil were found under the coconut tree.

After the incident, some officers from the police station and firemen in the locality went to the spot for examination. They took notes and collected some of the said combustibles. On the afternoon of the same day, Mr. Wang Yen-chang, Consul of the Consulate-General, drew the attention of the State Government to this incident, and the State Government promised to make investigations.

The Chinese Embassy deems it necessary to point out emphatically to the Indian Ministry of External Affairs that the Government of India bears the responsibility for the protection of the security of the Chinese official organ in India. At a time when wanton anti-Chinese outbursts are being whipped up in India, the occurrence of this incident is of an extremely serious nature. The Embassy cannot but express its deep regret at it, and draws the serious attention of the Government of India to the matter.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 5 January 1962

Reference Chinese Embassy’s Memorandum dated 4th December, 1961, regarding the deportation of four Chinese nationals viz., Ling Chi-kang (shoe-maker), Yeh Tien-lin (primary school teacher), Fo Yin (Hair dresser) and Hu Tung-hai (bean-curd-seller) from India on 21st November 1961.

2. No Government can ignore the security and well being of its people, and permit aliens to work from within to subvert the state. From time to time the Government of India has had to expel aliens from the territories of the Indian Union for engaging themselves in anti-social activities (e.g., smuggling, trafficking in narcotics and other cognizable offences), for infringement of visa regulations and indulgence in activities, covert or overt, intended to subvert the security of the state.

3. The Embassy’s Memorandum takes a tendentious and distorted view of such cases and by its arrogant stand lends implied support to the anti-social and anti-state activities of certain Chinese nationals in India. For some time Chinese propaganda organs have seized on these stray cases of deportation to launch a virulent campaign attempting to disparage the Government of India in the eyes of the world by circulating stories of persecution of ‘innocent’ Chinese nationals in India.

4. The Embassy’s Memorandum is doubly objectionable because it constitutes an act of open interference in the internal affairs of India and because it wilfully distorts and misrepresents facts regarding the deportation of certain Chinese nationals from India on account of their indulgence in anti-state activities at the behest of a foreign power. It is clear that in this matter the Chinese Government’s intervention is neither disinterested nor impartial.

5. To expose the myth about the Indian Government’s persecution of Chinese residents in India it would suffice to state that out of a total Chinese population of over 12,000 in India, only eleven had to be physically deported across the border. It is relevant to point out that in all such cases the persons concerned defied notices served on them to leave the country by a specified date. Reluctantly, therefore, steps had to be taken to ensure their departure, but in each such case arrangements were made to ensure that the deportee was well provided not only with good food but with comfortable and well heated accommodation on Indian territory. In addition, each deportee was given a number of items of warm clothing, boots etc., to make his journey home as comfortable as possible. A list of articles given to the four deportees is enclosed. Timely notice was also given to the Chinese Embassy for the reception of the deportees on the Chinese side of the border.

6. In such matters, instead of casting aspersions the Chinese Government could well emulate the humane and generous standards of the Government of India.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 18 January 1962

On October 27, 1961, Mr. Ma Mu-ming of the Chinese Embassy called at the Ministry of External Affairs and lodged a complaint with Shri B. C. Mishra, Deputy Secretary, about what Mr. Ma described as 'noise' made by a large number of Indians on 10th October, 1961 in front of the Chinese Consulate-General. Mr. Ma also alleged that the Indian had carried a straw effigy of a Chinese leader and some anti-Chinese posters.

The complaint has been investigated and the facts are as follows:

On 10th October, 1961 some peasants who came all the way from Igatpuri in Nasik District peacefully demonstrated in Bombay city against Chinese aggression on Indian soil. The procession stopped about 200 yards away from the Chinese Consulate-General in Bombay. No violence was committed, nor was there any threat of violence. The authorities in Bombay who watched over the procession were entirely satisfied about its peaceful character and apprehended no disturbance of the peace from it. One of the processionists wrapped himself in straw but no effigy of a Chinese leader, as mistakenly alleged by Mr. Ma was carried.

The right of freedom of speech and expression and of peaceful assembly without arms are guaranteed under Article 19 of the Indian Constitution. The procession in question was in lawful exercise of the fundamental rights of Indian citizens.

The only slogans raised by the processionists asked, as of right, the Chinese Government to vacate its aggression on Indian territory. The sentiment is national and common to all the people of India.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 18 January 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India, and with reference to the Embassy Note No. M/578/61, dated 2nd December, 1961, have the honour to state that the facts in regard to the demonstration in question are as follows:

(1) In Calcutta on the afternoon of November 25, 1961, a procession came out of Hazra Park and moved on to Lower Circular Road. At about 5 p.m. it stopped at a distance of about 125 yards from the Consulate-General. The Police were present at the scene to prevent any disturbance of the peace. The processionists held a meeting to condemn Chinese incursions into Indian territory, and dispersed peacefully at about 5:20 p.m.

(2) In Bombay on the afternoon of November 25, 1961, some people went out in a procession towards the Chinese Consulate-General. They stopped at a distance of 100 yards from the Chinese Consulate-General building. The police were on hand to keep the peace. The processionists were all along peaceful, and there was no untoward incident. Their leader made a speech in which he condemned Chinese aggression on India and criticised Government of India's policy in regard to China. They dispersed peacefully at 5:10 p.m.

(3) On November 27, 1961, a procession of people went through the streets of Bombay and stopped at a distance of about 200 yards from the Consulate-General. The processionists then held a meeting to protest against Chinese aggression on Indian territory. Speakers criticised Government of India's weak policy towards China and demanded effective steps to oust the aggressors from Indian soil. One person tried to reach the gate of the Chinese Consulate-General to hand over a memorandum but he was stopped by the police. Some others tried to light a torch but the police seized and put out the torch. Persons who acted unlawfully were arrested by the police. The Embassy's account of this demonstration does not agree with the facts. Eight or nine persons did not rush as alleged to the gate of the Consulate-General, nor did any one burn effigies of Chairman Mao and Premier Chou. No one attempted to lock the Consulate gate. These are highly exaggerated accounts given by the Chinese Embassy which are not borne out by facts.

There are certain facts of life in India which the Chinese Embassy might well begin to appreciate. The rights of freedom of speech and expression and of peaceful assembly without arms are guaranteed by the Indian Constitution to every Indian citizen. These rights are cherished as part of India's national heritage, and it is impermissible except under certain specified and exceptional circumstances to interfere with these rights of the people. The demonstrations in question were peaceful. No act of violence was committed or threatened by the demonstrators. The police watched even them, to prevent any excesses. There was no intrusion into or damage to the Consulates-General, nor was there any impairment of their dignity. Besides, the incidents to which the Chinese note refers took place well outside the premises of the Chinese Consulates-General. In view of the facts stated above, Government of India is satisfied that the demonstrations in question were in lawful exercise of the fundamental rights of Indian citizens, and that there was no cause for Government to take action to prevent them.

The Government of India take serious exception to the contents of the penultimate paragraph of the Chinese note. The fact of Chinese aggression on Indian territory forms the subject of protracted diplomatic exchanges and is not a matter of doubt in the public mind in India. Instances of recent Chinese incursions into Indian territory brought to the notice of the last session of Parliament have been admitted in its fashion by the Chinese Government. These do not, therefore, become 'baseless charges'. The Government of India resents the imputation contained in the Embassy's note that it unleashed 'another new wave' against China or that it permitted the people of India to whom the Embassy's note ungraciously refers to as 'ruffians' to make trouble in front of the Chinese Consulate-General.

The Indian people have reacted spontaneously and with dignity and restraint to Chinese incursions into Indian territory and the expressions of their just indignation against which the Embassy's note protests are as natural as they are sincere.

The Government of India cannot accept any protest, far less an unseemly protest based on miscomprehension of the constitutional rights of the Indian people and misrepresentation of facts against the lawful exercise of the fundamental rights of Indian Citizens.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 18 January 1962

Reference Chinese Embassy Memorandum dated the 14th December, 1961, about a fire on the premises of the Chinese Consulate-General, Bombay, which affected a coconut tree and an old sofa lying under the tree. The Embassy’s memo not only mis-states the facts but draws the wrong conclusions. The facts are as follows:—

On the morning of December 5, 1961, a servant in the neighbouring house (Shri Batliwalla’s) noticed a fire in the courtyard of the Consulate-General. This was reported to Shri Batliwalla, Managing Trustee of Bhulabhai Desai Institute, who immediately telephoned for the Fire Brigade. The first fire engine on reaching the spot was misguided by a Chinese employee of the Consulate-General to another location. When the second fire engine arrived, officials of the Consulate-General refused to allow the fire brigade personnel to enter the premises. It was only at the insistence of Shri Batliwala that the fire-brigade personnel were ultimately allowed to enter the premises and put out the fire.

It was a small fire which was easily extinguished. Damage caused by the fire was negligible. An old sofa lying under a coconut tree, at some distance from the Consulate-General building, was damaged by the fire. The sofa belonged to the Bhulabhai Trust which owns the building occupied by the Consulate-General.

According to preliminary investigations, some Diwali sparklers and charred cotton were found near the scene of the fire. An interesting aspect of the case is the part played by the officials of the Chinese Consulate-General, who adopted an unco-operative and unhelpful attitude not only in the matter of putting out the fire but in regard to the efforts of the police to investigate into the cause of the fire.

One fire engine was asked to go elsewhere, another was refused permission to enter the premises. An officer from the Control Room of the Fire Brigade who also arrived at the spot was not allowed to go in. Police officials who went there to investigate and collect evidence were refused permission to enter the premises.

A Chinese official of the Consulate-General gave a statement to the police officer but declined to sign the statement. Although the police did eventually take charge of some material evidence found on the spot, other evidence was removed by the Consul-General who refused to hand them over to the police.

The Government of India deplores this unfortunate incident and the inconvenience it has caused to the Chinese Consulate-General.
The Government of India must however, draw attention to the extraordinary behaviour of the Consulate-General which refused cooperation to the fire-men who came to put out the fire and police officials who went there to make investigations.

Needless to say there is a good deal of suspicion surrounding the 'fire' which broke out on the premises of the Chinese Consulate-General. The stubborn efforts made by the Consulate-General, to deny firemen and the police access to the scene of fire did not make the task of protecting the Consulate-General easier. Furthermore, the removal of material evidence from the scene by the Consulate-General deepens suspicion. It is clear that while at the time of the fire the Consulate-General behaved as though nothing of consequence had happened to warrant the admission of firemen and police into their premises, they used the incident later for political ends without hesitation.
The Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of India, and has the honour to state in the following:

About 7:10 in the evening of January 17, 1962, over ten ruffians bringing with them dangerous weapons and hammers suddenly broke open the doors and raided the office of the China Review and the Lita Press in Calcutta, indulging in violence and making wanton disturbances; they stabbed Mr. Liu Kuo-jui, office worker of the China Review, and destroyed the printing machines, type-setting frames, radio sets (two), telephones, typewriters and other office equipment. It was only after the ruffians had fled that the Indian policemen came to the spot, and then they orally told the Review to stop publication. It must be pointed that in the past two years the Indian Government expelled, without any justification, the publisher and the chief editor of the China Review from India, and took various unwarranted measures of persecution against its other members, such as ordering them to leave India within a specified period and putting them under arrest. This incident of wrecking the China Review by the ruffians is obviously another new calculated scheme following the unwarranted persecution of Chinese nationals and expelling the chief responsible members of the China Review by the Indian Government. This is a serious political incident. The Chinese Embassy expresses utmost regret at it. It is demanded that the Indian Government immediately take effective steps, severely punish the criminals, ensure the safety of the office of the China Review, and guarantee against recurrence of similar incidents in the future.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 25 January 1962

As reported by the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay, about 9:40 in the evening of January 16, 1962, a window-pane of the Consulate's Building, which faces the street, was hit at from outside and a hole was caused to it. It may be recalled that on December 5, 1961, there occurred the incident of setting fire on the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay, to which the Chinese Embassy has drawn the serious attention of the Indian Government. The window-pane was broken soon after the above-mentioned incident of setting fire took place and the Chinese Embassy took up the matter with the Indian Government. However, the Indian Government has again failed to prevent such kind of sabotage and disturbance. The Embassy expresses regret at this. The Embassy once again draws the attention of the Indian Government to this matter and requests that steps be taken to prevent recurrence of similar incidents.
The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Embassy’s note No. L/507/62, dated the 23rd January, 1962, regarding an incident which took place at the office of the China Review and Lita Press in Calcutta on the 17th January, 1962. The incident has been investigated.

2. On the 17th January, at 19-05 hours 15 Chinese nationals armed with some implements made their way into the office of the ‘China Review’ and Lita Press where they kept the inmates of the office and Press gagged and caused some damage to property in the premises. Slight injuries were caused to Mr. Ssu Tu-jung an employee of the Press. Ten minutes later, hearing calls for help, members of the public came to the rescue and the persons responsible for the disorder made good their escape. Three of them were arrested by the Calcutta Police as they were trying to get away. A fourth member of the group was arrested later. The Calcutta Police have since apprehended the remaining members of the group and a process has been started against the offenders under the law.

3. The Calcutta Police arrived at the scene of the disturbance as soon as word reached them. The Embassy will have noticed that ‘China Review’ in its issue dated the 19th January, 1962—two days after the incident—stated that the Police “reached the spot in time”.

4. The police made no demand, oral or otherwise, that ‘China Review’ should stop publication. The allegation to this effect made in the Embassy’s note is factually incorrect. In India, the functions of the Police officials are limited to maintenance of law and order. They do not issue political directives of any kind. The latter task is performed by appropriate organs of the Government. Moreover, contrary to what the Embassy has stated the Calcutta Police were prompt both in taking action to apprehend the offenders and in posting a guard at the office and press of the ‘China Review’ with a view to ensure its safety.

5. As the Embassy is aware, for some years now, there have been groups of Chinese residents in Calcutta holding different political views. More recently, one such group has been seeking to impose its views on another, and to this end has been using ‘China Review’ to amount political attacks on its opponents. Tension between the groups was heightened by a series of slanderous items which appeared in the ‘China Review’ exposing private and family affairs of Chinese nationals of the opposite group to public ridicule and shame. It is this policy of the journal calculated to offend and intimidate the other Chinese group which appears to have set off the incident of 17th January, 1962.

6. It is a fact that ‘China Review’ published by a group of Chinese nationals in India has over a long time been carrying on a vigorous anti-Indian campaign and operating as a mouthpiece of Chinese official propaganda in India. As the Embassy is aware some members of the staff of the 'China Review' were expelled because they had been engaged in objectionable and subversive activities which threatened the security of the State. The expulsion orders in their case were not only necessary but were strictly within the internal jurisdiction of the Government of India. In this connection, the Embassy may wish to refer to the Ministry of External Affairs Memorandum dated 5th January, 1962, wherein the reasons for Memorandum dated 5th January, 1962, wherein the reasons for detail. The Government of India are constrained to observe that the Embassy's attempt to link up this incident with the expulsion orders is misguided and mischievous. The inter-necine feud among groups of the Chinese nationals in Calcutta, which resulted in violence on 17th January, 1962, has, as the facts show been instigated by the support given to one group against the other by the Chinese Missions in India. The Government of India hope that no support of any kind will, in future, be given by Chinese missions to any unlawful elements which promote a breach of law and order as in this case.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China present its compliments to the Embassy of the Republic of India in China, and, with reference to the memorandum from the Ministry of External Affairs of India to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India dated January 5, 1962, has the honour to state the following, which the Embassy is requested to transmit to the Government of India.

In order to cover up its political persecution of Chinese nationals the Indian Government in its memorandum groundlessly accused Chinese nationals of indulging in activities intended to subvert the security of India and engaging themselves in anti-social activities. Moreover, the memorandum slandered the Chinese Embassy as lending implied support to the anti-Indian and anti-social activities of certain Chinese nationals and as openly interfering in the internal affairs of India. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China expresses its deep regret at this and strongly protest against these malicious slanders levelled by the Indian Government against the Chinese Embassy.

Since 1960 the Indian Government has been persecuting Chinese nationals on framed-up charges and unjustifiably ordering them to leave India by a specified date. Recently, things have developed to more serious proportions. To date more than 100 Chinese nationals have been expelled or given notices by the Indian Government to leave India by a specified date. They have been subjected by the Indian authorities to rude treatments—unwarranted summons, detention, imprisonment, fine and even deportation under armed escort.

In its memorandum the Indian Government falsely alleged that it expelled these Chinese nationals because they had been engaged in anti-social activities and in activities, covert or overt, intended to subvert the security of the state of India. Previously the Indian authorities had also repeatedly slandered the Chinese nationals as being engaged in so-called “anti-Indian activities” and “activities which are prejudicial to Indian national interests”. But what grounds are there for such charges and slanders by the Indian Government?

The Chinese nationals expelled by the Indian authorities had all lived in India for a long period of time, had normal occupations and always abided by the laws and regulations of the Indian Government. For instance, Mr. Wu Tao-lung, who was engaged in journalism, and his family had resided in India for generations, Mr. Ling Chi-kang, a shoe-maker, and Mr. Wang Ching-shan, who lived by selling beans, had both lived in India for many years. They have all along been residing in India with legitimate status and have lived in amity with the local people. However, it was these innocent Chinese nationals who were one after another arbitrarily arrested by the Indian authorities in 1961, imposed with the charge of so-called anti-Indian activities and deported under armed escort.

In this connection the Chinese Government has more than once made inquiries to the Indian Government and asked it to give the concrete reasons for arresting or expelling the Chinese nationals, but the Indian Government has never been able to give any facts, it has refused to make any concrete explanation and only dodged the question by asserting that it was the policy of the Indian Government not to divulge the concrete reasons. In its memorandum the Indian Government still did nothing more than imposing on these Chinese nationals the charge of subverting the security of the state and failed to cite any facts. This cannot but arouse the suspicion that the above charge is a sheer fabrication.

The Indian authorities not only unreasonably expelled Chinese nationals but also applied various extremely inhumane measures against the Chinese nationals involved. Take the case of Mr. Chang Ching, Mr. Liu Wei-tai, Mr. Hou Hsin-fu, Mr. Wu Tao-lung and others, who were arrested by the Indian authorities when they, after receiving the order to leave the country by a specified date, were appealing according to law for permission for continued residence. At the time of arrest, they were not allowed to pack their luggage, some of them were even taken to the airfield in pyjamas. In escorting them to the border, the Indian armed personnel covered their eyes with black cloth and shut them in cold rooms, in disregard of the piercing weather in the mountainous areas on the border, thus greatly hurting them both spiritually and physically. In the case of Mr. Chang Su-fung, a Chinese national in Kalimpong, he was even denied legitimate defence before he was unjustifiably sentenced to imprisonment. His wife was first ordered to leave Kalimpong within a specified time-limit, and then recalled to Kalimpong to be tried; under various means of persecution by the Indian authorities, she finally fainted at the court. Later the Indian authorities sentenced her to imprisonment, thus separating her from her four young children and a suckling baby and throwing the family into a miserable state where husband and wife and parents and children were separated. Are these the "humane and generous standards" the Indian Government boasted of in its memorandum?

At the same time the Indian Government has gone back upon its promise and allowed and permitted Chiang Kai-shek clique elements and Tibetan rebels to carry out flagrant political activities in India against the People's Republic of China. How can such practice of the Indian Government of giving totally different treatment to different people be explained if it is not out of ulterior motives?

Judging from the above-said facts in three aspects, the Indian Government can in no way deny that it has subjected innocent and law-abiding Chinese nationals to political persecution.

What is even more surprising and regrettable is the fact that the Indian Government in its memorandum described the Chinese Embassy's proper and normal representations with the Indian Government concerning the Indian authorities' unwarranted persecution of Chinese nationals as open interference in the internal affairs of India and alleged that the Chinese Embassy lent implied support to the so-called anti-Indian and anti-social activities of certain Chinese.

The consistent policy of the Chinese Government towards overseas Chinese is, in the spirit of the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence, to educate them to respect the laws and regulations of the country where they reside, refrain from taking part in local political activities, engage in economic and cultural work beneficial to the local national economy and people's livelihood, and live in amity with the local people. The Chinese Embassy and Consulates-General in India have consistently and strictly executed this policy. As for protecting the proper rights and interests of its nationals abroad and making reasonable representations to the government of the host country when they suffer unwarranted persecution there, this is the legitimate right as well as bounden duty of the Embassy and Consulate-General of every country, as is internationally acknowledged. As a country which has large numbers of nationals residing abroad, India cannot be unaware of this point. However the Indian Government actually considers the Chinese Embassy's diplomatic representations concerning Chinese nationals as constituting an act of open interference in the internal affairs of India; this is not only a malicious slander against the Chinese Embassy but also an obvious attempt to deprive the Chinese Embassy and Consulates-General of their legitimate right to protect the proper rights and interests of their nationals. This is something the Chinese Government absolutely cannot accept but must categorically repudiate.

At present, the Indian Government's acts of persecuting Chinese nationals continue to increase; this is completely against the wish of the people of China and India. Proceeding from the spirit of consistently upholding the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence and safeguarding the friendship between the two peoples, the Chinese Government asks the Indian Government to treasure the friendship of the two peoples, respect the proper rights and interests of Chinese nationals, and immediately take effective measures to stop persecution of Chinese nationals. The Chinese Government once again expresses its readiness, together with the Indian Government, to seek fair and reasonable solutions to problems concerning Chinese nationals in the spirit of friendly negotiation.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 29 March, 1962

Reference Chinese Embassy's Memorandum dated 25th January 1962 regarding a broken window-pane in the premises of the Chinese Consulate-General in Bombay. When an investigation was held into the alleged incident, the Indian Police official who visited the Consulate General was shown a small hole about 2" in diameter in one of the windows. It is significant that the matter of a broken window-pane which is the subject of the Chinese Embassy's Memorandum was not promptly reported to the police at the time of its occurrence and that later when the police had started a process of investigation the officials of the Consulate-General had adopted an unco-operative attitude by refusing to give information requested for by the police. These facts have rendered the task of investigation difficult, and in consequence the investigation has yielded no positive result.

However, it has been established that the damage in question was trivial and probably due to accidental causes. The Government of India, therefore, reject the allegation contained in the Chinese Embassy Memorandum that the broken window-pane of the Chinese Consulate-General in Bombay was an act of "sabotage and disturbance". On the above facts there can be no basis for any charge of negligence or deliberate harassment of the Chinese Consulate-General in Bombay. There is no need to reaffirm that the Government of India have always taken and will continue to take all necessary steps to extend full protection to foreign missions in India.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 28 April, 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the two notes addressed by the Ministry of External Affairs of India to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India dated January 18, 1962 concerning Indian ruffians' provocative disturbance in front of the Chinese Consulates-General in Bombay and Calcutta, has the honour to state as follows:

The Chinese Government completely disagrees with the reply of the Indian Government. That Indian ruffians created provocative disturbance in front of the Chinese Consulates-General and even wantonly insulted Chinese Consulate-General, but was reported in newspapers. Needless to point out, such activities constituted a serious provocation against China. The Indian Government in its notes tried to quibble with the pretexts of "the fundamental rights of Indian citizens", "Indian national heritage" and "the peaceful character of the procession". This shows that the Indian Government openly connived at and shielded such acts hostile to China, which is regrettable. Should the Indian Government persist in this attitude, to what state the relations between China and India would be reduced? The Chinese Government cannot but be worried about the eventuality.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 28 April, 1962

Regarding the incident in which an attempt was made to set fire to the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay has in its memorandum of December 14, 1961 given a clear and correct account. The Ministry of External Affairs in its memorandum of January 18, 1962, however, not only failed to account for the cause of the fire, but on the contrary made a narration inconsistent with the facts with regard to what had happened at that time and even charged the Chinese Consulate-General with refusing cooperation to the fire-men and police officials. Such an attitude cannot but make the Embassy feel disappointment and regret.

The Chinese Consulate-General accorded full co-operation and assistance to the police officials who went there for investigation. They were given facilities in conducting a detailed investigation on the spot. As for the question of a fire engine being misguided elsewhere, the fact is that, when the fire-men entered the courtyard of the Consulate-General, they blamed Mr. Batliwalla, secretary to the landlord, who informed the fire brigade of the incident by telephone, asking him why he had told them that it was Mr. Bhuilabhai Desai's house, and not the Chinese Consulate-General that had caught fire, with the result that the fire engine mistakenly went elsewhere and failed to reach the Chinese Consulate-General earlier. Mr. Batliwalla replied that he was not wrong in informing them that way because the house which the Chinese Consulate-General occupies is that of Mr. Bhuilabhai Desai. A member of the Consulate-General related the facts about the fire to a police official who went there for investigation but he found that in the statement recorded by the police official there were some discrepancies from what he had related. It is natural, therefore, that he could not sign on it.

The grave nature of this incident of setting fire is far too obvious. It is entirely necessary for the Embassy to draw the serious attention of the Government of India to it. The Government of India has unshirkable responsibility for ensuring the security of the official organs of a foreign country in India. The Government of India, however, not only has failed to carry out serious and earnest investigations but on the contrary made such assertions as "it was a small fire", "damage caused was negligible", there is a good deal of suspicion", and even went to the length of groundlessly accusing the Consulate-General of "using the incident for political ends". This is indeed exceedingly surprising and regrettable.

While noticing that the Government of India in its memorandum has deplored the incident, the Embassy once again requests the Government of India to see to it that the security of the Chinese official organs in India be effectively ensured.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 5 May, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs Note dated 6-3-1962, have the honour to state as follows:

It is a matter of surprise and regret to the Government of India that the Government of China should continue to make baseless allegations regarding the treatment of Chinese nationals resident in India. It is particularly regrettable that the Chinese Government should have gone to the extent of making a false and malicious suggestion that their nationals are being persecuted on framed-up charges and are being unjustifiably ordered to leave India.

It is a perversion of the truth to describe the protective action taken against a few offending Chinese nationals resident in India as "persecution on framed-up charges". The fact that the number of such Chinese nationals is small relative to the size of the Chinese population in India should indicate that there is no general discrimination against Chinese residents and that the Government of India are only proceeding against a limited few who over a period of time have been found to indulge in anti-social activities. As already pointed out in the Government of India's memorandum dated 5th January 1962, every Chinese expelled from India has been guilty of a cognizable offence, e.g., smuggling or other criminal offences, infringement of visa regulations, or indulgence in activities, covert or overt, intended to subvert the security of the State.

The suggestion in the Chinese note, that Chinese nationals have been subjected to rude treatment, unjustified summons, detention, imprisonment, etc. is false and groundless. Action taken against the Chinese nationals has been strictly limited to the law and legal procedures obtaining in the country and adequate notice has invariably been given before taking action against the offending individuals concerned.

The Chinese note has attempted to cite specific instances in support of its allegations regarding 'unfair treatment' to Chinese nationals. It will be seen from the following data that the allegations of arbitrary arrest etc. are entirely contrary to the facts:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Date of expiry of residential permit</th>
<th>Date of expiry of three month notice</th>
<th>Date of arrest</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Mr. Wu Tao Lunk</td>
<td>17-4-1960</td>
<td>23-10-1960</td>
<td>28-12-1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mr. Wang Ching-Shan</td>
<td>4-4-1960</td>
<td>7-3-1961</td>
<td>29-5-1961</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Not only had sufficient notice been given in these cases but even the arrest of the offending individuals had come after a further period of grace had been allowed to these persons to betake themselves from India. Besides, the utmost care had been taken to ensure that these offending, Chinese received the maximum facilities permissible under the law. Arrangements had been made to provide them with good food and comfortable accommodation on Indian territory and, in addition, they were given a number of items of warm clothing, boots, etc. to make their journey home as comfortable as possible.

The Chinese note refers to Mr. and Mrs. Chang Sui-fung. This couple had been served with orders on the 30th August 1960 to leave Kalimpong within a period of 15 days but as they did not comply with the order they were arrested on the 5th December 1960. The Court refused bail to Mr. Chang but allowed bail to Mrs. Chang on condition that she made arrangements to leave Kalimpong forthwith. Upon her refusal to do so, her bail application was rejected. But later, on the receipt of assurances on her behalf, she was released on bail on 17-12-1960. Mrs. Chang had been sentenced at her trial to two months simple imprisonment but in view of the special family considerations, the Government of India arranged to have the unexpired portion of the sentences on both Mr. and Mrs. Chang Sui-fung remitted and they were both permitted to leave the country. It will be seen from these facts that this Chinese couple had been released even before the expiry of their terms of imprisonment. Surely there was nothing inhumane about this.

In this connection, the Government of India firmly reject the absurd suggestion made in the Chinese note about the “Chiang Kai-shek clique elements” having been permitted to carry on political activities against the People’s Republic of China. The absurdity of this suggestion should be self-evident from the fact that the Government of India recognise and maintain diplomatic relations only with the People’s Republic of China, and have no relations with Taiwan.

The Government of China do not seem to be aware that the Indian Constitution and the laws of the land guarantee maximum liberty and equal treatment to all persons without distinction provided they do not act against the laws of the country. But where certain individuals, whether foreign or Indian, infringe the laws of the land they have necessarily to face the consequences that arise from their actions, and have only themselves to blame for it. Such enforcement of the law falls entirely within the internal jurisdiction of a country.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 15 May, 1962

The Chinese Embassy cannot accept the reply given by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs in its memorandum of March 29, 1962 regarding the incident in which a window-pane of the building of the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay, which faces the street, was broken through. This incident of the breaking of the window-pane occurred soon after the attempted setting fire to the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay. Its serious nature is thus obvious. The Government of India has the responsibility for ensuring the security of foreign official organs in India. What the Indian Ministry of External Affairs stated in its above-mentioned memorandum that "the damage in question was trivial" and "probably due to accidental causes" was intended to justify the act of endangering the security of the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay. The Government of India groundlessly charged the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay with failing to give cooperation in investigation. The Embassy is surprised at this extraordinary attitude of the Indian Government.

The Embassy has recently received further report from the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay that, at about 8 o'clock in the evening of April 26, 1962, another window-pane of the Consulate-building facing the street was broken through from outside. It was further discovered that, before that incident, the window-panes of three other rooms had also been broken with a hole on each of them. Besides, the glass cover of the gate light of the Consulate was smashed from outside on April 19. At about 7 o'clock in the evening of May 1, a piece of tile was thrown into the courtyard from outside the Consulate, almost hitting a member of the Consulate. All these incidents are of extremely serious nature. These incidents themselves serve to have refuted the untenable contention of the Ministry of External Affairs contained in its above-mentioned memorandum. It must be pointed out that the repeated occurrence of such incidents are by no means accidental. The Embassy expresses deep regret that the Government of India has failed to prevent such kind of sabotage and disturbance against the Chinese official organ, and requests that the Government of India pay serious attention to it and effectively ensure against recurrence of similar incidents in the future.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 17 May, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India and with reference to the Note of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Chinese People’s Republic, Peking, dated the 28th April 1962, have the honour to state as follows:

The facts about the demonstrations which took place in Bombay and Calcutta in October/November 1961, have been communicated to the Embassy in the Ministry of External Affairs Notes dated 18th January 1962. It is, therefore, not necessary to restate that the demonstrations were peaceful, spontaneous and in lawful exercise of the fundamental rights of the Indian people. Nor is it necessary to reiterate that the Government of India found no cause to take action against the peaceful demonstrators who had posed no threat to law and order.

If the Chinese Government are as exercised over the future of Sino-Indian relations as their note would seem to indicate, they would have no doubt noted that the demonstrations in question were themselves the outcome of public indignation over the unlawful occupation of Indian territory by Chinese forces. It is this occupation of Indian territory that has caused a deterioration in Sino-Indian relations. While it is a matter of no small regret to the Government of India that their relations with the Chinese People’s Republic have worsened in recent years, it is obvious that normal relations between the two countries can easily be restored if Chinese forces posted on Indian territory are withdrawn. Such action would lay a true and lasting foundation for friendly relations between the two countries and also create a favourable atmosphere for negotiations to settle the boundary problem.

The Ministry of External Affairs take this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, to the Embassy of China in India, 17 May, 1962

Reference Chinese Embassy Memorandum dated the 28th April 1962, about a fire in the premises of the Chinese Consulate General, Bombay.

The facts about this incident were furnished to the Chinese Embassy in the Ministry of External Affairs Memorandum dated the 18th January 1962 in which the cause of the fire, as established on the basis of preliminary investigations, was also indicated. The same memorandum drew the attention of the Embassy to the obstructive and unhelpful attitude of certain officials of the Consulate-General which seriously hampered efforts of the local Police officials to investigate the case. The Government of India are satisfied that all the facts communicated by them to the Chinese Embassy are correct and incontrovertible. In the face of the facts, they are constrained to reject the prejudicated version of the incident put forward by the Embassy.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 23 May, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and with reference to the latter's Memorandum dated 12th December, 1961, have the honour to state as follows:

2. The Government of India have carried out a thorough investigation into the allegations made by the Embassy against the Indian local authorities in regard to the affairs of the Chung Hwa School in Kalimpong. The facts of the case are clear enough. On December 2, 1961, some members of the Chinese community in Kalimpong had come in person to the Chung Hwa School and had made a proposal that the school should henceforth be run jointly under the direction of the Board of Directors of the Chung Hwa School and the Chinese Refugee School. They contended that as the number of students in the Chung Hwa School had come down to a mere 30 and as there was no properly elected Board of Directors or a Headmaster to look after the Chung Hwa School, it would be in the best interests of the Chinese community as a whole for the two Schools to be placed under one management. These Chinese from the Chinese Refugee School claimed part-ownership of the building on the ground that some of them had been among the original sponsors of the Chung Hwa School and had contributed towards the construction of the building. This request made by the representatives of the Chinese Refugee School was summarily rejected by a lady teacher, Mrs. Yang Lan Ying of the Chung Hwa School, and thereupon an argument ensued between the two rival parties. At this moment an official of the Foreigners Registration Office in Kalimpong who had received information about the disturbance arrived on the spot and prevented the situation from taking an ugly turn. The disputants were advised by the Indian officials to decide the matter amicably by mutual negotiation and not by any unilateral action.

3. It is evident from the foregoing that the action taken by the Indian authorities in this instance was correct and proper. It is a matter of regret to the Government of India that the Embassy of the People's Republic of China should have seized this incident for levelling a number of totally unwarranted accusations and allegations against the Indian authorities charging them, amongst other things, with "connivance", "planned persecution", etc. The Ministry of External Affairs while totally and individually rejecting these incomprehensible charges cannot but point out a few examples of the erroneous and coloured statements contained in the Embassy's note under reference:—

(a) It is not a fact as stated in the Embassy's note that the Indian local authorities have interfered in the functioning of the Chung Hwa School. On the contrary, the local authorities had warned the members of the Chinese Refugee School against attempting to take forcible possession of Chung Hwa School building and had thereby protected the interests of the Chung Hwa School.

(b) The expulsion of some Chinese nationals related to the Chung Hwa School had taken place only after an investigation had more than established their anti-social and anti-Indian activities. It is slanderous to impute any other motives to explain these expulsions which constitute an internal act of the Indian Government.

(c) The curious accusation of connivance with "the Chiang Kai-shek clique" deserves to be ignored, except that the Embassy has repeated it so often. The incongruity of the charge should be evident to the Embassy from the fact that India maintains diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China alone and has no such relations with Taiwan.

(d) The Embassy makes much out of the expulsion of some Chinese from India for their anti-social and anti-Indian activities. But other foreigners too have been similarly expelled from time to time when their behaviour warranted it. In those cases the Embassies concerned had invariably shown a proper appreciation of the sovereign jurisdiction of the Indian Government in the matter. The Government of India take strong exception to this charge contained in the Embassy's Memorandum which goes against all notions of accepted diplomatic behaviour and seeks to interfere in the purely internal affairs of India.

4. In the Chinese Embassy's Memorandum dated 12th December 1961, there is no mention of the Chinese Consulate General, Calcutta, letter dated 11th December 1961, to the Chief Secretary to the Government of West Bengal, regarding the taking over by the Consulate General of the Chung Hwa School. It has now been ascertained that without waiting for authorisation from the competent authorities, irregular and objectionable steps have been taken by the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong in closing down the Chung Hwa School. It should be obvious that the Consul General of China in Calcutta, can, in no way, authorise the Trade Agent in Kalimpong to take over the premises of the Chung Hwa School. Such action falls well outside the province of a Trade Agency and reveals a lack of respect for the local laws and regulations. This illegal action of the Chinese Trade Agent is further compounded by the fact that on the 14th December 1961, they had also surreptitiously removed furniture etc. from the school and taken the same to the Chinese Trade Agency premises. In this the Trade Agency has grossly exceeded its functions both under the 1954 Agreement as also under recognized principles of Customary International Law. It is not the function of a Trade Agency to take charge of private property on anybody's behalf and in so doing it will not be entitled to the privileges and immunities shown under Article I of the 1954 Agreement.
5. In view of the above irregularities and illegalities, the Government of India call upon the Embassy of the People's Republic of China to take immediate action on the following:

(a) The premises together with the keys of the building of the Chung Hwa School should be handed over to the Sub-Divisional Officer, Kalimpong, within 10 days of the receipt of this note.

(b) Any equipment removed from the premises of the Chung Hwa School should be restored to the premises in the presence of the S.D.O. within the same period of time.

(c) The Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong should be instructed in clear terms not to transgress the limits laid down in the 1954 Agreement and act in defiance of the law of the land.

6. The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Embassy of China in India to the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi, 28 May 1962

The Embassy of the People’s Republic of China in India presents its compliments to the Ministry of External Affairs of the Republic of India, and has the honour to state as follows:

About 6:45 on the afternoon of May 25, 1962, more than forty Indians shouted anti-Chinese slogans in front of the Embassy, insulting Premier Chou En-lai and the Chinese people. They viciously attacked China and burnt the Embassy’s bulletins and other Chinese publications. They did not disperse till 7 P.M.

It must be pointed out that the Government of India has time and again connived with a few elements hostile to China in making noises in front of the Embassy, and, what is even more serious, in insulting a Chinese leader. For this the Government of India cannot evade its due responsibility. The Embassy hereby lodges a protest with the Government of India, and urges the Government of India to adopt effective measures to prevent recurrence of similar incidents in the future.

The Embassy takes this opportunity to renew to the Ministry the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 28 May 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Embassy of India in China and, with reference to the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India dated March 2, 1962, has the honour to state as follows:

The Indian Ministry of External Affairs in its reply note of March 2 did not mention a single word to condemn the ruffians for their crime of unlawfully raiding the office of the "China Review" and the Lita Press but, on the contrary, made groundless charges against the victimized "China Review", even alleging that the violence was "instigated by the support given to one group against the other by the Chinese Missions in India". This is not only an act of turning the facts upside down and shirking responsibility, but is a calculated attack against the Chinese Missions. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China expresses its deep regret at this extremely unfair attitude of the Indian Government and resolutely rejects the unwarranted slanderous charges against the Chinese Missions.

Both the depositions made by some of the criminals before the Court in Calcutta and the police report show that the incident was a premeditated and organised act of violence. The criminals, with such implements of violence as chopper, axe and iron rods in hand, smashed up the "China Review" office and wounded a member of the Press. The hearings at the Indian Court have established the guilt of these ruffians. The Indian Ministry of External Affairs however, in disregard of the facts, turned around and slandered the wronged party, so as to absolve the criminals of their crimes. This unusual practice can only be regarded as proceeding from ulterior motives.

This smashing up of the "China Review" office by the ruffians is by no means fortuitous. This is another case of political persecution following the unwarranted persecution of Chinese nationals and expulsion of the leading members of the "China Review" by the Indian Government. Therefore, the Chinese Government hereby once again asks the Indian Government to respect the legitimate rights and interests of the Chinese nationals, to ensure the safety of the "China Review" and to assure that no similar incidents will recur in the future.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of India in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and, with reference to the note delivered by the Indian Ministry of External Affairs to the Chinese Embassy in India on May 23, 1962, has the honour to state as follows:

1. In its memorandum of December 12, 1961, the Chinese Embassy in India proved with indisputable facts that the Indian local authorities had systematically persecuted the Chung Hwa School in Kalimpong and connived at the scheming activities of Chiang Kai-shek elements. As a result of this persecution, the Chung Hwa School was compelled virtually to close down. The Indian Government’s arbitrary arguments and denial are futile.

2. The Chung Hwa School in Kalimpong is a school run by Chinese nationals in the locality with pooled funds. In the situation in which the School has been unable to continue functioning owing to persecution by the Indian local authorities, it is entirely proper and legitimate for the Chinese Consulate-General in Calcutta to take charge of the property of the School at the request of its Board of Directors. The Chinese Consulate-General in Calcutta notified the West Bengal Government of India of this by letter dated December 11, 1961, enclosing a copy of the letter from the Head and Deputy Heads of the Board of Directors of the Chung Hwa School requesting the Consulate-General to take charge of the School’s property. To perform its trusteeship over the School’s property the Consulate-General entrusted the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong which is in the locality to look after such purely technical matters as keeping the school building under lock, looking after the School property and paying taxes for the School. This is in no way “taking over” the School, and has nothing to do with the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement. Furthermore, the Chinese Trade Agency wrote to the Sub-Divisional Officer at Kalimpong, India, on December 12, 1961, informing the latter of its looking after the School. The Sub-Divisional Officer in his reply dated December 15 stated that the matter had been noted, and a letter would follow concerning this. However, more than five months have passed, and no objection has been heard from the Indian side. Now on the eve of the withdrawal of the Trade Agency, the Indian Ministry of External Affairs suddenly sent in a note on May 23, arbitrarily alleging that the Chinese Trade Agency “falls well outside” its province, “close down” the Chung Hwa School, and “takes charge of private property”. These allegations are groundless and can only be regarded as deliberate distortion of the facts and malicious slanders against the Chinese Trade Agency.

3. Especially surprising is the fact that the Indian Government should attempt to deprive the Chinese Consulate-General of its right to take charge of the property of a school run by Chinese nationals. The Indian Government demanded that the Chinese side should hand over to the Sub-Divisional Officer, Kalimpong, India, the premises together with the keys of the building of the Chung Hwa School within 10 days of the receipt of the note from the Indian Ministry of External Affairs. The Chinese Government absolutely cannot agree to, and lodges its protest against, this rude demand which scorns the internationally acknowledged consular functions and powers and infringes on the legitimate property of foreign nationals.

4. The Chinese Government hereby states that to take charge of the property of the Chung Hwa School is a proper duty of the Chinese Consulate-General, and hopes that the Indian Government will respect the legitimate rights of the Chinese Embassy and Consulate-General to protect the proper rights and interests of their nationals.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 15 June 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to acknowledge the latter's Note No. M/552/62, dated the 28th May 1962.

On the evening of 25th May 1962, the Praja Socialist Party took out a procession as a protest against continued violations of Indian territory by Chinese forces. At about 6.45 p.m. the procession reached Lytton Road and was stopped by the police at a distance of over 50 yards from the gate of the Chinese Embassy. Elaborate police arrangements were made to ensure the fullest protection to the Embassy.

The processionists asked for the vacation of Chinese aggression from Indian territory and burnt certain publications, circulated in India, which dared to question the territorial integrity of India. The procession stayed on Lytton Road well outside the Chinese Embassy for a total of fifteen minutes.

The Chinese Embassy should be aware by now that under the constitution and laws of India, it is not possible to prohibit demonstrations in this country so long as they remain peaceful.

The Government of India reject the Chinese Embassy's protest note dated the 28th May 1962, which by questioning as it does the fundamental rights of the citizens of India, shows a regrettable disregard for the laws and constitution of India.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and with reference to the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs delivered to the Chinese Embassy in India on May 17, 1962, has the honour to state the following:

Concerning Indian ruffians' provocative disturbance in front of the Chinese Consulates-General in Bombay and Calcutta and the insult flung at Chinese leaders, the Indian Government, in its note tries to explain it away by slandering that China has allegedly occupied Indian territory. This helps nothing. There is a dispute between China and India over the boundary, which remains to be settled equitably and reasonably through peaceful negotiations between the two sides. However, the essence of the Sino-Indian boundary question, as pointed out by the Chinese Government is that the Indian Government has laid claims on large pieces of Chinese territory, incessantly encroached on and set by aggressive strong points and made armed provocations inside Chinese territory. Such being the case, it is China which is hurt and feels indignant. But the Chinese peoples, proceeding from the overall consideration for Sino-Indian friendship and Asian-African solidarity, have long since held an attitude of self-restraint. The Indian Government's repeated connivance at and shielding of the acts hostile to China and insulting Chinese leaders has further deteriorated the relations between the two countries. One may ask what India would think about this if it were put in the position of the Chinese Government. The Indian Government's persistence in such a wrong attitude is not in the interest of the Chinese and Indian peoples and it lays bare the fact that the Indian Government is making use of the boundary question to create tension and poison the Sino-Indian relations.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy the assurances of its highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking to the Embassy of India in China, 23 June, 1962

With regard to the case of ruffians attempting to set fire to the Chinese Consulate-General in Bombay, the reply of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs is entirely unsatisfactory. In its memorandum of January 18, 1962, the Indian Ministry of External Affairs did not make any account for the cause of the fire except the ambiguous assertion that some Diwali sparklers and charred cotton were found near the scene of the fire. It is only surprising that the Indian Government, which bears the responsibility for the protection of the security of official foreign missions in India, instead of undertaking serious investigations into the case, should have made fabricated charges against the Chinese Consulate-General in Bombay whose security had been threatened. Viewing this together with the fact that the window-panes of the same Consulate-General has been repeatedly broken through of late and the Indian Government has kept closing its eyes to the matter, the Chinese cannot but express its anxiety for the security of the Chinese Consulate-General in Bombay.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 26 June, 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to note No. 52I, dated the 2nd June 1962 from the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

In their note dated the 23rd May 1962 the Government of India have already refuted the baseless allegations about Indian persecution and interference with the Chung Hwa School in Kalimpong.
These are mischievous allegations and they do not confer legality on the seizure of the School building or removal of equipment therefrom by the Chinese Trade Agent. The action of the Chinese Consul General in authorising the Chinese Trade Agent to take charge of the property on his behalf is highly improper. The Chinese Consul General has only aided and abetted the Chinese Trade Agent in performing an act in defiance of the duly constituted authorities of the Government of India.

The attempt to justify the unwarranted action of the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong as being the legitimate exercise of a Consular function betrays ignorance of well-recognised principles of customary international law. The arbitrary seizure of property cannot be considered to be in defence of the interests of its nationals by a foreign Mission. Even if one ignores the fact that the request of the so-called Board of Directors of the Chung Hwa School to the Chinese Consulate-General in Calcutta to take over the school was arbitrary and did not represent the wishes of the majority of the original sponsors of the school, the action taken to assume physical charge of this property is questionable under Indian laws and regulations.

It is not customary in India to proceed arbitrarily against any person or institution. The particular offence having been committed by agencies of a foreign Government, the local authorities concerned has to carry out a thorough inquiry before proceeding against the offenders. It was in deference to the status of the main offender viz.
the Chinese Trade Agent that the Chinese Embassy was advised that the premises and property of the Chung Hwa School should be handed over to the Sub Divisional Officer, Kalimpong within 10 days of the receipt of notice. Since this property, arbitrarily seized, was not handed over as advised, the matter is now before the court.

The Ministry of External Affairs avail themselves of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China
the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 4 July 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China and have the honour to refer to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs’ note, dated May 28, 1962, regarding the incident which took place in Calcutta on the 17th January 1962.

The Government of China have already been informed in the Ministry of External Affairs note, dated 2nd March 1962, that case had been registered against the offenders before a court of law. The persons concerned have on the basis of the evidence been found guilty of certain infringements of the law by the court and sentenced.

The judgment of the court specifically dealt with the offences committed in this particular incident. Courts in India are above politics and impartial. The activities of the Chinese missions in India and their using the China Review as a mouthpiece of their official propaganda and fomenting internecine feud among groups of Chinese nationals resident in this country are matters which were never before the court and the court had no occasion to pronounce any opinions or findings on these activities.

The Government of India hope that the Government of China will appreciate the impartiality with which laws are administered by the courts in India and not draw any unwarranted conclusions from the judgment of the court.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People’s Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Memorandum given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 10 July 1962

Reference note No. 640 dated the 23rd June 1962 from the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

2. The facts regarding the old and derelict sofa set lying under a cocoanut trees in the courtyard of the Chinese Consulate-General which caught fire on the 5th December 1961 have already been given in the Ministry of External Affairs Memorandum, dated the 10th January 1962. There is nothing further to add except to reiterate that the members of the Chinese Consulate-General refused to cooperate and obstructed the investigation of the fire.

3. About the broken window-panes, the local Government have given the facts to the Chinese Consulate-General in their letter No. C.A.P.-4362-43729-E, dated the 21st May 1962. Little boys threw stones at the fruit of a mango tree and missed the target. The damage thus caused to the window panes was unintentional. However, the police apprehended the boys and admonished them. Apart from the mangoes, the boys had no other motive. Nevertheless, in view of the Chinese Government's political suspicions, further steps have been taken by the Bombay police to patrol the vicinity of the Chinese Consulate-General at Bombay.
Note given by the Ministry of External Affairs, New Delhi to the Embassy of China in India, 10 July 1962

The Ministry of External Affairs present their compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and have the honour to refer to note No. 439 dated the 23rd June 1962, from the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The facts about the demonstrations which took place in Bombay and Calcutta in October|November 1961, have already been communicated in the Ministry of External Affairs notes of the 18th January 1962 and the 17th May 1962. There is nothing further to add to them.

It is surprising that, the Government of China, having illegally occupied by stages, since 1957, more than 12,000 square miles of Indian territory and laid claims over more, should attempt now to delude themselves that it is not they but the Government of India who have committed aggression. It is but natural that the people of India should express their feelings over these systematic Chinese violations of India's territorial integrity and sovereignty. The Government of India cannot interfere with this normal exercise of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Indian Constitution so long as this is done in a non-violent and peaceful manner.

The Ministry of External Affairs renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of their highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 3 December 1961

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state the following which the Embassy is requested to transmit to the Indian Government:

The Agreement between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India on Trade and intercourse between Tibet Region of China and India, which was signed on April 29, 1954, came into effect on June 3 the same year upon ratification by both Parties.
According to the provisions of Article 6 of the Agreement the Agreement shall remain in force for eight years, so it is due to expire and cease to be in force on June 3, 1962.

With a view to consolidating and developing the traditional friendship between the peoples of China and India and promoting the economic and cultural interflow between the two countries, the Chinese Government proposes that the Chinese and Indian Governments hold negotiations so as to conclude, in accordance with the Five Principles of mutual respect for each other’s territorial integrity and sovereignty, mutual non-aggression, mutual non-interference in each other’s internal affairs, equality and mutual benefit and peaceful co-existence, a new agreement on trade in intercourse, to replace the original Agreement. The Chinese Government is looking forward to the reply of the Indian Government to this proposal.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China in India and has the honour to state that it has received a proposal from the Government of the People's Republic of China through the Indian Embassy in Peking to hold negotiations between the two Governments to conclude, in accordance with the Five Principles of mutual respect for each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty, mutual non-aggression, mutual non-interference in each other's internal affairs, equal and mutual benefit and peaceful coexistence, a new agreement on trade and intercourse to replace the 1954 Agreement between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of India on Trade and Intercourse between the Tibetan region of China and India, which will expire and cease to be in force on 3rd June, 1962.

2. As the Embassy of the People's Republic of China is aware, Government of India took the initiative to enter into negotiations with the Government of the People's Republic of China in 1954 with a view to reaching an agreement on the revised pattern of economic and cultural relations between India and Tibet so as to establish a climate of friendship and co-operation between India and China and to ensure and indeed to facilitate friendly and co-operative relations between India and China and to promote peace and rapid economic and cultural development not only in the two countries but also in South East Asia. It was with this end in view that the Five Principles of peaceful co-existence were enunciated and set out in the preamble to the Agreement. It was hoped that these Five Principles would not only regulate for years to come the relations between India and China but that the agreement would pave the way for a wider acceptance of these principles in inter-state relations more particularly in Asia.

3. The Government of India, ever since the signing of the 1954 Agreement, consistently pursued a policy of creating a zone in Asia free from cold-war conflicts and expected that the Government of the People's Republic of China would also co-operate in this commendable objective.

4. Within a year or two of the signing of this Agreement, the Government of the People's Republic of China not only began to curtail progressively the economic and cultural facilities provided for Indian traders and Indian pilgrims under the Agreement, but, what is more reprehensible, started to encroach, at first insidiously and later on openly, on territories which had clearly been accepted as Indian, and by 1958, began to make open claims, followed up by aggressive military activity, on several thousand square miles of Indian territory. The position today is that the Government of the People's Republic of China have not only violated both in letter and spirit the Five Principles of co-existence set out in the preamble to the 1954 Agreement but have actually occupied by force over 12,000 square miles of Indian territory and continue to expand their illegal claims and pursue their aggressive military activities to forcibly occupy large areas of Indian territory.

5. The Government of India always desired friendly and cooperative relations with the Government of the People's Republic of China. It was to this end that they negotiated the 1954 Agreement even though this involved relinquishment of important rights and privileges in Tibet that the Government of India had inherited from the past. The Government of India willingly sacrificed these inherited rights and privileges with a view to laying a new and firm foundation of friendship and co-operation between India and China. The hopes and aspirations entertained by the Government of India while negotiating for and signing the 1954 Agreement have, however, been completely frustrated by the aggressive and expansionist policies followed by the Government of the People's Republic of China during the last few years.

6. The Government of India are still desirous of having friendly and co-operative relations with the Government of the People's Republic of China but they cannot see how, in the context of what has been stated in paragraphs 4 and 5 above, they can start negotiations for a new agreement in accordance with the Five Principles. The first essential for the starting of such negotiations is the reversal of the aggressive policies followed by the Government of the People's Republic of China during the last few years and the restoration of climate which assures the strict observance of the Five Principles both in letter and spirit.

The Ministry of External Affairs of the Government of India avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 3 March, 1962.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to state its views again on the question of negotiations for an agreement on trade and intercourse between China and India, which the Embassy is requested to transmit to the Indian Government.

The Chinese Government has read the note of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs of December 15, 1961 in reply to the Chinese Government’s note of December 3, 1961 in which the Chinese Government proposed that the Governments of China and India hold negotiations so as to conclude, in accordance with the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence, a new agreement on trade and intercourse to replace the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement on Trade and Intercourse between the Tibet Region of China and India, which will expire on June 3, 1962 and cease to be in force. It is wholly from the good desire of safeguarding the friendship between the two countries that the Chinese Government put forward this proposal. Contrary to expectation, however, the Indian Government in its note not only rejected this friendly proposal, but lacking elementary courtesy, made wilful and ill-intentioned charges and slanders against China.
The Chinese Government can only express its disappointment and regret at this extraordinary reaction.

The question of an agreement on trade and intercourse between China and India and that of the Sino-Indian boundary are two different matters. There is no reason why the boundary dispute between the two countries should hinder the two sides from conducting negotiations for an agreement on trade and intercourse.
That is why the Chinese Government, in putting forward the pro-sal for holding negotiations on the question of an agreement on trade and intercourse, did not link it with the Sino-Indian boundary question. In its note, however, the Indian Government insisted on linking the Chinese Government’s proposal with the Sino-Indian boundary question. This can only complicate the matter. Since the Indian note has referred to the boundary question, the Chinese Government cannot but point out that it is India that has occupied big tracts of China’s territory and laid claims to even bigger ones, and not the other way round. Even Puling-Sumdo, which is explicitly listed in the 1954 Sino-Indian Agreement on Trade and Intercourse as one of the markets for trade in western Tibet opened by the Chinese Government, was occupied by the Indian side shortly after the signing of the Agreement. Nevertheless, the Chinese Government, in proposing that the Chinese and Indian Governments hold negotiations to conclude a new agreement on trade and intercourse, has not put forward any precondition for the Indian Government to fulfil,
The Indian Government in its note not only charge the Chinese Government with violation of the Five Principles, but stated that "the first essential" for starting the negotiations is "the reversal of the aggressive policies followed by China during the last few years and the restoration of a climate which assures the strict observance of the Five Principles both in letter and spirit". This charge is totally groundless. On the contrary, it is the Indian side that in fact has repeatedly violated the Five Principles and the 1954 Agreement. Apart from the boundary question, the following facts may be cited. At the time of the armed rebellion of the handful of reactionary traitors in Tibet, the Indian Government interfered in China's internal affairs by openly expressing its sympathy for the Tibetan rebels and conniving at their anti-Chinese political activities. Going back on its own pledge, the Indian Government even today allows the Tibetan rebels to operate in India in the virtual capacity of an exile government. Owing to various restrictions imposed by the Indian Government, the Trade Agency in Kalimpong, India, set up by the Chinese Government in accordance with the 1954 Agreement, has been placed in a situation where it is hardly able to perform its functions. These are undeniable facts. Now the Indian Government reverses right and wrong by slandering China as following aggressive policies, and preposterously asks China to reverse such non-existent policies as the first essential for starting negotiations for an agreement on trade and intercourse. Should the Indian Government persist in this attitude, the Chinese Government, regretably, can only derive from this the conclusion that the Indian Government harbours the intention of rendering it impossible to hold negotiations for an agreement on trade and intercourse between the two countries.

The Chinese Government, in proposing that the Chinese and Indian Governments hold negotiations to conclude a new agreement on trade and intercourse, is not seeking any interests of China alone, but proceeds from the long-term and all-round interests of the two peoples. Therefore, the Chinese Government reaffirms its proposal made in its note of December 3, 1961 and hopes that the Indian Government will reconsider the matter.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Indian Embassy in China the assurances of its highest consideration.
The Ministry of External Affairs presents its compliments to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China and has the honour to acknowledge receipt of the Chinese Government's note of 3rd March on the subject of a new agreement on trade and intercourse between India and the Tibet region of China.

2. The Chinese Government have repeated their proposal for negotiations for a new agreement to replace the present agreement which is due to expire on 3rd June. They have suggested that an agreement will help "to safeguard friendship between the two countries" and that trade and intercourse should not be linked with the border question as this may lead to complications. They have alleged that it is not China, but India, which has "repeatedly violated the Five Principles and the Agreement". This baseless allegation has been made before and has been refuted in notes sent earlier, but the Government of India are taking this opportunity to restate their position in this matter in some detail.

3. From the very start, after India became independent, the Government of India have consistently followed a policy of friendly relations with China. For some years after liberations, China's attitude towards the independent neighbouring countries of Asia did not show proper understanding of the new forces at work in independent Asia. The Government of India, however, persisted in their efforts to cultivate friendly relations with China and, in 1953, took the initiative to enter into negotiations with the Chinese Government. The purpose of these negotiations was to reach a settlement which would clear the way for friendly and co-operative relations. These negotiations resulted in the Agreement of 1954 and the enunciation of the Five Principles.

4. The Agreement of 1954 was obviously intended to settle all outstanding issues which had been inherited from the past. It laid down regulations for trade and intercourse with the Tibet region across the common border. It also, for the first time in history, laid down the Five Principles as a code governing relations between two friendly Governments. Each side gave a solemn undertaking that it would respect the other's territorial integrity and sovereignty. The Chinese side had full knowledge at the time of the negotiations of what constituted the territorial boundaries of India. If it had any doubt, what was the purpose of the undertaking which it gave to respect India's territorial integrity? Surely, it is not open to a Government which enters into a solemn agreement on the basis of the Five Principles, first to give such an undertaking and then to claim part of the other's territory as its own?

5. It cannot be said that the Chinese Government was in any doubt at the time of the 1954 Agreement about what India regarded to be the correct traditional boundary between the two countries. What Indian official maps clearly showed conformed to the territorial status quo of 1954 and earlier. The Government of India had published these Indian official maps which were precise and the Chinese Government knew about them. The Government of India had also repeatedly drawn the attention of the Government of China to the precise Indian official maps and to the bewildering variety of erroneous alignments shown in the Chinese maps. The Government of China in reply always assured the Government of India that the old Chinese maps were products of the incorrect cartography of the Kuomintang regime and that they had no time to revise them. There was no ambiguity in so far as the Government of India was concerned about the traditional boundary alignment precisely shown in Indian official maps; nor did the Government of India have any reason to believe that there was any uncertainty on the part of the Government of China regarding the correctness of this alignment. There can be no doubt at all that the 1954 Agreement confirmed the territorial status quo as it existed at that time. Surely, no agreement like that of 1954 negotiated over a period of some months could have been arrived at with substantial doubts and mental reservations on the question of the border in the minds of one of the parties to the Agreement.

6. The entire frontier was a peaceful one at the time of the 1954 Agreement and continued to be so far a few years thereafter. There was no conflict or trouble along the frontier. It is only during the last few years that conflicts and troubles have arisen along the frontier. These have not arisen because of any action taken by India. The cause of the recent troubles and conflicts along this frontier is the action taken by the Chinese authorities along this frontier. These actions taken by the Chinese authorities along the frontier have undermined confidence on the Indian side and led to conflict and misgivings.

7. So far as trade and intercourse are concerned many restrictions have been placed on Indian traders, officials and pilgrims in contravention of the provisions of the 1954 Agreement. There has been a long exchange of notes on the subject and it is not necessary to repeat the factual details given in these notes.

8. A more serious matter is the violation by the Chinese Government of India's territorial integrity and sovereignty. Since 1957, Chinese forces have begun a process of intrusion and occupation of Indian territory in the Aksai Chin area. In September 1958, they captured an Indian patrol at Haji Langar and interfered for the first time with the lawful exercise of Indian jurisdiction in the area. In disregard of the protests of the Government of India, Chinese forces, by the end of 1959, spread further west and south of the Aksai Chin. They built roads from there to Kongka La and along the bed of the Qaraqash river which was being regularly patrolled by the Indian Border Police. In October 1959, an Indian police force on patrol duty was ambushed by the Chinese forces at Kongka La and suffered heavy casualties. Between 1960 and 1961, the Chinese forces advanced further into Indian territory. All these facts have been brought to the notice of the Chinese Government by the Government of India in a series of notes. In addition to unlawful occupation, the Chinese Government have made unlawful claims to large parts of Indian territory.

9. The Chinese allegation that it is not China, but India, which has violated the Five Principles is manifestly groundless. No territory has been occupied or claimed by the Government of India which is not actually part of India and which was not known to the Chinese Government at the time of 1953-54 negotiations to be part of India. The Chinese Government's allegations that Puling Sumdo has, since 1954, been occupied by India illustrates the prevailing confusion in the minds of the Chinese authorities and their lack of knowledge of the correct delineation of the border in this region. The factual position is that Puling Sumdo lies to the north of the main watershed. It has been listed in the 1954 Agreement as one of the trade marts in western Tibet. It is part of Chinese territory and continues to be in Chinese occupation. It has not been occupied by the Government of India.

10. Another Chinese allegation is that by showing their sympathy for the Tibetans who had to leave the Tibet region in 1959, the Government of India interfered in the internal affairs of China. Tibetan refugees have been given asylum in India in accordance with international law and practice in this matter. The Chinese Government seem to lack a proper understanding of the international law and practice on this subject. Tibetan refugees have received no encouragement from the Government of India to indulge in political activities. The Government of India took measures to disarm the refugees on their entry into India and applied various restrictions on their activities during their stay in India. The allegation that the Tibetans who have taken refuge in India have been allowed to form a government in exile is completely baseless.

11. The Chinese Government have also referred to restrictions imposed on the Chinese Trade Agency in Kalimpong. The Government of India have already explained to the Chinese Government that certain regulations have been framed, under Indian laws, to control the activities of foreigners for reasons of national security. They regret that the Chinese Trade Agency has been found on many occasions to be violating these regulations and abusing its privileged position. In any case, the regulations in Kalimpong are not nearly as harsh and all-pervasive as the calculated measures which have been taken in the Tibet region to paralyse the activities of the Indian Missions.

12. The facts mentioned above show that it is not India, but China, which has violated the Five Principles and the provisions of the Agreement. Armed incursions and occupation of Indian territory by Chinese forces, since 1954, have aggravated the situation. This has led to an undermining of confidence and has created deep resentment among the people of India.

13. Although the Chinese policy since the Agreement of 1954 and their aggressive activities on the border have caused serious disappointment, there is no change in the Government of India's basic policy towards China. The Government of India are convinced that friendly and co-operative relations between India and China based on the Five Principles are in the interest, not only of the two countries, but also of peace in Asia and the world. In conformity with their policy, the Government of India would welcome any genuine effort to restore friendly and cooperative relations between India and China. They cannot, therefore, have any objection in principle to negotiations for a new agreement to maintain and develop trade and intercourse between India and the Tibet region. These negotiations, however, can hardly be undertaken till confidence in the bona fides of the Chinese authorities that they will implement the agreement both in letter and spirit is restored. Nor can an agreement on trade and intercourse across the border be negotiated when the Chinese authorities continue to violate the territorial integrity of India along that border.

14. The facts relating to the border are now available to the Chinese Government in the Report of the Officials which has been published in India. The Report which has not been published in China shows conclusively that the territory occupied, or claimed, by the Chinese Government is Indian territory. As these facts do not seem to have been considered by the Chinese Government the Secretary General of the Ministry of External Affairs, during the visit to China, drew their attention to them. The Government of India will be glad if, in the light of these facts, the Chinese Government will take early steps to implement their undertaking to respect India's territorial integrity and sovereignty, withdraw their forces from Indian territory and restore the status quo along the border as it existed in 1954. This alone can restore confidence and create the requisite friendly atmosphere for negotiating a new agreement.

15. The Ministry of External Affairs avails itself of this opportunity to renew to the Embassy of the People's Republic of China the assurances of its highest consideration.
Note given by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Peking, to the Embassy of India in China, 11 May 1962

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China presents its compliments to the Indian Embassy in China and has the honour to acknowledge receipt of the Indian Government's note of April 11, 1962, on the subject of the agreement on trade and intercourse between China and India.

1. The Chinese Government expresses its regret at the fact that the Indian Government once again turned down the proposal for negotiating and concluding a new agreement on trade and intercourse to replace the 1954 Agreement on Trade and Intercourse Between the Tibet Region of China and India. The various excuses made by the Indian Government in its note are totally unreasonable. In order to distinguish between right and wrong, the Chinese Government wishes to take this opportunity to restate its position.

2. The Indian Government asserted that, as the 1954 Agreement laid down the Five Principles as a code governing relations between two friendly governments and as each side gave a solemn undertaking that it would respect the other's territorial integrity and sovereignty, it meant that the Chinese Government had accepted the Sino-Indian boundary line unilaterally claimed by India. In its note, the Indian Government pretentiously said, "The Chinese side had full knowledge at the time of the negotiations of what constituted the territorial boundaries of India. If it had any doubt, what was the purpose of the undertaking which it gave to respect India's territorial integrity? Surely, it is not open to a government which enters into a solemn agreement on the basis of the Five Principles, first to give such an undertaking and then to claim part of the other's territory as its own". But the first of the Five Principles is "mutual respect for each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty," and does not stipulate that one party must accept the boundary claimed by the other party. If acceptance of the principle of "mutual respect for each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty" should be construed to mean the Chinese Government's acceptance of the boundary line claimed by India, then, by the same logic, can it not be construed also as meaning the Indian Government's acceptance of the boundary line maintained by China? Obviously, such argumentation can only be regarded as unilateral bigotry and is purely a distortion of an international document.

3. The fact is that the 1954 Agreement settled only those questions relating to trade, cultural relations and friendly intercourse between China's Tibet region and India; it did not settle all the questions existing between China and India, and did not even touch on the boundary question. As for maps, the fact is that only after the signing of the 1954 Agreement did the Indian Government bring up the question of maps with the Chinese Government, and only in 1958 did the Indian Government call the attention of the Chinese Government to the boundary alignment claimed by it and cite the Indian map published in 1956. How can it be said that at the time of the negotiation and signing of the 1954 Agreement the Chinese Government already accepted the boundary alignment which has come to be drawn on Indian maps only in recent years? This is absurd.

4. Then there is the question of Puling-Sumdo. It is a crystal clear fact that Puling-Sumdo has been invaded and occupied by India. On the Indian maps published in recent years, it is included in Indian territory and renamed Pulam-sumda. To cover up the fact, the Indian Government arbitrarily alleged that Poling, which is situated deep within Chinese territory, is Puling-Sumdo. To say that Puling-Sumdo continues to be held by China while in fact to have invaded and occupied China's Puling-Sumdo—such practice, to put it mildly, cannot but be considered unseemly.

5. The Indian note, reviewing the development of Sino-Indian relations in the past ten years and more, alleged that responsibility for the deterioration of Sino-Indian relations lies with China and that "from the very start, after India became independent, the Government of India have consistently followed a policy of friendly relations with China". This allegation is groundless. It is true that, through the joint efforts of China and India, Sino-Indian relations were friendly. Our two countries early established diplomatic relations, jointly initiated the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence and cooperated in international affairs in a friendly way. Even now the Chinese side is still making efforts to restore such friendly relations. But there is no reason to deem that the Indian side too has always done so. If one respects the objective historical facts, one cannot but acknowledge that there has been a dark side to the Sino-Indian relations since their very beginning.

6. In 1950 the Chinese People's Liberation Army advanced into Tibet. In a series of notes delivered to the Chinese Government between August and November in the same year, the Indian Government described China's exercise of its sovereignty in its own territory Tibet as "invasion" of Tibet, as being "deplorable" and "with no justification whatsoever" and asserted that China's action "has greatly added to the tensions of the world and to drift towards general war" and "affected these friendly relations (between India and China) and the interest of peace all over the world". After that the Indian Government has all along allowed a batch of Tibetan fugitives to carry out disruptive and subversive activities against China's Tibet in Kalimpong and other places in India. All this clearly constitutes interference in China's internal affairs.

7. In 1959 the Indian Government described China's exercise of its sovereignty in putting down the rebellion in Tibet as "armed intervention", "oppressing and suppressing" and "autonomy" of Tibet and held that by doing so the Chinese Government has not kept "the assurances given to India". The Indian Government connived at the political activities carried out in India by the Tibetan rebels, distributed traitorous statements for them, allowed them to stage demonstrations against the People's Republic of China and even publish a so-called draft construction for an "independent Tibet". All this has gone far beyond the scope of giving political asylum and can in no way be justified by any international law or practice. Obviously the Indian Government is not reconciled to the fact that the Chinese Government is exercising its sovereignty in Tibet.

