Some Copper Coins of Akbar found in the Kángrá district.—By E. E. OLIVER, M. I. C. E., M. R. A. S., &c. (With two Plates.)

While on tour last cold weather as I was just leaving the Kángrá Valley a baniyá from Chintpúrní, a village on the boundary line separating the Kángrá from the Hoshiyárpur district, brought up to my camp a large bag of the copper coins of Akbar, numbering several hundred. All had been found together and were in excellent preservation, the lettering and ornamentations being almost as sharp as if fresh from the mint. Although struck at widely distant places and considerably differing dates, the larger portion of them could hardly have been long in circulation. They might not improbably have formed a part of one of the bags of 1,000 paisá which Bernier says, in Aurangzeb's time at least, were kept ready for distribution, and have been sent up to the valley for the payment of troops during one of the Mughal expeditions under Jehángír or Sháh Jehán, and have lain hid away ever since.

A selection of 90 or 100 of the best resulted in the following list of mints and months, and from these again I give in a couple of plates some 30, which may be of interest in continuation of recent papers on similar coins by Mr. Rodgers in the pages of this Journal.

4 E. E. Oliver-Some Copper Coins of Akbar found in Kangra. [No. 1,

The whole are struck as falus or nim tankahs, the average of 90 coins weighed by me being $318\frac{1}{2}$ grains; several exceeded 320, in one case touching 326 grains.

Some of the mints, 28 in all, exclusive of two unread, are new to me, or are variants of known mints, and one or two I have not been able to identify. Possibly some of the more experienced contributors to this Journal may be more successful.

Akbarábád, Mirath, Nárnol, Fathipur, Sherpur, Gobindpur, Bairátah, Deogir, Doganw, and (? Sirsa Banáras) are not mentioned by Abul Fazl in his list of mints given in the Ain. Dáru'l Saltanat Fathipur is, however, presumably what he refers to as "the seat of government." (Dáru'l Khiláfat) Akbarábád is of course the Muhammadanised name of Agrah. Nárnol or Nárnaul was well-known for its copper mines and is very common, but I do not remember seeing Mirath mentioned as a mint of Akbar's before. Sherpur may not improbably be the town in the Bográ district, Bengal, referred to both in the Ain and the Akbarnáma as an important frontier post, and usually called "Sherpur Murchha" to distinguish it from another Sherpur in Maimansinh. Rája Mán Singh, Akbar's Hindú General in Bengal from 1589 to 1606 is said to have built a palace here, and have used it as a centre for military operations in Southern Bengal. In 1660 it finds a place in the Dutch Government maps under the disguise of "Ceerpoor Mirts." Of Gobinpurs there are two or three in Bengal, now insignificant villages. The name, however, survives in certain fixed divisions and in a mart in Gayá, that may formerly have been of greater importance.

Bairátah or Bairát, General Cunningham takes to be Virát, the capital of Matsya or Gujarát, where Hindú legends make the five Pándus spend their exile from Dilli. As Bairátnagar the old city was deserted for several centuries, but probably repeopled again in Akbar's time. It too was always celebrated for its copper mines and is mentioned in this connection by Abul Fazl in the A'in. Deogir, the Daulatábád of Muhammad bin Tughlaq, is variously called in the A'in by both names and as Dhárágarh, but whether during Akbar's time, or at any rate prior to 986, the date of this coin, it had any right to be termed Dáru'l Khiláfat may perhaps be doubted.

Dáru'l Islám Dogánw I have so far altogether failed to identify. Comparing some dozen coins there seems no reason to doubt the reading to be as above, and the prefix "Dáru'l Islám" points to a place of some importance. The dates of the coins in my cabinet extend over 12 years, or from 980 to 992 A. H. The termination gánw or gáon was common, and we have Sátgánw, Pánchgánw, Chálisgánw, Chittagáon, Sunárgáon, Lohgánw, Deogánw and numerous others mentioned in the Ain and the the Akbarnáma, but I have not been able to trace any mention of a Dogánw.

No. 9. (? Sirsa Banáras) is quite open to other readings, and I only offer this tentatively. I have not found any mention of such a place. Atak Banáras and Katak Banáras we know, but did Akbar ever christen any place Sirsa Banáras ?

It will be noticed the falús struck at Nárnol commence from the year 962 A. H. or a year before Akbar's accession, but the only inscription is "Zarb falús Nárnol" and the coinage at this place may possibly have been continuous from the time of Sher Sháh to whose copper issue these pieces bear a marked likeness.

It is perhaps not a little curious in connection with this one find that it should have included specimens of the whole twelve Persian months from Farwardin to Isfandarmuz, in many cases of several mints.

The Antiquity, Authenticity and Genuineness of the Epic called The Priths Ráj Rásá, and commonly ascribed to Chand Bardáí. —By Kavi Ráj Shyámal Da's, M. R. A. S., Poet Laureate and Member of the State Council of Mewar.

This famous Hindí epic—generally believed by scholars† to be the work of Chand Bardáí, the court bard of Prithí Ráj Chauhán, and describing the latter's history from his birth to his death—is not genuine, but was, in my humble opinion, fabricated several centuries after Chand's time, by a bard or bhát of Rájpútáná, to show the greatness of his own caste and of the Chauháns, who had come to the province from other parts of the country, and were not held in great esteem by the Princes of Rájpútáná.

The poem appears to have been composed by some literate bard of the family of Kothária or Bedlá Chauháns, to prove that they were related to the kings of Rájpútáná: the author chanted the praise of the Princes of Mewar in high terms, with a view to persuade them to connive at the facts and admit the narrative to be true, so that the Princes of the other Rájpútáná States might also be led to believe it, as really happened.

* [The author wishes it to be stated that this paper was written by him in Hindi, and translated into English by Munshi Râm Prásâd. Ep.]

† Mr. Beames supposes the 'Poem' to be the 'earliest work of Hindí Poetry'; in the Journal A. S. B. [1873, P. I., No. 1, page 167] we find "Chand is the earliest poet in the (Hindí) language." He also says that it was written about A. D. 1200. [In. Ant. Vol. I.] Had the poem been actually composed by Chand, the learned gentleman's suppositions would have been correct; but it was written comparatively later on, as I shall show in the following pages; and several Hindí poems written earlier than the 'Rásá' exist: e. g., the 'Rámáyan' of Tulsí Dá.—the 'Ráe Mul Rása.'

The author ascribed the poem to Chand Bardái, and did not mention his own name, as he was afraid he would not be believed.

T.

There is not the least doubt that the epic was composed in Rájpútáná (or by a poet of the Province) as it teems with terms and expressions commonly used in the poetry of this Province, and not found in that of Braj Bháshá or any other eastern dialect of India.

In the opening stanzas of the poem we have:-

- (a.) धन फुल्या चानदिस Adi Parva, 2nd Chhappai Chhand.
- (b.) हती भारती वास भारत भाषो ।

जिने उत्त पारत्य सारत्य साध्यो ॥ A. P. 4th Bhujanga-prayâti.

In these lines the words "सत्त" "चाविद्धि" "भारता" "पारता" and "सारता" belong to the poetry of Rájputáná.

(c.) In the åkhet chak canto occurs the couplet— 'यह घात सब गोरी सुबर।

करूं चूक के सज्ज रन '॥ 5th Chhappai.

Here चूककरना means 'to kill treacherously,' a sense in which it is never used in any other part of Hindustán.

In the Journal A. S. B. referred to in the preceding footnote, p. 175 Mr. Beames says: "Chand always puts an anuswâra to the last syllable of his words when writing Gâthâ. He seems to be under the impression that by doing so he is making them into Sanskrit."

But this was not the author's meaning, he intended to turn the style into Mágadhí or Bhála Bháshá, as poems composed three hundred years ago, were written generally in that tongue. The author had not himself studied the language, but had apparently heard of some Mágadhi poems, and to make his own composition appear ancient, he used anuswáras; but unfortunately the words thus framed were neither Mágadhí, Hindí, nor Sanskrit. It is plain from his use of anuswáras that he was totally ignorant of Sanskrit.

Only a few examples are cited for shortness' sake; thousands of expressions could be quoted from the poem that are found only in the poetry of Rájpútáná. Any intelligent Hindí poet on devoting attention to the poem would find it to be wholly in the style of the poets of Rájpútáná who compose two kinds of poetry:—

(1.) In the Márwárí dialect, called Dingal.

(2.) In the Braj Bháshá and other Hindí dialects, called Pingal in Rájpútáná. [The literal meaning of 'Pingal' is a "Treatise on Prosody."]

All kinds of verses are in reality kabits, but the term is restricted here to two, viz., *Chhappai and Manoharan; in like manner the poetry of Braj Bháshá came to be called Pingal in the Rájpútáná phraseology.

Dingal is written always in one and the same style—but the poets of Rájpútáná mingle the idioms of Dingal and their native expressions in Pingal: hence the poetry of this Province bears no resemblance to that of Agra, Delhi and Benares &c. provinces.

It should be remembered that there is some difference between the poetical and colloquial dialects of Rájpútáná.

The poem is thus proved to have been composed in (or at least by a poet of) Rájpútáná.

II.

The Prithi Ráj Rásá was not written in Prithi Raj's time, or by Chand, but later.

I shall prove this first by quoting passages from the poem, and then refuting them.

The dates and eras given in the poem are for the most part incorrect: e. g., the year of Prithi Ráj's birth is given as follows:—

(a.) देश । एकादस में पश्च दह विज्ञान साक चनंद। तिहि रिपु पुर जय दरन की भे प्रथिराज नरिंद ॥ I. 46.†

Translation.

In the auspicious year 1115 of Vikram's era was born Rájá Prithí z 1058A.Ö. Ráj to take his enemy's territory.

(b.) A little further on we find the following:

- पबरी चंद। १ दर्वार वैिंठ सीमेस राय। श्रीने चजूर जेतिन मुखाय॥
 - ९ करो जन्मे कर्म वालक विनाद। सुभ लग्न मुह्लरत सुनत मेाद्र।

- Lit. a verse having six feet.
- † [The references given by the author being to MSS. in his own possession and not accessible to the public, have been corrected in accordance with the complete list of the cantos of the Prithiraj Rasa given by me in Proceedings A. S. B. for 1872, p. 62. Ep.]

- थ क्या प्रकास इक वरिय राति। पस्र तीस अंस त्रय वास्त्र स्नाति ॥

This Chhand describes the horoscopic announcements at the birth of Prithi Ráj:

· Translation.

- 1. Rájá Somesar Dev (the father of Prithí Ráj) sat in a darbar and called the astrologers before his presence.
- 2. He said to them "give an account of the birth, destiny, and pursuits of the infant:" there reigned joy as soon as (the assembly) heard the lucky moments of its birth.
- 3. The Samvat was 1115, the 3rd day of the dark fortnight of Baisákh; रक्षदम पश्च = 1115; according to the Dehlí-dípak Nyáya—देखी दीपक न्याय—a poetical license, the term दम in the middle of रक्ष and पश्च, applies to both, making रक्षदम and दम पश्च.

Dehlí-dípak, lit. the light on the threshold which illuminates the inside as well as the outside of a room.

- 4. It was Thursday, Siddhi Yoga,* and Chitrá Nakshatra;† the Guru or spiritual preceptor named the child with great cheerfulness.
- 5. One ghați (24 minutes), 30 pals, and 3 amsas had elapsed of the Ushá Kál (the interval of four ghațis immediately preceding sunrise) when the infant was born.
- 6. Jupiter, Mercury and Venus were in the tenth mansion; and the consequences of Saturn being in the eighth mansion were given.
- 7. The Moon and Mars were in the fifth mansion; Ráhu was in the eleventh, which means the annihilation of the wicked (enemies).
- 8. The Sun was in the twelfth mansion, which meant the child would win great glory, and be able to trample down inveterate foes.
- (c.) In the same Chhand, the astrologers have prophesied the age of Prithi Ráj to his father Somesara Dev in the following terms:—

"चाजीस तीन तिन वर्षे साज। कांज प्रकार दन्द्र खदार काज॥"

- * A division of a great circle measured on the Ecliptic. (J. A. S. B. Vol. 9, p. 365.)
 - + A star-asterism.

Translation.

In the Kali Yug he would be a protector of the earth for forty-three years—in other words he would enjoy the age of forty-three years.

- (d.) Again, there is a chhappai chhand, called Kabit by the poets of Rájpútáná, describing the adoption of Prithí Ráj by his maternal grandfather Anang Pál Tunwar king of Delhi, who had no male issue:—
 - किन १ एकादम् संवतस्—सङ्घ समास् ति तीस भनि।
 प्रथम सुरित् तसं देम—सुद मगसिर सुमास गनि ॥
 - ९ सेत पण पंचितिय—सकल वासर गृह पूरत । सुदिमगसिर सम इंद्-जाग सिंददि सिध चूरत ॥
 - १ पड सनक्रपास सम्मिय पुरसि—पुत्तिय पुत्त पवित्त सन ॥ शंक्यो समोर संस्था तन तस्ति—पति बड़ी सक्ते सरन ॥ XVIII. 31.

- (1.) It was Samvat 1138, and commencement of the season of #10 1140 Hemant (winter)—and the bright fortnight of the propitious month of Magsir.
- (2.) It was the 5th day of the lunar half—Thursday complete in all its parts—the moon of the ominous Magsir Nakshatra complete in all its phases—Sidhi Jog, which is a wholesome dose of aromatic powder.
- (3.) King Anang Pál made over his kingdom to his daughter's son with a cheerful heart; he renounced all sorts of enjoyments, viz., comforts of the body and gratifications resulting from females and their company—and went on a pilgrimage to the shrine of Badri Náth.
 - (e.) Again in the Mádho Bhát Kathá.

1. Dohá—Prithí Ráj became king of Delhi in S. 1138; hearing this Sultán (Shahábuddín Ghorí) ordered martial music to be struck.

2. Aril—(Prithí Ráj) Chauhán became king of Delhi in S. 1138. This hero is worthy of giving currency to an era in his own name, although he is not Vikram. The stern rule of Prithí Ráj is current.

= 1081 AD.

- (f.) Again, the date of the battle gained by Kaimás, who is still famed as a wise Rájpút among the servants of Prithí Ráj, over Shahábuddín Ghorí, is thus given:—

- (3.) The news of the battle spread very easily and the day was very unfortunate for Delhi. The battle took place in such a manner that it appeared as if the goddess of wealth (i. e., Lakshmi) fought with Saraswati (the goddess of talents). [The rivalry between them is well known in the Puráns—if one of them favours a person, the other will not care for him—i. e., a learned man is seldom seen to possess riches, and a rich man is seldom a man of letters.] The Sun also stayed to witness the action.

I have done with quotations—all of which have been ascertained by comparing the several MSS. of the poem in our library which are the same as that of Bedla.

Only one Samvat would have sufficed, but I thought it advisable to adduce several passages of Samvats, so that no one might argue that it might be a mistake of the scribe, and I hope the readers will thus be satisfied that no such error was committed.

III.

Now, to discuss the Samvats found in the foregoing quotations.

(a.) We must note the year when Prithi Ráj fought with Shahábuddin Ghori, and the time when he ruled over Delhi.

The 'poem' gives us S. 1158 as the year of the battle.

But there is only one correct answer, viz., that Prithi Ráj fought with Shahábuddín in the Pánjáb in S. 1249 = A. D. 1193, and ruled over Delhi before that time.

The reasons given below will testify to the truth of the statement.

The author of the 'Tabaqát Náçiri' (written in A. H. 602 = A. D. 1205 = S. 1262) writing about Shahábuddín says:—

"Shahábuddín Ghorí took Multán in A. H. 571 (= A. D. 1175 = S. 1232); and came towards Naharwárá in A. H. 574 (= A. D. 1178 = S. 1235) viá Urchá and Multán; he encountered the forces of the Rájá

1886.7

"In A. H. 578 (= A. D. 1182 = S. 1239) the Sultán came towards Deval and seized the maritime districts—he obtained much booty.

"In A. H. 580 (= A. D. 1184 = S. 1241) he again went to Lahore and plundered the whole territory; imprisoned all the descendants of Mahmúd and built the fort of Siálkot; created Ali Karmákh (who was the Commander-in-chief of his forces) Hákim (Governor) of Lahore, and Sirájuddín Minháj (the author's father) was appointed Qázi of the troops stationed in India.

"In A. H. 587 (= A. D. 1191 = S. 1248) he took the fort of Sirhindá and entrusted it to Qázi Ziáuddín who was a cousin of the author's maternal grandfather. The Qázi garrisoned the fort with 1200 men to guard it till the Sultán's arrival. But Ráe Kolá Pithaurá had approached and the Sultán arrived as well; all the Rájas of Hindústán were on Pithaurá's side. The Sultán attacked Rája Govind Ráe of Delhi who was seated on an elephant, and knocked down two of his teeth with a lance. The Rájá threw a stone that severely wounded the Sultán's arm who was supported, while falling down from his horse, by a Khiljí soldier, and all the Sultán's men took to flight.

"Ráe Pithaurá beseiged Qázi Tolak in the Fort of Sirhindá, the battle was continued for thirteen months.

"The Sultan returned to Hindústan to take vengeance. The author heard from Muiz-uddin, a trustworthy person, that the Muhammadan army on the occasion consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand cavalry.

"Before engaging in battle, the Sultán divided his army into four separate detachments, and ordered his men to shoot arrows from all directions, and to give way when the elephants and soldiers of the enemy (Hindús) made an attack.

"The Muhammadans defeated the Hindús by acting up to his will and order; God granted victory to the Sultán and the heathens fled.

"Pithaurá descended from his elephant and gallopped off the field on horseback instantly; but he was captured in the land adjoining the Saraswatí, and sent to hell (killed).

"Govind Ráe of Delhi was killed, whose corpse was identified by the Sultán who had himself broken two of his teeth in a former battle.

"Delhi, Ajmere, Hánsi and Saraswatí were annexed to the Empire. This victory was gained in A. H. 588 (= A. D. 1192 = S. 1249); the Sultán appointed Qutb-ud-dín Aibak in charge of the Fort of Kahrám, who took Mirath and Delhi, and also the Fort of Kol in A. H. 589 (= A. D. 1193 = S. 1250).

"The Sultán proceeded to Kanauj and Benáres from Ghazní in A. H. 590 (= A. D. 1194 = S. 1250-1251), and repulsed Rájá Jaichand near Chandáwal; more than three hundred elephants formed part of the booty.

"Qutb-uddín conquered Naharwárá, Kálewá, Badáon and many other districts.

"God willing, an account of these battles will be written in the Fath Qutbí (a book that seems from the title to give a history of Sultán Qutb-uddín Aibak)."

Now, the year 587 A. H. corresponds to A. D. 1191 = S. 1248.

A. D. 1192 = S. 1249.

This shows the battle between Shahábuddín and Prithí Ráj Chauhán, and the latter's death, to have occurred in S. 1248-49; that is about 90 years after the date mentioned in the 'Prithí Ráj Rásá.' (S. 1158,)

Although the author of the 'Tabaqát Náçiri' was a foreigner, he could not have committed mistakes in the dates, if he did in names.

The 2nd Vol. of the 'Abul Fidá' [written in A. H. 700 = A. D. 1300 = S. 1356-57, originally in Arabic, and afterwards translated into Persian and Urdú] narrating Shahábuddín's advent into Hindústán, states briefly the events that happened in the years A. H. (586, 587, 589) and does not mention anything about Prithí Ráj's battle; but the existence of Shahábuddín Ghorí is proved to a certainty from the narrative, and all the later histories available uniformly mention S. 1249 (= A. D. 1192-93) for the battle between them.

The time of Rájá Jaichand and Shahábuddín having been ascertained and settled, there remains no doubt as to that of Prithí Ráj, seeing he was their contemporary.

Having done with the testimony borne by books, I now proceed to refer to stone Inscriptions found in Mewar, and some copper-plate grants (given in the Journals of the Society) that all go the same way.

Inscription* I.

This Inscription exists in the village of Bijholi in Mewár, about 100 miles from the capital, on a rock under a Mahwá (Bassia latifolia)

* The Sanskrit texts and translations of the Inscriptions referred to in this paper will be found in the Appendix.

tree, close to the wall, to the north of the tank at the shrine of Párśwanáth It records the grant of the village of Rewná by Somesvara Dev, the father of Prithí Ráj; and was executed by a Mahájan in S. 1226 = A. D. 1169. This shows that Prithí Ráj could not have lived or died in S. 1158, = A. D. 1101 as mentioned in the 'Rásá.' The Inscription concludes the genealogy of the Chauháns at Someswar Dev; this shows that Prithí Ráj (his son) had not ascended the throne when the Inscription was placed in Phálgun Badi S. 1226.

Inscription II.

Found on a pillar over the northern gateway of a palace in Menál garh in Mewár; recording the erection of a monastery by Bháv Brahma, while Prithi Ráj Chauhán was the reigning monarch, Dated (Málwi) Vikram's Samvat 1226 (= A. D. 1169).

Comparing this Inscription with the preceding it is concluded that Prithí Ráj must have ascended the throne between Phalgun Badi and Chait Badi S. 1226.

However, if it was customary to reckon the commencement of the Samvat from any other month than Chait (as is still usual in some provinces) a greater interval may have elapsed between Phálgun Badi and Prithí Ráj's succession to his father's throne.

It is the general rule that Histories mention the events of the time, and may contain some exaggerations or false statements even—but for the most part the true facts are recorded—there is no error in dates or years; if there is, it is in books (like the Prithí Ráj Rásá) forged in the names of former authors as is usual with the founders of new religious systems, who compose new books, and name them after older authors to give them the authority of the Puráns.

Had Chand Bardáí, the court-bard of Rájá Prithí Ráj Chauhán composed the poem, so grave a mistake of 90 years* could not have been made: and the poet could not have expected to gain anything by writing an incorrect date intentionally.

There are some copper-plate patents of Rájá Jai Chand of Kanauj, bearing dates S. 1233—1243 (= A. D. 1177—1187), mentioned in the Journal of the Society for 1873, p. 317.

He was overthrown by the Muhammadans in A. D. 1193 (= S. 1249).

Prithí Ráj had married Sanjogitá the daughter of Jai Chand, who was defeated by Shahábuddín Ghorí in Kanauj, after the latter had conquered Delhi, as mentioned in the "Tabaqát Náçirí."

* 1249 - 1158 = 91.

Colonel Tod has given S. 1249 for the battle between Shahábuddín and Prithí Ráj; but he does not adduce any arguments against S. 1158 given in the Prithí Ráj Rásá.

Again, he describes the existence of Ráná Ráhup, (son of Ráwal Samar Singh's grandson) in the 13th century of Vikram's era, who lived really in the fourth quarter of the 14th century.

The Colonel is not to blame, because the 'Prith' Ráj Rásá' has caused mistakes of dates in the histories and annals of Rájpútáná; and it was difficult, rather impossible for him, to write otherwise, when materials for History were available with great difficulty. If he is to blame at all, it is simply that he did not attend to the sequence of facts in his book.†

His narrative misled many authors, as for instance, Forbes in his 'Rás Mála;' Prinsep in Vol. II. of his 'Antiquities;' and Dr. Hunter in Vol. IX. of his 'Imperial Gazetteer' p. 166 [London edition, 1881], where we read "In A. D. 1201, Ráhup was in possession of Chittore," i. e., in S. 1257—58; but we find no trace of Ráwul Samar Singh even till after S. 1324 (= 1267 A. D.), as the next Inscription in this paper will show.

IV.

Next, something must be said about the mistakes occasioned by the 'Prithi Ráj Rásá' in History.

The Muhammadans had a regular system of writing History, the Hindús had no such system; if there was anything of the kind, it was simply the genealogies, and very little, if any, historical accounts written in the books of the bards, or exaggerated poems of the times.

It is worth keeping in mind that the genealogical tables given in such books are found to be somewhat correct after the Samvat year 1600; those between S. 1400 and S. 1600 are wrong in several instances; but those previous to S. 1400 (= A. D. 1343) found in them are all wrong and guesswork.

When the 'Prithí Ráj Rásá' was forged and made known to the public as a poem by Chand, the bards and poets adopted the 12th century of Vikram's era for Prithí Ráj's death, in all their books bearing on the history of Rájpútáná.

As for example-

(1) The marriage of Ráwal Samarsí Jí of Mewár with Prithá, the sister of Prithí Ráj, narrated in the 'Rásá,' led them to adopt the S. 1106 as that of Ráwal Samarsí's ascending the throne of Mewár, [•] Called also Samarsí.

[♦] Tod's 'Rájasthán.'

To confirm this Samvat 1158 adopted for Ráwal Samar Singh's death, they inserted by guesswork Samvats, in their books, of all the kings who ruled between Ráwal Samarsí and Mokul:—

1.	Ráwal Samar Singh.	11. E	láná Bhuvan Singh.
2.	Ratna Singh.	12.	" Bhím Singh.
3.	" Karna Singh.	13.	" Jai Singh.
4.	Ráná Ráhup.	14.	" Lakshman Singh
5.	" Narpati.	15.	" Ari Singh.
6.	" Dinkaran.	16.	" Ajai Singh.
7 .	" Yashakaran.	17.	" Hamír Singh.
8.	" Nág Pál.	18.	,, Kshetra Singh.
9.	" Púrna Mal.	19.	" Laksh Singh.
10.	" Prithví Pál.	2 0.	" Mokul Jí.

The people of the Rájpútání States believed in the Samvats given for these kings by the bards, and inserted in their books.

It is impossible that Ráwal Samar Singh could have married the sister of Prithi Ráj who lived about a century before him.

A masonry bridge constructed over the Gambhirí that flows past the celebrated Fort of Chitor, is attributed to Mahá Ráná Lakshman Singh's son Ari Singh; though I have not found it stated in any Persian history, yet some Muhammadans attribute the architecture to Khizr Khán, the son of Aláuddín Khiljí; whosoever might have been the builder, this much is certain that it was built towards the close of the 14th century of Vikram's Samvat, land the style is strongly in favour of its being a Muhammadan structure.

Inscription III.

There are nine arches in the bridge; in the eighth arch (taken from the east to the west), there is a slab bearing an inscription dated S. 1324 (= A. D. 1267), when Ráwal Tej Singh, father of Ráwal Samar Singh was reigning over Mewár. It appears to have been originally placed in some temple, and afterwards put in its present position when the bridge was built, i. e., some materials for it were taken from the débris of the temple.

The characters are so deeply chiselled in that they have suffered very little from the constant action of water against the tablet (during the floods) for several centuries.

Two lines of the Inscription are extant, and they are given in Appendix III.

Inscription IV.

In the ninth arch of the same bridge we find an Inscription S. 13—2, the 13th of the bright half of Jeshtha, recording that Ráwal Samar Singh granted a piece of land, on the bank of the river below the Lákhotá Bári (gate) on the northern border of the Fort of Chitor, for the good of his mother Jaitalla Deví (जयसब देवी).

It is a pity that this Inscription is much broken, and thus cannot furnish any important information. Of the four figures of the year, the third is broken. However, so much is certain that it was executed in Samar Singh's reign: seeing the century to be 13 and the unit's place occupied by 2, I think the decimal place must have been taken up by 3, thus making up 1332; because the style of this Inscription closely resembles that of Inscription III, (dated 1324) and probably one and the same person was the author of both.

Inscription V.

Found embedded in the inner yard of a palace at Chitorgarh, dated S. 1335, Thursday, the 5th of Baiśákh Sudi—of Ráwal Samar Singh's time. It records the grant of land by him to a temple of Syám Páraśwanáth, built by his mother Jaitalla Deví, Queen of Ráwal Tej Singh.

Inscription VI.

The Inscription exists in a monastery adjoining the temple of Achalesvara, near Achalgarh on Mount Abú. Its date is S. 1342 (= A. D. 1285)—and it records the erection of a golden pillar for, and the reparation of, the monastery by Ráwal Samar Singh.

Inscription VII.

This Inscription is dated S. 1344 (= A. D. 1287)—Baiśákh Sudi 3rd recording a land-grant to a temple of Vaidya Náth Mahádev, when Ráwal Samar Singh was the reigning sovereign at Chitor. The temple was originally built in the tank dug by Chitrang Morí.

There are altogether eight lines—the character is Devákshara—it is on a pillar called Surah (433), bearing the figure of a cow in relief, and one of the Mahádeva lingam.

I found this valuable writing on a white stone (not exactly marble) pillar, at the third gate from the Súraj Pol (Sun-gate), and had it removed to Oodeypor, the present capital—and it lies here in the palace.

These inscriptions prove that Ráwal Samar Singh's father Tej Singh was the reigning sovereign of Chitor and Mewar in S. 1324; and that Ráwal Samar Singh reigned from S. 1332—S. 1344 (= A. D. 1275—1287).

Thus we see, the reign of Samar Singh could never have been before S. 1324, though there is nothing improbable as to his having reigned a few years after S. 1344.

Therefore, the S. 1158 (= A. D. 1101) written in the 'Prithi Ráj Rásá' for the death of Ráwal Samar Singh with Prithi Ráj, cannot be correct any how.

Moreover Ráwal Samar Singh cannot be proved to have been in existence even in S. 1249 (= A. D. 1192-93), the actual year of the battle between Prithí Ráj and Shahábuddín Ghorí.

Hence, it follows, if Prithí Ráj's sister was married at all to any ruler of Chitor, she must have been wedded to another prince; because Prithí Ráj was killed in S. 1249, and Samar Singh's inscriptions are dated S. 1332—1344; that is, his reign falls 83* years after the death of Prithí Ráj: hence the assertion that, the latter's sister was married to this Samar Singh, is absurd.

It may be argued that there may have been another Rájá, bearing the name Samar Singh at Chitor: but the argument falls to the ground by the following correct and infallible genealogy, extending from Bápá Ráwal to Samar Singh, and copied from a stone Inscription:—

- 1. Bápá Ráwal-वापारावस
- 2. Guhil-nfin
- 3. Bhoj--भोज
- 4. Shil-शीख
- 5. Kalbhoj-कासभोज
- 6. Bhartri Bhat—wa we
- 7. Agh Singh—অৰ বিছ
- 8. Samháyak— समसायक
- 9. Khamán—चमाण
- 10. Allat—Was
- 11. Naraváhan—नरवासन
- 12. Shakti Kumár—wang

13.	Suchi Varma—ग्राचिवकी	2 2.	Kshem Singh—चेम सिंच
14.	Naravarma—नर वस	23.	Sámant Singh—सामन सिंप
15.	Kírti Varma - की ति वसी	24.	Kumár Singh— कुमार सिंग
16.	Bairad—चिर्	2 5.	Mathan Singh—मथन सिंद
17.	Bairí Singh—वेरी सिंद	26 .	Padma Singh—पद्म सिंद
18.	Bijai Singh—विजय सिंद	27.	Jaitra Singh—जैन सिंद
19.	Ari Singh—ঋবি ধিঁৰ	2 8.	Tej Singh— तेज विद
20.	Chond Singh- चेंड सिंड	2 9.	Samar Singh—समर सिंच
21.	Vikram Singh—विक्रम सिंड	3 0.	Ratna Singh—ৰ বিভ

In this list there is only one Samar Singh (No. 29) who ruled at Chitor—and the 'Rásá' also mentions Samar Singh, as the son of Ráwal Tej Singh, and that Ratna Singh (No. 30) was his elder son. (Kumbh Karan was the younger.) These facts identify the genealogical No. 29 to be the person meant by the author of the "Rásá," who has by mistake placed Samar Singh's name in the poem in connection with the 12th century of Vikram's era.

Aláuddín Khiljí of Delhi took the Fort of Chitor after severe bloodshed in S. 1359 (= A. D. 1302-3) when Ratna Singh, the son of Samar Singh, was the reigning prince there: this fact disproves the statement of the 'Rásá' that Ráwal Samar Singh married the sister of Prithí Ráj, and was killed with him in S. 1158 (= A. D. 1101) which is impossible, because a son and successor can by no means reign two centuries after his father's death.

(1.) Thus, a mistake of a very serious nature was caused by the 'Prithi Ráj Rásá' in the history of Mewár, viz., that "Ráwal Samar Singh ascended the throne of Mewár in S. 1106 (= A. D. 1050) and was killed with Prithi Ráj Chauhán fighting on his side against Shahábuddín Ghorí in S. 1158 (=A. D. 1101).

This statement makes Ráwal Samar Singh flourish about two* centuries earlier than his actual existence, and having been believed to be true by the bards and poets of Rájpútáná, the period intervening between Ráwal Samar Singh and Mokul Jí was thus lengthened; and the poets had to adjust this ignorantly or blindly made up long period among the reigns between Samar Singh and (the death of) Mokul Jí, and the gap was thus bridged over.

(2.) In like manner, the historians of Jodhpur took for granted the S. 1132 (= A. D. 1075) for the accession of Rájá Jai Chandra Ráthor of Kanauj, because Prithí Ráj had married Sanjogitá, daughter of Jai Chandra. They too divided the hundred years of the error among the number of generations between Jai Chandra and (the death) of Rao Chandá of Mandore.

* 1344 -- 1158 = 186 years.

1886.7

The Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal for 1864, Vol. XXXIII, No. 3, p. 232, has a table of the Ráthors of Kanauj, by Major-General Cunningham:

	V. S.	A . D.
Chandra Dev	1106	1050
Madan Pál	1136	1080
Govind Chandra	1171	1115
Bijai Chandra	1221	1165
Jai Chandra	1231*	1175

That is Jai Chandra lived about one hundred* years after the Samvat accepted by the Jodhpur historians for his accession, as concluded from the 'Prithí Ráj Rásá.'

Again, referring to the inscriptions in the Journal of the Society of Bengal for 1858, No. 3, pp. 217-221, that is, copper-plates published and translated by Fitz-Edward Hall.

- (a) Madan Pál Dev's Grant—S. 1154 [= A. D. 1098, p. 221].
- (b) Govind Chandra's Grant—S. 1182 [= A. D. 1126, p. 243].

That is, even these sovereigns lived later than S. 1132, the year fixed upon for Jai Chandra's accession, who really lived much later than they.

(3.) In the same way, the bards of Amber (Jaipur) adopted S. 1127 and S. 1151 corresponding to A. D. 1071 and A. D. 1095 for the accession and the death respectively of Prajun Jí Kachhwáhá, who is named among the heroes of Prithí Ráj, the hero of the 'Rásá.'

These dates also can never be correct. Though I have nowhere come across the exact year when Prajun Jí preceded to the gadí, yet, if he was a warrior of Prithí Ráj, he must evidently have lived about S. 1249 (= A. D. 1193) which is the correct year of Prithí Ráj's death.

(4.) In like manner the annals of Búndí, Sirohí, and Jessalmer &c. have recorded incorrect eras, as found in or deduced from the 'Rásá' —a fact which interfered seriously with the true aim of annalists to record true years.

The argument that the scribe through mistake might have put down Samvat 11 hundred for 12 hundred, will be refuted on the following grounds:—

- (a.) The term 'twelve' cannot be replaced by 'eleven' in poetry, as the metre would not hold good.
- (b.) The 'Astrological terms' 'Siva' and 'Har' used in the 'poem' for 'eleven' cannot indicate 'twelve,' nor can twelve be substituted for them.

- (c.) The same years (viz., eleven hundred) are found in the MSS. of the 'Rásá' about one or two centuries old, as well as in comparatively modern ones.
- (d.) It is not as if the years were mentioned only in one or two places which might be due to a mistake of the scribe; they are found in many places, and moreover the years, months and dates are written in words in the form of couplets and verses in the horoscope of Prithí Ráj, given in the Rásá.

The horoscope on being examined by Náráyan Dev Shástrí [a learned Pandit of Benares, and who is in the Mewar State service] has not been found to tally with the data, according to his calculations given below:—

Data.

"Born in S. 1115, on Thursday, the third of the waning Moon of Baisakh. It was the Chitrá Nakshatra, and Sidhi Jog—one and a half ghaṭikás previous to sunrise, when the child was born. His name being Prithi Ráj, his Ráshi is the first half of Chitrá, i. e., Virgo or Kanyá: the Moon and Mars are in the 5th mansion, and Virgo is also in the same: that is, the birth took place in the Vṛisha Lagna; Saturn is in the eighth; Jupiter, Mercury and Venus in the tenth; Ráhu in the eleventh, and the Sun in the 12th mansion.

Now, according to the Súryasiddhánta the third date of Baisákh Badi S. 1115, falls on Sunday.

स्पष्ट स्ट्रंथ (clear Sun)—11/21/24/49; स्पष्ट चन्द्र (clear Moon)—6/16/27/17;

Nakshatra should be Swáti—(আনী) and Jog should be Vajra—(বল্প).

Since the birth happened before sunrise, the Sun could never have been in the 12th mansion from the Lagna; the Sun is in the 12th mansion in the Vrisha Lagna, when it is in $\frac{1}{2}$ (Aries γ): but in the data it is in $\frac{1}{2}$ (Pisces)—which is impossible.

The position of the other Planets or Grahas, e. g., Mars, &c. need not be discussed; because the position of the Sun having been shown to be incorrect, it is certain that the other combinations recorded in the horoscope are also impossible.

In the same way the Samvat 1158 is assigned by the "Rásá" to the last battle with Shahábuddín, which resulted in the death of Prithí Ráj—and the date is said to have been Amávásyá or the 15th day of the waning Moon of Shrávan; the Sun to have been in (the sign of) Cancer ($$\sigma$) the Nakshatra Rohini and the Moon to have been in Taurus ($$\sigma$).

Now, if the Moon be in Rohini, the Sun should be in Taurus: but according to the rule, the Sun and the Moon must be in one and the same Ráshi.

That the Sun should have been in Cancer seems correct: but the Moon could not have been in Taurus as told in the 'Rásá'; on the other hand it must have been in Cancer.

Thus it seems the author was quite ignorant of astronomy, and hence he did not notice this mistake: it is also rendered manifest that he was not the court-bard of Rájá Someśwara Dev or Prithí Ráj, as in that case he must have known the true dates and combinations of the planets when the latter was born.

I think the arguments so far stated are sufficient to prove that the 'Prithi Ráj Rásá' was not composed by Chand or in his time.

IV.

Then the question naturally arises, "When and by whom was the Epic composed?" if not by Chand Bardáí.

I have stated the poem to be the work of some poet of Rájpútáná, and I venture to say I can prove the period of the composition on the following grounds:—

(1.) In the poems composed in Rájpútáná before Akbar's time and still available, Persian words and expressions are not met with: only the words of Sanskrit, Braj Bháshá, Mágadhi or Prákrit, Rájpútáná dialects, and sometimes of Gujaráti also are found.

The Princes of Rájpútáná opened intercourse with the Imperial Court during Akbar's time. Rájá Bhárá Mal Kachhwáhá of Amber (Jaipur) went to the Court in S. 1619 (= A. D. 1562) for the first time. In his domains there were very few Márwári poets, and Braj Bháshá poetry is still widely prevalent there. The poems now available about the Rájás of Jaipur or their brotherhood, are found to have been composed by Márwár or Mewár poets: that is Márwár stands first, and Mewár holds the second place as far as Márwári or Dingal poetry is concerned.

The intercourse of the poets of Márwár and Mewár with the Imperial Court commenced during the latter days of Akbar's reign.

When the dispute between the sons of Rao Mál Dev of Jodhpur was over, and Udai Singh was established on the throne in S. 1639

(= A. D. 1582), he commenced living at Akbar's Court: since that time the intercourse of the Márwár poets became more frequent, and severa other famous Hindí poets got encouragement at the same time, e. g.; Gosáin Tulsí Dás, Kesav Dás, Súr Dás, Bárhuts Narhar Dás, Iswar Dás, and Lakhá &c., &c., and a greater proportion of Persian words found way in the poems of Hindí produced in Rájpútáná.

On perusing the 'Prithi Ráj Rásá' Persian words are found to exist in it in the proportion of 1:8, or 1:10 to Hindi, Márwári and Sanskrit words or to those of any other Indian dialect.

After S. 1640 (= A. D. 1583), the people of Mewar commenced intercourse with the Imperial Darbar: the Maha Rana of the time (Pratap Singh) did not go there, but some of his relatives, who were dissatisfied with him, did go, as for instance Shakat Singh, Jagmal and Sagar Singh, and many poets accompanied them; and Persian words came to be greatly introduced in the poems of Mewari and Marwari tongues.

The 'Prithi Ráj Rásá' was in my humble opinion composed at some date during the thirty years between S. 1640 (= A. D. 1583) and S. 1670 (= A. D. 1613); which I proceed to show:—

I. In the Hammir Kávya composed about S. 1540-42 (A. D. 1484-86), which describes the battles fought by Chauhán Hammir and his ancestors, the description given of the battle between Prithi Ráj and Shahábuddin Ghorí, does not agree with that given in the 'Rásá;' neither do the genealogical tables of the Chauháns agree in these two poems.

It is a matter of common sense that, if a standard work like the 'Prithi Ráj Rásá' had been composed before the 'Hammir Kávya,' the author of the latter would certainly have borrowed facts from it.

II. Had the 'Rásá' been composed even a century or two after Ráwal Samar Singh's time, mistakes of so serious a nature could not have occurred, as are actually seen. We generally do not find such mistakes in the Samvats or dates of kings who lived two, or two and a half centuries before a history is written.

Thus it follows, the 'Rásá' was composed about three centuries after Samar Singh's time; and the latter lived about a hundred* years after Prithí Ráj.

Hence it follows that the 'Prithi Ráj Rásá' was fabricated about four centuries after Prithi Ráj's or Chand's age; and the author based his fabric on some corrupt history.

• Prithí Ráj died in S. 1249. Ráwal Samar Singh ruled till about S. 1344; the difference in their periods is thus 1344 — 1249 — 95 years.

Now, I proceed to prove the 'Rásá' to have been written after S. 1640.

The author has praised the kings of Mewar very highly in the name of Rawal Samar Singh—whom in one place, where pronouncing benedictions, he calls by the following epithets:—

- (a) "वर्षंकियां राय वंदार;
- (b) "पापियां राय प्रयाग;
- (c) "इत्यारां राय वाषारसी;
- (d) "सदवान राय राजान री गंग;
- (e) "सुलतान प्रस्ण मोखन;
- (f) "सुज्ञतान मान मज्ज ॥"

These, when translated into English, would stand respectively thus:

- (a) (Like the god) Kedárnáth for (removing the stain of) those who are charged with anything disgraceful;
- (b) (Like the sacred shrine of) Prayág (the modern Alláhábád) for the sinful;
- (c) Vánárasi [correctly 'Váránasi' the modern Benares] or 'the Sacred City of the Hindús' for those who are charged with murder—one of the deadly sins;
 - (d) The Ganges for drunkards or proud kings [सद्यान राय].
 - (e) Who liberated (the) Sultán after once taking him prisoner.
 - (f) Who crushed (the) Sultán's pride.

All these titles allude to Mahá Ráná Sangrám Singh of Mewár. The fourth epithet (d) suggests that the other Rájás yielded to the Muhammadan Sultáns and prided themselves, also that they indulged in wine. The Ránás of Mewár did not take wine—hence the title 👣 (Ganges), for the purification of those Rájás, is given to them (Ránás) with a taunt to the latter.

The fifth title (e) alludes to the fact of Mahá Ráná Sangrám Singh's having captured Sultán Mahmúd of Málwá in A. H. 924 (= A. D. 1518 = S. 1574), and afterwards setting him free.

The last title (f) alludes to the kings of Gujarát, whom the Mahá Ráná had defeated and plundered their territory.

Several other poets of the period have described the Ránás of Mewár similarly:—

- १ देा॰ चार रे चावविरयाच—तेज तुचालो तुरवाङ्गा। नय १ नीपरियाच—राणविनामचराजवी॥
- २ चक्रवर घोर चंधार—जंघाणा चिन्दू चवर। जागे जग दातार—पोडोरे राण प्रताप शे॥

Translation.

- (1.) O! Akbar, O! Turk, to thy glory, all the Rájás yielded, except the Ráná (of Udaipur).
- (2) Akbar resembles a deep darkness; all other Hindús felt their eyes heavy with slumber; whereas Ráná Pratáp Singh* was on the watch, who was a great benefactor of the universe.

[The poets stamp a stain of disgrace on those Hindú Rájás who offered service, and gave away daughters in marriage, to the Moslem kings.]

From the six epithets quoted above, it is easily inferred that the 'Rásá' was composed after Mahá Ráná Sangrám Singh had defeated the king of Málwá in S. 1574 (= A. D. 1518); and the presence of Persian words in the 'Poem' indicates that it was composed after S. 1640 (= A. D. 1583), when the first intercourse of the poets of Rájpútáná with the Imperial Court was opened, and they allowed Persian expressions to adulterate their style.

(B.)

Having shown the 'Rásá' to have been written after S. 1640 (= A. D. 1583), I shall now prove that it was composed before S. 1670 (= A. D. 1613).

In the Dilli-ki-kathá (दिशो की कथा) Prastáv we find the couplet:-

है। । चीरे चै सत्तीतरे—विक्रम साक बदीत। दिखीधर चीतोड्यत—छे चग्गां वस जीत ॥† III. 31.

= In S. 1677 (= A. D. 1620) of Vikram's era, the lord of Chitor would conquer Delhi.

Here the poet delivers a prophecy that the kings of Chitor would take Delhi.

Therefore, it is quite evident that the couplet and hence the poemwas written some time before S. 1677.

It was probably written before S. 1671 (= A. D. 1614)—because in that year a treaty was concluded between Mahá Ráná Amar Singh I., and the Sultán Jahángir, through the mediation of Prince Khurram. Therefore the above-mentioned prophecy could not have been delivered after S. 1671, when the treaty was concluded, because then all thought of ever conquering Delhi on the part of the Ránás had vanished. They had left off shaving (the head), eating out of a metallic plate, ^{*} Reigned from S. 1628-1653 (= A. D. 1571-1596).

^{† [}Col. Tod's MS. has Hain for This.-ED.]

fastening the sword to the belt, and keeping the kettle-drum in the van of their processions, long before S. 1671, in Mahá Ráná Pratáp Singh's time (whose reign ended in S. 1658 = A. D. 1601),—with an oath to revive* these customs only on retaking Delhi.

The noble deeds of the Ránás of this State during S. 1640-70, and the awe inspired by Mahá Ráná Sangrám Singh and his predecessors in the minds of the people led them (people) to cherish a sanguine expectation that some Ráná or other would take Delhi; and with this idea the author of the 'Rásá' inserted the couplet in his production.

I do not hold the narrative of the 'Prithi Ráj Rásá' to be totally incorrect; but it is clear enough, that the author must have based his fabric on some wrong annals.

My main object in writing this paper (for publication) is to caution the public against the incorrect dates given in the 'Rásá' and against the belief that it was composed by Chand Bardáí, or even by any author who was his contemporary.

The spuriousness of the Rásá, and my doubts as to its antiquity, are further confirmed by the fact that its narrative, and the names of persons and dates as found in it, do not agree with those in the Persian works of Prithí Ráj's time.

I second the statement made by Vincent A. Smith, Esq., B. C. S:—
"The Rásá as we now have it, is misleading, and all but worthless for the purposes of the Historian." [J. A. S. B. 1881. Pt. I, No. I, page 29.]

APPENDIX.

Inscription I.

[This Inscription is very corrupt, being full of mistakes made by the Inscriber, who makes no distinction between v, v and v, and has made a mess of the vowel-marks (wvv) and the Anuswaras and Visargas. Here and there some letters have been defaced: thus it is very difficult to arrive at the original readings and the author's meaning; but the Pandits here have tried their utmost to make the best of it as it stands. The transcript was taken on Gokank paper, and deciphered by Pandit Rám Pratáp Jotishí, a good Sanskrit scholar and the only antiquarian in the city.

* Not revived till now. The Ránás do eat out of a metallic dish, but still a leaf-platter is placed underneath it.

The inscription measures 12 ft. 9 inches at the longest, and 8 ft. 6 inches at the shortest part in length, and the breadth is about 3 ft. 8 inches. Altogether, there are 30 lines, and 92 slokas.

The first ten ślokas are a salutation to the Bandba divinities: then a genealogy of the Chauháns, in which all the names are not clearly made out, is comprised in the ślokas 11—29 (inclusive). Our translation extends only so far, as the rest of the inscription is not pertinent to our purpose; the inscription is valuable for the date and the genealogy, which differs from all other tables.—Trans.]

Translation (from the Hindí).*

1. Obeisance to Him, who has given up all worldly concerns.

I bow to, praise meditate upon, and seek the protection of the light existing in the soul, which is intelligent, self-effulgent, without beginning and without end, felt only with wisdom, ever-glorious;—which enlightens the understanding of the creatures, is known by the name "Syát,"† and but to exist, is all-pervading, the most wonderful, the summum bonum or the source of all good and joy, and ever-existing.

- 2. May the peerless sun of righteousness be the source of your (i. e., of the audience-mankind) peace and happiness—that never sets, is not reckoned among the inauspicious planets, the strength of whose rays is not unbearable......who does no one ill.
- 3. There was the sage Sánti Nátha—whose both beautiful hands with brilliant nails stretch out to cherish and satisfy the accomplished goddess (Lakshmí) of happiness for the people of the world, blessed with sons and prosperity, and for these fortunate (or learned) men bending low with humiliation, like the decorated ground of Braj for Lakshmí, the spouse of Vishņu, to sport upon.
- 4. I bow to the very mighty one Nemi Nátha—who sounded the Páncha Janya or Krishna's conch, while breathing through the nostrils with the tip of the lotus-like; who fully strung the bow of Vishnu called Sárnga (WIT) with his thumb, like Bala-Ráma (who had a plough for his weapon), and whirled it about with the finger.

[This is an allusion to Nemi Nátha's having gone to Dwáriká where Krishna lived, and blowing his conch and stringing and whirling his bow—each of which was unwieldy for any one else but Vishnu himself. A lotus was his (Nemi Nátha's) emblem.—This story has been taken as recited by a Jati, and is well-known to the Jains.]

- [The Hindi is, as will be seen, rather a loose paraphrase of the original Sanskrit. It is impossible to effect a literal agreement between the two, the general sense of the Sanskrit seems, however, fairly expressed in most places.—Ep.]

- 5. May the Tirthánkara* Párśwanátha have success! whose lecture-ground is gazed upon by the curious spectators in great admiration, the fore-part of the lofty rampart of which is closely crowded with the leading gods, which is surrounded on all sides with streamers, brilliant with the sun-gem and rendered vocal with jingles or bells.
- 6. May the ever-prevailing enshrinement of (Vardhamána) Mahávíra who excels the heroes, ever be on the increase.

[In this śloka the poet makes a display of his poetical talent; he repeats the same line twice, which admits of a double meaning by

- 8. We worship with success the lords who always remain absorbed in devotion, who are independent or self-willed, and as it were an ocean (of ambrosia in the form) of the greatest degree of mercy; at the head of whose list stands Nábheya (the son of Nábhi Rájá), i. e., Rishabha Deva (च्यमस्व). They who have obtained salvation by receiving the best portion of the light of these lords, adorn like a garland of pearls the bosom of the fair one (who is) deliverance.
- 9. Oh! ye twenty-four (Tirthánkaras) of Jainism, the source of rejoicing to the hearts of humble or good persons, the support of 'True Piety', who destroy the actions which cause birth and death, a series of the sources of good, who have undisturbed wisdom, and take an interest in the good of beings, the (cradle) source of (the goddess Lakshmí of) bliss, the sustainers of the world, ye guide us aright into good actions.

Genealogy of the Chauháns.

- 10. The rare first-born (king) in the noble race of the Chauháns was Jadáwtadwa* [or Jadáw Chandra] who was ever-thriving, successful in all his actions, knew the hidden policy of kings, possessed armies and other influence, and never bowed to anybody.
- 11. Noble-looking, free from blemish, brilliant, tender-bodied like a wreath of flowers, wearing garments, white like limpid and pure wavelets, bending (modestly) with the weight of (breasts in the form of) high† (?) hills, such a one, the goddess Sákambarᇠis like Lakshmí the spouse of Vishnu.
- 12. In Ahikshetrapura, the first ruler was Púrnatalla surrounded with numerous warriors, like a bed smiling with flower-plants.
- 13. From him were descended Jai Ráj and Vigrah Ráj—Chandra and Gopendra—the last was succeeded by Durlabh Ráj, then ruled Gúrvak, Shashi Nrip, and after the latter Gúwák and Sachandan; (then the throne was occupied in turns by) Vapyai Ráj, who ruled over the Vindhyá mountains, Singh Ráo and Vigrah; then ruled Durlabh, Gúndú, Vákpati, and lastly his younger brother Vírya Rám succeeded.
- 14. Then ruled Chand, Sri Singh the foremost among the Ránaks, from the latter was descended Dúsal, then came his brother Bísal, the beloved (lord) of Ráj Devi; his son was Prithvi Ráj I., the lord of Rásalya Devi, to him was born Jaidev, the consort of Saumalla Devi.
- 15. Who after killing three Rájás, the first of whom was Yasho Ráj the Padhingamichal, defeated the chief whose name was Solhan Dand in the field of battle; and as it pleased him best, he kept him in irons, and committed him (alive) to a fortress with an entrance resembling the mouth of Yam.
- 16. His son was Arno Ráj who kept Hari (Vishņu) in his heart, who was the seat of virtue, whose vastness or range was aimed at, who was rare (great) in depth and generosity, whose depth could be sounded by none.

The king as well as the ocean were the seats of Hari, but it is marvellous that unlike the ocean the former had neither mire, nor was capable of being churned, nor deprived of wealth (Lakshmí); neither the generator of the mine of guilt§ (the Moon), nor was he served by double-tongued (serpents) hypocrites.

- 17. His stern rule (iron-hook) had as a matter of course, freed his kingdom from (the elephant of) wickedness, or conquered the country of Kuśaváran. It is to be wondered at that, he had thrown the reputation of Indra into the shade by acquiring salvation and Náráyan with his piety.
- 18. From Arno Ráj was descended Vigrah Ráj, the light of the earth, which is no matter of surprise. But it is astonishing that the descendant of that Arno Ráj (ocean), namely the Moon, is devoid of sensation, liable to waning, and marked with spots. [Whereas Vigrah Ráj, son to the king Arno Ráj, was free from these defects.]
- 19. His hand imparted its beauty to his terrible sword, which was graceful in the act of killing, and crushed the pride of mad and noble elephants.
- 20. He was prepared to proceed to the world of Yam a he, one of the noblest among men, seizer of lands, expert in wielding the lance, ascended into Heaven, as he was really a Protector of the needy and the distressed.
- 21. He converted Jáválipur into Jwálápur ('City of Flames') by setting it on fire; reduced small villages into hamlets or mere collections of huts; his anger rendered the strength of his foes as frail as the thread of the mandár-cotton (the white flower with radiating threads that issues from the plant called Asclepias gigantea).
- 22. Whose fame, acquired by means of his getting a sword and wearied from not succeeding in taking Delhi, spread in the streets as well as in chimney-rooms. [चरिका साथ देशिनं has been explained above = "acquired by means...... sword." If the reading is सारिका साथ देशिनं the meaning would be = "Whose fame, blackened only by his failure in taking Delhi," &c.]
- 23. His elder brother's son was named Prithvi Ráj II, who resembled Vishņu in preserving his subjects, and chased away poverty from his dominions, by giving away kine and gold (-en hills) in charity to the poor.
- 24. He, who was thoroughly devoted to religion, dedicated the village of Morákri to the self-revealed Párśwa Nátha for enjoyment (in this world) and salvation (in the next).
- 25. He cherished the Bráhmans by giving them gold in charity, and by performing the ceremony of Tuládán (giving his own weight in gold) on ten several occasions, as well as by grants of towns (and villages), he defeated the intelligent king Vastu Pál and took his beautiful elephant named Mansidhi.
- 26. He was followed by king Someśwar who got his kingdom with the blessing of the god Someśwar; and being his true devotee, he came to be regarded like Siva among mankind.

- 27. He, the very potent one, got the surname of Pratáp Lankeśwar: from his presence the chief (among the powerful) enemies fled, and many met their death by his sword.
- 28. Actuated by a desire to enter the Heaven, he offered the village of Rewná (during his administration), to the self-existent Párśwa Nátha:

Inscription VI.

[This Inscription measuring 3 feet 2 inches by 3 feet runs to the length of 48 lines, each containing 70 letters on an average, and consists of 62 ślokas of different metres. The ordinary salutation to the gods ends at śloka 10th; then we read a genealogy of the Ránás of Udayapur, from Bápá Ráwal to Samar Singh, which ends at the 48th śloka. Translation.

- 1. Obeisance to Siva! whose might, capable of being known to himself and naturally free from impurity, is but little appreciated by Brahmá (the Creator) and other gods. May the lord Achaleśwara, free from all concern with the universe, who liberates the beings of the world who are absorbed in Him from its bonds, be pleased ever to give us bliss.
- 2. Who seated on a lotus [or a Padmásana, a seat or throne made in the shape of a lotus, on which idols are placed], offers the oblation of souls (vitality) to (the sacrificial fire of) the body for Creation's sake; prior to such a one the Omnipresent Being, was born Siva having a Níla-lohita (with a blue neck and red hair) body.

May Sankara (Siva), holding in his lotus-like hand, the brilliant fifth head of Brahmá, forcibly detached from the trunk, with the tip of the nail of his (Siva's) wicked* thumb, protect you.

* Because charged with Brahmá-hatya = murder of a Bráhman.

- 3. May the elephant-faced god Ganes, grant you wealth, who is the remover of misfortunes, whose brilliant temples (like mountainpeaks) are buzzed about till now by a swarm of black bees, which are as it were performing penances to him, with a desire to get rid of their black colour, and repeating a humming prayer composed of (letters or) sounds which we cannot make out, having given up all other occupation, and feeling honourable pride or intoxication.
- 4. May Hanuman deliver us from evil, whose wonderful leap to cross the ocean, set the terrestrial sphere a-whirling, by causing a cloven range of mountains to fall down in the shrinking ocean, caused the sky to burst asunder and come down and the points of the compass to contract to a centre, that disturbed the equilibrium of the (vessel of the) universal frame, and thus threw the world into a state of agitation resembling that (which happens) at the end of a kalp (the destruction), although the day had not arrived.
- 5. The foremost (noble) race of Gohil is triumphant, whose lineage, is formed of a number of clans and sub-clans, having good qualities, recognised as the head of Princes or ruler of mountains, resembles the bamboo plant, of which the joints have a number of branches large and small, which is suited to have a bow-string fastened to it, and crowns the crests of hills.
- 6. That the race of this Gohil has the reputation of Náráyan or Vishnú among the kings, is right, else how could the kings, [whose purpose is to attain salvation, holding white dandas (mendicants' staff) in the form of canes (for inflicting punishment), inclined to the protection of lives, and ever enjoying the blessing of wealth, allow their hands full liberty to deal in charity by giving away money], have reposed confidence of protection in it?
 - 7. The territory, well-suited to remove misfortunes, saturated with the filthy odour exhaled from the (decomposing) fat of wicked persons (killed) by Bápá Ráwul, excelling the Paradise in beauty, and bringing the pride of all other cities of the world to a test, bears the name Med-pát (the modern Mewar).
 - 8. There is in this land of Mewar a town (named) Nághrid (now the village of Nágdá) well-deserving celebrity, where the sage Hárit rich only in penances, performed austerities.
 - 9. There are many well-to-do householders, who have commenced a series of sacrifices for the welfare of the world, being pious, and having a store of articles fit to be burnt as oblations (or virtue), they satisfy Agni (the god of fire) with those substances.

ing Pránáyám (a system of Yog in which the breath is drawn in through the nostrils, and then exhaled in the opposite direction after a periodical stoppage), who have acquired true wisdom, and seated in a lovely and charming spot, perceive the Deity existing in the soul.

- 10. In that forest, where ascetics practise Yog and are generally freed from the bonds preventing the approach to heaven; Hárit Rishi who subdued the senses by the practice of Yog, who clearly sees the occurrences of the universe, and attained final absorption into Siva, the abode of the result of ascetic severities, granted (the goddess of) royalty to his votary, the renowned Bápá Ráwal.
- 11. Bápá Ráwal artfully transferred the characteristics of a Bráhman (acquired during his breeding in a Bráhman household) to Hárit Rishi resembling Brahmá in his prowess, as it were by means of his services to the sage: and in return he received, the splendour of a Kshatriya from the Rishi, in the form of a golden anklet. The descendants of Bápá called Gohils incessantly adorn the earth like so many incarnations of Kshatriyadom up to the present day.
- 12. Bápá Ráwal's son was Gohil who dealt out justice impartially; the Rájás descended from him are distinguished by the title of Gohils (the modern Gohilots or Gehlots).
- 13. From Gohil was descended Bhoj, whose intellect was brilliant like a ray of nectar, whose ornament was (the ambrosia of) learning, who could easily hold the passion of love in subjection, and was of extremely good and charming (amiable) manners, who crushed the pride of the ocean, (which is deep and a seat of fortune) and was a worshipper of the Lord of Lakshmi, i. e., Vishnú.
- 14. He was succeeded by a king named Shil, whose hand was terrible with a wanton sword, who had a horripilation expressive of exquisite delight or spiritedness, and a body like an incarnation of the high sentiments themselves, who was a great warrior, and enjoyed the wealth of the enemies (slain by him).
- 15. His son was Kálbhoj, who cut asunder the love of the females (of Dravida and Kalinga or) who wear garments reaching down to the toes, the crown of the kings of noble races, who inflicted punishment on the rulers of the Carnatic, who took delight in worshipping the images of Vishnú, well-versed in the mysteries of law and witticism, (whose strictness was) unbearable from his dealing punishment with a violent bow true to its aim and terrible like death.
- 16. Then came Bhartri Bhat, who satisfied women with his protection, and the learned men with presents, the quarters of the world with lots of conveyances, the Bráhmans with (handsome) presents and gifts on the occasions of births (of descendants), who were made as happy as the fountains of delight, who had stout progeny and was very charming, protected the earth and crushed the pride of the Kalpa Briksha (the fabulous tree that grants all felicity).

- 17. To him was born a Prince named Agh Singh, who was slender-waisted and broad-chested, terrified the kings, who support the earth (like the elephants at the corners), or the mad elephants of the mountains.
- 18. His son was Samháyak who trusted to his own valour and prowess, never yielded to any one, and bore the heavy burden of State (or the earth, like the King of Serpents), from (the sparks of) whose anger (resembling the fire in fierceness) the troubled foes were dispersed, and in which (sparks) wicked people feeling a difficulty in subduing the senses, fell like so many insects (gathering round a lamp or fire).
- 19. He was followed by Khumán, whose sword (like a nimbus-rain-cloud) fell upon (drenched) the best of warriors with its sharp edge (like a piercing shower) in the sky of the day of attack, overclouded with the dust rising up from the ground by the tread of forces: it is wonderful that the red powder, besmearing the breasts of the wives of warriors (killed by him), was washed away with the tears black with the collyrium of their (wives') eyes, and similarly, the hearts of clear-intellected men are peeling like a roar of thunder when lightning falls (to the ground).
- 20. Then succeeded Allat, who was invincible in battle and a rival of death in killing, as his terrible sword conquered the forces of his enemies in mere sport.
- 21. Next was born Narváhan, who captured the conveyances of his rival kings in battle, worshipped Siva with conscientiousness, struck awe and terror in the hearts of all his enemies.
- 22. After him succeeded Sakti Kumár who eradicated the policy of all his enemies with his valour, who was free from stain and possessed good qualities, the renown of whose noble deeds excelled even the stars in brilliance.
- 23. From Siva, whose feet rest over high mountains, was born the beautiful Swámi Kártik: so from Sakti Kumár, whose feet rested on the crown of great Princes, was descended king Suchi Varma who displayed his terrible strength to his enemies.
- 24. Verses celebrating the heroic deeds of whose hands were chaunted by the celestial maidens of melodious tones, who was entitled to the reputation of Indra in heaven, on account of his great and noble actions, such a one Suchi Varma was succeeded by Nara Varma, who turned pale the complexion of his enemies' wives agitated with love, who illuminated all the worlds with the lustre of his renown.

- 25. On Nara Varma's desiring to taste the delight of meeting the wives of the gods [i. e., when he entered Heaven], the earth was protected by Kirti Varma, who was on a par with Indra in piety.
- 26. On Kirti Varma's,—who was very fierce, and weak from constant love (to acquire new possessions) and also devoted to very austere penances,—performing ablutions in (the sacred stream of) the Ganges (the Sindhu of Heaven) and sporting with the heavenly damsels, Bairad succeeded to the throne, who pulled down the houses of enemies with his hands, and had the forehead of his foes kept lower than his throne (in homage) on account of his valour.
- 27. On the death of Bairad, a source of delight to the host of his enemies, succeeded Bairi Singh, who made his name quite significant, as he was a lion among his rivals.
- 28. After him reigned a king Vijai Singh by name, who was a Lion with Victory for his title or surname, who had a broad chest and a slender waist, and caused mountains or (the hearts of) kings to tremble, even in sport; he was a destroyer of (elephants in the shape of) enemies.
- 29. His enemies' wives, pressed down with grief for their husbands' death, gave up the whiteness of their bodies with the sandal-paste applied to their breasts, and thus acted as it were the part of a Karnikár (बिंबार, a species of the bread-fruit tree Lacucha) flower, which is red inside with a yellow coating on the outside. [In just the same way the interiors of their bodies were red, while the outside appearance was languid and pale with grief].
- 30. (He was succeeded by) Ari Singh (stits) a great hero, who wrote down inscriptions of his noble deeds in all the quarters, with the ink composed of the smoke (soot) rising from the corpses of his enemies, burnt (to ashes) in the fire of his energy (rage).
- 31. Through his favour, learned* men's wives were enabled to paint their eyelids with collyrium, and filled their eyes with tears of delight. On the other hand, he deprived the eyelids of his enemies' wives of their collyrium (that was) washed away with tears of mourning; and thus it is wonderful that one and the same king produced double effects.
- 32. From Ari Singh was born Chond Singh, glorious as the Sun and brilliant like the crown-gem of princes, his throne shone over mountains as that of the Sun over Sumeru (स्तेष).
- 33. The son of Chond was Vikram Singh, whose sword fell upon the temples of elephants (and cut them asunder), who overtook even - * If unant is taken to mean 'gods' wives,' there would be an allusion to the belief that heroes killed in the battle-field become gods.

Death itself in the battle-field, and spread a tale of his valour among his enemies.

- Then ruled Kshem Singh for the prosperity of the earth, he rooted out all the (thorns) formidable enemies with the strength of his hands.
- The wives of demons, grown senseless, and graceful in the act of staggering, occasioned by satiety or intoxication from drinking a portion of the blood, gave it in skulls filled up to the brim and overflowing, to their husbands, who drinking to an excess out of the vessels placed in the hands of jolly female attendants, merrily sing aloud the noble acts of that king in the battle-fields.
- 36. Kshem Singh found a successor in Samant Singh, protector of the earth, excelling even Cupid himself in beauty, who seized all the property of the petty kings in his empire.
- 37. Kumár Singh then became the leader of the armies of the Gohils, of which the glory is curious [as led only by generals after Khumán whose descendants did not command in person]* which never sustained a defeat, and he retook the lands that had been taken by adversaries.
- 38. Then succeeded a king whose name was formed by two words, one signifying a Lion, and the other meaning the crusher of the pride of his enemies' armaments; that is, his name was Mathan Singh, really significant of his qualities, for he defeated his foes with his valour.
- 39. His sword could assume double aspects in the field of battle: (1) While in the scabbard it did not sprinkle any blood at all; (2) When active in the field in spilling blood, it was not satiated and did not seek the scabbard.
- After him king Padma Singh, the essence of the rest, protected the land of Mewar, and made it happy.
- The learned Padma Singh, glorious like the lustre of a pearl got from the globes (resembling hill-peaks) over the heads of his enemies' mad elephants unseamed by his sword, nicely inscribed the song or narrative of the vigour of his arms on the tablet of battle-fields.
- 42. On Padma Singh's ascending the seat of immortals (i. e., Heaven), succeeded king Jaitra Singh, the strength of whose hands shook the foundations of an enemy called Nadole, and who was to the army of the Turks like Agastya to the Ocean. [As the sage Agastya
- * वियोग = separation. Taking it (= विशेषेण, योगः) to mean constant attendance, the [] would stand thus: 'as constantly led by the descendants of Khuman in person.'

sucked up the Ocean, so the Turkish army was (devoured, i. e.,) killed with the sword of this Prince.]

- 43. Verses celebrating the heroic deeds of Jaitra Singh's hands are loudly echoed up to the present times in battle-fields by demons, intoxicated with a drink of the blood of the soldiers of the Sindhis (slaughtered by Jaitra), as well as jolly with the embraces of their (own) wives surrounding them.
- 44. After Jaitra Singh the earth was made splendid by the renowned piety of Tej Singh, who was quite free from fear, and planted the root of anxiety in the hearts of enemies.
- 45. Tej Singh, a tourist among crores of cultivators, sowed the seeds of (the pearl of) salvation (in fertile grounds) by giving away lands in charity, and by watering them with the handful of water (indicating a vow) for giving alms, and bestowing care on the field in the form of advices from a good spiritual preceptor, he obtained the fruit of virtue: and afterwards having performed ablutions, he raised a store of mounds of the spreading renown of his wealth in all the quarters.
- 46. This clever prince Samar Singh (son to Tej Singh), the tip of whose grinders shines like a touchstone delivered (the land of Gujarát) from its drowning state in the ocean (of the Turkish army), like the Boar Incarnation of Vishnú, and is administering his kingdom with a liberality and charity equal to that of Kurna and Bali (the types of Bounty).
- 47. O! son of Tej Singh, the renown established by your sword is celebrated in battle-fields till now, by demons holding in both hands the heads detached from the bodies of the slain (in battle), and striking them together as if to beat the time to the fourth cadence, and thus add harmony to the fine art of music, leading their beloved ones into a dance, and intoxicated with the blood of the enemy.
- 48. O! lord of men, all your noble qualities cannot he recounted, as there is a fear of their swelling up the volume of the book, because your character is formed of crores of strings of good qualities that cannot be numbered.
- 49. Abu reigns supreme as a gem among the mountains served by the gods, in which the sage Vasistha, free from the 16* sources of vanity, performed austerities.
- 50. That bestows every sort of prosperity on those who are impatient under difficulties, and gives salvation to those who hold the passions in check, that is a seat of fortune, whose body is pure from the company of the sacred stream of the Ganges, in such a mount Abu, the powerful lord of Bhawani, that is, Siva, the symbol of the all-pervading attribute, and thus moveable, has acquired a permanent and stationary abode.

- 51. Is not the monastery over this mountain a heap of the essence of all beauty? (a monastery) that had no beginning, and is wonderful and a fit abode for devotees.
- 52. In which a great many devotees and men of unblemished character, and also many gods have acquired emancipation of the soul, and thus (attained) the Supreme Being in all the (three) subdivisions of 'time,' of which the origin has been described with that of Abu by the authors of the Purans, that monastery holds in this mountain the wealth of the three worlds, under the guise of (its existence in) the (three) past, present and future.
- 53. Samar Singh, lord of the masters of the earth, ordered the reparation of this monastery at his own expense for his welfare, because he is possessed with a zeal in such virtuous deeds, and very willingly founded an almshouse, with arrangements of dainty and sumptuous food to be distributed to the sages* at a great expense.
- 54. A high golden flag-staff was erected in honour of Achaleswar by Samar Singh, who perceived the life to be transient like wind and lightning.
- 55. This monastery was formerly occupied by Bhávágni the master of the place, who had rooted out all causes of the least dishonour in the world, by fastings in the worship of Siva.
- 56. Having bodies pure from giving up all mutual enmity, whose minds are affectionate and who look upon mankind with pity, who have fully found out the principles of redemption, such lions and elephants perform austerities about this convent.
- 57. Bháv Ṣankar, the disciple of Bhávágni and like him in faith, is engaged in penances difficult of performance, with a desire of final absorption into Ṣiva.
- 58. The trees growing over mount Abu, always richly laden with fruits and flowers, express in numberless ways (by their roots and leaves), the diligence in continence of the sages who have eradicated the inclination for the pleasures of the sense, to the visitors.
- 59. Guided by the counsels of Bháv Ṣankar, king Samar Singh built this monastery with a golden flag-staff on Mount Abu.
- 60. Veda Ṣarmá the son of Priya Patú, a Nágar Bráhman of Chittore, who prepared the inscription that was placed in the village of Ekling Ji, among the temples of (Ekling Ji) the lord of the three worlds, the Divine Samádhís Chakra, is the author of this Inscription also charming to the minds of the learned, and pure because it describes distinguished (and hence noble) qualities.

- 61. May this Inscription be a means of livelihood to the poets who read it, so long as the Lord Achalesvar lives in (the company of) Mount Abu.
- 62. This innocent Inscription was marked with characters by Subh Chand, and chiselled out by a clever mason named Karma Singh.
- 63. Dated S. 1342 (= A. D. 1285) on the first of the waxing Moon of Magsir (October).

The language spoken in Chittagong is a dialect of Bengali, but greatly corrupted, owing to the remote position of the district, the strong Muhammadan element in the population, and the tendency in East Bengal to speak quickly and clip the words.

These causes have been at work in Bakarganj, and the country east of the Meghna, and the language spoken there differs from ordinary good Bengali, the difference increasing as we proceed south-eastwards. The extreme is reached in Chittagong where the difference is so marked that a native from other parts of Bengal does not readily understand the language. Thus আই ন দেইত ফারির means আমি দেখিতে পারি না, I cannot see; বাগ্রন means বেবাক প্রনিন, everything; তর stands for তার পর, after that. Ordinary colloquial Bengali is also met with there, or at least words used in ordinary colloquial Bengali, but such words are mixed up with purely local expressions, so that without a knowledge of the latter, it is not easy to understand what is said.

In offering these notes on the Chittagong dialect I know how incomplete they are, how many matters are unnoticed, and how much remains to be filled in to render this sketch thoroughly serviceable. These notes were collected some years ago, when I was residing in Chittagong. I have since then collected memoranda when studying the colloquial in other districts of Eastern Bengal where I have been. Several of the peculiarities here noticed are not confined to Chittagong, but prevail generally throughout Eastern Bengal, though not in so marked a degree. I may hope, however, that these notes, incomplete though they are, may be of use to others, whether as an aid in learning the vernacular, or as an inducement to supply what is wanting.

Notes on the Grammar of Chittagong Dialect.

PRONUNCIATION OF THE LETTERS.

The letters are the same as in pure Bengali; but the following peculiarities may be noticed—ক at the beginning of a word very often has the sound of the letters z (h) and z (kh) in the Hindustani—thus কাইম "a split bamboo" is pronounced kháim; কোনো "whither?" khonde; কোন "who" khaun.

থ is often pronounced like হ; and is sometimes corrupted to গ, thus মুগ দেই চিনি = মুখ দেখিলে চিনি, "I should recognise him if I saw his face." ছ is almost invariably pronounced like s; thus আহি "I am" is pronounced asi.

ট and ঠ are often corrupted to ড; thus উড for উঠ "get up"; মাডি for মাটী "earth"; উডান for উঠান. "the court-yard in a house."

প at the beginning of a word is very often pronounced like ফ, f, —thus ফারি for পারি "I can."

ফ is often pronounced like প or ছ—thus পেল্পাম for ফেলিলাম "I threw"; and ছেল for ফেল "throw."

শ sometimes and স generally, at the beginning of a word, are pronounced like হ h—thus সকল "all" becomes hakal; শোর "a noise" becomes húr.

য় in combination is almost always distinctly pronounced as y—thus কর্বা "kargya." When the vowels অ and আ immediately precede the a phalá, they are pronounced as if the vowel ই came in between, and this is especially the case when the a in combination is followed by the vowel এ—thus মাপো "he measured," is pronounced máipye; সাজা evidence sáikhya; আলো "he came" áisye. Similarly সমজে "in the presence of," "before," is pronounced samaikhye.

CORRUPTION OF WORDS.

The chief peculiarity of the dialect spoken in Chittagong is the extent to which the words are shortened by corruption. The chief ways in which this occurs are these—

(1) A single consonant, especially a hard one, occurring between two vowels is often elided, and the vowels open one on the other without blending; the elision is almost invariable if the second vowel be ই or ই—thus; ডাকিঃ "call" becomes ডাইঃ; আদি and আদিঃ "come" become আই and আইঃ; ড্বা "a bamboo hedge around a tank" becomes ডুআ; দেখিতে "to see" becomes দেইতে; বেবাক "all" becomes বেআক and then ব্যাক; বাঁথে "he binds" becomes বাএ; খতার "father-in-law" becomes হউর; খাইলাম "I ate" becomes খাইআম; বনিও "sit down" becomes বইঃ; খালিয়া "having opened" becomes খাইয়া and খাই; নিকাল "draw out" becomes নিআল.

But ম in such a position is often changed to anuswar; thus আমি "I" become আঁই; তুমি "thou" becomes তুঁই; ভামাত "tobacco" becomes ভাঁত and ভাউত; আমাত্ৰ "my" becomes আঁত্ৰ; and ভোমাত্ৰ "thy" ভোঁত্ৰ.

- (2) A compound consonant preceded by a long vowel in the middle of a word is generally reduced to a single one, all except the last being omitted or being replaced by anuswar;—thus শুধ্না "dry" becomes ছুনা.
- (3) Final a is often dropped, especially in the locative affix to in nouns, and in the infinitive of verbs—thus বাড়িতে "at home" becomes বাড়িত; বহুতে "to say" becomes কহিছ.

(4) Final আ is omitted in the 3rd person, Past and Pluperfect Tenses, in verbs; thus গেল for গেল; আছিল for আছিল; কর্গিল for কর্গিল.

(5) Short words with আ in the first syllable, sometimes insert ই (less frequently উ) after the আ in pronunciation—thus আইজ for আজ

"to-day": হাইল for হাল "rudder"; আউলে for আলে "before".

(6) In words of several syllables, especially those borrowed from Persian and Arabic, the accent is thrown back as far as possible, and the following syllables are lightened; thus হ্যালা (Arab. عواله) "charge" becomes হাওলা "a háola" (a tenure in which the tenant receives "charge" of a tract of jungle to be reclaimed); এলাকা (Arab. علائه) "connexion" becomes এলকা.

DECLENSION OF NOUNS.

The declension of nouns does not differ materially from ordinary Bengali, allowance being made for the changes due to corruption, thus the দিয়া of the Instrumental is corrupted to দি. The chief peculiarities are these—the Nominative often ends in এ; the Ablative is formed with তুল "from"; and the Locative often drops the এ of the termination "তে" so that it ends in t, as তারত for পারেতে "on the bank." The abl. তুল is added in nouns to the word itself, but in pronouns to the genitive case.

A sort of double case is sometimes met with, thus বহিনেরত (gen. and loc. cases) "at a sister's [bári]." I have also heard হাওয়ার উত্তে "by the force (lit., this) of the wind"; but this expression seems to be merely an instance of the common use of the pronominal form রি "this" ("what-do-you-call-it") to denote something that one cannot name at the moment.

Sing.		Sing.
N.	পুত or পুতে a son.	N. ফোইর a tank.
	পুতরে	Ac. ফোইর
I.	পুতরদি	I. ফোইরুদি
D.	প্তরে	D. ফেইরে
Ab.	পুততৃন	Ab. ফোইরতুন
G.	পুতর	G. ফোইর্র
L.	পুতে	L. কোইরত
V.	ও পুত

The numerals are the same as in ordinary Bengali, but অই is commonly used for eight instead of আঠ.

The word উআ or উআ is very generally used after a numeral to denote a "thing" or "piece," thus অফ উআ "eight things." When affixed to the word এক "one," the compound becomes এগু উআ, অপ্তআ and উপ্তআ "one thing or piece." It is also added to nouns to particularise, thus হে রাভ উআ "that particular night."

আনে (for থানে) is also used, thus দোনো আনে "both things."

ধন is used with adjectives, thus হত ধন "how many?" "how much?" ব্যাগ্ধন "everything."

THE VERB.

The most striking differences occur in the conjugation of the verb, which varies considerably from ordinary Bengali. Verbs are all conjugated very much in the same way, but the formation of the Past Tense (and the Pluperfect which is formed from it) presents several differences which depend on the final letter of the root.

The ordinary mode of forming the Past Tense is by affixing য়ি, য় and য়ে to the root if it end in a consonant, and ইয়ি, ইয় and ইয়ে if it end in a vowel, for the 1st, 2nd and 3rd persons respectively. This য় is distinctly pronounced y—thus মাপিয় "I measured;" আসিয় or (আফিন) "I came;" আসেয় (or আফেন) or আইয়ে "he came;" খাইয়ে "he ate;" ব্ৰিয় "I understood."

But if the root ends in ব or ড, (and also গ), the affixes are গি, গা and গো respectively—thus কর্গি "I did;" পড়গি "I read;" and the গ is sometimes changed to জ thus ধর্গি or ধর্জি "I seized." The regular forms, however, or forms closely like them are in use, thus খাইলাম "I ate;" ফেললাম "I threw;" নাজিলাম "I danced."

The Pluperfect is formed by affixing লাম, লা (or লি) and ল, to the 1st person, Past Tense—thus লেখিলোম "I had written;" লাগিগলান "I had begun;" কর্গিলাম "I had done;" ধর্মিলি "you seized," but আন্সেল "he had come."

The 1st person Future is formed by affixing মুম, গাাম and জ্বাম with or without a conjunctive ই, to the root, thus করিয়ম or কর্পাম "I shall do;" পারিজ্যম "I shall be able." The other two persons are nearly regular.

THE SUBSTANTIVE VERB.

Present. Past.

- 1. আছি "Iam," "we are " আছিলাম "I was," "we were."

THE PROPERTY OF THE PROPERTY O

The following is a specimen of a verb in its full conjugation.

Conjugation of the Verb कतिएड "to do, make."

Present.

- 1. করির "I do," " we do."
- 2. করর
- 3. করের; honorific. কর্তন

Imperfect.

- 1. করিতে আছিলম "I was doing."
- 2. আছিলা
- 3. আছিল

Past.

- 1. কর্গি "I did;" or regularly করিলাম (করি আম)
- 2. কর্ণা করিলা
- 3. কর্গো করিল্

Pluperfect.

- 1. ক্র্গিলাম "I had done."
- 2. ক্র্গিলা
- 3. কর্গিল্

Future.

- করিয়ুম* or কর্গাম; or regularly কর্ব and করিবাম "I shall do."
- 2. কর্বা
- 3. কর্বা* or কর্বে

Imperative.

- 2. কর "do thou"; and with the negative ন, করিও
- 3. কব্দক

Infinitive করিতে and করিতাম "to do."

Prest. Part. করিতে "doing."

Past Part. (कर्1) "done."

Conj. Part. করি, করিয়াবে "having done."

The following are specimens of other verbs, which show variations in the Present and Past Tenses.

VERB রাখিতে "to keep."

 Prest.
 Past.

 1. রাখির
 রাখাম or রাখিয়

 2. রাখর
 রাখ্য (or রাখিয়)

3. রাখের রাখ্যে (pronounced ráikhye).

^{*} This form is most common.

VERB 4130 "to eat."

Prest.

Past.

1. খাইব

খাইয়ি or (খাইলাম)

2. খাওর

খাইয়

3. খাএর or খার

খাইয়ে

The verb যাইতে "to go" has an irregular participle গোই "having gone," which is often added to other verbs, to render them more forcible, thus আঁই গোলাম গোই "I went away"; দেও গোই "give."

THE INTEROGATIVE.

A phrase is rendered interrogative by placing না after the verb, expressed or understood, for the present tense, and নি (sometimes না) for all the other tenses—thus ষাওৱ না "are you going?" গেলা নি "did you go?" ও চুৱ ন না? "is it not a char?"*

THE NEGATIVE.

The negative is expressed by ন, which is placed before the verb, thus—আইন দিয়ুম "I shall not give." ন যাইও "do not go." ন আইয়ে "he has not come." With the verb হইতে, ন is often blended into one word, thus—ন হইল্ becomes নইল্ "it was not." But the imperative use of না remains the same as in ordinary Bengali, thus—যাও না "go."

ADVERBS.

Adverbs of place are formed from the pronominal bases by affixing (1) ডে—thus কোডেডে "where?" or (2) যাঁ, য়ান or যানে (corruption of খান?)—thus ইযাঁ, ইয়ান and ইয়ানে "here."

Adverbs of direction are formed from the same bases by affixing for for (corruption of first?) thus—Efor "hither;" cotfor "whither?"

Adverbs of time are formed by adding the word উক্তে (وقت) or its corrupted form উত্তে to the pronouns, thus—হেউত্তে " then."

VOCABULARY.

I append a vocabulary of words peculiar to Chittagong. Out of a large number I noted down, I have struck out all that were to be found in Bengali Dictionaries, and those that remain are either peculiar, or are used in peculiar senses. A considerable number of the words, however, are not confined to Chittagong, but may be met with in Noakhali, Bakarganj, and other districts of Eastern Bengal.

Birthday of the Emperor Jaláluddin Muhammad Akbar.—By KAVI RÁJ SHYÁMAL DÁS, M. R. A. S. and F. R. Hist. Society.

[Translated by Babu Ráma Prasád.]

I. VIEWS OF DIFFERENT AUTHORITIES.

In the course of my constant references to the histories of India to gather information for my forthcoming work on Rájpútáná, I have found out that Persian authors are not unanimous as to the date of Akbar's birth.

(1.) Abul Fazl, Akbar's Minister says:—" Hamidah Bánú Begam, queen of Húmáyún was delivered of prince Akbar at Amarkot on Sunday night, the 5th Rajjab A. H. 949* (= Kartik Sudi 6th, Samvat, 1599 = 15th October, A. D. 1542)."

But he is not certain of the truth of this: he says that two astrologers (probably not living when Abul Fazl wrote,) Mauláná Chand and Ilias were present at Amarkot when the prince was born; and he gives several horoscopes prepared according to the Greek (Yunáni) and Hindu systems of astrology of the prince, which do not agree, some of them marking the sun in Libra and others in Scorpio; some mentioning

* Akbarnamah, Vol. I, pp. 31-53.

the birth to have taken place in the Sinha (Leo) Lagna, and others again in Kanyá (Virgo).

The author does not mention the annual birthday festivals as he does those of the accession day.

(2.) Nizámuddin Bakhshi assigns the same date for Akbar's birth in the 'Tabaqati Akbari' as Abul Fazl, who has also been followed by Badáuni in the 'Muntakhib-ut-Tawárikh.'

Their statements as high officials of the Empire, were taken to be correct and trustworthy, and adopted by the authors of the 1. Iqbál Náma-e Jahángiri; 2. Tarikh Farishta; 3. Muntakhib-ul-Lubáb; 4. Sair-ul Mutákharin and 5. Mulakhasut Tawárikh.

(3.) The author of the 'Miráti Aftáb Numá' gives no positive opinion on the point in question, but describes it in the following doubtful strain:—

"In the year A. H. 949 according to some accounts, or in A. H. 950 as others would have it, at Amarkot was born Jaláluddin Muhammad Akbar of Hamidah Banú Begam* a descendant of Ahmad Jám." "According to the Akbarnáma the auspicious birth of the prince took place at Amarkot on Sunday night the 15th Rajjab A. H. 949, the sun being at the time in Scorpio."

(4.) On leaf 44 of MSS. Tazkirat-ul Wáqyát the author Akbar Jauhar who was Aftábchi or the ewer-bearer of the Emperor Húmáyún writes:—

"While the Emperor Húmáyún was encamped on the banks of a pond, at a distance of 12 kos = (24 miles) from Amarkot on the way to Bakkar, a messenger arrived in the morning from the former place with the joyful intelligence of the birth of a son and heir; and delivered his charge in the following terms:—

"The Supreme Being has been pleased to bless your Majesty's royal household with a fortunate prince," which highly pleased the Emperor.

This auspicious event happened on the night of Saturday the 14th of Shábán A. H. 949 = 23rd November, 1542 = Margsir Sudi 15th Samvat, 1599.

"The moon of the 14th night (full moon) is called Badr, in consequence of which the child was named Badr-ud-din which signifies nearly the same thing as Jaláluddin, the name by which Akbar is commonly known.

"When the Emperor had finished his devotions and thanksgivings to the Creator, the chiefs came and offered their congratulations.

"His Majesty then asked the author of this (Akbar Jauhar) what articles he had given him in trust?

^{*} Miráti Aftáb Numá MSS. leaf 212.

"Two hundred Sháhrukhi coins, silver gauntlets, and one pod of musk," was the answer. Further "that the coins and the gauntlets were made over to Khudáwand Khán."

"His Majesty asked the reason of my giving to another person the things that had been entrusted to me.

"A due execution of your Majesty's order," was the response.

"His Majesty sent for the pod of musk which was immediately produced.

"The Emperor asked for a China plate, and having broken the pod in it, distributed it among the nobles, in demonstration of the joy felt at the prince's birth.

The courtiers expressed their good wishes and congratulated his Majesty on the occasion."

(5) The English authorities have simply followed Abul Fazl with-

II. OPINIONS OF LIVING SCHOLARS.

The statement of Akbar Jauhar makes the birthday fall about 5 weeks (the period intervening between 5th Rajjab and 14th Shábán) after the date assigned by Abul Fazl.

This difference put me into a dilemma, and I had to put off inserting the date of Akbar's birth in my book till I could satisfy myself of the truth of one or other of the statements.

With this view, the first step I took was to put the question to the Persian scholars of the day, through the columns of the "Khair Khwáh-e Alam" (a newspaper published in Urdu) in an article contributed to that paper by my friend Maulavi Ubaidulla Farhati, but without result.

Next, I referred to the under-mentioned learned gentlemen famed for their knowledge of Indian History:

- 1. Rájá Siva Prasád, C. S. I.
- 2. Maulavi Sayyid Ahmad Khán, C. S. I.
- 3. Maulavi Anwarul Haq (Mir Munshi in the office of A. G. G. for Rajputana). I am very glad to say, Raja Siva Prasad, to whom I am much indebted for his assistance confirms the statements of Abul Fazl by quoting the same date, 5th Rajjab A. H. 949, from some of the Persian works alluded to in the foregoing pages, and adds weight to their statements by proving the same date to be mentioned in the horoscopes of Akbar, copies of which are in the possession of trustworthy old Hindu astrologers.

I IMMENDITY !

Mill. W. 8 22 m 4. 11 Mpr.

I am glad to be able to say I have also got copies of the horoscopes of the Mughal kings and of the Rájás of some of the States in Rajputáná, e. g., Udaipur, Jaipur, and Jodhpur, &c., from well-known astrologers in Ujjain and other places, who follow astrology as an hereditary profession; but no reliable horoscope of Akbar has been found. Lastly, I relied on the labours of Dr. Hunter who writing of Amarkot in his Imperial Gazetteer (Vol. IX, p. 182) says:

"Here, in October 1542, was born Akbar the son of Húmáyún, the exiled Mughal Emperor, then on his way to Afghánistán. The presumed spot of Akbar's birth is marked by a stone-slab, with an inscription."

This passage inspired me with the hope of gaining my object. Consequently, I addressed a letter to my well-known friend, Sir Edward C. E., Bradford, K. C. S. I., Agent to the Governor-General for Rajputáná, requesting him to secure for me a copy of the inscription. He kindly complied with my request, and the following reply was thankfully received this month:

(True Copy.)

"Camp Ajmere, 1st December, 1885.

(Copy of the enclosure.)

"Sir.

With reference to your letter, dated the 26th instant, I beg respectfully to state that the stone is situated about two miles north-west of Umarkot with the inscription—

Digitized by Google

Akbar Bádsháh was born in the year 963 Hijri."*

Amarkot, 30th Oct., 1885.

I beg to remain Sir

To

Your most obedient servant

K. B. Kazi Faiz Muhammed. UMEDALI K. MUNSHI, Head Master A. V. School, Amarkot.

The year Hijri 963 (= A. D. 1555-56), however, is not that of Akbar's birth, but that of his accession to the throne; the date of his birth is not given at all: the inscription is thus valueless, and was most probably written at a far later date.

Thus left to my own resources, I feel in duty bound to submit my humble views, the outcome of my attempts at settling the question, for the approval of the learned members of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, to whom this Paper is intended for a "New Year's Present."

III .- THE AUTHOR'S VIEWS.

I am led to believe the statement of Akbar Jauhar to be correct and trustworthy on the following grounds:—

- (1) He was a contemporary of Humáyún, his constant companion in all reverses of fortune, and the Emperor reposed full confidence in him
- (2) He was present when the glad tidings of Akbar's birth were conveyed to Humáyún, who took from him the musk-pod to distribute it among the courtiers.

Under these circumstances, he (Jauhar) could not possibly have recorded an incorrect date for the Prince's birth.

IV .- OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

(a) It cannot be assumed that the scribe made a mistake in transcribing the MSS of the Tazkirat-ul Wáqyát long after the date of its composition, for, in it after writing the date and month the author explains the name Jaláluddin (Badruddin) to be due to the birth having taken place on the 14th, the moon of which (being full) is called Badr.

This shows that the 14th could not possibly have been written by mistake instead of any other date.

- (b) The argument that Akbar assumed the title of Jaláluddin on succeeding to the throne, does not hold good; because, according to Jauhar, it was given to him on the very day of his birth, a statement supported by the "Mirati Aftáb Numá" of Sháh Nawáz Khán, who says:—

THE RESIDENCE IN THE WALL PRINCE LINKSON

"The fort Jae-Sháhi (now known as Jalálábád) was given by the Emperor Muhammad Humáyún to Prince Jaláluddin Muhammad Akbar in jágir for his table-charges during princehood when Humáyún had been exiled from India by the Patháns, and had established himself in Cabul after punishing his brothers (relatives).*

"Since it came into the prince's charge, it flourished and increased in population, and was called after him Jalálábád."

From this it is inferred, that the birth took place on the 14th date, whence the name Jaláluddin was given to the prince.

The date recorded by Jauhar is therefore unquestionable.

Now, the following account of the village of Jún to which Humáyún had his Queen Hamidah Bánú Begam and the prince Akbar brought from Amarkot) by Jauhar, proves that the birth did really happen in the month of Shábán:—

"Several bands of robbers had to be encountered near the village of Jun; Sheikh Ali Beg returned after putting them to flight. The Emperor halted in a garden adjoining the village, and ordered entrenchments to be thrown up round it: then he sent one of the chiefs to Amarkot to bring the young prince, the females and the servants. On the 20th Ramzán the prince arrived, and had the honour of being embraced by his Majesty for the first time on the 35th day of his age."

This proves to a certainty that the prince was born on the 14th

A few lines further on, the author mentions the Roza or fast, from which the inference is drawn that the prince did really arrive in Ramsán, the month when the Roza or fast is kept.

V.

What led the authors of the 'Akbar Namah,' the 'Tabaqáti Akbari, and the 'Muntakhib-ut-Tawárikh' to record the 5th Rajjab, Sunday instead of the true date, 14th Shábán, Saturday?

My explanation may be embodied in a single term, superstition, still I should like to say something in detail.

There is a couplet enjoining on the Hindús to conceal nine things :-

चायुर्वित्तं ग्रहिक्दं मंत्रमैयुनमीषधीं। दानमानापमानच वव गोष्णानि कारयेत्॥

- * MSS. Miráti Aftáb Númá, p. 212.
- † MSS. Tazkirelul Wáqyat, leaf 45.

that is, 1, age, 2, wealth, 3, defects in one's household, 4, mantra (Vedic or Tantric), 5, coition, 6, medicine, 7, charity, 8, honour and 9, dishonour should be concealed.

Now, the first of these with which we are immediately concerned, is still strictly observed by well-to-do Hindús, of whom only 10 per cent. of enlightened views would ever dare to lay aside this rule. The annual birthday festivities are in most cases held a day or two previous to or after the actual birthday; and if the date is published in this way, the year of birth is kept a profound secret. Horoscopes of the nobility and gentry are always entrusted to confidential family-priests, who never betray their charge, or are at least expected not to do so.

The writer has personally observed people sometimes accusing their enemies of practising witchcraft against the life of some person; and to confirm the charge brought by them, the accusers try to produce fabricated horoscopes bearing special symbols, and a puppet figure of the proposed victim, from the houses of the parties accused.

The Mughals borrowed these superstitious notions from the Hindús. This is corroborated by the account, my able friend Major (now Colonel) John Biddulph gives of the superstitious observances current among the tribes of the Hindú-Kush in his book of the same name, under the headings:

1, constellations, 2, earthquakes, 3, fairies and demons, 4, magic charms and 5, divination* &c., &c.

From his description of these things it is evident that the people of Central Asia and the Tibetan regions have not, in spite of their conversion to Islám, given up the customs prevalent among the Aryan Hindús.

The Mughals consulted good or bad omens before important undertakings, as for instance—

- (1) On the eve of the battle at Fatehpur Sikri between Bábar and Maharána Sángá (Sangrám Singh) in S. 1584 (= A. D. 1527), the astrologer Sharif announced that the planet Mars being in the van, the Emperor's defeat was certain. Bábar did not care a fig for the prophecy, seeing it was against his purpose to believe it: but all his peeple were utterly discouraged at the astrologer's remark, and their hearts failed them.
- (2) When prince Humáyún was taken seriously ill, Bábar was advised to sacrifice the thing most precious to him, for the prince's recovery. He proposed to go round the prince's bed, wishing the sickness might leave the prince and visit his own person. The courtiers, believing the Emperor would thus stake his life, tried to persuade him against the proposal but in vain, as Bábar would not listen to their counsel. The consequences of such a proceeding are thus summed up by Abul Fazl:

- "From the very moment that the Emperor did this, the prince began to recover; the malady descended upon Bábar resulting in his death."*
- (3) "Jiji Anagah"—one of the nurses of prince Akbar, being on bad terms with another nurse Máhum Anagah by name—was very uneasy when accused of practising magic on the prince in the eighth month of his existence, thereby charming him to refuse to be nursed by any other woman than herself; but as the legend goes, the young prince to remove her anxiety, one day consoled her thus:—"Be of good cheer; I will not cease to be nursed by you, and on growing up I will hold your children in due regard." †
- (4) Speaking of a talismanic knife presented to Akbar by the Rája of Kajli in the 14th year of the Emperor's reign, Abul Fazl writes:—
- "The knife is still kept in the Imperial Treasury, and I have several times heard the Emperor say 'More than two hundred persons on the point of death from illness, recovered instantly on touching it." "I
- (5) "Prince Salim born with the blessings of Shekh Salim Chishti, after the Emperor had lost some children, was not allowed to be brought to the Emperor's presence for two months." §

Abul Fazl writes this in a roundabout way, but the true reason probably was the advice of astrologers.

There is not the least doubt of Akbar's belief in the miraculous powers of Shekh Salim. On one occasion the Emperor travelled on foot from Agra to worship at the sacred shrine of Khwájá Muin-ud-din Chishti in Ajmere; and again from Chitore to offer thanksgiving for his victory gained there.

It is needless to multiply proofs in support of the prevalence of superstitious customs among the Mughals. Superstition having a stronger hold upon the minds of females than those of males, I fancy Hamidah Bánu Begam, Akbar's mother and his guardian from his infancy till long after his accession to the throne, was possibly instrumental in keeping his birthday a mystery, as no one could be more anxious for his safety. She might have reported the 5th Rajjab to Abul Fazl and other courtiers, as it is not easy to conjecture that they could have remembered the birthday during the troublous times when Akbar was born—the Begam's report was trusted, and horoscopes were prepared accordingly.

[§] Akbar Namah, Vol. II, p. 435.

There is, however, one other alternative; that is, that the authors of the "Akbar Námah," the "Tabaqáti Akbari," and the "Muntakhib-ut-Tawárikh" might not have liked to publish the true date even if they knew* it—to show their care for their master's safety, and thus to evince their loyalty to him, who was also swayed by superstitious feelings particularly till his fortieth year.

VI.

It might be questioned why attention has not been directed to the account of the Emperor Jaláluddin Muhammad Akbar's birth recorded by Akbar Jauhar in the Tazkirat-ul-Wáqyát?

This could not be, because Jauhar was a person of low position, literate enough just only to enable him to read and write in the ordinary routine of business: he put down a record of the events just as they passed, to serve the purposes of a private record, but written with the greatest sincerity.

As he was not learned, his production has no claims to erudition, like those of the other authors, whose books were generally studied.

Jauhar's work probably lay as a hidden treasure for years and years after his death, and was brought to light only when European scholars commenced their researches, and it was they who appreciated it fully: as a happy result of this we are placed within reach of manuscripts of the work.

Akbar Jauhar had no interest in altering the birthday of Akbar, for as I have already said his were private records; moreover he has corroborated his statements fully, never losing the thread of the narrative.

Therefore, I conclude that the Emperor Akbar was born on Saturday the 14th Shábán in the Hijri year 949 [corresponding to the 15th of the bright half of Margsir, 1599 of the Vikram era = 23rd November A. D. 1542] as recorded in the "Tazkirat-ul-Waqyát" by Akbar Jouhar, Humáyún's ewer-carrier.

I trust the worthy members of the Society will express their own opinions on the points here discussed; and I shall very thankfully insert in my work, the result of their researches if satisfactory.

* This is probable of Abul Fazl, who after writing several horoscopes of Akbar that do not tally, says:—

"It is but meet that everybody should not know the actual account of the birthday of a sample of creation (like Akbar).

The Decline of the Sámánís and the Rise of the Ghaznavís in Máwaráun-Nahr and part of Khurásán. (With some unpublished coins.)— By E. E. OLIVER, M. I. C. E., M. R. A. S.

To Englishmen in India the history and geography of Central Asia are matters that have always commanded considerable attention, and of recent years "the progress of events" has forced them into recognition as matters of interest, possibly vital interest, to Englishmen everywhere. But beyond the outlines of certain well known historical features and a few famous names, our knowledge is still very indefinite and uncertain, and an attempt to fill in the details for any particular time or State, difficult in the extreme. The history of the Middle Ages in the East may be said to be still unwritten. The whole is made up of struggles for supremacy by various races, conflicting tribes, and petty chiefs, who founded innumerable dynasties, the very names of which, with the cities and territories they ruled, are now unknown, or at best can be traced by evidence the most slender and obscure.

Not the least valuable among such evidence is the numismatic. "The coins of the Muslim East", as Mr. Stanley Lane Poole writes in a recent work, "do not so much recall history as make it." The right to coin money in his own name, and of being mentioned in the Friday prayers was one of the most cherished privileges of every Muhammadan who could in any way get himself recognised as a ruler, and, fortunately for history, his vanity in this respect has made his coinage richer in names, places, and dates, than perhaps any other. His own, his father's, and his son's names, the contemporary Khalifah, the name of his Suzerain and of his father, his titles, the place of mintage, the date, and sometimes even the month, are occasionally to be met with on the same coin; a little history in itself which as a check on the native chronicles becomes invaluable.

Comparison of such evidence on a sufficiently large scale would in time enable us to clear up the history of many now entirely obscure periods. Such comparison is, however, only possible under the most exceptional circumstances, discoveries of large hoards of coins are very few and far between, and though from time to time a few worn coins with strange Kufic inscriptions of curious interest do find their way to the bazars of Northern India, they are of course rare, and collectors being now so numerous, it is highly improbable that sufficient will fall to one individual to serve any useful purpose. The Indian official is moreover handicapped in many other ways, by the want of books of reference, and of information as to what has been done already, and still more by the want of time for anything outside his immediate work at the State mill. The most practical suggestion is that of Mr. Stanley Lane Poole in the last number of the Numismatic Chronicle to compile from all sources a History of the Muhammadan Empire as established by coins, comparing the leading cabinets of the world. purpose of such a Fasti Arabici every coin accurately described may prove of value. Such a reason may perhaps serve as an excuse for the publication of the few I have met with, in preference to waiting in the probably vain hope of completing a series.

If not indeed to make such description in telligible, at any rate to give something of interest to the dry numismatic bones, it is desirable to make some effort to cover them with what has been so far ascertained of the history of their whilom owners, and at the risk of trespassing on ground already explored by past masters in the art, I have endeavoured to bring together in a brief and imperfect sketch an outline of the decline of one and the rise of another dynasty on the banks of the Oxus.

Máwará-un-Nahr, literally "what is beyond the River," is perhaps not so convenient a term as Transoxania, or the Greater Bukháriá of old European writers, but is more accurate. By it may be understood the territory bounded on the North by Táshkand, on the East by Farghánah or Khokand, on the South by Balkh, and on the West by Khwárazm or Khiva; of which the capital was Samarkand, and under the Sámánís, Bukhárá. The Sámánís themselves were originally natives of Khurásán,

The authorities used are mainly the Tabakát-i-Násiri of Minháj-i-Siráj, with Major Raverty's notes, the Kitab-i-Yamíní of Al Utbi. Vambéry's History of Bukhárá, with the selected translations from other chroniclers to be found in Elliot's Historians of India. And it is perhaps needless to add that what follows here has pretensions to nothing beyond being a sketch.

Asad bin Abd-ullah "the Good and Friend of the oppressed." Viceroy of the Khalífah in Khurásán, was implored by a nobleman of Balkh, named Sámán, one of the remaining followers of Zoroaster, to assist him against enemies who had expelled him from his city. Asad took up this nobleman's cause and reinstated him in his home, upon which Sámán showed his gratitude by embracing the faith of Islam, and named his first son after his protector, Asad.

This Asad had four sons, who following their father and grandfather's new creed devoted themselves to the cause of the Arabs, and rapidly rose to power and fame. Their swords were needed in the cause of the Faith, and the Khalifah Mamun promptly recognized their "talents, capabilities, bravery and innate nobility of mind," and conferred territories upon them. To Núh was granted Samarkand, to Ahmad, Farghánah to Yahyá Shásh,* the modern Táshkand and Isfanjáb, † and to Ilvás. Hirát. This was in 204 H. when Ghassan bin' Ubbád was the Khalífah's Viceroy in Khurásán. Succeeding Khalifahs confirmed the grants, the government of Samarkand passing at Núh's death to his brother Ahmad, 204-216 H. who, of all the brothers appears to have been the most sagacious, energetic, and powerful. In addition to Farghánah the whole of Káshghar and Eastern Turkistán to the frontier of China is said to have come into his hands, and his fame, as one of the most upright and best Princes of the dynasty "was celebrated throughout Irán and Turán." He died at Samarkand in 216 H. and was succeeded by Naşr, one of a family of nine sons.

Nasr I 261-279 H.

A man described as of many virtues, but of weak and suspicious nature, who to a great extent was indebted to the support of a younger brother, Ismá'íl, for the establishment of his throne. The dynasty of the Tahiris* had closed with the deposition of Muhammad (a) in 259 H. but there were still powerful members of the family, who with others were rival claimants to the Sámáni family lands. Husain bin Tahir (b) had been plundering and laying waste Bukhárá. Ya'kúb bin Lais(c), Saffári, had among other successes taken Hirát in 256-7 H. Níshápúr and Bukhárá in 259 H., and the inhabitants of all these territories were split up into innumerable parties. Especially was this the case in Bukhárá where certain of the nobles applied to Nasr for protec-Ismá'il was forthwith despatched and made his entry as Nașr's representative in 260 H., the latter's name being forthwith substituted in the Khutbah (Friday prayers) and Sikkah (money issue) for that of Ya'kúb bin Lais. The government of the territory was formally conferred on Ismá'íl in 261, who became universally popular, his popularity being materially increased by a severe defeat inflicted on Husain bin Tahir who had advanced on a fresh plundering expedition. He was too popular in fact to please Naşr, who now tried to depose him, and was only prevented by the intervention of mutual friends. Nasr still jealous and suspicious, soon sought new cause of quarrel and in 272 H. moved against his brother with a large army. Ismá'il was joined by his friend and ally Ráfi' bin Harsamah who had been made the deputy governor of the Khalifah in Khurásán.† For the time being hostilities were avoided and in 273 Ráfi' managed to patch up a peace, but within 15 months the quarrel was revived and a fierce and obstinate battle took place (275 H.) in which Naşr was entirely defeated and taken prisoner. The victorious Ismá'il showed the greatest generosity and respect to his brother as head of the Samani house, forgave him, and induced him to return at once to Samarkand, remaining his lieutenant in Bukhárá. For the next few years Naşr remained quietly at Samarkand where he died on the 22nd of Jumádí-ul-awwal, 279 H.

Ismá'íl 279-295 H.

Ismá'il assumed the government of Máwará-un-Nahr, as of all the territory which his brother had held, making Nasr's son governor of Samarkand, and choosing Bukhárá for his own residence, receiving the usual diploma of investure from the Khalifah. Such recognition had by this time become practically a matter of indifference, the Khalifate having ceased to be respected as a civil power and the Court of Baghdád only maintaining itself by a series of small intrigues. In fact at the very time Al Mu'tazid-b'illah was accrediting Ismá'il the "Defender of the Faith and of the Khalifate against all enemies" he was sending secret orders to 'Amrú bin Laig, the Saffári, to attack and overthrow him. result was a war lasting some seven years, which only terminated by the total defeat of 'Amrú under the walls of Balkh, who was taken prisoner 287 H. and sent by Ismá'íl to the Khalifah to dispose of as he deemed The Khalifah rewarded want of success by causing 'Amrú to be paraded on a camel through the Baghdad streets and thrown into prison, where he was either starved to death or beheaded about 290; while to Ismá'il he sent costly gifts and a further diploma investing him with the sovereignty of Khurásán from Bastam (the modern Sháhrúd) eastwards as far as Balkh, and northwards from Kain, by Sijistán, 'Irák, and Mazandarán to the Oxus. It is from this date, 287 H. that Ismá'íl is by many writers spoken of as the first of his dynasty entitled to be called a sovereign Prince. At the beginning of his reign he had defeated the 'Alawi Muhammad bin Zaid* in Tabaristán, had disposed of the remaining claimants of the Tahiris, defeated and reduced to subordinate governors the Saffáríst in Sijistán and Balkh, and in a series of campaigns defeated the Turks on his northern border. Bukhárá was now the virtual capital of the Central Asian States. "The power of the ruler on the Zarafshán," (Scatterer of gold); says Professor Vambéry "extending northwards to the confines of the Great Desert, eastwards to the Thien-Shan mountains, southwards to the Persian Gulf and the northern frontier of India, and westwards beyond 'Irák to within a few days' journey of Baghdád." Ismá'íl's representatives governed the towns of Merv, Níshápúr, Rai, Amol, Kázvin, Isfáhán, Shiráz, Hirát and Balkh.* He was well-known as a religious and pious prince, not less famous as a brave soldier than as remarkable for his love of justice, humanity, and taste for learning. He could have had but short respite from his protracted wars, repelling the invasions of Turks on the north, or waging crusades at the bidding of the Lord of the Faithful, but he did great things for Bukhárá, which under his rule became the centre of wealth and learning for nearly half Muhammadan Asia. For details regarding his encouragement of science and literature, his patronage of eminent theologians and scholars, the palaces he erected, the schools he founded, his efforts for the encouragement of manufactures and for an improved water supply, a reference must be made to the chapter in Vambéry's Bukhárá, in which city the name of Ismá'il Sámání is still venerated. He was born at Farghánah in the month of Shawwál 234 H., was 15 when his father died, governed Bukhárá for 20 years as the representative of his brother Nasr, and for 14 years independently, dying on Tuesday the 14th of Safar 295 H. his title then becoming Amir-i-Mázi, "the Late Amir."

ABU NASR-I-AHMAD 295-301 H.

That is, Ahmad the father of Nasr, the eldest of Ismá'il's four sons. afterwards designated Amír-i-Shahíd, "the martyred Amir" succeeded. "A prince of ungovernable temper and warlike tastes, but without a trace of his father's pacific virtues." His first act was to seize his uncle the governor of Samarkand and imprison him in Bukhárá, his next, to punish the governor of Tabaristán who fled to Baghdád. He then marched on Sijistán against the Saffárí Mu'addil who had assumed the sovereignty, but who was promptly subdued and imprisoned, Abu Sálih bin Mansur, the son of Ahmad's uncle, being established as governor. Subsequently the Sijistánis revolted and confining Abu Sálih in the fortress of Ark set up 'Amrú bin Ya'kúb of the house of Lais in 300 H., whereupon Ahmad promptly re-invaded them and 'Amrú surrendering, another Sámáni governor was set up. Ahmad's severities, and the execution of certain of his retainers, soon, however, raised enemies in his own house ready to assassinate him. He is said to have lived in constant fear of his life and to have had two trained lions secured every night near his sleeping apartments. The precaution being omitted one night, his own servants seized the opportunity, and earned for him the title of "Martyred," on day the 23rd Jamádi-ul-ákhir 301 H. His mint towns observed are Samarkand, Shásh and Andarábah.

cities, as far as known, is more extensive, including Samarkand, Bukhârá, Shásh, Balkh, Níshápúr, Muhammadíyah, Kumm, Andarábah, Ma'dín, Binkith, Akhsíkat, and Tamkat-Ilak, of which some are difficult to identify. He died in Rajab 331 H. after a reign of 30 years, extending over four of the Khalifahs. Of his three sons he had named the youngest but was actually succeeded by the eldest.

Nин I 331-343 H.

The reign of Núh the first, styled Amír-i-Hamíd, "the Laudable Amir," like that of his predecessors was made up of a long series of wars and revolts, and even more than Ahmad or Nasr he was in the hands of his officials. The Sámánís in place of leading themselves, became more and more the puppets of the Turks, who had already begun to assert their power as the dominant race. Núh's wars commenced with a campaign in 332 against Rukn-ud-daulah, the Diálamah or Buwiah, who had seized Rai. Abú 'Alí, Núh's general, who, after two campaigns succeeded in restoring order, demanded the Vicerovalty of Khurásán as his reward, and on being refused broke into open rebellion. Abú Isháki-Ibrahím, Núh's uncle and rival, obtained powers from the Khalifah, joined the rebellion, and seized upon the high lands of 'Irák and part of Khurásán (335 H.) and but for the rebels quarrelling among themselves Núh, would have lost his throne. He had in 332 put down the rebellion in Mery, and in 335 proceeded there again on the same errand, the nobles and soldiery showing signs of disaffection. On succeeding his father he had appointed as Wazir and entrusted with the administration of affairs, Shams-ul-Aïmmah, a man Minháj speaks of as having "by his enlightenment and just administration annoyed and irritated the rebellious party beyond measure," who was now charged by a section of the army with being the cause of all the confusion and division in the State, and demanded as a victim. "Give him into our hands," they said "or we will join your uncle." Núh was constrained by necessity to deliver the Imam into the hands of these tyrants, and they brought him forth. At the entrance to the royal residence there stood two tall white These they bent downwards, and, fastening each of that poplar-trees. unfortunate minister's feet to a branch of either tree which was nearest it, let the trees spring back again into their upright position, and the great man was torn asunder." The risk of being too famous as a "just man" was even greater under the Sámánís than among the Athenians. But the sacrifice of the minister did not postpone the evil day. Abú 'Alí the general went over and joined Rukn-ud-daulah, and a fresh revolt resulted in the latter becoming the independent ruler of Khurásán, the Buwiahs* extending their power to Shiráz, the Sámánís being confined very much within their original frontiers of Trans-Oxania.† Núh died after a reign, in no other way especially remarkable, of 13 years, in 343 H.

'ABD-UL MALIK I 343-350 H.

The son of Núh, a boy of 16, was selected by the nobles to succeed him, the real business of State being carried on by the Wazir Abú Mansúr Muhammad bin Al'Aziz, and the Commander-in-chief, Abú Sa'íd-i-Bakir. The Amir or his advisers seem to have heartily endeavoured to restore the power of the Sámánís in the West, though the best the generals could succeed in obtaining were tolerable conditions of peace, but no submission. The final conclusion of the treaty with the Buwiahs seems to have brought the Commander-in-chief under suspicion, for both he and the Wazir were subsequently put to death by the Amir's order, the command of the troops being in 346 H. entrusted to Alptigin, the Hajib or chamberlain. It may here be noticed it was in this reign that according to Baihaķi a merchant named Nașr, a Ḥáji, speculated in a slave named Sabuktigín, and brought him to Bukhárá, where Alptigín purchased him, and took the slave along with him when he went as governor of Tukháristán, and subsequently when the government of Khurásán was entrusted to him, Sabuktigin accompanied his master, who after many vicissitudes of fortune finally took him to Ghaznín.

Abdul Malik was passionately devoted to field sports and "chival-rous amusements" which gained for him the title of Abu-l Fawáris, the "Father of Knights," he was also called Amír Rashíd the "orthodox Amir." He died after a seven years' reign on the 8th Shawwál 350 H. from the consequences of a fall while playing Chaugan or "Polo."

Manşúr I 350-366 H.

Abú Ṣálih-i-Manṣúr, Amír-i-Sadíd, "the Steadfast Amir," was elected by the commanders of troops, the heads and elders of the religious bodies, and the law, to succeed his brother. The Amír-i Ḥájib Alptigín who then held the governorship of Níshápúr, was during the election at Bukhárá absent somewhere in Khurásán. He was written to and consulted, and is said to have declared in preference for the son instead of the uncle of 'Abd-ul-Malik, although if the latter, who died at 17, had a son, he could have been but an infant. Whatever his advice may have been, it arrived too late, and meanwhile hearing of Manşur's election, Alptigin would fain have recalled it. The advice moreover appears to have given offence, for the government of Nishápúr was conferred upon Ibn 'Abd-ur-Razzák, much to the powerful Turk's astonishment, who hurried back to Bukhárá, some accounts say, with a formidable body of troops which were only stopped at the Oxus by a strong force of Mansúr's adherents; others that he was met by a conciliatory letter assuring him of favour, turned aside from Balkh and proceeded to Ghaznín. Whichever is true, the increasing decay of the Sámání power is as evident as the rising influence of the "Turks," the former slave having now become a power in the land, and it is clear, that about this time Alptigin went, presumably for the second time, to Ghaznín as the Sámání Viceroy and died there in 352 H. On all sides powerful nobles were forming similar semi-independent States. Farghánah, Sijistan and 'Irák were revolts. The Buwishs were masters of half Irán, and that dynasty had now become one with which the Sámánís were not strong enough to cope. Mansúr's campaign against them had to be brought to an end. He made peace with Rukn-ud-daulah, and in 361 H. married the latter's granddaughter, the daughter of 'Uzdud-daulah Faná Khúsrau which prince retained possession of 'Irák, Rai, Gurgán and Tabáristán in fief on payment of an annual tribute. Manşúr died on Tuesday the 11th of Shawwal 365 H.*

Nún II 365-387 H.

Better known as Amír Abú-l-Kásim-i-Núh was elected by the people to fill his father's throne, and, in spite of the patent of investure and standard sent him by the "Lord of the Faithful," Al Tâ'i-lillah found still more stormy days and harder fights in store for him. The new ruler made Abú-l'Abbás-i-Tásh the Ḥájib, and with him associated Fáyik-i-Kháṣah, or Buk-Túzún as he is variously called, in the command of the troops and direction of military affairs; Tásh having the title of Ḥisám-ud-daulah "the sword of the kingdom." The son of another Turkish slave, Abú-l-Ḥasan-i-Símjúr ruled in the Amir's name over Níshápúr and parts of Khurásán, to which was subsequently added the territory of Tús, if not indeed part of Máwará-un-Nahr. Abul Ḥasan-i 'Abdullah son of Aḥmad Al'-Utbá, a member of whose family compiled the Taríkh-i-Yamíní, was made Wazir. Kábús the son of Washmgir was made, or rather recognized, as governor in Gurgán, and others in outlying provinces, but in most cases such governors were practically independent. Tásh the Ḥájib was despatched against 'Uzd-ud-daulah the Buwíah who ruled both the 'Iráks, but defeated. Not long after both Tásh and Símjúr themselves revolted, although after some struggles both returned to their allegiance, and Abú 'Alí the son of the latter was given the command of the Amir's troops. Abú 'Alí turned out in every way even a baser man than his father, for he had no sooner entered the service than he commenced intriguing against Núh.

On the eastern frontier of the kingdom a new power had for some time been growing, in the shape of the Khanate of Turkistan. Regarding the earlier of these Turkistán Kháns but little is known, and that little to a great extent unreliable. Of Ilaks and Bughrás and Arsaláns there are at least two or three of each casually mentioned by Muhammadan historians, with a considerable amount of uncertainty as to their identity, and possibly the same man is occasionally made to do duty for two separate chiefs. The first who became a convert to Islám is said to have been Sátúk-Kujah, or Sátúk Karachár, who endeavoured to extend the belief among his people, probably about 315 or 320 H. On his death, his son Músá succeeded, and after Musá his grandson Abú Nașr-i-Ahmad, bin 'Ali, bin Músá, under the title of the Ilak Khán, the title of Ilak by some being held to be the ruler of a tribe, or a leader, subordinate to a Khán. This Ilak bore the Musalmán title of Shams-ud-daulah, and is presumably the one who entered Márwará-un-Nahr from Turkistán in 367. The fourth was the grandson, Abú Músá-i-Hárún Bughrá Khán bin Sulímán bin Ilak, and though it is probably his successor, the more famous Ilak, who really completed the uniting and consolidating the scattered Turkish States from the Eastern frontier of Khokand to the modern Chinese province of Kansu, Bughrá Khán had nevertheless already become celebrated both as a powerful ruler and for his successful religious wars in the cause of Islám. He had united all the Eastern Turkish tribes under his sceptre and was now pushing his conquests westwards, thinking to enrich himself with some fragments of the decaying Sámání empire. Ignoring the puppet Amir, and addressing himself to the rebellious Abú 'Alí he entered Máwará-un-Nahr from Káshghar his capital, for the first time in 372 H., and subsequently in communication with Fáyik and Abú 'Alí with the latter of whom he had a secret treaty to divide the country, invaded in force in 380 H.

The Sámání forces were beaten on one or two occasions, the ablest of their generals, Madáwanj, being defeated near Samarkand. The rebellious Fáyik would seem to have been then put at the head of the army, and to have promptly betrayed his trust, and when Bughrá advanced to Bukhárá there was nothing left for Núh but flight in disguise with a few faithful retainers, Bughrá entering the capital in triumph in 382 H. Fáyik, who had now declared himself his subject and been rewarded with Isfanjab was despatched to Balkh, to collect taxes, and cause the Khán's names to be inserted in the public prayers and the coinage. Bughrá, however, did not remain long in Bukhárá, becoming much afflicted by a painful disease, which heattributed to the unhealthiness of the Sámání capital, he determined to return to Kashghar. As soon as he commenced his retreat,* Núh with the assistance of certain tribes of Ghuzz Turks, viz., Turkománs, plucked up heart and set off in pursuit overtaking him at Samarkand. Bughra at once faced about, and inflicted another defeat on the Amir, but before reaching Turkistán died himself in 383 H. He is described as a just and well-disposed monarch, the friend of learning, and the learned, from Kashghar to Chin. It is also worthy of note that it was in her reign, in 375, that Saljúk, the son of Lukmán, one of the aforesaid Ghúzz Turks with his family and dependents finding their native pastures in the Karakhita too circumscribed, entered Máwará-un-Nahr for the sake of the pasturage, wintering in the Núr of Bukhárá, and summering in the Sughd of Samarkand, and living to ultimately establish the famous Saljúk dynasty.

Núh once more retired to his faithful capital, almost the only part of his dominions that remained so, and cast about for some alliance to strengthen himself against his rebellious vassals. Such an alliance he found in Sabuktigin the famous founder of the dynasty of the Ghaznavis. Upwards of thirty years had elapsed since Sabuktigin had gone with Alptigin to Ghaznin and several changes, which will be subsequently noticed, had meanwhile occurred there, but the former slave, who had. now become practically the independent ruler over territory extending from Ghaznín to the Indus, was nevertheless still devoted to the house of his suzerain. The people of Balkh had already implored his aid against the tyranny of Fáyik, and when a similar call came from Núh, Sabuktigin marched to the Oxus with a large army, including 200 elephants, halting on the way for a short holy war against certain heretics and schismatics on the confines of Talkan, for which the Khalifah rewarded him with the title of Náşer-ud-din, "The defender of the Faith." Núh met him at Kāsh, and their united forces marched into Khurásán. Abú 'Alí although powerfully supported by the governors of Gurgán and 'Irák was no match for the combined armies of Núh and Sabuktígín, with whom was his son Mahmúd. A battle was fought on the plains of Hirát in Shawwál 384 H., Núh resigning the entire command to Sabuktigin, in which the rebels were routed and fled to Nishá-This was the occasion when the aged Sabuktigin received the title of Násir-ud-daulah "Succourer of the kingdom," and Mahmúd that of Saif-ud-daulah "Sword of the kingdom." Núh returned triumphantly to Bukhārā and Sabuktigīn to Ghaznīn, Maḥmúd being nominated to the command of the troops with the government of the territories of Balkh, Hirát and Níshápúr, having his head quarters at the latter place.* In the following year, 385, Abu 'Alí, who had taken refuge with Abú-l-Hasani-Buwiah, at Rai, thinking the departure of Sabuktigin had partly left the field open to him, attacked Mahmúd at Níshápúr who after some hard fighting was defeated and driven back to Hirát: Abú 'Alí occupying Níshápúr, until Sabuktigín advancing with a considerable force to the rescue, he moved forward to meet him. A severe and sanguinary battle ensued near Tús; Abú 'Alí, with whom was Fáyik, being utterly routed and driven to Khwarazm. † The Shah of Khwarazm, Abu Abdullah, in spite of a generous appeal from Núh, put the fugitive in irons (386), a procedure that roused the indignation of the Viceroy Múmún Mahmúd at Jurgán, who forthwith attacked and defeated the Sháh, threw him into the identical irons from which Abú 'Alí was released, and finally in thoroughly Roman fashion executed him to make a holiday for a party of friends. ‡ Abú 'Alí was formally pardoned by the easy going Núh, but Sabuktigin considering him too dangerous a traitor, demanded his custody, and threw him into prison, where he died 387 H.

But, to use the somewhat inflated language of Al 'Utbi, the once "lofty flame of the house of Sámání had sunk very low, and the star of their empire almost set." Ilak Naṣr the successor of Búghra, the most powerful and famous of all the Kháns of Turkestán, was already on the frontier squeezing the Revenue Collectors, and preparing for invasion in communication with the ever ubiquitous Fáyik. Sabuktigín, who since his last victory had remained at Merv, now moved to Balkh, where he received an imploring letter from Núḥ for fresh assistance. This, after some little consultation with his officers, he commenced active preparation to render, meanwhile to him Ilak also made overtures, urged their ^{*} Coin No. XXIX of those now figured is of great interest in this connection confirming the accuracy of the chronicler, being struck by Mahmúd the son of Sabuktigín, about this time, as "Saif-ud-daulah" and governor of Nishápúr, giving also the name of his suzerain and of the khalifah who had recognized him.

brotherhood of faith, and the desirability of an alliance against the feeble Amir, who squandered his substance and neglected the cause of Islám. In reply Sabuktigin declared his loyalty and attachment to the Sámání house, and his intention to fight all who rebelled against it. An answer, that, plainly translated, might be read as a determination to establish his own dynasty rather than assist Ilak or any one else to establish his. Both sides therefore prepared for war, Núh, true to his weak and vacillating character, was helpless in the hands of any adventurer near him, and Sabuktigin's advice to stand firm and show himself a king, was thrown away. He was ready to send troops, or to give fresh titles of honour, but not to do anything more; a plan that in no way commended itself to the stout old warrior of Ghaznín, who forthwith took matters into his own hands, and sent his sou Mahmud with 20,000 cavalry to Bukhará; thus virtually deposing Núh and insuring the reversion of the kingdom. Ilak who, though master of a large army, was either not sufficiently prepared to fight, or thought more was to be gained by diplomacy, now made overtures of peace, and Sabuktigin, disgusted with the inertness of Núh, accepted them, the Boundary Commission of the time fixing Kútúm as the actual frontier, Fávik as usual receiving a solatium as governor of Samarkand, and Mahmúd returning as governor to Níshápúr. Sabuktigín returned to Balkh and Núh enjoyed a brief respite in Bukhárá, where he "went to the neighbourhood of mercy" on Friday, 13th Rajab, 387 H. in which year also died Sabuktigin.*

Mansúr II 387-389 H.

The history of the last two Sámánís who occupied for some two years the nominal throne of Bukhárá, is merely a chronicle of the struggles for the fragments of the Empire. Amír Abú-l-Hirs-i-Mansúr, who has been nominated by his father Núh as his successor, ascended the throne a raw and inexperienced youth, and among other of the mistakes of his brief reign of 20 months, he committed the great one of quarrelling with Maḥmúd. To the ruler of Ghaznín and the conqueror of India his unfriendliness was a matter of small consequence; he was pleased to ignore it, simply keeping aloof, attending to the consolidation of his power in Ghaznín, and the deposition of his brother Ismá'íl, who had in the first instance succeeded his father there. Fáyik was again entrusted with the command of the forces and again almost immediately commenced negotiations with Ilak, by whom he was summoned to Samarkand and sent back to Bukhárá with Turkistan troops, the newly made Amir retiring to Amul. At Fáyik's solicitation he came back again, entrusting the command that had formerly been Mahmud's to a courtier named Baktúzún. These two worthies conspired together to dethrone him, which they did taking him from Bukhárá to Balkh and thence by Merv to Sarrakhs, where they put out his eyes, and set up in his place Abú-l-Fawáris 'Abd-ul Malik, his brother, a mere child with whom they went back to Merv.

'ABD-UL-MALIK II 389 H.

'Abd-ul-Malik the second, cannot be said to have ever ruled, but briefly to trace his fortunes, and the still more exciting adventures of his brother Ibráhím, will perhaps be the most convenient way of dealing with the events that followed. Mahmúd who had disposed of the claims of his brother Ismá'il at Ghaznín, was already on the march with an army to Khurásán, and made the treatment of Mansúr an excuse for interference. By the time Fáyik and Baktúzún had nominated 'Abdul-Malik Amir, he had arrived at Balkh, from whence a very short time brought him to the gates of Merv. The conspirators fought and fled. but subsequently negotiated an arrangement by whith Hirát and Balkh should be held by Mahmúd, Merv and Níshápúr by them, the date of the arrangement being given as 26th Jamádi-ul-awwal, 389 H. Mahmúd giving the command of his troops to his brother Nasr, making Balkh the capital of his provinces west of the Kohi Baba, "the Father of Mountains." Not, however, before inflicting a severe defeat on a body of Sámání nobles collected under Dara bin Kábús, bin Washmgir, the governor of Gurgán, that had followed his army in hopes of plunder. 'Abd-ul-Malik and Fáyik returned to Bukhárá, where shortly after in the month of Shá'bán the latter died, "deeply regretting and heartily repenting of all the treachery he had committed, a contrition," as Minháj adds "that came too late." The adherents of the Samani dynasty were all dispersed.

In the meantime I'lak had also moved uninvited to chastise the enemies of order in his neighbour's country, and revenge the cruelties practised on Mansúr. He advanced from Fargháná to Bukhárá in the month Zi Ka'dah of the same year giving out that his object was to render aid to the Amir, and at the same time seizing and putting in irons a deputation of nobles who came out to meet him. He entered the city on the 10th of the month, any pretence was no longer necessary, the four sons of Núh, their uncles and all other representatives of the Sámání family likely to give trouble were arrested, 'Abd-ul-Malik the boy Amir being sent to a prison at Uzgand in Fargháná, the blind Mansúr Yá'kub, Ibráhím and the others being separately confined to prevent their taking counsel together. Abú Ibráhím-i-Ismá'íl known to history as Muntasir was the only one who escaped or is ever heard of again, and he for some years made a series of gallant but abortive attempts to restore the fallen fortunes of his house.

MUNTAŞIR, THE LAST OF THE SAMANÍS.

The adventures of Muntaşir suggest a chapter of the chronicles of the Cid, and the story as told by the contemporary Al 'Utbi offers a characteristic bit of the intricacies of Central Asian History. Disguising himself as a slave girl he succeeded during the confusion at Bukhárá in getting away, taking refuge for three days in the house of an old woman in the city, and eventually in the dress of a common soldier reaching Khwarazm. Here he was joined by a few Samani nobles and soldiers, and received warm sympathy and afterwards assistance from Shams-al Muálí Kábus of Gurgán. To cope with an adversary like Ilak was hopeless, but for a long time he was able to carry on a desultory war on the confines of Khurásán and Máwará-un-Nahr. When Ilak left Bukhárá he paid that city a flying visit, capturing J'afartigin and 17 other principal Kháns, and being welcomed by the people. His Hájib, one Arsláni-Bálú, defeated Tigín Khán a general of Ilak's near Samarkand, but both beat a hasty retreat on the first rumour of Ilák's preparation to return. At times his following became formidable and he encountered on various occasions the troops both of Ilak and of Nasr, Mahmud's brother, who was now commanding at Nishapur and governor of Khurásán, and with occasional success. In 391 he succeeded in capturing Níshápúr, the Ghaznavi general falling back to await reinforcements from Mahmúd, who sent to his assistance the Ḥájib Altontásh, the then governor of Hirát, by whom Muntaşir was driven back to the frontier of Gurgán to find his former friend there, Shams al Muáli, turned against him. Again rallying, with the help of the Ghuzz Turks (Turkománs) and their chief Bighú, he successfully attacked Ilak in 393, and is next heard of as "flying in the night" in personal fear of his Ghuzz allies. Now he appeals ad misericordiam to Mahmud, reminding him of the rights of his ancestors, the Sultan's feudal relations, of the many sorrows and extreme distress which had been his misfortune, and breaks out into verse which Reynolds freely translates.

"To mine eye, on which thy goodness still is painted, thou art dear;
To mine heart, which oft from misery's blows hath fainted, thou art dear;

To a soul forlorn, to sorrow born,

Which Heaven has grudged to cheer, That looking round, few friends hath found, Oh, chieftain thou art dear."

Without waiting or perhaps expecting a reply to this effusion, he makes for Merv, there unsuccessfully soliciting assistance from Abú Ja'far; thence to Abiward, in 394, where Abú Naṣr, a general of Mahmúd's lends him active support, and the two attack and are beaten by the Shah of Khwarazm. Next with a few followers, who seem to have stood faithfully to him through every calamity, he makes for Isfarayín, only to find that city closed against him. Then crossing the Oxus once more, he is met by the cavalry from Bukhárá and narrowly escapes with his life. At this crisis he falls back on his Ghuzz-Turk friends again, the military governor of Samarkand joining him with 3,000 men. and the citizens sending him 300 "picked Turks and a supply of money." So that he is sufficiently formidable to first alarm, and subsequently defeat, the forces of Ilak, near the village of Burband in Shá'bán 394; the Ghuzz coming in for abundant loot. I'lak is now roused, assembles an army and inflicts upon him a crushing defeat, the Ghuzz having meanwhile gone off with their loot. This defeat seems to have been a final one, Muntaşir retreating to Balkh from which place his flight, like the hunted hare, was in a long continued circle. From Balkh he fled to Kohistán.* Nasr the Ghaznavi general, Arslan Jazíb the prince of Tus. and Tughánjak Prince of Sarkhás hurrying after him, he continues his course to Júmand and Bastam, where Shams-ul Muáli, of Gurgán, with 2,000 body-guards, takes up the running to Bibar and Nísa. Beguiled by false promises he is induced once again to attempt Bukhárá and arrives at Shah Hamad his few attendants wearied with long marches and their long continued run of ill-luck. Deserted by his worn out followers, with no supplies, or other means of further resistance, he retreated to the eucampment of a nomad Arab tribe, and sought shelter in the tents of one Máh Rúe the "moon-faced" chief of the tribe. Al 'Utbi's words, "when the night arrived the vile Arabs of this Arab made a sudden attack upon him and spilt his noble blood upon the first day of the month Rabí-ul-awwal, in the year 395, and they buried his remains in marshy ground of the irrigated country of Mardám." "Moon-face," it is satisfactory to note, was afterwards put to death for his brutality by Mahmúd, whose sympathies were aroused for the unfortunate Muntasir.

^{*} The troops both of Mahmud and I'lak were on the look out for him.

Thus ended the dynasty of the Sámánís, Muntasir being the last of his house. With him a family became extinct which for the space of nearly a century and a half had ruled over a large part of Central Asia, "and whose members," as Vambéry writes, "may therefore with truth be regarded as the founders of that religious and social polity which was regarded by the Muhammadans of three continents, as the nearest approach to the golden age of Islám, and is in consequence still to this day held in high veneration. Baghdad and other cities of Western Asia were open to all manner of free thinkers, but Bukhárá, Balkh, and Samarkand, were, under the Sámánís, the special refuge of the Muhammadan scholars and zealots * * *. The political supremacy of Bukhárá over the different tribes of Central Asia, which has been maintained up to modern times by the rulers on the Zarafshan, may be traced to a similar origin. The deference paid by the mighty Sabuktigin to Bukhára, a deference imitated in later times by Afghans, Indians and Uzbegs, began during the period of the greatness of the Sámánís. They represented the last Iranian dynasty in the land of the ancient Iranian civilization and the importance of the legacy left by them to their Turko-Tartaric successors on the throne of Transoxania cannot be overrated."

Ylak Nasr at Bukhárá 389 - 403 H.

Abú-l-Hasan-i Nasr l'lak Khán, the son of 'Alí, who is described as the brother of Hárún-i Bughra, now that the Sámání family were removed, ruled unopposed in Máwará-un-Nahr, and not long afterwards. he wrote to Mahmud congratulating him on his inheritance of the kingdom of Khurásán and proposing a friendly alliance, with a settlement of boundaries, all the trans-Oxus territory to appertain to him, and all Mádún-un-Nahr, or Cis-Oxus, to Mahmúd. Ilak probably at this time was, at least nominally, acknowledged ruler of all the territory from the borders of China to the Caspian Sea. Mahmud's ambition was in the direction of India, and some such treaty and alliance seems to have been made about 396 H. and for some time friendly relations to have been preserved. An embassy was sent by Mnhmúd, consisting of Tughánjak Prince of Sarkhás and Abú-l-Ta'ib Sahl bin Sulaimán, Sa'lúki the Imám of the sacred traditions, who is described as one of the singular scholars of the age-"sound in controversial tact, casuistical divinity and lunar calculations"-to demand the hand of Ilak's daughter for his son Muhammad, a young lady,—" the unequalled pearl" who was subsequently married to another son Masa'ud, and the most valuable presents were interchanged on both sides. Such an alliance, however, proved but temporary, for no sooner had Maḥmúd proceeded on one of his expeditions to India, to where he had gone the same year, (396), than I'lak seized the opportunity for invasion, sending Sub'áshitigín* with a large force to occupy the country Cis-Oxus, and a general, Ja'fartigín, to invest Balkh. Sub'áshitigín advancing as far as Hirát, Arslán-i-Jázíb the Prince† of Tus, who had been established there by Maḥmúd, fell back to Ghaznín in accordance with the previous instructions left him.

Mahmud who at the time was at Multan, which city he had just taken, no sooner received the news than he hastened back to Ghaznín, arriving, says one chronicler, in 40 days, beat off Ja'fartigin from Balkh, and sending Arslán with 10,000 cavalry in advance, pressed Sub'áshítigín so hard, the latter had to abandon the most of his baggage, entrust a subsequent instalment to the Shah of Khwarazm, and save himself by flight across the desert. "So hot was the pursuit there was not even an opportunity for bathing" says Al Utbi. Ilak who was himself trans-Oxus made an unsuccessful attempt to divert Mahmud by sending a further force of 6,000 cavalry under Ja'afartigin. This was in 397 H. Ilak now prepared for a fresh struggle, allying himself with Kadr Khán the ruler of Khután, a city to the east of Yarkand, who may possibly have been his brother, I and moved on Balkh with a large army, including 40,000 cavalry. The preparations of Mahmud were also on a large scale, for in addition to his Afghán, Turkish, and Hindu troops, was a contingent of the Ghuzz (Turkománs). The armies met near Balkh and the order of battle was arranged with great care on both sides. Mahmúd assigned the centre to his brother Naşr, Abu Naşr Farighúni, and Abú 'Abdullah Tái, with a force of Kurds; the Ḥájib Altúntásh commanding the right and Prince Arsalán Jázíb the left; himself holding a force of 500 elephants in reserve. Ilak placed Kadr Khán with the Khután army on the right and Ja'afartigin on the left, himself taking the centre with a picked force of Turkish troops, who appear to have done great execution, and for some time the fortune of the day was doubtful, but Mahmud finally heading a charge with the elephants on Ilak's centre, turned the scale, and gained the victory. Ilak was now finally driven back to Máwará-un-Nahr, many prisoners being taken, and numbers of his followers drowned in the Oxus. Khondamir asserts with confidence that this was in 397 H. but the date generally accepted is the 22nd Rubí al Akhir 398 H. Mahmúd next turned his attention to certain of his provincial governors who had been unfaithful to their trust, including Khalaf bin Ahmad of Sijistán, who for the second time had been found intriguing with Ilak, and if he had not rendered actual assistance, had encouraged his invasion; and who in consequence was now permanently imprisoned in the fortress of Juzdaz in Kábulistán. Shortly after, in 401, Maḥmúd again departed for Hindústán, against the fortress of Bhímnagar.

^{*} Khondamir says "Siáshitigín."

Ilak, who at the battle of Balkh, must have been pretty well advanced in years, never seems to have recovered from the disappointment of that defeat, and though he nourished the hope of revenge, time did not permit him to gratify it, for he died in 403 H.*

Tughán or Tugín Khán 403-408 H. and Arsalán Khán.

Sharf-ud-din Tughán, or Tugín, Khán now succeeded him in Máwará-un-Nahr and Turkistán, though it is probable he may have ruled territory prior to this, and it is more than likely that though ruling in Bukhárá, the seat of his government was Kashghar. His authority was not unquestioned even in parts of Máwará-un-Nahr, while immediately beyond was a general struggle for power. Every man did very much what pleased him, some had united to oppose Ilak, others were nominally subordinate to Mahmúd, but at any time ready to set up petty kingdoms for themselves. The Turkish nomads spoken of as Ghuzz, a term that probably included tribes scattered over most of what is shown on modern maps as Turkistán, and who have since come to be famous as Turkmáns or Turkománs, have been several times referred to, and, as also noticed, some of these had moved with their flocks and herds to the pasture lands of Bukhárá and Samarkand, in fact had established themselves on both sides of the Oxus. There they stayed, for it can hardly be said they settled, embraced Islámism, and were ready to take sides in any expedition that offered prospects of plunder. The chief named Beghu. mentioned as assisting Muntaşir against Ilak, a chief variously stated to have been a commander under Saljúk, or a son of Músá bin Saljúk. and the uncle of Tughril Beg, was probably one of the first founders of the Saljûk family which was then coming rapidly to the front rank and became, within a year from the death of Mahmud, 422 H. a power of more importance than ever the Sámánís had been.

Major Raverty and most authorities give the name as Tughán, and the former suggests a possible derivation from tughán the Turkish for falcon—the "falcon knight," but on the coin No. XVII of the annexed plates, which is in exceptionally good preservation, the mint, Bukhárá,

* The mints on the British Museum coin of I'lak are Bukhárá and Khujandah, to those may be added Samarkand and Fargháná on coins now figured. Of Mansúr II or Abd al Malik II Sámánís no coins are known.

and the date, 407 H. being quite clear, the name appears to read ينكين Jafari (?) Tagín and M. de Tiesenhausen in a notice of Count Stroganoff's collection describes a very similar coin (No. 31) of the same name struck at Bukhárá in 406. The first name may be doubtful, but the last cannot be read Tughán the is clear. It is therefore possible the name of this Khán was Tagín, and it is not probable a rival Chief ruled in Bukhárá during these two years, although there were rival Afrásiyáb Kháns there shortly after, as for instance 'Alítigín, against whose tyranny Mahmúd was appealed to on more than one occasion.*

In 408 his dominions were invaded by a vast horde of settlers from Chín who had been displaced from their own lands, to the number of 100,000 tents, (khargahs) equal to that number of families. Khán resented the invasion in the name of Islám, summoning all believers to his assistance, and though himself ill at the time, after much fighting drove them back, vast booty and many captives falling into the hands of the "Musalmán Turks" and their allies. He died the same year, and was succeeded by another brother Abú-l-Muzaffar-i-Arsalán Khán, also styled Al-Aşam, "the deaf." It was in this year that the princess, 'the casketed gem of Ilak Naşr," who had previously been betrothed to Mahmud's eldest son and who was afterwards married to Mas'úd, arrived at Balkh, which capital was illuminated; and it was not long after that Mahmud made over to Mas'ud the government of Khurásán, with Hirát as his head quarters. Some accounts show this Arsalán as fighting with Maḥmúd in 410, and overthrown, but Maḥmúd appears to have made an expedition to India in 409, and another in 410. when he was absent from Ghaznín some four years. The date of Arsalán's death is uncertain.

THE SUBSEQUENT KHÁNS OF TURKISTÁN.

History in the matter of these Turkistán Kháns or Afrásiyábí maliks, as they are variously called, is nearly as uncertain as regarding the predecessors of Ilak. Some are mentioned as more or less intimately connected, both by marriage and alliance, with Mahmúd and his immediate successor Mas'úd, and as a considerable power beyond the Oxus; others again in connection with the Saljúks, with whom they also intermarried, and who after a time may be looked on as the suzerain power to which they were at least nominally subject. These warlike, plunder-seeking sons of the desert kept moving further forward to the rich cities of

* On the other hand No. XXIV of the coin figured seems to read Tughán Khán but without mint and date or much legible the name of the Khalifah al Kádir B'illah.

Khurásán and after Mas'úd's time their chief strongholds were probably Balkh on the east and Níshápúr on the west, from whence their influence gradually extended, till some of their chiefs met the crusaders in Syria, but it seems doubtful if they were ever able to maintain themselves in Máwará-un-Nahr. The substance of power there remained with the Turkistán Kháns, or their representatives.

According to Major Raverty,* the eighth in order of succession was Kadr Khán, son of Yúsuf, son of the Bughrá Khán-i-Hárún but numismatic evidence goes to show that more probably Yúsuf was the son of 'Alí, the brother of this Bughrá. He is described as a prince of great justice and goodness and to have entered into a fresh treaty with Mahmúd. One authority, Gardezí, says, the complaints by the Musalmáns against the Afrásiyáb Khán 'Alítigín of Bukhárá had reached Mahmúd at Balkh in 415, and he advanced to deliver them, upon hearing which Kadr Khán left Kashghar, met him at Samarkand and there arranged Faşihi, however, puts the date at 419, about the time Mahmúd seized Isrá'il the Saljuk and sent him off to Kálinjar in India. In 417 two of Kadr Khán's brothers, Kayá and Bughrá, are stated to have sent envoys to Ghaznín proposing a matrimonial alliance. replied it was not the custom to give the sisters and daughters of Musulmáns to infidels, but if they would become Muhammadans the matter would be considered. Subsequently it was agreed that his daughter Zainab should be betrothed to Yughantigin, afterwards Bughra Khan II, Kadr's son; while the latter's daughter was also to be betrothed to Kadr Khán is shown as dying in 423 H.

The IXth Arsalán Khán the second, Major Raverty calls the son of Bughrá Khán-i-Hárún, and says at that time Arsalán was Lord of Kashghar, Khutan, Khujand, and Bilásághún. It is very unlikely, however, that a son of Bughrá's would have been shut out of the succession for forty years, and on two or three of the coins now figured, the name of Arsalán is associated with Yúsuf as a title or family name, and on one of those described by M. de Tiesenhausen (No. 32) the name reads Arsalán Ilak Yúsuf bin 'Alí which would point to his being a possible brother of Kadr Khán (No. VIII). Some hostility arose between Arsalán and a Bughrá, also described as a brother, by whom he is made captive and imprisoned. This Arsalán is the person to whom Mas'úd of Ghaznín sent a despatch after the battle with the Saljúks at Dandánkán a fort near Merv, in 431 H.+

^{*} The account of the following Kháns is mainly taken from Major Raverty's notes to the Tabakát.

[†] As before remarked there is an amount of uncertainty as to the identity of, these various Arsaláns and Bughrás. The first Arsalán, brother of Ilak is shown

The Xth was the son of Kadr, Yughantigin or Bughra Khan the second, then Lord of Banki or Taraz and Isfanjab (a town on the borders of Turkistan). He nominated a son Ja'fartigin his heir, on which the mother of Ibrahim, a younger son poisoned him with several of his Amirs and also put an end to Arsalan the second who was still in confinement, in 439 H.

The XIth was the son Ibrahím, who was killed on an expedition against Binaltigín, or Niáltigín on which he had been sent by his brother, and with him the direct line terminates. It may also be noticed that an Ibrahím named Tamghaj or Taghmáj Khán is mentioned by one author as flourishing about this time.

The XIIth Abú-l-Muzaffar-i-Tafkáj Khán, the son of another Ibrahím bin Naşr. He had previously been a ruler of Samarkand under the sovereign and now succeeded to the throne, dying of paralysis in 460 H.

The XIIIth Shams ul Mulk Naṣr, known as the Khákán, was a son of Taf-káj. He married the daughter of Sulṭán Alp Arsalán, the Saljúk, who in 453 or 454 undertook the subjugation of Turkistán, but had to abandon the enterprise and return from Kashghar to the aid of the Khalifah. Alp Arsalán's son, afterwards famous as Sulṭán Malik Sháh, married a niece of Naṣr's named Turkán Khátún and on at least one or two occasions Malik Sháh invaded the Khán's dominions. In 468 he entered Máwará-un-Nahr and deposed Sulímán Khán who governed at Samarkand, and by way of teaching this governor to behave himself, he was made to walk all the way to Iṣfahán on foot, but was subsequently restored. In 471, Sulṭán Malik Sháh came again and finally removed him. Naṣr died in 472 H.

The XIVth was Khizr Khán, a brother of Naṣr, who died soon after. The XVth Ahmad Khán the son of Khizr, or of another brother Ja'far, whose tyranny became so notorious that Sultán Malik Sháh marched into Máwará-un-Nahr to coerce him. Ahmad was defeated and sent to his aunt, Turkán Khátán, but after awhile restored to the sovereignty. In 488 H. he was put to death for heresy.

as succeeding in 408, but nothing is known as regards his death. The second is said to be advanced from the over-lordship of Kashghar &c. to sovereign power in 423. It is not quite clear that they were different persons.

So also the Kadrkhán who is mentioned as furnishing such material aid to I'lak at the battle of Balkh in 398 is not afterwards accounted, for while in the Tabakát the Kadrkhán who concludes a treaty with Mahmúd in 416 or 419 is called the brother of the late I'lak, Gardezi calls him cousin. They may be the same. Possibly further numismatic evidence may help to clear up the difficulties.

The XVIth Maḥmúd Khán, son of an uncle of Aḥmad, but of which uncle does not appear, succeeded both in Turkistán and Máwará-un-Nahr but in the year 490 H. Dabkúlí-i-Tughán Khán, son of Kara Khán marched an army against him and slew him.

The XVIIth was Kadrkhán, or Kunduz Khán, bin 'Umr Khán, bin Ahmad Khán (No. XV). In 495 H. he invaded part of Khurásán, and in Shábán of the same year, Sanjar son of Sultán Malik Sháh defeated him near Tirmiz and put him to death.

The XVIIIth Muhammad Khán, or Arsalán the third, by some called Aḥmad, a son of a sister of Sanjar's by Sulimán bin Dáud bin Bughra (No. X) and who for some time before had been in exile succeeded in 495 H. In 523 Sayyid Ashraf the 'Alawi with the people of Samarkand rebelled against him and some say slew his son Nasr; others that the two septs of Kárlúghíah and Ghuzz Turks who formed a large part of Arsalán's army, combined with Nașr were induced by the Samarkandis to revolt, and the latter was executed. Arsalán had called upon his uncle Sanjar for aid, but suppressed the outbreak before any arrived, he had, however, fallen under suspicion of plotting against the Saljukí, and Sanjar advanced against Samarkand, took it in 524, and deported Arsalán to his brother-in-law, at Merv. Arsalán was restored to the throne by Sultán Sanjar in 526. The year of his death is not recorded. It is also noticeable that in 522 Aghúz the Chíní with a vast horde invaded Kashghar. He was driven out, but the same authority speaks of his successor as the Gúr Khán, a name that shortly became famous.

The XIXth Ḥasantigín bin 'Alí bin 'Abd-ul Múmin, more commonly called Abú-l-Ma'alí Ķuliji-i-Tamgháj, a man of the same family, was then raised to the throne by command of Sultán Sanjar but died shortly afterwards.

The XXth Rukn-ud-dín Maḥmúd Khán, bin Arsalán (No. XVIII) and great nephew of Sultan Sanjar, sometimes also called Khákán, was raised to the throne by his great uncle's support in 526. In 531 he encountered the Gúrkhán of the Karakhitáí in battle within the limits of Khujand, but was defeated and compelled to retire to Samarkand. Sultán Sanjar advanced with a large force to his assistance but was also defeated in 534, and about this time it may be said the suzerainty of Máwará-un-Nahr was transferred from the Saljuks to the tribes of Northern Turks once more. Maḥmúd Khán forsaking his country and possessions, went to Khurásán with Sultán Sanjar, and remained at his court till the latter was taken captive by the Ghuzz, when as a temporary measure he was raised to the sovereignty of Khurásán. Shortly after Sanjar escaped and died in 552, when Maḥmúd had a stormy reign of 5½ years as nominal sovereign again, he was fiually blinded by a former slave of Sanjar's, Mu'ayyid-ud-din, and died in 558 H.

The XXIst a Tamgháj Khán bin Muhammad Khán, but what Muhammad does not appear. He became the governor of Máwará-un-Nahr after Sanjar's imprisonment by the Ghuzz, but possessed little beyond nominal power, and his reign was short and stormy. He was tributary to the Kara Khitáís, who continued to hold sway until finally driven out by Muhammad Khwarazm Sháh. He was subsequently slain by the Kárluks or Kárlúghs, and his corpse cast into the desert in 550 or 551. Tamgháj it may be mentioned appears as the name of a territory in Turkistán, and is also a dynastic name.

The XXIInd Jalál-ud-din 'Alí son of Hasantigín (No. XIX) also entitled Khizr Khán, and by some Jaghar Khán, succeeded with the support of the Kara Khitáís, but as in the case of his precessor, and subsequently of his successor, who was styled the Khákán of Máwárá-un-Nahr, was entirely subordinate to the Gúr Kháns, and when Iyal Arsalán Khwárazm Sháh marched an army to Bukhárá and Samarkand in 553 the Ilak of the Turkán with 10,000 men was sent by the Gúrkhán to his assistance. The length of his reign which must have been long is uncertain, as is the date of the accession of his son.

The XXIIIrd Sultán 'Usmán bin Jalál-ud-din, who on account of the antiquity of his race was styled Sultán us Salátín, and who was said to be a second Yúsuf in beauty. He solicited the hand of a daughter of his suzerain in marriage, but the Gúr Khán refused, for which very reason Sultán Muḥammad Khwárazm Sháh gave him a daughter of his own in 606. Great friendship arose between 'Usmán and his father-in-law, which was afterwards turned to equal resentment, for 'Usmán threw over Muḥammad and was making overtures to the Gúr Khán, when the former marched against Samarkand, and at the instigation of his own wife, Khán Malik by name, 'Usmán was put to death in 609 H. and with him finally ended the Afrásiyáb dynasty. Sultán 'Usmán it was who is said to have interceded with the Kara Khitáís, and saved the life of Sultán Mu'izz-ud-din Muḥammad bin Sám Ghúri after his defeat at Andkhúd in 601 H. and enabled him to escape.*

THE DYNASTY OF THE SAFFÁRÍS. 255-300 H.

In immediate subjection to the Sámání kings, and subsequently more or less closely identified with the Ghaznavi rulers to whom in

* In the genealogical tree appended I have endeavoured to show as far as possible, in a tentative way, the relationship of these Turkistán kháns. There is, however, much still wanting to make an intelligible account of them possible. Perhaps numismatic material may exist in some of our Indian cabinets to suppliment, and in many respects correct this.

turns they became subordinate, were the semi-independent governors of Sijistán or Nimroz, who succeeded, and were allied to, the dynasty of the Ṣaffárís. The following short summary may help to make their connection with the period clearer.

According to the Tabakát, Ya'kúb, 'Amrú, 'Alí and Mu'addil, were four brothers the sons of Lais, the Saffar or worker in brass, who was the head of the braziers of Sijistán in the days when Ibrahím was the governor and Salih the deputy governor on the part of Muhammad Táhir, the last of the Táhirís, then Amir of Khurásán. Lais is described as a restless refractory fellow with a large following, and his character seems to have descended to his son Ya'kúb, who caused Sálih to be put to death, armed his followers, seized the deputy governor's palace, declared himself Amir, and raised an army that in a brief space not only made him master of the situation, but enabled him to start a career of conquest of his own. Having raised his army he led it towards Bust, and Zawulistán, Zamín-i-Dáwar and Ghaznín, subduing the whole of them, thence advanced into Tukháristán an ancient district of Balkh; Balkh itself, and on to Kábul, with uniform success. 256 he returned to Sijistán and subsequently advanced to Hirát which cost him much fighting before he obtained possession of it. After this he took Bádghais, Búshanj, Jám, Bákhurz, and in 259 Níshápúr, where he seized Muhammad-i-Táhir with his treasure and followers, and having visited Gurzán and Tabaristán, and extorted tribute, again returned to Sijistán, setting free Muhammad-i Táhir who found a refuge at the court of the Khalifah in 261. His brother 'Amrú he made governor of Hirát, and after one more excursion into 'Irák he died at Khandahi-Shápúr a town of Ahwaz in 265 H.

The IInd was 'Amrú, the brother, who on succeeding withdrew his forces from 'Irák and the year following (266) moved to Hirát and thence to Níshápúr before the gates of which he was defeated by one of the Táhirí Amirs and fell back on Hirát. In 271 the Khalifah deposed him, and declared the government of Khurásán given back to Muhammad-i-Táhir, sending one Ráfi' bin Harsamah as his deputy, who joined his forces with the Táhir Amir's. But in 284 'Amrú defeated them and sent Ráfi's head to the Khalifah at Baghdád with a request that he, 'Amrú, might now be recognised as the governor of Máwará-un-Nahr, Khurásán, Nimroz, Fárs, Kirmán, Ahwáz, and the guardian of the entrance of the Palace of the Khalifahs; moreover that the name of 'Amrú should be mentioned in the Khutbah and inserted on the coins of Makkah, Madínah, and Hijáz. All of which demands seem to have readily agreed to by the Khalifah's court and the usual "dresses of honour and counter-marks of favour and distinction" sent him. At the same time, it will be remembered the Baghdád court had just conferred similar favours on Ismá'íl Sámání. No sooner had Amrú proceeded to take possession of Máwará-un-Nahr, than Ismá'íl advanced from Bukhárá and crossed the Oxus to prevent him. How 'Amrú was defeated under the walls of Balkh in 287 and sent a prisoner to the Khalifah, and the fate he met with in Baghdád has already been noticed. Arraján is his only mint represented in the British Museum.

The IIIrd Táhir the grandson of 'Amrú was then set up, and after a somewhat chequered career, in which he was once or twice in possession of Fárs, was defeated by a rebel slave, a Sigizí, and together with a brother of Ya'kúb's, deported to Baghdád and there made a public show of like his grandfather, dying in 296 H. Two of his known mints are Fárs and Zaranj.

The IVth Lais bin 'Alí another son of the Brazier, who entered Fárs from Sijistan, attacked and drove out the Sigizí slave but was again driven out by the Sigizí reinforced by troops of the Khalifah. Soon after, however, this Sigizí withheld the Khalifah's share of the revenue and was in his turn driven out to the wilds of Khurásán. In the same year, 296, Abu Naṣr-i-Aḥmad Sámání obtained possession of Sijistán, taken prisoners several of the Saffárís, and leaving his cousin Abú Ṣáliḥ Manṣúr as governor. Lais bin 'Alí is said to have died in Fárs in 298 H. Bust is his only mint in the British Museum.

The Vth Mu'addil the brother of Lais (No. IV) assumed the sovereignty in 299 driving out the Sámání governor, upon which Ahmad Sámání despatched a large army under some of his principal nobles, Hasain 'Alí, Marw-ar-Rudi, Ahmad bin Sahl, &c., to whom Mu'addil surrendered at discretion and was taken to Bukhárá and thence sent to Baghdád, which city would seem to have served as the Jericho of the time.

The VIth 'Amró, great-grandson of the 'Amró the son of the Brazier attempted the sovereignty in 300 H. when again Ahmad Sámání despatched a force under the above-mentioned nobles, but after a defence of 9 months 'Amró surrendered his capital, and the territory of Sijistan received a Sámání governor; who is not mentioned.

THE GOVERNORS OF SIJISTÁN. 300-393 H.

Ist. Shortly after the above events AHMAD said to have been the grandson of Táhir, (No. III above) who was living in distress at Hirát, attracted the notice of Naşr the II, Sámání, and had bestowed upon him the government of his native country, Sijistán. From Ahmad there follows a period regarding which there appears little beyond numismatic evidence, and that very scanty. How long Ahmad was governor was unknown, but from a coin in the British Museum, struck at Sijistán in 306 No. II KASAYYAR bin Ahmad would appear to have been then governor. Whether immediately after or no is not known but he must have been followed by

No. III Khalaf, whose coinage both gold and copper shows him to have ruled at Sijistán from at least 325 to 334 H. and during the Khalifat of Al Mustakfi and Al Muti'. This of course may have extended either or both ways. The copper coin now figured as No. XXVII is very nearly identical with the one in the National Collection, with the exception that the date reads 334, as compared with 325. A Khalaf is mentioned as the son of 'Abú Ja'far bin Lais, but which Lais is uncertain, and this Khalaf as being the father of a Muhammad who again was the father of an Ahmad. Giving this genealogy for what it is worth the (? 1Vth) Ahmad bin Muhammad, would, from another British Museum coin, appear to have been the governor of Sijistán in 340 H. but as regards the length of his rule all dates are wanting. His successor was presumably (? Vth) Khalaf bin Aḥmad, whose biography has been noticed at length by several contemporary writers. At times in direct subjection to the Sámánís, making a pilgrimage in 353 to Makkah, leaving his son-in-law, Táhir bin Ḥusain, to act as his deputy; obtaining aid from Mansúr bin Nuh on his return to drive out the deputy, Al Ḥusain bin Táhir, who in the meantime had succeeded his father, and usurped. Again on the withdrawal of the Bukhárá troops asserting supremacy and engaging in expeditions of his own. Rebelling against Núh bin

Mansúr, by whom his capital was invested. Intriguing with and against the Ghaznavís. Joining Sabuktigín with a contingent, who sends back his forces with honour and consideration only to find him intriguing with Ilak. Subsequently seizing provinces of Maḥmúd's, whose uncle Bughrájak was slain by Khalaf's son Táhir at Fushanj in 390. By Mahmúd he is beseiged in the fortress of Ták, reduced and has to make abject submission. Anon in 393 abdicating in favour of his son Táhir,* but thinking better of this, treacherously putting the latter to death. Again besieged by Mahmúd whom he flatters by addressing as "Sultán" and has Júzjánán assigned as his residence. Intriguing once more in 398 with Ilak, and dying the following year in close confinement in the fortress of Juzdez. He was reputed a learned and intelligent man, and by his command a commentary on the Kur'án in 100 volumes at a cost of 100,000 dinars, was compiled.

Al Husain bin Táhir whose coin is in the British Museum is most probably the man who was deputy for a brief period, for after Khalaf the sovereignty of Sijistán or Nimroz remained in the possession of the rulers of Ghaznín for some time, until, by the support of the Saljúk Sultáns, Alp Arsalán and Malik Sháh a great-grandson of Khalaf, by name Táhir bin Muhammad bin Táhir bin Khalaf, obtained the government of the country, and became the first of the "Maliks of Sijistán and Nimroz" as chronicled in the Tabákat.†

THE EARLY RULERS OF GHAZNÍN. 322-388 H.

It has already been noticed that the earlier Muḥammadan rulers in Ghaznin were governors subordinate to the Sámáni sovereigns, and it is in association with the latter that most notices of Alptigin and Sabuktigin occur. That they were termed "Turkish slaves" does not necessarily imply that they were slaves in the common acceptation of the term. Although described as purchased by the Sámáni nobles, they filled the position of trusted advisers, were entrusted with high civil and military commands, ranked among the chief personages in the State, and in fact very soon became its masters. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the few particulars given regarding these two more famous names, while to attempt any complete outline of the reign of Maḥmúd or his successors in Ghaznin would be beyond the scope of this already lengthy paper, but in connection with some of the coins figured it is necessary to briefly notice such scanty information as is available relating to the early governors, who have been almost entirely omitted from general history.

Of the origin of Alptigin, or Albtigin, beyond that he was a "Turk" the slave of the Sámání dynasty, no reliable account is forthcoming. According to Fasihi and others, he was born in 267 H., a date more than doubtful, as it would make him 79 when appointed commander-in-chief in Khurásán. There is more evidence to show that he displaced "Lawik* and captured Ghaznin first in 322 H., and from that time had more or less to do with the administration of affairs there, although it is exceedingly improbable that his residence was continuous. In 346 he is spoken of as the Hájib and commander-in-chief of 'Abd-ul-Malik Sámání and by him also entrusted with the governorship of Hirát to which place he sent Ishák-i-Táhirí as his deputy. In 350 he had become one of the most, if indeed not the most, powerful Amir at the Sámání court, holding among other offices the governorship of Nishapur. After some little friction with the court in connection with the election of Mansur the first to the throne, he went to Ghaznín in 351, and in 352 H. he died there, and was succeeded by his son Ishák.

The governor Lawík, long a competitor for power in Ghaznín, almost immediately attacked Ishák who was either defeated or considered it more desirable to retire on Bukhárá, whither he was "accompanied (in 353) by his father's slave Sabuktigín". At Bukhárá he obtained the formal investiture of government, and returned reinforced, Faṣiḥí says the following year, to Ghaznín, Lawík taking to flight. After a year at Ghaznín Ishák died (early in?) 355 H., and was succeeded by Balkátigín, formerly chief of the Turkish troops under Alptigín.

Balkátigín as a successor of Ishák has been passed unnoticed by most historians. In Muḥammad 'Ufi's Jámi'ul Hikáyát he is in two stories spoken of as ruler in Ghaznín, a brave but hard-drinking Amir, with Sabuktigín as his watchful Ḥájib and general-in-chief, who on one occasion at least saves Balkátigín's life. And in the Tabakát-i-Násiri, Minhaj-i-Siráj quoting from the last volumes of Abú-l-Fazl-i-Baihaki, who wrote in the time of Maḥmúd, gives a circumstantial account of his elevation to power as follows: "Baihaki states, that during the reign of Abd-ul-Malik-i-Núḥ, the Sámání, there was a merchant named Naṣr, the Ḥáji who purchased Sabuktigín and brought him to Bukhárá. Perceiving in his countenance evident signs of capacity and energy, the Amír-i Ḥájib, Alptigín, purchased him. He accompanied his master into Tukháristán, when the government of that territory was entrusted to him; and subsequently, when the government of Khurásán was made over to Amír Alptigín, Sabuktigín attended him thither also. After some time had passed away, Alptigín, through the vicissitudes of fortune, retired towards Ghaznín, and subdued the territory of Záwulistán, and wrested Ghaznín out of the hands of Amír Abú-Bakr-i-Lawík.

[•] The question as to who was Lawik, the Wáli of Ghaznín, is full of interest, but unfortunately history is a blank regarding him.

"Eight years subsequent to these events Amír Alptigín died, and his son, Ishák, succeeded to his father's authority. He entered into hostilities against Lawík, but was defeated, and retired to Bukhárá, to the court of Amír Mansúr, son of Núh, Sámání, and there continued until that ruler directed that aid should be afforded to him, when Ishák came back again to Ghaznín, and regained possession of it. After a year Ishák died, when Balkátigín, who was the chief commander of the Turkish troops, was raised to the government. He was a just and pious man, and one of the greatest warriors of his time. He exercised the authority for a period of ten years,* and died. Sabuktigín was in his service.

"After the death of Amír Balkátigín, Pírí succeeded to the authority. He was a great villain; and a body of people wrote from Ghaznín to Abú 'Alí-i-Lawík, and invited him to come there. Abú 'Alí-i-Lawík acceded to their request, and brought along with him the son of the Sháh, or king, of Kábul to assist him. When they reached the vicinity of Charkh, Sabuktigín with a body of 500 Turks, suddenly fell upon them, and defeated them, he also captured ten elephants, and brought them to Ghaznín.

"Such a great success having been gained by Sabuktigin and all having become quite sated with the villanies and misdeeds of Piri, with one accord they raised Sabuktigin to the direction of affairs. On Friday, the 27th of the month of Sha'bán 366 H., the sovereignty of that province was settled upon him."

Mr. Thomas in the 2nd of his papers on the coins of the kings of Ghaznín,† puts the date of Alptigín's conquest of that city as 351 H., which is also the date given by Ferishta, and no doubt represents the date of his final visit, and quoting the Tabakát sentence beginning-"Eight years subsequent to these events" fixes his death in 359 H. But there is no reason why "these events" should specially refer to Alptigin's going to Ghaznín, and might equally relate to Sabuktigín's purchase. Indeed a few pages further on, the Tabakat gives the date of the birth of Mahmud as occurring "on the night of 'Ashura, the 10th of the month Muharram in the year 361 H., in the seventh year of the government of Amír Balkátigín at Ghaznín. Mr. Thomas mentions the occurrence of Balkátigín's name on certain coins struck at Balkh in 324, but considering how frequently the governors of these cities were changed, there is nothing at all improbable in his having held that charge, and inserted his name on the coinage there, as he subsequently did on the coinage of Ghaznín. Among the coins noticed by Mr. Thomas in the same paper is one described by M. Dorn* as struck in 359 H. by Balkátigín as ruler of Ghaznín, with the name of his Sámání suzerain. Mansúr bin Núh. The description is as follows:

لا اله الا || الله وحدة || لا شريك له || بلكا تكين | Margin بسم الله [ضرب هذا] بعوبة سنة تسع و خبسين و ثلثمائة المحبه || وسول || الله || منصور || أبن نوح |

Margin illegible.

"The name of the mint عربة can stand for nothing but Ghaznah."

The legends of the coin now figured as No. X are very similar, though the mint and last figure of the date are wanting, what is left looks more like the final of than anything else, which would make it 355 H. Major Raverty in his notes to the Tabakát gives the death of Balkátigín as occurring in 362 H., but does not quote his authority, the ill-conditioned Pírí succeeding him. In the following year (363) Pírí, or rather Sabuktigín for him, is said to have fought a battle with an army advancing from India for the purpose of seizing Ghaznín and to have completely defeated it. In 366, as given in the extract from the Tabakát above quoted, he was deposed, and Sabuktigín installed.

The acknowledgment of the Sámání line as Suzerains or Lords Paramount, by the insertion of their names on the coinage, still continued, and was common to all the Ghaznaví rulers, Sabuktigín, Ismá'íl, and Maḥmúd himself, at any rate until 389 H. when the house assumed independency; Sabuktigín being a particularly loyal supporter of the house. No. XI of the coins now figured is however an interesting novelty, probably a very early coin of Sabuktigín's struck for Indian circulation, possibly as the Hajib of Balkátigin. In the first of his papers above referred to, Mr. Thomas notices the early appropriation by the Ghaznavi monarchs of the device of the bull of Siva (Nandi), superscribed by the words Sri Samanta Dev, as first used on the coins of the Brahmanical kings of Kábul, and shows that the Ghaznavis had associated themselves in this way with their Indian possessions, by the combination of Mahometan titles with the old Hindu designs at least as early as the time of M'adúd in 432 H. In the second paper he gives examples of very similar pieces with the names in Kufic letters of Mas'úd 421 H., and of Muhammad, his brother and predecessor.* In the coin now figured—from the Akra mounds near Edwardes-abád—the elephant and lion device of the Brahmanical kings has been rudely copied, with on the obverse the name in Kufic of Sabuktigin, and on the reverse عاجب hajib, the chamberlain or commander. The three rings were possibly symbols of strength and unity, or as ingeniously suggested by Vambéry, "typical of power encircling the three zones, borrowed from the heraldry of ancient 'Irán," and subsequently adopted as a sign mark on the coinage of Timur. Some Indian cabinets may very possibly possess other similar Ghazni coins. Mr. Thomas notices four published in the earlier Journals of this Society, on which the Sanskrit inscription had not been clearly made out, but having the special title of Sabuktigín "Náșir-ud-din-allah" clear in Persian.

Such coins might reasonably be expected to be even common. The Muslim conquerors for many reasons would probably find it both politic and convenient to continue for some time the local monies of the various provinces, and as a matter of fact, all over India, the coinage of newly conquered States, more especially the copper or mixed coinage in current use, remained in most cases long unaltered. Pure silver and gold was more easily recalled and re-issued, but even with this a very favourite plan, particularly with the Central Asian dynasties, was counterstriking the coin.

Sabuktigín ruled Ghaznín for a period of twenty years dying in 387 H., at the age of 56, at the village of Madrú-múe on the frontier of Balkh. His sons were Ismá'íl, Naṣr, Maḥmúd, Ḥusain, Ḥasan, and Yúsuf. Ismá'íl, who is always mentioned as playing a very subordinate part, and in all his father's campaigns seems to have been ignored, but who was in Ghaznín when his father died, succeeded, and was dethroned by his brother Maḥmúd in 388, after an offer of the sovereignty of Balkh which he refused. Subsequently in 389* he was sent to the fortress of Júzjánán, and nothing further is heard of him.

Mahmúd was now recognised by the Khalifab, who in forwarding the robe of honour, added to his former titles that of Yamín-ud-daulat wa Amín ul-millat, 'right hand of the Empire and Guardian of the religion, and, the Tabakát adds, styled him "Sultán."† His son Mas'úd became another "right hand of the Empire," a "defender of Orthodoxy," a guardian of the true religion and of the true believers, the regulator of the Faith, and the friend of the Lord of the Faithful." In the same year 389 H. Maḥmúd had also returned to Khurásán.

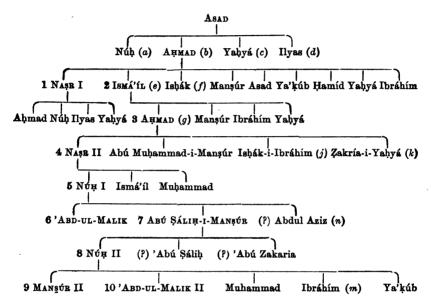

The chief events of his reign there have already been dealt with. His accession to the throne of Ghaznín marks his almost immediate rise to the supreme Muhammadan power in the East. "During these days," as Al 'Utbi puts it, "the victories of the kingdom and royalty of Yamínud-daulat and Amín al Millat commenced, and subsequently as time advanced, the tablet of his kingdom was gladdened, and the flame of his Empire blazed, and the star of his prosperity rose to a degree of happiness and power, until the pulpits of Islám became illuminated by the might of his august surnames, and his decree was current as destiny in all tracts and portions of the world; for God maketh royalty to come unto whom he willeth, and God is bounteous and wise."

^{*} These are the dates given by Faşihi and may be accepted as most probable.

[†] There is, however, no evidence that he ever adopted the titles.

I have to express my acknowledgement and best thanks to Messrs. Rodgers, Gosset, Stulpnagel and many other numismatic friends who have kindly placed their cabinets at my disposal. To the first named gentleman, the present Archæological Surveyor of the Punjab, but whose numismatic fame is of long standing, I am specially indebted for assistance in many ways, and not a few of the coins in these plates are the result of his many years of patient collection and research. Nos. XIII, XXIV and XXV are from the collection of Col. Gosset.

Place names in Merwara.—By R. S. Whiteway, B. C. S., Ajmer.

The British District of Merwára is a narrow slip of country between 70 and 80 miles long and from 15 miles to 1 mile broad. The head quarters are at Nyashahr or new Beawar, a station on the Rajputana line of railway. The district commences some 5 or 6 miles north of this. Dewair the extreme connected point is 66 miles south, and some 10 miles south of it are a few disconnected villages. The district lies along the backbone of the Aravalis with very little level ground. Around Beawar the general level is about 1500 ft. above the sea, the highest point is Goramji some 50 miles south which rises to over 3000 ft., in the east the Meywar plain slopes gradually away from the foot of the hills, but in the west the drop to the plains of Beáwar is considerable averaging about 1000 ft. and for some distance the country is wild jungle and rocky ravine. Cultivation is carried on in the valleys, the population presses heavily on the good land while the soil is naturally thin, hence heavy manuring and high cultivation require large herds of cattle. As the rainfall is precarious nearly every village has one or more tanks to retain the surface flow off, either to give direct irrigation or retain the water in the wells by percolation. For administative purposes there are two tahsils, Beawar in the north and Todgarh (called after the wellknown Col. Tod) in the south, Todgarh is the name of the tahsil only and not of any village, the head quarters are in the village of Barsawara an elevation of about 2500 ft. The inhabitants of the country are Mers (cf. Meru, a hill) a jovial set of men somewhat given to drinking. There are a few traces of early clans (mostly pastoral as Gujars) whom the Mers ousted-but speaking generally all the colonization has been done by this latter race—and that mainly within the last 60 years since the English came into the country. Before we took it the inhabitants scourged the neighbouring countries by their raids. They were not numerous and were mainly collected in a few inaccessible villages. They were reclaimed by Col. Hall and Col. Dixon who raised the Merwara batallion and by building tanks rendered settled habits possible. It is still their boast that the English alone conquered them. Their claims as to origin range high, but it is almost certain that they were composed mainly of outlaws who found here a protection from any settled form of government. To the south there are a few Bhils.

Nominally the Mers are divided into Mahomedans and Hindus but the division is little more than a name as all intermarry, and whether a woman is buried or burned depends on the nominal religion of her husband. Their language is a form of Hindi, but with peculiarities that divide it from that of Meywar on the east, of Marwar on the west, and of Ajmere on the north. It is to illustrate this language and to show how place names are in the process of formation that I have put together the appended list. The names consist of (a) Villages on the Government list (b) Tanks where these differ from the villages (c) Hills, valleys and streams. (a) Villages. Hamlets are now springing up in every direction-danger alone in such a difficult country could keep the people in large villages -- only very few names of hamlets are given as they are generally called after their founders as Basiajaga-Jaga's hamlet or Gudha Bíram, Biram's hamlet. Of the 330 villages on the Government list, 160 are called after some person, caste or local god the names of most of the others are analysed below. These names have suffered great mutilation at the hands of the Persian writers of the offices. I have tried in each case to get the oldest and real form of the word, and then if I could trace any thing in the history, local position or peculiarity of the village, to explain it. As might have been expected 50 years wear and tear have caused some phonetic changes but in all cases the names are peculiarly appropriate. The older villages Jhak, Aslum, Chhapli have names more or less connected with the predatory habits of the people. Many refer to the pastoral habits as Mewása others refer to the physical peculiarities of the inhabited site as Dholichat and others to that of the village lands as Sendra. The names in class B are not so worn as those in class A while those in C are not worn at all. These latter are seldom used far from their immediate neighbourhood-though well-known there, and they have never been reduced to writing. Only a few have been given as they are innumerable. These names are very valuable as giving the real speech of the people as opposed to the language taught in schools—this speech is very rich in names for every kind of rock, stone, ravine and embankment. Wild animals are not numerous—there are a few tigers, bears. leopards, sambhar and nilgáí-of these the tiger and sambhar are represented in this list—the bear (richh) leopard (begar) and nilgáí (roz). are not-of animals now extinct the plainest traditions refer to the wild buffalo (arna), but I can find no name unless it be the hamlet of Arnálí. The local explanation of Arnálí however that here cowdung (also called arna) was collected in the jungle seems a probable one. Elephants, if there ever were any, have left no tale. The references to local trees and bushes are very frequent. I may add that names are given from some peculiarities and not from general characteristics—thus the few streams and tanks whose name is compounded with khará 'salt' show that the majority of them have sweet water.

		A .
A'dábálá	ৰাভাৰান্তা	A tank and a locality in the hills—It means (the embankment) across the stream for the former, and the stream across (the way) for the
Adámál	चाडामास	latter. The plain between, Jánwar ádámál pará, would mean that the animal had put a considerable distance between you and it.

Gauhaná	मोचमा	A village and tank. Connected with gau a cow.
Goram	मोरम	The highest hill in the district highest hill in the district named after a man now deified whose temple stands on the top. He was the son of Sathu, after whom the village of Sathukhera is named, and the most remarkable action of his life appears to have been his abduction of a neighbouring beauty. He carried her to the top of this hill while the pursuing father and his friends were driven back by the bees that swarm on the precipice on either side of the hill. These bees are still called Goram's bees.

On a Collection of South Indian Coins.—By Captain R. H. C. Tufnell, Madras Staff Corps.

(With two plates.)

The "fanams" are from my collection of South Indian coins. Regarding some of them I fear I can offer no suggestions, but have no doubt but that some of the members of the Society, better versed in the subject, will be able to throw some light on such as have not hitherto been published. I have numbered them consecutively throughout for facility of reference.

The earlier numbers are issues of Mysore and the smaller states, once independent, but now comprised within its boundaries. No. 24 is a specimen of the "Canteroy" fanam, by far the commonest of the series found in Mysore. This little piece of money was originally struck by Canthirava in the earlier part of the 17th century, but a re-issue was made after the fall of Seringapatam and collapse of the Muhammadan power in that state; it is, I fancy, to this re-issue that most specimens belong.

Nos. 23, 22, 21 and 20 represent the "Soobaroye" or snake series figured in Hawkes' Mysore Coins (1852) and attributed by him to the Polygars of Cuduconda. He, however, makes no mention of No. 23 of this set, nor do I know of any reference to it elsewhere. No. 21 also differs from his figure in having a five-headed and not a three-headed snake. During a course of some years collecting in and round the province, I have come across several specimens corresponding with the one I now send for inspection, but have never met with an issue bearing the three-headed Naga.

The Balapur coins, Nos. 19, 18 and 17 are fairly common still in the Mysore country. Struck by a Polygar of this once independent state, they differ from most of the issues of those around in having the word "Balapur" (بالاپور) on one side and Shah (الله) on the other in Hindustani, with a figure beneath which Hawkes likened to the device on the early Mahratta coins, but which I cannot help thinking is merely a perversion of the word () Muhammad.

Towering above this petty state, stands the strongly fortified Drug of Nundy, which also boasted its own coinage as represented by No. 16.

No. 15 brings us to the coinage of Mysore proper, during the period of the Muhammadan usurpation—a series, most of the coins of which are still fairly common, but as all these have been fully noticed by Hawkes in his "Coins of Mysore" they need no remark. There is, however, one exception to which I might perhaps invite attention, as I have never come across any mention of it. I refer to No. 15, a fanam corresponding to the pagoda of Sadasiva figured in Marsden's "Numismata Orientalia," and again referred to in the issue of the Society's Journal for 1883 (Fig. 13).

No. 9 represents a fanam very rare now, but occasionally met with, having on one side a dragon (which seems to me to place it with the Udayars of Mysore) and on the reverse what looks like श्री or the Nagari "sri." This little coin attracted the attention of Sir Walter Elliot, who figures it in a plate of his "Numismatic Gleanings," devoted to coins of the Sinha type (Madras Literary Society's Journal for 1858); but his only remark about it is, that it and its fellows "are gold fanams from various parts of the country," and I know of no other notice of it. Copper issues bearing a similar device I have several times met with in different parts of Mysore, but the reverses bear nothing but the cross lines so common in the early issues of these parts. At the same time one specimen I have found which bears illegible traces of an inscription apparently in Nagari on the reverse, and I cannot help thinking that should the old copper coins in the Central Museum in Madras be examined, some clue may be found to the identification of the series.

Nos. 7 and 8 carry us away to the Gajapati lords of Orissa. The pagoda of this series is one of the best known coins of Southern India. Marsden and Moore have both figured it, and it finds a place too in the XVIIth Vol. of the Asiatic Researches and in Dr. Bidie's recent article on the "Varahas"—while forged copies abound as brooches, pins, and sleeve-links. I have, however, never seen any notice of the existence of a fanam or half fanam claiming direct kinship with it. The latter, the smallest coin I have ever seen, is especially rare, and this specimen was only sold to me as a great favour (and at a somewhat exorbitant figure), by a Mysorean who had it for generations in his family. The full fanam I have only met with twice.

No. 6 bears the Sivaite bull on the obverse, and on the reverse the legend "Sri Chama Udaya" but to which of the Mysore kings of this name to assign it, I know not.

Nos. 4 and 5 are two coins regarding which, as far as I am aware, no notice has ever appeared, nor have all the enquiries I have made among natives led to any result. The former bears a figure standing before a sacred lamp on obverse and on reverse a goddess, presumably Lakshmi—seated in "padmásana," on the lotus seat. The lamp may connect it with the Setupathis of Ramnad. The obverse of No. 5 seems identical with the last, and has on the reverse what looks like a warrior holding a club.

No. 3 is a Pandyan issue bearing on the reverse the legend "Ahava Malla" (lover of war) apparently. Several Tanjore grants are said to bear this title of the Pandyan kings of probably the 10th or 12th century. The fish on the obverse also point to the Pandyan Avnastv.

No. 31 may be a more recent issue of the Sub-Pandyan families. The dancing figure of "Garuda," the winged vehicle of Vishnu, is of common occurrence on the later copper coins found in the Madura district (Pandyan), usually with the fish on the reverse and occasionally under the figure.

With No. 2 commences a series of five coins of the Cingalese Chola dynasty, all of which have been found in the South of India, chiefly round Madura and Tirumangalam. The first of these (figured in Rhys David's article in the "Numismata Orientalia") bears the word "Iraha," a Prakrit form of the Sanscrit word "Rákshasa" (demon) above which is what may be the lotus, or possibly the conch shell of Vishnu-and it is not improbable that the Cholas of the 12th and 13th centuries were followers of that deity. The coin itself is by no means uncommon, but I have never seen a duplicate issue of its fellow, No. 1, in which the sun and moon (?) take the place of the device on the former coin, while the inscription remains the same.

No. 25 still preserves the same obverse (though in a somewhat different style to that most common on the Chola issues) but on the reverse the word "Iraka" becomes "Irako," according to the reading of a Pandit who has kindly examined the coin for me, the nominative singular taking the place of the root. Above the word is a dotted circle, probably intended for a flower, as in No. 27 we find an exactly similar circle taking the place of the lotus in the hand of the standing figure.

No. 26 presents a change in the attitude of the figure on the obverse. Instead of standing up with pendant "dupattá" the cloth here flies out, and the left leg is passed behind the right, while under the left arm appears the object which we usually find either under or grasped in the right hand. On the reverse, the word seems to be "Lakmi," the Prakrit form of the Sanscrit "Lakshmi." The circle still appears above but undotted.

No. 27 differs from all other specimens I have ever seen in having on the reverse a figure with no inscription. The squatting figure on the obverse seems to hold in his hand a dotted circle, exactly corresponding to the one previously mentioned; the form of head dress is changed, and the shape of the head is quite different to that on the generality of specimens. The same dotted circle peculiar to these coins again appears on the reverse under what looks like a tiger (the Chola symbol), and which seems to squat under the figure in much the same attitude as in what is known as the "lion" coin of Parakrama, of Ceylon.

No. 28 seems to bear on the obverse the V shaped Vishnavite symbol, with the conch and disc on either side of it, while on the reverse appears to be the "Sthali," or spouted vessel used by the Vishnavites when placing the sacred mark on their foreheads. To what place or dynasty to assign it I know not, for so many of the early Hindu royal families were of this persuasion.

No. 29. A modern issue of Travancore.

No. 30. A packet of fanams (12) of the west Coast, all of common occurrence.

No. 32. Muhammad Sháh.

No. 33. Ahmad Sháh.

No. 34. Alamgir II.

No. 35. Sháh Alam.

Specimens of the coinage of Muhammadan conquerors after the style of the Hindu currency.

I fear that in many (if not in most) of my observations on the above I may be very far astray, for as far as I can ascertain, this class of coins has received but very little notice at the hands of numismatists hitherto, and here in Southern India we labour under the two great disadvantages of living where there is no regularly arranged public collection for comparison (though in the Madras Museum there is ample material for one), and secondly in having to deal with coins which for the most part bear no inscription whatever. A very tyro in the subject myself, I doubt not but that some of my remarks will appear ridiculous to those deeply read in numismatic lore, but as I send specimens which in most instances I can find no reference to anywhere, and in some cases, which I can meet with no specimens of elsewhere, I feel that they may prove of interest to some of the members of the Society and therefore send them for their inspection. I may add that I have duplicates of many of those I send, and these I shall be glad to exchange for Northern India issues with any members who care to do so.

Note on Some of the Symbols on the Coins of Kunanda.—By W. Theobald, Esq., M. R. A. S.

The coins of this king are so well known and have been so well delineated and so fully described, that it may excite surprise that any new light should be sought to be thrown on the symbols they bear, without recourse to any essentially nearer or different material than those which have already undergone the scrutiny of some of our ablest orientalists; and I feel that a sort of apology may well be expected for my presumption in claiming to see deeper into the subject than others have done, who are far abler than myself in this particular branch of enquiry, and that my justification can alone be found, by establishing with a fair amount of probability the substantial correctness of the views which have suggested themselves to me, after the perusal of the papers of some of my eminent predecessors in this enquiry. For my present purpose it will, I think, suffice to quote from the writings of Prof. H. H. Wilson in his 'Ariana Antiqua,' p. 415, Pl. XV, f. 23; a paper by E. Thomas, Esq., in J. R. A. S. Vol. I, New Series, p. 447; a paper by my learned and esteemed friend Bábu Rájendralála Mitra in J. A. S. B. 1875, Part I, p. 82, and Prinsep's Pl. XXXII, J. A. S. B. 1838.

The type of both the silver and copper coins of Kunanda is very constant, so far as the general design goes, though the copper coins vary considerably in size, weight, and execution, while the dies of the more carefully executed silver coins present minor variations, which do not, however, impair the marked uniformity of type pervading them all.

Professor Wilson thus describes the silver coin figured by him in 'Ariana Antiqua,' Pl. XV, f. 23. "Round. Stag, to the right with female figure in front; above the back of the animal a symbol, Mon. No. 164d, and between its horns another (?) No. 164b * * * * * Rev. A chaitya surmounted by an umbrella, and Mon. No. 156; on its right a square Mon. No. 165 surmounted by a triple tree; on its left two symbols, No. 166 and the sign familiar to the Hindus by the name of Swastika. See No. 158" l. c. p. 415.

On the preceding page, Professor Wilson remarks: "The principal object is a female figure, in front of a stag, the meaning of which does not derive much light from the passage quoted by Mr. Csoma from the Dul-va that 'a man of the religious order may have on his seal or stamp a circle with two deer on the opposite sides, and below, the name of the founder of the Vihara or monastery." Wilson's coin I will designate as a.

Mr. E. Thomas (1. c.) thus describes his coin, which may be called b. "The central figure represents the conventional form of the sacred deer of the Buddhist. (1) The horns are fancifully curved, and the tail is imitated from that of the Himalayan yak; an appendage, which, in its material use and pictorial embodiment, was so early accepted as a distinctive type of royalty. In attendance on this symbolic animal is a lightly draped female (2) who holds aloft a lotus (3). The monogram \Box (4) complete the emblems on the field, but the lotus is repeated at the commencement of the legend."

The emblems on the reverse are thus described; (p. 476) "The central device consists of a stupa (5) surmounted by a small chhatra (6), above which appears a favourite Buddhist symbol (7). At the foot is a serpent (8). In the field are the Bodhi tree (9), the Swastika cross (10), and an emblem peculiar to the Buddhists (11)."

The coin itself is figured on p. 457. In a note on p. 475, Mr. Thomas adds, "On some coins* the lotus is inserted in the field below the body of the stag. On other specimens the letter $\Delta = V$ (Vihára?) occupies the vacant space." The third coin, c, figured by Bábu Rájendralála Mitra (J. A. S. B. 1875, Part I, p. 89) does not materially differ as regards the emblems engraved on it, from specimen b, and need not therefore be more particularly described here. The fourth specimen in silver, d, is a coin in my own possession, which differs in the animal on the obverse, standing in full side profile, so as to display one horn only; in the female holding some obscure object, which it is hardly possible to regard as a lotus, but which may be intended for a chowri or fly-whisk, and in the presence beneath the animal's belly of a small chaitya, made of three segments of circles.

* J. A. S. B. Pl. XXXII, f. 4.-W. T.

The three symbols which it is proposed to consider, are—lst: The animal forming the central figure on the obverse of these coins. 2nd, the symbol or emblem over the animal's head; and 3rd, the object or symbol on the reverse, standing to the left of the chaitya, numbered 11 by Thomas, but the nature of which he professes his inability to explain.

As regards the animal which writers have agreed to term a 'deer,' the question which first arises is, whether the same animal is in every case intended, or if two animals have not been confounded under one designation? The rude execution and style of many of these coins, particularly the upper ones, has, I think, contributed to a laxity of interpretation, resulting on a fundamental misconception of the animal which generally appears on the coins, as from the careful consideration of the four above-mentioned silver coins, it may be gravely doubted if a 'deer' is the animal intended to be represented on any of them! In coarsely executed coins of small size, like these of Kunanda, no absolute decision can perhaps be arrived at on the evidence of a single specimen. but in coins of fairly good execution, as for example, specimen b, on which Mr. Thomas recognises (correctly in my opinion) the tail of the animal, as the tail of the Himalayan yak (Poephagus grunniens) something beyond mere assertion is called for, before we can admit the theory that the artist intended to represent a 'deer,' with the tail superadded of an animal belonging to an entirely different section of ruminants.

The well known canon of Horace should serve to warn us against adopting such a supposition, unless there is strong evidence to warrant our so doing.

"Pictoribus atque poetis Quidlibet audendi semper fuit æqua potestas. Scimus, et hanc veniam petimusque damusque vicissim: Sed non ut placidis coëant immitia, non ut Serpentes avibus geminentur, tigribus agni." Ad Pisones.

"Poets and painters (sure you know the plea)
Have always been allowed their fancy free.'
I own it; 'tis a fair excuse to plead;
By turns we claim it, and by turns concede;
But 'twill not screen the unnatural and absurd,
Unions of lamb with tiger, snake with bird." Conington's translation.

The horns or antlers of deer are branched and deciduous, and capable of being periodically shed and renewed; the horns of other ruminants are unbranched, persistent and supported by bony cores, as in the oxen and antelopes, and these appendages are so characteristic of the animal, that to represent an ox with the curved and knotted horns on its head of an Ibex or the antlers of a bara-singha or stag, would be as monstrous as the figure presented by 'Bottom,' disguised with an ass's head, or the unnatural productions of heraldic imagery. Now on a coin. it were more easy to represent with effect, a branched horn or antler. such as characterise a 'deer,' than a simple unbranched one, such as is invariably borne by a bovine ruminant; but on none of the above four coins, all perhaps above the average of execution, nor indeed on the majority of the coins in question, in either silver or copper, is there any indication of an attempt to represent the animal with a branched horn, or the antler of a deer, and hence I think we may fairly hesitate to believe that a 'deer' was the animal intended.

In the best executed specimens the tail is 'bushy' and drawn with sufficient character, to fully warrant Mr. Thomas in describing it, as the tail of a yak. What induced Mr. Thomas to consider this yak's tail, as grafted on to the body of a 'deer' it is needless to enquire, but the question for us to consider is, if the animal is not rather a yak than a deer?

Professor Wilson in his description of the coin figured in Ariana Antiqua gives a clue to the correct determination of this point, and differs from Mr. Thomas in describing a symbol (No. 164b a. a. Pl. XXII) as occurring over the head of the animal. This 'symbol' (as Professor Wilson correctly regards it) Mr. Thomas evidently regarded as constituting part of the horns, which he consequently described as "fancifully curved," and in this he is followed (though inferentially only and without special comment or allusion) by Bábu Rájendralála Mitra; but the distinctness of the figure of Wilson's coin a fully supports the view that the object or symbol in question has no connection with the horns of the animal, however much that may seem to be the case in less carefully executed or less well preserved coins.

In the coin d in my own possession the complete isolation of the symbol in question from the horns of the animal is as clearly marked as in Wilson's specimen, and is rendered more striking and obvious by the somewhat different 'pose' of the animal, which offering a side profile, displays but a single horn, whereas Wilson's figure exhibits both.

With equal clearness is the distinct separation between the symbol and the horns of the animal represented on Prinsep's Plate XXXII, J. A. S. B. 1838, figs. 4 and 5, where the artist's intention to depict two cobras facing each other can hardly be questioned. These coins are of silver, but on the same Plate a copper coin fig. 8 supports the same conclusion. It may also be added that on two copper coins on the Plate figs. 9 and 10 the symbol appears to be wholly absent.

In every coin but one, which has come under my notice, in either silver or copper, the horns are unbranched, or of the bovine, as contrasted with the cervine type, and in the exceptionally fine specimen a, would appear as though slightly twisted, precisely as the horns of the yak actually are. Generally, however, the horns are represented as simply curved, but for this, there is a sufficient reason, in the extreme difficulty of representing in metal, such horns in any other way; there was therefore every inducement to the artist to represent a branched horn of a 'deer' as most effectively and in the most artistic manner indicating that animal, had such been his design. On the evidence then of coins a and d it may be assumed as established, that the horns of the animal represented on the majority of these coins, are not "fancifully curved" (through their accidentally coalescing with the symbol above them) but possess the simple curvature of a yak's horn, and as the peculiar bushy tail of that animal is represented as well, with no mean pictorial fidelity. the conclusion is irresistible that the Himalayn yak, and no species of 'deer,' is the animal usually intended.

One coin has, however, fallen under my notice, the first upper coin of this series in the British Museum collection, which undoubtedly represents an animal with branched horns, and I see therefore no escape from the conclusion that on this particular coin a deer and not a yak is really Perhaps other collections may contain similar coins, but it is the only one I have myself hitherto seen. On this coin also (whether as some might suppose fortuitously, or as I am inclined to believe, by intention) the tail of the animal is long and lank, and not bushy like a yak's; and the very fact of the tail being represented rather long, though a deer's tail is short, appears to me not improbably to have been an intentional deviation from nature on the artist's part, the more forcibly to proclaim by the palpable contrast between a lank tail and the ordinary bushy one, the substitution of a stag in place of the more generally accepted yak. This it may, perhaps, be urged is too refined a speculation, as on the coarser and less carefully executed copper coins of the usual type, the bushy character of the tail is not invariably maintained; but in the case of this coin (though it be of copper) where the artist has introduced the crucial detail, as I may call it, of a branched horn, the style of tail represented, more probably results from design, and is correlated to the alteration in other particulars, than from imperfect or careless execution.

It now remains only to add a few words on the objects or symbols depicted over the yak's head. In Wilson's coin a it is clear that whatever they are, they are separated from, and have no relation to, the horns of the animal, and the same remark applies to the coin d in my own possession. They are in fact two rather stumpy or conventional figures of snakes, presumably the Indian Cobra (Naga tripudians), and this is so apparent as to cause surprise that Professor Wilson should have contented himself with including them in his Plate of symbols (No. 164b) without hazarding any opinion as to their true significance. On the copper coins of rude execution, these objects are often degraded into two straight-backed sigma-shaped objects quite unconnected with the horns, whilst in such coins as those figured by Mr. Thomas (b) and by Bábu Rájendralála Mitra (c) of superior execution, the lengthened and more serpentine form given them, causes the tail cut to approximate sufficiently close to the termination of the horns of the animal, to give rise to the mistaken idea that they are really prolongations of them.

The appropriateness of a pair of cobras among a collection of Buddhist symbols is unquestionable, and on this the remarks of Mr. Thomas which relate to the single snake below the chaitya on the reverse of these coins may here be quoted. "(8) The craft of serpent-charming in the East, probably from the very beginning, contributed a powerful adjunct towards securing the attention and exciting the astonishment of the vulgar, whether used as an accessory to the unpretentious contents of the juggler's wallet, or the more advanced mechanical appliances* of professors of magic-who among so many ancient nations progressively advanced the functions of their order from ocular deceptions to the delusion of men's minds and the framing of religions of which they constituted themselves the priests. India, which so early achieved a civilization purely its own, would appear, in the multitude of the living specimens of the reptile its soil encouraged, to have simultaneously affected the mass of its population with the instinctive dread and terror of the scriptural enemy of mankind-a fear which, in the savage stage, led to a sacrificial worship similar to that accorded to less perceptible evil spirits. Hence the dominance of the belief in Nagas, which came to be a household and state tradition, and which especially retained its preeminence in the more local Buddhist faith" (l. c. p. 484).

In representing two snakes facing one another, we have an indication, (apart from their tripudiant attitude) that the cobra was intended,

"The silver snake

Abhorrent of the deed was seen to quake." Gifford's translation.

^{*} The learned writer may not improbably when penning these words have had the line of Juvenal in his mind.

[&]quot;Et movisse caput visa est argentea serpens." Satire VI, line 338.

as these reptiles are popularly supposed, and with some instice I believe, to associate in pairs, so much so that it is commonly believed that if one is killed it will not be long before its companion will be found near the same place. Whether this is a trait with poisonous snakes only, I do not know, but in corroboration thereof in their case I can relate an instance within my own personal knowledge. Many years ago I had a terrier dog bitten in a dry ditch in Calcutta, by a Chandra borá, (Daboia Russelli, Shaw). The dog died in a very short time, and I then and there killed its assailant, a powerful animal of some five feet in length. The very next day, as I was walking in slippers over the same spot, I narrowly escaped putting my foot down on, and being bitten by a very similar snake, which I naturally concluded to be the partner of the one killed the day previously. The appearance, however, of two hooded snakes or Cobras on coins is too common to call for further comment, but it may be asked how comes this serpent symbol to be repeated on the reverse. To this the answer is clear. The solitary serpent, depicted as a single undulating line below the chaitya represents not the cobra, but another type of reptile altogether, the Asiatic Python. It is of course needless to remind the reader that two distinct ideas are embodied in the symbol of the serpent (considered apart from the local Indian Naga) viz., that, with which we are most familiar, of the serpent as the embodiment of evil, the Vedic 'Ahis' and 'Vritra,' the dreaded throttling snake of primeval mythology; and the serpent in its beneficent aspect and the symbol of life-giving and healing power. It is of course in this latter aspect that the serpent appears beneath the 'chaitya,' and on one copper coin in my possession, the serpent is depicted, not extended at length below the chaitya, but as entering into it from below, so that regarding the 'chaitya' as a leaf, the serpent is indicated as occupying the position of its stalk, that is, as partly parallel with its base, but curved up and united to it, in the middle. The idea in this instance is (I would suggest) that the sacred 'chaitya' has been selected as its abode by the sacred and symbolic animal, as the sacred serpents of other lands were popularly held to do, in some shrine or temple of Pallas, Phoibos or Æsculapius. This copper coin exhibiting the union of the snake and 'chaitya' is in rather poor condition and weighs 34 grains, but does not display any other deviation from the ordinary type of these coins.

The third symbol on these coins to be now noticed is that numbered 11 by Mr. Thomas and regarding which he thus expresses himself (l. c. page 487).

"(11) I am unable to conjecture the intent or import of the singular emblem which appears below the Swastika. An earlier form of the device occurs on the introductory weight currency * * * but this outline suggests no more intelligible solution of its real import than the more advanced linear configuration. The design may possibly have emanated from some fortuitous combination of mystic signs of local origin, so many of which passed imperceptibly into the symbolization of Buddhism. General Cunningham states that this device, in its modified form as seen on Kunanda's coins, is found on the necklace of Buddhist symbols on one of the Sanchi gateways."

I would here enter, en passant, a protest against the idea of any "fortuitous combination" being responsible for the origin of religious symbols of any sort; indeed the terms 'mystic' and 'fortuitous' appear to be mutually incompatible. The reason why hair grows on some parts of our body and not on others, may be unknown to us, but it is certainly not fortuitous. The removal of the hair from a part of the body, in the tonsure of the priest, is also not fortuitous, but mystical in the highest degree; and we should certainly err in supposing the 'tonsure 'a fortuitous and meaningless custom, because its origin being thoroughly pagan, and rooted in an impure soil (as we who have lost all sympathy with and almost the power of appreciating justly the old nature worship, would term it) is probably unknown and its import unsuspected by the majority of those individuals in modern Christendom who submit to the rite, and thereby masquerade in the cerements of a religion, their very souls would recoil from. The fact that the meaning of a rite or symbol is unknown or but little dwelt on may be used as an argument for suspecting that its origin, like that of many a noble house, is of such a character as to be dishonestly kept in the back ground, but not that it is in any way fortuitous, and still less that it is at once fortuitous and mystical likewise.

Whether the archaic symbol referred to by Mr. Thomas as occurring on the weight currency was of identical import with the symbol on the coins of Kunanda need not here be discussed, as the authority of Mr. Thomas is, I consider, sufficient to settle the question affirmatively; but as regards the symbol on the coins, a very simple and appropriate explanation presents itself to any one familiar with Buddhist manners at the present day in a Buddhist country, like Burma for instance. Viewed then by the light of modern Buddhist usage, the symbol in question resolves itself into an altar or receptacle wherein food is exposed for the benefit of animals, in the neighbourhood of a monastery or pagoda. In Burma, food may often be seen thus exposed, often lavishly, for the use of any passing animal, generally on the ground or on some low and easily accessible spot, but sometimes on a raised platform or altar constructed for the purpose. For the use of birds, a pious Buddhist would naturally provide a raised support, much of the character of the symbol in question on the coins, so that the birds, when feeding, might be safe from the attack of any beast of prey in ambush near them, and such an altar for the reception of food, is in strict accord with the other symbols with which it is associated. To those who have not seen the symbol, it may be roughly described as resembling a flower-pot elevated on a pole, but whether the intention is to represent a partially hollow receptacle or not, is neither very clear nor very material.

The archaic form of the symbol supports, or, at all events, does not militate against the explanation now offered. It consists of an upright T supporting a cup-shaped vessel, not improbably representing the begging bowl of a Buddhist monk.

On one side of this vessel are two appendages forming a < the precise character of which is certainly far from clear. It is just possible, if the object is intended for a begging bowl, that the appendage in question may represent conventionally the carp or ends of a band, used to sustain it, whilst collections are being made: but this suggestion I make tentatively and with much hesitation.

These remarks I offer for what they are worth, leaving it to those with more extensive knowledge of the subject than myself, or whose acquaintance with these coins is larger than my own, to decide what weight fairly attaches to them.

Bedford, May 11th, 1886.

The Miná tribe of Jájpur, in Meywar.—By Kavi Ráj Shyámal Dáss, M. R. A. S., F. R. Historical Society. Translated by Babu Ram Prasad.

The Minas are said to be a mixed race: descended from unions between high caste fathers and low caste mothers, and are divided into three hundred and forty clans.

Of these only seventeen are of importance, the remainder being represented only by a few families. They are found all over Rájputáná, but principally in Meywar, Jeypore, Bundi, and Kotá.

The seventeen clans are as follows:

- (1.) Tází ताजी derived from a Rájput father.
- (2.) Pawri प्रश्ने from a Bráhman father and Miná mother.
- (3.) Mor Jálá मोरजाजा.
- (4.) Chítá चौता.
- (5.) Húnháj क्रवहाज Rájput father and Miná mother.
- (6.) Barad are derived from a Mahájan.

- (7.) Belang वेस्ब.
- (8.) Kábrá कावरा.
- (9.) Dágal wine from a Rájput father.
- (10.) Ghartud utse from a Rájput father.
- (11.) Bhúrwo भूडवो.
- (12.) Kirwá की दवा.
- (13.) Dhodhing খাৰ্থাৰ of a Chowhán father.
- (14.) Bhil भी w born of a Bhil mother.
- (15.) Boya बोया.
- (16.) Mothis मोडीस from a Pramar or Puar Rajput.
- (17.) Parihár परिचाड (पडवार) from a Rájput father.

Of the above only the Mothis and Parihar are found in the Jajpur[®] district in any considerable number, and the following account relates principally to these two clans.†

The Jájpur Minás number altogether two thousand five hundred families, composing, in round numbers, eleven thousand five hundred souls.1

Mothis Miná.§

The Mothis family of Minas is said to have been founded about three centuries before the age of Vikramaditya by a Rajput of the Pramar clan, of which Vikram was the pride and ornament.

Rohi Dás, a descendant of Rájá Barna Rishi, son to Rájá Dhúmra (to whose family also belonged Chitrang Mori and Bhartrihári), was one day engaged in contemplation on Mount Abu, when a Banjárá female who had strayed from her caravan of bullocks chanced to pass by him. Rohi Dás was struck with her beauty, and wooed her. She in due course gave birth to two sons, Hariá and Sariá, in a field of lentils, (Moth), whence they came to be called Mothís; and in consequence of having been born of a low caste mother, they were ranked low.

- * Yajnapúra 'city of sacrifice' is the original Sanskrit name: although in the word vas the jn regularly becomes g in Hindi vas or vas; yet in the name of the town it becomes vas giving Jájpur, which again outsiders have modified into Jaháj pur. See my Comp. Gram. Vol. I., p. 302.—Ed.
- † The writer is indebted to the Hákim (Mehtá Lachhmi Lál Ji) of the district for much assistance in the enquiry regarding the Minás, and also to Bhawáná Miná a Subahdár in the Sajjan Paltan.
- ‡ The total number of Minás in Rajputána is fixed by Kitts at 42,7672. Compendium of Castes and Tribes, p. 13.
- § This narrative has been taken from the MSS. of the Jágás and Dholis, and from oral accounts delivered by old men.
 - || His younger brother succeeded to the throne of Dhár in Málwá.

The Mothis Minas are not allowed to step on the carpets of Hindus because of their having practised cow-slaughter at some period.

The genealogy of the Mothis Minás is as follows:

- (1.) Rohi Dás रोची दास..
- (2.) Hariá and Sariá दरिया, परिया.
- (3.) Ren रेच.

- (4.) Chundár च्टार.
- (5.) Kous को उस,
- (6.) Káti Ráe काती राव.
- (7.) Budká व्यका.
- (8.) Bálrá वाखरा.
- (9.) Khetrám Pásá चेतराम पाचा.
- (10.) *Sátúji चातूजी.
- (11.) Hatak चढक.

(The hero of his race, who distinguished himself as a warrior in the fight against Baghráwuts.† He is worshipped by the Mothis Minás, as a hero-god.)

(10.) Dípsá दीपना.

(11.) Dewul देवस

- (12.) Udási जदासी came to the Todá Solankhi Chief of Bhánylá भाषा (the modern town of Nayánagar), between S. 1404 and 1488.
- (13.) Bisal बीसख.
- (14.) Guná जना.
- (15.) Tídá डीडा.
- ् (16.) Toi डोइ.
- * His descendants are found in Merwara.
- † The twenty-four Baghráwat brothers were the descendants of Bágh Rao in the service of Prithvi Ráj Chauhán. They acquired a reputation for benevolence and courage but are said to have been addicted to spirituous liquors.

A Gujar woman bore to the eldest brother Sawái Bhoj a son Devá, worshipped under the name of Deváji by the Gujars. All the brothers lost their lives on the Khári river in Meywar, fighting against the Rájá of Bhanái in Ajmere; their deeds are still sung by the villagers.

who is now living in Sarsá, he gave away a lion with all its trappings to his dependants, and thus acquired great fame among his caste people.

The Mothis Minas claim to have sprung into existence eight hundred years ago, but a study of their genealogy shows that a later period must be assigned to their origin.

The Minás of this clan are a tall, handsome, and dark complexioned race. Their dress has apparently been modified by contact with more advanced races. It generally consists of a dirty dhoti, a turban, and a bagtari or jacket.

Bows, arrows, and daggers are their principal weapons; they also, however, carry swords and muskets, and are courageous in battle. They live mainly on barley and Indian-corn, but eat meat as well, and indulge in spirits. Though brave they are generally a poor class, and lead a humble life. In addition to cultivation they live by thieving, which with them is a sort of hereditary profession. They are loyal to the Government—their number is very limited in the majority of villages. They worship Máláji, and do not mount a white horse, or use Amauwá (चानीवा) dye (a colour prepared with turmeric and the husks of pomegranates mixed with alum), in consequence of a curse pronounced by Máláji on that colour.

Legend of Máláji (alias Mángatji) as delivered orally by Minás:

When the Bhagrawats were killed, Sandhu, a Gujar female, went with her child Deva Narayan, six months old to her father's house.

When the child grew up, he came with his mother to Gothá, and when starting for Rán to revenge the murder of his ancestors by the chieftains of that place, as well as to take back the colt of the mare Boli from them, he was enjoined by his mother to take with him the youngest of the five sons of her sister (whose husband was Satuji Pawár), who was in the village Bhányela, that formed one of the twelve villages in Satuji's jághir.

This lady was a kanchuli badal sister, (i. e., one who had exchanged bodices) of Deva Narayan's mother.

Deva Narayan acted on the order and took Malaji with him to Ran.

He fought with the chieftains of the place and was returning victorious with the colt, when the Rán people pursued him; Deva Narayan went straight to Gothá, but ordered Máláji to face the enemy, and to kill anything he might meet and bring with him one of the legs of whatever he slew.

Máláji defeated the pursuers, and on his way back to Gothá, he saw a cow, killed it, and put one of its legs in the horse's food-bag.

The legend says, the cow was not real, but had been left there by Deva Náráyan to try the faith of Máláji; Deva Náráyan having formed it of the dirt of his body and inspired it with life.

When Máláji came in sight of Deva Náráyan, the latter refused to touch him—accusing him of cow-slaughter. But Máláji instantly sprinkled ambrosia on the victim, which sprang into existence again; this act pleased Deva Náráyan highly, and he pronounced benediction upon Máláji, saying he himself had only 12 kalás (art or trick), but Máláji would have one kalá in addition; and made him proof against shot, arrow, and sword, but said if a Thori* should chance to hit him with an arrow of green reed (sánthi) after wetting its tip with his saliva he (Máláji) would at once die, and be translated to heaven.

Máláji took leave of Deva Náráyan and returned to Bhánylá: after a time a quarrel broke out between him and the Baghráwats, on the ground of division of shares, which was followed by a fight, but Máláji could not be killed, because Deva Náráyan's benediction was upon him.

However, the secret of his vulnerability was unwittingly made known by his wife Bhatyániji, to the attendant who dressed her hair, and she revealed it to her husband, and he in turn to the Baghráwats.

They accordingly secured the services of a number of Thoris for the special purpose of killing Máláji, and ordered them to try to shoot him with an arrow of green sánthi, wetted with their saliva.

One day, as Máláji was seated at a window of his house, with one leg hanging down, a Thori hit him with an arrow in execution of the order of the Baghráwats.

Immediately, Máláji extended one of his feet to the ridge of the eaves and the other to a heap of cowdung cakes, and crying out "chhút, chhút" "fie! fie!" ascended up to heaven.

During the night he used to come and visit his wife Bhatyániji, and told her not to make known the fact to anybody.

One day his mother seeing her widowed daughter-in-law adorning herself, asked her the reason; she was obliged to tell her the secret.

She told her mother-in-law to hide herself among tulsi plants at night and behold what passed. She did accordingly; Máláji came and passed the night—but when on the point of departing in the morning, his mother held him by the hand. He said, if his secret had not been thus revealed, a person of better qualifications than himself would have been born in the family, and he himself would have assisted the members of the family in fight in a tangible shape, but now he would come privately, and keep himself in advance of a hero, who would see him.

Moreover, he commanded the family never to use the following articles:

(1) A white cloth; (2) an ivory bangle; (3) an indigo-coloured and bordered gown having angular bits of cloth sewed on to it, and other articles that his wife had on her body at the time.

Amauwá dye, an arched door, double folding shutters, a heap of cowdung cakes and a gable roof are never made or used by Mothis Minás.

After this Máláji went to heaven, taking with him his wife, the white horse (that had been given to him by Deva Náráyan when going to Ran), and its groom.

The horse was white, and that is the reason why the Mothis Minás do not mount a white horse.

Máláji is worshipped on the 9th day of the month, and the Navami of Asarh sudi (पापाइस्सार) is the particular day of his worship, when a fair is held in his honour at his shrine on mount Rohi in Bhánylá.

Thoris are not allowed by the Minás to enter their villages, because the latter owe them a grudge for their having killed Máláji.

THE PARIHÁR MINÁS.

The Parihar Minas exceed in number all the other castes inhabiting the District of Jajpur; forty thousand men of this branch live within the bounds of Meywar, Tonk, Bundi,* and Jeypore, and are systematically organised.

Origin and genealogy, as given by the Jágás and Dholis:

- (1.) Náhar Ráo नासर राव (Rájá of Mandore in Marwar).
- (2.) Mál Deo मास देव
- (3.) Súpan स्तपन
- (4.) Járu जाद
- (5.) Thunsí य्वसी
- (6.) Sevá and Somá सवा. सोसा.

These two (No. 6) went to Todá between S. 1503 and 1547 and were granted jágirs by the Rájá of Todá.

(7.) Sámdá স্থান্থ্য—the legitimate son of Somá, repaired to Málwá.

Then Somá married two Miná women, named Kerdí केंद्री and Kabrí, कावरी who bore him six sons:

- (a.) Hápá रापा whose descendants are found towards Umargaḍh.
- (b.) Nápá नापा (c.) Sadná घडना
- (d.) Sánwul viag—who was killed.
- (e.) Dená हैवा—whose descendants are traced to Mínás still living in the Bundi state.
 - (f.) Bhojá भोजा—his issue exists in Jájpur. From Bhojá was born:

From Dhoja was

- (8.) Dená देवा
- (9.) Hájá हाजा

^{*} The date of their advent is fixed about the 12th century A. D., confirmed by an inscription in a temple at the Kheran village of Oomur.—Mr. A. N. Bruce's "Report on the Parihár Minás" 1865-67. Also Sherring's "Hindu Castes and Tribes," Vol. III, p. 80.

From Hájá were born :

Sálá offered his head to Mahádev; the descendants of his brothers are extensively spread.

It is said that (No. 13) Ran Mal, son of (No. 12) Halu, received the grant of the village of Luhári from Rája Jang Bahádur* of Málwá.

The wife of Isar (No. 15) (son of Nela) (No. 14) immolated herself on the funeral pyre, and the platform erected over the spot where she was reduced to ashes is still to be seen.

There have been born heroes in this tribe, which is called after the race from which it is derived. The Parihar Minas are a brave and athletic race, tall, handsome, and well-built; but revengeful; and maintaining blood-feuds for generations. They wear a frock, and dhoti of cotton cloth. Their principal weapons are bow and arrows, dagger and sword: having been disarmed by the British

^{*} The correct name seems to be Báz Bahádur, who sought refuge with M. R. Udai Singh of Meywar, when Akbar deprived him of Málwá.

Government in S. 1916 (= A. D. 1860) they do not publicly carry arms. Their food consists of wheat, barley, Indian corn, and ghi, they indulge in spirits and eat largely of flesh of all kinds, save that of the boar which, strange to say, they hold to be sacred.

Generally they are a well-to-do people, very few of them being poor, and most of them owning large herds of cattle. Theft is their general profession, and some of them follow dacoity, they practise husbandry merely as a nominal pursuit.

They have a strong feeling of attachment to their clan, and readily unite against outsiders. They have all the obstinate courage of hill men, and are disposed to be turbulent and troublesome subjects, requiring a strong hand to keep them in order.

When not called upon to fight against their own tribe, the Parihár Minás are very reliable and daring mercenaries.

The Minás of this branch are very cunning and expert thieves, and do not always fulfil the conditions of compacts in the nature of black-mail entered into with travellers.

When a theft is traced home to them, and the perpetrators of the crime are fined, they pay the amount, but recompense themselves by similar ventures at the earliest opportunity.

They principally worship Mahádev (Shiv).

It is not held by them to be inconsistent with their dignity, to give their daughters in marriage on payment of money; but as their number is very great, and the other Miná castes are comparatively few in number it rarely happens that the latter have to marry the daughter of a Parihár Miná, and whenever they do so, they pay a fine, so low are the Parihárs held in estimation by the other Minás.

The Parihar Minas used to kill their daughters in former days, but this barbarous practice has gradually died out since the Camp at Deoli has been in existence, and the monthly statement of births and deaths is submitted to the Agency.

The crime has not been heard of for some years past. On referring to the statement for Samvat 1936 (= A. D. 1879-80) for Pepleá, the number of boys was found to be in the ratio of 22:0 to girls.

The younger brother can marry the widow of the elder, but a woman cannot become the wife of her sister's son: the other rules of Nátá (widow-marriage) all hold good in the case of the Parihárs.

SINDAM MINÁS.

Jorji or Zorji Rathor জাজো নেটাং—chief of Kálinjar in Kángrá, had a younger son named Jamráj, from whom descended the following line—

Thárá witi.

Thárá married a Miná female Sári—the result of their union came to be called Siddámá विदास.

Kálá, काला came to Meywar.

His descendant (in the 15th generation) named Sánvlá Patel सांवद्धा प्रदेश is living in Náthún.

From the numbers mentioned above, the family may be said to have existed for not less than three or four centuries.

They worship Devi and Bhairava; they pay no reverence to Máláji; other facts about them are the same as those of the Mathis Minás.

DHODHING.

Tej Pál Chowhán, took to wife the bride of Dhanná Miná, from the union sprang the Dhodhing Minás, who originally dwelt in Mándal, but subsequently removed to the Kherar.

Kishná the Patel of Tilá is in the 23rd generation from Tej Pál—a fact from which the family is concluded to have been founded about six hundred years ago. Chárbhuja is their chief deity.

They resemble in all respects the Parihars and Mothis Minas.

GENERAL REMARKS.

Among the Súdra class, the Minás of the Kherár and the Bhils of the hilly tracts are very interesting, and a comparison is here drawn between them.

Bhils.

- (1.) Wild race, a blackish complexion.
- (2.) Follow theft occasionally and way-lay travellers.
- (3.) Loyal to the State, and hard-working.
- (4.) Inhabiting an area of 600 miles.
- (5.) Wear breeches not covering the thigh, and a cloth passing round the body cross-wise over the shoulders—both of country-cloth.
- (6.) Their weapons consist of bow and arrow; they are well-skilled in hill-fight.
 - (7.) Worshippers of Káláji.
- (8.) A man can marry five women at a time.

Minás.

- (1.) Ignorant; -wheaten complexion.
- (2.) Occasional robbers but habitual thieves.
 - (3.) Not very loyal.
 - (4.) 400 miles.
 - (5.) Frock and dhoti.
- (6.) Spear and dagger: capable of fighting on the plains, as well as in the hilly tracts.
 - (7.) Worship Mátáji.
- (8.) A man can take two wives.

Neither of these races is bound by any religion or social law, homicide is to them a mere sport.

They organise a system of Tháná of their own caste-men for the prevention of theft and highway robbery.

They do not plead guilty even on punishment being dealt out to them.

They are well aided in their profession by hills and forests.

The Minas regularly pay rent, and instalments of debts. They never allow other castes to settle in their villages.

THE CONTRIBUTOR'S OWN VIEWS.

The accounts of the origin of the Minás, given in the foregoing pages, according to the views expressed by well-informed people of that tribe, and the traditions of the bards, are in my opinion not correct, seeing that mistakes generally occur in the records kept by the latter, except so far as the genealogies comprised in a period of nearly the last three centuries are concerned.

Therefore, I take the liberty of here stating my own views as to the origin of this interesting race somewhat in detail, which urges me to go back to a very, very ancient epoch of history.

There was no law to prohibit the four castes into which the Aryans split up after their immigration into India from Central Asia regions from blending together:* in fact the differences between them consisted merely in the variety of the particular calling pursued, or the degree of excellence acquired by each.

Visvámitra, Válmiki, Vedavyása, Dron Acharya, may serve as instances as they were reckoned among the Bráhmans on showing by their proficiency and behaviour, that they deserved the promotion, notwithstanding that the first was originally a Kshatriya, the second a Bhil, the third sprung from a Kahári† female and the fourth of unknown parentage and found in an earthen vessel.

As time advanced and ages rolled on, and the same profession continued to be pursued in a family for generations, every class came gradually to be distinguished by its ancestry; but nature had its own way, and the several races intermarried among themselves, thus giving birth to an immensity of castes and tribes.

I. A person descended from a Vaishya father and a Bráhman mother, is called a Vaideh:

(a) वैद्यासामधवेद्दी-राजवित्राज्ञनासुतौ ‡

From a Vaishya father by a Kshatriya woman, is born a Mágudh; while from a Vaishya by a Bráhman wife, springs a Vaideh.

(b) वैदेश पुषितः—वैद्यादुनाच्या मृत्यत्रोसंकर जान्यकरे. §

A Vaideh is a mixed caste derived from a Vaishya man and Bráhman woman.

I conjecture that a low class of people dwelling in large numbers among the hills to the south of Oodeypore and called Vaid—the men among them serving as barbers, and the females as midwives, are no other race than the Vaidehas mentioned by our great lawgiver: they bear no sort of resemblance to any other caste.

Probably, the Vaidehas, when looked down by the Aryans of pure blood, by reason of their mixed origin, preferred to go over to live among the Bhils (an aboriginal race, considered one of the lowest class that can be imagined, by the Aryan conquerors)—who regarded them with a certain degree of respect, as they were descendants of Aryan parentage.

II. Med are the people born of Vaideh fathers by Bhil mothers:

(a) वैदेखिकादंशमेदौ-विद्याम प्रतिस्थिती. ||

- 1 Manu, 10th chapter 11th verse.
- § Sabdarth Chintamani (म्यावेचितानिकः) Vol. IV, p. 450.
- || Manu, 10th chapter 36th verse.

From the Vaidehas are descended the Andhras and the Meds—destined to live (in the outskirts of or) without the town.

(b) मेदः पुक्तिकः--

वैदेचेन निषादभाशीयां जनिते चंत्यजविशेषे *

The Meds are a mixed class resulting from the intermarriage of a Vaideh man to a Bhil woman.

The Meds thus descended from the Vaidehas spread in the hilly tracts mentioned above.

After the lapse of centuries perhaps, their name was most likely modified into the form Mew, while the portion of the country inhabited by them was called Mewal (contr. of Mew + Alaya নৰ + ৰাজ্য.

The pergunnah now known by that name is no longer occupied by them, not even to the least extent or number.

Most probably the Mews now found in the tract called Mewát, subject to the Ulwar and Bhartpore states, were expelled their original abode, I suppose, by the Gujars [a tribe from Sindh, who were the barbarians+ known to have sacked the kingdom of Vallabhi in the peninsula of Sauráshtra—which came to be called after them Gujarát] who advanced towards Mewul, either, in pursuit of the descendants of the Vallabhi kings of the Solar Line, who had sought shelter in the southern ranges of the Arvallis, or with a desire to extend their sway over those hill tracts where small ponds dug out by them still survive as the landmarks of their authority.

Of course the Mews would or could not have been expelled all at once, but only gradually after the Gujars had contracted marriages with their women; and I suppose the Minás, (Menás) to be a cross-race between them. Their present name seems to be merely a contraction of the full name Mewna (given them by the Gujars, who regarded them of a lower standing than themselves.

The term Mewna सेव ना means,—descendants of the Mews—(ना) ná being the Gujrati‡ particle for the preposition of, signifying relation.

This tribe is found to live in increasing numbers in Mewal and in the hilly land to its S. E. while the hills to its west are occupied by the Bhils [the Mews having emigrated to Mewat as mentioned above].

 - (a) Gujrati story.
- ‡ Gujrati words are still greatly mixed with the spoken language of the people who live in Mewál and in the hilly tracts of Mewár generally. For Mewálsee ante p. 29.

The evidence of the Mews having been the original inhabitants of Mewar is borne by the facts given below.

- (1) Mewar is a compound word composed of Mew and Ar নিৰ আত্ and means a land of shelter to the Mews.
- (2) Mewal is still the name of a tract (forming part of Mewar) which shows that at some period or other its fastnesses formed the dwelling-place of the Mews.
- (3) Mewat a compound of Mew and At— भेव चात, the name given to the part of the country where they are now found, evidently proves it to be the place of their advent from other parts and that they are not the primitive inhabitants (the children of the soil).

The connection between the Mews and the Minás is quite clear on the following grounds:—

- (1) The Mews, as well as the Minás, live, not so much in villages as in congregations of separate houses or huts which are called Pals by both of them.
- (2) The names of the various clans among them are found to correspond.
- (3) The appearance of the Minás living in Mewal at the present day differs from that of the Bhils, while it closely resembles that of the Mews.

A number of the Mews who took up their abode on the northern borders of Mewár [when the tide of emigration of the tribe flowed towards what is now called Mewát,] are called Mers or Mairs [a term which is commonly used in Rajpútana for border* or boundary] or the border people, and the part of the country adopted by them for residence is called Mairwarra up to date.

- (1) I fancy that these Mers intermarried with the Gujars for a second time, when the latter left the southern and advanced towards the northern portion of Mewár, and it may be, as the bards would have it, also with the Rájputs, preferring the Kherárs for their habitation; at this stage they resumed their name Miná, the original designation of their family.
- (2) Moreover the fact of the Minás of the Kherars being the result of a union between the Gujars and the Mews, is confirmed by the following similarities between them and the Gujars:
 - (a) Similarities in appearance and customs.

As the Aryan Hindus perform funeral obsequies to the manes of their forefathers in the dark half of the month of Aswin (Asaj or Kuár), in the same way, both the Minás and the Gujars perform the ceremony annually, on the 15th day of the dark fortnight of Kartik in the course of the night of Dewali.

* Mer or Mair does not signify a hill, as mentioned in J. De La Touche's Settl. Rep. p. 38 and in Capt Powlett's Kerowli Gazetteer.

1886.7

The proceedings do not differ materially in these two peoples; both of them dip Andhijhara (बान्ना भाइर) and Mundapati (मुद्दा पानी) and Gúmá (= Pharnaceum Mallugo) into water during the ceremony.

- (b) The Minas as well as the Gujars consider themselves justified in marrying the widow of the elder brother.
- (c) The Kanyars (a cognate race to the jágás and bards), whose duty it is to recite the deeds and genealogies of their employers, regard the Minás and the Gujars in the same light.
- (d) The Gujars worship Devaji, who is the same hero as Málá ji or Mángut ji (whose legend is given at the conclusion of the account of the Mothis Minás), adored by the Minás.
- The conflicts between the two are settled as between people on an equal footing.
- (f.) The Gujars and Minás smoke together. They eat out of the same pot, but not out of the same plate.*

CONCLUSION.

Further research will probably bring to light other points of resemblance between the Gujars and the Minás.

This paper has been written as the result of an enquiry concerning the Minás, it being rather an easy task for one who has passed the first 34 years of his life at his jágir forming a part of the Kherárs.

A pond of legends is given in this essay from which it is expected scholars will be able to fish much useful information.

Coins supplementary to Mr. Thomas' "Chronicles of the Pathan kings of Delhi."No. IV.—By Chas. J. Rodgers, A. M., A. S. B. &c.

I have had the accompanying two plates in hand for nearly four The reasons for this long period are not far to seek. This is my fourth supplement to Mr. Thomas' excellent work. All coins are now-adays getting scarcer and scarcer, except the ever-decreasing-in-value rupee. Hence rare and unedited coins must of necessity be seldom met with. As, hitherto, I have had only the Panjáb in which I could search, the coins coming under my notice are mostly those obtained in the bazárs of Panjáb cities. But my coins correspondence has during the last four years considerably increased, and many friends have placed their treasures at my disposal. Of the thirty coins here drawn very few are in my own cabinet now, though at one time they were mine. So far as I know they are at present thus distributed:—

- (1.) Gold coin of Fath Khán and Fíroz Sháh, new type, found by me, now in possession of General Cunningham.
- (2.) Rupee of Shams ud Din Altamash; cabinet of L. White King, Esq., LL. B. C. S., Ajmír.
- (3.) Qila Deogír Mohur of Tuglaq Sháh I. found by me, now in the Government Central Museum, Madras.
 - (4.) Dám of Ibrahím Súr, my cabinet.
 - (5.) Dám of Sikandar Súr, my cabinet.
- (6.) Mixed copper and silver coin of Firoz Sháh and Muhammad Sháh: my cabinet, from General Cunningham.
- (7.) Gold Mohur of Ibrahím Sháh of Júanpúr. Dr. Da Cunha's cabinet, Unique.
- (9.) Daulatábád Mohur of Tuglaq Sháh I. Dr. Da Cunha's cabinet.
- (10.) Láhore rupee of Sikandar Súr Ismáil Dr. Da Cunha's cabinet. Unique with mint and date.
- (11.) Mohur of Násir ud Dín Mahmúd Sháh; found by me, now in Government Central Museum, Madras.
- (12.) Square Mohur of Alá ud Dín Muhammad Sháh, General Cunningham. Unique.
- (13.) Small copper coin of Ibrahím Lodí and Ráma Maharajah of Kángra, cabinet of J. D. Tremlett, Esq., M. A., Judge of the chief Court, Lahore.
- (14.) In all probability a duplicate, with further development of inscription; from the same gentleman's cabinet.
- (15.) Small silver coin of Násir ud Dín Mahmúd. Formerly in the cabinet of Alexander Grant, Esq., C. I. E. of Cheltenham, then in mine, now in the Government Central Museum, Madras.
- (16). Rupee of Mubáriz ud Daniya, Mohammad Sháh Súr, General Cunningham.
- (17.) Half rupee of Ibrahim Súr. The only silver coin of his known up to the present, General Cunningham.
- (18.) Mohur of Násir ud Dín Khusrau Sháh. Found by me at Amritsar. Exchanged to J. G. Delmerick, Esquire; sold to General Cunningham: exchanged to me: now in the Government Central Museum, Madras.
- (19.) New type in copper of Kutb ud Din Mubárak Sháh. My cabinet. Duplicate in the Cabinet of Mrs. Stoker of Attock, now of Dharmsalla.

- (20) (21) and (22.) Brass coins of Firoz Sháh Zafar, bin Firoz Sháh. My cabinet.
 - (23.) Anonymous Coin, my cabinet.
- (24.) New type of Abú Bákr Sháh bin Firoz Sháh. General Cnnningham.
- (25.) New type of Fíroz Sháh, Zafar, son of Fíroz Sháh Tuglaq. My cabinet.
 - (26.) Chaital. General Cunningham.
- (27.) New type of Changez Khán. My Cabinet. Duplicates cabinets of Col. Mat. Gosett, Dorsetshire Regiment, Aden, and of L. W. King, Esq., Ajmír.
- (28.) Posthumous Coin of Mubárak Sháh. My cabinet, duplicate General Cunningham.
- (29.) Square Mohur of Islám Sháh Súr. The only gold coin of this king known. Found by me in Amritsar, now with General Cunningham.
 - (30.) "Dokání" piece or Dokánike. General Cunningham.

From this it will be seen that I possess now only eleven of the coins here described and that six others were found by me and passed on to safer custody. I here take the opportunity of thanking my friends General Cunningham, Dr. Da Cunha and J. D. Tremlett, Esq. for the loan of the coins they so kindly allowed me to draw.

Nearly all the coins are unique so far as our present knowledge goes. I know of duplicates only of Nos. 3, 4, 5, 16, 18, 19, 20, 22, 27, and 28. But further research will I daresay unearth more. Just now there seems a lull in numismatic researches and in finds. Roads, railways and canals being finished and not in progress account for this. I have heard of only one find of coins during the last four years. About a year ago a lot of heavy mohurs of Akbar and Jahángír appeared in the Láhore bazar, I could not get to know where they had been found. Many of the Jahángírí mohurs were "Kalimah" ones. These were as fresh as if just from the mint. I have just returned from a tour of four months, and during the whole of this time though I examined the bazars of every place I visited I obtained only 3 or 4 new coins out of a total of nearly 300 purchased for the Archæological Survey. Every place seems swept out.

Owing to the fact that I drew these coins as they came into or passed through my hands they follow no chronological order. Last year I commenced plates for a fifth supplement. This will I hope be the last. When it is finished it is my intention to add a list of the coins I have given in chronological order.

Several of these coins have already been published in England by the Hon'ble Mr. Gibbs and by the British Museum. But as many of the members of the Asiatic Society of Bengal are not members of the Numismatic Society of London and do not see the catalogues published by the British Museum, I do not think any harm will be done by my retaining them in my plates.

I will now decipher the inscriptions on the coins as far as I can.

There is a duplicate of this coin in the British Museum. Thomas edits a rupee of this Deogír Mint. But these two Mohurs are all I have heard of from this mint.

Mr. Thomas read neither Ismáel nor Súr. Yet both words are on the coin he gives. The British Museum Catalogue reads Súr but deciphers Ismáel thus الساعاب which of course means nothing. This coin of Dr. Da Cunha's is invaluable as giving the mint Lahore and part of the margin which agrees with the inscription on Sikandar's copper coin No. 5, noticed above. How he got the name Ismáel I can't say. Ferishta says his name was Ahmad Khán.

188 C. J. Rodgers-Chronicles of the Pathan kings of Delhi. [No. 3,

دران مدت احمد خان سور حاکم پنجاب که پسر عم شیر شاه میشد و یک خواهر عدلی در جهالهٔ نکاح او نیز بود خبر زبونی عدلی و استیلائی ابراهیم شاه شنیده اورا هم هومی پادشاهی و سروری در سر آفتاد و هیبت خان و ناتار خان که از امرای سلیم شاه بودند با خود یکجهت کرد و خود را ملقب سکندر شاه ساخته با ده هزار سوار از لاهور متوجه بلده آگرم شد ه

This rupee was therefore probably struck by Sikandar before commencing his march from Lahore to Agra. It is just possible that Ferishta is wrong in calling him Ahmad Khán before he ascended the throne. Perhaps his name was Ismáel Khán.

The reverse of this coin has the kalimah in a square. The margins are only partially legible. They probably contained the names and titles of the four companions of Muhammad.

The rupees of Sikandar are very rare. General Cunningham has one. The one here given is Dr. Da Cunha's. His dáms are also very rare. But I think I know of some half dozen.

Thomas gives no gold coin of this king. Mr Gibbs, however, edits one and refers to mine which is, however, a broader piece than his. The British Museum has not got one.

It will be noticed that this gold coin has the inscription in circles and not in squares as the rupees have. This it seems was the custom. The margins too are on both sides and are repetitions of one another. This I have noticed as being followed by Gyás ud Dín Balhan, Muizz ud-Din Kaikabád, Jalál ud Dín Fíroz Sháh and Ala ud Dín Muhammad Sháh. During my late tour I obtained a rupee of the last named king and its inscriptions are in circles. When we get gold coins of the other kings such as Ala ud Dín Masaúd and Muizz ud Dín Bahrám Sháh they will perhaps follow the same custom.

No. 12. This is a square modur of Ala ud Din Muhammad Sháh Mr. Gibbs edits this and gives a second. The inscriptions are the same as on Ala ud Din's ordinary modurs and rupees. There are no margins. It may have been struck from the die used for a rupee.

Nos. 13 and 14 are coins bearing the joint names of Ibrahím bin Sikandar Lodi and that of a Mahárájah of Kangrah. When I wrote my paper on these Mahárájahs I had not seen a coin of this kind. I now possess several.

Ráma died in 1528 A. D. Ibrahím died in 1526 on the plain of Panípat. Ríma was succeeded by Dharmma. But No. 14 is not a coin of the latter Mahárájah. I cannot assign this coin positively to any Mahárájah of Kángrah. At any rate the coins show that the last Lodí Sultán was suzerain of Kángrah.

This small silver coin is fellow to the one of Gyás ud Dír. Balban's that I edited in the last supplement. It is the only one I know of.

Rev. Kalimah in square.

Margins: names and titles of the four companions of Muhammad. The British Museum has two specimens of this type.

This is an eight-anna piece and is as yet the only silver coin of Ibráhím Súr that is known. His copper dáms are not at all common. We ought, however, to have his rupees. These must be sought for.

No. 18. This mohur of Násir ud Dín Khusrau Sháh follows the same type as the rupee given by Mr. Thomas. It was probably struck from the die used for a rupee. The object I had in view when I drew this was to put Mr. Thomas right in his reading of the obverse where he puts الواثق غير الرحمن as الواثق غير الرحمن. Mr. Thomas was not in fault The rupee he used was. I had been perplexed over the word banasr. Better specimens of this mohur are now known. But the rupee given by Mr. Thomas is still unique.

These coins are all of brass. Mr. Thomas does not notice them. I think his No. 257 given under Fíroz Sháh Tuglaq may be one of these. His weighs 106 grs. I have five specimens. They weigh 100, 102, 103, 104, and 113 grs. As his had no margin he could not of course assign it to Fíroz Sháh Zafar.

The Dokání piece given in Thomas weighs 25 grs. This one given by me from General Cunningham's cabinet weighs 51.7 grs., or twice as much as the one in Thomas. Thomas gives a chaital weighing 74 grs. which was equivalent, the coin inscription says, to one kání. I am afraid people's notions of these coins must have been somewhat mixed up. In the time of Akbar, however, as I have shown, a fulús was a coin of no fixed weight.

I can only read what is on this coin. It is evidently one of Muhammad Tuglaq's pieces as he was fond of using في عهد on his coins. It may, however, have been issued by one of his successors. The archaic style of the coin must come for a good deal in its assignment.

From the present dearth of coins of any antiquity or rarity it will at once be seen that now-a-days to attempt to form a cabinet, an Imperial Cabinet for India, would be almost an impossibility. But it is an end I have not lost sight of. I think it incumbent on all who care for the future of India to make the attempt. India is now fast awaking from her lethargy of centuries. Many of her sons are fully awake. Some have already given themselves to historical enquiries. It is well that all should know something about the pit from which they have been digged. I know of no more interesting study in history than that of the coins of a country. Especially is this the case in India where the first work of a king on ascending the throne is to set his mint to work in order that throughout the length and breadth of his province, the circulating medium should inform the people as to the name and titles of the sovereign.

But many of the best coins of the country have already gone out of The cabinets of Sir Edward Clive Bayley, Mr. Edward Thomas, Alexander Grant, and General Cunningham contained many coins of which no second has as yet been found. It is true many have found a resting place in the British Museum. But many, e. q. the whole of the coins of Col. Stacey have been purchased for Berlin, and of late years St. Petersburgh has been enriched with many rare things from India. Now as India is the largest foreign possession of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Empress of India I beg to be allowed to enter respectfully a protest against this exportation of Indian historical treasures. Director General of the Archeological Surveys of India has issued an order to the effect that surveyors shall not collect for themselves. is excellent as far as it goes. I would suggest that the Government of India should lay aside a small sum every year, as does the Government of Great Britain and Ireland, for the purchase of coins only. This sum should be distributed amongst the Surveys. The present arangement is that the survey shall be carried on during the next four years. If during this time each surveyor exert himself numismatically, there is a prospect that a good collection may be started even now.

At home the British Museum possesses many duplicates especially in the cabinets of the India office collection. This collection ought of course to have been returned to India. I would suggest that at any rate the duplicates should be. The Museums in India are beginning to be important aids in the matter of education and especially in the matter of historical instruction. Lahore, Madras, Kurrachee and Calcutta are taking steps in the right direction. If the duplicate coins in these museums were sent off to museums not possessing them another important step would be gained. With duplicates from England and duplicates from sister institutions each Indian museum should during the next ten years be on the way to getting a fairly good representative cabinet of coins of the whole of the Empire. Meanwhile electro-types of the rarest coins ought to be supplied by the British Museum to all Indian museums So that after all if a student of Indian History wish to consult one of the sources whence the story of his country has been taken he should be able to study either the originals themselves or exact replicas of the originals. Of course in order that this may be brought to pass some one should be put in charge of the necessary arangements. An imperial officer should be appointed with power enabling him to exchange coins from one provincial museum to another. His chief aim, however, should be to look well to it that the Imperial Museum in Calcutta obtain a cabinet of coins which shall represent every dynasty that has at any time sat upon any throne in any and every province in India. Then he should see that every provincial museum possesses a cabinet representing the dynasties who have ruled in that province, and in adjoining provinces. In each museum lectures should be started on the coins it possesses already.

Buddhist and other legends about Khoten.—By BABU SARAT CHANDRA DAS, C. I. E.

Buddhist (Indian) legends connected with Li-yul.*

Buddha (Sakya Muni) after attaining to Nirvana for the cause of all living beings resided in twenty-one mansions.† Li-yul is the last of those, though in merit it is superior to all the others. In ancient times when Buddha Kashyapa appeared in this world, Li-yul was called the country of Chandana‡ where the sacred creed (Budh-

- * Li-yul. Li is a Tibetan word meaning kansa or bell-metal. Yul means a country. The Sanskrit for Li-yul is "Kansa Desa." This is probably the Ila Varta of Indian cosmogony.
- † The places or superb mansions which according to the Mahayana school were visited by Buddha Sakya Sinha.
- ‡ The earliest intercourse of the Indians with China was through Khoten which they called Chandana and it is very probable that they subsequently extended that designation to China.
- "Two letters of Pishabarma, king of Aratan to this emperor (Sung wenti) are preserved in the history of this dynasty. He describes his kingdom as lying in the shadow of the Himalayas whose snows fed the streams that watered it. He ism) was greatly propagated. After Kashyapa had passed away from sufferings (mundane existence) his remains were interred in the chorten* of Gomasalagandha. On account of its sanctity the sage Kharasha and others resided for a long time on the top of the mountain of Li-yul which from that time became a place of pilgrimage. Subsequently when unbelievers persecuted them, the sages soared on high, and fled to other countries; so that on the decline of Buddhism, Li-vul became a lake. After the lapse of a long time Sakya Muni appeared in Arya Varta where he worked for the salvation of all living beings. Before entering into Nirvana he charged the different Sramanas (guardians of Buddhism) with the protection of the Buddhist countries. Li-vul was entrusted to the care of Vaisramana.+ Yaksha and others. The teacher himself together with his followers soaring in the sky, visited Li-yul which had turned into a lake. Seated on a lotus high above the present site of Ghumtir Vihara which is situated on the bank of the river Shel Chhale, he blessed it. Rays praises China as the most prosperous of kingdoms, and its rulers as the benefactors and civilisers of the world." Edkin's Chinese Buddhism, 92. Referring to the name of China Mr. Edkins has the following note.

"The common Indian name of 'China' written in Chinese Chentan, is here employed. Another orthography found in Buddhist books is Chi-na. It is clear from the use of these characters, that the Indians who translated into Chinese at that early period, did not regard the word 'China' as the name of a dynasty, but as the proper name of the country to which it was applied. This leaves in great uncertainty the usual derivation of the term 'China' from the 'Dzin' dynasty B. C. 250 or that of Ts' in, A. D. 300. The occurrence of the word as the name of a nation in the 'Laws of Manu' supposed to date from some between B. C. 1000 and B. C. 500, with the use of the term 'Sinim' in the "Prophecies of Isaiah," indicate a greater antiquity than either of these dynasties extends to. Some have supposed that the powerful feudatory kingdom, Dzin, that afterwards grew into the dynasty of that name, may have originated the appellation by which the whole country subject to the Cheu emperors was known to the Hindus. Dzin occupied the north-western tract now called Shen-si and Kan-su. It was that part of China that would be first reached by traders coming from Kashgar, Samarcand, and Persia. Chen-tan, the other Hindu name of 'China' used in the Buddhist books, may be the Thinae of Ptolemy. When the first Buddhists reached China, the character used for writing the first of these two syllables would be called Tin, and soon afterwards Chin. In Julien's Méthode, &c., its Sanscrit equivalent is Chin. This would be somewhat late. Would it not be better, having traced the term to India, to make that country responsible for its etymology?"

- * Chorten (Chaitya), a Buddhist tope or stupa, it is a shrine intended to hold the relics of sanctified persons.

of light flashed from his person which being thrown back by the Buddhas and Bodhisattwas of the ten quarters, were re-absorbed on the teacher's head and a voice from heaven was heard, saying, "Let there be peace and happiness, Amen." Thereafter the Blessed One made magical demonstrations and prophecies about the spread of Buddhism. He commanded Shariputra to pierce the mountain with his trident and Vaisramana to hurl his javelin into it so that the waters might run out, when they did so, the teacher himself became absorbed in a big image which stopped on the top of Goshirsha hill. On the left side of the temple where now stands a small chorten he stayed seven days. Being asked by Ananda the circumstances of the lake's becoming dry, he said, "After I have entered into Nirvana this place will be called Li-yul and the fort called Wu-then* (Panchavati or Naden). A great city will then come into existence. At the time of its being ruled by Raja Grama, an image made of sandal-wood in which the scent of Buddha's person has been absorbed, will come from Aryavarta. Its kings and ministers will build three hundred and sixty viharas for the residence of male and female mendicants of the Mahayana school. Bodhisattwas who will worship the sacred image, monks and nuns and upasakas (lay devotees) who will always reside there will number five hundred. Half of them will be clergy. Bodhisattwas who are not destined to degradation and the followers of the Mahayana school in general will also reside there. This place will be sacred to the Buddhas of past, present and future times." Then commanding the Sramanas always to protect this country he allotted to them their respective charges. Then the lake became empty and the external symbols of Buddha Kashyapa, the chorten of Gomasala Gandha, Goshirsha Parbata, the walled city of Gewai Shul &c. reappeared.

Tibetan legend about Li-yul.

Two hundred and fifty years after the Nirvana of Buddha, Dharma Asoka the king of Aryavarta after committing many sins took the vow of erecting in Jambudwipa temples and chortens to the number of 84,000. He visited Li-yul where he found the lake dry and the country uninhabited. Coming to the spot where now stands the sacred ^{*} Wu-then—(Lúa-lden or Panchavati) was the chief city of Khoten. Wu in Chinese means from or than.

city of Wuthen (Khoten) he spent one night with his wife, and there she was delivered of a child possessed of good signs. The fortunetellers told the king that the child was destined to rule the kingdom before his (Asoka's) death. The king out of anger ordered the infant to be thrown away. The mother interceded but as the monarch would not retract the order, the child was cast on the ground. Owing to the merits of the child, there sprang out a teat from the ground, sucking which, it throve and grew up. Being suckled by the teat of the ground he was called Salana. It is said that when the mistress of king Asoka was bathing in a pleasure grove in Magadha, she happened to see Vaisraman, passing through the sky, and when her eyes met his, she conceived this child. At this time Che-he-Wang king of China who was an incarnate Bodhisattwa had got only 999 sons, although he was to have 1000. He now prayed to Vaisramana for another son to make up the number, saying that he would send him to rule over Li-yul which had been touched by Buddha's feet. Vaisramana presented Salana to him and asked him to accept him as the son.

Account of Li-yul (from Tibetan sources).

The Emperor of China Che-he-Wang (che-Hwante) sent one of his sons (Salana) with 10,000 troops in search of Li-yul; proceeding towards the west Salana arrived at Me-kar in Li-vul. Just at that time Yaksha the minister of king Asoka, who was in banishment, came to Li-yul with his parents, his brother and 700 followers in search of lands. When they were encamped above the river Shel-chhale Gongma of Wu-then, two of Salana's servants who had gone there in search of a runaway cow met them. The reason of their coming to Li-yul being known, and also it being a common interest of both to hold it, Salana, Yaksha and their followers agreed to remain as king, minister and subjects in the valley of Wu-then. The parties conferred at a place called Hanguji below Kora. A short time after this, they disagreed as to the division of the country. In the quarrel the gods (Vaisraman and Srideni) interceded. All the country below the river of Wu-then, i. e. Shel-chhu Gong-ma, and below Dolla Me-kar and Kamshing were given to Salana and his followers and thenceforward they belonged to the Chinese; and all the lands above the river Shel-chhu Gong-ma were given to Yaksha and his followers which thenceforth belonged to Arvavarta. Thus the country between the two Shel-chhu rivers being owned by the king, minister and subjects both of Aryavarta and China, according to their order and precedence they settled in it and founded cities and towns. The central place where the Chinese and Aryans came in contact with each other being the country of Li, its language became mixed. Anciently in Li the art of written language was taught by Bhikshu Vairochana an incarnation of Manj Ghosha to a shepherd boy by that saint's command. The character and language of Li greatly resembled those of the Aryans but their customs and manners mostly resembled those of China.

Two hundred and fifty-four years after the Nirvana of Buddha king Salana was born. He became king of Li in the 19th year of his age. Salana and minister Yaksha were the earliest king and minister of Li-yul (231 B. C.). After Salana his son Yeula* became king, and founded the city of Wuthen. Sixty-five years after the foundation of the kingdom of Li by Salana Viyaya Sambhava son of Yeula was born (166 B. C.). In the fifth year of his reign Buddhism was introduced into Li. King Vijaya Sambhava was an incarnation of Maitreya. During his reign Bhiksha Vairachana first taught the art of language to a shepherd boy from which beginning Buddhism gradually made progress. The king founded the vihara of Charma which was the first seat of Buddhism in Li-vul. Again Maitreya having reappeared in king Vijaya Virya, he greatly promoted the cause of Buddhism. erected the vihara of Ghumatir. A metrical romance of the chhorten of Gomasala Gandha being composed, the king imbiled much faith in the Buddhist creed and built the vihara of Girishwar on the top of Goshirsha.

After his reign, during two generations no viharas were established. Thereafter king Vijayayasa erected the chhortens of Potoya and Masha and another vihara of great sanctity. Vyayayasa had three sons. = ling y a flag The eldest named Dondo, + and the second named Dharmananta went to study Buddhism in Aryavarta. The youngest, Vijaya Dharma ruled over the kingdom. Being very warlike and valiant he used to be always fighting, and on account of his delight in bloodshed, he became very sinful. His elder brother Dharmananta after attaining Arhathood reclaimed him from leading a cruel and wicked life and by skilful devices induced him to make confession of his sins. The king erected a vihara on the site where in ancient times the great Muni (Buddha) on his birth as king Chandra Babha gave away his head in charity to Bráhmans. He also built a chhorten at Gyenteshan and a vihara in the grove of Bhybalong. Dondo on his return from Aryavarta met his brother and built the temple of Jamo Kokorang and the vihara of Sangter.

* This chronology seems to be approximately correct. This was the age of Che-Hwangte, the great Emperor of China, who erected the great wall and was contemporaneous with Asoka the mighty monarch of India. Their empires touched each other.

The legend is evidently a fabrication. The descendants of Salana who adopted Indian names, manners and customs probably did not like to trace their origin from either the Chinese or the Indians. The mother is allowed to be Indian and Vaisramana the divine head of the Yakshas is said to have fallen in love with her. He does not touch her but only looks at her from his ethereal passage, she miraculously conceives and delivers at Wuthen. Salana and his son Yi-ula who also bears a non-Aryan name were both Chinese.

Ye-u-la was the name of the son of Salana. It is probable that Ilavarta the country of a very fair people derived its name from the name of this king.

Vijaya Sunha the son of Vijaya Dharma founded the vihara and chhorten of Somna. Subsequently king Vijayakirti built the vihara of Sruno which exists to this day (time of writing the book from which this is compiled), being saved from the ravages of the river by a Naga. His son Vijaya Sangrama at the advice of Arhat Jnanayaksha built the viharas of Dharmatir and Gheynshan. His son king Vijaya 16. 2 Sunha miraculously visited Maitreya and erected the vihara of Shaserna. After the reign of his son king Vijaya Bala, for six generations no viharas were erected. Then king Vijaya-santrema obtained an image of Buddha from Chugasan which is said to have come from the sky. He built a shrine for this image and a chhorten. At the advice of Arhat Mergude Abhaya Dhanya he built the vihara of Shasanuna. After the reign of his son king Vijaya Satu, for four generations no monasteries were built. The king Vijayakirti having been exhorted by a certain Naga king founded the vihara of Bhabana. During the reign of this king, Li-yul was conquered by a Tibetan king and made a dependency of Tibet. The king and his son Vijayagram Gupta fled to China-during their absence the prime minister of Li named Ama Chhagumay governed the state in the capacity of regent. During his government the vihara and chhorten of Manadhe were built. On his return from China king Vijayagram Gupta built the vihara of Gyeshidema. Thereafter the Chinese Generals Ser-thise and Ka-these erected the viharas of Maitriya, Bhau (khar) fort and The king erected the great chhorten of Sátona at Tshalmoi-tshed* where in ancient times Arya Vairochana had taught first the art of language to a shepherd boy.

The vihara of Bhavana was built in the year when Gar-long-toan† the general of king Srang-toan-jampo invaded Li-yul.

^{*} Tshal-moi-tshal. This is a Tibetan word meaning garden of gardens.

On the site of that chhorten king Vijaya Vahana and a Chinese monk named Balasha erected a monastery. The wives of the kings of the Salana dynasty occasionally followed the example of their husbands and built viharas in order that they might accumulate merit for themselves. The following are some of the principal monasteries of Li-yul: Nuona, Ossojo, Sserojo, Soyen-ro, Demoja, Kobrojo, Horonjo, Yermono: Khosomno, Guterima, Okono, Kuchye, (Black hole), Chunono, Khyeno, Namobhathong, Anoyono. Counting the viharas, in and outside of the city of Wuthen there were 60 large viharas, 95 of medium size, and 448 temples.

In Dollo and Mikar there were four large viharas and upwards of 100 temples with 124 monks—above Kameshang and below Jili, in the towns of Phuna, Begada, Oku and also in their suburbs there were 23 large viharas, 21 middle-sized viharas, and 62 temples with about 438 monks belonging to the Lekyen and Goi-tsho schools, 39 of the temples contained 8 chhorten in each.

Below the towns Duryamo and Kesheng and above Gyel-kyan and Isarma there were about 15 large viharas besides many chhorten and temples with about 963 monks of both schools.

From the introduction of Buddhism into Li-yul during the reign of king Vijaya Shambhava, the grandson of Salana, up to the present time (the year when the account of Li-yul was recorded) counting the years from the autumn of every year without the intercalary months, there have elapsed 1,253 years. From the time of king Salana there have been 51 generations of kings and one regency.

During the reign of king Vijayakirti in the country called Sangapatana near the vihara of Sangayaprahana there lived a hermit named Sangaya Dhara. One of his pupils seeing a prophecy with the Vinaiti Pandits Chandragarbha and Dharma asked him if it was true.

The prophecy ran thus-

For two thousand years after the Nirvana of Buddha in the country of Li-yul, the reflection of the sacred Dharma and sacred relics will exist. Thereafter the Buddhist creed will decline when the three countries of Li, Shuli, and Anshe will be conquered by China, Tibet tsang consented to give in marriage the princess Wen Ching—it was Lu-tang-tsan (Lon-Tong-tsan) who was sent by Tsanpá to receive her.

This was evidently king Srong-tsan Gampo. During the reign of his grandson, the Tibetans extended their arms further west, vide Dr. Bushell's early history of Tibet. "In the first year Hsein Shing (670 A. D.) in the fourth month, they (the Tibetans) invaded and destroyed eighteen of the subject Chaon (outside frontier) and led the people of Yu-tin (Khoten) to capture the Chin-tsa-Pohnan Chéng. Thereupon the four Military Governments of Anhsi were all given up." and So Chyi Dugu and Hor. Then a Bodhisattwa being born as king of the Dongma (Tibet) Buddhism will rise in Tibet where viharas and chhorten will be erected, two classes of clergy will be introduced and by degrees kings and ministers will be converted. Professors and teachers of Buddhism from other countries, and many excellent precepts (scriptures) will be introduced. The country of Li will then pass under the rule of that king of Tibet whose descendants to the seventh generation will be devoted to the immaculate creed.

In the country of Li, about the time of the decline of Buddhism its young king disliking the sacred creed expelled the Buddhist clergy and by degrees drove away those of the temples of Tsharma, Bong, Mekar, Kongnu &c. The expelled clergy with their sacred books and religious articles fled towards the country of Dongma (Tibet) and proceeding slowly as if guided by a laden yak arrived at a place called Tshal in Tibet; their elders were taken to the king of Dongma whose wife was a Chinese princess; she extended her patronage to them and inquiring if there were more monks in Li-vul she sent for thosethat were still there. These men brought with them many pandits from Anshe, Shuli,* Brusha (Dusha) and Kashmir. These Buddhists conducted religious services in the viharas of Tibet for three years, after which the princess+ died of small-pox. At that time many people died of that disease. The ministers and officers of Tibet then holding a conference unanimously declared against permitting the Buddhist clergymen to remain in Tibet. They attributed this dire calamity to these monks who being expelled from Lhodal (Nepal) had settled in Tibet, the Bandes‡ from Aryavarta and the Tibetan monks were therefore compelled to fly towards the west to the country of Maha Gandhara, whither they carried all their religious books, &c. These Buddhist clergy of Jambu Dwipa were cordially received by the king of Maha Gandhara who supported them for a period of two years. In the meantime the king died leaving two sons who were Buddhists. Some ambitious Bandes taking advantage of the reigning king's devotion to them killed him and usurped the throne. The king's younger brother with the help of his ministers and subjects killed the Bathdi usurpers and forced all the Buddhists to leave Maha Gandhara. They proceeded towards the country of Ke-u-sha where they found shelter. "The religion (Buddhism) had now long been established in Nepal and Independent Tartary, as the travels of the patriarchs indicate. It had also extended itself throughout India and Ceylon, and the persecution of the Bráhmans instigated partly by controversal feeling and more by a desire to increase their caste influence had not yet com-Long before this, it is stated that in B. C. 217, Indians had arrived at the capital of China in Shen-si in order to propagate their religion. Remusat, after mentioning this in the Foe-koue-ki, adds that, towards the year B. C. 122 a warlike expedition of the Chinese led them to Hieow-thou a country beyond Yarkand. Here a golden statue was taken and brought to the emperor. The Chinese author states that this was the origin of the statues of Buddha that were afterwards in use" "Edkin," Chinese Buddhism, p. 88.

"Kumarajiva, was brought to China from K'u-tsi a kingdom in Tibet, east of the Ts'ung-ling mountains. The king of Ts'in had sent an army to invade that country, with directions not to return without the Indian whose fame had spread among all the neighbouring nations. The former translations of the Buddhist sacred books were to a great extent erroneous. To produce them in a form more accurate, and complete was the task undertaken by the learned Buddhist just mentioned, (Kumarajiva), at the desire of the king. More than 800 priests were called to assist, and the king, himself, an ardent disciple of the new faith was present at the conference, holding the old copies in his hand as the work of correction proceeded. More than 300 volumes were thus prepared," l. c. p. 90.

Extract from "Dsam-ling Gyeshe" by Tsanpo Noman Khan of Amdo.

The country called Thokar by the Tibetans and vulgarly Malaya Phokhar or Little Phokhar is identified by some with Li-yul. The description given in history of Chaudan Choui the famous image of Buddha in China and the accounts given in the travels of Thangssin tally with some accounts mentioned in the Kálachakra that Li-yul was situated somewhere in the north of Tibet. Many Tibetan authors in their description of Li-yul have confounded its position. Some say Li-yul is in Mongolia, some say Li-yul is a province of Tibet; according to others Li is Pal-yul, (Nepal).

This country of Li is divided into eight parts of which Kasikara is the chief. The fort of Yamkasar &c., is included in it. There are many Hor and Chinese possessions in Li-yul. To the east of Khokan and Angiyan, &c., there is a chain of lofty snowy mountains, to the east of which lies the country of Sulanu Okshi now vulgarly called Oosi, where is Arbu Parvata or the wonderful mountain. Its rocks contain curious figures and Thangssin mentions the existence of some (Gagnom) Buddhist ascetics who had attained the state of suspended animation. Some among them were known to have lived many ages.

To the south-east of it close to the snowy mountains lies the province of Kasikara (Kashgar), the capital city of which is Kasikara with the fort of Yamkasar.

These places were visited by the Chinese traveller Thangssin, who found them filled with a Buddhist population and with religious establishments. Subsequently the country was overrun by the Golog Lalo (Muhammadans) who demolished Buddhism and converted the people to Muhammadanism. During the great dispute between the Sakyapa and Digumpa schools, the Kasikar in the strife, troops and generals took part, and are said to have been all killed. Now-a-days a Chinese frontier officer holds it.

To the south-east of Kasikara is the large province of Yarkhan the Sanskrit name of which is Arghan, there is a remarkable mineral spring in Arghan well-known by the name of Bula. There are also mines of precious stones besides that remarkable stone called yangti or jade.

The river Sita (White River) one of the four great rivers mentioned in the sacred books, issuing from the bright glacial slopes of the Himavat Parvata, flows through this country towards lake Mansorowara. Sita is also called Arghan as if it were the water of ablution for gods, whence the country derives its name. The water of the Sita is of a milky white colour. Thangssin calls this country by the name of Sukakai. To the south of Yarkhan there is a desert which having crossed, we arrive at the country called Gosthan or place of virtue now vulgarly called Khothan or (Khoten) which contains the mountain of Langri (Goshirsha) mentioned in the religious work called Langri Lungtan. There formerly existed the great chhorten (chaitya) Gomasala Ganda and many Buddhist temples and viharas, but after the country was overrun by Muhammadans, those were demolished. The Muhammadans of Khotan now designate Langri by the name Gorusheshi, evidently a corrupt form of the name of Gosirsha or cow's head. To the south-east of Khotan and Yarkhan lies the Nahri province of Tibet and Ladak. On account of the extensive barren plains and lofty snowy ranges which intervene between Khotan and Ladak, there is great difficulty of communication. To the east of Khotan there is a vast sandy desert and also a river of which mention is made in Thangssin's travels. Lamas Redama and Manlingpa and others confound this river with the head waters of the Machhu (Hoangho). It is called Gasheshi. Then if one travels eastward he arrives at a place called Puan-khar. The vast arid and sandy regions lying on the north of Thokar, Li-yul, China, Kooli (Corea) were designated Sukatana (dry lands) by the ancient Indians. To the north-east of Kasikara lies the province of Illi and to the south not at a great distance from it, lies Akusu (kupir) which Thangssin designated by the name of Bharo, not far from which is situated Tasu tasa. To the east of Akasu lies Guchhe of Li-yul, now called Khu-chhu or Khuthe. These were anciently places of Buddhist pilgrimage. It was from Khuthe that the image of Chaudana Choui of China was carried to the court of the emperor of Ts'in. To the east of Yarkhan and Khuthe lies the Lalo country called Kerwashar or Kharashar containing a fort, at some distance from which are the towns of Athashara, Karlo, Haimthu, The-chin, Talon, &c., inhabited by the Gokar people. To some distance from these places is situated the winter residence of Thorkod Khan. To the east of these lie the two provinces of Thurphan and Eshwa now called Eshora which are known by the general name of Eeshi-thur-phan. In Eshora there are numerous images of Arhats and other Indian saints, as well as the tombs and birth places of many Arhats of ancient time. To the north of Thurphan lie Danemig &c., not far from which to the east lies Hwamil called Khomal (probably Komal of Marco Polo), to the east of which lies a portion of the Great Desert. After crossing the desert and some mountains one reaches the western extremity of the Great Wall. whole of this vast country between Samarkhan and Hwamil, and also including Shachu, Suchon, Kanchan, Lanchan, Liyi, Oorumussthar, Bakatu was included in the kingdom of Li-yul. The people of Li-yul were anciently a well-to-do people and their number was immense. In Li-yul the heat in summer and the cold in winter are very great. The country is rainless, and the people draw water (hardly enough for their wants) from glacial streams and from wells. They grow wheat, rice, peas, arhar, gram, different kinds of peaches (white and black) kakati, kachtya, karakashe, holpe, chipaka, apricots and a kind of grapes called bhasur, as well as different kinds of water-melons suchás, turtinga, and kharlinga. They are martial, stalwart, very strong, and straightforward.
